Pieces

JENNIFER VANDERMEER

The telephone in the hall doesn't ring.
Laughter rarely echoes
between these walls.

Our mouths have no more need to smile.
Cracked wine glasses lie in a corner among pieces of a faded photograph, the celebration long over.

Angry words reverbrate
through the window, piercing the roses planted in spring, whitering delicate petals.

A door slams
tires spin on gravel
then, silence—
tears dry
and dust from the road
settles among the pieces of photograph,
petals, and glass.
