

Editors' letter

This is the first issue with Phyllis Illari and Federica Russo as joint Editors-in-Chief. We are absolutely delighted to be on board and begin the job.

Nevertheless, this issue remains almost entirely the result of the efforts and dedication of the founding Editors-in-Chief Mauro Dorato and Carl Hoefer, and the outgoing Associate Editors Jesus Zamora Bonilla, Isabelle Drouet, and Thomas Pradeu. The whole community owes them, and the outgoing Editorial Board, an enormous debt of gratitude for creating this journal, and we would like to add our personal thanks for a handover that could not have been warmer or more collegial.

In the past months we have formed a new team of Associate Editors:

- Annamaria Carusi, University of Sheffield
- Melinda Bonnie Fagan, University of Utah
- Mathias Frisch, Leibniz University, Hannover
- Marcin Milkowski, Polish Academy of Sciences
- Dunja Šešelja, Ruhr University Bochum
- David Teira, UNED, the Spanish Open University

Which together offer a very broad range of competence, including philosophy of the social science, biology and bio-medicine, mind & brain, physics and climate science. We also offer competences in formal philosophy and in STS.

We have also renewed the editorial board, which can be seen on the website (<https://link.springer.com/journal/13194>). Between the Editors-in-Chief, the Associate Editors, and the Editorial Board, the journal can reasonably claim to represent philosophy of science in most of its sub-fields, with good gender balance, very broadly across Europe, with some colleagues from North and Central America. We have been profoundly grateful for the enthusiasm and dedication of so many colleagues to the project of EJPS, and we offer you all our heartfelt thanks.

In the coming months we will present more information about editorial choices, strategies, and so on for the coming years. Perhaps you will already have met us in person at the Meet-the-Editors session planned during EPSA17 in Exeter, and if not you will hear from us at other conferences and venues about our vision for EJPS and the Philosophy of Science community.

Stay tuned @EuroJPS or contact us at editors.ejps@gmail.com.
