INTRODUCTION

The use of collections of text in language study is not a new idea. Scholars in the Middle Ages made lists of all the words in a particular text, together with their contexts – what we today call concordancing. The easy and quick access of large quantities of data has increased the use of corpora in language study. With the availability of the computer to process natural occurring language and the wider availability of institutional and private computing facilities, interest in corpus linguistics has grown considerably. Now more and more universities are offering courses in corpus linguistics and are using corpora in their language teaching and research. Few would now consider doing language study without some use of corpus data. And for many, “... The notion of attempting descriptive language work without reference to empirical data would be regarded as perverse” (Rundell, 1996).

PROBLEM STATEMENT

In Malaysia currently, minimal attempts have been made to establish a corpus as a reference for researchers to pursue various language studies within the context of Malaysian Business English. The need to establish a corpus for Malaysian Business English is unquestionable as such database opens up numerous research possibilities in the area of corpus linguistics, language teaching and learning and language for specific purposes and many other fields. Sinclair (1991) pointed out that “the beginning of any corpus study is the creation of the corpus itself.” Thus the purpose of this study is to create a database of Malaysian Business English.

RESEARCH OBJECTIVES

The general objective of the study is to establish a Malaysian business English database. Specifically, the study aims:

1. To identify the kinds of English business texts that Malaysians read.
2. To identify the types of English businesses writing that Malaysians do.
3. To build an electronic database of Malaysian business English.

SIGNIFICANCE OF STUDY

The database/corpus of Malaysian Business English would allow for the study of language as revealed in the naturally occurring data. The corpus would enable the study of some linguistic phenomenon as a teaching resource, the study of language acquisition, the study of language for specific purposes, in this case for business purposes, and the discovery of facts about Malaysian Business English. The establishment of the corpus would also prove useful to educators, learners, and textbook writers. The establishment of a corpus of Malaysian Business English, would also encourage research in corpus linguistics as the corpus would be useful for the description, testing and verification of theory (Kirk, 1996). Besides, publishers can also use the corpus commercially to produce Malaysian business English books.

REVIEW OF LITERATURE

This section entails the definition of corpus, its characteristics and its usage in relation to the development of language.

What is a corpus?

‘Corpus’ is derived from the Latin word meaning body, may be used to refer to any text in written or spoken form (University of Essex). Based on the Old English Dictionary, ‘corpus’ or the plural ‘corpora’ has three definitions. It can be referred to as i) the body of a man or animal, ii) a structure of a special character or function in the animal body or iii) a complete collection of writings and the like. McArthur & McArthur (1992) defined corpus with reference to linguistics and lexicography as “a body of texts, utterances, or other specimens considered more or less representative of a language, and usually stored as an electronic database”. This body of text must be carefully sampled to be maximally representative of the language and the language variety (Kirk, 1996). A corpus can be thought of as a collection of texts gathered according to particular principles of some particular purposes (Warwick, 1997; Atkins, Clear, & Olster, 1992). Crystal (1991) defined corpus as "a collection of linguistic data, either written texts or a transcription of recorded speech, which can be used as a starting-point of linguistic description or as a means of verifying hypotheses about a language".

However, in modern linguistics corpus can be referred to any text in written or spoken form which encompasses a large collections of texts which represent a sample of a particular variety or use of language(s) that are presented in a machine readable form.

Since corpus is a collection of texts, thus, there are 3 main characteristics of what constitute the modern corpus, which include i) sampling and representativeness, ii) finite size and iii) machine readable form.

Types of corpora

There are many different types of corpora (Corpus linguistics). The corpora ranges from written, spoken (transcribed language), modern or old texts from one or several languages. The selection of text may include whole books, newspapers, journals, speeches or even extracts of varying length. The decisions or choices made on the kinds of texts and combination of different texts vary and depend on the corpora and corpus types.

The first type of corpora is what is termed as 'General Corpora', which consist of general texts of different kinds or with various fields or register. The British National corpus is an example of this kind. Another type of corpora, contain texts that are sampled or chosen from a particular variety of a language, is called 'Sublanguage Corpora'. This kind of corpora may look at a single text type or subject field or even a specific kind of register from a particular dialect or subject area. The third type of corpora is 'Parallel Corpus', which looks at translation, thus studying a same text in different languages. A 'Comparable Corpus' compares a collection of similar text.

Why study corpus?

Corpus linguistics is the study of linguistic phenomena through large collections of machine-readable texts: corpora (Corpus linguistics). Kirk (1996) contends that it has a methodological bias referring to the use of corpora and computers as tools for analysis and to the use to the use of the results as a basis for interpretation in the study of any aspect of language. The four key general features of corpus linguistics that make it a way of doing language study are: i) it focuses on linguistic performance rather than on competence, ii) it focuses on description rather than on linguistic universals, iii) it focuses on quantitative--as well as qualitative--models of language, and iv) it presents a more empiricist rather than a rationalist view of scientific inquiry (Kirk, 1996).

A corpus is valuable because "together its component texts allow statements to be made about language as a whole" (Warwick, 1997). The importance of corpora to language study is related to the importance of empirical data, which allows linguists to make objective quantitative claims rather than a subjective one, which usually is based on the individual's own internalised cognitive perception of language. Because data can be transferred in machine-readable form, thus it allows one to study language through specimens of language use of a wide and various kind.

Some of the reasons or areas for the use of corpus are:

- a) Linguistics: to study linguistic competence or performance as revealed in naturally occurring data, using annotated text.

- b) Diachronic: able to analyse a systematic collection of data
Linguistics

- c) Computational: to train/test a natural language processing system on a Linguistics representative sample of the kinds of texts the system is expected to process or to build large lexicons in a given domain.

- d) Applied: First/Second language acquisition research: supplement/replace Linguistics elicitation.

Language teaching/learning: language for specific purposes (e.g. newspaper corpora, corpora of business texts); to prepare vocabulary lists based on high-frequency lexical items; to prepare CLOZE tests, to answer ad hoc learner questions; to discover facts about language.

(Ball, 1997)

Thus the best justification of corpora in linguistic research is their usefulness for the description itself as well as for the testing and verification of theory which lends into its contribution to language teaching.

A brief review of the current development of corpus building

The use of corpora or collections of texts in language study could be traced back to the middle ages. Much of the work done then was similar to the kind of corpus based research carried out today but, of course, without the convenience of technology. Prior to 1960s processing texts of several million words in length was considered impossible. But the availability of computers and the surge of interest in computing had made computational linguistics fashionable. 1961 saw an attempt made by Quirk to construct Survey of English Usage (SEU). In the same year, the work on Brown Corpus of Standard American English began and this corpus later became the first modern electronically readable corpus. The corpus consists of one million words of American English texts. Other corpus compilers later copied its layout. The LOB (Lancaster-Oslo-Bergen) corpus, for instance, was made to match the Brown Corpus. For years the Brown Corpus and the LOB were the only easily available computer readable corpora.

With technological advances, however, more releases were made, such as the release of the London-Lund Corpus, Cobuild's Bank of English (BoE), and the British National Corpus. A growing number of corpora are also available in other languages as well, which have been released in the form of monolingual or multilingual. There is also a large, and growing, amount of highly specialized corpora that are created for a special purpose such as the Air

Traffic control corpus

A more significant development is the diversification in corpus building whereby collection of specific domain is the prime focus, such as corpus of conversational English from University of Nottingham (Carter and McCarthy, 1995) and academic texts done by University of Reading or better known as RAT Corpus (Carne, 1996). Rundell (1996) claimed that Specialized corpora, based on text which are specifically defined in its characteristics, such as computer manuals, or in highly specific domains, like cancer research, are becoming increasingly common. There has also been growth in the area of 'learner corpora' – text collections assembled from essays, report or assignments written by non-native learners of English. Corpora of this type would be of great value in teaching of English. Similarly corpora of specific domains would be highly valuable to add to the body of existing literature.

Approaches in corpus building

Creating a corpus, which is maximally representative of the variety under examination provides us with a near accurate picture of the tendencies of that variety and their proportions. To ensure validity in text collection, size of the corpus is one of the major and critical factors that need to be considered. One of Chomsky's (1964, 1968) criticisms of the corpus approach was that language is infinite, which means that any corpus would be skewed whereby some utterances would be excluded because they are rare, others which are much more common might be excluded because they are rare, others which are much more common might be excluded by chance and alternatively extremely rare utterances might also be included several times.

According to Rundell (1996) there is a continuum of basically two approaches that corpus developers can adopt. One is called the opportunistic approach and the other is principled approach. Opportunistic approach to corpus building entail collecting whatever data that can be easily obtained while the principled approach, similar to Brown Corpus model, only looks at appropriate text which is collected to match a carefully-designed specification.

The corpus can also be collected by adding texts to the existing ones so that it gets bigger. This is called a monitor corpus. However, corpus can also consist of a finite number of words, for example Brown Corpus consists of one million running words of text. Usually this figure is determined at the beginning of a corpus-building project. When the corpus reaches its grand total of words, collection stops and the corpus is not increased in size.

Of late corpus almost always implies the additional feature of machine-readable. In the past it was just referring to printed text. Machine-readable corpora possess the following advantages over written or spoken formats in terms of speed, where it is easily and quickly access as well as it can easily be enriched and added with extra information. Having corpora in machine-readable format would also encourage quicker and accurate analysis.

SCOPE AND LIMITATION

The corpus established is restricted to the collection of written texts produced in the Malaysian business context. It uses only what that can be obtained. As such the extent of its validity is the extent of the representativeness of the materials that have been used.

METHODOLOGY

Subjects:

1. Companies

The initial sample comprises companies that placed job advertisement in the New Straits Times and the STAR for the month of January 2004. However, only advertisements that included the names and addresses of the companies were used. The actual sample used comprised those companies that responded to the questionnaire survey.

2. Printed texts

These include all the commercially printed texts such as newspapers, trade magazines, pamphlets, etc. and written materials produced by the respondents' organizations.

Data collection procedure:

The data collection process was divided into two phases.

Phase 1: Identification of relevant materials

In this phase a questionnaire developed by the researchers was sent to the selected companies to solicit information on the types of English materials they read and kinds of writing in English they do.

Phase 2: Collection of data

In this phase a letter asking for samples of writing in English was sent to the companies responded in the initial survey. The researchers also visited some companies to collect the materials needed. Besides collecting company generated materials, the researchers also collected commercially produced printed materials available.

Instrument

The study used a questionnaire (refer to appendix 1) developed by the researchers to identify the types of materials to be collected.

Data processing

The materials collected were transformed into electronic form and merged to form a single database.

FINDINGS

Phase 1

The questionnaire was sent to 565 companies that placed job advertisement in the New Straits Times and the STAR for the month of January 2004. However, only 218 companies responded. It represented a return rate of 38.6%. The companies responded came from all the industries listed in the companies. However, a number of the industries were not well represented. The companies in the 'others' categories were mainly from sub-fields of major categories. The statistics are as shown in Table 1 below.

Phase 2

Collection of company generated materials

A letter requesting materials published by company or written by personnel was sent to the 218 companies responded in the initial survey. Of the 218 companies, only 44 companies obliged. The companies responded appear to come from a limited number of the categories of industries listed in the questionnaire. Most of the companies responded are diversified in their business activities. The list of companies that responded is shown in appendix 2.

Collection of commercially produced materials

The business related magazines read by the management personnel and other business related materials such as brochures and fliers were also collected. Besides these, the business section of major newspapers was used as well. The list of commercial materials used is shown in appendix 3.

The written Malaysian Business English database

A total of slightly more than 23 million words (tokens) were collected. The types of words collected are as shown in appendix 4. The total number of words under each alphabet is as shown in table 2. Only words that are found in dictionary are used. All proper nouns are excluded as is normally practised. The words are listed as what they are and in the form of 'types'. A word may exist in the British form, American form, or both the British and American forms. No attempt has been made to categorise them in other ways as the main purpose of this study is just to build a database of written business English.

The distribution of words shows that eight of the alphabets, a, b, c, f, i, o, s, t, have more than a million words each. The missing of any x word in the materials collected is most probably due to the limited number of words with the initial 'x'. This is not unusual. The two thousand common words used by the Longman Dictionary of Contemporary English (2003) as the defining vocabulary do not contain any 'x-word'.

The 50 most frequently used words

The 50 most frequently used words are shown in Table 3. 14 of the words are often used in business. The word ‘company’ is the most frequently used. With the exception of the business related words, the other words are quite similar to those found in other corpora, for example, the British National Corpus (Leech, Rayson, & Wilson, 2001). Majority of these non-business words are function words such as the, of, and, which, etc. The word ‘the’ occurs about two millions times in the database which accounted for almost 10 percent of the total number of words collected. Three other words ‘from’, ‘of’, and ‘and’ occurred more than a million times.

DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSION

This study was designed to collect a representative sample of the Malaysian Business English, as is reflected in commercially published business related materials and materials produced by business organisations. The study has, to certain extent, achieved the objective. It must also be made known that the corpus could be made much more representative by including materials from all categories of industries that are found in Malaysia. As to the usefulness of the corpus, as mentioned by Hunston (2002), it all depends on the purpose of the study one intends to conduct. Many corpora contain only a million words or more (Ball, 1997) as it is the norm to use a million words as the base line for comparison. Twenty three million words in a raw state of unannotated plain text are more than sufficient as a starting point for the construction of an annotated corpus for use in the description of the use of English in the Malaysian business context.

The effort to establish this specialised corpus has revealed a number of constraints that had been overlooked at the conceptualisation stage of the study. A major obstacle that was hindering the collection is the financial resource allocated for the coding process. The conversion of print-based text to electronic form was more tedious and time consuming than expected. It took much longer than the estimated time. The collection of words could be much bigger if there were more financial resources to support the coding process. An additional problem associated with the conversion is the degree of readability of the scanned text. Much editing has to be done to make it readable by the computer software used.

In conclusion, the researchers are excited about the potential uses and benefits that can be derived from the study of the corpus created. However, all these benefits can only be secured when the corpus has been fully annotated. This endeavour should be pursued in the near future.
