Biographical and Historical Note

Charles Waddell Chesnutt was the first successful African-American novelist. Fayetteville, N.C. was the hometown of Chesnutt's parents, who fled to Cleveland, Ohio because of the restrictions on free Blacks in the South. It was here that Charles was born. After the Civil War, the family moved back to Fayetteville where Chesnutt grew up. Charles attended the Howard School, founded in 1867 by his father, Andrew J. Chesnutt and six other men in Fayetteville. Charles worked in his father's store, where he heard the latest political developments discussed and also heard stories of superstition and conjuration. Charles listened and learned. Much of the material was later used for his stories and novels. His keen sense of humor and sharp ear for dialect (the language spoken by many Blacks at that time) were manifest in several of his works. From 1881 to 1883, Charles served as the second (2nd) Principal of the Howard School, known today as Fayetteville State University.

After Chesnutt's marriage in 1878, his concern about "closed doors" and racial prejudice in the south deepened. He decided to move his family to Cleveland, Ohio. Here he became a successful lawyer, but he continued to write to "exalt his race" and protest racial prejudice. The "Goophered Grapevine" (1887) was the first work by an African American to be accepted by the Atlantic Monthly. The Conjure Woman (1889) was his first book.
