UPD installs new safety tech

BY CINTHIA LOERA
Staff Writer

The San Jose State University Police Department (UPD) is working towards adding more technology on campus in the near future in order to help students feel safer.

"We're here to educate. We're here to keep the campus safe," Captain Alan Cavallo said. "We want you to have an experience so that you can get a quality education and become a contributor and not feel unsafe."

Security cameras as well as five gunshot recognition detectors were placed around campus. Although UPD does not currently have personnel watching the surveillance footage at all times, Cavallo explained that some of the 24 cameras have intuitive technology that alerts dispatchers if there is any activity happening late at night in certain areas.

FIELD DAY

SJSU students break heat with icebreakers

BY SALVATORE MAXWELL
Staff Writer

Students enjoyed the "Wet and Wild Field Day" held by the Latino Business Student Association on Tuesday afternoon.

Wet and Wild Field Day was put together in order to bring more attention to the association itself following its presence at the Student Organization Fair, which was held earlier that day.

The association's board members got active with old and new students by playing games such as water balloon toss and ladderball toss. The LBSA provided attendees with Otter Pops to cool down from the intense summer heat.

The event was organized so that all members could have the opportunity to interact and get to know each other by learning what the LBSA provides for students on campus.

According to the association's Facebook page, its mission is to "promote a diverse and open environment to continuously develop students into leaders by providing resources and guidance."

LBSA offers many career improvement and professional development opportunities through workshops in order for members to improve their leadership skills.

"What takes place in those workshops is usually a company comes in and leads a workshop," said management senior and LBSA president, Daniel Espinoza.

Espinoza added that the association offers help with everything from resume assistance to mock interviews, as well as tips for LinkedIn profiles and personal branding.

LBSA helps guide their members into landing jobs and internships for companies such as Hewlett-Packard, Apple and Sony.

The association prides itself in the principles of making all ethnicities feel welcomed in the organization, on and off campus. LBSA has been recruiting members since its establishment in 2008.

"With events like today is what kept me going, just meeting the people, being apart of the club, just making genuine relationships," said public administration senior Mathew.

The LBSA will hold its kickoff event this Thursday Sept. 7 from 6 to 7 p.m. in room 324 of the Boccardo Business Complex.

The event is for new and future incoming associates to meet all the official board members. They will provide tacos and refreshments for associates.

According to their website, UPD offers services including the SJSU Safe Ride program, which offers shuttle rides off campus from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. They also provide on campus police escorts and offer an app called RAVE Guardian.

This app allows students to set up timers when walking alone from campus. If the timers are not turned off by the student when they arrive at their destination, their "guardians" – emergency contacts input by the student – will be contacted. Additionally UPD will be notified, and will call student to make sure everything is okay. Both Cavallo and Silva advise students to be aware of their surroundings and try to walk in groups. Both officers also emphasized how important it is for students to not be so consumed by their phones because they might miss signs of suspicious activity happening around them.

Kinesiology sophomore Cierra Mothershed said she does feel safe on campus for the most part but is not quite satisfied with UPD's escort services.

"A lot of the time they're really slow so it's not really helpful," Mothershed said. "Their response time is terrible."

Business sophomore Jenny Voong said she feels safer on campus during the day but tends to make sure she always walks in groups at night.

"I do sometimes worry when they tell me someone got sexually harassed in this building and I tend to avoid that building completely," Voong said.

She added that although the Alert SJSU texts she receives do worry her, she appreciates how UPD notifies students in a timely manner.

Cavallo explained that UPD officers are real San Jose police officers who are armed and able to take people into custody.

Cavallo and Silva said that their main goal as officers is to educate the campus community and maintain a safe environment in order to make everybody's experience at SJSU great.

"We do our best to try to be there for anybody and everybody that might need us," Silva said.

Policy change limits Fourth Street student parking permits

BY MOHAMED BAFAKIH
Staff Writer

Fourth Street Garage is losing $35,000 from San Jose State University students as 200 less semester-long parking permits have been assigned this fall.

In the past, 350 permits were assigned to students for $175 per semester (Monday through Friday) at the public, city-owned lot on the corner of Fourth and San Fernando streets. The garage only offered 150 this semester – excluding Wednesdays – at the same rate due to an agreement with the Rotary Club of San Jose.

"[The] first day I came in [the Fourth Street Garage], which was Wednesday, they said no parking on Wednesdays," biology senior Dalton Tran said. "So I had to pay $20 because I had classes all day, and that was $20 out of my pocket that was supposed to go to the permit."

Tran wasn't allowed to purchase a permit on two separate occasions at the start of the semester until his schedule had six or more credits as part of the parking lot requirement. He was waitlisted, so by the time he was enrolled and returned a week and a half later, all parking permits were sold.

According to SP+, the organization which manages and operates the garage, semester-long permits were sold out in the first four days of the semester.

Additionally, those who managed to purchase a permit aren't able to park onsite on Wednesdays – that's when the Rotary Club holds its weekly meeting at the Rotary Summit Center on the seventh floor next to the garage. Key cards given to students don't work on Wednesdays.

It isn't clear how much the Rotary Club pays for spots, but according to the organization, there is a $20 fee for lunch and it includes free parking inside Fourth Street Garage. For the general public, $20 is the price for an all-day parking pass on weekdays there. "It's really frustrating parking around here," Tran said, as he's been parking on the street daily to avoid the garages since the start of the semester.

Main campus parking – which can be purchased at $192 for each day of the semester – fills up quickly. Though he wasn't aware of free parking for the first week at the Park and Ride Lot, Tran mentioned that he'd rather avoid the shuttle busses.

Industrial technology senior Alan Auduong, who has been parking at Fourth Street Garage for two to three years, managed to get a parking permit again this semester on the second day of classes.

"This semester has been OK," Auduong said about his parking situation. "It's not that inconvenient because I only have one class on Wednesdays... considering a lot more people are parking on-campus versus [Fourth Street], it's a bit more convenient."

However, he had to park at the North Garage of the main campus last Wednesday for five dollars.

Aduong said he'll continue to park at the North Garage on Wednesdays, which at the end of the semester could potentially see an $85 increase to his current $175 permit fee.

In the past, there was assurance that parking served as a more reasonable alternative as parking was guaranteed for students Monday through Friday.

"When I was a student here and I parked in the student lots, I'd have to get to school like an hour early just to find a spot," SJSU alumna and current volunteer on campus Andrea Heine said. "Here [at Fourth Street Garage] there's always a spot."

With 200 less spots, Fourth Street Garage has added to the already difficult task of finding parking near campus.

Farmers' market welcomes SJ community

Families, couples and dogs gathered at the weekly SoFA Farmers' Market on Sunday morning.

In addition to the colorful variety of organic veggies, fruits and juice, SoFA Farmers' Market also welcomed local people with live music and a playground for kids.

"We wanted to elevate the experience," CEO of Metro Dan Pulcrano said. "We didn't want to just throw out the vegetables and canapes then call it [a] farmers' market because it's been done before. So we came up with this concept of a pop-up park."

As an organizer of the event, Pulcrano talked to the guests in order to help create a social atmosphere.

The farmers' market offered about eight stands of organic vegetables, berries, flowers, an organic fruit juice bar, hot dogs and popcorn.

"Personally, I'm a big fan of fruits so there is some pretty good melons and pretty good berries here," San Jose resident Avila Pavia said. "It's important to have a broad spectrum of events taking place to build audiences."

Gilbert Avila, a worker at Juice Alize, said participating in the farmers' market is a great opportunity in this community because customers coming to the farmers' market usually prefer organic foods.

Juice Alize is a company that sells organic fruit and vegetable juices.

It had three types of juices at the market ranging from fruity to a strong veggie taste.

In addition to organic vegetable stands, the market also had a playground area for kids.

The playground gave kids an opportunity to play with a chalk board, spray water on each other, use hula-hoops and participate in a bean toss game.

"I like downtown," Pulcrano said. "It's a good place for kids to grow up. It wasn't like that 20, 30 years ago. Kids never came down here, and there were no families."

Couples chatted on the outdoor sofas with coffee in their hands.

Some people stopped by with their dogs. Others slid into the farmers' market with their rollerskates.

"How can you build the community without socializing," delivery driver of Metro, Shawn Jarrett said. "Anybody in a community can come, socialize, and bring the kids."

The live music performances were the event's significant feature.

Starting off with rap music, about four musicians performed on the stage.

Most of the organizers, including the musicians, are volunteers.

Local musician, Israel Sanchez, participated in the event to support the community and get his name out there. "It's a slow build," Pavia said. "If you keep producing events like this, that's going to allow this area to grow."

Although it was not fully packed, a combination of food, music and a laid-back setting led people to become more social with each other.

This free event is organized with the collective power of local communities.

The event is funded by different organizations such as the 49ers Foundation, SoFA Association and The Pierce apartments.

The SoFA Farmers' Market will take place every Sunday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the parking lot on First Street in downtown San Jose.

Border wall conversation takes architectural turn

BY LOVINA PAVEL
Staff Writer

Division in the United States embodied by border walls could have a whole new meaning.

Author and architecture professor at UC Berkeley Ronald Rael spoke on this viewpoint at San Jose State University Tuesday evening.

Rael centered his new book "Borderwall as Architecture: A Manifesto for the U.S.- Mexico Boundary" on border walls.

The primary point that Rael lectured on was to view walls as more than just a physical wall. Since the election, walls have represented separation.

Rael, however, wants others to see walls as a place to come together as one community.

"I not only make a plea in this book to reconsider the construction of walls physically that may divide countries, but to dismantle the imaginary walls we set up in between ourselves within this country," Rael said to the audience.

He went on to read stories from his book that are geared toward redefining the representation of a physical wall through architectural creation.

One story in particular was inspired by The Simpsons.

In an episode, a wall is put up to keep residents of neighboring town Ogdenville from coming into Springfield. Homer Simpson mistook the word 'xenophobia' for 'xylophobia,' prompting the idea of turning the existing U.S./Mexico border fence into the world's longest xylophone.

"It would be played by thousands of people across two countries to create a singular, sonic experience that would transform the existing wall into a performance," Rael said.

Through art, a wall is seen as much less of a dividing force.

Other stories included a man being catapulted across the border with passport in hand and a volleyball game being played using the border as a net.

Students laughed while watching clips of these events.

The goal of the lecture was to use architectural creativity to lighten the social definition of a wall and to create unity.

Rael holds a position against President Trump's physical border wall proposal but reiterated that the United States is already divided.

He also said that building more walls to physically separate communities would only worsen the situation socially.

"Donald Trump's desires to construct walls have been fulfilled," Rael said, "He has built walls that have divided this nation in a remarkable way."

In the current political climate, unity is something that is sought.

"It's especially timely now with the current proposals of our current president," interior design senior Vinh Le said. "You have to think about how one might design a space around these walls so they can evoke different emotions."

A border between the United States and Mexico already exists, and Rael wrote his book and speaks at universities to revisit it and work with what is already there.

"The very last thing he talked about is how a border has been affecting us," photography graduate student Carmina Eliason said. "He wrote the book before Trump was even elected."

"You have to think about how one might design a space around these walls so they can evoke different emotions."

My wallet still cannot afford Whole Foods' new prices

William Yap
Staff Writer

Starting a new semester means taking huge uppercuts to my checking account. So when Amazon announced it was lowering prices at Whole Foods Market, I didn't get excited for another mundane activity like grocery shopping.

According to The New York Times, Amazon announced in June it would buy Whole Foods for $13.4 billion. For those unaware, Whole Foods is a supermarket chain most known for its wide array of food and drinks that are organic or from local farms.

The market often has to compensate for all the trouble of securing organic products by charging more than its competitors, such as Walmart.

Whole Foods is like that one guy at the coffee shop that will dissect every ounce of his cold brew coffee and ultimately say he's had better at this one place in Oregon. Now with Amazon's deep pockets, the hipster will have more ways to describe how he's unique.

"Although I am being cynical about shopping there, I shouldn't be selfish and ignore the people who do have funds to afford it."

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) approved of the deal in August. Amazon made a big splash by slashing prices within its first week of control over Whole Foods. Avocados, organic large brown eggs, salmon and others were the first grocery items to lower in price.

So I took it upon myself to visit a local Whole Foods. I learned that the appeal of eating food a supermarket sign says is healthier for me doesn't overpower my desire to have money in my wallet.

Justice studies senior Raymond Yeung used to shop at Whole Foods back when it was one of the few options he had, but admits he wasn't rich enough to shop there frequently.

"When they lower Whole Foods prices, that just lowers it down to regular prices," Yeung said. "See when Safeway lowers food prices, then you get an actual deal."

"Their poultry is all raised with no hormones and antibiotics and they have sustainable farms for their seafood," Furtado said. "They also support local farmers, which is something that I really value."

Amazon is also making the effort to make Whole Foods more affordable by offering additional discounts for Amazon Prime members. College students can get the service for free for the first six months and then $49 annually, half of its original price.

If Amazon continues to affect the market, competitors will have no choice to change some of their prices in order to stay in the game. According to Business Insider, competitors are already taking blows at the stock market.

"There will be pressure on other grocery retailers to lower their prices, thus cutting into their profit margins," economics professor Justin Rietz said. "It is possible that some competitors will be forced out of business."

Currently it is too early to tell if Amazon will truly change the game of supermarkets. However, I predict Amazon will continue to make headlines for discovering more innovative ways to consume products.

Until then, I will continue to get my groceries at Target and not spend $9 on a gallon of organic milk from Petaluma, Calif.

OP-ED

Sexual assaults on college campuses: What would you do?

BY JEFFREY F. ROSEN
Santa Clara County District Attorney

For most of our lives we are simply bystanders. We read other people's biographies, watch the news, notice other lives—great and small—as they flit by. As much as college is a necessarily self-focused time of picking mini-fridges and majors, it is also a time when you will sit there in a classroom chair and passively listen to others. You absorb from your professors the lives and lessons of Aristotle, Jefferson, Curie, Baldwin and Jobs. You will become willing witnesses to the history of ideas.

Sexual assault, however, should not be part of anyone's college experience. The statistics regarding campus sexual assault are staggering and a pessimist will tell you that without question, far too many of you will be victims of campus sexual assault. However, I am an optimist. I believe that we do not have to surrender to these statistics. Together, we can fight them and we can change them. Here is where you come in.

Many sexual assaults are born out of an environment full of witnesses. A group of friends are hanging out at a sporting event or at a party. These occasions involve bystanders who may see troubling behavior. When it comes to campus sexual assault, I do not use the word "bystander" to mean silent witness. I bring up the concept of the bystander because we are exploring a new way of reducing campus sexual assault, sexual assaults of all kinds, in fact. It's called "Bystander Intervention Training." Basically, it's teaching people how to effectively (and legally) intervene when they see someone who is too drunk to take care of themselves and you see a risk of someone taking advantage of another's inebriated state. A call. An Uber. A helping hand. It is one way of trying to stop a sexual assault before it happens. We have designated drivers. Why not have a sober person at a bar or party to watch out for signs that something troubling, even criminal, might soon happen?

This is certainly not a call for morality policing. This is a call for you to watch over each other. You know your friend—you know if she's had too much to drink and may need help getting home safely. You know your friend—you know if he is acting aggressive or stupid and may need help getting home safely. Don't just look out for people you know. Being a friend to a stranger in trouble may prevent a sexual assault from happening. Here's a basic tenet: if there's no consent, then it's not "just sex." It's a felony called rape.

As you learn your way around campus, I'd like you to take with you some important lessons from my world:

If you are a victim of campus sexual assault, please know that you are not to blame. You did not get raped because you got drunk or because of what you wore. You were raped because someone raped you. It is common for survivors of sexual assault to feel shame. Yes, there is shame in a sexual assault—but it isn't your shame. It's the offender's shame.

As the chief law enforcement officer in Santa Clara County, I want the offenders held accountable for their actions. However, I can't do this without evidence. Some evidence, like your memory of the event, may not change with time. Other evidence will fade, disappear, and literally be washed away. This forensic evidence is crucial. The forensic exams [also called "SART" exams] are provided free of charge. You may still choose to remain anonymous. A prompt SART exam is a way to ensure that your health is protected and a prosecution is not hampered should you decide at some point that you do wish to pursue criminal charges.

The district attorney's Victim Services Unit offers a wide variety of services that will be made available to you. Please call them. We have many resources that we can use to help you feel safer and begin to heal. We can get you counseling, here and/or back home. We can help educate you about the criminal justice process. We can lead you toward legal services. Here, for you, is a trained advocate who will listen to you, get answers for you, and help you. You are not alone and you do not need to suffer alone.

The rest of you, thankfully, will go through college as students, not survivors. Your responsibility toward your own safety is paramount. However, your responsibility doesn't end there. Please ask yourself this difficult and open-ended question: You may be at a party, a bar, or a dorm room and witness a situation that may be leading toward trouble. What will you do?

Lord of the Flies doesn't need an all-female remake

Jonas Elam
Staff Writer

Two men remaking a film adaptation of a book about toxic masculinity with an all-female cast in 2017 is a complete social blunder.

Director duo Scott McGehee and David Siegel announced last week that they have partnered with Warner Bros. studios to make another film adaptation of "Lord of the Flies," an award-winning novel written in 1954 by Nobel Prize winner William Golding. Previous versions of the film include the 1963 version by Peter Brook and the 1990 version by Harry Hook.

The novel centers around a group of boys stranded on an island and explores how the boys act and create their version of society. The entire novel is an allegory for a number of issues: order versus chaos, civilization versus savagery and reason versus emotion. Online critics of the announced female-centric adaptation claim the book primarily addresses toxic masculinity.

"Nobody expects the movie to be particularly successful due to the male directorship of this all-female-cast adaptation that addresses issues that most view as predominantly masculine."

McGehee said that one of the purposes of the remake is to break common social conventions by portraying aggressive behavior from women instead of men. This is an admirable goal, but putting it in a movie proves nothing. The directors are making a risky move, as their reputations are on the line because of the gamble they are taking.

The characters in the novel take what knowledge they have from their parents and the adult world and use it to create their own society. I am anxious to see how McGehee and Siegel will show that same situation from the perspective of modern girls, but I doubt it will be well-received by the movie-watching community.

"Not everything has to be remade to appease a female audience," marine biology junior Aaliyah Avelar said. "Some things are made for boys and some things are made for girls, and that's okay. You don't see them remaking all girl movies with guys."

Nobody expects the movie to be particularly successful due to the male directors of this all-female-cast adaptation that addresses issues that most view as predominantly masculine. As a fan of the novel and 1963 film, I will watch with an open mind but low expectations.

"It is a timeless story that is especially relevant today, with the interpersonal conflicts and bullying, and the idea of children forming a society and replicating the behavior they saw in grownups before they were marooned," said McGehee to British news outlet Deadline.

McGehee is absolutely correct. The novel and first film are timeless, so there is no reason to show us the same story, making a remake redundant. This is especially true when showing the viewer that an all-female group would have done the exact same thing. We do not know if that is the case, and making a social statement by forcing their view of how females would deal with that situation upon the viewer is the wrong way to make that statement.

The film is tackling issues that do not need to be tackled, taking perspectives that do not need to be viewed and remaking a classic film that does not need to be remade.

"Of all the films that cry out to be remade, the call of Brook's "Lord of the Flies" is very faint indeed," said esteemed film critic Roger Ebert in his review of the 1990 film. This statement stands today, as this remake is nothing but unnecessary.

SJSU has one of the best teams in college eSports

BY JONAS ELAM
Staff Writer

San Jose State has a history of dominance in collegiate eSports through various games.

SJSU had the No. 1 North American collegiate “League of Legends” and “CounterStrike: Global Offensive” teams in 2014 and 2016, respectively. The Spartans are also among the top four collegiate “Overwatch” teams in North America.

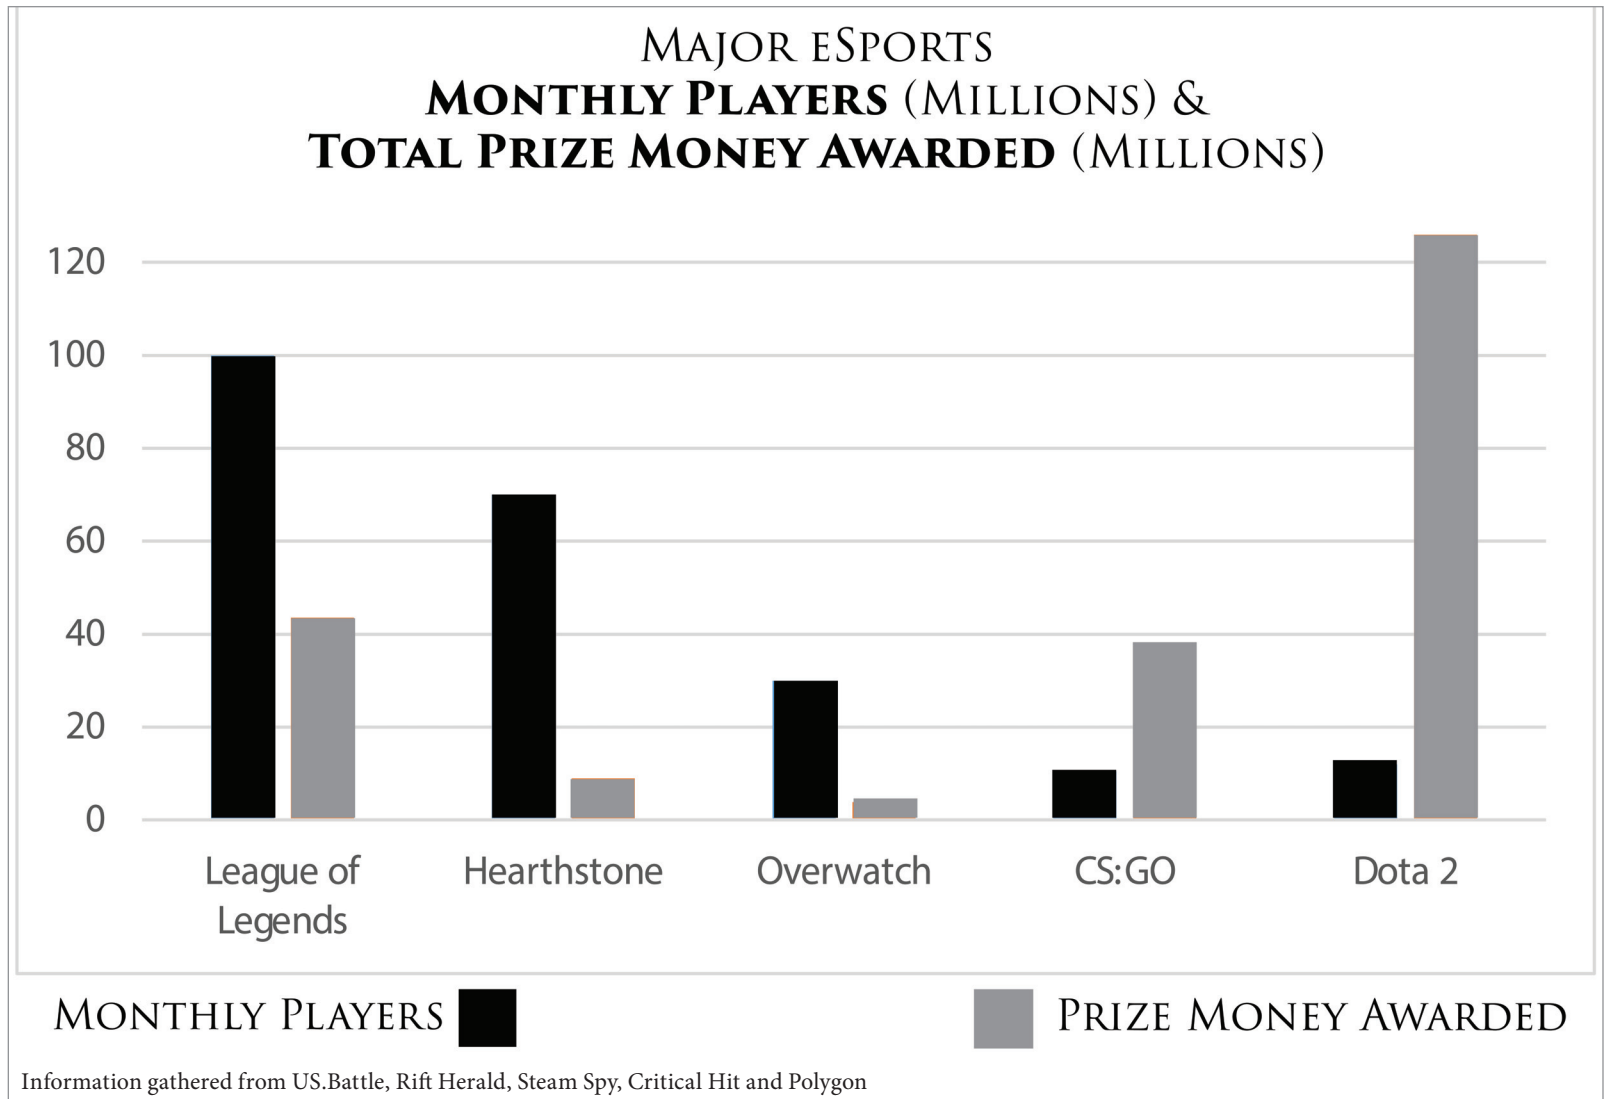

It is easy to support Spartan eSports, but it can be difficult to understand the games.

“I think it’s really cool that we have good eSports teams,” said applied mathematics sophomore Tyler Wong. “I just don’t know how they work.”

SJSU’s first collegiate eSports title was for “League of Legends” – a multiplayer online battle arena game, or MOBA – in which two teams of five players battle to destroy the enemy team’s base. The game requires a high level of game knowledge, strategy and mechanical skill to play well. It is free to play, and games typically last around 35 minutes.

“League of Legends” is the most played video game of all time at over 100 million monthly players, according to Forbes. The League of Legends World Championship was viewed by over 36 million people and had a prize pool of $6.7 million.

SJSU had a more recent championship title in “CounterStrike: Global Offensive.” or “CS:GO.” This is a first-person shooter, somewhat similar in concept to “Call of Duty’s” “Search and Destroy” game mode.

The “terrorist” team is comprised of five players whose win condition is detonating a bomb at one of two specific locations or killing the team of five “counter-terrorists.”

The “counter-terrorists” win by preventing the planting of the bomb, defusing it or killing all five “terrorists.”

“Our 2016 season was the one I got picked up in, and we ended up winning the season in CSL [Collegiate Starleague],” said SJSU “CounterStrike” team member and software engineering junior Kevin Ma. “We won a grand prize of $30,000 which was split up between five players and one manager.”

The last eSport that SJSU has been internationally successful in is Overwatch. The game is played by two teams of six players competing in various objective based game modes.

Overwatch has four game modes. In “assault,” teams take turns attacking and defending capture points. In “escort,” the offensive team escorts a moving objective to a destination. “Hybrid” games combine assault and escort. “Control” games are a “king-of-the-hill” type match across different locations in the map.

The variety of game modes, multiple characters and required mechanical skill make Overwatch a difficult game to master.

SJSU recently made it to the Collegiate Starleague summer semi-finals for Overwatch, losing to the University of Toronto. The team will likely retain most or all of the summer roster for the fall season.

“I think we will perform much better if we scrim a lot more in between matches and have better synergy overall,” said SJSU Overwatch player and MIS senior Ian Martensen.

The school participates in tournaments hosted by Tespa and Collegiate Starleague, which can have prize pools of over $100,000. The teams are supported by Spartan Starleague, the campus video game club. “As long as there are enough interested players to make a competitive team, Spartan Starleague will support it,” said club secretary Benjamin Zhou.

Clarke transfers, there goes the Spartans' season

LUKE JOHNSON
Sports Editor

Brandon Clarke is gone — and so are the hopes and dreams of San Jose State's men's basketball team.

The First Team All-Mountain West forward announced last week via Twitter that he is transferring to Gonzaga — and I don't blame him.

Clarke was the best male athlete on campus last academic year, and had a great chance to be the first SJSU player drafted in the NBA in over 20 years.

His sophomore stats nearly mimic former Mountain West forwards who turned into NBA All-Stars.

Clarke averaged 17.3 points, 8.7 rebounds and 2.6 blocks per game. His 78 blocks in a single-season is a school record.

Kwahi Leonard — an NBA MVP candidate last season — produced 15.5 points and 10.6 rebounds per game as a sophomore at San Diego State. Meanwhile, Paul George — the "NBA 2K17's" cover man — contributed 16.8 points and 7.2 rebounds per game as a sophomore at Fresno State.

Leonard and George didn't pursue their junior season in the Mountain West and neither should Clarke. He shouldn't spend his glory years at a school that hasn't earned an NCAA Tournament bid since 1996. He deserves to play in full arenas and in games with high stakes.

Clarke's decision is the latest step of a downhill spiral for the men's basketball team this offseason.

In June, guard Terrell Brown was one of five arrested in Hayward on suspicion of robbing a man and using his credit card to buy food at an In-N-Out restaurant, according to The Mercury News. He was subsequently released by the team.

Brown was an important player down the stretch of last season serving as the team's third leading scorer in conference play. His arrest came just weeks after he signed a scholarship as a walk-on freshman.

In July, the university announced that Dave Wojcik resigned as head coach due to "personal reasons."

In addition, role players Cody Schwartz and Brandon Mitchell also left the team this offseason. Schwartz transferred back home to the University of Wisconsin, Green Bay and Mitchell joined SJSU's football team.

It was admirable that Clarke committed to a team that went 2-28 (0-18 MW) his senior year of high school and led it to a 14-16 record two years later. However, with many key members of the team leaving this offseason, there is no reason for Clarke to stick around and build the team from scratch again.

Looking at the glass half full, players said they are keen on new head coach Jean Prioleau — who was previously the associate head coach at Colorado.

The Spartans will be led by Ryan Welage and Keith Fisher III in the front court, and Jalen James and Isaiah Nichols in the backcourt. It's up to them to prevent another 2-28 (0-18 MW) season while their former captain fights for an NCAA Championship the remainder of his college career.

WOMEN'S SOCCER

No. 10 Georgetown lays San Jose State to waste

MOHAMED BAFAKIH
Staff Writer

Weather was yet again a focal point of the San Jose State women's soccer nonconference schedule as the Spartans lost to United Soccer Coaches' No. 10 Georgetown Hoyas, 3-0.

After a scheduled home game against Rice University on Sept. 1 was cancelled due to airport closures in the Houston area stemming from Hurricane Harvey, temperatures reached 97 degrees Sunday afternoon at the Spartan Soccer Complex.

"Anytime you play in weather like this you gotta manage the game appropriately with substitutions and stuff, and I thought we did a good job of that," SJSU head coach Lauren Hanson said.

Hanson substituted players 19 times to the Hoyas' 13, with 12 coming in the second half.

SJSU's two lone shots on goal came in the early minutes of the second half down 2-0, as forward Dorthe Hoppius found opportunities within Georgetown's defense.

The Hoyas (4-2-0) had 11 shots for the game with six on goal, while the Spartans (1-4-0) took five shots.

With five new starters in the lineup, Hanson is looking for rhythm to set in offensively.

"Our rhythm is just off right now... it just takes time, and I think once we get these games under our belt, we'll get a little more confidence as we go and we'll start scoring some goals," Hanson said.

Georgetown was coming off a 4-0 shutout loss to fifth-ranked Stanford, but had only allowed one goal in its previous four matches.

The Hoyas managed to get back on the board with a hot start against the Spartans as Chloe Knott found defender Meaghan Nally in the seventh minute for the team's first of three goals — all coming from beyond the 18-yard mark and along the wing.

With three minutes left in the first half, the Hoyas' Carson Nizialek found the back of the net from the left corner set up by her teammate Jenna Menta.

Georgetown came in leading the country with 10.5 corner kicks per game, but managed to score all three goals on crosses while being limited to six corners.

Goalkeeper Paige Simoneau dropped to 0-2 on the season, but she also finished with three saves.

"It seemed like they were trying to cross it [each goal scored], but it happened to go in so there's nothing that I could have done," Simoneau said.

the 75th minute as forward Caitlin Farrell took it upon herself and zoomed past her defender for a score that bounced off the right post and in the net.

"We all like the challenge of playing these tough teams," defender Kristen Amarikwa said. "It makes us better for when we get to conference, that way we have high intensity and high energy."
