

University of Louisville

ThinkIR: The University of Louisville's Institutional Repository

Electronic Theses and Dissertations

8-2013

Our mess is more.

Conyer Clayton
University of Louisville

Follow this and additional works at: <https://ir.library.louisville.edu/etd>

Recommended Citation

Clayton, Conyer, "Our mess is more." (2013). Electronic Theses and Dissertations. Paper 260.
<https://doi.org/10.18297/etd/260>

This Master's Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by ThinkIR: The University of Louisville's Institutional Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Electronic Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of ThinkIR: The University of Louisville's Institutional Repository. This title appears here courtesy of the author, who has retained all other copyrights. For more information, please contact thinkir@louisville.edu.

OUR MESS IS MORE

by

CONYER CLAYTON

B.A., University of Louisville, 2010

A THESIS

Submitted to the faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences of the University of Louisville

In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree of

Master of Arts

Department of English

University of Louisville

Louisville, Kentucky

August 2013

Copyright © by Conyer Clayton 2013
All Rights Reserved

OUR MESS IS MORE

by

CONYER CLAYTON

B.A., University of Louisville, 2010

A Thesis Approved on April 23, 2013

By the following Thesis Committee:

Courteney Petrosino, Thesis Director

Paul Griner

Michael Williams

ABSTRACT

WHAT IS THIS MESS YOU ARE TALKING ABOUT?

Conyer Clayton

04/23/2013

This collection of thirty-one poems, composed between June 2012 and March 2013, was inspired by my travels to Belize, Prague, London, and Thailand. The collection is my attempt to negotiate, through poetry, the concept of wilderness, and the “messes” (literal and figurative), which we humans make in our attempts to tame it. Structurally, the sonnet is the guiding formal force of this collection, which is made up of a prefatory section, two major sections, and two concluding poems. The first section, “A Life Hardly Lived In,” contains fourteen short lyric poems. This section is structured so that each poem loosely mimics the traditional purpose of the corresponding line in a Shakespearean sonnet. The second section, “For the Birds. For the Humans,” is set entirely in London. I originally composed this section as a traditional heroic sonnet crown, or fifteen linked sonnets. In its final form, I have allowed the sequence to follow a more organic logic. Although the repeating lines are still present, I have moved away from strict adherence to the form. I extend the lessons learned by my interactions with the natural world to my negotiations of personal identity and relationships. My personal experiences are meant to extend towards a reflection on the wider human condition. Thematically, this collection considers how we thrive when we relinquish the desire to control the outside world. The tension in these poems is how, despite knowing this, we still balk at allowing the wild to take over.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ABSTRACT	iii
GOING	1
A LIFE HARDLY LIVED IN.....	2
The Reminder	3
Gone Fishing	4
Crumbs.....	5
Foreclosure.....	6
Labyrinth.....	7
Pick Pocket in Paris.....	8
Bell Tower Shadow.....	9
Signs.....	10
Tropical Storm.....	11
Timeless.....	12
My body is the car I drive.....	13
Fertilizer.....	14
Contents.....	15
Our Hanging Threads.....	16
FOR THE BIRDS. FOR THE HUMANS.....	17
Covent Square	18
Raven of the Tower of London.....	19
Cooing.....	20

Tracks.....	21
Portrait of My Husband.....	22
The Obvious	23
Assemble	24
Saddled	25
Darwin at Westminster Abbey	26
Shell.....	27
Script.....	28
Darwin on the Beagle	29
Assessment	30
FINAL SAY.....	31
Curtsy, then.....	32
Old Town Square.....	33
 CURRICULUM VITAE	 33

GOING

She imagines herself gathering her things and going - saying, going

for a walk, instead of, I'm just cold.
She sees herself walking calmly away, fitting her fingers into gloves while her socks bunch because they're inside-out as usual. Instead she stares at the corner of the book on the coffee table;

the corner without words, no syntax to tread or punctuation to stumble, sheer white, soothing.

A LIFE HARDLY LIVED IN

The Reminder

You wrote “I miss you” on my stomach in bright blue sharpie the morning I left, just to remind me, a marking, a deterrent for strangers and lace. It faded on the fifth day in a dirty hostel shower, though I didn’t use soap.

I glanced in the mirror and saw only skin. You were missing.

I traced the ghost of your stenography with my finger.
I think about it still, three years later, as you trace your fingers across my stomach.

I wonder what you’re writing.

Gone Fishing

Our toes grip the rocks,
and we grimace,
hold fast to bait
buckets, crabs
with their last meal
of coconut shavings.
We are still.

The osprey stoop
and we pray:
Teach us how to glide through life. The pelicans double back. The sky is ours. The sky is mine.

My eyes refocus

and I slip,
spilling the bait
into the sun-warmed shallows.

I could curse
but stay silent.
The birds fly close. An eagle turns his head.

Crumbs

I felt his soft-shell break before I heard it, my head lamp pointed too far ahead, ignoring the ground in front of me. I left him to recover silently, to suffer, just give me a minute, I'm fine really, I'm fine. But he let himself be covered by sand, his crushed insides spilling.

I carried him to the ocean with a metal spoon, belly-up.
I made sure to rinse it off.

Foreclosure

We collect real-estate for hermits from the most convenient waters. Prime snail-crafted homes, lived in slowly, easily, calmly, with a firm grip on slick ground, adjustable to the rising water levels, a fixed slow rate and slow growth, live till we die, leave it to the ocean, children have their own rocks to claim. Don't worry. Risk is natural. We signed a salted waiver when we touched each other's insides.

We dress in our nicest shells, a healthy coating of mold, but nothing a good scrub of salt and sand and human hands can't handle. We relocate to the shaded side of the island, away from the piled brittle palm leaves and coconut husks. Age creates character. Who would want a shiny shell, a life hardly lived in.

Labyrinth

The stairs are empty, inhabited by ivy, and walls and walls and walls and walls. I'm caught between a singsong accent and heavy breath, haggled to half price near a chicken coop and almond pastries. The walls crumble to rebel, the walls crumble, and a sharpie screams for a lost regime, a slow theoretical decay, like bodies piled in dozens, and kept within walls and walls and walls and walls, by a crow's beak and hard palms.
The clock chimes

and I stand, reminded by the coming tour group to pull back from the wall, from every castle and keep a population in grips. I catch a spider on pen point, with the best intentions, but I tire of rescue, and I place him on the wall, the wall, inescapable.

Pick Pocket in Paris

I.

I've been riding this carousel for hours, whistling the words I cannot speak, the ones I'll never find, leaving my clarinet dismantled and praying for another coin in my case. I fall under fashion, under aversion and stretch into the seats next to me, the only empty ones on the subway, and no one notices when I take a breath, whet my lips.

II.

Times passes as planned, like fingernails under your hair, or a crowd pushed stomach to back.
I exist in between the tight and baggy, the smoothed and locked, the painted and scrubbed clean. I slip my hand into your pockets while you watch an actor in a cheap costume, waving to a meager, distracted mob.
The cloud cover is coming.

Bell Tower Shadow

I balance on a bench's edge, coo and peck for my pretty pretty eyes, my wings drenched in dirty water and stone, dodging her feet as she begs and stumbles in the shadow of a messiah's gangled limbs of gold, halos embroidered instead of skirts and shoes, a gypsum scarf covering toothless gums, stooped and shaking, herding the wind to her chest with a paper cup clinking, grasping air between her pain-thinned nails.

She spreads peanut shells in the dirt, muttering for lost money, how passersby dismiss her shawled drowning; trembling in a confession booth; faith despite a vaulted ceiling crumbling into her mouths.

I fly over fountains, drain holes stopped with bread crumbs, gliding over her firmly grounded back.

Signs

The church bells ring, forget about the lies you've told.
The time is wrong. I should floss daily.
The sun finds a hole in the clouds.
The paper jamming in the printer is the bread that wouldn't rise. The water was warm.
The Internet being slow is a gesture to the dead.
The train floods, and I know I've spent too much on drinks this week.
The lost puzzle piece is my husband whom my mother never met.
The cut on my upper gum is healing like all else, except for those things that never heal.
I'm on my last bit of chapstick. God knows I didn't call my mom enough.
The wine I spilled on my brand new tights shows me what a shitty friend I've been.
The sidewalk rose to stub my toe, and I don't know what to blame these mood swings on.
The record skips, and it's like my voice, unable to broach that subject.
I can't talk about what my mother would have thought. The record skips, and I can't talk. The record skips.

Tropical Storm

My leg slept,
twitched under your weight and we woke.

The dark inside matched the clouds outside, and we worried over the tent, rethinking our carelessness.
Stakes don't hold in sand.

Timeless

It's really a matter of pushing the edges down, of making a time tight seal, like plastic wrap on glass over spinach salad, or the butternut squash Dave made with leeks and thyme, when we lived in that shitty small apartment over a bulk grain and nut store, where our room was a cave and needles hid in the green plaid couch cushions, but oh, the time is getting in. Let's try wax this time. Drip sealed and dried on an envelope, or a white clump on a golden candlestick, the stalks mismatched in height, measuring greater depths in wine glasses and casserole dishes, the wear of the seats, the build-up of tension in extended families, and all this growing on a brass base, a slow melt of underhanded comments on mother's drinking and power struggles over clean plates, tongue and soap and scraping.

My body is the car I drive

I.

The earth lies loudly, with groaning plates and thunder. It lies still with a simmering temper, deep breath, deep breath, timely eruption, moving boundaries.
If I speak faster, I have the authority. If I rumble there is intimidation. The waves slap our skin.

II.

That time we walked in the rain with a bottle of wine, but how I got cold after an hour and missed the chance to kiss you under a tree, is the constancy of desire, the repeated chiming of clocks. Truth only in hearing.

A robin with a broken wing.
A dead bird on the sidewalk, glass an unexpected warrant.
Death is a voice on the phone, you didn't say hi the same way, you took such a strange breath.

Fertilizer

Overheated in the underpass, as we sit on a towel soaked in sweat and dead grass. He'll be here in an hour, they said, so relax with a book, your skin creased and red. We watch an ant haul a hardshell, while the friends who say they aren't dating kiss across a cooler. Can we crack a beer at least? Because who can stay sober under a road sign, two miles to the next exit. Who can stay sober without a word, all attention paid to text. It's all for show, and your tongue doesn't help, sitting on the beginning of a sketch, remembering the glass cracked sky, a fist brought down on the stratosphere, making lightning leap.

Contents

The river teems eyeless and unseeing, blind swimmers gilled and transparent, clouded over, scaled. Our eyes are made seeing crickets grope in darkness, stumbling over hermaphroditic newts. Bats cling and water drips, build build build.

Have you lived in midnight creek beds? Swum in blackness with white swans and ducks?

Felt their webbed legs on your saturated skin as you float on the silted rock bottom?

Have you felt the contents of the world?

Water spiders skimming a surface slick with oil and yesterdays egg and bacon grease, fried bananas and fish.

I saw the leaves sitting blackened the fall of the blackbird into another's nest, strangers at their bus stops rearranging scarves.

I've seen branches
against moonlit stars,

a flock missing a leader, wandering aimless in crowded skies.

Our Hanging Threads

Lay your lenins on an armchair.
Be filled with air and nomads. Evolve

on camel back, sipping through plastic and staring through cloth, a movement in memory, toes dragging over unsanded floorboards.
And so we move, forward or back, it doesn't matter really, since there's a blue rose on your see-through shirt, a blooming product of newly sewn sinew, threaded through your jutting jaw, a breath blown, your hand just out of reach.

At last at last we've seen a new body, a new contour of mountains, of flatland at first.
All final, at least, at last.

FOR THE BIRDS. FOR THE HUMANS.

Covent Square

The sun never got quite warm enough after this week of bad weather, so he grabs her waist and lifts her up to stand, burying his face in her belly and her dress for just a moment.
She puts her hands on his shoulders, looks at the sky and laughs, saying, this is for sitting, not standing, but stays standing all the same. Pigeons swarm, grouped in desperation. The stranger seated next to her feet looks pointedly away while the couple kisses. He feigns focus, an eraser between his lips, waiting for the words to come, like the sudden flight of birds.

Raven of the Tower of London

It is said the tower will fall if I fly, so I'm clipped; trapped in winged pacing; corner, corner, corner, corner. I open my eyes, extend my talons as far as iron allows.
Collecting cracked eggshells,
I count the bars and the fingers on your hand and wonder how they'd taste in my mouth.
My bones shriek. Hunt! Hunt and fly!
So I do. Corner, corner, corner, corner. My wings are the tightest manacle, heavy with unused potential.

Cooing

We don't drink wind, just coffee and sugar water that you leave behind. I've learned to ignore the stares. You watch our flock instead of speaking to each other, and make a point to keep a rail between you as you eat lunch on benches.
Do you envy my squalid inclusion, my intuition to directional shifts and body language?
Or do you envy my scavenging, the sips I take from caps and pockets, my wings heavy with smoke.
Yes, my wings are heavy, but I have them, while your heels slip over ketchup and sludge.
I slip under your gaze for that scrap you let loose, taking refuge under a rain-wet seat.
The sun hasn't got quite warm enough to dry it.

Tracks

The city is heavy with unused potential, swaying, shifting cobbles, vowels, sidewalks busy with scheming and decay. Well-tended cuticles and battlefields exist in tandem, and we all pedal faster, attempting to free the voices insulated by construction.

They echo in a pint glass and deep in my gut, deeper in the sewers, claimed in the name of the queen and rats. It's the difference between a guillotine and a cutting board, a meadow and a lawn.
We step into the box, eager for escape.

Portrait of My Husband

I'm waiting for the words to come, like the sudden flight of birds, so I can describe you in more natural terms.
My patient pine, my sweet chestnut, living off peat and sand, avocado and quinoa.
You push taller and your skin falls off in strips of hardened bark. You cedar, you larch, you thorned and sprouting pet name. You keep what's crucial hidden under sap and wax, so we are warmed by your silky debris. My silver lining, you mountain beech, short-armed and steady. You calm my frantic growth and broad-leafed eagerness, my greed for sun and sinew. You are a nest for sparrows, a collarbone, even when we are dispersed, playing puzzles with tectonic plates.

The Obvious

It seems we always make a mess of it, mumbling sorry, oh sorry I didn't hear you, aren't you listening, no, sorry, to backs already turned. It's the gnarled root of our obsession with flight, our ground bound envy of those drinkers of wind, swallowing acres of coastline, consuming without concern for parasites and eggs.
We envy the honesty of pigeons.
Their straightforward posturing and puffing, the fluidity of intention. Our mess is more dangerous than droppings on a windshield and torn up loaves of bread. Our mess is ash and tissue paper, words spoken too quickly or not at all.
We don't drink wind, just coffee and sugar water.

Assemble

Men will never rest till they've spoiled the earth, says a rabbit, says a waiter, says a finch, so say we all in our ships and fancy cars.
We built this. We suffered in deplorable conditions.
We planted trees in tardy reconciliation.
We piled objects on the backs of flat-bed trucks.
We wore black to hide blue blood under thin skin, to cover the sad lack of worm hearts under our nails, one for each broken finger, for each boarded window. The train doesn't run that way. Shovels are expensive. Descend in a bucket and continue your work.
Don your frock and get to chiseling.

Saddled

Eager for escape, we tighten the straps and ride back home. Yeah, I'm allergic, but it's the image that counts, the heroism of sweating fur and leather, the welcome scent of shit on grass. The repeating green blades are a welcome and beautiful suffocation.
Safety is in the soil. The worms are trained in CPR and meditation.
The birds are classically practiced.

If I am lost, I'd rather be lost.
I'd rather be buried.
A hawk keeps watch
while I sleep, but the water hardly moves.

So why is my heart pounding?

Darwin at Westminster Abbey

The inside of your tomb must remind you of clouds gathering, addressing your name on stone. You sailed the wrong direction in death, away from mollusks and the cut of wings across moonlit cloth, reminding you just how far you came for silence, for undisturbed eggs.
You must relish the dirt trodden over you by queens and tourists and priests, the secrets carried under our nails. Do you feel the cold honor you've been given? Do candles and choirs take the chill from decay, like hugging your arms on a foggy hilltop?
I really have no clue where I'm going.

Shell

I get to chiseling.
I put my back into it.
Never mind the leaning I feel.
It's just my spirit longing for sea-salt and sandy soil, for the appeal of emptiness.
Forget how I wish my fingers were wooden homes for caterpillars. That a chrysalis hung from my shoulder blades. Food for birds dangling from my tongue and sappy spit. I am not in touch with the semantic connection signaled in a root's bend.
I am not a flower reclaiming craters, eating bombshells and shrapnel, fertilizer and fireweed, railway spikes tilling the soil for roses.
I always make a mess of it.

Script

Our humor is written, our ink carved from apple cores and empty stomachs.
The rigid paths we're forced to follow shear the soft fuzz from our peaches and cheeks, and change our words, meddle with our minds.
Mechanized, we stand in awe of skyscrapers, instead of cells or bubbles or crowds moving mindlessly. Plastered, we plaster green men and gods on our beer soaked walls and sooty floors, equating renewal with drunkenness, a Celtic tradition. I get it. We've worked hard. We deserve a break, a pint, an ax, and someone to destroy and butcher.
But we cannot rest. The world is turning.

Darwin on the Beagle

We are dispersed, he said to yellow faced sailors, watching symbols emerging in beaded eyes and water alike, fearing mutiny in close quarters.
Oh let him see the peak, let him see the island rising, the slow steady push of magma.
Praying to chance and mutation, he leaned over the edge of the ship, marveling over a beetle's back, a flightless bird and swimming lizards, noting the slim chance we have for isolation, regarding randomness and rising water levels as gods, until he broke onto the land like sea-foam on a turtle's back, a seagulls webbed toes.
Does the inside of your tomb remind you of clouds gathering?

Assessment

I really have no clue where I'm going,
so I take the first compelling left, and find baby quails popping from the brush like gumballs, or feathered marbles. I'm far from Wordsworthian, all glowing description, oh red beak, black back, so I grab my tweezers and prepare the chick for careful inspection, my eye looming in a magnifying glass. The heat of my appraisal roasts him medium-rare, standard fare, well-bred, but he didn't harden long enough. His gestation left him soft and flimsy. I could crush him in my hand, melt his beak down for coin, snap his neck for diamonds. No. Put him back to toughen.
Everything is not salt-colored. Nowhere close.

FINAL SAY

Curtsy, then

gallop into the pasture, on fused and airless roots. Hands sticky with saliva fight strong-boned, and the space in her lap is filled with string, empty nesting babies.
Her gingham scratches a sun burn, her nails ingrown, pulling at udders, a continually empty bucket.

Old Town Square

We count the time in horses. Arrows and lions chime. A new day. A new day. The same river runs. We are built by boulders. We are rolled on logs. New money and old oils, pooled from rotting foreheads.

We are painted, refinished, slowly carved, another world's hardened soil and bone, misshapen machinery.

The sky is marked by time. A new day. A new day.
The same river runs.

CURRICULUM VITAE

Conyer Clayton
940 Ash Street
Louisville, KY 40217

EDUCATION

University of Louisville M.A. in English	2013
University of Louisville B.A. in English	2010

AWARDS

First place in graduate poetry in the Metroversity Writing Competition for “Vegetables”	2013
Second place in graduate poetry in the Metroversity Writing Competition for “Bone-Bed”	2012

PUBLICATIONS AND PAPERS

Mochila Review “Full Sunlight” and “a recoil of springs”	2013
China Grove “Vegetables”	2013
The Snail Mail Review, Issue 4, “Bone-Bed”	2012
The Tau Creative Journal, “Trap”	2012
“A Poet’s Iconoclasm: Metalanguage as Intrinsic to Contemporary Avant-Garde Poetics,” as presented at the Pacific American Modern Language Association Conference	2012

EMPLOYMENT

Kentucky Gymnastics Academy
Head Coach
2004-Present