Compassion is key when teaching military children

Balancing firmness with compassion is a key part of Gerry Grubbs' job as assistant principal of Evergreen Elementary School in Washington.

Evergreen is on the Fort Lewis Army Base, and almost every student has had a parent deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. Also, the Army built the school in 1991 to serve medically fragile and severely handicapped children. About one-fourth of Evergreen's 800 students receive services for some type of disability.

As Grubbs '89 explained, Fort Lewis is a compassionate duty station, for those whose family members need special medical care. Evergreen's staff includes two nurses, as well as award-winning teachers, one a National Disney Teacher of the Year.

Grubbs studied education and sociology at Linfield and received a master's in special education at Western Oregon University. He taught in Tumwater, Wash., for nine years before becoming an administrator.

Because so many of Evergreen's students have special needs, Grubbs attends even more meetings than most educators. "It's a matter of making sure you have all the resources in place, and there's a lot of turnover, so the needs are ever-changing," he said.

Gerry Grubbs '89 accepts a U.S. flag from Cayla, a first-grader whose grandfather carried it over Afghanistan in a C-131 transport plane three years ago while her father served in Iraq.

Deployments create stress. "Kids get emotional, and you have to know when to be tough and when to be compassionate," Grubbs said.

One benefit of his job: lots of hugs.

Nursing alumna nurtures children, families facing cancer

Marni Allen '96

Marni Allen '96 spends her days surrounded by the laughter and smiles of children.

Ironically, most are fighting cancer.

Allen is a nurse practitioner at St. Luke's Regional Medical Center Mountain States Tumor Institute in Boise, Idaho. She provides care to children and their families at the Pediatric Hematology Oncology clinic, the only children's cancer program in Idaho.

As she works with families often facing catastrophic circumstances, Allen is constantly amazed by the resiliency of children.

"So many times when you walk in the clinic it's like a party," said Allen, last year's Lloydena Grimes Award winner at the Linfield-Good Samaritan School of Nursing. "Children are watching movies and playing games. You wouldn't know they have cancer. They're amazing."

Allen got a glimpse of her future while still a Linfield student, working at Legacy Cancer Services. With degree in hand, she began a four-year stint with Legacy Health System at Meridian Park Hospital on the oncology unit and at Legacy Cancer Services providing cancer prevention and early detection services to the community.

After earning a master's degree at the University of Portland, Allen joined the faculty at Boise State University, stepping away from oncology to fulfill a longtime aspiration to teach. She integrated her passion for culture and diversity into her lessons and taught nursing students to consider the cultural aspects that might influence patient care.

"It goes beyond making sure a professional interpreter is available," she said. "It's learning from a cultural standpoint what is important to a client and meeting those needs."

Allen was instrumental in securing a federal grant for nurses, the Greater Awareness for Idaho Nurses (GAIN) grant. As lead author of the proposal, she was responsible for course development and implementation at every nursing school in Idaho. She remains a consultant on the program.

"I really like to finish what I start," said Allen, who emerged from Linfield with a strong sense of professional responsibility.

She is past president and a board member of the Idaho Nurses Association, where she advocates for nursing issues and lobbied on Capitol Hill on behalf of safe nursing practices. She is also a strong proponent of Camp Rainbow Gold, an American Cancer Society camp.

Allen said her Linfield experience prepared her in all aspects of nursing, from in-patient care to community health and program development.

"I feel very fortunate," Allen said. "I am truly grateful for my Linfield education."
