Biking through Wales

Jay Swenberger '06 and Janet Peterson took their passion for healthy living overseas when they biked around Wales last summer.

The 760-mile tour was captured on the couple's blog (jjpeterberger.wordpress.com/) and began with a stop in London, where they witnessed preparations for the summer Olympics, including the passing of the Olympic torch in Portsmouth.

"Being two feet from the torch itself was an incredible, emotion-filled moment conjuring up a deep sense of history – a moment I won't soon forget," said Peterson, professor of health and human performance.

Over the course of six weeks, the couple pieced together a figure-eight using National Cycle Network routes through Wales. Throughout their journey, they encountered strong rains, steep hills and the occasional flock of sheep crossing the road.

"The country lanes often meander right through sheep pastures. You have to watch around every corner," said Peterson, who also attended a three-day training in kinanthropometry, the study of size and proportions of the human body related to movement, while in Portsmouth.

The two stayed in plush campgrounds, rustic camping fields and the occasional bed and breakfast, cooking many of their meals on a one-burner stove but also exploring the richness of local Welsh food, especially the bakeries. Jay's favorite – cream scones. They endured pelting rain, muddy roads, second-degree burns and broken pedals – all part of the adventure.

Janet Peterson and Jay Swenberger '06 took in the Wales countryside, along with hills, mud and local livestock, during a six-week, 760-mile tour through the country last summer.

"The lure of the unknown, the next climb, the next meal, make all the tribulations on the road irrelevant," said Swenberger, a registered nurse at Holy Family Hospital in Spokane, Wash.

Peterson reflected on the bittersweet end to the journey in a blog post.

"Jay and I connected with locals, tourists, family and friends," she said. "We pronounced Welsh words terribly wrong. We made new friends and reconnected with family. We grew stronger together."

They are now busy planning their next adventure.

Hiking the Pacific Crest

Joe Robinson '09 stands at the northern terminus of the Pacific Crest Trail after completing the 2,655-mile journey in 169 days.

Walking the equivalent of 100 marathons is no easy task, but for Joe Robinson '09 it was a labor of love.

Robinson quit his job, sold his car, stored his belongings and began the 2,655 mile journey on the Pacific Crest Trail from Mexico to Canada. He lost his mother in 2006 to multiple sclerosis and was motivated to give up everything and raise money to fund research into the disease for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. He began his walk in April and reached his destination, Manning Park Lodge in Canada, 169 days later on Oct. 13, hoping to raise $25,000.

"The athletic aspect honestly took me by surprise," said Robinson, who charted his course on Facebook and Twitter. "To walk 25 miles and climb 5,000 feet a day is hard, but to keep that up every day, six days a week, for almost six months is tremendously hard."

While the trail has presented challenges for Robinson, it has also brought him great fulfillment.

"Few other experiences can offer such a holistic experience as the high mountain passes," he said. "Having half a year to evaluate my life and where it's going in my mid-20s is both rare and underrated. I've had a chance to check and make sure I'm still the man I set out to be when I was 10."

Volunteer shares enthusiasm, one wheel at a time

Brian Adams '87 has turned his love of unicycling into a thriving after-school program.

In 2009, Adams started a unicycle club at his children's school, Vose Elementary in Beaverton. The unicycle club, operated solely by volunteers, became the only after-school program offered at the school when budget cuts forced other programs to close last year. Since its start, 68 students have participated in the program with a current wait list to join.

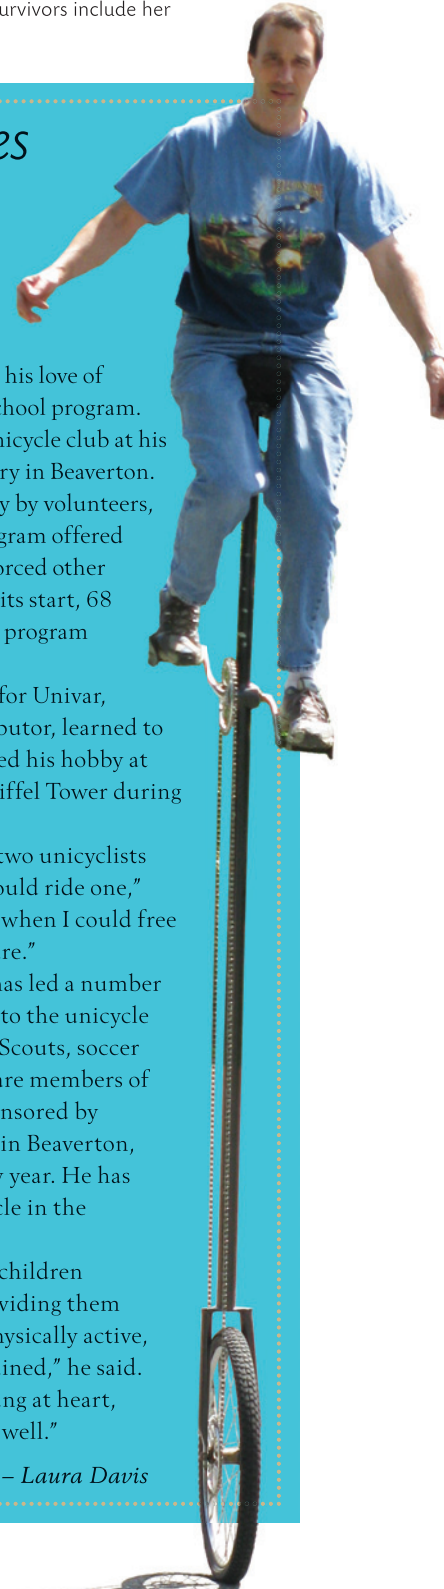

Adams, a sales coordinator for Univar, an international chemical distributor, learned to ride when he was 7 and continued his hobby at Linfield, even cycling near the Eiffel Tower during a study abroad trip to France.

"In Paris, I happened upon two unicyclists on tall unicycles and asked if I could ride one," he recalls. "They were surprised when I could free mount in the middle of the square."

An avid volunteer, Adams has led a number of groups and teams in addition to the unicycle club including Boy Scouts, Cub Scouts, soccer and magic. He and his children are members of the One-Wheeled Wonders, sponsored by New Vision Fellowship Church in Beaverton, and ride in several parades every year. He has ridden his 36-inch wheel unicycle in the Portland Bridge Pedal.

"All of these activities help children build self esteem along with providing them constructive outlets for being physically active, mentally stimulated and entertained," he said. "I suppose they help me stay young at heart, physically fit and entertained as well."

Supporting Field Research

Jane Claire Dirks-Edmunds '37, biology professor emerita, understood the value of collaborative research, having worked on the Saddleback Mountain ecological survey as a student in the 1930s. The beloved professor gave back to Linfield to support collaborative learning through a charitable gift annuity, a gift plan that provided her with a fixed income for the remainder of her lifetime. Today her gift supports students and faculty such as those pictured above and is part of the robust collaborative research program that exists at Linfield (an example of which appears beginning on page 6 in this issue).

To learn more about making an impact on future students through a planned gift, contact Craig Haisch '95, director of philanthropic planning, 503-883-2675, chaisch@linfield.edu.
