PREFACE

This bibliography was compiled to assist people who are interested in and working on Aboriginal issues. It will be particularly useful for those involved in research, policy development and program design, delivery and evaluation. It includes approximately 375 entries. Over half of the entries are annotated, or at least sufficient key words and phrases are provided so the content of the document is obvious to the reader. Just under one half of the entries fall in the field of housing and community planning, as most of the entries were compiled while preparing a number of reports on Native housing and community planning issues. However, the bibliography also includes entries under Native constitutional issues, Native culture and tradition, Native economic development, education, health and social welfare. In general, only those documents published in the last ten years have been included, although some earlier publications are listed in the bibliography, particularly if they deal with programs or issues that are current and ongoing.

No attempt was made to include all the publications in each area; rather, items are listed on the basis of their availability and potential utility for individuals on Native issues. No doubt there are many important documents that are not included. As well, the inclusion of annotations should not be construed to mean that those items are more important than others. An explanatory statement is also necessary on terminology. The references included focus on Natives, both Status and non-Status, Métis and Inuit, but throughout, these groups are often collectively referred to as Native or Aboriginal.

In conclusion, this is a working bibliography that will be very useful for individuals from a variety of fields and professions who are working with Aboriginal problems and issues. A sincere vote of thanks must be extended to Cheryl Shindruk, who spent many hours compiling many of the entries.
