

Seeking Lifelines

Nicole Montgomery

The migraine begins as a stream, a current moving slowly through the canyon of a peaceful neurological waterway.
Sensory signals flow together the converging of a cranial confluence as the fury of the sky unleashes a downpour.

The current swells and churns as I shield my eyes to the lightning flashes blinding me.

The water boils in my skull, searing all perception as the waves grow, mounting their attack.

I must grasp tightly:
the capsizes is inevitable.

I am floundering, grasping for any support, seeking lifelines—none to be caught.

I scream in fear, the pain unrelenting like the burn of saltwater in the eyes.
As I struggle against the white-capped migraine, I see my solution and swim toward

my only chance of salvation.

One last push like a needle piercing an eye, I grasp the stone
my pill, pulling myself toward the heavens, the comfort of my bed.

I lie on my back, focused only on breathing, slowly breathing.

Here I rest, awaiting the torrent to subside.

Nicole Montgomery is a sophomore English teaching major at Northwestern College in Orange City, Iowa. She has been writing poetry since 8th grade, but began getting serious as a poet after an introductory creative writing class. She writes about various topics that give voices to the silent. She hopes that she may write about what matters and shed light on otherwise unnoticed suffering.
