From the Editor's Desk

To commemorate the sesquicentennial anniversary of the Civil War, we offer three selections from Mike Bunn, the newly appointed Executive Director of the Chattahoochee Historic Commission. His first two pieces, "Recollections of the Last Battle" and "A Letter from Columbus Shortly After the 'Last Battle,'" provide vivid firsthand accounts of the so-called "Battle of Columbus" in April 1865. In his third submission, "The Photograph of the C.S.S. Jackson in the Chattahoochee River at Columbus," Bunn recounts the brief life and fiery death of the Confederate ironclad CSS Jackson. He also provides the background story for the only known photograph of the vessel by A.J. Riddle. In the fourth submission, "The First Decade of Telephone Service in Columbus, Georgia: Subscribers from 1880 – 1890," Callie McGinnis offers a brief history of early telephone service in Columbus, Georgia, along with the names of the city's first telephone subscribers. It is well-crafted, well-researched piece of telecommunications history. For the final selection, "Membership Lists of the First Presbyterian Church, Columbus, Georgia, 1830 – 1842," Martha Ragan has scoured the records of First Presbyterian to uncover a treasure trove of information for local historians and genealogists, including membership rolls, lists of baptisms, and annual reports.

Unfortunately, this issue will be my last as editor. I have taken on additional research and professional responsibilities, so I feel it would be prudent to step aside and allow someone else to take over as editor of Muscogiana. I have enjoyed working on the journal and getting to know some of the finest genealogists and local historians in the region. It has been a real pleasure and a tremendous learning experience. I wish you all the best.

Recollections of the Last Battle

Edited by

Mike Bunn

This account of the Battle of Columbus, by Dr. W.W. Grant of Denver, Colorado, appeared in the April 1915 issue of Confederate Veteran.

"At about 9:30 in the evening of April 16 we heard distinctly the bugle call of the enemy in front of our line to charge. With our six- and twelve-pound brass howitzers we were ordered to commence firing at an estimated distance of fifteen hundred yards. The bridges and lower line of trenches were defended by other forces, including the artillery battalion of Maj. J.F. Waddell. The firing continued briskly for some time. I cannot recall the exact hour, but when the last order to cease firing was given there was a hurried conference of officers of the company, and a little after midnight we received the sad and what proved to be the last order 'to take care of ourselves.' I was just eighteen miles from my home, which I had not seen since I left it a year before. Most of my comrades were from others parts of the State. We left the Girard hills in squads of six to twelve. I had visited Columbus from the age of seven or eight years, sometimes accompanying my father, but generally George, the negro driver, with six mules, taking six bales of cotton, weighing five hundred pounds each, to the Columbus market. Many a night as a lad had I slept under the wagon on the Girard hills and fallen asleep to the gentle moaning of the long-leaf pine and the subdued roar of the waters over the dam at the Mott Cotton Factory. I, therefore, knew something of the topography of the country."

"I left the battle line with a dozen comrades. We knew that Wilson's Cavalry was scouring the country for live stock, provisions, wagons, etc. We tramped over hills and through the woods, giving the public highways a wide berth to avoid capture, until five o'clock in the morning, when we lay down to rest in a pine thicket."

A Letter from Columbus Shortly after the "Last Battle"

Edited by

Mike Bunn

This letter was written by Lucy Banks to her cousin Lucy Young of Columbus, Mississippi. It was written in The Cedars, her family's home in Wynnton, shortly after the battle of Columbus. It describes both the battle and the chaotic situation in its aftermath. The original is in the Banks Family Papers at the the Hargrett Library, University of Georgia. It is reproduced here courtesy of Mr. and Mrs. John M. Sheftall from the collections at The Cedars.

April 21st /65

My darling old Pard [a nickname for Lucy Young]

Haven't I been through the rubbers this week though you have heard ere this that we have been honored by a visit from the Yanks. I am like an old Negroe of ours how I never want to see another seed of them even to the third or fourth generation of them. What say you to that? Tell Maj. Mac - I never thought he would let the Yanks run rough shod over us in this manner, without making one effort for our defense. He told me when he was here, not to get frightened about them, that he would come in ahead of them and give me warning. I took him at his word and did not get frightened, until several drunken ones came in, then I thought it was time "to get and get" to use a very expressive expression of the present times.

Well, Lu, shall I begin at the beginning and tell most all. Sunday at two o'clock the firing commenced. We had about twenty five hundred, the enemy seven or eight thousand whites and that many more blacks. Sunday night at ten they entered our City and such destruction, all the factories, government works, some few private houses &c were burned. Monday morning about twenty came down our lane, half Negroes, rode in our back yard & commenced forcing open the smoke house. Ma [Sarah Watkins Banks] gave them the keys. They took every ham all the flour & meal, sugar, coffee, &c, and off they went. From that time they poured in every minute in the day. I talked pretty brave until the drunken ones came and then I had nothing else to say. One gave me a sword, for my brash talking, said he captured it from one of our Maj's. I told him I prized it very highly, it was stained with blood. I remarked it looked like it had been in good service & I would try and see that it still did good service. I hope it will kill a many one more. Our loss was about as heavy as most any one else around here, that is not counting negro loss. We only had one little boy, Lunks that drove Father [John Banks], to leave. They got some of our silver forks, spoons & six silver knives &c. One old fellow went all through my draws, asked Mama what my work box was, & said La' just look how many things you Southerners have, what did you want to fight for. Some right funny things happened now that it is all over, but I tell you, it was not funny when we expected every minute to have the house burned. One old grabbed Father's hat, but he held on. Our guard finally came to the rescue and made him give it up.

Upon the whole we fared better than we expected...

The Photograph of the C.S.S. Jackson in the Chattahoochee River at Columbus

by

Mike Bunn

Perhaps the most remarkable achievement of Columbus' burgeoning military-industrial complex during the Civil War, regarded as second only to Richmond, was the ironclad ram C.S.S. Jackson. In many ways the ship became the embodiment of the local Confederate experience. It was born of a valiant, but ultimately futile, struggle against time and the odds. Though an object of pride and craftsmanship upon which great hope had been placed, it ultimately proved unsuccessful and met with a tragic end. Today it is remembered less for what it accomplished than for its importance as a tangible local link to a vital chapter in national history.

The Jackson was a major component of the local implementation of national Confederate naval strategy. Realizing early on the impossibility of countering Union naval forces ship for ship, the nascent Confederate Navy pinned its hopes of success on the construction of a fleet of ironclad warships.¹ Ironclads were a recent innovation in naval technology and virtually impervious to most artillery of the era. In theory, they could run ramshackle over the Union's conventional wooden-ship navies that blockaded southern ports, restricted the import and export of goods and war materials, and threatened waterside communities. A crucial element in the success of this strategy, however, hinged upon the development of secure construction facilities. Columbus, with its existing industrial base and interior location far removed from the major fronts of the war, fit the bill perfectly.²

¹ The history of the Confederate Navy is chronicled in a number of excellent books. See especially Raimondo Luraghi, A History of the Confederate Navy (Annapolis: Naval Institute Press, 1996) and Philip Van Doren Stern, The Confederate Navy: A Pictorial History (New York: Da Capo Press, Inc., 1992; reprint, New York: 1962) and William N. Still, Jr., Confederate Shipbuilding (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1969).

² The story of the Columbus Navy Yard is chronicled by Maxine Turner in Navy Gray: Engineering the Confederate Navy on the Chattahoochee and Apalachicola Rivers (Macon: Mercer University Press, 1999; reprint, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1988).

Accordingly, the Confederate Navy Yard at Columbus began operations in the fall of 1862. Lieutenant Augustus McLaughlin assumed overall command, while Chief Engineer James H. Warner headed up activities at the closely-associated Columbus Naval Iron Works.³ The complex would quickly become one of the most crucial to the hopes of the Confederacy. Featuring a rolling mill, machine shop, and facility to build and repair hulls, it eventually produced machinery for nearly a dozen warships and repaired or supplied equipment for several others. The Jackson, at first called the Muscogee and later officially named in honor of the capital city of Mississippi, became its single most important undertaking.⁴

Constant delay and frustration characterized the construction effort, however. Supplies for the mammoth project proved especially difficult to obtain in the war-torn and overwhelmingly agrarian South, and throughout 1863 and 1864 McLaughlin and Warner were called upon to invent ever-more creative solutions to shortages in iron and equipment. Just as significantly, the crushing workload and corresponding juggling of projects at the Navy Yard caused the work that did take place to occur haltingly.

Fittingly, no sooner did the ship begin to near completion than Confederate Chief Naval Constructor John L. Porter, the designer of the ship, visited Columbus in January of 1864 and set the project back by several months. Noting flaws related to the warship's buoyancy and propulsion system during an inspection, Porter, to the consternation of Naval Yard officials, ordered several major modifications.⁵ These changes, including an overall structural redesign and the addition of twin screw propellers in place of the original central paddle wheel, would ultimately improve the potential effectiveness of the warship. They also caused another significant delay in its construction, though, and public concern about perceived mismanagement of the ambitious undertaking soon manifested itself in open ridicule in the local press.⁶

The Jackson finally left its ways and splashed into the Chattahoochee on December 22, 1864.⁷ The ship was indeed formidable – over 223 feet long, fifty-six feet wide, featuring ports all around for a lethal battery of Brooke rifled cannon and protected by four inches of armor plating.⁸ Even in an unfinished state, such a mighty warship afloat on the Chattahoochee was truly a novel sight. Unfortunately, only one image of the scene has survived (Figure 1). Among the very few to depict a Confederate ironclad in service, the photograph was evidently taken shortly after the launch of the ship. The bare tree at left reveals it to be taken in winter, while the opening at the front of the casemate conforms to what is known about its stage of development at launch.⁹ In the background can be seen the C.S.S. Chattahoochee, another boat undergoing repairs at the Navy Yard at the time.

Columbus-based photographer A.J. Riddle, the self-styled "Chief Photographer of the Army of the West," probably captured the image.¹⁰ Riddle operated out of both Columbus and Macon during the war and is known to have produced numerous photographs and reproductions of maps for the Confederate Army.¹¹ He is probably most famous for the haunting images of Camp Sumter (Andersonville) prison he took in 1864, which vividly portray conditions at the facility. Though no definitive evidence confirming his involvement has surfaced, he surely would have photographed the boat provided an opportunity.

Union troops set the still-unfinished ship ablaze and left it to drift downriver after capturing Columbus on April 17, 1865.¹² It lay where it eventually grounded some thirty miles below the city for nearly a century, serving partly as a piece of local historical lore but mostly as a navigational hazard. Defiant and difficult to the end, the ship thwarted a concerted effort by the Corps of Engineers to remove it in 1910.¹³ Fifty years later, a group of local citizens, inspired by the approaching centennial of the Civil War and undeterred by the previous recovery failure, launched a locally-funded salvage effort that culminated with the raising of the ship in 1963.¹⁴ Today, the Jackson is the centerpiece of the National Civil War Naval Museum at Port Columbus (Figure 2), where it remains impressive as ever, both as an exhibit and as a physical reminder of one of the most turbulent and consequential periods in Columbus' past.

The First Decade of Telephone Service in Columbus, Georgia: Subscribers from 1880 – 1890

by

Callie B. McGinnis

Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876. Within a couple of years, telephone service began operations in many American cities. The first telephone exchange in the United States opened for business in 1878 in New Haven, Connecticut, with twenty-one customers.¹ In the South, the Atlanta Telephonic Exchange opened in 1879, operating out of an office on the top floor of the Kimball House, a hotel located on the corner of Wall and Pryor Streets.²

Just four years after the invention of the telephone, a small number of citizens in Columbus, Georgia, banded together to support the establishment of telephone service in the city. They got their wish on April 22, 1880, when the Columbus Telephone Exchange opened its doors for business. It was housed in the Georgia Home Building on the corner of Broad and 11th Street (then called St. Clair).³ Today, this building is known as the "Iron Bank," due to the fact that it has a cast iron façade. On that first day of business, the exchange handled about 600 calls – a hefty number considering there were only thirty-three subscribers.⁴

Oscar Harrell, manager of the Telephone Exchange, and J.O. Jeffries, the assistant district manager, gave special instructions to the neophyte Columbus telephone users:

When you desire to communicate with any other subscriber, first take the telephone from the hook and place it firmly against your ear. Then raise the hook, pull and hold down the switch lever, and when you hear the operator's voice, tell him your number and the number of the subscriber you desire to communicate with; then let go the switch lever. And when your bell is rung, proceed with your communication. Should you not hear the party you wish to speak to, pull down the switch lever and tell the operator to ring again. When you have finished your communication pull down the switch lever as at first, and tell the operator at the central office to disconnect your wires. Then hang up your telephone back on the hook.

When your telephone is not in use be sure it is hanging on the hook, otherwise your bell cannot be rung when you are wanted by other subscribers.

When speaking stand with your mouth about eight inches from the transmitter and speak plainly in an ordinary tone of voice.

When listening press the telephone firmly over the orifice of the ear.⁵

The day before the opening of the Exchange, the Daily Enquirer Sun published a list of the original subscribers arranged by telephone number. Curiously, many of the early numbers are left blank. That list appears below.⁶ It is interesting to note that while most of the listings are for businesses, there are two residences listed: that of Oscar Harrell, the Exchange's manager, and G. Gunby Jordan, one of the city's most prominent citizens.

Over the next decade, the Columbus newspapers added occasional batches of entries to the telephone list.⁸ The following eight entries were listed on September 5, 1886:⁹

In the fall of 1889, single listing appeared for the Acme Steam Laundry. Its telephone number was 227.¹⁴

The following year, on April 15, 1890, an actual Columbus telephone directory, containing 242 listings, was published and distributed to subscribers. This publication was reprinted in 1992 by Southern Bell Telephone and Telegraph Company.¹⁵ A copy is held by the Columbus State University Archives. There is also a copy in the Columbus Public Library's Genealogy Room Pamphlet File.

Of course, new subscribers continued to come on board after the directory was published. In June 1890, a few more subscribers were added:¹⁶

- 253 Little, W. A., residence
- 254 Smith, Thomas W., residence
- 257 Wells & Curtis, shoes
- 258 Gibson, W. H., general merchandise
- 259 Parker, T. C., Union Depot Lunch Room

After 1890, additional listings were published in the newspapers as an ongoing venture. The telephone directories were also revised and published. By 1904, at least four directories had been published. It must have been difficult for subscribers to keep up with all the new subscriber listings. By 1904, it was estimated that there were at least 500 subscribers. It is interesting to note that telephone users did have access to "directory assistance." All they had to do was dial 500.¹⁶

After its first four years of operation, the Columbus Telephone Exchange was relocated from the Iron Bank to a two-story brick building on 11th Street, located just behind the bank.¹⁷ This building, situated at 14 11th Street, is currently occupied by the Old Siam Thai Cafe. Curiously, a pediment on the front of the building bears the date "1889." It appears that this feature was added later (probably in the late 20th century), and that it is a mistake. The building is clearly noted on the 1885 Columbus Sanborn Fire Insurance Map as the Telephone Office.¹⁸ It is the exact same shape in the 1889 Sanborn map.¹⁹

The first ten years of telephone service in Columbus, Georgia, must have been an exciting time for local residents. Between 1880 and 1890, close to 300 businesses and individuals signed up as telephone subscribers. These people were the technology geeks of their era, pioneering the use of a gadget that would completely change the face of communication in Columbus and around the world.

Membership Lists of the First Presbyterian Church, Columbus, Georgia, 1830-1842

Transcribed by

Martha Ragan

The following transcribed lists are part of a collection of materials housed in the Columbus State University Archives. These lists were not previously printed in James J. Gilbert's The History of the First Presbyterian Church of Columbus, Georgia, during the first 100 years of its existence. These lists would be of significant interest to anyone doing research on the church or genealogy of Columbus families. I was given these handwritten lists to transcribe in early 2011.

The First Presbyterian Church Records, MC 171, comprise two series. The first series includes the original and microfilm materials related to the history of the church. This series includes session minutes, Board of Trustee minutes, deaconate minutes, scrapbooks, and various other historical materials, circa 1833-1995. These materials arrived at Columbus State University in September 2006 and were previously housed at the Presbyterian Historical Society in Montreat, North Carolina. Due to the closing of the facility, the church decided to house the materials at Columbus State. The second series includes videotapes of various services and other events related to the church, circa 1991-1996. The church donated these materials to CSU in 2002.
