DOUBLE TROUBLE WITH DOUBLE DESCRIPTION: A CONSIDERATION OF STATE V. MONTOYA AND ITS APPLICATION OF THE RULE OF LENITY

Ashley Funkhouser*

I. INTRODUCTION

In State v. Montoya,¹ the New Mexico Supreme Court addressed the issue of whether simultaneously punishing a defendant for shooting at a motor vehicle and voluntary manslaughter for the same action is a violation of double jeopardy. Specifically, the court evaluated the case as a double description case, where “the same conduct results in multiple convictions under different statutes.”² Not only did the court hold that Defendant’s two convictions were a violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause of the United States Constitution,³ overruling State v. Gonzales,⁴ State v. Dominguez,⁵ and State v. Riley,⁶ but it also altered the rule in such a way that future cases that raise double description will most likely be resolved in favor of the defendant.

This note first discusses pertinent double description precedent in New Mexico and the cases that the Montoya court overruled.⁷ It will then recount the court's discussion of important cases in double jeopardy jurisprudence and the rationale behind overruling Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley. Next, this note looks at the importance of State v. Varela,⁸ where the court held that convictions for shooting at a dwelling and homicide is a violation of double jeopardy.⁹ Finally, this note focuses on the Montoya court's emphasis on the rule of lenity in determining whether convictions under separate statutes violate double jeopardy.¹⁰ This note argues that the court could have overruled Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley by extending the holding from Varela without reaching the rule of lenity at all.

Applying the rule of lenity without explicitly stating what is ambiguous about the statutes in question could have a dramatic effect on the future of double jeopardy jurisprudence by limiting the instances in which a defendant may be convicted under multiple statutes.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Facts

"This case, like all too many that come before our courts, erupted from a toxic mixture of testosterone and guns," stated Justice Daniels as he began his explanation of State v. Montoya.¹¹ After an altercation involving gunfire between Defendant's friends and another gang,¹² the Defendant and his friends were standing in the driveway of Defendant's parents' home, tending to Defendant's injured brother.¹³ A Ford Expedition containing members of the rival gang drove by the Defendant's house, shooting at Defendant and his group again.¹⁴ Defendant ran inside,

Frazier, 2007-NMSC-032, 142 N.M. 120, 164 P.3d 1 (the predicate felony for a felony murder conviction is always subsumed by the felony murder conviction, and the defendant can never be convicted of both), State v. Cooper, 1997-NMSC-058, 124 N.M. 277, 949 P.2d 660 (convictions for felony murder and second-degree murder of the same victim violated double jeopardy), and *State v. returned with an AK-47, and began shooting at the Expedition.¹⁵ Defendant shot the victim, Diego Delgado, seven times, including one shot to the head.¹⁶ Delgado died as a result of the multiple gunshot wounds.¹⁷

Defendant was indicted on nine felony counts, including shooting at a motor vehicle resulting in great bodily harm and a homicide count of deliberate first-degree murder or in the alternative, first-degree felony murder.¹⁸ At trial, the district court judge gave the jurors instructions on deliberate first-degree murder, second-degree murder, and voluntary manslaughter.¹⁹ Separately, the judge instructed the jury to consider felony murder.²⁰ While the judge instructed the jury on the essential provocation element distinguishing second-degree murder from manslaughter, he did not instruct them that lack of sufficient provocation is an element of felony murder.²¹ This was an issue because a defendant must be guilty of second-degree murder to be found guilty of first-degree felony murder.²² During deliberation, the jury asked the district court judge whether it must find Defendant guilty of felony murder if it already found him guilty of manslaughter.²³ The district court judge simply replied, “[e]ach crime charged in the indictment should be considered separately.”²⁴ Defendant was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter and first-degree felony murder for the felonies of shooting at a motor vehicle and shooting at a motor vehicle resulting in great bodily harm.²⁵ He was sentenced to life imprisonment for first-degree felony murder.²⁶

The district court judge vacated the shooting at a motor vehicle and voluntary manslaughter convictions, reasoning that under New Mexico Supreme Court precedent interpreting the Double Jeopardy Clause, Defendant could not be punished for felony murder and for the lesser-included predicate felony.²⁷ Defendant appealed his voluntary manslaughter and felony murder convictions directly to the New Mexico

Supreme Court.²⁸ On appeal, the court determined that the felony murder conviction was fundamental error because the jury instructions for felony murder did not include an instruction that lack of provocation distinguishes heat-of-passion voluntary manslaughter from second-degree murder.²⁹

As a result of its holding that the jury instructions were flawed, the court had to reinstate Montoya's voluntary manslaughter and shooting at a motor vehicle charges.³⁰ This raised the issue of whether both convictions could be allowed to stand under the Double Jeopardy Clause.³¹

B. Legal Background

1. Double Description

The Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution states, "nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb."³² The Double Jeopardy clause applies in two situations—in a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal or conviction, or multiple punishments for the same offense.³³ When a defendant is charged with multiple violations of the same offense, the case is called a "unit-of-prosecution" case.³⁴ When a defendant is charged under multiple statutes for conduct that was part of the same act, the case is a "double description" case, the type of case at issue in Montoya.³⁵

Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court often disagree about how the double jeopardy precedent it has created should be applied.³⁶ Professor George C. Thomas III³⁷ states that the efforts of the Supreme Court of the United States to make coherent double jeopardy law in general have

He has written extensively on the subject of criminal procedure, and double jeopardy in particular. The New Mexico Supreme Court has referenced his works in their own opinions. See State v. Montoya, 2013-NMSC-020, ¶ 31, 306 P.3d. 426; Swafford v. State, 1991-NMSC-043, ¶ 26, 112 N.M. 3, 810 P.2d 1223.

“largely failed,”³⁸ and that double description is particularly difficult for the United States Supreme Court to work with because there are far more criminal statutes in effect today than there were at the time the constitution was written.³⁹

2. Legislative Intent

“[T]he Double Jeopardy Clause does no more than prevent the sentencing court from prescribing greater punishment than the legislature intended.”⁴⁰ In Brown v. Ohio,⁴¹ the U.S. Supreme Court gave a rationale for deferring to legislative intent, stating that “the Fifth Amendment double jeopardy guarantee serves principally as a restraint on courts and prosecutors. The legislature remains free under the Double Jeopardy Clause to define crimes and fix punishments.”⁴² In other words, the Double Jeopardy Clause only prevents courts and prosecutors from imposing greater sentences than the legislature intended; the legislature remains free to punish unitary conduct with multiple statutes if it so desires.⁴³

The U.S. Supreme Court created the Blockburger test in *Blockburger v. United States*⁴⁴ as a way to determine whether a sentence violated double jeopardy, even if Congress intended to impose cumulative sentences with multiple statutes.⁴⁵ The Blockburger test is as follows:

[W]here the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two punishable offenses or only one [for double jeopardy purposes] is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not.⁴⁶

The Blockburger test is a strict elements test, meaning that the court looks only to the language of the statutes to determine if the statutes are the same for the purposes of double jeopardy.⁴⁷ However, the U.S. Supreme Court later decided that Blockburger should only be applied to statutory formulation, and therefore only provides half of the answer to the double description issue.⁴⁸ The New Mexico Supreme Court takes double description analysis further.⁴⁹ First, the statutes must survive the Blockburger test, then the court looks for evidence that the legislature intended cumulative punishment.⁵⁰ It is this second part, looking at the legislative intent, which changed significantly with Montoya.

3. The Rule of Lenity

The rule of lenity is “[t]he judicial doctrine holding that a court, in construing an ambiguous criminal statute that sets out multiple or inconsistent punishments, should resolve the ambiguity in favor of the more lenient punishment.”⁵¹ The rationale guiding this rule is that, “if doubt exists about whether the legislature meant to create distinct blameworthiness, courts should presume singular blameworthiness.”⁵² Unit of prosecution cases apply the rule of lenity with some regularity, but its application to double description cases is less consistent.⁵³

Although the rule of lenity applies to double description cases involving lesser-included offenses, its application to other types of double description cases is less clear.⁵⁴ An offense is generally considered a lesser-included offense when “the proof necessary to establish the greater offense will of necessity establish every element of the lesser offense, without regard to the nature of the offenses.”⁵⁵ Even though the lesser-included offense doctrine is strikingly similar to the Blockburger test, not every double description case in New Mexico involves lesser-included offenses, because New Mexico courts apply both Blockburger and a legislative intent analysis to determine whether separate convictions for unitary conduct violate double description.⁵⁶

In Whalen v. United States,⁵⁷ the Supreme Court of the United States stated that the rule of lenity should be applied in double jeopardy cases when the matter of legislative intent is “not entirely free from doubt.”⁵⁸ In Whalen, the court analyzed the statutes of rape and felony murder, determining that the defendant could not be convicted of rape if he is convicted of felony murder.⁵⁹ The rape is the predicate felony for the felony murder charge, and is therefore a lesser-included offense.⁶⁰ The Court also applied the rule of lenity in Bell v. United States,⁶¹ stating that “[i]t may be fairly said to be a presupposition of our law to resolve doubts in the enforcement of a penal code against the imposition of a harsher punishment.”⁶²

III. RATIONALE

In Montoya, the New Mexico Supreme Court first held that the jury was incorrectly instructed on an essential element of Defendant’s felony murder charge, and that Defendant’s conviction for voluntary manslaughter precluded him from being retried using appropriate jury instructions.⁶³

The court then determined that Defendant could not be punished for voluntary manslaughter and shooting at a motor vehicle resulting in great bodily harm when both convictions were based on the same action.⁶⁴ The State conceded that Defendant’s culpable conduct was unitary, meaning that Defendant’s single act of shooting was the common factual basis for both the shooting at a motor vehicle and the voluntary manslaughter charge.⁶⁵ Because Defendant challenged his conviction under different statutes for unitary conduct, his appeal was treated as a double description case.⁶⁶ The court first applied the Blockburger test, which determined “in the abstract whether each statutory offense ‘requires proof of a fact which the other does not.’”⁶⁷ If the court’s application of the test determines that one statute subsumes another, the statutes are the same for double jeopardy purposes.⁶⁸ However, because shooting at a motor vehicle does not require a death and voluntary manslaughter does not require that one shoot at a motor vehicle, the statutes survived the Blockburger test.⁶⁹

The court then had to determine whether the legislature intended separate punishment for unitary conduct under Swafford v. State.⁷⁰ The court examined “the particular evil sought to be addressed by each offense” and stated that “[i]f several statutes are not only usually violated together, but also seem designed to protect the same social interest, the inference becomes strong that the function of the multiple statutes is only to allow alternative means of prosecution.”⁷¹

In New Mexico, the test relevant to double description cases comes from Swafford.⁷² In Swafford, the defendant was convicted of third-degree criminal sexual penetration, incest, aggravated assault with intent to commit a felony and false imprisonment.⁷³ The defendant appealed his convictions on the grounds that the convictions under separate statutes arose from unitary conduct, and was therefore a double description violation of double jeopardy.⁷⁴

Swafford discussed the rule of lenity as the court outlined the tests and considerations that go into a double jeopardy analysis.⁷⁵ It stated that the Supreme Court of the United States applies the rule of lenity to ambiguous statutes, with the presumption that “the legislature did not intend to fragment a course of conduct into separate offenses.”⁷⁶ However, the court in Swafford explained that the rule of lenity always applies in “unit of prosecution” cases, but that its application to double description cases is unclear.⁷⁷ The court stated that lenity applies “only after the language, structure and legislative history of the statutes at issue raise an indication of leniency.”⁷⁸ Ultimately the court rejected including the rule of lenity as an element of the test.⁷⁹ Swafford went on to state:

The first part of our inquiry asks the question that [U.S.] Supreme Court precedents assume to be true: whether the conduct underlying the offenses is unitary, i.e., whether the same conduct violates both statutes. The second part focuses on the statutes at issue to determine whether the legislature intended to create separately punishable offenses.⁸⁰

In the second part of the test, Swafford pointed to the Blockburger test, and explained that the court must first determine if the statutes survive the Blockburger test as distinct offenses.⁸¹ However, surviving the Blockburger test only raises a presumption that the statutes are distinct for the purposes of sentencing; the court must still look at “other indicia of legislative intent”⁸² to determine the “particular evil sought to be addressed by each offense.”⁸³ Such indicia include the language, history, and subject of the statutes.⁸⁴ Double description cases have applied this test from Swafford and it continues to be the relevant inquiry.⁸⁵

In State v. Montoya, the New Mexico Supreme Court overruled State v. Gonzales and the two cases that relied on it, State v. Dominguez and State v. Riley.⁸⁶ These three cases all involved shooting at or from a motor vehicle, and some form of homicide.⁸⁷ In each opinion, the court applied the test set forth in Swafford, where statutes that survive the Blockburger strict elements test should be analyzed for the social harm that the legislature intended to address with each statute.⁸⁸ Before Montoya, the court determined that the legislature intended these statutes to address different social harms, and therefore it was not a violation of double jeopardy for the defendant to be convicted under both statutes.⁸⁹

In Gonzales, the defendant appealed on double description grounds because he was convicted of first-degree murder and shooting at a motor vehicle.⁹⁰ The court reached its holding in Gonzales by using the language from Swafford, first determining that the conduct was unitary.⁹¹ It then applied the Blockburger test, determining that the statutes survived

Blockburger because shooting at a motor vehicle does not require that a person die, and first-degree murder does not require that the victim die because he was shot in a vehicle.⁹² Therefore, each statute required proof of a fact that the other did not.⁹³ Finally, it determined that the social harm that the legislature intended to prevent with the shooting at a motor vehicle statute was property damage and bodily injury, whereas first-degree murder was intended to prevent unlawful killings.⁹⁴ Thus, because the statutes addressed different social harms and neither statute subsumed the other, convictions under both shooting at a motor vehicle and first-degree murder were permitted.⁹⁵ Gonzales remained the applicable legal rule for similar statutes, controlling the decisions in Dominguez and Riley.⁹⁶

In Dominguez, the defendant was convicted of “shooting at or from a motor vehicle” and voluntary manslaughter.⁹⁷ The Dominguez court extended the reasoning from Gonzales, holding that convictions for both shooting at a motor vehicle and voluntary manslaughter did not violate double jeopardy.⁹⁸

Finally, in Riley, the court reaffirmed its holding in Gonzales that shooting at a motor vehicle and first-degree murder convictions for unitary conduct did not violate double jeopardy.⁹⁹ The court elected to follow stare decisis and held that the convictions were permissible because the defendant did not offer any reasons to depart from the precedent.¹⁰⁰ However, the court did not do much to defend its holdings in Gonzales and Dominguez, it merely stated that the cases were still valid, and it did not have a good reason to overturn them.¹⁰¹

The decisions in Dominguez and Riley were sharply divided, and the dissents in those opinions indicated a shift in the court’s position on the validity of the holding of Gonzales.¹⁰² The dissents also suggested a growing consensus among the justices that Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley should be overruled.¹⁰³ Justice Bosson’s dissent in Riley was practically an invitation to defense attorneys to specifically challenge the holdings in Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley, indicating that the court would welcome the opportunity to reconsider them.¹⁰⁴ Justice Bosson got his wish in Montoya, where the Defendant finally argued specific reasons for overruling Gonzales.¹⁰⁵

In the years since Gonzales, the court addressed the double description issue using the Swafford analysis in cases that involved statutes other than the statutes considered in Gonzales, Dominguez, Riley, and Montoya.¹⁰⁶ The Gonzales line was one of the few where the court found no double description issue, making it difficult to reconcile with the double jeopardy jurisprudence as a whole.¹⁰⁷

One case of particular importance to the Montoya court was State v. Contreras, in which the court decided for the first time that convictions for felony murder and the underlying predicate felony violated double description.¹⁰⁸ Montoya also noted that State v. Frazier greatly expanded the holding of Contreras, because it held that the legislature did not intend convictions for both felony murder and the predicate felony under any circumstances, so there was no need to evaluate this issue on a case-by-case basis.¹⁰⁹ Further, Montoya recognized that in State v. Cooper, the court held that a defendant could not be punished for felony murder and the second-degree murder that the felony murder is predicated on.¹¹⁰ Finally, Montoya stated that the decisions in Cooper and *State v. Santillanes*¹¹¹ “substantially eroded” the reasoning underlying Gonzales, because in each case the statutes passed the Blockburger test and were still found to be a violation of double jeopardy if a defendant was convicted for unitary conduct under both.¹¹²

In Varela, the court determined that convictions for shooting at a dwelling and felony murder violated double jeopardy.¹¹³ In Varela, the court determined that shooting at a trailer and killing the person inside was unitary, thus requiring an analysis of the legislative intent behind the shooting at a dwelling statute.¹¹⁴ If the legislature did not intend for death to be used as a substitute for “great bodily harm,” then it would have been error for the court to use shooting at a dwelling as a basis for a felony murder conviction.¹¹⁵ The court looked to the social harm that the legislature sought to prevent by outlawing shooting at a dwelling.¹¹⁶ The court then concluded that felony murder subsumed the elements of shooting at a dwelling; therefore, Varela’s convictions for both offenses violated double jeopardy.¹¹⁷

In Varela, the court examined NMSA 1978, Section 30-3-8(A) (1993), which defines the offenses of shooting at a dwelling or occupied building.¹¹⁸ The first provision of the statute prohibits shooting at a dwelling or occupied building, and the court interpreted that as the legislature seeking to prevent that very action.¹¹⁹ The next three scenarios the statute addresses are: (1) shooting at a dwelling that does not cause any great bodily harm, (2) shooting at a dwelling that causes injury, and (3) shooting at a dwelling that causes great bodily injury.¹²⁰ The court stated that it would be absurd to construe the statute to not include situations in which the victim dies, and held that a shooting at a dwelling in which the victim dies is covered by one of the three levels of punishment laid out in the statute.¹²¹

The Montoya court stated that Varela is important to its analysis because Varela recognized that death is part of the harm that the legislature intended to prevent in outlawing drive-by shootings.¹²² It reached that conclusion by recognizing that the analysis in Varela is applicable to Montoya because it interpreted different provisions of the same statute.¹²³ The Montoya court explained that this analysis of the legislature’s intent is supported by the way that the shooting at or from a motor vehicle statute is structured, paralleling assaultive crimes (which modify the sentence imposed based on the harm done) as opposed to property damage crimes (which modify the sentence imposed based on the value of the property taken).¹²⁴

Next, the Montoya court discussed several cases where the court overruled double description jurisprudence where it previously found that convicting the defendant under two statutes for unitary conduct was constitutional. In State v. Gutierrez, the court held that robbery of a car and the armed robbery of its keys violated double jeopardy.¹²⁵

Gutierrez introduced the concept of the modified Blockburger approach for statutes that are “vague and unspecific” or “written with many alternatives.”¹²⁶ Under this approach, the court looks at the state’s legal theory, without looking at the particular facts of the case, to determine whether convictions under separate statutes violate double jeopardy.¹²⁷ The reviewing court looks to the charging documents and jury instructions, not just the statute’s text.¹²⁸ In Gutierrez, the state charged the defendant under the auto burglary statute as well as the general robbery statute, arguing that the “anything of value” element of the statute was satisfied when the defendant took the car owner’s car keys.¹²⁹ The court found that the “anything of value” language was sufficiently vague to trigger the rule of lenity and prevent convictions under both the auto theft and general robbery statute.¹³⁰

The court also applied this theory in another important double description case, State v. Swick.¹³¹ In Swick, the court overruled its decision in State v. Armendariz.¹³² Armendariz held that convictions for aggravated battery and attempted murder based on unitary conduct were not a violation of double jeopardy for three reasons: the aggravated battery and attempted murder statutes addressed different social harms, neither state indicated that they were different ways of committing the same crime, and the two crimes are not necessarily violated at the same moment in time.¹³³ In Swick, the court pointed to Armendariz’s reliance on

Gonzales, asserting that both cases applied Blockburger's strict elements test without due consideration of the substantive sameness analysis set forth in Swafford.¹³⁴ However, the Armendariz court recognized that the legislature may not have intended cumulative punishment because attempted murder is punished by a much greater sentence than aggravated battery.¹³⁵ The court in Swick concluded that this observation about the severity of the sentences leaves the legislative intent unclear, and as a result modified Blockburger applied.¹³⁶

Another important aspect of Swick is that it stated when a statute is "vague and unspecific," the court must analyze the State's legal theory to determine if each charge requires proof of a fact which the other does not.¹³⁷ Swick explains that the statute for attempted murder is a "vague and unspecific" statute because many forms of conduct can support the "began to do an act which constituted a substantial part of the murder" element.¹³⁸

Swick held that when the legislative intent is still unclear after a thorough examination, the rule of lenity should apply, and any ambiguity should be resolved in favor of the defendant.¹³⁹ The Swick court applied the rule of lenity because "reasonable minds can differ as to the Legislature's intent in punishing these two crimes."¹⁴⁰

The Montoya court noted State v. Gutierrez's adoption of the modified Blockburger approach, and stated that it was critical because it "exemplified how the Court has been 'rethinking some of the underpinnings of [its] double jeopardy jurisprudence.'"¹⁴¹ It also recognized that the modified Blockburger approach was followed in Swick.¹⁴²

Finally, though it was a unit of prosecution case as opposed to a double description case, Montoya discusses State v. Gallegos.¹⁴³ Montoya stated that the underlying rationale behind trying to punish an act as opposed to violations of multiple statutes, as the court did in Gallegos, “set a new course for the future application of double jeopardy principles.”¹⁴⁴

The court in Montoya noted that the strict mechanical elements test has faded away over the course of New Mexico double jeopardy jurisprudence and a substantive sameness analysis replaced it.¹⁴⁵ In keeping with this transition, the court in Montoya overruled Gonzales and the cases that follow it.¹⁴⁶

The court concluded that the changes in double jeopardy jurisprudence made the decision in Gonzales “so unworkable as to be intolerable.”¹⁴⁷ It stated that:

Applying [the precedents considered] and the rule of lenity, we can no longer conclude that the Legislature intended that this defendant should receive more than the maximum punishment it determined appropriate for either a drive-by shooting or a completed homicide, taking into consideration the relationship between the statutory offenses and their common commission by unitary conduct, the identical social harms to which they are directed, and their use by the State in this case to impose double punishment for the killing of the victim.¹⁴⁸

Although the court stated the factors considered, it did not clearly detail the analysis it went through to reach a conclusion on many of those points: the relationship between the offenses, their use by the State,¹⁴⁹ or why the rule of lenity applies.¹⁵⁰

The court also held that circumstances justified overruling Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley.¹⁵¹ The court addressed the notion that either party may have justifiably relied on Gonzales and would be unfairly prejudiced should the opinion be overruled.¹⁵² Because the double description issue is one that is only raised in post-conviction situations, the State, which would be the party relying on Gonzales to its detriment, cannot be said to actually be relying on the decision.¹⁵³

As a result of the court's decision to overrule precedent and disallow multiple convictions for the same action, the court determined that the more severe punishment, shooting at a motor vehicle, should be reinstated.¹⁵⁴ The court determined, in keeping with other jurisdictions and its holding in State v. Swick that the conviction with the shorter sentence should be vacated to avoid a double jeopardy violation.¹⁵⁵ Voluntary manslaughter is a third-degree felony requiring six years imprisonment,¹⁵⁶ whereas shooting at a motor vehicle resulting in great bodily harm is a second-degree felony calling for fifteen years imprisonment when it results in the death of a human being.¹⁵⁷ The court imposed the greater sentence because the court determined it is unacceptable for one to escape punishment for a crime simply because he also violated a statute with a lesser punishment.¹⁵⁸ Regardless of which is considered the more serious crime, the court must choose to reinstate the one the legislature designated a more severe punishment.¹⁵⁹

Finally, the court discussed Defendant's claim that he was denied the right to an impartial jury, determining that he received a fair trial,¹⁶⁰ and Defendant's claim that he received ineffective assistance of counsel holding that there was an insufficient record for the court to determine the claim.¹⁶¹

IV. ANALYSIS

After the extensive evaluation of double description jurisprudence, the Montoya court did very little to actually apply the rules it laid out. In fact, discussion of many of the cases seemed almost random, particularly because the court did not then apply the legal analysis gleaned from those cases to the issues in Montoya: The court did not apply the modified Blockburger approach it adopted in Gutierrez and Swick. It also did not explain what is vague about the statutes at issue in Montoya (a necessary finding in order for the rule of lenity to apply).

In Montoya, the court emphasized that the rule of lenity applies “in cases of ambiguity because reasonable minds can differ as to the Legislature’s intent in punishing the [] two crimes.”¹⁶² In Montoya, the court must have concluded that the two such statutes Defendant was charged under were ambiguous because it stated that the rule of lenity applied.¹⁶³ However, the court did not explain how the statutes are ambiguous. Without this determination, the court does not have a justification for applying the rule of lenity.

The court anchored its use of the rule of lenity by relying on Swick.¹⁶⁴ However, the statutes in Swick were much more vague than the statutes in Montoya, and the court failed to specifically explain what is vague about shooting at a motor vehicle or voluntary manslaughter. Further, the court did not need to use the rule of lenity to overturn Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley. By doing so, the court created a scenario in which it will be extremely difficult for the State to overcome a double description challenge to convictions based on unitary conduct.

Justice Chavez explained in his special concurrence in Frazier that if the offenses are the same and the language is ambiguous, then the rule of lenity applies.¹⁶⁵ However, Frazier is distinguishable from Montoya because Montoya did not involve lesser-included offenses. In Montoya, the offenses do not merge in the traditional way that lesser-included offenses merge with a greater offense. Rather, the court explains one conviction given by the jury should have been vacated by the judge for the purposes of sentencing.¹⁶⁶ The problem with thinking about Montoya as a lesser-included offense case once the felony murder charges are dismissed is easy to illustrate by analyzing the statutes in question. If the court finds that voluntary manslaughter is a lesser-included offense of shooting at a motor-vehicle, then it essentially places more importance on a crime that society may view as less serious.¹⁶⁷ On the other hand, if the court finds that shooting at a motor vehicle is a lesser-included offense of voluntary manslaughter, it places more importance on a crime that carries a much shorter jail sentence.¹⁶⁸ Either approach leads to an odd result, indicating that Montoya did not concern the theory of lesser-included offenses, and the court needed an alternative justification for applying the rule of lenity.

Although the court clearly explained why the rule of lenity should apply in Swick, its application to Montoya is less clear. In fact, the court does not explicitly state in Montoya that the statutes are ambiguous; it merely states that an application of other double description precedents and the rule of lenity requires that Gonzales and the cases that follow from it must be overruled.¹⁶⁹ Thus, the major change in Montoya is not so much the application of the rule of lenity as it is the court's treatment of legislative intent. Recognizing that their decision on what the legislature intended in Gonzales was wrong would have been sufficient to overrule it. Applying the holding from Varela to Montoya and carefully addressing the reasons for overruling precedent would have been enough for the court to reach the same holding as it did.¹⁷⁰

By noting the absurdity of interpreting the shooting at or from a motor vehicle and shooting at a dwelling statute as not including death as a social harm that the legislature intended to prevent, the Varela court swiftly dealt with the ambiguity issue that Montoya asserted makes the rule of lenity so necessary.¹⁷¹ In fact, the court in Varela analyzed a statute

167. See id. ¶ 56.

168. Id. (stating that third-degree voluntary manslaughter carries a sentence of six years' imprisonment, and second-degree shooting at a motor vehicle carries a sentence of fifteen years' imprisonment).

169. Id. ¶ 52.

170. The Dominguez court addressed the idea of applying Varela instead of Gonzales, and dismissed it vigorously by explaining that the same statutory definition of great bodily harm used in Varela was available at the time that Gonzales was decided, and yet the court still held that first-degree murder was distinct from shooting at a motor vehicle resulting in great bodily harm. State v. Dominguez, 2005-NMSC-001, ¶ 9, 106 P.3d 563. The court's position on the importance of Varela is vastly different in Montoya than it was in Dominguez, but the Montoya court did not address why it now places more importance on the analysis of the statutes in Varela than it does on the analysis in Gonzales. This may be one reason why it could not simply rely on Varela, and relied on the rule of lenity to bolster its decision to overrule Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley.

171. See Varela, 1999-NMSC-045, ¶ 13.

that is vaguer than the statutes in Montoya (felony murder), making the Montoya court's application of the rule of lenity is even more suspicious.

The similarity of the statute in Varela to the one in Montoya makes it logical to apply the same rationale when reconsidering the shooting at a motor vehicle statute in Montoya.¹⁷² Finding that convictions for shooting at a motor vehicle and homicide is a violation of double jeopardy is a simple task once the court finds that death is a social harm that the legislature intended to prevent in passing the shooting at a dwelling statute. Because the statutes in Varela and Montoya are essentially the same statute, just different subsections of that statute, one can conclude that they address the same social harm. Furthermore, in applying this analysis the court eliminates the ambiguity that the rule of lenity is intended to resolve.

Montoya gives defendants an additional opportunity to prove that conviction under two statutes for a unitary act is a violation of double jeopardy. As early as Swafford, the defendant had two opportunities to do so.¹⁷³ First, the court uses the Blockburger test to see if one statute subsumes another.¹⁷⁴ Next, if the statutes survive Blockburger, the court may still invalidate a conviction on double description grounds based on its interpretation of legislative intent.¹⁷⁵ After Montoya, if there is even the slightest question as to what the legislature intended, the rule of lenity will apply, thereby resolving the issue in favor of the defendant.¹⁷⁶ The court could have resolved the issue on the second step by applying Varela and ending the inquiry. Instead, it applied the rule of lenity, for reasons that are not entirely clear.

It is possible that Montoya is intentionally vague in its application of the rule of lenity in order to create a consistent rule for all double description cases, not just cases involving shooting at a motor vehicle and homicide. The court stated that it has struggled to reconcile those specific statutes with the rest of double description jurisprudence,¹⁷⁷ and the trend is clearly toward finding multiple punishments for unitary conduct under two statutes unconstitutional. However, the court did not explain why it matters that its jurisprudence regarding these particular statutes be in line with the trend. If double description inquiries are going to be conducted on a case-by-case analysis involving the facts of the case and legislative intent, it does not follow that the court should be influenced by its decisions involving other statutes and very different fact patterns.

If there is a way to violate two statutes with just one action, double description comes into play. The court should not allow the fact that it has disallowed multiple punishments for many double description scenarios to influence how it will rule on a specific double description issue, because the inquiry is a fact-specific analysis that turns on how the conduct in each case violates the statutes. The Uniform Statute and Rule Construction Act provides guidance for courts in interpreting statutes.¹⁷⁸ In addition to considering the text of the statute, courts may look to the judicial construction of the same or a similar statute.¹⁷⁹ However, the rule requires courts to look to the language and construction of “similar” statutes.¹⁸⁰ In other words, courts should not use interpretations of the embezzlement statute¹⁸¹ to justify a novel reading of the kidnapping statute,¹⁸² because the two statutes are completely different. The same should hold for double description—the court should not allow its conclusions about whether charges under one set of statutes violate double description to influence its conclusion about a different set of statutes. Each combination of statutes should be considered individually, influenced only by cases where the same statutes were at issue. Although this might lead to different methods of determination depending on the crime charged, each combination of statutes is unique enough that such individualization might be desirable.

Montoya overturned Gonzales, Dominguez, and Riley, three opinions that grew increasingly unpopular as the court developed its double description jurisprudence.¹⁸³ However, it also set the stage for future double description cases, sending the message that multiple punishments for unitary conduct will be looked upon with disfavor by the court, to the extent that it will be nearly impossible to prove that the legislature intended for a defendant to be convicted under two statutes for a single action.

V. IMPLICATIONS

The “shooting at a motor vehicle” and “homicide” statutes are commonly violated together, particularly in the context of gang-related violence as seen in Montoya.¹⁸⁴ Therefore, the holding in Montoya changes the potential outcome for many criminal prosecutions in the future. Although the defendant likely will still be charged with both homicide and shooting at or from a motor vehicle (as double description is an issue that is considered post-conviction), the defendant will not be required to serve sentences for both convictions that a jury may impose. Overall, defendants will be looking at less serious consequences than they were before Montoya was decided.

The most important takeaway from Montoya, however, is that it indicates the future of double description jurisprudence in New Mexico.¹⁸⁵ The dissents in the cases leading up to *Montoya*¹⁸⁶ as well as the holdings in double description cases with statutes unrelated to Montoya indicate a trend towards a more liberal application of the double description rule. The majority of the double description cases discussed in Montoya have held that it is a violation of double jeopardy to convict the defendant of both offenses he was charged with. In the future, the court may interpret legislative intent in such a way that precludes punishment for both offenses charged whenever possible. When applying the rule of lenity, it is difficult to imagine that there are many circumstances in which the legislative intent is so clear that double description will be permissible.¹⁸⁷

The fact that the court does not explain why the statutes in Montoya are vague opens the door for defendants to challenge any number of statutes for double description violations. Montoya overruled three cases that gave courts guidance on how to interpret the shooting at a motor vehicle and homicide statutes without giving clear instructions on how those statutes should now be interpreted. Furthermore, the precise role of the rule of lenity continues to be unclear, though it is obvious that the court intends to incorporate it into the double description analysis.

VI. CONCLUSION

Double description is a complicated area of law that troubles courts across the nation as criminal statutory schemes become increasingly complex. As legislatures create laws that outlaw very specific activity, courts struggle to interpret when legislatures intended for the defendant to be punished under each statute he violated, even when the conduct was unitary.

Montoya limits the circumstances in which the State may secure convictions for defendants under more than one statute for unitary conduct. However, Montoya does not explain how shooting at a motor vehicle and voluntary manslaughter remain vague after a thorough examination of legislative intent, thus opening the door for the rule of lenity to apply to many more statutes without really explaining what is ambiguous about them. In fact, a closer look at State v. Varela indicates that the statutes at issue in Montoya are not vague at all, and shows how the court could have reached the result it wanted without addressing the rule of lenity.

Montoya has the potential to change the course of double jeopardy jurisprudence in New Mexico. Although it may be construed narrowly and only apply to shooting at a motor vehicle and voluntary manslaughter, it is clear from the court's complete explanation of double description cases that it will apply broadly. Montoya makes a bold assault on multiple punishments, is sure to be persuasive in future cases, and will aid the court in narrowing double description as much as possible.
