

New Mexico Quarterly

Volume 13 | Issue 2

Article 18

1943

Sunday

Ann Louise Bowman

Follow this and additional works at: <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq>

Recommended Citation

Bowman, Ann Louise. "Sunday." New Mexico Quarterly 13, 2 (1943). <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq/vol13/iss2/18>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by the University of New Mexico Press at UNM Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in New Mexico Quarterly by an authorized editor of UNM Digital Repository. For more information, please contact disc@unm.edu.

FOUR POEMS

ALIEN

He saw the wind diffuse soft dust,
 Subduing color to its glintless beige;
 He watched the creek edge through the crust
 Of cracked gray earth which was its winter bed;
 He touched stalks brittle with the drouth,
 And, propped against an unkempt, barren tree,
 Savoured the hinting salt upon his mouth,
 Heard sea, spread thin on sand, reclaimed by sea.

SUNDAY

He gave no reasons for the hours he spent
 Alone but seated where his hand could reach
 To rest on mine. The message which I meant
 For him he gave to me; all words must slow
 That still, compassionate tongue our hands could speak—
 For though our minds held tumult, yet his touch
 Gave comfort which I had not dared to seek,
 And for the peace I took he gave me thanks.

TO A DISCHARGED SOLDIER

Come! The sunshine seeks you, calls you back.
 You neither won nor lost—the game goes on.
 Must you, possessor of the highest stakes,
 In shame yet say, "They were not fairly won,
 I took the prize before the play was out"?
 It is not so. You but reclaimed your own.

POEM

By fantasy half caught
 Our minds are slow
 To turn to staid thought.