

New Mexico Quarterly

Volume 18 | Issue 2

Article 12

1948

Delilah

Harold V. Witt

Follow this and additional works at: <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq>

Recommended Citation

Witt, Harold V.. "Delilah." New Mexico Quarterly 18, 2 (1948). <https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/nmq/vol18/iss2/12>

This Contents is brought to you for free and open access by the University of New Mexico Press at UNM Digital Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in New Mexico Quarterly by an authorized editor of UNM Digital Repository. For more information, please contact disc@unm.edu.

Is a cause too late to controvert.
 Like animals, or like the blind, my instincts seem more sensitized. The pavement

Mottled by the damp is mapped
 with islands of escape.
 The roads fade into cinder
 lots, abandoned sidings,

By-passed slums. No streets are here, no rumors, nor
 the traffic-lined opinions
 that the most pursue.

BYRON VAZAKAS

DELILAH

I'm wise as Freud in this, Delilah. Time
 I dreamed you fitted on a platform built of moonlath, I a Romeo had to climb that rickety starbeam stair, and all those gilt-edged teacups rattled . . . think I didn't know . . .
 you think the boy who didn't hold your coat
 and you called fool was so lamentably slow,
 O-mouthed, and comic-eyed he missed the boat?
 Yet I'm turned inside out with wondering
 and all my nerves snap on the frosty air;
 if I were bold and broad and thundering,
 laying my cards on tables everywhere —
 would all your love be focused by the shock,
 naked as neon, clear as any clock?

HAROLD V. WITT