ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It has been an honor to work with the authors featured in volume 57 of the Natural Resources Journal. Their rigorous scholarship will no doubt catalyze further discourse and inspire action. We thank them for contributing and entrusting us to publish their important work, and for their thoughtful engagement in the editorial process.

In turn, these acknowledgements would be incomplete without extending deep thanks to our friends and colleagues, the Journal's citation staff and editorial board. This volume is only possible due to editors' countless hours and board members' problem solving and attention to the smallest details, assuring the Journal continues to proudly publish scholarship of excellence. That is no small feat, given the breadth and depth of substantive material our authors contributed.

As this issue is the last of the current editorial board's tenure, we must acknowledge our truly dedicated faculty advisor, Cliff Villa. We benefitted enormously from his wisdom at critical junctures, which always left us comfortable in our own abilities to run the Journal.

Nota bene: this issue would not be in your hands—or on your screen—were it not for the dedicated work of our tireless managing editor, Richard Moore, who has kept our progress moving forward, despite any challenge or complication. The value of Richard's quality assurance in the editorial process cannot be overstated.

Lastly, many thanks to our readers, old and new. Your support is critical to the continuity of the Journal's nearly 60-year history of publishing its unique brand of policy-driven, interdisciplinary, international scholarship in the environmental and natural resources domain. The need for such scholarship has never been greater.
