

LEXICOGRAPHICAL NOTES

[These notes are based upon the collections of the British Medieval Latin Dictionary Committee and are designed to illustrate the entire process of collecting and classifying the material. Some quotations are incomplete, others difficult to interpret and classify, and the method of giving references has not been standardized. The quotations given by Du Cange have generally, but not always, been checked. The articles selected include three Latin and two non-Latin groups. The notes on the exact meaning of « virgate » are necessarily incomplete, as also are the illustrations of pre-Norman Conquest use. The division between pre- and post-Conquest periods has been retained, and in each case the earliest and latest dates recorded are given. An asterisk indicates continuous use between the dates given, and of such words no fresh examples are required.]

WORDS DOUBTFULLY CONNECTED WITH CORNU.

1. CORNEOLUS, ETC. Cicero uses the adj. corneolus = horny, of horn. It is doubtful whether the word corneolus = cornelian is really connected with cornu; it is more probably derived from cornum, the cornel-berry or cornel-cherry. See the N. E. D. The various forms for cornelian have been added below for the sake of completeness.

Cornelus 13c., 1584; cornola 1204; cornelinus 1245; cornelinus 1315.

2. CORNICULUS, a cornice, 1461.

The origin of the word cornice (corniche, etc.), is very obscure, and does not appear to be connected with cornu. See the N. E. D. Our file contains what is apparently the earliest recorded English example of this word. The form perhaps indicates a medieval attempt at etymology.

1461. Lib. Plusc., p. 282. cum turribus et portis et corniculis.

Equip and its derivatives.

According to the N. E. D., equip, etc., are derived from the French équiper, esquiper, which is probably an adaptation of the Old Norse skipa, to man (a vessel), to fit up, arrange (cp. skip, a ship). The French word, in the sense « to equip », is apparently not recorded before the sixteenth century; but the noun eskipeson, equipment, is found in Anglo-French in the fourteenth century. It is not easy to distinguish the derivatives of skipa from the various forms of ship (derived from the common Teutonic root scip), and I have therefore included the complete series, as given in our files.

Standard.

According to the N. E. D., although the verb (and noun) stand is of purely Teutonic origin, the word standard is derived from the Old French estandar, etc. The French word, which is said to have passed into all the living Teutonic languages, is believed to be derived from the Latin extendere, estendere. The origin of the use of standard = a standard of measure or weight is obscure. The forms in STAND are to be distinguished from those in STANT (e. g. stantivus), which are derived from the Latin sto.

Virga and its derivatives.

In Classical Latin, virga = a twig, rod, wand, staff. It is not used = a wand of office, but it is used of the small rods in the fasces of the lictors, hence = fasces, as a designation of one of the higher magistrates (Ovid, Martial). Classical derivatives are : virgatus = striped ; virgetum = thicket ; virgeus = of rods, twigs.

It should be noted that one of the difficulties connected with the preparation of our material is the problem of the exact meaning of the various weights and measures referred to. The same word is often found to refer to different measures, or to local variations. Even as regards the terms used in Domesday, scholars have not yet reached agreement, and the word 'virgate' has been explained as a quarter carucate or a quarter-acre, the 'carucate' and the 'acre' being also words of variable meaning (see also virgata).
