

SUGGESTIONS FOR A BRITISH-LATIN DICTIONARY

It seems unlikely that a comprehensive international dictionary of Later Latin, down to 1600 or 1700, will ever be produced. Even if the materials for it could be satisfactorily assembled and digested, a thorough treatment of such a varied vocabulary, reflecting so many different vernaculars and diverse social systems, might well result in a volume too cumbrous and unwieldy to justify the labour involved in its compilation. Ideally the interests of scholarship would probably be better served by a series of national or regional dictionaries on a scale adequate to do justice to the development of local institutions and ideas, coupled with a parallel series of international dictionaries on such specialized subjects as philosophy or medicine in which national frontiers counted for relatively little.

In the course of editing a revised edition of the Medieval Latin Word-List, the present writer has given some thought to the question how the available material might best be embodied in a regional dictionary of this sort relating to the British Isles (in a wide sense). As will be shown by the forthcoming edition of the Word-List, which is now approaching completion, the material is now far more abundant than when the first edition appeared in 1934. Though there are still some important lacunae to be filled, the stage has probably been reached at which preliminary work on a full-scale dictionary might profitably be begun. The time therefore seems opportune for considering the form that such a dictionary might eventually take, even though there is no immediate prospect of translating theory into practice. The following tentative suggestions have accordingly been put forward for the consideration and criticism of scholars who may be interested in this particular project or in similar ones relating to other regions. They represent the writer's personal conception of what is desirable and may well require considerable modification in the light of what proves to be technically or financially feasible.

Function.

The function of the dictionary should be conceived as three-fold :

- (i) To act as a readily intelligible guide, when used in conjunction with a standard Classical Latin and a standard English dictionary, to the meaning of any known Latin text within the limits prescribed.
- (ii) To provide a comprehensive picture of the resources and the evolution of the Latin language within these limits.
- (iii) To illustrate, so far as the material allows, the life and thought of the people who used this language.

General Scope.

The limits of date should not be too strictly defined. Early sources already covered by international dictionaries need not be treated exhaustively, but should be freely drawn upon to illustrate the history of words that remained in current use. While not much account need be taken of humanistic Latinity (subsequent to c. 1500), the continued development of legal and administrative Latin in the 16th and 17th Centuries should be illustrated, together with significant neologisms in the contemporary literature. The main emphasis, however, should be on the everyday writing of the 12th to 15th Centuries, when the main vehicle of literary expression and of administration throughout the region was a fairly stable form of Medieval Latin not yet seriously disturbed by humanistic influence.

The phrase «British and Irish sources» should not be interpreted so rigidly as to exclude, for instance, letters from foreign correspondents printed by Rymer; but words not normally used except with reference to Continental affairs should be clearly distinguished. Vernacular words incorporated without disguise in Latin documents should not be included in their own right, though passages containing them may sometimes be worth quoting as illustrations of form or meaning. In the treatment of marginal words or phrases with some title to rank as Classical or Patristic, a middle course should be steered between the all-inclusive policy adopted by Professor Blatt for the period before 1200 and the strictly glossarial approach of Professor Niermeyer, who excludes even such non-Classical developments as the Medieval treatment of prepositions. To illustrate fully the continuance of Classical usage as well as departures from it would demand an impossible amount of space. Phrases that merely echo earlier writers must therefore be excluded. But it is impossible to do full justice to the originality and adaptability of Medieval Latin without some examples of familiar words doing duty in novel settings, even if the novelty is sometimes hard to define. This, as soon becomes apparent on inspection of a mixed bag of slips, is a highly subjective matter on which different editors are no more likely to agree than different text-readers.

Word-forms and Spelling.

Words of purely Latin or Greek origin should be entered under their Classical form (poena, paenitet, ratio, rhythmus), even if this is not recorded in MSS of the period. Variants resulting from normal Medieval spelling (racio, ritmus) may be disregarded; other variants (ballivus and bailivus, feodum and feudum) should be noted at the beginning of the entry, and at least one reference (though not necessarily a quotation) should be given for each. A clear distinction should be drawn between forms in common use and those that are exceptional or dubious. Vowel quantities need not be noted except to make necessary distinctions (liber, l̄iber, infinitives in -ēre and -ēre) and to record significant abnormalities in quantitative verse. Forms that may be indistinguishable in oblique cases or in MS contractions, including such gender variants as feod/um, -us, -a, are best grouped together in one entry. It will probably be found convenient to follow the practice of Lewis and Short, as distinct from Forcellini, of grouping derivative adverbs under adjectives, participles under verbs, etc. It is probably more practical as well as more rational to enter verbs under the infinitive rather than the first person singular.

Etymology.

This should be dealt with very briefly, if necessary by reference to the OED or other standard work, except when the Medieval Latin forms may throw new light on the origin or relation of words.

Translation or Definition.

The first aim should be to discover the contemporary English or other vernacular equivalent of the Latin word (e. g. «interchangeably» for alternatim with reference to the apposition of seals). Definitions or explanations, when required, should be clear and unambiguous but not more precise than is warranted by contemporary evidence. Indications of a specialized meaning attached to a technical term, or of the value of a weight or measure, should be noted ; but it should not be implied that they are of general application.

In general, the various uses of words should be distinguished on the basis of the contexts (phrases, idioms, formulae) in which they actually occur, not of a priori analysis of the concepts they are believed to express.

While technical terms of the arts and sciences, scholastic philosophy, etc., should not be excluded, detailed explanations of these, supported by lengthy quotations, should be left to the specialized dictionaries envisaged above. On the other hand special care should be taken to ensure that words and phrases of distinctively national or local application are dealt with authoritatively, though rather by reference to the relevant literature than by lengthy dissertations.

Quotations and References.

If possible, at least two quotations should be given in illustration of each distinct usage. These should include the earliest recorded example, except for usages well attested in earlier Latin. Preference should be given to quotations that contain or imply a definition or are otherwise self-explanatory. Where many quotations are available, selection should be made with an eye to distribution in time and space and in different types of source as well as to shades of meaning determined by context. All quotations should be dated as precisely as possible ; but they need not always be arranged in strictly chronological order, as it will often be helpful to adopt an alphabetical order of phrases or to juxtapose passages that emphasize significant parallels or contrasts in usage. If there is reason to suppose that particular words or usages are of purely local currency, this should be clearly indicated.

In quotations the original (MS) spelling should be reproduced as far as practicable. In those derived from published texts, it will be less confusing to adopt a rough-and-ready principle of standardization than to reproduce the idiosyncrasies of the editors in such matters as the use of diphthongs, capitals, Arabic numerals, etc. Quotations should be cited not only from the best text available but from primary rather than secondary sources. Phrases used by derivative chroniclers should be traced back to their earliest appearance ; later repetitions can be disregarded unless they show some significant variation. Official documents quoted by chroniclers, etc., should be checked where possible against the original, though the fact of their appearance in a literary source may be of some interest. Quotation by modern scholars may also be worth noting, where this is accompanied by comment or elucidation. Calendars or other publications in which a passage is summarized or translated may be usefully referred to in order to establish the occurrence of a word ; but as illustrations of meaning and usage they can never be satisfactory.

The problem of indicating the sources of quotations clearly, briefly and consistently is a tricky one on which I do not propose to enlarge. Whatever general principles are adopted, it may sometimes be necessary to sacrifice them to practical convenience, in order to ensure that authors and texts are described under the names by which they are most widely known.

Some of these recommendations are doubtless truisms or counsels of perfection ; others may be considered controversial.

sial. In order to put them to the test of concrete demonstration, I have prepared sample entries relating to five words (two substantives, one adjective, one verb and one preposition); chosen for the particular complexity of the problems they present. The material for these samples is drawn from the slips accessible to me — i. e. those prepared for the British Committee from sources subsequent to 1066. Some scholars may see in them evidence that this material is not yet adequate to the task, that there are important omissions and that idiomatic usages of common words, in particular, have been illustrated from far too narrow a range of sources¹. It is hoped that those who hold this opinion will contribute to the repair of these deficiencies. Some, on the other hand, may question whether any useful purpose is served by illustrating the various uses of such an every-day word as facere, few of which are likely (as such) to occasion any difficulty to a reader. It may well be that in an actual dictionary this word would have to be content with a less generous allowance of quotations than I have assigned to it (about 100, chosen mainly from some 1,000 slips collected specifically for this word, but including a few culled from slips prepared for other words). But this is not a quarter of the allowance in Forcellini or Lewis and Short, not to speak of the space given to faire by Littré or to make by the OED. Though some of the phrases included in this sample (more, perhaps, than the editor is aware of) could be closely paralleled from Classical authors, they do collectively afford a glimpse of the Latin language struggling successfully with a wide range of new situations and ideas. This struggle is an historical fact that surely merits a much fuller treatment than it has yet received at the hands of the lexicographer, if only because (like Mount Everest) «it is there».

The examples quoted below are drawn mainly from sources noted in the Check List of British and Irish Writers printed in ALMA VII, and from miscellaneous publications mentioned in the Supplementary List (Ibid. pp. 107-114), together with other publications in the same or similar series and a few unpublished

1. Comparatively few texts have in fact been read with an eye to such usages.

MSS. The absence of a complete bibliography has made it desirable to indicate sources in a rather fuller form than would otherwise be necessary; but use has been made inter alia of the following abbreviations:

D. B. (Domesday Book), EHR (English Historical Review), LIEB. (LIEBERMANN, Gesetze der Angelsachsen), P. R. O. (Public Record Office), S. P. (State Papers), *Sel. 12 Used to form new compounds denoting approach (addigitare, adherbare, adjornare, admallare, etc.), addition (adhabere, adinjungere, etc.) or attachment (affeuatus, affilare, allottare, applegiare, attachiare, etc.).

Some compounds apparently result from amalgamation of juxtaposed words :

- 1406 Unum gounum de panno adauro (Exch. K. R. Acc. 406/10 ap. Archaeologia LXVII 174; cf. 9 above) ;
 1244 Ad advinculam S. Petri (Curia Regis R. 131, m. 21 d.; cf. 2 above).

*Some seeming compounds with ad- are due to false etymology or analogy : admannire (A. S. amanian), admirallus (Ar. amir), advantagium (ab ante), advēna (for avena), advunculus, coadservare (for coacervare).*
