

ADMINISTRATIVE “SELF-REGULATION” AND THE RULE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN CHINA

Shen Kui*

From a historical perspective, the formation and evolution of administrative law in many countries and regions have relied upon the important role and contribution of the judiciary. China is no exception in this respect. Over the past roughly thirty years, since the promulgation of the Administrative Litigation Law in 1989, Chinese courts have worked hard to secure the compliance of administrative actions with laws and regulations, and have acted as disguised lawmakers in fashioning new norms in regulating administrative agencies.

The development of administrative law in China has also been propelled by legislation. The National People’s Congress (NPC) and its Standing Committee have promulgated several laws regulating particular types of administrative action, such as administrative punishment, administrative licensing, and administrative compulsion, among others. Moreover, the NPC has passed many laws regulating specific areas of public administration, including but not limited to environmental protection, land administration, taxation, insurance, banking, and securities. In addition to making laws to regulate public administration, the legislature also monitors agencies’ statutory compliance through its “law enforcement inspection” power.¹

Presently, in China, however, the legislature and judiciary are inherently limited as external checking mechanisms. It is insufficient to rely on them alone to fully advance Chinese administrative law. Meanwhile, especially since the late 1990's, "self-regulation" or internal control within Chinese administration itself has come to play an important role which ought to be highlighted.² This paper will delineate such "administrative self-regulation" in China through the examples of rulemaking procedures, "filing and check" of normative documents, and criteria for the exercise of administrative discretion.³

Why would the Chinese administration be incentivized to pursue "self-regulation," given its dominant position in the political structure? This paper will argue that administrative self-regulation is driven by a variety of dynamics that include pressures for democratic legitimacy, as well as the demands of the bureaucratic structure.

However, the drivers for administrative self-regulation are limited in terms of their strength and effectiveness. Therefore, while self-regulation is an important phenomenon and cannot be ignored, the rule of administrative law in China cannot ultimately depend upon it. Without future political and judicial reforms enhancing the positions of the legislature and the judiciary in the public power structure, it is doubtful that administrative self-regulation can avoid administrative tyranny and truly ensure that administration is subordinate to the rule of law.

A. The Role of the Legislature

Since judicial review of administrative action was fully established in China by the promulgation of the Administrative Litigation Law in 1989,⁴ there have been a number of significant developments in the area of administrative law, including legislative enactment of laws on state compensation, administrative reconsideration, and administrative supervision,⁵ as well as laws on administrative penalties, administrative licensing, compulsory enforcement, and rulemaking.⁶ Many basic laws in specific areas of Actually, it was the Zhonghua Renmin Gongheguo Minshi Susong Fa (Shixing) (中华人民共和国民事诉讼法(试行)) [Civil Procedure Law (interim)] (promulgated by the Standing Comm. Nat'l People's Cong., Mar. 8, 1982, expired in 1991) that first introduced judicial review of administrative action in civil procedure. However, on the basis of that law alone, the justifiability of administrative action was not generally confirmed, but rather depended upon specific authorizations in particular statutes.

public administration, including environmental protection, land administration, tax collection, insurance, banking, and securities have also been promulgated.⁷ All of these law-makings have been produced by the NPC and its Standing Committee, and have established a general framework for regulating administrative agencies. Through these means, public administration has been constituted, limited, proceduralized, and made accountable.

Of course, most of this legislation (with the notable exception of the Administrative Litigation Law)⁸ was initially drafted by government departments or the Legislative Affairs Office of the State Council.⁹ Inevitably, many administrative priorities were ⁸The Administrative Litigation Law was initially drafted by the "Administrative Law Research Group," comprised mostly of legal scholars, which was delegated this task by the NPC Standing Committee's Legal Affairs Working Commission. Neysun A. Mahboubi, Participation and Accountability in Chinese Administrative Procedure (2015) (unpublished manuscript) (on file with author).

planted therein.¹⁰ Even so, these laws were examined by and issued in the name of the national legislature, and reflect legislative will, external to the administrative regime, as to the regulation of public administration. Over time, it has become increasingly common for agencies to solicit NPC opinions while preparing initial legislative drafts¹¹—or even for the NPC Standing Committee’s Legal Affairs Working Commission or the NPC Special Committees themselves to take over initial drafting.¹² Further, there have been a growing making (zhongda juece) by the government, undertaking administrative reconsideration procedures, and handling administrative litigation cases, among other responsibilities.

¹⁰ In China, this phenomenon is usually referenced as “departmentalist legislation” (bumen lifa). Infra note 18.

¹¹ As a scholar who is frequently called upon in this respect, I have personally witnessed the trend, in which it is increasingly common for agencies charged with preparing legislative drafts to invite experts from both the national and local people’s congresses, as well as experts from academia and practice, to participate in roundtable discussions on the contents of their drafts. One of the reasons for this may be that such ex ante dialogues are presumed to help the agency’s positions or priorities in the later legislative process.

¹² It is rare, in China, for the NPC’s subordinate institutions to make the initial draft of legislation. However, there are a few examples. See, e.g. Zhonghua Renmin Gongheguo Laodong Zhengyi Tiaojie Zhongcai Fa (中华人民共和国劳动争议调解仲裁法) [Labor Dispute Mediation and Arbitration Law] (promulgated by the Standing Comm. Nat’l People’s Cong., Dec., 29, 2007, effective May 1, 2008) was drafted by the NPC Standing Committee’s Legal Affairs Working Commission; Wang Wenzhen & Zhang Shicheng (王文珍&张世诚), Laodong Zhengyi Tiaojie Zhongcai Fa de Xintupo (《劳动争议调解仲裁法》的新突破) [New Breakthrough of the Labor Dispute Mediation and Arbitration Law], 56 ZHONGGUO LAODONG [CHINA LAB.] 6, 6–10 (2008); the amendment of Zhonghua Renmin Gongheguo Huanjing Baohufa (中华人民共和国环境保护法) [Environmental Protection Law] (promulgated by the Standing Comm. Nat’l People’s Cong., Dec. 26, 1989, effective Dec. 26, 1989, amended Apr. 24, 2014) was launched by Quanguo Renda Huanjing yu Ziyuan Baohu Weiyuanhui (全国人民代表大会环境与资源保护委员会) [NPC Environmental and Resources Protection Committee]; Ou Changmei (欧昌梅), Huanbaofa Ying Xieqingchu Zhengfu Zeren (环保法应写清楚政府责任) [Environmental Protection Law Should Stipulate Clearly the Government Responsibility], DONGFANG ZAobao [ORIENTAL MORNING POST] (Mar. 19, 2013), <http://money.163.com/13/0319/10/8QAQRO6G00253B0H.html> [<https://perma.cc/M3XX-329H>] (showing examples of NPC Standing Committee’s Legal Affairs Working Commission or the NPC Special Committees number of instances where the NPC has declined to approve proposed bills submitted by the State Council.

Despite this, the role of the NPC as a proponent for the rule of law in China is still quite limited. This is not only because of problems common to legislatures in many countries, but also because of certain deficiencies specific to China. Many legislatures grant administrative agencies quasi-legislative power, almost like a blank check with doctrines of non-delegation existing in name only.¹³ Administrative discretion is further compelled by out-of-date statutes, insofar as legislatures cannot foresee everything or make laws in time to deal with every new change. Moreover, the Chinese legislature has its own particular shortcomings. First, the relationship between NPC deputies and their constituents is so weak that it is difficult for the legislative process to adequately reflect public concerns about regulating administration.¹⁴ Second, many NPC deputies and Standing Committee members are not legal professionals, and thus their capacity to propose and scrutinize bills is quite limited.¹⁵ Third, national legislative sessions are too short, taking over initial drafting).

as there is insufficient time for proper deliberation on proposed bills.¹⁶ Finally, as noted above, many bills are initially drafted by administrative agencies, and even with the new trend noted above,¹⁷ departmentalism in the legislative process remains practically unavoidable.¹⁸

Thus, while the NPC and its Standing Committee have made great progress by setting up the basic framework of Chinese administrative law over the past two and a half decades, it is difficult for the national legislature to promptly meet rising public demands for better laws regulating the administration. For example, it took more than twenty-five years for the NPC to revise the Administrative Litigation Law (“ALL”) in November 2014, notwithstanding the many insufficiencies that became readily apparent and ever more acute as great economic and social changes took place. Legislative promulgation of a general Administrative Procedure Law (“APL”), long discussed by Chinese administrative law scholars, was listed in 2013 in the legislative plan of the Tenth

NPC Standing Committee as “a law which should be researched and drafted and, when ripe, submitted for discussion.”¹⁹ Yet in 2008 it was withdrawn from the legislative plan of the Eleventh NPC Standing Committee.²⁰ In 2013, the APL was listed in the legislative plan of the Twelfth NPC Standing Committee, but as a third-category law (i.e., conditions not ripe for legislative review and further researched required) as opposed to a first-category law (i.e., conditions ripe for submission and discussion in the term) or a second-category law (i.e., subject to drafting for submission when conditions ripen).²¹ The arduous process of lawmaking does not necessarily mean that the NPC is not competent to regulate administration agencies, but it does reflect the pre-dominance of the administrative agencies in the ruling of China.

B. Judicial Review

In the current administrative law framework, and in particular under the ALL, courts are limited to reviewing “administrative actions.”²² The standard of judicial review is legality in its narrowest sense—although in a few cases, courts do step a little further to examine the rationality of administrative actions.²³ Like courts in most other countries, Chinese courts are not inflexible automatons. In some administrative litigation cases, reviewing courts also have played the role of lawmakers, albeit in a somewhat disguised and very careful way.

For example, even though there is no “due process clause” in the PRC Constitution, Chinese courts have, in some cases, required administrative agencies to follow fundamental principles of due process even when they are not clearly provided in relevant laws and regulations. In one case, the appellate court stated:

In the process of house demolition, given the principle of due process, in order to protect the legal interest of the house owner and/or lessee, the assessment report of the house to be demolished shall be served to the house owner and/or lessee, for them to know in time the assessment result, bring out their objections, if any, and apply for reassessment without delay.²⁴

In another case, the reviewing court ruled as follows:

Even though the Law on Administrative Licensing does not specifically stipulate the procedure for annulling an administrative license, under Articles 5 and 7, the establishment and implementation of an administrative license shall abide by the principles of publicity, fairness and impartiality, and citizens, legal persons and other organizations are entitled to make statements and defend themselves while facing an agency implementing an administrative license. These provisions are the principles that shall be followed in the process of administrative licensing. The defendant here shall abide by the above mentioned provisions. However, the defendant did neither notify the plaintiff nor give it the chance of statements and defense, as violated the principle of publicity stipulated by the Law on Administrative Licensing and the defendant's right of statements and defense. Besides, the notification of annulment without giving reasons is inconsistent with the basic requirements of administrative procedure.²⁵

Nevertheless, Chinese courts usually tend to rely on positive laws and regulations as the sole measuring stick for determining the legality of administrative action.²⁶ Furthermore, the status of courts in the overall state power structure is relatively weak, mostly due to the lack of full independence. Altogether, it is very difficult for courts to be a major producer of administrative law or act as the major external check on public administration.²⁷ This is why academics and the public hope for the improvement of judicial review of agency action rests not on the prospect of courts becoming more active and dynamic, but rather on the greater judicial authority that might derive from the implementation of the new revision of the ALL and from generally progressive judicial reform.

II. Administrative Self-Regulation

Given the abovementioned limitations on the Chinese legislature and judiciary, as potential checks on administrative action, the notion of the administration itself developing Chinese administrative law should not be discounted. Indeed, administrative authorities have taken on this role ever since the policy of reform and opening-up was adopted in the late 1970s. Most recently, the landmark event symbolizing such “administrative self-regulation” was the issuance of the State Council’s Decision on Promoting Administration According to Law in 1999 (“1999 Decision”),²⁸ that was rooted in new language added to the Constitution the same year that identified the PRC as “a socialist country ruled by law.”²⁹ Since the 1999 Decision, the State Council has consecutively promulgated four related policy documents: the Outline on Comprehensively Promoting Administration According to Law in 2004 (the “2004 Outline”),³⁰ the State Council’s Decision on ³⁴ “Xingzheng fagui” refers to regulations formally enacted by the State Council.

Some key examples, further described below, include ex ante rulemaking procedures, post hoc review of promulgated rules, and the elaboration of criteria limiting the exercise of administrative discretion.

A. Rulemaking Procedures and Examination of Legality

The Law on Legislation incorporates administrative regulations (xingzheng fagui) (行政法规) and rules (guizhang) (规章)³⁵ into the category of law (fa) (法), and provides principles and frameworks concerning procedures for their formulation. Further and more detailed procedural norms are stipulated in the State Council's Ordinance on Procedures for the Formulation of Administrative Regulations³⁶ and its Ordinance on Procedures for the Formulation of Rules.³⁷ In addition to administrative regulations and rules, there are many so called "normative documents" (guifanxing wenjian) (规范性文件) produced by governments at various levels, from the central down to the most local. It is crucial to pay more attention to and better regulate these guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件) because many of them directly impact individual rights and duties. Absent a uniform administrative procedure law, it appears the administrative regime is attempting to “self-regulate” by delineating the procedures for formulation of such “normative documents.” The 2004 Outline stipulates several requirements, including:

- 1) The formulating agency shall hear wide-ranging public opinions in various ways while drafting guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件). The agency shall solicit opinions from society on final drafts of great significance, through multiple and alternative procedures such as formal hearing, discussion meeting, or publication.
- 2) The contents of the guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件) shall be concrete, clear, and flexible, as well as capable of resolving problems in practice.
- 3) The guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件), after being finalized, is to be published in the relevant government’s gazette, and on its official website, as well as in general circulation newspapers or journals.
- 4) The agency shall attempt to set up and develop a regularized review system, aimed at “cleaning up” (qingli) (清理) conflicting or out-of-date guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件).
- 5) The formulating agency and the enforcing agency are to regularly evaluate the enforcement of guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件), with the enforcing agency reporting its ongoing evaluation to the formulating agency.³⁸

Building on the 2004 Outline, the 2010 Opinions add these further requirements:

- 1) No guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件) is permitted to serve as the basis for an administrative license, administrative punishment or administrative compulsory

2) Guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件) which directly influence the rights and duties of a citizen, legal person or other organization must be publicized for public comment, reviewed for lawfulness by the relevant legislative affairs office, and discussed by the executive conference of the local government.

3) Local governments are to work towards unifying the registration, serial numbers, and publication of their (or their departments') guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件).³⁹

The prescriptions in the 2004 Outline and the 2010 Opinions do not have legally binding effects under orthodox administrative law doctrines, but they do have significant practical influence on subordinate administrative agencies. organization has the right to submit a proposal or request for such review to the NPC Standing Committee.⁴⁴ In the absence of Western-style separation of powers, in practice, this review mechanism has developed into, this paper would call, a model of “proposal + self-correction.”

The Sun Zhigang (孙志刚) case in 2003⁴⁵ and the Tang Fuzhen (唐福珍) case in 2009⁴⁶ are the best illustrations of this

⁴⁶ On November 13, 2009, a female entrepreneur named Tang Fuzhen set herself on fire to protest the forced demolition of her factory buildings, which were controversially determined to be illegal by the local government in Sichuan province. Her death, after sixteen days of hospital treatment, provoked extensive discussion in the media. See Chengdu Chaiqian Zifen Shijian Diaocha Tongbao (成都“拆迁自焚”事件调查通报) [The Investigation report on Chengdu “Self-burning during House Demolition” case], SICHUAN XINWENWANG (Dec. 3, 2009), <http://society.people.com.cn/GB/41158/10506824.html> [<https://perma.cc/HEZ2-EXPE>] (introducing the case background and government disposal of the case). On this basis, five law professors from Peking University Law School (including the author) submitted to the NPC Standing Committee a proposal for review of the constitutionality and legality of the State Council’s Regulation on Urban Housing Demolition (Chengshi Fangwu Chaiqian Guanli Tiaoli) (城市房屋拆迁管理条例). After more than a year, the State Council model. In both cases, legal academics (including this author) filed a request to the Legislative Affairs Committee of the NPC Standing Committee, hoping to activate the review procedure with respect to two problematic regulations. However, the review procedure was not formally initiated in either case by the NPC Standing Committee. Instead, largely opaque communications between the NPC and the State Council substituted for formal NPC review.⁴⁷ Ultimately, it was the State Council itself, rather than the NPC, that abolished the challenged measures: in the Sun Zhigang (孙志刚) case, through its Measures on Custody and Repatriation of Vagrants and Urban Beggars,⁴⁸ and in the Tang Fuzhen (唐福珍) case, through its Regulation on Urban Housing Demolition.⁴⁹

This model of administrative self-correction extends broadly. In 1987, the General Office of the State Council issued its Notice of Archival Filing of Rules by Local Governments and Departments of the State Council,⁵⁰ which expressly required that ministerial rules (bumen guizhang) (部门规章) and local government rules (difang guizhang) (地方规章) be submitted to the State Council for archival annulled this regulation and replaced it with a new, improved regulation on urban takings and compensation thereafter.

filing. In 1990, the State Council promulgated an administrative regulation for this system of “filing and check” (bei’an) (备案), the Provisions on the Filing of Regulations and Government Rules.⁵¹ Under this regulation, the Legislative Bureau of the State Council⁵² undertook the task of “filing and checking” regulations (fagui) (法规) and government rules (guizhang) (规章), examining the legality and consistency of this administrative work-product. Some ten years later, the passage of the Law on Legislation in 2001 also propelled the State Council to issue a new Ordinance on the Filing of Regulations and Government Rules,⁵³ which abolished the earlier regulation but retained the system of “filing and check.” The new ordinance follows the Law on Legislation by also permitting individuals to request such agency review.⁵⁴

The 2004 Outline expands the “filing and check” mechanism to all guifanxing wenjian (规范性文件) issued by administrative agencies.⁵⁵ The 2010 Opinions further stipulates in detail:

A request for examination by a citizen, legal person or other organization shall be handled strictly according to relevant provisions. Illegal government rules and normative documents shall be reported without delay to the authoritative organ for revocation, and the results of the examination shall be publicized. Also, the filing

C. Criteria for Exercise of Administrative Discretion

In any modern administrative state, it is unavoidable that legislators will delegate broad discretion to administrative agencies. However, the exercise of such discretion by administrators can result in substantial unfairness. In order to try to regularize the exercise of administrative discretion, the 2008 Decision provides:

It is necessary to earnestly induce administrative agencies to comb through provisions that stipulate discretion concerning administrative punishments and administrative licensing, and to detail their administrative discretion in terms of the practical development of the local economy and society, to ⁵⁶ Article 10 of the 2010 Opinions cited supra note 32 (detailing the requirements on government to deal with citizen or organizational request).

⁵⁷ See, e.g., Shuilibu Guifanxing Wenjian Shencha Yu Bei'an Guanli Banfa (水利部规范性文件审查与备案管理办法) [Administrative Measures of the Ministry of Water Resources on the Examination and Filing of Normative Documents] (promulgated and effective Aug. 3, 2005); Jiaotong Guifanxing Wenjian Bei'an Shencha Zhidu (交通规范性文件备案审查制度) [System of the Filing and Examination of Normative Documents of Communication Administration] (promulgated Sep. 25, 1996, effective Oct. 1, 1996); Nengyuanbu Guizhang, Guifanxing Wenjian Bei'an Banfa (能源部规章规范性文件备案办法) [Measures of the Ministry of Energy on the Filing of Regulations and Normative Documents] (promulgated and effective Oct. 5, 1990) (all listing the “filing and check” rules on normative documents).

quantify discretion that is capable of quantification, and to publicize and implement such detailed and quantified standards for the exercise of administrative discretion.⁵⁹

This provision does not expressly reference the concept of “criteria for administrative discretion” (xingzheng cailiang jizhun) (行政裁量基准), but instead uses the concept of “standard for administrative discretion” (xingzheng cailiang biao zhun) (行政裁量标准). Yet, both academics and practitioners soon began to use the terminology of “criteria,”⁶⁰ and the 2010 Opinions hence adopted that common usage:

They shall establish basic criteria for administrative discretion, scientifically and reasonably detail and quantify administrative discretion, improve the rules for application, strictly standardize the exercise of administrative discretion, and avoid arbitrary law enforcement.⁶¹

Local governments have initially focused on discretionary criteria for the exercise of administrative punishment, and these form the main bulk of existing “criteria for administrative discretion” thus far. Examples include rules promulgated by the Construction Commission of Hangzhou City in 2010, by the Housing and Urban-Rural Development Department of Zhejiang Province in 2010, by the Education Bureau of Changsha City in 2010, and by the Bureau of Supervision and Administration of Work Safety of Jiangsu Province in 2009.⁶²

Discretionary criteria are, on one hand, useful for controlling the exercise of broad administrative discretion within the scope of rationality. On the other hand, they may be so detailed and concrete that they “ossify” the exercise of discretion.⁶³ However, given the breadth of discretion that is granted to administrative agencies in China, and the serious abuses that have resulted, the advantages of administratively developed “criteria for discretion”—binding not through legal obligation but on the basis of bureaucratic hierarchy—outweigh the disadvantages.

⁶³ See Yu Lingyun, supra note 60 (discussing the discretionary criteria for administrative discretion in Jinhua).

The areas or issues covered by “administrative self-regulation” are certainly not limited just to the above-mentioned examples of ex ante rule-making procedures, post hoc review of promulgated rules, and criteria for the exercise of administrative discretion. Chinese administration is also working to realize “the rule of rules” by creating a large body of rules on aspects of major decision-making procedures, disclosure of government information, and administrative accountability, among other topics.⁶⁴

The term “major decision-making” (zhongda juece) first appeared in the State Council’s 2004 Outline, and subsequently was included in the 2008 Decision and the 2010 Opinions. Pursuant to these documents, by July 2014, the departments of the State Council and governments at or above the county level issued at least 2,226 rules or documents stipulating major decision-making procedures, at different levels of detail.⁶⁵ Although the precise definition of “major decision-making” is still not sufficiently clear and unified, this national and local normative elaboration has actually, to some extent, regularized the procedures for administrative decisions which may have significant, large-scale impact. However, this term has not yet appeared in any statute promulgated by the NPC and its Standing Committee.

Neither has the disclosure of government information ever been made a legal requirement by the NPC and its Standing Committee. Since the enactment of the State Council’s Regulation on Open Government Information (“OGI Regulation”) in 2007, the General Office of the State Council has issued nine documents, departments of the State Council have issued 293 documents, and governments at or above the county level have issued 2,205 documents, altogether meant to promote government openness by providing more detailed interpretations, guidance, and procedural requirements, as well as by publicizing relevant work reports.⁶⁶ Although many of these additional rules elaborating the disclosure of government information are essentially very similar to the OGI Regulation, the sum total really does help to push forward gradual and incremental changes.

⁶⁴ “The rule of rules” is actually an extension of “the rule of law,” premised on the fact that public matters are mostly regulated under agency rules rather than law enacted by the NPC. See Xixin Wang, Rule of Rules: An Inquiry into Administrative Rules in China’s Rule of Law Context, in THE RULE OF LAW: PERSPECTIVES FROM THE PACIFIC RIM, 71-89 (The Mansfield Center for Pacific Affairs, 2000) (explaining “the rule of rules”).

Lastly, a new approach to top-down accountability was set in motion by the eruption of SARS in 2003, which caused 349 death all over the country, and eventually led to the dismissals of many government officials, the highest being the Minister of Health, Zhang Wenkang, and the mayor of Beijing, Meng Xuenong.⁶⁷ Many provincial governors were shocked by these dismissals, and for a time adjusted their focus from enhancing GDP to handling SARS.⁶⁸ The so-called “accountability storm” from this period is widely accepted as the basis for strengthening top-down accountability more systematically. Since that time, the CCP Central Committee and the State Council have separately or jointly issued a series of rules designed to heighten accountability for Party and government leaders at different levels. The most significant and regularized mechanisms are provided in the Interim Provisions on Accountability for Party and Government Leaders (Guanyu Shixing Dangzheng Lingdao Ganbu Wenzhe de Zanxing Guiding) that was issued by the General Offices of the CCP Central Committee and the State Council in 2009. Subsequently, there have been at least twenty-two implementing rules issued by local party offices and governments.⁶⁹ This top-down internal instrument is to make the administrative leaders at different levels accountable for important decisions and serious incidents or accidents which arouse wide concern. The fact that it is mostly not based on democracy but rather on bureaucracy may discount the expected effect of this kind of accountability to improve the competence as well as the reliance of public administration. However, it really places more burden than before on the shoulders of the administrative leaders to be responsive to the public needs or concerns.

III. Dynamics

The insufficiency of external regulation is, of course, one of the reasons for the rise of “administrative self-regulation.” The key question is why the administrative regime has the motivation to consider self-constraint notwithstanding the loopholes of external regulation, rather than “gallop in the broad land” granted by the legislators? Also, to what extent is administrative self-regulation, as a driver for the advancement of the rule of administrative law, worthy of belief and reliance? Arguably, it is the following dynamics that are in favor of such administrative self-regulation.

A. Demand for Rational-Legal Authority

It appears that the “New China”—from the leadership of Mao Zedong, to Deng Xiaoping, Jiang Zemin, Hu Jintao and now Xi Jinping—has experienced the progressive decline of Weberian charismatic authority.⁷⁰ In the process of leading China to transform from an agricultural society to an industrial society, and overseeing migration from rural areas to cities, it has proven impossible for Chinese rulers, facing the continuing task of modernization, to withdraw to traditional forms of authority.⁷¹ Rational-legal authority seems to be the sole option for China's rulers, provided the aims remain fixed to economic growth, political stability, social justice, and long-term acceptance by the Chinese people. Basically, this has become the consensus of China's leadership since Deng Xiaoping's tenure. In December of 1978, Deng Xiaoping said:

It is necessary to strengthen the legal system in order to guarantee the people's democracy. It is necessary to institutionalize democracy and concretize it into laws. The institutions and laws thus created are not to be changed just due to the change of leaders, are not to be changed just due to the change of viewpoints and attention of leaders.⁷²

Ye Jianying, another very important and influential leader during the time of Deng Xiaoping, also declared that a country must be ruled by laws and institutions that have stability, continuity, and foremost authority; he said it is only through legal procedures that laws and institutions are to be revised—they should not be changed due to the change in will of any particular leader.⁷³ Since the end of the Cultural Revolution, the demand for rational-legal authority has been continuing and even increasing.⁷⁴ Given that background, and where the legislature or judiciary lacks capacity to control the administration, there is reason for the administrative regime itself to pursue a type of “self-regulation,” aiming thereby to realize an “administration by rules.” The mostly hierarchical administration would operate more on the rules rather than on the arbitrary and unaccountable wills of the leaders, which are deemed as one of the evil sources of huge disorders such as the Cultural Revolution.

B. Soil for Ideologies of Democracy and the Rule of Law

China currently remains in transition from an agricultural society to a more urban one. In 2010, the population of rural areas remains 720 million. (This number does not include the approximately 170–180 million people who are still classified as farmers in terms of the residence registration (hukou) system, but who have left the countryside and lived for more than six months in cities or towns).⁷⁵ The transition in question is and will be from a situation of rural areas suffering negative effects from cities to the unified development of urban-rural areas; from a society based on acquaintances (shuren shehui)⁷⁶ to a society of strangers; and from fragmented and diverse rural lifestyles to a relatively uniform urban lifestyle. Amidst this transition, there is ever greater economic and social “soil” for the ideologies of democracy and the rule of law to take root.

Indeed, democracy and the rule of law have been recognized by the Chinese leadership as among the ruling ideologies. This is illustrated by the addition of this sentence: “[t]he People's Republic of China governs the country according to law and makes it a socialist country under rule of law” into the PRC Constitution in 1999,⁷⁷ and also by the State Council’s subsequent issuance of the 1999 Decision, the 2004 Outline and the 2010 Opinions. With further change in economic and social conditions, there certainly will be a greater number of people supportive of these ideologies and aware of the significance of democracy and the rule of law for the protection of their rights and interests.⁷⁸ Facing such growing demands from the public, the administrative regime may be compelled to adopt more self-regulation in response.

C. Pressure of Democratic Legitimacy

Like many other countries, the legitimacy of public administration in China is also proclaimed to be founded on the basis of democracy. In principle, the State Council is the executive arm of the NPC and its Standing Committee, while the local governments at various levels are the executive arms of the local congresses and their standing committees.⁷⁹ However, the problem of a “loose transmission-belt”⁸⁰ typical in Western countries is even more serious in China, because of which the public administration

⁷⁸ For example, a questionnaire survey demonstrates that, compared with the low-income people, the higher-income people are more concerned with the constitutional protection of private property. Almost 99% of the surveyed private sector owners hold with the opinion that the legitimate private property should get equal protection with the public property, and 81.3% of the people who show indifference to the constitutional article on the private property protection are at the low-income level. seems to lack a solid foundation of its legitimacy.⁸¹ Furthermore, representative democracy, although having undergone large changes in the past thirty years, still remains weak and subordinate to the dominance of the administration. The administrative regime has a very powerful and influential position in the structure of government.

However, at the same time, the administrative regime is also increasingly propelled by public opinion and forced to be more directly accountable to the people, while ideologies of democracy and the rule of law are slowly but irreversibly expanding.⁸² The growth of internet technology can help to shape public opinion

⁸¹ For example, most of the tax legislation in the past was not enacted by the National People's Congress, but by the State Council. Recently it has incurred more and more criticism from some deputies of the NPC as well as many scholars. Hence the Law on Legislation was amended in 2015 by stating that "the establishment of any category of tax, determination of tax rates, tax collection administration, and other basic taxation rules" are the matters that shall only be governed by law except for the cases where laws have not yet been developed on the matters and the NPC or its Standing Committee delegate the legislating power to the State Council. Zhonghua Renmin Gongheguo Lifa Fa (2015 Xiuzheng) (中华人民共和国立法法(2015修正)) [The Law on Legislation of the People's Republic of China (2015 Amendment)] (promulgated by the Nat'l People's Cong., Mar. 15, 2000, effective Jul. 1, 2000, amended Mar. 15, 2015), art. 8(6). Furthermore, Ms. Fu Ying, the spokeswoman of the third plenary of the 12 NPC in 2015, released that it will be no later than the year of 2020 that the establishment of any new tax shall only be vested in the NPC or its Standing Committee. ⁸² The development of an administrative accountability system since 2003, notwithstanding its limitations, is generally regarded as an attempt to realize some form of democracy in the current political context of China. See, e.g., Lin Congjian & Zhou Yayue, Woguo Wanshan Xingzheng Wenzhe Zhizhi Lujing Fenxi (我国完善行政问责制止路径分析) [Analysis of the Path to Improve the Administrative Accountability in China], 3 NINGBO DAXUE XUEBAO (RENWEN KEXUE BAN) [J. extremely rapidly, and voices criticizing the administration for breach of democracy or the rule of law can immediately pose huge pressures on both lower-level and superior officials.⁸³ Both potential and actual pressure from the public has been forcing the administrative regime, particularly the State Council at the very top, to seek to bind administrators (both leaders and lower-level personnel) by self-regulation in order to decrease or eliminate their misconduct, corruption or other abuses of power, and further to strengthen the democratic legitimacy of the administrative regime.

D. Structure of Bureaucracy

Another important factor driving administrative self-regulation is the bureaucratic structure of the administrative regime. One of the defining characteristics of such a hierarchical structure is that the superior commands the subordinate.⁸⁴ And yet, in practice, the leadership at various levels of the government in China fear the severe public criticism that might arise from serious problems or scandals.⁸⁵ Given this concern, administrative self-regulation has a two-fold function: (i) to restrict arbitrariness by administrative subordinates, and (ii) to share with or transfer accountability to these subordinates. Besides, the engineering of advancing the administration by law, which is mostly initiated by the State

⁸⁵ Such fear is reflected by the development of administrative accountability at the urging of the central government. See Guanyu Shixing Dangzheng Lingdao Ganbu Wenzhe de Zanxing Guiding (关于实行党政领导干部问责的暂行规定) [Interim Provisions on the Implementation of the Accountability System for the Leaders of the Party and Government] (issued by the Gen. Office of the Cent. Comm. of the Chinese Communist Party and the Gen. Office of the St. Council, Jun. 30, 2009, effective Jun. 30, 2009), art. 5 (2009):

- Under any of the following circumstances, a leader of the Party and government shall be held accountable:
1. He/she makes serious faulty decisions, which leads to severe losses or adverse effects;
 2. He/she neglects his/her duties, which leads to the occurrence of an extremely serious accident, incident, or case, or successive occurrences of serious accidents, incidents, or cases in the region, department, system or entity where he/she worked during a relatively short period, causing severe losses or adverse effects;
 3. A functional department of a government has a poor administration and supervision, which leads to the occurrence of an extremely serious accident, incident, or case, or successive occurrences of serious accidents, incidents, or cases within the scope of its duties during a relatively short period, causing severe losses or adverse effects;
 4. He/she abuses power in administrative activities, forces or instructs others to conduct illegal administrative activities or has a nonfeasance, which causes a mass incident or other serious incidents;
 5. He/she improperly handles a mass or emergent incident, which worsens the situation and causes adverse effects;
 6. He/she violates the relevant provisions on selecting and appointing cadres, which leads to the evaluation failure or faulty use of personnel, causing adverse effects; or
 7. He/she conducts other neglect of duties, causing severe losses of national interests, human life and property, and public property, or causing adverse effects, etc.

Council, could be used by administrative superiors to better control their subordinates.

IV. Conclusion

Due to the above dynamics, administrative self-regulation seems to be playing a positive role in advancing the rule of administrative law in China. However, it is only one of the forces that might push forward the process, and it has its own inherent and formidable limitations. Indeed, the dynamics of administrative self-regulation are limited in terms of both steadiness and effectiveness.

First, the State Council, the most important driver of administrative self-regulation, does not have sufficient time and resources to supervise the practical performance of self-regulation by the innumerable subordinate administrative agencies across the country. Likewise, the “transmission belts” between the State Council, provincial governments, municipal governments, county governments and the town governments are loose. It is still unclear whether the self-regulation provisions promulgated by local governments and their departments will nominally cater to the demands of superiors, or will actually be carried out and put into effect.

Second, the pressure of public opinion that to some extent drives and supervises administrative self-regulation is mostly formed and represented through the media. The space in which the media has to operate may be limited, and some illegal actions or decisions by the central or local governments may not be allowed to receive full reports and disclosure. Separately, news reports may rapidly give rise to certain public opinion, but also may just as rapidly transfer attention to other subjects or topics, making it difficult to keep continuous pressure on the governments or their departments. The pressure of public opinion is limited if it is very hard to transform it into systematic, steady and effective checks and balances by legislative or judicial bodies. Hence, the contribution of administrative self-regulation to the rule of administrative law in China must be observed, analyzed and recognized systematically and carefully. Expectations might be placed on administrative self-regulation for its contribution to the rule of administrative law in China; however, it is highly unlikely that the rule of administrative law can be achieved solely through administrative self-regulation. External regulation and its effectiveness are not only indispensable, but more important. Otherwise, the final results of one-sided development of administrative self-regulation would be ubiquitous glass ceilings.
