DEAN'S MESSAGE

This is the first issue of In Brief published during my deanship, and I am honored and excited to be writing this message to you as Dean of the Case Western Reserve University School of Law. Although it is now six months into my deanship, a day still does not go by when I do not find myself marveling at my good fortune to be named Dean of this great school. I came to Case Western Reserve University last July after more than twenty years on the law faculty at Cornell University, including seven as an associate dean. It was not easy to leave Cornell after so many good years, but the Deanship here was an opportunity that I simply could not pass up.

As a dean candidate and then as the Dean, I have been impressed by so many aspects of the school. Probably first and foremost, the faculty is simply world-class, with outstanding teachers and nationally and internationally renowned scholars who are doing influential and creative work in numerous fields. In addition, the students are a very bright and diverse group, chosen from a sizable and highly competitive applicant pool. Seventy percent of this year's first-vear class of 228 students comes from outside Ohio—39 other states and 5 foreign countries.

have been amazed at the activity generated by the school's centers of excellence. With their various conferences, speakers, and visiting scholars, the centers are truly hotbeds of activity. The law school's curriculum is also something that a newcomer cannot help but notice. It offers a degree of breadth, depth, and innovation that make it the envy of virtually any school. The more I learn about the CaseArc skills training program, now in its fourth year, the more I admire the school's initiative in creating it. I believe that it is not only distinctive, but actually unique in making skills training a required four-semester sequence.

Since starting here in July, much of my time has been spent meeting people—law school faculty, students, alumni, and staff, the university's central administration, the deans of other colleges, and more. In my view, consensus-building lies at the heart of successful deaning, and the meetings have put me in a much better position to build consensus for new initiatives. One initiative, still in the planning and discussion stage, contemplates the creation of a new center of excellence. A proud part of this law school's legacy is the welcoming atmosphere that it provided for the relatively sizable number of African Americans who attended the law school in the years before desegregation. Many of those African American graduates went on to illustrious careers, including Fred Gray '54, the legendary civil rights attorney whose past clients include Rosa Parks and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. While looking back to honor these graduates and commemorate this law school's historic commitment to racial equality, the proposed center also would look ahead to promoting social justice for the various groups that experience discriminatory treatment today. It would do this in a variety of ways, including expanding curricular coverage, mounting conferences and speaker programs, sponsoring student scholarships, supporting financially the law school's loan repayment assistance program, funding summer internships, and facilitating students' participation in pro bono activities and secondary school "pipeline" projects in the Cleveland area.

In my meetings with alumni in Cleveland and elsewhere, I have been struck time and again by the wonderful attitud that so many of you have toward the school. Without a strong base of alumni support, financial and otherwise, no law school can hope to achieve or maintain excellence. A prime source of my optimism and excitement about the future of the Case Western Reserve University School of Law is its graduates' enormous amount of good will and genuine affection for the school. I can promise you that I will do my very best to ensure that the law school lives up to your highest hopes.

Best wishes

Gary I. Simson

World Court Judge Thomas Buergenthal, a Holocaust Survivor, Honored with Cox Center's Humanitarian Award

On October 17, 2006, Judge Thomas Buergenthal visited the law school to deliver the annual Frederick K. Cox International Law Center Lecture in Global Legal Reform. Judge Buergenthal is the American judge on the 15-member International Court of Justice, also known as the World Court, which has its seat in The Hague, Netherlands. The topic of his talk was "Truth Commissions: Between Impunity and Prosecution." Judge Buergenthal explored the comparative advantages of truth commissions versus criminal prosecutions in responding to human rights crimes and atrocities. He also considered how both systems can facilitate national reconciliation and the creation of a historic record that is accepted by the population.

Dean Gary Simson, who was Judge Buergenthal's junior colleague in the late 1970s at the University of Texas School of Law, introduced him at the lecture and recalled his generosity in mentoring junior faculty. Dean Simson praised him as the model of what a judge should be—someone not only of great intellect but also of great integrity and humanity.

Judge Buergenthal is a survivor of the Holocaust and an expert on human rights crimes. He was first elected to the World Court in 2000 and was reelected in 2005. He previously served as the chairman of the El Salvador Truth Commission and president of the Inter-American Court for Human Rights.

At the time of his election to the World Court, Judge Buergenthal was the Lobingier Professor of Comparative Law and Jurisprudence at the George Washington University Law School and presiding director of its International Rule of Law Center. Before that, he had served as dean of the law school at American University. He is the author of several books and numerous articles in scholarly journals. Judge Buergenthal is the honorary president of the American Society of International Law and serves on the editorial board of the American Journal of International Law.

During Judge Buergenthal's visit, Professor Michael Scharf, director of the Cox Center, presented him with this year's Frederick K. Cox International Law Center International Humanitarian Award for Advancing Global Justice.

Dean Appoints Three Associate Deans

Sharona Hoffman, professor of law and bioethics at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, and co-director of the Law-Medicine Center, was named associate dean for academic affairs at the school, effective July 1, 2006, by incoming Dean Gary Simson—his first appointment as dean of the law school. On January 15, 2007, she became senior associate dean for academic affairs when she was joined by Jonathan Entin, professor of law, as he assumed the position of associate dean for academic affairs.

Having come from a school where there had been two academic associate deans in recent years, Dean Simson believes our law school will be better served with two as well. In the past, there has only been one associate dean for academic affairs at Case Western Reserve University School of Law. Dean Simson appointed Melvyn Durchslag, professor of law, to serve as interim associate dean for the 2006-2007 academic year while Dean Hoffman is on sabbatic leave. Deans Durchslag and Entin will be sharing the position's responsibilities through this spring until Dean Hoffman returns.

On January 1, 2007, Sarah McFarlane Polly, previously assistant dean for career services became associate dean for student and career services. As her new title suggests, Dean

Polly will continue to be the senior administrator in charge of career services, and she also will replace Barbara Andelman as the senior administrator in charge of student services.

Andelman, associate dean for student services, enrollment planning, and special projects, left the law school to pursue other career goals in December 2006, after 18 years of distinguished service to the law school. Dean Polly has been with the Career Services Office since 2000. Prior to her arrival at the law school, she was an

Maya Angelou Delivers Inaugural Lecture

Case Western Reserve University School of Law welcomed Dr. Maya Angelou as the inaugural speaker for the newly established "CISCDR Maya Angelou Distinguished Interdisciplinary Lecture" on Thursday, November 9, 2006. Dr. Angelou, the first Reynolds Professor at Wake Forest University, internationally lauded author, educator, civil-rights voice, and U.S. Poet Laureate, spoke—and sang—to a packed and lively audience at Amasa Stone Chapel on campus.

CISCDR (the Center for the Interdisciplinary Study of Conflict and Dispute Resolution) grows out of interdisciplinary study conducted for the past five years by center director Professor Calvin Sharpe on the nature, causes and solutions to conflict in human social interactions. Launched in April 2005, CISCDR offers three lectures each year: the CISCDR Distinguished Scholar-in-Residence Lecture, the CISCDR Distinguished Visitor Lecture, and the CISCDR Maya Angelou Distinguished Interdisciplinary Lecture.

Look for a special feature on Dr. Angelou's lecture in the next issue of In Brief.

attorney with Southeastern Ohio Legal Services for three years, and a staff attorney with Jones Day in Cleveland for one year.

New Dean of Finance and Administration

Crystal Taylor joined the university in October of 2003 as director of administrative services for university relations. Earlier this fall, she came to the law school to become assistant dean for finance and administration. Prior to joining the university, Dean Taylor held positions in both human resources and finance with General Electric, Capital One and Corporate Express. She holds a B.S. in Business Administration from the University of Maine and an M.B.A. from Indiana University.

Director of Operations, Donor and Alumni Relations

Anne-Marie Connors was named director of operations, donor and alumni relations in the fall of 2006. She began her career at the law school in 1998 as director of admissions. Previously, she was the assistant director of undergraduate admissions at John Carroll University. In 2001, Ms. Connors joined the development department, and most recently, she was primarily focused on fundraising as director of regional development and special gifts.

With the continuing growth of worldwide trade and the proliferation of the Internet, the concept of intellectual property has become an issue of vital concern in many fields and disciplines. Once largely the realm of lawyers and legal scholars, it is now important in areas such as art, literature, music, science and technology. However, the growing study of intellectual property has not been followed by dialogue across disciplines about issues of common concern.

Approximately one hundred scholars from North America, Europe and Australia gathered at Case Western Reserve University School of Law late last spring to foster that dialogue. The working conference, "Con/texts of Invention," was convened by the Society for Critical Exchange, a national organization devoted to collaborative interdisciplinary scholarship in theory. Co-sponsors included Case Western Reserve University's Center for Law, Technology, and the Arts, and the Department of English; Harvard University's History of Science Department; the Washington College of Law at American University; and the Morris Fishbein Center for the History of Science and Medicine at the University of Chicago.

The conference continued the line of inquiry begun at a groundbreaking conference, "Authorship and Intellectual Property," which the law school hosted in 1991.

Among the general topics addressed this time were "Personhood, The Body and Intellectual Property," "Open Source, Free Software, Creative Commons," "What Is an Author Now," "Interrogating Key Concepts," and "Networks of Invention." The event also included a trip to Milan, Ohio, the birthplace of Thomas Alva Edison and of Isaac W. Hoover, creator of the Potato Digger and other potato-related innovations.

Two Fulbright Scholars Join Attorneys from 17 Countries in LL.M. Program

The U.S. and Global Legal Studies Program welcomed fifty-three foreign attorneys this year, each of whom will spend a year at Case Western Reserve University School of Law earning an LL.M. degree in U.S. and Global Legal Studies. Two Fulbright Scholars from India are among them: Mr. Anand Bhusan and Ms. Harini Narayanswamy.

The LL.M. students hail from all corners of the world and represent seventeen countries this year—the largest number are Thai (fifteen), followed by nine Chinese nationals. Since 1992 when the program was initiated, over 400 attorneys from more than sixty countries have participated. New countries represented in this year's class are Bulgaria, Tunisia and Uganda. The other countries are: Armenia, Cameroon, China, France, India, Japan, Korea, Nigeria, Peru, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Taiwan, Thailand, and United Arab Emirates.

U.N. War Crimes Commission Archives Donated to School of Law

A special ceremony launched "Lessons from the Saddam Trial"—the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center's War Crimes Research Symposium—on October 6, 2006 at the School of Law. The purpose of the ceremony was to dedicate the Archives of the U.N. Commission of Experts on War Crimes in the Former Yugoslavia, which were donated to the law school by the chairman of the Commission, DePaul law professor Cherif Bassiouni. The Archives include more than forty volumes of original documents, notes and photographs that have never before been available to the public, as well as artifacts of the Commission's "War Room," including maps showing the locations of detention centers and mass grave sites.

Under Bassiouni's leadership, the Commission was the first U.N. body to document the genocidal campaign of ethnic cleansing in Bosnia. It also was the first to call for the prosecution of perpetrators before an international court, leading to the creation of the first international war crimes tribunal since World War II and ushering in a new era of accountability for atrocities.

The brief "An Occasional Paper of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center" describes the historic importance of Bassiouni's

The Roe Green Foundation Establishes Global Security Conference

In the spring of 2007, Case Western Reserve University School of Law will present the first of three annual conferences on issues concerning global security law and policy. A gift by the Roe Green Foundation of $25,000 per year for three years will provide support to offer this conference in partnership with the law school's Institute for Global Security Law and Policy and its director, Professor Amos N. Guiora '85.

The first Roe Green Foundation Conference—"Sacred Violence: Religion and Terrorism"—will take place on March 30, 2007, and feature a keynote address by renowned expert on terrorism Bruce Hoffman, corporate chair in counterterrorism and counterinsurgency at the RAND Corporation, and director of RAND's Washington, D.C. office. The daylong event will be free and open to the public, and CLE credit will be available. Papers and proceedings from the event will be published by the Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law

March 30, 2007

Next year, the conference will address America's response to disaster. The third year's topic will be determined in 2007 and will be based on current issues in the area of terrorism.

The Roe Green Foundation Conference Presented by the Institute for Global Security Law and Policy "Sacred: Religion and Terrorism"

In recent years the relationship between religion and suicide terrorism has been questioned by scholars and others who claim that entirely secular motivations (such as resistance to occupation) lie beyond this increasingly prevalent phenomenon. This presentation will examine the role that theological justification plays both in motivating individual suicide terrorists and in sustaining an organization's use of this tactic by providing it with a deep pool of recruits from which to draw upon. It will first explore and explain the rise of suicide terrorism world-wide since 9/11 and then assess religion's role as a key element in this process.

Briefing by Law Professor and Student to the Congressional Human Rights Caucus to Be Included in Congressional Record

On September 28, 2006, Professor William Carter and Lydia Bakaki, a current LL.M. student from Uganda, gave a briefing at the Rayburn House Office Building in Washington, D.C. to the Congressional Human Rights Caucus. It dealt with the international human rights standards governing women's human rights, property rights, and socioeconomic status in sub-Saharan Africa. The Caucus is co-chaired by Senators Brownback and Harkin and Representatives Lantos and Wolf. The briefing was chaired by Congressman Kucinich, and at his request, a written summary of Professor Carter's and Ms. Bakaki's remarks will be prepared for inclusion in the Congressional Record.

Annual Conference to Address Comparative Legal Aspects of Entrepreneurship in Canada and the United States

The Canada-United States Law Institute will host its annual two-day conference on April 13–14, 2007. As both countries attempt to remain competitive in the global economic environment, the Institute has assembled distinguished experts to address the critical importance of entrepreneurship to economic growth. The conference will cover topics such as public and private financing and government assistance for entrepreneurs; the legal options available to structure entrepreneurial ventures; Canada United States the manner in which to recruit and retain entrepreneurs; and the means to protect intellectual property.

Keynote addresses will be given by Michael Lazaridis, president and co-CEO of Research in Motion, Ltd.; Hon. Eddie Francis, mayor of Windsor, Ontario, and former owner of Royal Pita-Baking Company; A. Malachi Mixon III, chair and CEO of Invacare Corporation; and Professor Robert Hisrich, professor of entrepreneurship at Thunderbird School of Management.

The conference is approved for 17.5 hours of CLE credit. For more information, visit http://law.case.edu/centers/canada_us/journal.htm or contact deborah.turner@case.edu.

As the new dean, Gary Simson's passion for legal education sets the tone for his leadership of the law school

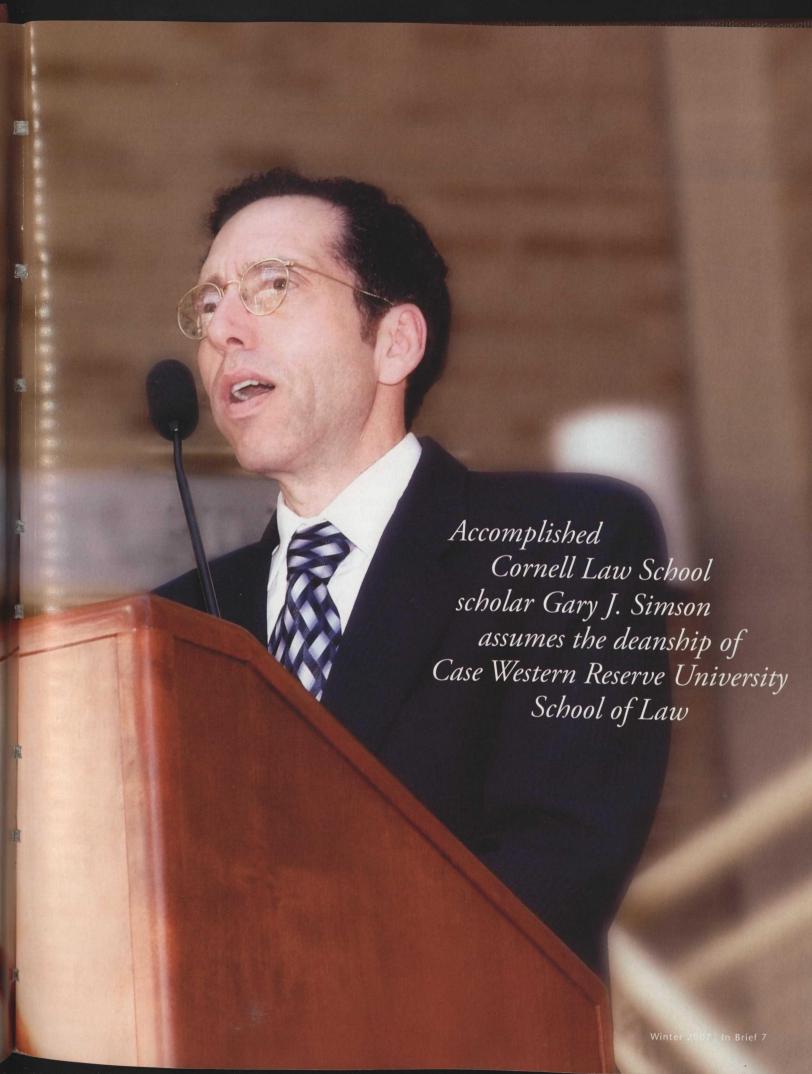

This article is based on an interview with Gary Simson a few weeks after his first day on the job on July 1, 2006.

ary Simson may not fit the mold of what most would consider a traditional leader. Humble and unpretentious, Simson radiates genuineness. He prefers to listen before speaking, absorbs every detail said in his presence, and works tirelessly to bring people together around important issues—everyone from the faculty and administration, to students and alumni. In his view, consensus-building lies at the heart of successful deaning. His reserved wisdom becomes more evident as soon as one hears him speak about his new home—the City of Cleveland, and particularly the dean's suite in Gund Hall. That is when his enthusiasm and passion for legal education shine.

Before leaving Ithaca for Cleveland last summer, Simson had already achieved remarkable successes in his personal and professional life. As the husband of a highly regarded philosophy professor, father of two bright, thriving children, productive and well-known scholar, respected administrator, and beloved teacher, Simson was poised to take the next step in his distinguished career as the leader of a law school.

The Case Western Reserve University School of Law's dean search committee recognized Simson's potential last year when they embarked on a national search for a new dean following Gerald Korngold's decision to step down from the deanship after nine years. Simson's appointment took effect July 1, 2006, marking a new school year and a new era for the law school under the able guidance of its twelfth dean.

Several months into his tenure as dean, Gary Simson has already proven to be adaptive and open to the distinctive features of his new school. He came to the School of Law after twenty-six productive years on the faculty and administration of Cornell Law School, but Simson does not see his job as "transplanting Cornell to here." As he explains, "When you go somewhere new, you... incorporate what you liked where you were, so certainly to some extent I do draw on my experience. This place, though, is different; all law schools are different, and I want to be responsive to what the differences are and value them as I see them." "Gary Simson is a first-rate scholar and

Gifted Teacher, Scholar and Administrator

Gary Simson was a member of the Cornell law faculty since 1980, where he also served as associate dean for academic affairs and associate dean for faculty development for seven consecutive years. In those positions he was responsible for curricular planning and development, faculty course assignments, coordinating the mentoring of untenured faculty, and spearheading efforts to diversify the law school's faculty.

Simson is the author of a leading conflict of laws casebook, now in its fourth edition, and various articles in the field. He has also has written articles on a wide array of constitutional law issues, including sex education and freedom of religion, Supreme Court appointments, school vouchers, the death penalty and religion, and single-sex schools.

Simson is a graduate of Yale Law School (1974), where he was an editor of the Yale Law Journal and was awarded the Colby Townsend Memorial Prize. He is also a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Yale College. Before joining Cornell's faculty, Simson clerked for the Hon. J. Joseph Smith of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. He began his teaching career at the University of Texas School of Law in 1975, was promoted to full professor in 1977, and joined the Cornell Law School faculty in 1980. He has also held a visiting appointment at the University of California-Berkeley Boalt Hall School of Law.

Simson has chaired the advisory board of Carolina Academic Press's Law Casebook Series since the series began—with his conflict of laws casebook—more than twenty years ago. He also has been a member of the Legal Advisory Panel of the National Center for Science Education since the panel was established. He is admitted to the bar in the states of Connecticut and New York. In connection with the Religious Liberty Clinic that he founded (as the first of its kind) and ran for six years with his Cornell colleague Glenn Galbreath (CWRU Law 1974), Simson litigated a number of high profile cases, including one that is well-known for breaking new ground in free exercise law.

While at Cornell, Simson regularly taught Conflict of Laws and Constitutional Law. Except for his years as associate dean, he also regularly taught a third offering—either the Religious Liberty Clinic or a seminar on equal protection or freedom of religion.

And Simson is not about to let his long streak of consecutive years teaching end. He took the fall semester off to get settled in his new city and school, but he is teaching Conflict of Laws this spring. "I really love teaching and I enjoy dealing with students enormously," he says. "It keeps me active in my areas of interest and close and accessible to students." He notes that many deans today do no school. In the 30-plus years that I have known him, he has been a proponent teaching at all due to the great demands on their time. He is intent on bucking the trend, however, because he believes that his teaching as dean is invaluable to communicate to

On the Makings of a Great Law School

Simson recognizes that at the heart of any law school is the faculty and administrative staff, its graduates and friends, and at its core the students-its raison d'etre. So when he talks about the things that make for a great law school, he immediately mentions attracting and retaining the best law school applicants and top-notch faculty. He stresses the value of looking beyond LSAT scores or the number of published papers, and he underlines the importance of "attractir diverse candidates" for the student body and faculty. Simson believ in diversity to the full extent of its meaning—"obviously in terms of race, gender, and religion, but also in terms of ideas, approaches to the way to do things, and background." That, he insists, is what makes for a rich educational experience.

Also of great importance to Simson is fostering interdisciplinary education. He sees tremendous value in bringing that kind of learning to the study and practice of law. "I have always found that it is illuminating to get another perspective on things," he sai adding, "you can't approach legal issues in a vacuum." Simson has incorporated the study of other disciplines into his own teaching and writing for many years, and regularly recruited faculty from other departments to teach at the law school when he served as associate dean at Cornell. Aware of the great advantage of being part of a first-rate university, Simson wants to see to it that interdisciplinary studies continue to expand and flourish at the la school in partnership with Case Western Reserve University's oth strong schools and departments.

Similarly, Simson would like to see international and comparative law "infused into the curriculum." He believes that rich offerings these subjects—in addition to integrating international and com ative studies into almost every course—is crucial to the practice and study of law. And, he adds, "it is also what I think will define an outstanding law school in coming years."

Central to a superior legal education, Simson also asserts, are the clinical and writing experiences. Having co-taught a clinic himself for a number of years, Simson is keenly aware of the difficult yet important service clinics offer to their communities, and the value they provide to students who participate in clinical courses. In terms of legal research and writing, he says, "if you ask any law firm what they would like to see law graduates better trained in, they would probably all tell you it's in writing." The law school's innovative CaseArc program has become a trend-setter in this regard, and Simson is committed to its continued success.

Technology is another area Simson will focus on, from promoting the use of technology in the classroom to ensuring that course offerings address and reflect developments in the fields of science and technology worldwide.

Furthermore, Simson is also committed to supporting students in their endeavors to pursue a wide range of interests and practice areas. He is eager to increase the options available to students who are interested in public interest work. He explains, "I think law schools need to make it easier for students who want to do public interest work—whether it's for nonprofit organizations, for the government or other areas." Loan forgiveness, more scholarships, summer fellowships, and other initiatives to facilitate public interest work are all resources Simson plans to pursue more aggressively.

Family Ties

par-

So far, the most demanding critic Simson has ever met has been his wife, Rosalind Simson. She reads and critiques all his articles (as he does hers), but she is his most dedicated advisor and supporter as well. The two met as students at Yale College in the 1970s and have been together ever since. Simson proudly recalls that his wife was in the first class of women admitted to Yale, a class that earned a feature article in the Sunday New York Times magazine.

Rosalind was an associate professor of philosophy at Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, New York, for over twenty years. She now holds a joint appointment in law and philosophy at Case Western Reserve University. The Simsons have two children. Nathaniel, 22, graduated from Cornell with a double major in physics and theatre and still resides in Ithaca. Jennie Anne, 14, moved to Cleveland with her parents and is a freshman at the Beachwood public high school. She plays soccer and shares a love of music with

Making a Difference

"I have always believed that lawyers do extremely important work for society. It is why I went to law school and then entered academia—to make a difference. Assuming the role of dean at this law school is my way of promoting the good of society in a way that impacts not only the legal profession, but society in general. I'm honored to have the opportunity to be a dean... to make a distinctive contribution to the focus of the law school, to the law in general, and to influence legal education on a local as well as on a national scale. It's a chance to make a difference, and I'm delighted to be given this chance."

—Gary J. Simson

Those ambitions are anything but ordinary. While Case Western Reserve University School of Law has had an illustrious and reputable past, it is now poised to continue building on that proud tradition under the leadership of its new dean and his quest to make a difference.

ince the attacks of September 11, 2001 on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, the nation has largely focused its security efforts on preventing further acts of physical destruction. Yet warfare in the 21st century is likely to take many different forms, including the use of biological weapons on a nation's food supply.

Case Western Reserve University School of Law explored the implications of an agricultural attack in a conference titled, "The Fifth Plague: A Counterterrorism Simulation." The day-long event featured representatives from the Federal and Ohio Emergency Management Agency (FEMA and OEMA), law enforcement agencies, health commissions, the media, and other agencies and organizations from the U.S. and Canada. It offered 6.5 hours of CLE credit and was webcast live on the Internet.

The conference was co-sponsored by the law school's Frederick K. Cox International Law Center, the Institute for Global Security Law and Policy, and the Law-Medicine Center. Erin M. Page '06, who contributed this article, was a third-year student last spring when the conference took place. She was the primary organizer of the event, which addressed the dilemmas and decisions created by an outbreak of the debilitating Foot and Mouth Disease.

The "Fifth Plague" was a unique, scenario-based and simulation-driven law and policy conference that brought together academics, emergency management and law enforcement officials, veterinarians, attorneys, and a local farmer, among others. During the course of the day, experts addressed the legal and policy aspects of a bioterrorist attack from the point of initial discovery to the point of resolution. In addition, the roles and responsibilities of different levels of government were addressed.

From Preparation to Simulation

In the planning stages of the bioterrorism conference, different possible diseases and scenarios were discussed. Because of the unique opportunity to highlight an often overlooked issue with particular importance to Ohio and the nation, Foot and Mouth Disease was chosen over a more traditional bioterrorism threat, such as anthrax or smallpox. Foot and Mouth Disease poses no threat to the health of humans, but retains the ability to wreak havoc. A terrorist attack involving Foot and Mouth Disease and agriculture has the potential to affect exports that are valued at $50 to $60 billion annually. In Ohio alone, millions of animals are susceptible to Foot and Mouth Disease.

The scenario was drafted and sent to agricultural experts nationwide. Their feedback ensured 1) that the scenario be scientifically accurate both in terms of its introduction and how events would unfold in a real situation, 2) that it be realistic in terms of how the disease was introduced and would be spread to farms, and 3) the timeline of the disease's progression.

Anumber of experts from different fields were invited to participate. In addition, a local farmer, John Yarish, graciously accepted our invitation to participate. Mr. Yarish significantly contributed to the day's success by ensuring that the audience and participants understood the "on the ground realities" faced by farmers. Representatives from the Ohio Department of Agriculture and the Ohio Emergency Management Agency contributed significantly to the continued development of the scenario, and to the conference's proceedings on the day of the simulation.

Agricultural exports—a large part of the U.S. economy—are greatly susceptible to bioterrorism threats. Therefore, "The Fifth Plague" was designed to explore and highlight the international trade and border ramifications of a possible bioterrorism attack.

Professor Henry King–famed Nuremburg war crimes prosecutor, Case Western Reserve University law professor, and U.S. director of the Canada-United States Law Institute—was instrumental in recruiting Canadian officials to participate. Canadian experts Carolyn Inch, DVM (national manager of disease control for the Canadian Food Inspection Agency) and Gloria Mintah (legal counsel at Canadian Food Inspection Agency), discussed steps that Canada would take to prevent Foot and Mouth Disease from spreading. They also educated students and practitioners alike regarding the differences between U.S. and Canadian quarantine and bioterrorism laws.

The diverse group of experts who presented the day of the simulation discussed the legal and policy aspects of the critical decisions that would have to be considered in case of a terrorist-induced Foot and Mouth Disease outbreak. The involvement of media relations officials and journalists created discussion regarding the flow of information during a terrorist attack. These professionals and law enforcement officials debated how much information would be released to the public, when it would be released, and how to handle inaccurate reports.

As the scenario unfolded throughout the day, new information was introduced to move the timeframe along the disease's progression. With the help of Classic Worldwide Productions and law students, video clips were created to move the simulation into new discussion points.

Outbreak

The conference started with "101" sessions given by the Ohio Department of Agriculture and the Ohio Emergency Management Agency. These sessions were designed to give law students, practitioners, and academics the background they needed for the day. The three sessions covered the basics of Foot and Mouth Disease, the laws surrounding a biological disease, and the laws and regulations of emergency management. With these tools, the participants were able to better understand and grapple with the complexities presented by The Fifth Plague.

After the introductory sessions, a news clip kicked off the simulation. Subsequent news clips presented the different panels assembled with new information, which the panel members used to answer questions and explore legal and policy dilemmas. Professor Amos Guiora, director of the law school's Institute for Global Security Law and Policy, moderated the discussion in order to tease out information and provide reasoning behind why certain decisions were made.

The morning panels focused on the local and state interactions of the outbreak. The afternoon panels focused on the national and international aspects of a terrorist-induced outbreak of Foot and Mouth Disease. At the end of each panel, participants and audience members had the opportunity to address the panel about that particular stage of the scenario. Thanks to the live webcast of the conference, people nationwide were also able to watch and participate in the conference by emailing questions. This was the first time that a conference at Case Western Reserve University School of Law had an interactive conference through webcasting.

Professor Lawrence Gostin provided the keynote address during lunch. He is director of the Center for Law and the Public's Health, professor of law and associate dean for research and academic programs at Georgetown University Law Center. His talk focused on biosecurity with an emphasis on national and global perspectives regarding infectious diseases.

Lessons Learned

The Fifth Plague simulation highlighted a number of important issues that require further attention in order to prepare for a real-life bioterrorism attack:

- The need to more effectively delineate responsibility amongst government agencies
- The need for better coordination between law enforcement officials and other government agencies
- The need to more effectively inform the public

The Fifth Plague highlighted the competing interests of different groups that would be involved in such an outbreak and how to resolve some of the inherent conflicts that arise from different interests. Participants commented that it is always a balancing act between private individual interest and the interests of the general public. Other conflicts addressed were the responses of agencies to a situation, whether the state or federal government has control, immunity for state actions during an emergency, and proactive actions versus reactive actions.

The Fifth Plague also highlighted many areas where the government has improved since September 11, 2001, but also areas where improvement is still needed. Participants from many of the agencies involved commented on the uniqueness of the conference and how it allowed them to discover new places to grow and revise their response strategy. Academics learned of nuances in the laws and subtle conflicts between agencies and their roles. For law students and practitioners, the conference demonstrated how laws and regulations must be enforced to ensure individual rights and the nation's security.

As one participant noted, "response to a terrorist threat has come a long way since 9/11, but there is still a ways to go."

ERIN M. PAGE '06

Erin M. Page graduated from Case Western Reserve University School of Law in May 2006 where she was a Senior Fellow in Terrorism and Homeland Security at the Institute for Global Security Law and Policy. Upon graduating, she was selected as a 2006 Presidential Management Fellow and has been working for the FBI's Counterterrorism Division.

A recipient of the Distinguished Scholar Merit Scholarship at the law school for three years, Ms. Page made the Dean's List two semesters and earned two concentrations: Criminal Law and International Law, with honors. She has co-authored two law journal articles ("Going Toe to Toe: President Barak's and Chief Justice Rehnquist's Theories of Judicial Activism," 29 Hastings International and Comparative Law Review 51 (2005), and "The Unholy Trinity—Interrogation, Intelligence, and Torture," 37 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law 427 (2006)); a third article is pending publication. She developed the scientific-based scenario that served as the basis for "The Fifth Plague," a simulation-based bioterrorism conference held at Case Western Reserve University School of Law in 2006. Ms. Page has also completed the Department of Homeland Security's Pilot Homeland Security Exercise and Evaluation Program and participated in an FBI tabletop exercise.

In addition to conducting research for the Iraqi Special Tribunal and U.S. Department of Defense, Ms. Page also competed on the Philip C. Jessup International Law Moot Court team in 2005–2006 and on the Jean Pictet International Humanitarian Law Moot Court team in 2004–2005.

Prior to attending law school, Ms. Page earned a B.A. in Political Science from the University of Michigan. Recipient of a Robert C. Byrd Honors Scholarship, she was a founding member of a student bioethics group and helped to plan, organize and moderate a National Undergraduate Bioethics Conference held in Ann Arbor in March, 2004.

A tale of two recent graduates who chose different paths in their careers—one as a prosecutor and the other as a public defendant—who have a lot more in common than not, including tremendous respect for each other's work and commitment to the criminal jusice system. We recently caught up with them in opposite sides of the country and they each shared how their law school experiences, particularly through the Milton A. Kramer Law Clinic Center, helped shape their careers.

any law students arrive at law school with little idea of what they want to be "when they grow up." Many others think they know, but end up after graduation doing things they never imagined. Others, it turns out, arrive with a plan and see it through. But one thing all these law students realize by the time they graduate is that law school can change you profoundly, and one of its most profound effects is the respect it teaches you to have for your adversaries.

Kori Keil '06

Kori Keil arrived at the law school knowing she loved to snowboard and that with her B.A. in business and a J.D. she might be very happy practicing corporate law in Colorado. Angela Jolly might have been Kori's nemesis. When she arrived as a member of the same 1L class as Kori, Angela was a single mother, had worked as a social worker with Head Start in North Carolina, and had dreamt since a 6th Grade Career Day of being a lawyer and helping people. Corporate law and snowboarding were not in her future.

A funny thing happened on Kori's way to a life driving her SUV to ski resorts in the Rockies—she found a passion for criminal defense work and social justice. Now, having graduated in June 2006, she is in Colorado, and she is of course snow-boarding, but Kori is also pouring out her "blood, sweat, and tears" for the Golden Public Defender's Office, with a case load that started with 170 indigent clients facing criminal charges. And still Angela might seem to be Kori's nemesis—Angela is now a prosecutor, working as an Assistant State Attorney for Miami-Dade County.

Kori's passion for representing criminal defendants had its genesis in Professor Lawry's first year Criminal Law class. To her own surprise, she found herself speaking up in class for defendants' points-of-view. She was especially struck by the injustice of "three-strike" laws that impose life imprisonment even for minor offenses. She is convinced, for example, that most defendants in drug-related cases need help, not imprisonment, and certainly not life imprisonment. She was also shocked at the power of the state to use conspiracy laws to coerce defendants who had played trivial roles in larger criminal enterprises. While she had never previously pictured berself as a criminal defense attorney, she knew she had always been a fighter and had always stood up for the underdog. Now that she finds herself in the front lines of our criminal justice system, she finds that every day something new adds fuel to her fire.

Angela might always have known she wanted to be a lawyer, but it was only in her second year course in Trial Tactics with Ed Jerse and her participation in the Mock Trial Program that she realized she wanted to do trial work. She realized working at a law firm wasn't the route she wanted to follow when, as a summer associate during her second summer, she worked with a third year lawyer who had not yet tried a single case. Given her background and beliefs, Angela set her sights on a large prosecutor's office, and now she finds herself happily warm in Miami and even more happily challenged by the challenges of prosecution.

Kori too was heavily influenced by her Trial Tactics course, in her case taught by Linda Betzer and Michael Anne Johnson '77, and by Dennis Terez's Criminal Pretrial Practice class and Mike Benza's '92 Criminal Procedure class. But it was in the Milton A. Kramer Law Clinic Center where Kori and Angela, so different in so many ways, did so much to help each other become exactly what they are—not nemeses but, rather, professionals with adverse interests and deep respect for each other's duties, responsibilities, and clients.

As Angela explains, the small group of students in each given Clinic is forced to find a way to work productively together on behalf of their clients. Moreover, the only way to maintain that kind of productivity is to cultivate real camaraderie, not an easy thing when you're driven primarily to protect society from dangerous criminals and your colleague is driven primarily to help the little guy. Angela found herself, of course, in Kori's Clinic. But, as Kori explains, working together with lawyers on a number of cases from beginning to end—through every stage of a criminal proceeding from arrest and indictment through sentencing and appeal—makes you realize that lawyers doing their jobs are an enormous help to one another. Professional respect can quickly overcome more superficial differences, and, after all, prosecutors and defense lawyers are two of the principal engines behind one common enterprise—our criminal justice system.

Angela's and Kori's Clinical group worked fantastically well together. Their success wasn't a matter of ignoring their differences but, rather, of articulating, understanding, and learning to respect those differences. Kori expresses it well when she explains that a lawyer becomes "myopic if she is always surrounded by people holding the same point of view." Angela, she found, was invaluable during their Clinic experiences, always ready to check the excesses of Kori's bleeding heart with a good natured retort, "Hey, Kori, that's ridiculous!" Angela, for her part, realized that defense attorneys have as much to teach her about lawyering as any prosecutor. The Clinic, and colleagues like Kori, also brought home to her what she already knew but that prosecutors can sometimes forget: defendants might have done bad things, but that doesn't make them bad people.

Angela and Kori are therefore in perfect harmony in recognizing the prominence of the Clinic in the development of their professional lives. Not only was the diversity of their small group a force that changed them all, but, as Angela points out, the Clinic finally provided the real, in-court experience for which the law school's earlier simulation courses (including the CaseArc courses, Trial Tactics, and Pretrial Practice) had prepared the students. Thus, for example, while Angela thought the judges she appeared before in her Clinic cases might have been more sensitive to the inexperience of Clinic students, she is now thankful that they forced her to develop in law school the thick skin worn by every successful lawyer.

Kori adds that because the clinical students devote so much time to and become so embedded in the intricacies of their clients' cases and lives, inevitably they better understand and utilize everything else they learn in law school. The focus the Clinic's cases require, in short, finally allows the students to slow down and think through the human implications of the vast quantities of material they are learning in the rest of law school.

Most importantly, both Kori and Angela feel the Clinic prepared them well for their current positions. Angela's career at the State Attorney's Office in Miami-Dade County started with six weeks of training under the supervision of seasoned prosecutors, a period she describes as "law school on steroids." Just as Kori expressed some shock at her initial load of 170 cases, Angela felt initially overwhelmed by the "box full of criminal cases" assigned to her. But her education serves her well. She works hard always to be prepared, even when that preparation goes for naught because, for example, police officers or victims don't always show up to testify. She is, in addition, thrilled at the new experiences she constantly encounters. Her combination of hard work and open-mindedness not only makes her effective; it makes her happy. She is doing what she wants to do, and she is helping make the world a better place in ways she has wanted to since she was twelve. She also gets to enjoy the many funny things that go on in courtrooms, like the defendant awaiting arraignment in the back of a courtroom who, hearing the charge against her client, yelled out, "I'll take that!" And recently, in just her first half year of practice, Angela tried her first two jury cases, something she always wondered whether she'd achieve back in her law school days. She has also had four bench trials already.

Kori, for her part, has been on the job in the Golden P.D.'s Office since August 2006. Not only did she hit the ground running with those 170 case files, but she has already had seven jury cases and five bench trials. She knows she has just begun, but she already feels she has seen "the good, the bad, and the ugly," and she already recognizes the enormous amount she has learned in her first six months of practice. Her biggest challenge at the moment is representing the defendant in a sexual assault case. With her characteristic defense attorney's attitude, she acknowledges that the case is difficult and emotional but she also remarks that it is fascinating and "full of fodder for the litigator." She loves what she is doing, and, just as she has done since the age of fifteen, she goes snowboarding at every opportunity.

The Milton A. Kramer Law Clinic Center

Serving Students and the Community

The Milton A. Kramer Law Clinic Center is an in-house, real client clinic, which provides legal services to unrepresented or underrepresented members of the community unable to afford legal counsel. In a hands-on learning environment, law students put their lawyering skills to work representing real clients in civil, criminal, and transactional matters. Third-year students act as the primary legal counsel for clients from start to finish. Nearly one third of all third-year law students complete a clinic course. As part of the CaseArc program, students are also able to participate in innovative experiential projects through labs and externships.

With close assistance from faculty members—each of whom is a distinguished attorney with extensive litigation and practical experience—a student in one of the civil clinics may incorporate a nonprofit institution, help a homeowner sue for predatory lending practices, or obtain disability benefits for a client. In the criminal clinic, students—such as Kori Keil '06 and Angela Jolly '06— handle misdemeanors ranging from DUI and petty theft to assult, domestic violence and drug offenses.

The clinic center stresses fundamental values of the profession to law students: providing competent representation, striving to promote justice and fairness, striving to improve the profession, and engaging in professional self-development. In turn, students have a wide range of unique opportunities to:

- Learn and strengthen fundamental lawyering skills such as problem-solving, legal analysis and reasoning, legal research, factual investigation, effective written and oral communication, counseling clients, planning, litigation, and alternative dispute resolution, organization and management of legal work, and recognizing and resolving ethical dilemmas.
- Serve clients in their third year through one of the center's four specialized clinics—the year-long Civil Litigation and Mediation Clinic, Community Development Clinic, Health Law Clinic, and Criminal Justice Clinic.
- Gain experience managing a caseload—generally four to six cases—and serve as first chair at all hearings, trials, and/ or negotiations under the supervision of faculty. A student's experience serving clients may include directing a cross examination of a police officer, drafting a contract for a nonprofit organization, interviewing material witnesses in a consumer complaint matter, conducting an examination of a medical expert in a social security disability claim, negotiating a plea arrangement with a prosecutor, or drafting a will or an advanced health care directive for an ailing client.
- As a supplement to the real-life lawyering experience, participate in lectures and roundtable discussions that simulate the setting in a law firm.

Professors Judith P. Lipton and Kenneth R. Margolis '76 are co-directors of the Milton A. Kramer Law Clinic Center.

Faculty Profile

PROFESSOR LEON GABINET

Professor Leon Gabinet does not intend to stop teaching his favorite class, Federal Income Tax, any time soon. He knows most students dread any class that has that scary three-letter word in it, but he still revels in being able to win them over. And he has a proven ability to do just that. In a few semesters, he will have taught the course every single year to law students at Case Western Reserve University School of Law for forty years. Over 2,500 students have sat in his classroom. And since 1968, he has converted many of those wary students into loving the world of tax law that he has dedicated his career to.

Few things inspire Professor Gabinet like a good discussion about the intricacies of the tax code, although watching a good hockey game is a close second. This tax law professor not only played successfully in high school and then college, but he is an avid fan of the sport. As many of his students—past and present—know, the team that gives him the kind of joy and agony Cleveland Browns fans can relate to is the Chicago Blackhawks. But he also cheers for the Edmonton Oilers from Alberta, Canada, and the memento his class left him of that team in 1985 still hangs in his office (a photo of hockey player Wayne Gretzky signed by everyone in the class).

Students have also heard some war stories from Professor Gabinet—some have even heard him tell of how he was almost lost at sea as a marine in the U.S. Navy after a Japanese kamikaze sank his ship in the Pacific. Professor Gabinet served in the Navy for two years during World War II (1944–46). He had enlisted right out of high school and needed his parents' permission.

When he returned home, he decided to go to college and began the pre-med track at the University of Chicago. He was swept by a desire to be a performer instead and decided it would be fun to be a trial lawyer. After completing his undergraduate studies, he went to law school, which is where he was first lured to tax law by a great professor. According to Professor Gabinet, Walter J. Blum made tax so fascinating that Gabinet gave up any ambitions of pursuing anything else.

He received his J.D. from the University of Chicago in 1953. After law school, Professor Gabinet clerked for a judge in the Oregon Supreme Court for a year before joining the Oregon State Tax Commission (known today as the Oregon Department of Revenue), a place he worked for two years. Then, he joined the law firm of Hart, Spencer, McCulloch, Rockwood and Davies—the largest law firm in Oregon at the time—where he spent twelve years in the tax department.

But Gabinet had always wanted to teach. With a lot of practical experience under his belt, he left Oregon and headed back east to become a professor of law at Case Western Reserve University. In the classroom, he found more satisfaction than ever before in his career as a practitioner. In teaching, he says, he is in the constant process of reeducating himself. That has been a fun intellectual challenge for Professor Gabinet. He describes each class as an act in which he has to perform, and it is hard work preparing for every single one. But he does it all with meticulous care and a passion for wanting each class to be his stellar performance.

Besides teaching, Professor Gabinet has kept busy with other aspects of academic life such as writing (he is the coauthor of a casebook, Tax Aspects of Marital Dissolution, first published in 1986, now in its second revised edition (The West Group, 2005), and its supplement that has been published annually since the publication of the first edition of the book). He was also the executive director of the Graduate Program in Taxation at the law school for many years, and is a member of the school's Society of Benchers. Just this year he stepped up to emcee the group's annual meeting in September 2006, citing that ever-present desire to be a performer (and, he adds, a stand-up comedian).

Professor Gabinet loves to chat, and just in case his students, children or grandchildren do not give him their undivided attention, he has a standing lunch date every Wednesday at noon with a group of dear friends at Yours Truly in Shaker Square. The men, all well past their 60s, have met here regularly for the past several years, and Gabinet looks forward to it each week. He says that he and his friends solve all the world's problems in just one hour every week.

An avid reader, Professor Gabinet also gets to talk about books often too. He belongs to the exclusive Cleveland Novel Club—now in its 111th season of operation. The last book the 25–member group read was Moby Dick, and John le Carré's Tinker Tailor Soldier Spy is on next month's list.

If there is one thing Professor Gabinet loves more than taxes, hockey and talking, it is his family. Sadly, his wife Laille passed away a couple of years ago. But his three children and five grandchildren keep him busy (one of his grandchildren was married last June). Not surprisingly, most of them have played hockey too. Two of his children take most after their father. Sarah Gabinet is a trial lawyer and a partner at Kohrman, Jackson & Krantz PLL in Cleveland. She is a graduate of the law school's Class of 1982, and now serves on the board of the Law Alumni Association. His son Arthur is the former head of the Securities and Exchange Commission office in Philadelphia. He recently left the SEC for a position with the Vanguard Group in the Philadelphia suburbs. But daughter Kathryn is an artist and French/English translator in Montreal, Canada. Anyone who has ventured into Professor Gabinet's office or home has seen the proud display of her work on the walls.

Shown in the background is Professor Gabinet when he was a member of the University of Chicago hockey team.

$773,000 NIH Grant Awarded to Law Professor

Maxwell J. Mehlman, Arthur E. Petersilge Professor of Law and director of the Law-Medicine Center, received a two-year grant of $773,000 from the National Institutes of Health (NIH) to study ethical differences between therapeutic and enhancement genetic research that involves human subjects. Professor Mehlman will lead a team of researchers in identifying these ethical differences and then determining whether current rules and regulations adequately protect human subjects in genetic enhancement research. The team will then suggest guidelines to fill public policy gaps.

The study aims to address the absence of guidelines that explicitly address the special issues of enhancement research. Researchers and bioethicists have developed guidelines to protect human subjects in clinical experiments of therapeutic modalities. However, virtually no attention has been paid to whether these rules would be appropriate for clinical investigations to assess the safety and efficacy of genetic technologies intended for enhancement rather than therapeutic uses.

The project is the first major research grant received in connection with the Center for Genetic Research Ethics and Law (CGREAL) at Case Western Reserve University, which is one of four university centers recognized by the NIH for excellence in work on the ethical, legal, and social implications of the Human Genome Project. Professor Mehlman is a research coordinator and director of public policy for CGREAL.

Other members of the research team include: Jessica Berg, professor of law and bioethics; Jennifer Fishman, assistant professor of bioethics and sociology; Mary Quinn Griffin, assistant professor of nursing; Eric Juengst, associate professor of bioethics; and Eric Kodish, MD, the F.J. O'Neill professor and chairman of the Department of Bioethics at the Cleveland Clinic Foundation.

Law Professors to Administer Counterterrorism Grant from U.S. Department of Justice

Professors Amos N. Guiora '85 and Gregory S. McNeal '06 lead the Professional Education for Terrorism Trials Program, recently funded by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) to promote cooperation between U.S. and foreign prosecutors in terrorism cases. The DOJ awarded $246,807 in September 2006 to the Case Western Reserve University School of Law's Institute for Global Security Law and Policy.

Professor Guiora, an expert in global approaches to counterterrorism, is the director of the Institute. He will supervise the program as its principal investigator and serve as its liaison to government officials. Professor McNeal is an adjunct faculty member and the Institute's assistant director, and will serve as executive director of the program, managing its development and overseeing all operations. The professors co-teach the Counterterrorism Prosecution Lab at the law school and wrote the grant application in Spring 2006.

Professors Guiora and McNeal have already met and consulted with senior DOJ officials to gauge current levels of cooperation between U.S. and foreign prosecutors. They are working together with the DOJ to develop the curriculum for an upcoming educational program, focusing on the challenges officials face in transnational cooperation. This summer, the Institute will facilitate a transnational summit bringing together U.S. and foreign prosecutors—a unique educational and networking opportunity for these professionals. During the summit, participants will share lessons learned, discuss opportunities for greater collaboration, and engage in simulations related to actual and potential terrorist cases. The project will conclude with a final report on the results of the study, the effectiveness of the educational summit, and opportunities for future collaboration and cooperation among prosecutors.

The law school has already established itself as a leader in the field of counterterrorism law through the work of the Institute and the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center. Case Western Reserve University School of Law is the only law school selected by the U.S. Department of Defense to provide research regarding the prosecution of alleged terrorists held in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as well as the only law school to provide research for prosecutors in every international war crimes tribunal. The Institute has advised members of Congress and congressional committees regarding proposed counterterrorism legislation. Recently, the Institute also entered into an agreement with the U.S. Coast Guard to provide legal research and simulation support for Coast Guard Homeland Security exercises. Professor Guiora will head that partnership, along with Adjunct Professors Daniel Uzjco '01 and Niki Dorsky '05, who will teach an associated Homeland Security course.

Professor Amos N. Guiora '85 is completing an innovative case-book for law students in the field of counterterrorism law. The new casebook, Global Perspectives on Counterterrorism, analyzes and compares the legal, policy, operational and intelligence counterterrorism measures of the United States, Israel, Spain, India and Russia. It will be published in the spring of 2008 by Aspen Publishers Inc. A retired lieutenant colonel in the Israeli Defense Forces (JAG), Professor Guiora was named director of the Institute for Global Security Law and Policy when it was established in 2005 to provide key knowledge and guidance on the most pressing problems facing U.S. and foreign government officials; the public; students; and the business, legal and law enforcement communities in the post-September 11 environment.

New Faculty Workshop Series to Focus on Legal Theory

Professor Juliet Kostritsky has been appointed by Dean Gary Simson to develop a legal theory workshop series for faculty. The series will consist of six or seven workshops per semester at which a faculty member from another university will present his or her work and respond to questions and comments from the Case Western Reserve University law faculty.

The spring 2007 series is entitled, "Legal Theory: Justificational Analysis in Law." As organizer of the series, Professor Kostritsky—the John Homer Kapp Professor of Law and a nationally recognized scholar in contract law and theory—will identify and invite scholars elsewhere whose work would be of particular interest for the aspects of legal theory that are the focus for that semester. The series will host renowned scholars in their fields who will address some of the most basic issues confronting judges and legal scholars, legislators, administrative agencies, and advocates. These scholars will draw on the central analytical models from various disciplines, including economics and moral philosophy. Speakers in the series will also use insights gained from contract theory to illuminate legal reasoning and legal precedent. For example, one speaker will address the interplay between insurance law and liability rules in a presentation entitled, "Which Came First, the Liability or the Insurance?" (Professor Kenneth Abraham of the University of Virginia) and another speaker (Professor Luca Anderlini of Georgetown University) will address "Court Intervention in Contractual Relationships" with a special focus on the problem of unforeseen contingencies.

First Book on Saddam Hussein Trial Penned by Law Professors

Over the past year, when reporters and even members of Congress needed legal information about what was happening in the Saddam Hussein trial, they turned to the legal experts at Case Western Reserve University School of Law's Frederick K. Cox International Law Center, who were running a real-time Blog as court events unfolded. As the trial came to a close this fall, those same professors released the first book on the high-profile trial of Saddam Hussein: Saddam

On Trial: Understanding and Debating the Iraqi High Tribunal (Carolina Academic Press, 2006).

During the nine months of the trial, over 100,000 people around the world logged on to the law school's "Grotian Moment: The Saddam Hussein Trial Blog," where legal experts associated with the trial and international law scholars posted running commentaries analyzing the legal issues raised during the proceedings. The Blog won four Web awards early in 2006, and finished fifth in the Best Law Blog category of the 2006 Weblog Awards Competition, quickly establishing itself as the number one location on the Internet related to the Saddam trial. The Blog essays were even translated into Arabic and read each day over the air by a popular Iraqi radio station.

Inspired by the public's interest in their Blog, law professors Michael Scharf and Gregory McNeal '06 began saving, organizing, editing, and expanding upon the online information to produce the first published book on the Saddam Hussein trial by the time of the judgment in October. The 428-page book was completed by then, and helped provide a framework of historic significance about how the tribunal formed and subsequently how the trial unfolded. It contains 80 essays that evolved from the web postings, as well as a timeline of the trial, a glossary of key legal terms, a political-psychological profile of Saddam Hussein, and English translations of the defendants' indictments and the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure.

Kevin C. McMunigal, Judge

Calvin William Sharpe, John Deaver Drinko Baker & Hostetler Professor of Law, and Robert N. Strassfeld,

Key guestions examined in the book include: whether it was a mistake to try Saddam Hussein before Iraqi judges in Baghdad; was the Iraqi High Tribunal a legitimate legal court; were the procedures fair; did the judges react fairly when confronted with hunger strikes or disruptive actions by the defendants; was coverage of the trial accurate; and what lessons were learned that could be applied to the subsequent trials in Iraqi or other international courts.

Professor Scharf, a former State Department Attorney-Adviser, served on an elite team of international law experts who trained the judges and prosecutors on the Iraqi High Tribunal. He directs the law school's Frederick K. Cox International Law Center. In the past year and a half, he has appeared countless times on national media to provide expert commentary on the Saddam Trial. Professor McNeal is a former officer of the U.S. Army and serves as assistant director of the law school's Institute for Global Security Law and Policy. Together with Professor Amos Guiora, he oversees the work of students who are preparing legal memoranda for the Chief Prosecutor of the Department of Defense Office of Military Commissions.

New Faculty Appointments

Case Western Reserve University School of Law began its 2006–2007 academic year with five additions to the faculty body. Jennifer Cupar, Maureen Kenny and Carolyn Seymour are assistant professors of legal analysis and writing in the Case Arc Integrated Lawyering Skills program. Gary Simson—also dean as of July 1, 2006—is the Joseph C. Hostetler-Baker & Hostetler Professor of Law (see article on page 6). Rosalind Simson is associate professor of law and philosophy.

Jennifer Cupar returned to her law school alma mater in 2005 to teach after seven years of practice. She is an alumnus of Case Western Reserve University School of Law, Class of 1998, where she graduated second in her class (magna cum laude) and as a member of the Order of the Coif. Professor Cupar was an external affairs coordinator and note editor for the Case Western Reserve Law Review. Prior to law school, she attended Miami University on an alumnisponsored academic scholarship, and received a Bachelor of Science in Education in 1994 (summa cum laude). While there, she was a member of the Kappa Delta Pi Educational Honor Society and was named a Miami University Scholar Leader.

Professor Cupar is licensed to practice law in the State of Ohio. She began her legal career in 1998 as an associate for Squire, Sanders & Dempsey L.L.P. where she had been a summer associate during law school. She then served as a law clerk to the Honorable Solomon Oliver, Jr., in the United States District Court, Northern District of Ohio, in Cleveland for several years. Before coming to teach, she was an associate at Scott & Scott, LLC in Chagrin Falls, Ohio, where she successfully represented a death row inmate in his habeas appeal to the Sixth Circuit, as well as injured parties in large consumer, securities, and antitrust class action lawsuits. Professor Cupar was appointed to the Northern District of Ohio Advisory Group in 2004.

Professor Cupar and her husband, Dave, live in Avon and have two children, Cam (5) and Tyler (2). She now spends most of her free time at basketball and soccer practices for Cam, but when time permits, she enjoys gardening and reading.

Carolyn Seymour brings extensive practical experience to her teaching. She practiced law for almost 20 years before coming to the law school to teach legal writing in 2004. She received a Bachelor of Arts from Colgate University (1982) and a Juris Doctor from the University of Michigan Law School (1985).

Professor Seymour also began her legal career at Squire, Sanders & Dempsey L.L.P., where she was an associate for five years before joining Duvin, Cahn & Hutton in 1990. As an employment litigator, she specialized in sexual harassment and disability discrimination issues. In 1995, she became in-house counsel for BFGoodrich-Aerospace, another position she held for five years before returning to Duvin as a partner in 2000. After adopting Finn, a three-legged Labrador, Professor Seymour became a member of the Board of Directors of the Humane Society of Greater Akron. She and her husband, Paul, live in Hudson, Ohio.

In addition to teaching legal analysis and writing in the CaseArc program, Maureen Kenny also teaches Criminal Law to first-year law students. Before joining the Case Western Reserve University School of Law faculty in 2004, Professor Kenny practiced for six years as a litigation associate at the law firm of Squire, Sanders & Dempsey L.L.P. in Cleveland, where she specialized in First Amendment law, media law, business litigation, and banking law. During her tenure at Squire, Sanders & Dempsey L.L.P, she defended a major Cleveland television station in defamation, breach of contract, invasion of privacy, and other suits. She also participated in hearings and related proceedings advocating the media's right of access to the courtroom, and defending the journalistic and editorial privilege. Finally, she provided counsel on a variety of First Amendment topics and currently serves as a consultant for freedom of press/speech and related media law issues.

Professor Kenny attended
Bowling Green State University, where she studied Psychology and Political Science. She received a Bachelor of Arts in 1993, and returned to Cleveland to study law. She has a Juris Doctor from Cleveland State University Marshall College of Law and lives in Chagrin Falls with her husband and three young children.

Rosalind Simson spent over twenty years as philosophy professor at Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, New York. She now has a joint appointment on the law and philosophy faculties at Case Western Reserve University. In the law school, she teaches a course entitled Sex, Gender, and the Law. Her primary areas of interest are theory of knowledge. feminist philosophy, and issues at the interface of law and philosophy. At Yale University, Professor Simson received a Bachelor of Arts in 1973 (Phi Beta Kappa; summa cum laude with honors in Philosophy). As a recipient of the Harry W. Foote Fellowship in Philosophy and the Arts, she earned a doctorate degree in Philosophy at the Yale Graduate School (Ph.D., 1979).

Among her more recent publications are "Feminine Thinking" in Social Theory and Practice (2005) and "Does Capital Punishment Deter Homicide? A Case Study of Epistemological Objectivity" in Metaphilosophy (2001). While at Hobart and William Smith Colleges, Professor Simson chaired the Women's Studies Program (2005-06) and the Aesthetics Program (1997-2006). She also served on the coordinating committees for the Women's Studies Program (1993-2005) and the Media and Society Program (1997-2006), and on various philosophy department hiring, reappointment, and promotion review committees (1982-2006).

This past summer, Professor Simson moved to Cleveland with her husband Gary Simson who assumed the deanship of the law school in July 2006. Their daughter, Jennie Anne, is 14 and attends Beachwood High School where she's a member of the soccer team and plays the violin in the school's orchestra. Their son, Nathaniel, 22, recently graduated from Cornell University and resides in Ithaca, New York.

Professor Woodmansee shared some of this new research with U.S. intellectual property scholars at an interdisciplinary conference sponsored by the Albany Law School on "The Impact of Technological Change on the Creation, Dissemination and Protection of Intellectual Property" in New York City, October 26–28, 2006.

CHRISTOPHER Y. CHAN

Christopher Y. Chan's interest in international business and intellectual property law should come as no surprise. Before beginning his legal education, Chan experienced first-hand the headaches that can arise when legal practices differ across national boundaries. While working as a business consultant for a Philadelphia based consulting firm, he had the task of setting up a self-sufficient branch office in India at the height of the outsourcing movement. Chan relocated to Pune, India to hire, train, and establish an office that would be able to communicate effectively with its partners back in the United States. Forced to deal with power outages, employment disputes, corruption, and technological bottlenecks, Chan came to realize and appreciate how the rule of law in government regulation could serve as a great obstacle to international business.

Chan earned degrees in both Biology and Psychology from Duke University. While he originally intended to pursue a career in business, Chan developed a strong interest in law after his experiences in India. His goal is to combine his backgrounds in scientific research, international business, and the law into the field of intellectual property. Chan has made use of his technology and business background to explore the areas of domestic and international patent law while working at Bridgestone Americas Holding, Inc. in Akron, and Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner, L.L.P. in Washington, D.C. These experiences have made him a valuable asset to the U.S. and Global Legal Studies program at the law school, where he serves as a patent and copyright tutor to foreign LL.M. students. He also worked as a judicial extern on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit under Judge Deborah L. Cook.

While still hoping to practice internationally, Chan has not been distracted by his overseas ambitions. During the first two years of his legal education, he served as American Bar Association Circuit Governor and was responsible for coordinating the efforts of 18 student bar associations across Ohio, Michigan, and Kentucky (known as the 6th Circuit). He has also put his skills to use in organizing relief efforts for victims of Hurricane Katrina and working with other members of the 6th Circuit to spread breast cancer awareness through a variety of events. At the 2005

ABA Annual Meeting, Chan successfully presented a resolution supporting an independent judiciary before the Law Student Assembly. That same year, the ABA recognized Chan's efforts and presented him with the Star of the Division, ABA Silver Key, and the ABA Circuit of the Year.

At the law school, Chan currently serves as the executive board treasurer of the Student Bar Association, the executive symposium editor of the Journal of International Law, and as a law student vice-chair of the Section of International Law of the ABA. While busy with class work and activities, Chan still has time to write a weekly column for The Docket, the law school's student newspaper. Upon graduation in May, he plans to take the California Bar and will be practicing intellectual property law with Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner in Washington, D.C.

Students Thank Law School Community and Local Businesses for Support

$4,000 in Contributions Send Students to Aid Katrina Recovery Effort

While many university students spent their spring breaks enjoying sun and surf in places like Florida and Mexico, a group of Case Western Reserve University law students traveled to New Orleans to help victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Their trip was made possible by donations from faculty, staff and students and by grants and prize donations from Cleveland area businesses.

Nineteen students from the law school were in the Crescent City March 12–18, performing legal services for people whose homes were destroyed or damaged during the hurricane and helping with the cleanup effort. Kathleen Gibson, a second-year law student, organized the expedition. She got the idea from a small item in an e-mail newsletter from the law student section of the American Bar Association, of which she is a member. "At the bottom of one of the e-mails was a little blurb about an organization called the Student Hurricane Network," Gibson recalls. "I contacted them and what they are doing sounded really exciting, so I decided to get together a group of students from Case to go there."

The Student Hurricane Network is an association bringing law students from around the country to New Orleans and organizing them to help with the relief and recovery effort.

Gibson began talking to friends, members of the ACLU club (whose executive board she sits on), and putting up posters inviting other students to join her. Although she was expecting to get no more than ten volunteers, she quickly found she had almost twenty.

The students worked with three organizations: the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN), New Orleans Legal Assistance, and Common Ground. They assisted with tasks such as interviewing clients, resolving landlord-tenant disputes, and establishing proof of home ownership when titles and other documents were destroyed in the hurricane. The students also helped with rebuilding and cleanup efforts.

A native of Cleveland Heights, Gibson performed volunteer work throughout high school and Carol Rubin, a second-year student from Canton, said, "I had originally planned to visit a friend in London over spring break, but this was a one-time shot to do something meaningful with my friends."

International Law Student One of First Americans Selected to Intern at International Criminal Court

In spring 2006, law student Colin McLaughlin was offered a five-month internship in the chambers of the International Criminal Court (ICC) at The Hague, Netherlands. McLaughlin is the first Case Western Reserve University student, as well as one of the first Americans ever, to have been selected to intern at the prestigious court. He completed his internship with the ICC from July to December 2006. He will receive a stipend and reimbursement for his travel to The Hague.

McLaughlin's interest in international law is what originally lured him to the School of Law. After his first year, McLaughlin worked as a research assistant to Professor Michael Scharf, director of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center, during which his work was published twice (including a chapter on Interpol that he wrote for a new edition of Professor Scharf's Law of International Organizations textbook).

In his second year, McLaughlin registered for the War Crimes Research Lab, where he wrote a memorandum to the ICC on victim and witness protection measures. He also attended the law school's Summer Institute for Global Justice, where he spent six weeks in Europe studying international criminal law, atrocity law, and terrorism law. McLaughlin traveled to the Cayman Islands during spring break as part of the course International Business Organizations to study international business and tax strategies and the related policy debates.

Originally from Gladstone, Michigan, McLaughlin earned a B.A. in Business Administration and Political Science from Alma College. In 2004, he worked as a legal clerk for Butch, Quinn, Rosemurgy, Jardis, Bush, Burkhart & Parks, PC in Escanaba, Michigan. He has served as a senator and executive treasurer for the law school's Student Bar Association, and as an associate editor for the journal Health Matrix. He is the executive notes editor for the journal this year. McLaughlin is pursuing concentrations in International Law and Criminal Law.

Moot Court Program Benefits from Alumni Support

Ever want to be a judge?

The Moot Court Program

encourages alumni to volunteer as judges in student competitions

The Moot Court Program at Case Western Reserve University School of Law begins with Appellate Advocacy's rigorous training in the written and oral practices of appellate lawyers and is followed the next semester by the venerable Dean Dunmore Moot Court Competition. The Dunmore is an annual internal competition that puts all the students enrolled in Appellate Advocacy up against one another as adversaries and in front of judicial panels drawn from the finest of Ohio's lawyers and judges. The excitement the competition generates and the opportunity it presents for collaboration between the school and the practicing bar make the Dunmore a fitting tribute to one of Case Western Reserve's most influential deans, Walter Thomas Dunmore, Class of 1904, who served as dean from 1910 to 1945.

During the semester in which the Dunmore competition occurs, students first spend six weeks preparing their written briefs and

For the success of the Dunmore competitions, we consistently turn to what we see as the best pool of judges we can find—Alumni! The alumni community has been the backbone of the Dunmore competition and team guest judges. Year after year, alumni volunteer their time and energy to help educate current students. Alumni bolster pride and bring valuable skill sets.

On behalf of the Case Western Reserve Moot Court Board, I would like to thank alumni for their continued support of the Moot Court Program. If you have any questions or would like to judge a round, please do not hesitate to email me at casemootcourt@case.edu. I can also be reached at (216) 368-3314. I look forward to hearing from you.

developing their oral arguments. In the following weeks, they argue against each other in a round-robin competition judged by faculty members, local judges, and attorneys, many of whom are alumni.

The second year of the Moot Court Program draws on the Dunmore participants, inviting them to try out for a position on a moot court team designed to compete against teams from other schools. Case Western Reserve offers three teams: the National Team, the American Bar Association (ABA) Team, and the American Intellectual Property Law

Association (AIPLA)
Team. The National

Moot Court Competition is hosted by the New York Bar Association.

The National Team competes in the fall semester, and consists of two teams with three students on each team. This year the competition began on November 9 at Ohio State University. The American Bar Association hosts another competition in early March. This year Case Western Reserve is entering one team of three participants. The AIPLA hosts an intellectual property competition during the spring semester as well. There are two AIPLA teams from the law school this year, each with two students.

Moot Court teams are required to produce a competition brief and prepare oral arguments. The teams traditionally have three to four weeks to prepare their briefs; then they have four weeks to prepare their oral argument. The work is intense and anticipation builds quickly. When the competition begins, two team members argue each round before a panel of competition judges.

The Moot Court Program offers an excellent opportunity for alumni to work with students. The Moot Court teams and the Dunmore competition require guest judges. Dunmore judges manage the appellate argument, grade the participants, and give constructive feedback.

Four School of Law Students Selected for Equal Justice Works Summer Corps Program

Instead of just reading about equal justice, four law students from Case Western Reserve University spent the summer interning with nonprofit public interest law organizations as a part of Equal Justice Works' Summer Corps program.

Lauren Gilbride, Tiffany Nevel,
Graham Polando and Matthew Vincel
each received a $1,000 education award voucher through this national AmeriCorps-funded program. The students were among 608 applicants for 315 participant slots nationwide.
All 2006 Summer Corps participants were first-year and second-year law students, and they each served at least 300 hours in public interest internships providing critically needed legal assistance to low-income and underserved communities in 42 states.

The Summer Corps members gained first-hand experience and legal skills in areas such as client intake, individual representation, research and writing. Summer Corps program participants work on a broad range of issues such as civil rights, community economic development, death penalty, disability rights, housing, domestic violence, education, public benefits and workers' rights.

The four Case Western Reserve University law students interned with the Legal Aid Society of Cleveland on different assignments: Gilbride worked for the Volunteer Lawyers Program, Nevel for the Unemployment Compensation Project, Polando for the Ashtabula County Office, and Vincel for the Consumer Law Unit.

President of the Student Bar Association, Michael D. Mortenson, addressed his classmates and presented several awards.

Alumni Spotlight

Traditionally, an Irish groom, after the exchange of rings, gives his bride a coin, symbolizing the ancient tradition of paying "luck money" to the family of the bride, ensuring happiness and blessings upon them. Larry Stewart '50, then, must have inherited both his generosity and his luck from his Irish immigrant parents.

Lawrence E. school's develor construction, a the new lawyer.

Stewart certainly understood how his parents' enormous efforts on his behalf led to the good fortune he has enjoyed as one of Ohio's most prominent trial lawyers. The traditions they bequeathed him in turn inspired Stewart's own generosity. Ten years ago he gave $100,000 to the law school's building campaign. Then, last year, to celebrate his own 80th birthday, Stewart gave another $50,000 to the Leading the Way in Legal Education campaign. In his honor, the law school has named one of the new group study rooms in the renovated Judge Ben C. Green Law Library. The Lawrence E. Stewart '50 CaseArc Study Room is on the East corner of the third floor.

Stewart supports the law school and Ohio University, from which he graduated with a B.Sc. with Honors, because they played such significant roles in his professional and personal fortunes. He met his late wife Barbara at OU. He wants to ensure that his schools do at least as much for current and future students as they did for him, declaring, "The law school deserves the best—it gave me the best." His first job out of law school resulted from a classmate's suggestion that he contact a Western Reserve Law School grad. Edward Lurie '22 hired him. Six years later when Lurie died, Stewart took over the firm. With Thomas DeChant '58, he subsequently formed Stewart & DeChant, L.P.A., a prominent firm with a focus on plaintiffs' representation and trial practice. Their firm has always made it a point to hire Case Western Reserve University law graduates.

Stewart still identifies with the law school's students. His fondest memories of law school include his large Civil Procedure class. As he recalls, it was there that he first learned to read case law like a lawyer and to appreciate the procedural rules he later mastered as a trial lawyer. One of his favorite professors, Clinton DeWitt, taught Evidence and inspired the young Stewart to "sneak in" to courtrooms to see in action the rules he had learned in the books while studying in the Cleveland Law Library. And who could ever forget Dean Fletcher Reed Andrews?

Stewart's generosity is tied as well to his trial lawyer's competitive instincts. In the Fall 2004 issue of In Brief, he read of the eponymous gift to name the Judge Adrian B. Fink '48 Group Study Room in the law library's third floor. Stewart decided to investigate doing something himself involving the library. One day, unannounced, Stewart showed up in the law school's development office. Given a tour of the library, which was under construction, and inspired by the focus on practice skills promoted by the new lawyering skills program, Case*Arc*, he was sold. The collaborative learning that the library renovations were intended to encourage has been realized, and the Fink and Stewart group study rooms are among the renovated library's most popular features.

His parents did not only inspire Stewart's generosity; they also taught him the value of the hard work for which he has been recognized throughout his career. Among the experiences that reinforced those lessons was his WWII service as a surgical technician in the U.S. Army. Stewart's combination of hard work, outstanding education, and generous nature inevitably led to recognition by his peers throughout his career. The list of his honors is far too long to publish here in its entirety, but they include his regular inclusion in the "Best Lawyers in America," "Who's Who in the Law," and "Ohio Super Lawyers."

Stewart is one of the few attorneys in the State of Ohio who has been certified as a Civil Trial Advocate by the National Board of Trial Advocacy, and he is a fellow and past Ohio chairman of the American College of Trial Lawyers and a fellow of the International Academy of Trial Lawyers. He is a former president and trustee of the Cleveland Bar Association and was named chairman of its Court Management Project in connection with the construction of the Justice Center. A founding trustee of the Cleveland Academy of Trial Attorneys, Stewart subsequently became president of the plaintiffs' trial organization. He also held the position of trustee and vice-president of the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers, a state-wide plaintiffs' trial bar. Stewart is a Life Member of the Judicial Conference of the Eighth Judicial District, an annual conference consisting of judges and distinguished lawyers who discuss methods of improving the justice system. Stewart is also a Master Bencher of the American Inns of Court and has been inducted into the School of Law's Society of Benchers.

Larry Stewart at age 81 has fifteen grandchildren who, he hopes, will carry on the traditions passed on to him by his parents. And Case Western Reserve University School of Law owes a great measure of thanks to Stewart for his vital role in helping the school establish cutting-edge academic programs, award generous scholarships, provide first-rate student and career services, and in keeping the law school building a wonderful state-of-the-art facility.

Larry Stewart '50 fondly remembers the way Fletcher Reed Andrews, dean of the law school from 1948 to 1958, would twirl his spectacles as he taught.

Alumni in Alternative Careers

Not all who graduate from Case Western Reserve University School of Law go on to practice in the more traditional settings of private practice or academia. While most graduates start out in these fields, some alumni have chosen to use their law skills in alternative careers. Meet four alumni who have recently chosen to take a different path.

Joan Andrews '92 is an entrepreneur in the world of radio. She is one of the co-founders of Lake Effect Radio in Cleveland. Lake Effect produces three shows on WHK AM/1420 titled, "Supper and the Silver Screen," "What's So Funny!" and "Novel Conversations." Andrews is extremely passionate about radio and is convinced it can make a comeback with better shows that are thought out, edited, entertaining and enlightening. Recently, she said to the Plain Dealer, "There's a huge market of people out there who watch television and aren't very happy with themselves for doing that. With our shows, you can go running, garden, clean, cook, sit outside and watch the sunset. We will entertain you wherever you go." Andrews' goal is to expand her shows to ten hours of weekly programming and to continue to produce a different kind of programming that includes intelligent shows for adults and clean and family friendly radio for everyone.

The goal of the program is to promote intercultural understanding between the two nations, and educators return and implement a self-designed plan to share their experience and knowledge. Banas was the first teacher in her school district to receive this honor.

Keir Beadling '93 spends most of his days surfing in Northern California and running his sports management and marketing company, Evolve Sports. Beadling started his career in the field of business litigation in Boston before moving to San Francisco in 1999 to work for Fenwick and West where he worked on the high-profile lawsuit against online music provider Napster. After almost a decade in private practice, Beadling discovered that he had lost his passion for private practice and decided to pursue his other passion: extreme physical challenges. Thus, Evolve Sports was born. The company started small by only representing a few individual athletes, but now it sponsors Mavericks Surf Contest, a competition where twenty-four of the world's most courageous surfers tackle forty-foot waves in California's northern fifty degree waters. An estimated 30,000 spectators attended last year's contest, and the event has been broadcast on NBC for the past two years.

Ian Kahn '93 sells books for a living. But Kahn does not sell the average paperback book in a store; instead he helps others plan and build their own private libraries. Kahn's book collections are worth anywhere from $50 to $25,000. His two-year old company, Lux Mentis—based in Portland, Oregon—has clients that have a wide range of tastes and means and include college students spending a few dollars a month to build their book collections, and venture capitalists investing in tomes to supplement their bond portfolios. Kahn has even built libraries that are valued well over $1 million. Building libraries became a livelihood for Kahn after a number of years acquiring business experience in a corporate position for a title insurance underwriter and entrepreneurial experience as the creator of an environmental remediation development company. Although he is not practicing law, his law degree has been useful in each case.

Alumni and Friends Honor Gerald Korngold

After nine years as dean of the law school, Gerald Korngold stepped down from the post in June 2006 in order to pursue scholarship and teaching again. Under his leadership, significant accomplishments were achieved at the law school, and the credential of a Case Western Reserve University law degree continued to create better opportunities for the next generation of leaders.

Funds raised in honor of Gerald Korngold will be used to name a reception area at the entrance of the newly renovated Judge Ben C. Green Law Library. Donors will be recognized on a permanent plaque at the School of Law. The following individuals have donated to this initiative

A Message from the Annual Fund Co-Chairs

Your Support Makes a Difference

Thank you to everyone who has already made a contribution to our School of Law Annual Fund this year! We hope if you have not yet made a contribution you will consider doing so very soon. As you know, your support is critical to our ability to grow and sustain the law school and achieve our mission of preparing the next generation of leading lawyers.

The Annual Fund plays a very important role in the School of Law's success. Annual Fund gifts make possible scholarships, necessary enhancements to our library and technology, stronger faculty, innovative curriculum improvements, effective career services assistance, and much more. Annual Fund gifts also help to bridge the gap between student tuition, which typically funds approximately 80% of the cost of a student's law school education, and the overall cost of a legal education. Our students count on our alumni and friends to give generously to the Annual Fund in order to pay for the additional 20% necessary to provide them with the best possible legal education.

Just as those who came before you invested in your future, you are now impacting the lives of our current and future students. We hope you will continue this excellent tradition of giving back.

If you would like more information on how to make a gift this fiscal year, please do not hesitate to contact Rebecca Krumhansl, director of regional development and annual giving, at (216) 368-3017 or (800) 492-3308.

Please accept our heartfelt thanks for your generosity and support of our law school. We look forward to a successful Annual Fund this year!

REUNION 2007

Celebrating the classes that end in "2" and "7" 2002, 1997, 1992, 1987, 1982, 1977, 1972, 1967, 1962 and 1957

Reunion Giving

In honor of your milestone reunion, please consider supporting the Annual Fund with a special gift to support scholarships. We invite you to contribute to a newly created fund named for your class year that will be used to provide scholarship opportunities for our students, while also increasing giving and class participation in honor of your reunion. For additional information about reunion giving, please contact Rebecca Krumhansl, director of regional development and annual giving at (216) 368-3017 or

Reunion Involvement

If you are interested in serving on your reunion committee or to get involved with planning your reunion, please contact Anne-Marie Connors, director of operations, donor and alumni relations at (216) 368-6355 or anne-marie.connors@case.edu.

Celebrate your reunion year!

Some Thoughts on Avoiding Capital Gains

Now that Congress has extended the 15% tax rate on long-term capital gains and most ordinary dividends through 2010, you might feel that avoiding capital gains is no longer a critical issue. It still is, however.

Most states levy a capital gains tax. Generally the rates are about 5% (although some are zero and some are as high as 10%). Do you consider losing 20% of your capital to federal and state capital gains taxes meaningful?

The federal capital gains rate is 28% for collectibles. The Internal Revenue Code includes in its definition of collectibles: any work of art, any rug or antique, most metals, any gem, any stamp, and most coins. Combine the federal rate and state rate on long-term capital gains and you will be out-of-pocket about 33% of your capital when you sell a collectible.

The federal capital gains rates is 25% on the portion of the gain that is due to depreciation of real estate (because depreciation reduces your tax-cost basis). If you sell commercial or rental property, you could end up paying a combined federal and state capital gain rate of 30% on the amount depreciated.

The Legacy Society

The Legacy Society recognizes alumni and friends who have included the law school in their estate planning, whether through life-income gifts, trusts, wills, or recorded estate commitments, or have initiated some other deferred gift to the School of Law.

The bottom line is that you still stand to lose from one-fifth to one-third of your capital when you sell an asset for which you must report long-term capital gains on your income tax returns.

Donating a long-term capital gain asset outright to the Case Western Reserve University School of Law, however, is completely free of capital gains taxes. And, if you donate stock or real estate, you can deduct 100% of that asset's market value on your federal income tax return. Note, however, if you donate collectibles, your deduction may be limited to your cost. It depends on whether the School of Law can use your donation to further its teaching purposes.

The point is you are recognized for having donated 100% of your asset value and you avail yourself of an income tax deduction. When you do the math, the combination of tax avoidance and tax deduction can save you a considerable amount.

Example: John, an Ohio resident, donates $100,000 in appreciated securities that cost him $50,000. He avoids paying combined federal and Ohio long-term capital gains taxes equal to 22.5% of $50,000, or $11,250. He deducts $100,000 from his federal income taxes which saves him $33,000 because his normal income tax rate is 33%. John's total savings is $44,250 so his out-of-pocket donation is $55,750. Yet the School of Law credits him for and actually uses $100,000, the full amount of his donation.

In addition to the advantages of avoiding capital gains and taking an income tax deduction, donating a long-term capital gain asset as a planned gift to the Case Western Reserve University School of Law has one additional advantage: income for you. But that's a story for another article. Until then, if wish to consider donating an appreciated asset to the School of Law and have questions, please do not hesitate to call the Office of Development and Alumni Affairs at 216-368-4495 or 800-492-3308 or visit http://www.case.edu/development/planned.

SEND US YOUR NEWS

Stay in touch with the law school and fellow alumni! We welcome submissions for inclusion in Class Notes. Send us your news via e-mail to lawalumni@case.edu; online at http://law.case.edu/alumni; or mail to Editor, In Brief, Case Western Reserve University School of Law, 11075 East Boulevard, Cleveland, Ohio 44106-7148.

It is with heavy hearts that we say goodbye to Daniel L. Ekelman, a dear friend and colleague, who displayed an unwavering commitment to those things about which he cared greatly. He was dedicated to Case Western Reserve University School of Law; he was passionate about his practice; and he proved to be one of the most influential leaders in Calfee, Halter & Griswold LLP's 103-year history.

A native Clevelander, Ekelman graduated from Case Western Reserve University School of Law in 1952 and was inducted into the Order of the Coif. As he worked to establish himself in his legal career, Ekelman always remembered his alma mater. No job too big or too small, Ekelman served as a telephone volunteer, reunion committee member, class agent, and an annual fund chair for the law school. He was a member of the Board of Governors of the Law Alumni Association and in 1989 was inducted into the Society of Benchers, which recognizes graduates of the law school who have especially distinguished themselves in their professions and their communities and have thereby brought honor to the law school. Since its establishment, the society and its individual members have been models of scholarship, leadership, and dignity for law students, younger members of the bar and the public. In 2001, Ekelman was awarded the prestigious Centennial Medal by the Law Alumni Association, the highest honor bestowed upon a graduate of the law school.

A consistent and substantial donor to the law school for 31 years, Ekelman's support was not limited to personal support. He helped Calfee establish the Edward G. Halter Scholarship in 1977, and in 1996 the generosity of Ekelman, Calfee, and special friends and family led to the creation of the Daniel L. Ekelman Scholarship. This support has enabled many talented law students to successfully complete their education at the School of Law.

In addition to Ekelman's contributions and recognitions associated with the law school, he also built a successful legal practice, beginning when he joined Calfee in 1952. Ekelman excelled in practicing law and distinguished himself as a highly skilled corporate counselor, with a special expertise in mergers and acquisitions, as well as hospital governance and finance, earning him a ranking in Best Lawyers in America.

He practiced law with an enthusiasm and dedication that brought him and the firm success. But it was Ekelman's contributions to Calfee's growth and development as a business that led him to be known as the architect of Calfee as a modern firm. As Administrative Partner on the firm's first Executive Committee beginning in 1967, during his tenure as Chair of the Executive Committee from 1978 to 1984, and even after his retirement from the firm in 1995, Ekelman's keen insights and business acumen served the firm well. He strengthened the finance and accounting department by hiring a Certified Public Accountant as Controller; he added a full-time legal recruiter; and he established the firm's first Compensation Committee.

A consistent and substantial donor to the law school for 31 years, Ekelman's support was not limited to personal support. He helped Calfee establish the Edward G. Halter Scholarship in 1977, and in 1996 the generosity of Ekelman, Calfee, and special friends and family led to the creation of the Daniel I. Fkelman Scholarship

An innovative manager and passionate believer in helping Calfee grow while remaining independent, Ekelman's commitment to Northeast Ohio businesses and entrepreneurs enabled Calfee to thrive even during turbulent economic times. Ekelman's steady hand and practical, down-to-earth counsel to both clients and attorneys within the firm were equally invaluable. Even when his official leadership role was concluded, he continued providing valuable guidance to Calfee's leadership team and to many others who followed him.

Ekelman contributed so much to Case Western Reserve University, to Calfee and to Northeast Ohio; his insight, support, and kind words will be missed greatly. He was trusted and respected by his clients, and he was an inspiration to all who worked with him. We thank Dan Ekelman and with sincere gratitude appreciate the foresight he provided to Calfee, his counsel to colleagues, and his contributions to our community. His legacy is one from which all can continue to learn.

ALUMNI

Alumni donors are listed by class, with a summary of number of donors in each class, total dollars raised, and the percentage of participation for each class. Matching gifts, if appropriate, are included with a donor's personal gift to determine club membership. For example, a donor who contributes $250, and whose employer contributes a matching gift of $250, qualifies for inclusion in the Friend Donor Club through a total gift of $500.

Donor Clubs

The School of Law established the Donor Club Program to recognize those donors whose generous support of the Annual Fund demonstrates a special commitment to the law school. Membership is listed in this Honor Roll and on the Annual Fund Donor Club display in the Gray Family Law Rotunda in the School of Law.

We have tried to ensure that these very important contributions to the School of Law are reported accurately. If you notice an error, please notify the Office of Development and Public Affairs, School of Law, Case Western Reserve University School of Law, 11075 East Boulevard, Cleveland, Ohio 44106, (216) 368-3308, tollfree at (800) 492-3308, or by e-mail at inbrief@case.edu.

LAW FIRM GIVING CHALLENGE

Case Western Reserve University School of Law has been broadening its appeal on a national and international level, and has increased applications by 130% since 1997. Many of the students we draw to Cleveland choose to stay in our city, serving as a vital resource for law firms in the area. Because of our significant role in the local legal community, members of Northeast Ohio law firms are generous in their support of our Law Firm Giving Challenge. Established in 1999, the Law Firm Giving Challenge encourages our alumni at these firms to contribute to the law school Annual Fund. This year, the twenty-five firms that participated raised 16% of our total Annual Fund, making a significant difference for the law school. We would like to thank our representatives at each law firm for their leadership and commitment to Case Western Reserve University School of Law.

We would like to extend our appreciation to the following firms:

The School of Law would like to extend a special thanks to all alumni, donors and friends who volunteer their time and efforts to assist the school in achieving its mission. These volunteers serve the school in various important ways, from sitting on the Leadership Gifts Committee or the Visiting Committee, serving on the board of the Law Alumni Association, or donating their time in various ways such as: assisting the Career Services Office by participating in practice interviews and workshops or encouraging employers to hire our graduates; volunteering to participate with student organizations, moot court programs, or Student Bar Association activities; and aiding the school's admissions efforts by encouraging prospective students to consider applying to Case Western Reserve University or presenting at an open house program.

Your individual volunteer efforts provide a leadership example for others. Thank you!
