Beethoven Sonata No. 3 for Cello and Piano, Op. 69

The sonata in A Major, Op. 69 dates from the particularly bountiful years following the onset of the composer's so-called middle period. Written in 1807-8, the sonata was published the following year as part of a package Beethoven had sold to Breitkpof and Hartel. The A Major sonata is notable for being the only sonata to possess a Scherzo. Following the broad-scaled first movement, the Scherzo features a syncopated rhythmic pattern and a trio that incorporates lyrical double stops in the cello. The allegro finale is preceded by an Adagio introduction, whose tunefulness gives it the character of a truncated slow movement.

Barber Sonata No. 1 in C minor, Op. 6

Written in 1932, the early cello sonata shows Barber's more mellow, lyric side, with a remarkable theme in rising minor sixth opening the work. An important part of this sonata's design is the telescoping of the inner slow and Scherzo movements into one. The two outer movements are in set forms; the first is a sonata arrangement with lines that sing in a traditional manner, and a heart-easing second subject that emerges almost disarmingly from the turbulent first group. The last movement consists of a series of connected variations on a theme, though it is not so titled, with exceedingly tight-knit construction. The sections unfold with no recapitulation material. There is more than a hint of Slav colouring about the ornate melodic cast and insistent rhythms of the finale.

Schumann Fantasy Pieces (Fantasiestucke), Op. 73

Originally written for Clarinet and Piano in 1849, the Fantasiestucke was later transcribed for violoncello and piano. This three movement work contains extended passages in which the piano duplicates the cello part, following it high and low through chromatic, melodic, and rhythmic movement. The doubling of the melody by the piano is a very characteristic trademark of Schumann's style.
