Notes

Requiem

The Requiem offered here resembles nothing of the great works of the same name by Mozart, Britten or Verdi. Instead, the violinist and pianist are set in differing environments from the very beginning, and though they may seem to work in tandem, there is often one or two elements of style that seem askew. For instance, dynamics schemes are often juxtaposed against one another - one player might be growing and receding organically while the other is meticulously executing a carefully constructed terrace scheme. There are only two "ideas" in the piece which are both haphazardly realized and then presented, though mutated in retrograde as the piece was conceived as a palindrome. I knew Matteo was not planning on programing any Baroque music, so to poke fun at Herr Bach and his cohorts, the opening and closing line in the violin limps around like the badly written bariolage it is, and there are a number of moments of three and four voice counterpoint that might encourage the old master to roll over in his grave.
