WHERE HEYS DO WELL

By Vincent Lee)

Lately I have been a number of times at a farm where a young man and his wife are doing well with poultry in connection with their butter-making business. There are some 30 head of cattle in the place and dairying is supposed to be the leading industry; but it looks as if first you know, the poultry end of it will get big enough to claim first place.

They now have some 250 hens with as many more last spring's pullets about ready to lay. The last day I was there the young man told me they were getting, around 10 dozen eggs a day. The young man himself takes care of the birds, and he is all upset if they do not get their ration at just such a time and in the way he has marked out. When the other work on the place presses however, the young wife steps out and feeds and waters them, so far as I can see just as well as her husband, from whom she has received her training in the poultry business,

There are two poultry houses on this farm, each 100 feet in length. One has a cement floor, and the other earth with gravel top. It is only a few years ago that the only house on the place was a little one, 20 feet long, and the stock was the common, everyday farm breed; but now there are only well-bred White Leghorns to be seen there. The market for this farm is New York and the eggs are shipped white strictly fresh. Having had some experience in stockeeping before coming on the farm, the young man understands the necessity of getting eggs to market just as soon and in just as attractive condition as prosible afaer they are laid. The small exes, what there are of them, are sold to the local dealer, or eaten at home.

The opportunities for farm poultry keeping most all over this country are good. It would bring in a good deal of ready money and at the same time furnish the fertilizer for the place.

The friend who took the doub barrel shot gun from the News other during the past year, he requested to return it. The edit or is likely to be in dire need of it at any time if Isidor Jacobs, president of the anlifornia Cannerer Company, has just completed an investigation of the underlying causes of the unprecendented prosperity now being enjoyed by the United States. It is his firm conviction after going! into the matter thoroughly, that the present degree of prosperity does not spring from war causes but from basic financial and economic conditions in this country that will become more apparent after the war than they are now.

Among the causes operating here to create a good business condition is the federal reserve act, which has specified in all parts of the country to free business from the debressing influence of private individuals, groups and interests that formerly controlled the money and eredit of the country.

It is intimated that the American industrial commission, 12 members of which have recently returned from a study of conditions in Ettrope, will urse in its report, that American manufacurers and merwhants prepare for a vast trade with Europe when the war is over-
