From the SPNHA Review Editor,

The 2018 issue of the SPNHA Review has quite different but important themes from each of our five authors, ranging from juvenile justice policy, to affordable housing, interdisciplinary health care, community engagement, and design issues in assisted living. Each author presents a perspective on a current policy or issue of concern to our own society and, indeed, across the world.

As editor, I rely on the careful review of potential articles by our faculty members most expert in the content of the article. So many thanks to them for taking the time to prepare their reviews and comments. I have also benefited from the expert attention and advice from Dr. Neal Buckwalter, who has joined me as an associate editor, ensuring another set of eyes and perspectives on the nominated articles in the selection process and in the final edits of each paper. I also found gratifying the positive responses of our former students, now alumnae, to further edit their original papers to meet the publication standards for the journal articles, and for including their bios and photos for the publication as well. Much of the layout and preparation for publication rests on Lindsey Bair, who works closely with our printer, GLPSI, to get the SPNHA Review ready for publication.

And, finally, thanks to Dr. Salvatore Alaimo for arranging for these authors to present their research at a Brown Bag event at the Johnson Center in early December.

So as you can see, this SPNHA Review is the work of many in our School. I hope that readers find it a strong addition to the fields in which they work, which will lead to reflections and conversations about their implications for the future. While the SPNHA Review seeks to serve the professionals in public service in Public Administration, Philanthropy and Nonprofit Leadership and Health Administration, these are topics that will reach far beyond our sectors.

We welcome your feedback related to this issue.
