After extended negotiations with Frederick III, the crown of Hungary was returned to the kingdom on 24 July 1463. However, Matthias delayed his coronation until after his successful campaign in Bosnia, where he captured some 60 castles and virtually divided the country between himself and the sultan. The invitation to the coronation diet went out in January 1464 for Palm Sunday (25 March), in Székesfehérvár, but did not begin until 29 March. The traditional coronation decree, confirming the ancient privileges, contained this time a number of additional points, mostly favorable to the estates who were able to use the king's need for financial and military support. The compromise included the king's acquiescing in the barons' and prelates' right to control the chancery in return of the estates' granting him free hand in finances.

In return, the diet agreed to mount a force (a horse for every 10 portae) and to pay additional subsidies for the continuation of the war. A royal command to Co. Heves, containing these decisions, dated the same day as the decree (but not issued in privilegial form, for it was of temporary validity), survived in one original, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], p. 152-55.

MSS.: Two originals on eight and six folios, respectively, one sealed with violet seal pendant (MNL OL DI 15678/1), the other's seal is lost (MNL OL DI 15678/2).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search
--

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), t 1: 342-59; DRH Matth., pp. 142-59.

LIT.: Vilmos Fraknói, Matthias Corvinus, König von Ungarn (1458-1490) (Freiburg i. Brsg.: Herder, 1891), pp. 103-15; György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), pp. 253-54, 262; András Kubinyi, "Stände and Staat in Ungarn in der zweiten Hälfte des 15. Jahrhunderts," Bohemia 31 (1990): 312-25; repr. in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 292-307.

6 APRILIS 1464

\Commissio propria domini regis.

Mathias Dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Gallitie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex universis Christi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris, presentium notitiam habituris salutem in omnium salvatore.

Cum laudabilis felixque sit res publica illa, in qua bene institute leges dominantur, decet igitur reges et principes, in quorum manibus populorum urbiumque ius est, non modo armis populum sibi creditum fortiter tueri, sed etiam in iuribus, libertatibus et constitutionibus utilibus conservare.

Proinde ad universorum notitiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod prelati et barones regni nostri ac nobiles potiores, qui ad concludendum in negotiis regni nostri in congregatione generali, quam hiis diebus pro felici coronatione nostra in Alba Regali celebravimus, deputati fuerant, accedentes nostrum regium in conspectum, necessitatibus illis, quibus hoc regnum nostrum nunc urgeretur, per omnia declaratis, exhibuerunt nobis quedam privilegia condam excellentissimorum principum dominorum Lodovici regis Hungarie ac Sigismundi imperatoris Romanorum et similiter regis Hungarie etc. predecessorum nostrorum felicium recordationum decreta et instituta eorundem et dicti regni nostri continentia, ac insuper quosdam articulos, quos ipsi prelati, barones et nobiles regni nostri in predicta congregatione pro communi utilitate et pace denuo fecissent, supplicantes unanimiter maiestati nostre, ut eadem et eosdem acceptare, et approbare ac de verbo ad verbum transsumi facere et simulcum libertatibus et institutionibus in eisdem conscriptis, ac etiam simulcum decreto condam potentissimi domini Andree regis per ipsum dominum Lodovicum in huiusmodi suo privilegio confirmato auctoritate nostra regia innovantes pro utilitate regni nostri perpetuo duratura et valituros stabilire et confirmare, confirmataque observare dignaremur. Quorum quidem privilegiorum, unius videlicet dicti domini Lodovici regis tenor talis est:

Lodovicus etc. [DECRETUM LODOVICI I REGIS 11 DECEMBRIS ANNO 1351]

Alterius vero, scilicet annotati domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis tenor sequitur in hec verba:

Sigismundus etc. [DECRETUM SIGISMUNDI REGIS 8 MARTII ANNO 1435]

Articuli autem prenotati hanc continent formam:

I. Primo, quod nos hoc regnum nostrum Hungarie et omnes eius ad idem pertinentes incolas in omnibus et singulis bonis et antiquis libertatibus, consuetudinibus et iuribus, quibus hoc regnum utebatur temporibus predecessorum nostrorum, conservabimus et tenebimus, et quod decreta condam dominorum Lodovici et Sigismundi regem simulcum decreto domini Andree similiter regis per ipsum dominum Lodovicum regem confirmato confirmabimus et cum hiis infrascriptis articulis observabimus.

II. Item quia novimus nos et noverunt omnes domini prelati et barones nostri, novit etiam tota communitas regni, quomodo et qualiter propter indebitam custodiam et provisionem sacre corone ipsa corona fuit ab hoc regno alienata, in cuius alienatione irrecuperabilia dampna et indicibilia spolia et multas incomoditates hoc regnum passum est, et tandem post multos labores et fatigas et graves expensas ipsa corona ex pecuniis communitatis regni novissime est redempta, nos ergo volumus et debemus de pari consensu et voluntate dominorum prelatorum et baronum et regni nostri nobilium hoc in loco providere circa debitam custodiam et conservationem ipsius corone sacre locum alias consuetum et personas ad id idoneas, ne, quod Deus avertat, ipsa corona iterato ab hoc regno alienetur.

III. Preterea quod nos aliquem vel aliquos ex regnicolis sine prelatorum consilio et baronum regni nota seu crimine infidelitatis dampnare non valeamus.

IV. Breves etiam evocationes de cetero pro nullis actibus et commissis fierent, ex parte tamen iam evocatorum fieret iudicium secundum contenta litterarum evocatoriarum.

V. Ceterum omnes quatuor octave annuatim celebrentur, excepto casu, quo contingeret fieri exercitum generalem per omnes regnicolas; et si etiam nos in factis et negotiis regni particularibus extra Budam occuparemur octave non prorogentur. Iudices quoque maiores sive ordinarii pariter cum eorum vices gerentibus in celebratione huiusmodi octavarum interesse semper tenerentur. Deinceps quoque evocationes cum insinuatione ad ipsas octavas fierent, in quibuscunque negotiis et factis post obitum condam domini Alberti regis illatis et perpetratis, que etiam evocationes cum insinuatione possent emanari sub sigillis omnium iudicum ordinariorum regni nostri.

VI. Prorogationes autem nostre temporibus ipsarum octavarum nemini suffragari valerent, nisi solum illis, qui castra in confinibus regni et signanter in regno Bozne tenerent, vel qui essent eotunc occupati in bello, aut qui progredierentur in legationibus nostris et regni nostri per provincias extraneas. Et si aliqui sub forma alterius istorum trium articulorum limitatorum prorogationes sibi acquirerent et ita non occuparentur in penis alias in talibus fieri solitis, hoc est in emenda lingue convincerentur.

VII. In facto vero interemptionis nobilium et occupationis possessionum ablationis litterarum et litteralium instrumentorum domorumque et curiarum nobilium, ubi personaliter residerent, invasionis nulla amplior in istis tribus articulis limitatis, nisi a tempore evocationis prime octave in tertiam octavam fieri possit prorogatio, nec ipsi occupati infra huiusmodi eis datam prorogationem cum aliquibus litigare valeant.

VIII. Si occupatus duos vel tres vel plures fratres indivisos haberet, quorum nomina in prorogatione exprimerentur et non occuparentur in rebus in dictis tribus articulis expressis, talibus non occupatis non observetur prorogatio, exceptis rebus factum possessionum et exhibitionem litterarum concernentibus.

Ille vero, qui occupatus fuerit in negotiis predictis cum eis condemnari non possit, qui in talibus non essent occupati.

IX. Sales extranei in regno nostro et confinibus regni nostri non vendantur sub pena ablationis eorundem, sed ubique sales nostri regales cursum habere debeant. Illorum autem possessiones et bona, qui ablationem huiusmodi salium extraneorum non paterentur, occupari debeant et teneri infra satisfactionem de dampnis nostris exinde secutis.

X. Omnia castella post obitum condam domini Alberti regis in hoc regno nostro constructa usque festum Penthecostes proxime venturum sub pena perpetue infidelitatis distraherentur, exceptis solummodo castellis que in partibus inferioribus contra incursus Thurcorum, ac que in comitatibus Bachiensi et de Bodrog et in aliis comitatibus regni nostri confinia tenentibus constructa essent, et etiam dempto castello Iohannis Thwz ac illis, que antiquis temporibus et etiam tempore condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris fuerunt castella, et tandem rupta et iterum in alio loco constructa essent, remaneant pro utilitate regni.

XI. Item quicumque a nobis donationem iuris regii super aliqua vel aliquibus possessionibus impetraverint in bonis aliorum, si bona impetrata iuri regis pertinere debere probare non posset, ac etiam litigantes, qui aliquo iure super bonis litigarent et bona huiusmodi suo iuri ordine iudiciario applicare non possent, propter indebitam inquietationem possessoris contra eundem possessorem in communi estimatione ipsorum bonorum convincantur.

XII. Omnium et singulorum bona, que a tempore obitus dicti condam domini Alberti regis per quoscumque minus iuste occupata essent, per eorum detentores infra octavum diem festi Nativitatis beati Iohannis Baptiste nunc venturi illis, quorum sunt, remittantur, et detentores vigore litterarum nostrarum vel aliorum iudicum ordinariorum per nostrum hominem et capituli aut conventus testimonium ad remittendum occupata bona ammoneantur, et si ammoniti non remitterent, evocentur cum insinuatione ad proxime futuras octavas; ex parte quorum fieret iudicium et iustitia sine prorogatione.

XIII. Regnum nostrum Sclavonie et partes Transsilvanie in omnibus antiquis bonis libertatibus, consuetudinibus et iuribus suis conserventur.

XIV. Viri seculares contra viros ecclesiasticos in nullo facto et lite seculari possent magis aggravari, quam viri ecclesiastici aggravarentur contra seculares.

XV. Tributum in una et eadem possessione in pluribus locis exigi non possit, sed in uno tantum loco, etiam possessoribus tributi quantumcunque inter se discordantibus. Et quod in omnibus locis tributorum tributum secundum antiquum modum exigeretur; facientes autem contrarium amitterent dominium tributi. Tributarii vias falsas nec in terris aliorum, nec extra antiquam consuetudinem custodire valeant; et propter non solutionem tributi quisquam impediri non possit extra metas possessionis, ubi tributum exigeretur. Nullum tributum vel vadum posset esse contra antiquam consuetudinem et legem regni nostri.

XVI. Convictorum hominum bona quoad portiones iudiciarias tam nos, quam iudices nostri ordinarii non aliter, nisi more alias consueto conferre valeamus aut valeant.

XVII. Item preter factum testamenti, matrimonii, dorum et rerum paraffernalium, periurii, verberationis et spoliationis clericorum et mulierum, et preter illas alias causas, que profane non essent, in foro spirituali nulla causa tractaretur.

XVIII. Et quod nos ad simplicem querimoniam aliquorum vel etiam in propriis factis nostris bona aliquorum occupare non faceremus, nisi prederet sufficiens cognitio cause secundum antiquam consuetudinem in talibus fieri solitam, et quod nos etiam factum nostrum regium ordine iuris prosequamur.

XIX. Si qui prothonotarium, vicepalatinum, banum, vicebanum, comitem vel vicecomitem, vel alias iudices ordinarios regni nostri tempore sedis iudicarie vel alias sine causa verberarent, interficerent aut captivarent, habita superinde probatione legitima, in nota et pena perpetue infidelitatis convincerentur.

XX. Et quia nonnulli essent ex regnicolis, quorum iura et litteralia instrumenta per inimicos et potentes ablata fuissent, igitur si tales ablationem huiusmodi iurium et litteralium instrumentorum ac id, quod ipsi et predecessores eorum in dominio bonorum et possessionum, quas tangerent littere ablate, pacifice perstitissent et ipsos concernerent, per vicinorum et commetaneorum suorum ac nobilium comprovincialium attestaciones comprobare possent, talibus omnibus nos huiusmodi bona sua titulo nove nostre donationis daremus et conferremus.

XXI. Item quod per omnes comitatus regni nostri fiat iudicium generale more aliis temporibus scilicet antiquis consueto.

XXII. Item quod nos faceremus cudere unam bonam monetam in lega et pondere monete condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris, que curreret per totum dominium nostrum vita nostra comite sine aliqua permutatione et haberet duos obulos, et huiusmodi moneta nostra in cunctis censibus lucri camere et decimis ubique recipiatur.

XXIII. Et quod nos omnes donationes predecessorum nostrorum regum et nostras proprias super quibusvis bonis et possessionibus factas exceptis donationibus condam domini Ladislai regis et etiam nostris, quas de lucro camere, quinquagesima, tricesimis et proventibus marturinalibus cuiquam fecissemus aut fecissent confirmare debeamus. Teneatur autem quilibet omnes litteras donacionales condam domini Ladislai regis, immediati predecessoris nostri et etiam nostras a prima die Aprilis infra revolutionem unius integri anni ad confirmationem reportare. Si qui vero non reportarent, littere eorum non maneant in vigore.

XXIV. Decime solvantur in omnibus et singulis comitatibus secundum modum quo unusquisque cum prelato suo superinde haberet vel fecisset, aut deinceps faceret dispositionem, in quarum exactione et solutione teneretur dispositio et decretum annotati domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis. Ita tamen, quod si ad requisitionem dicatoris decimarum rusticus iuraret et dicator huiusmodi iurato crederet, non amplius, nisi iuxta iuramentum iurantis dicare valeat. Et ubi iurato rustico dicator non crederet, liberam acervum examinandi habeat facultatem, qui si plus invenerit, superfluitatem auferre valeat; si autem iuxta verbum rustici repertum fuerit, pro indebita revisione acervi unus florenus auri per dicatorem rustico solvatur quem si dicator solvere recusaret rusticus auferre valeat equum dicatoris.

XXV. Diebus dominicis et in festivitibus beate Marie virginis in hoc regno nostro et eius partibus nullum forum celebretur, exceptis dumtaxat propter bonas causas foris dominorum archiepiscopi Colocensis et episcopi Waradiensis, que in aliquibus bonis eorum celebrantur.

XXVI. Cusores falsarum monetarum et florenorum ac falsificatores eorundem publice infamati habita prius debita superinde revisione per barones regni nostri puniantur condigna pena.

XXVII. Quicumque ex regnicolis salvum conductum nostrum infringeret prius recognita causa tales et non domini talium in nota et pena perpetue infidelitatis convincantur.

XXVIII. Postremo si tempore exercitus vel alias quocumque aliqui in domibus et curiis nobilium aut personarum ecclesiasticarum preter voluntatem eorum descenderent aut ecclesias confringerent, tales evocentur ad octavas cum insinuatione, ex parte quorum si agens voluerit non aliter, nisi mediante via communis inquisitionis impenderetur iudicium et iustitia. Similiter et ex parte illorum, qui tempore exercitus facerent dampna, pro ablatione rerum tale iudicium impendatur.

Unde nos ad supplicationem prefatorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium regni nostri annotatis privilegiis et decretis iam factorum dominorum Lodovici regis ac Sigismundi imperatoris et similiter regis, necnon et articulis premissis quos iidem prelati, barones et nobiles denuo fecissent, acceptis et susceptis, eadem et eosdem presentibus litteris nostris de verbo ad verbum transsumpta et insertos, quia in utilitatem regni nostri et pro totius eiusdem rei publice tranquillitate facta et dispositi esse videntur, simul cum omnibus libertatibus et institutionibus in eisdem conscriptis, ac etiam simulcum decreto prenotati domini Andree regis per dictum dominum Lodovicum regem confirmato approbamus et ratificamus, ac innovantes perpetue duratura et valituros confirmamus, nosque omnia in eisdem contenta cum moderatione articulorum predictorum observaturos obligamus presentis scripti nostri patrocinio mediante.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes litteras nostras pendentis et autentici duplicis sigilli nostri munimine roboratas duximus concedendas

Datum per manus reverendissimi in Christo patris, domini Stephani Colocensis et Bachiensis ecclesiarum canonice unitarum archiepiscopi, locique eiusdem Colocensis comitis perpetui, aule nostre summi cancellarii, fidelis nostri sincere dilecti, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo sexagesimo quarto, octavo Idus Aprilis, regni nostri anno septimo, coronationis vero primo, venerabilibus in Christo patribus dominis Dyonisio de Zeech cardinali Strigoniensi, eodem domino Stephano Colocensi archiepiscopis, Ladislao Agriensis, Iohanne Waradiensis, Nicolao Transsilvaniensis, Zagrabiensi sede vacante, Iohanne Quinque Ecclesiensis, Alberto Wesprimiensis, Augustine Iaurinensis, Vincentio Vaciensis, Alberto Chanadiensis, Thoma Nitriensis, Boznensi sede vacante, Urbano Sirmiensis, Marco Tininiensis, Segniensi sede vacante, Nicolao Modrusiensis ecclesiarum episcopis ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item magnificis Michaele Orzag de Guth regni nostri Hungarie predicti palatino, Emerico de Zapolya regni Bozne gubernatore, Nicolao de Wylak et Iohanne Pangracz de Dengeleg wayuodis Transsilvanis, comite Ladislao de Palocz iudice curie nostre, eodem Emerico de Zapolya Dalmatie et Croatiae necnon Sclavonie regnorum nostrorum et prefato Nicolao de Wylak Machoviensi banis, honore banatus Zewriniensis vacante, Iohanne de Rozgon thavarnicorum, Benedicto de Thwroc z ianitorum, Andrea Pongracz de prefata Dengeleg pincernarum Stephano de Peren et Ladislao de Bathor dapiferorum, Paulo de Dombo et Ladislao de Wesen agazonum nostrorum regalium magistris, Andrea Pawmkyrher comite Posoniensi aliisque compluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

6 APRIL, 1464

At the king's own command.

Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania and Bulgaria¹ [sends] greetings in the name of the Savior of all to all Christians, both those living and to come, who take notice of these presents.

Because that commonwealth is praiseworthy and fortunate wherein the rule of law is well-established, it therefore befits kings and rulers who hold in their hands the legal rights of peoples and cities not only to defend courageously with arms the people entrusted to them, but also to preserve them in their rights, freedoms, and beneficial laws.²

We therefore wish all to have notice by these presents that the kingdom's prelates, barons, and distinguished nobles, who were elected to be present at the general assembly which convened recently by reason of our happy coronation, so that they might deliberate on the kingdom's affairs, presented themselves to our royalty. They declared publicly the needs presently felt in our kingdom and pointed out to us some of the charters of our predecessors of happy memory, the once illustrious ruler, lord Louis, king of Hungary, and lord Sigismund, Holy Roman Emperor and similarly king of Hungary, which contain the laws and ordinances of these kings and of our said kingdom. They also presented certain articles, for the common good and peace, which the same prelates, barons, and nobles of our kingdom had newly prepared in the aforesaid assembly. They unanimously beseeched our royalty to accept those charters and articles, to sanction them and to have them copied verbatim; and that all those freedoms, and decrees included in them, together with the decree of the once powerful King Andrew³ which were confirmed by the same lord Louis' charter be reaffirmed by our royal authority and by reaffirming be perpetuated and continuously upheld by us so that they may endure and remain in force forever for the good of the kingdom. The content of those privileges, as stated in the decree of the aforementioned lord King Louis is as follows:

Louis, etc.⁴

¹The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of "kingdoms" that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, "Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources" in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

²The arenga elaborates on the arma et leges topos of Justinian's laws. Cf. Cicero, Pro Milone 11: silent enim leges inter arma...; Albinovanus Pedo, Ad Liviam 185 (= Livy 34.6.6.). The Ciceronian formulation became a commonplace in Latin literature (cf. August Otto, Die Sprichwörter der Römer, Leipzig: Teubner, 1890, p. 192); what is notable is the clear correspondence of the present text with Cicero, suggesting direct knowledge of the Ciceronian oration.

³ 1222.

⁴ See 1351.

And the other, namely that of the said King and Emperor Sigismund, follows in these words:

Sigismund, etc.⁵

And the said articles have these words:

1 First, that we shall protect and maintain our kingdom of Hungary and all of its inhabitants in all those rights and freedoms, customs and laws, singly and collectively, which this kingdom made use of in the time of our predecessors. And that we shall reaffirm the decrees of the late kings Louis and Sigismund along with the decrees of former King Andrew which were confirmed by King Louis and that we shall uphold them together along with the following articles.

2 Then, since we know, as do all of our prelates, barons and the entire community of the realm, by which means and which manner our Holy Crown came to be taken from the kingdom, that with its passage to foreigners this kingdom has suffered irreparable and unspeakable ravages and considerable inconvenience, and that finally this same crown has been redeemed only recently, after much toil, effort, and substantial expenditure of public monies.

We therefore, ought and wish with the unanimous consent and will of our lord prelates and barons and our kingdom's nobles, to provide here a specially designated place and suitable personnel for the necessary guarding and care of the Holy Crown, so that this crown may never again – may God save us from it – be taken from this kingdom.⁶

3 Furthermore, that we may not without the counsel of the kingdom's prelates and barons arrest any gentleman of the realm for the crime or offense of the charge of infidelity.⁷

4 Short summons in addition, may not be given for any action or offense, but for a person summoned, judgment should be given according to the contents of the letter of summons.⁸

⁵ See 1435/I.

⁶ The reference is to the theft of the Holy Crown from Visegrád in 1440 by Queen Elisabeth's lady-in-waiting, Helene Kottanerin (see Die Denkwürdigkeiten der Helene Kottanerin, Karl Mollay, ed., Vienna: Bundesverlag, 1971. (A passage of this memoir was translated into English by M. C. Bijvoet, "Helene Kottaner: The Austrian Chambermaid," in Katharina M. Wilson, ed. Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation, Athens, Ga.: Univ. of Georgia Press, 1987, pp. 327-49). It having remained in the hands of Frederick III and was not only used as a political tool against Matthias but finally costing the country several castles and a sum of 80 000 gold florins in ransom. The guard of the coronation jewels was reorganized only after Matthias's times, see Kálmán Benda, Erik Fügedi, Tausend Jahre Stephanskrone, (Budapest: Corvina, 1988) pp. 77-103.

⁷ Cf. 1446:6; 1458:38. The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property, defined in detail in 1462: 2) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates.

⁸ Short summons to the thirtieth day, regardless of the sessions of octave courts, of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast, such as Epiphany on 6 January, St. George's on 23 April, St. James's on 25 July, and Michaelmas on 29 September, lasting 30–40 or more

5 In the future all four seasonal octave courts must be held annually except in the event of a general levy of all inhabitants of the kingdom. And if we are engaged in our kingdom's specific affairs and business outside of Buda, the four octave courts must not be postponed. When such octave courts are held, the superior judges and judges ordinary must also be present along with their substitutes.⁹ In regard to the acts and offenses committed and done after the death of the late King Albert, henceforth terminal summons are to be issued to the octave courts. These terminal summons may be issued under the seal of any judge ordinary of our kingdom.¹⁰

6 As for our granting any postponements at those octave courts, none may enjoy them except those who are in the fortified border sites notably those who maintain castles in the kingdom of Bosnia or those who at that time are engaged in war or those who are representing the crown or the kingdom on a diplomatic mission in a foreign kingdom. And those who acquire a postponement by claiming to come under one of these three precisely described conditions but are not occupied thus, should be convicted in their fine of the tongue.¹¹

7 In cases in which nobles are killed, property is occupied by force, deeds and documents are taken away, and in which the homes and courts of nobles are attacked, no further postponement for any of the three specified reasons can be granted, except a postponement from the first to the third octave. Nor may those persons who enjoy such a prorogation take action against anyone else during the period of postponement.¹²

8 If the person who is thus engaged has two, three or more brothers with undivided property and their names appear in the letter of postponement whereas they are not engaged in any of the days. Were opposed by the nobility. On the other hand, the many reasons that hindered the regular observance of four octaves made such swift administration of justice necessary, and it was, in fact, gradually accepted even by its opponents, see e.g., 1471:28 and 1474:12, 15

⁹ Cf 1447:14 and 1458: 42. It is significant that the decree specifies the need to hold the royal court sessions regardless of the king's presence in the capital.

¹⁰ Terminal summons, issued after the serving of summons and then summons pronounced on three fairs, were introduced in 1443:2 and 25, but it was not specified which court was to issue them. It is assumed that until 1464 terminal summons were authorized only by the keeper of the king's judicial seal; this was here expanded to all the justices ordinary of the realm. By specifying the time period since the death of King Albert this article implies (as do some others, e. g., Artt. 10, 12 below) that between 1439 and 1458—during which time a double election took place, civil war waged, and a minor king ruled—a kind of ex-lex obtained in the kingdom.

¹¹ Cf. 1351:25, 1439:29, 30, 32 and 1458:42. The fine usual for certain procedural trespasses, such as unfounded litigation, unsubstantiated excuses, and so on, amounted to 100 gold florins and the suspension of the case, and was called fine of the tongue (emenda lingue) a judicial fine for procedural faults, causing the suspension of the trial. Until the culprit paid the fine, his ability to sue at court was suspended, "his tongue tied").

¹² This seems to be a unique and unusual stipulation, not contained in similar laws about prorogation (e. g., 1471:28, 1486:6), for it was in fact quite frequent that extension of terms was granted when a party had to attend to other legal matters.

three specified ways, the latter do not qualify for postponement, except in matters concerning property and the presentation of documents.

However, the person engaged in one of the aforementioned occupations may not be tried together with those who are not similarly engaged.

9 Salts of foreign countries may not be sold by anyone inside our kingdom or in its border areas under penalty of confiscation, but everywhere our own royal salts must be sold. As for those who do not permit such foreign salts to be confiscated, their properties and goods must be seized and held until they have made reparation for the damages they have caused us.¹³

10 All castles in our kingdom which were built after the death of the late King Albert must be demolished before next Pentecost Day¹⁴ under penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity. Exceptions are made for those castles which were built in the south against Turkish attacks and for those built in Bács and Bodrog counties, and in other border counties in our kingdom; excepted also is the castle of John Tuz¹⁵ as well as those castles which were built in earlier ages and also in the time of the late lord Emperor Sigismund, but were later destroyed and reconstructed elsewhere; these should remain for the welfare of the realm.

11 Then, those who request from us the bestowal of royal right to some estate¹⁶ and can not prove that the requested property does come under royal right, as well as those litigants who by some right attempt to claim someone else's property but cannot demonstrate their claims according to the law, these, because of the unjust disturbance of the possessors, are to be convicted in the common estimate of the said property.¹⁷

¹³ The salt monopoly was one of the major incomes of the crown, see István Draskóczy, "Salt Mining and Trade in Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages" in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18. At the time of this decree, it may have been almost half of all the regular revenue, amounting to more than 100 thousand gold florins; see János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter", in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987, pp. 347-87, here pp. 358-63. Cf. 1405/I:20; 1439:11 and 1458:10.

¹⁴ 20 May 1464.

¹⁵ John Tuz of Lak, royal treasurer in 1458-59, ban of Slavonia and Master of the Doorkeepers until 1470, had recovered the castles of Rakonok and Medvedgrad (Co. Somogy) in these times. The exemption referred obviously to Lak, built by John's father and counting as the family's own castle. John was a close friend of the royal family, which may explain the decision.

¹⁶ Royal right (ius regium) was an ambiguous term, apparently referring to royal claims to any estate which, though not actually possessed by the king, was assumed to belong to him in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. Actions were moved by or in the name of the crown against persons accused of "hiding royal rights" (celatores iurium regalium) i.e., allegedly usurping a royal claim.

¹⁷ Estimation of the value of immovable and movable property was usually done on the traditional basis (estimatio communis, see Tripartitum: I 133), but occasionally a tenfold (estimatio perennalis) valuation for immovable property was used. The low common estimation assured kinsmen's and even neighbors' and abutters' ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed

12 All and every estate unjustly seized after the aforesaid late King Albert's death must be returned to their rightful owners by the time of the octave of the feast day of St. John the Baptist.¹⁸ And the usurpers shall be warned by one of our men and one of a chapter or convent through a letter of ours or of one of the judges ordinary that they shall return the seized properties. And if they do not return them upon receipt of the warning letter, they have to receive terminal summonses to the next following octave court where judgment and justice will be given to them without postponement.¹⁹

13 Our kingdom of Slavonia as well as Transylvania will be protected in their traditional freedoms, customs and laws.

14 In secular trials of laymen against clergy, laymen may not be punished more severely than the clergy would be punished for offenses against laymen.²⁰

15 Tolls may not be collected in several locations on one and the same estate but only in one location, even if the owners of the toll do not agree with each other. And the toll must be collected in each customs place according to ancient tradition; those who act otherwise will lose their right to collect tolls. Toll collectors may not guard illegal routes either in the land of others or against ancient tradition; and they may not disturb anyone for nonpayment outside the estate where they have a right to collect tolls. No toll or ferry-fee may exist where it is against our kingdom's old customs or laws.²¹ on families having to pay the filial quarter in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation.

¹⁸ 1 July 1464.

¹⁹ Legal actions (summonses, inquests &c.) were usually executed by a royal bailiff (or the bailiff of one of the justices)—a nobleman from the county or, occasionally sent out from the court—and a witness of a place of authentication. These were members of cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35. On ocatvial courts and terminal summonses, see above, notes 10 and 8. Cf. also 1458:32.

²⁰ Cf. 1439:33, 1447:9.

²¹ The collection of road-tolls was regulated in several decrees from 1351:8, 15 onward, see, e.g., 1435/I:20-21; 1447:22. However, the stipulation of only one toll per estate is new here and the limitation of guarding the illegal routes (i.e., such routes as avoided legitimate tolls) is more elaborate than in earlier laws. On these matters, see Magdolna Szilágyi “Mobility, Roads and Bridges in Medieval Hungary” in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

16 Neither we nor our judges ordinary have the right to dispose of the property of convicted persons, as far as the portion given to judges is concerned, other than in the customary manner.²²

17 Then, the ecclesiastical courts must not try cases other than those of wills, marriages, dowries, and paraphernalia, perjury, assault or molestation of clergy or of women, and other cases which are not secular in nature.²³

18 And that we should not occupy anyone's property upon the simple complaint of individuals or in our own interest unless the appropriate legal review of the case has been carried out in accordance with the ancient custom appropriate in such instances, and that we shall try our own royal cases according to the order of the law.²⁴

19 Those who at the time of a trial or at any other time without due cause assault, kill or arrest a protonotary,²⁵ vice-palatine, ban, vice-ban, ispán or alispán or any of the kingdom's judges ordinary, upon lawful proof will be convicted and punished for perpetual taint of infidelity.²⁶

20 And since there are gentlemen of the realm whose rights and documents were seized by enemies and by powerful persons, if their neighbors, abutters, and the nobles living in that same county can testify that they lost their rights and documents and that they and their predecessors had been undisturbed owners of the estate and the property to which the seized documents refer, then we shall award these persons their estate as a new donation.²⁷

²² Cf. 1435/I:7 The king and the judges of the royal courts had the right to temporarily seize possessions in lieu of fines, and, consequently, grant these to others; Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899), p. 448.

²³ These cases were detailed in 1462:3.

²⁴ Cf. 1435/I:3 and its repetitions.

²⁵ Bónis (Jogtudó értelmiség, p. 292) suggests that the right word here should be palatinum, for he believed that the protonotaries, i.e., the learned judges of the higher courts, did not enjoy such extensive personal protection until later (see 1471:14), while the justices ordinary of the royal court did so at least since 1415—see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 402—and also 1462:2. On the other hand, the reference to the justices ordinary covers the palatine; hence, this would be tautological. Since the law extends protection also to the vicecomites, clearly less important judges than the protonotaries, Bónis's objection is at least debatable.

²⁶ Personal protection of judges (and other officers of the court: see also 1471:14) derived ultimately from the sacrosanct rights of the tribuni plebis of the Roman Republic, rights extended to (and claimed by) the Roman emperors in their civil and judicial capacities; see Theodor Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht ed. 3 (Leipzig: Hirzel, 1887) 2 301-306, 782; 948ff.; Mason Hammond, The Augustan Principate (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1968) pp. 79-87.

²⁷ Cf. 1447:13; the stipulation refers implicitly to what was called a common inquest, (inquisitio communis) a procedure for obtaining material proof. Abutters, neighbors, and other nobles from the county (comprovinciales) swore an oath on their faith and “fidelity to the Holy Crown” regarding the truth of their

21 Then, that in each county of our kingdom a public court of law should be maintained, particularly so since this is a very old custom.²⁸

22 Then, that we shall have good money minted, with the same grade and weight as the money of the late Emperor Sigismund which will remain current without any changes during our entire reign until the end of our day, and it should have the form of two obols; and this money must be accepted as payment of the chamber's profit and the tithes.²⁹

23 That we shall deign to confirm all gifts which our royal ancestors and we have conferred regarding property and estates (except for those donations which the late King Ladislas or we conferred from the chamber's profit, the fiftieth, the thirtieth and the income from the mardurina).³⁰ But everyone is required to present all letters of donation from the late King Ladislas, our immediate predecessor, as well as ours for confirmation within a calendar year beginning on the first day of April. As for those who do not present them, their letters of donation will not be in force.³¹ testimony, usually in matters of property rights. The inquest, as ordered by a higher court, was usually held where the disputed estate was located or the criminal act perpetrated. See Erik Fügedi, "Verba volant... Oral Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility" in Idem., Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary (London: Variorum, 1986), ch. VI.. On the meaning of donatio nova, which was a confirmation of ancient property, see József Illés, "A nova donatio jogi természeté" [Legal Character of nova donatio], in Notter Antal Emlékkönyv (Budapest: Szent István Társulat, 1941), pp. 634-44; now Pál Engel, "Nagy Lajos ismeretlen adományreformja" [An unknown reform of donations by Louis the Great] Történelmi Szemle 39 (1997), 137-58, repr. in: Idem, Honor, vár ispánság &c. [Honor, castle, ispán's office: Selected studies], ed. Enikő Csukovits (Budapest: Osiris, 2003) pp. 527-54.

²⁸ Counties held courts of law (called sedria, abbreviated from sedis iudiciaria), judging matters of local interest, mostly appeals from manorial courts ever since the thirteenth century. Presided over by the ispán (or usually the alispán), consisted of the noble magistrates (szolgabíró) and a notary.

²⁹ Matthias observed this law by minting good new money in three denominations between 1462 and 1464 (with the double cross on their reverse, see e.g., Corp. Num. Hung. Nos. C219, 220, 222), but their value began to deteriorate soon thereafter, so that a monetary reform became necessary in 1468, when new silver pennies (with the Madonna on them, see Ibid. No. 235 sqq.) were introduced and their exchange rate set at 100d for the florin. However, these were less valuable, and the treasury protected the enforced exchange rate between overvalued silver and devalued gold by controlling the silver coin emission. When, around 1480, this could not be maintained, the silver mint at Baia Mare was closed down; see András Kubinyi, "Wirtschaftsgeschichtliche Probleme in den Beziehungen Ungarns zum Westen am Ende des Mittelalters," in Westmitteleuropa—Ostmitteleuropa. Festschrift F. Seibt (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1992), pp. 170-74. Now see also: Márton Gyöngyössi, "King Matthias' Mint – the Great Monetary Reform," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008) pp. 285-7. Cf. 1427B, 1439:10, 1444:8, and 1458:9.

³⁰ These royal revenues included the direct tax called lucrum camerae, originally the king's profit from devaluing the coins; the thirtieth was a 5 % customs duties on export and import; the fiftieth a special tax of Transylvanian Romanians, and the mardurina that of inhabitants of Slavonia (originally rendered in marter pelts).

³¹ Cf. 1458:4. However, Matthias granted several exceptions to this measure with the clause non obstante... to his followers, see DRH Matth. p. 148, n. XXIII/2.

24 The tithe must be paid in each and every county by each person according to the agreement he had made or will make with his own prelate, and it must be exacted and paid in accordance with the ruling and decree of the said lord King and Emperor Sigismund,³² in the following manner: if the peasant swears an oath upon the request of the tithe assessor and the assessor believes the oath giver, then payment must be effected according to the oath given and not more than that. And if the assessor does not believe the peasant giving the oath, he may freely examine the stack and if he finds more than the sworn amount, he may confiscate the excess. But if he finds the same amount as the peasant swore to have, then the assessor must pay the peasant a gold florin for the needless examination. And if the assessor is reluctant to pay this, then the peasant has the right to confiscate the horse of the assessor.

25 On Sundays and on the feast days of the Blessed Virgin Mary there may be no fairs in any part of our kingdom; exception is granted, for good reason, to the lord Archbishop of Kalocsa and the lord Bishop of Oradea, for fairs held anywhere on their properties.³³

26 Minters of forged coins or florins or those who falsify money should be, after thorough investigation, suitably punished by the barons of the kingdom.³⁴

27 If any gentlemen of the realm interferes with our letter of safe conduct, he and not his master will be condemned after due legal inquiry for the crime of perpetual taint of infidelity.³⁵

28 Finally, those who at the time of a campaign or at any time billet in the dwellings and courts of nobles or ecclesiastics without their consent or who break into churches, must be cited to the octave court by terminal summons. Those summoned (if the accusers so wish) will be judged and given sentence only by common inquest. Likewise those who cause damages at the time of a campaign shall similarly be judged and sentenced for the theft of things.³⁶

³² Cf. 1411 and its predecessors as far back as the eleventh century. A detailed regulation of collecting the tithe in Co. Zala, referring to this article, also survived, MNL OL DI 45172. The tithing man's horse seems to have been a kind of security at the tithing. In general, see: Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed monograph on the issue is still missing.

³³ The prohibition of Sunday fairs goes back to St. Stephen (Stephen 1:7), even though the name of the day in Hungarian still refers to it as the day of the fair (vasárnap, from vásár=fair). The exemption granted the two bishops may have been a personal favor to the king's two most trusted counsellors, Archbishop Stephen (of Varda) of Kalocsa was one of the king's leading diplomats and Bishop John (Vitez of Sredna) of Oradea, his former tutor and his father's confidant.

³⁴ Cf. 1446:12 and 1462:2. The implication is that these crimes belong to the bench of the personal royal presence, a court that functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and it was led by the chancellor. After 1464, it was united with the court of the special personal presence, and became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary, the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff.

³⁵ Cf. 1462:2.

³⁶ This short summary of several earlier laws against damages caused by the levy (cf. 1405/II:1; 1435/II:6; 1454:8) simplifies somewhat the procedure in such lawsuits.

Therefore we, upon the entreaty of the aforesaid prelates, barons, and nobles of our kingdom, after receiving and accepting the said privileges and decrees of the stated lords King Louis and of Emperor and King Sigismund along with the above articles which these same prelates, lords, and nobles have newly prepared, have copied them and incorporated them word for word in these presents of ours since they appear to have been prepared and arranged for the benefit of our kingdom and for the peace of the entire commonwealth, with all the freedoms and rulings which they contain as well as the decrees of the aforesaid King Andrew and confirmed by the said lord King Louis, we approve and ratify them, and so that they might perpetually endure, we fully confirm them. And we pledge by the protection of these presents to observe all the contents in these texts, including the amendments in the aforementioned articles.

For the perpetual memory and confirmation of this, we have decided to grant these presents corroborated by affixing our pendant and authentic double seal.

Given by the hand of our most reverend father in Christ lord Stephen, archbishop of the canonically united bishoprics of Kalocsa and Bács and perpetual ispán of the county of Kalocsa, our loyal and esteemed chief chancellor of our court,³⁷ in the year of our Lord fourteen hundred and sixty-four, April sixth, the seventh year of our reign and the first year of our coronation. In the presence of the most reverend fathers and lords in Christ, Cardinal Dennis of Szécs of Esztergom³⁸ and the said lord Stephen of Kalocsa, archbishops; Ladislás of Eger³⁹, John of Oradea⁴⁰ and Nicolas of Transylvania⁴¹, bishops; the episcopal see of Zagreb in vacancy; John of Pécs⁴², Albert of Veszprém,⁴³ Augustin of Győr⁴⁴, Vincent of Vác⁴⁵, Albert of Csanád⁴⁶, Thomas of Nitra⁴⁷, bishops; the see of Bosnia vacant; Urban of Srem⁴⁸, Mark of Knin⁴⁹, bishops, Senj's seat being

³⁷ Várdai, Stephen (d. 1471) archbishop of Kalocsa 1456–71, high chancellor and secret chancellor 1464–71, cardinal 1467.

³⁸ Szécsi, Dennis (d. 1465) bishop of Nitra 1438–39, of Eger 1439–40, archbishop of Esztergom 1440–65, cardinal 1440, chancellor 1453–65.

³⁹ Hédervári, Ladislás (d. 1468) bishop of Eger 1447–68.

⁴⁰ Vitéz (of Sredna), John (d. 1472) bishop of Oradea 1445–65, archbishop of Esztergom 1465–72, secret chancellor 1453–64, high chancellor 1464–71.

⁴¹ Zapolya, Nicholas of (d. 1468) bishop of Transylvania 1461–68.

⁴² Csezmicsei, John (called Janus Pannonius, d. 1472) bishop of Pécs 1460–72, Neo-Latin poet.

⁴³ Vetési, Albert (d. 1486) bishop of Nyitra 1457–58, of Veszprém 1459–86.

⁴⁴ Salánki, Augustin (d. 1465) bishop of Győr 1447–65.

⁴⁵ Szilasi, Vincent (d. 1473) bishop of Vác 1450–73.

⁴⁶ Hangácsi, Albert (d. 1466) bishop of Cenad 1458–66.

⁴⁷ Himfi (of Döbrönte), Thomas (d. 1482) bishop of Nitra 1464.

⁴⁸ Urban, bishop of Srem 1464–68.

⁴⁹ Mark, bishop of Knin 1464–66.

vacant, and Nicolas of Modrus⁵⁰, bishops, who in good fortune govern God's churches. Then, the eminent Michael Ország of Gut, count palatine of our said Hungary⁵¹, Imre of Zapolya, governor of our kingdom of Bosnia⁵², Nicholas Újlaki⁵³ and John Pongrác of Dengeleg, voivodes of Transylvania⁵⁴, count Ladislas Pálóci, our judge royal⁵⁵, the same Imre of Zapolya, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia; the said Nicholas Újlaki, ban of Mačva; the office of ban vacant in Srem; John Rozgonyi, our Master of the Treasury⁵⁶; Benedict Turóci, of the Doorkeepers⁵⁷; the said Andrew Pongrác of Dengeleg, of our Butlers;⁵⁸ Stephen Perényi⁵⁹ and Ladislas Bátori⁶⁰, of the Stewards; Paul Dombói⁶¹ and Ladislas Versenyi⁶², of our Horse; Andrew Baumkircher, ispán of Pozsony⁶³, and many others holding our kingdom's honors and titles.

⁵⁰ Nicholas, bishop of Modrus 1464–80.

⁵¹ Ország (of Gút), Michael (d. 1484) master of the doorkeepers 1453–58, count palatine 1458–84.

⁵² Zapolya (a. k. a. Zápolya, Szapolyai), Imre of (d. 1487) chief treasurer 1459–64, governor of Bosnia, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1464–65, ispán of Spiš 1465, count palatine 1486–87.

⁵³ Újlak, Nicholas of (alias of Galgóc, son of ban Ladislas, d. 1477), ban of Mačva 1438–72, voivode of Transylvania 1441–65, king of Bosnia 1471–77.

⁵⁴ Pongrác (of Dengeleg), John (d. 1476) master of the stewards 1459–61, voivode of Transylvania 1462–76 (with interruptions).

⁵⁵ Pálóci, Ladislas (d. 1470) judge royal 1446–70.

⁵⁶ Rozgonyi, John (d. 1471) voivode of Transylvania 1450–61, master of the treasury 1459–70, judge royal 1470–71.

⁵⁷ Turóci (of Ludbreg), Benedict (d. 1465) master of the doorkeepers 1462–65.

⁵⁸ Pongrác (of Dengeleg), Andrew (fl. 1456–65) lord butler 1462–64.

⁵⁹ Perényi, Stephen (fl. 1450–89) master of the stewards 1461–65, master of the horse 1468–69, master of the treasury 1471–76.

⁶⁰ Bátori, Ladislas (d. 1466) master of the stewards 1464–66.

⁶¹ Dombói (or Dombai), Paul (fl. 1444–87) master of the horse 1460–64.

⁶² Versenyi, Ladislas of (fl. 1443–64), knight, royal castellan of Damásd 1458, master of the horse 1463–64.

⁶³ Baumkircher, Andreas (d. 1471) ispán of Pozsony Co. 1457–65.

REGISTER OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

(1467 [before 1 April])

Register attached to these presents)

[Reg 1467]

This fragmentary document survived as an enclosure to the king's letter sent 1 April 1467 to the counties Pozsony and Veszprem about a diet held from 21 February 1467 to late March. (The king's letter about new customs duties, decided at the same meeting, addressed to Košice and Prešov is dated 24 March, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], 169-71) The letter and the decree reflect an important step in Matthias's fiscal reform: the change of the old “chamber's profit” to a new direct tax, the “levy of the royal fisc.” This was not merely a change of name (which did not, in fact, become current) but rather an attempt at reducing the number of those who enjoyed exemption from the old tax. The decree's special interest lies also in the fact that it defines the term “nobleman” and imposes the tax on all those, who, according to the judgment of the time, were not “true nobles.” However, even though there were references to it in the administration of finances, it is not clear, whether it was meant to be a generally valid law, because—as the king himself admitted in a charter (exempting Andreas Baumkirchner and his family from paying the new tax)—“it has not been promulgated for perpetual validity ... and hangs in a way in uncertainty” (nondum perpetua editione publicatum sed aliquantulum quasi in incerto pendet, 28 May 1467, MNL OL DL. 100 776).

MSS.: a simple copy in a cartulary, Slovak Central Archives, Bratislava, Arch. cap. Poseniensis, Cod. No. 84, foll. 13r-14v; a paper transcript by the cathedral chapter of Veszprém of 25 April 1467, Episcopal Archives, Veszprém, Misc. 61. (film in MNL OL DF 200513).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich,, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 375-7; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 2: 182-7; Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779-1817), 15:208-11; Igatius Batthyany, Leges ecclesiastici regni Hungariae et provinciarum adjacentium. 3 vols. (Alba-Carolina: Typis episcopalibus, 1785–18270), pp. 504- 07; DRH Matth., pp. 165-68.

LIT.: LajosThallóczy, A kamara-haszna (lucrum camerae) története ... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary], (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879), pp. 94-96; András Kubinyi, “Die Statsorganisation der Matthiaszeit,”in: Idem, Matthias Corvinus (Herne: Schäfer, 1999) 5-96, here pp. 52-64.

REGISTRUM PRESENTIBUS LITTERIS ADIUNCTUM

[ante 1 Aprili] 1467

I. Item primo, quod omnes solvant, sed clerici de fundis clericalibus tantum et nobiles regni de fundis nobilitaribus tantum non solvant lucrum camere seu tributum fisci regalis.

Nobiles autem regni intelligantur, qui habent meram nobilitatem a regibus seu privilegium nobilitatis huiusmodi, sive tales sub nomine regio, sive sub ecclesiis, sive sub quacunque alia iurisdictione degant. Alii autem omnes solvant ubique, sive sint nobiles castrenses sive prediales ecclesiarum, qui non habent privilegium nobilitatis a regibus sive cives liberarum civitatum sive Cumani sive Philistei, Rwtheni, Tortoni, Walachi, sive cuiuscunque alterius condicionis vel secte preter Walachos, qui loco lucri camere in Transsilvania solvant centesimam.

Ab ista solventium regula excepti intelligantur duo: qui de domibus dominorum suorum terrestrium vivunt nec colunt terram propriam in numero civium vel rusticorum loci quales sunt, qui elimosina conservantur in domibus vel mercenarii vel agricole dominorum vel quicunque artifices seu servitores, qui de manibus dominorum suorum sustentantur. Si autem per se vivunt vel terram suam colunt, cuiuscunque artificii sint vel exercitii, solvere teneantur.

II. Item solutio fiat per portas ita, quod si in uno integro fundo seu sessione cum terra ad eundem unum fundum pertinenti sub una porta unus habitat, solvat denarios XX. Si autem duo unum fundum et unius fundi terram sub una porta habitantes obtinent, ambo solvant ad rationem unius et porte et medie. Quodsi plures fuerint, puta tres, solvant ad rationem unius et medie porte. Si vero quatuor duarum et deinceps qualitercunque terra inter eas divisa sit, quia hoc ad dominum terrestrem pertinet. Qui autem solus tenet terram duorum fundorum vel plurium, solvat pro duabus vel pluribus portis; liberis semper inquilinis in villis vel opidis exterioribus, qui non utuntur aliqua particula terre, videlicet qui nec terrestri domino quitquam solvunt.

III. Nobiles regni profugi ante Turcos et similes, ubicunque habitent, ut nobiles sint a tali solutione exempti, nisi se tradiderint sub iura eorum, in quorum terris commorantur, quod ultimum volumus generaliter ubique intelligi.

IV. Si rex lucrum camere dedit in concambium, rescindatur contractus vel contentetur ille alio modo secundum arbitrationem prelatorum et baronum.

V. Prelatis autem ecclesiarum, qui sub certo numero gentium exercituare tenentur, quibus lucrum camere hac ratione cognoscimus relaxatum, fiat per regem recompensatio vel competens alleviatio in onere, secundum quod arbitrabuntur inter dominum regem tales prelati et barones.

VI. Item dicator emittatur in principio anni, scilicet intra octo dies Ianuarii et non habeat dicator salarium trium florenorum pro singulo equite, ut hactenus, sed minus, prout fuerit competens. Et semper dicet cum iudice nobilium et faciat tot dicas, quot portiones sunt in unaquaque possessione nec plures nec pauciores.

VII. Singule autem dice redimantur duobus denariis tantum. Et si inter dicandum fuerit oborta aliqua differentia, puta de domibus desertis vel de numero portarum et similibus, stetur iuramento villici vel officialis. Ceterum villicus, apud quem dicator voluerit descensum, gaudeat immunitate, sed prebeat hospitium dicatori. Ne tamen possit ab eo nimis angariari, hoc est unam pintam vini communem, unum panem vulgo kalacz, unum pullum, unum quartale Budensem de avena, sive sit alia mensura tantundem continens. Completa vero dicatione dicator deponat se in loco sedis iudicarie illius comitatus et intra quindecim dierum exigat dicata. Et si quis allegaverit sibi factam esse iniustitiam, stetur asseverationi iudicis nobilium, nisi dicator deferat iuramentum conquerenti. Post quindecim dies cum birsagiis trium marcarum super contumaciam dicata exigantur et sedes nobilium ipso quintodecimo die teneantur omnino cum litteris birsagialibus comitem vel vicecomitem adversus contumaces, alioquin per se vadat exceptis de iniustitia dice querulantibus, que corrigatur, ut dictum est supra.

VIII. Item non minus, quam decem portis sit unus villicus et quod pluribus villicis in possessione una dimittatur una porta et illi omnes exhibeant unam hospitalitatem. Et si inde orietur differentia inter villicos, in sede nobilium ratificetur etc.

REGISTER ATTACHED TO THESE PRESENTS

1467 [BEFORE 1 APRIL]

1 Item, the first, that all should pay, but the clergy from ecclesiastical lands and the kingdom's nobles from noble lands, but only from these, do not pay the chamber's profit or the levy of the royal fisc.¹

The kingdom's, nobles are understood to be those who hold pure nobility from the kings or an appropriate privilege of nobility and live under the jurisdiction of either the king, or of the churches, or of some other authority. All others, whoever they are, however, pay, whether they are nobles of the castles² or predial nobles of churches,³ who do not hold a noble privilege from the kings, or burghers of free cities,⁴ or Cumans, Jász, Ruthenes, Tartars, Vlachs, or people of any other condition or group, with the exception of those Vlachs, who in Transylvania pay the hundredth instead of the chamber's profit.⁵

¹ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae)—for a short while under Matthias called tributum fisci—was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber's profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages; see Lajos Thalóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary] (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879). In around 1459 the royal income from this tax was ca. 40 thousand gold florins, to be increased by the reforms of Matthias to almost 400 thousand; see János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter", in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347- 87, here p. 360. The emphasis of this crucial sentence of the decree is that clergy is obligated to pay the tax for land they may hold besides their prebends, and nobles for properties rented, mortgaged, etc., other than then their "noble estates." It was also possible that, for example, a non-noble priest held inherited servile land, or a nobleman moved to a plot under seigniorial jurisdiction, in which case they had to pay taxes for these holdings. Noble exemption from direct taxes goes back to at least 1342, the first regulation of the chambers' profit. See also 1447:36 and 1458Sz:5.

² The social group of "castle nobles"—a survival of sorts of the early medieval jobagiones castri—was a stratum above the tenant peasants but below the "true nobles." Especially in northern Hungary (today's Slovakia), they were called thus (while in the south they usually became mostly prediales of ecclesiastical lords, such as the bishop of Zagreb, see below), were organized in "seats," similar to the noble county, had tenant peasants, and were obligated to military service. Throughout the late Middle Ages, the crown attempted to tax these semi-privileged nobles, while they refused to pay. Frequently the compromise was made that they—just as the nobles without tenant peasants and the prediales—paid the half of the extraordinary subsidy; see Antal Fekete-Nagy, "Az országos és particularis nemesség tagozódása a középkorban" [Division of national and 'particular' nobility in the Middle Ages], in: Domanovszky Emlékkönyv, pp. 159-84; György Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law]. (Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tudományos Intézet, n.d. [1947] rperr. Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó 2000), pp. 181-216, 331-87.

³ On the prediales see the preceding note and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 79-84.

From this payment two kinds of people are to be exempted: those, who live in the houses of the lords of the land and do not cultivate their own plot as one of the townspeople⁶ or peasants of the community, and those who receive board in the house of their lord, or are paid soldiers or husbandmen of their lord or any type of craftsmen or servants, who obtain their livelihood from the hands of their lord. However, if they live on their own or till their own land, they have to pay, even if they are craftsmen or the soldiers of someone.⁷

2 Then, this payment should be made according to *portae*⁸ thus that if one (family) lives on one full-sized plot or tenancy and on the land pertaining to the same one plot with one gate, he

⁴The taxation of the free royal cities seems to have been a compromise offered to the nobility by the king (Kubinyi, p. 16), but in fact, Matthias never planned to subject his cities to the direct tax. Several individual exemptions have survived, see DRH Matth., p. 166, n. 1/2. In the king's letter to the cities (of 24 March, as referred to above) nothing is said about their duty to pay the chamber's profit, only about the other part of the reform, the renaming of the thirtieth customs' duty as "crown's levy" (vectigal corone), and the appointment of Sigismund Ernuszt of Csáktornya (bishop of Pécs 1473-1504, chief treasurer) as the general administrator of the new revenues.

⁵ On the formerly free warrior groups of Cumans and others, see Hansgerd Göckenjan, Hilfsvölker und Grenzwächter im mittelalterlichen Ungarn (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1972) and Nóra Berend, At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and "Pagans" in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001). By this time, the majority of Cumans were peasants, their captains being their landlords. The estates tried to tax them, but the king collected their taxes for himself, through the provisor of the Castle of Buda (see András Kubinyi, "A budai vár udvarbírói hivatala 1458-1514" [Office of the provisor of the court in castle Buda], Levéltári Közlemények 35 (1964) 67--98. — Certain Romanian settlers were obligated to pay a special tax usually referred to as the "fiftieth." The reference here to a "hundredth" is unique, and may even be a scribal error.

⁶The reference to townsfolk, cives, is to the dwellers of both cities and those non-privileged market towns (oppida) that enjoyed more or less liberties. Towns, even the walled ones, had, of course vineyards and plow land in and around them, owned by the citizens.

⁷House servants and members of the lords' households were always exempt from the chamber's profit, see e. g., 1351: 5; 1397: 30; 1411: 3.

⁸*Porta* was the taxation unit in the medieval Hungarian countryside, originally referring to one tenant plot (sessio) with one gate (porta). By the later Middle Ages frequently several families lived on one plot (sometimes in order to avoid taxation), often with landless peasants (inquilini). István Szabó, in Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez [Studies on the history of the Hungarian peasantry], (Budapest: Teleki Pál Tud. Int., 1942) pp. 13-14 found that in some parts of the country one third or less of the tenant peasants held a full virgate, while quarter-virgaters amounted to up to 40-50% of the rural population. On the other hand, there is evidence for peasant tenants with sufficient land to their name to have moved together precisely in order to avoid paying the portal tax separately; on these problems see now András Kubinyi, "Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen und Wirtschaft in den Besitzungen der Magnatenfamilie Garai in Ungarn," Festschrift Othmar Field, pp. 367-77 (Graz-Wien: Leykam, 1987). See also István Szabó, "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén" [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], pays 20 pennies. If, however, two live on one plot and that plot has one gate, both pay at the rate of one porta and a half. If there are more, say three, they (each) pay at the rate of a porta and a half. If, however, four or more are on two (plots), the land is to be divided among them (for purposes of payment of taxes), [for that pertains to the lord of the land]⁹. He, who holds alone a tenancy of two plots or more, pays for two or more portae. Excepting always those landless peasants in the villages or outskirts of market-towns,¹⁰ who do not use any particular plot, those, to wit, who do not pay anything to the lord of the land either.¹¹

3 Nobles of the kingdom who fled the Turks, and similar persons, are exempt from any such payment wherever they live, unless they have commended themselves into the hands of those on whose land they stay, which we wish to be understood as final.¹²

4 If the king grants the chamber's profit in exchange, the original agreement must be cancelled or in some other way satisfied, according to the judgment of the barons and prelates.¹³

5 The prelates of churches who are obligated to send a certain number of soldiers to war and for whom, because of this reason, the chamber's profit is known to have been waived, should be recompensed by the king or their burdens suitably reduced, according to the agreement between the lord king and such prelates and barons.

6 Then, the tax-assessor is to be sent out at the beginning of the year, namely in the first eight days of January, and the tax-assessor should not receive, as hitherto, a salary of three florins in Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. pp. 167-200 (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1976).

⁹ The text is obscure, but the meaning in context is clear: multiple occupants on two plots of land will pay prorated shares of the tax. A clarifying phrase (e.g., unum fundum duarum terrarum habitantes) appears to have dropped out of the first clause, while the final clause ("for that pertains ...") seems to be either a scribal intrusion or the conclusion of a separate, missing provision. Actually, the crown's attempt to counteract the move of tenants to one plot in order to avoid taxation, was not successful.

¹⁰ The text is unclear. In medieval Hungary, oppida usually meant semi-privileged market-towns, but here seem to refer rather to settlements outside or at the outskirts of the villages. There is evidence that cottars and landless peasants lived on the outlying parts of the settlements, see Ferenc Maksay, A magyar falu középkori településrendje [Settlement structure of medieval Hungarian villages] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), p. 127.

¹¹ Due to the partible inheritance and other factors, the number of landless peasants (inquilini) increased in the later Middle Ages; many of them lived on tenant peasants' plots and supplied the wage labor in times of seasonal employment. See István Szabó, "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén" [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], in Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. pp. 167-200 (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1976)

¹² There is evidence for noblemen falling into the status of tenant peasants after having lost their land to the advancing Ottomans; settled on servile plots, they came to be subject to taxation.

¹³ That is: the king is obliged to have the approval of the prelates and barons should he give (in exchange for other property) to another party the right to collect the chamber's profit (or the new "levy"). In which case, the original terms of collection (as specified in this document) would no longer be valid. See DRH Matth., p. 167 n. IV/1; cf. also 1481:4., above.

for each horse, but less, as is appropriate. And he should always make assessment together with the noble magistrate, and make as many assessments as there are parts of every possession [or: village], neither more nor less.¹⁴

7 For every assessment only two pennies should be paid. And if some kind of disagreement emerges with the assessor, be it about deserted houses or the number of portae or something similar, the oath of the reeve or official should be decisive. Furthermore, the reeve, with whom the assessor wishes to billet may be exempt, but should host the assessor. However, it should not be allowed to overly burden him beyond one pint of common wine, one bread commonly called kalács,¹⁵ one hen, and one Buda quartal of oats¹⁶ or some other measure containing the same amount. After the completion of the assessment, the assessor should betake himself to the seat of the court of that county and collect the tax within fifteen days. And if someone alleges that he suffered injustice, the noble magistrate should decide unless the tax-assessor defers the oath to the complainant. After fifteen days the taxes are to be exacted by the fine of three marks for contempt. And on that same fifteenth day county court is to be held on the letters of fines and the ispán or alispán [sent out] against the tax-delinquents, or else, he [the tax-collector] should go alone, excepting the cases of those who complain about injustice in the assessment, which have to be remedied as defined above.¹⁷

8 Then, that there should be one reeve for each 10 and not fewer portae where there are several on one estate, one porta is to be deducted and all [the reeves] together should offer one hospitality. Conflicts caused because of this [arrangement] amongst the reeves should be settled in county court, and so on.¹⁸

¹⁴This was in fact received practice for centuries, see e. g., 1411:4; and 1470:1.

¹⁵*Kalács* (a Slavic loan word) was—and still is—the name of a higher quality bread, usually from fine (white) meal, baked for festive occasions in a round form, mostly with a hole in the middle.

¹⁶A quartal (in Hungarian: véka) of Buda was ca. 13.4 liter, approximately 10 kg of grain.

¹⁷Most of these arrangements were included in earlier decrees about assessment and taxation (e. g., 1351: 5, 1397:30; 1411: 3, and so on), however, the reeves were not earlier obligated to offer hospitality to the tax-collectors (see 1411:1).

¹⁸Nothing is known of the arrangement described here establishing the number of reeves on larger estates (villages?). Ratificare (ratify?) is unusual; here. The surviving text may be incomplete.

CONCORDANCE

Kovachich Vestigia ;	,	DRH Matth ; DRMH
Kovachich
Supplementum
I—III		I
IV		II
V		III
VI		IV
VII		V
VIII		VI
IX		VII
X		VIII

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

OF 18 SEPTEMBER 1471

The diet was called by the king in response to the conspiracy headed by Archbishop John Vitéz and his nephew, Janus Pannonius, the poet-bishop, which arose as a protest against Matthias's foreign policy and authoritarian regime. In order to secure the support of a wide stratum of nobles, Matthias invited all nobles to a general assembly on St. Giles's Day (1 September) to Buda. The nobility utilized the king's precarious position and requested the confirmation of several of its traditional privileges augmented by articles that strengthened the noble counties' jurisdiction. The king not only consented to the articles, but called them "a true decree to be observed by all." The estates, in return, declared their loyalty to the king, and sent a letter to Cracow confirming Matthias's legitimacy against the Polish claimant and supporter of the rebels, Prince Casimir, son of King Casimir IV (Central State Archives, Warsaw, Akty metyrki koronej publ. Nr. 12 of 21 September 1471).

MSS.: Only sixteenth century and later copies, on paper: MNL OL D1 13382, 83793,274352, and in the Codices Esterhazy, Kollar and Nádasdy; see DRH Matth. p. 192.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:358-73; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490 (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], pp. 190-202.

LIT.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801) 2:229; Vilmos Fraknói, A Hunyadiak és Jagellók kora 1440-1526 [The age of the Hunyadi and the Jagiello 1440-1526] Budapest: Franklin, 1896, pp. 224-46; György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary]. pp. 258, 292 (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), see also "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary." East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 181– 191; Lajos Bernát Kumorowitz, "Mátyás király pecsétjei" [Seals of King Matthias], Turul 46 (1932): 5-19.

18 SEPTEMBRIS 1471

Nos Mathias Dei gratia, rex Hungarie, Bohemie etc. notum facimus tenore presentium universis, quibus expedit, quod cum nos occurrentibus variis undique negotiis hanc conventionem generalem omnibus prelati, baronibus ac nobilibus de regno nostro ediceremus tractaremusque maturius cum eis super ipsis, iidem prelati, barones et nobiles cupientes se certis libertatibus et privilegiis fulciri, sive quod in decretis preteritis ita sufficienter expressa non habebantur, exhibuerunt et presentaverunt nobis articulos infrascriptos:

I. Primus est, quod nos singulis annis circa festum Ascensionis Domini de consilio prelatorum et baronum nostrorum edicamus generalem conventionem omnibus regnicolis nostris et hoc, si necessitas exigat.

II. Secundus est, quod nec nos, nec iudices curie nostre aut prelati et barones absque ordine iudiciario nobiles regni detineamus sive detineant, dempto eo, si aliqui nobilium factores fuerint et alias servitio suo non completo ab eorum dominis recesserint, quia tunc detineri possunt. Ex parte vero officialium teneatur modus in decreto condam Sigismundi regis expressus.

III. Tertius est, quod in facto decimarum teneatur modus ille, qui exprimitur in decreto nostro Albe tempore coronationis nostre edito, dempto illo, quod si in aliquo comitatu nobiles voluerint adiungere unum nobilem et plebanum similiter unum de illo comitatu dicatori decimarum tempore dicationis eundem de mala dicatione, si faceret, suo episcopo accusaturos; qui si non fecerint, nihilominus dicator procedere possit.

IV. Quartus est, quod camere salium nostrorum regalium teneantur in illis locis, in quibus tempore domini Sigismundi regis tenebantur, et sub modo et libertatibus tunc solitis; que etiam in metis [et] in illis locis fiant, unde commode percipi possit.

V. Quintus est, quod deinceps iudicium generale non celebretur, nisi secundum antiquam consuetudinem regni nostri.

VI. Sextus est, quod tam regalia, quam baronum et aliorum omnium nobilium regni nostri castra finitima, in partibus scilicet superioribus et inferioribus, sive in regnis Dalmatie, Croatie et Sclavonie et in partibus Transylvanis habita ad conservandum Hungaris, personis scilicet dignis et idoneis et non forensibus collocentur.

VII. Septimus est, quod in exercituatione et levatione banderiorum prelatorum et baronum nostrorum ac exercitus generalis regnicolarum teneatur idem modus, qui fuit tempore quondam domini Sigismundi regis, et qui in bonis destructi haberentur, agatur cum eis iuxta exigentiam bonorum suorum.

VIII. Octavus est, quod nos utamur quatuor vel quinque sigillis, videlicet bulla aurea et dupplici, secreto, iuridico et anulari.

IX. Nonus est, quod si tempore exercitus vel alias quocumque tempore aliqui in domibus et curiis nobilium aut personarum ecclesiasticarum preter voluntatem eorum descenderent et dampna committerent, vel iam commisissent, aut cimiteria seu ecclesias confringerent aut iam confregissent, tales evocentur ad octavas cum insinuatione. Ex parte quorum, si agens voluerit, non aliter, nisi per viam communis inquisitionis iudicium et iustitia impendatur. Que etiam circa finem prefati decreti nostri tempore coronations nostre editi in parte tacta sunt.

X. Decimus est, quod nos ad simplicem querimoniam non faciamus occupari bona aliquorum, sed in occupatione agatur semper iuxta consuetudinem regni nostri ordine iudiciario. Nec etiam occupentur donata bona a manibus possidentium donec ordo iuris decernat de dominio rei donate, ad quem pertinere debet; et hactenus male occupata bona simpliciter remittantur.

XI. Undecimus est, quod nos de cetero, nullam dicam sive taxam preterquam lucrum camere generaliter a regnicolis propter aliquam causam exigamus aut exigere faciamus preter eorum voluntatem et consensum.

XII. Duodecimus est, quod nos nullas litteras adiudicatorias in sede regni emanatas cassemus, sed data gratia agentibus in primis octavis tunc occurrentibus huiusmodi litteras adiudicatorias ad invalidandum vel roborandum iubeamus exhiberi, ut in talibus moris est, possessionibus et aliis bonis interim apud manus vigore litterarum ipsarum adiudicatoriarum possessorum remanentibus. Et si in contrarium huius, hucusque aliquid actum fuisset, revocemus. Nec etiam tales littere nostre, si que contra leges et antiquam consuetudinem regni nostri emanate essent, vires habeant. Preterea non imputetur iudicibus regni nostri, si tales littere non observabuntur in iudicio.

XIII. Tredecimus est, quod nos duo beneficia ecclesiastica uni person non conferamus, et si contulerimus, de eisdem beneficiis duobus aut pluribus personam eadem habentem tempore exercitus secundum antiquum modum exercituari faciamus iuxta posse ipsius.

XIV. Quartus decimus est, quod magistri protonotarii, unicuique faciant iustitiam sub pena consueta, et nec ipsi, nec eorundem assessores procuratores esse possint. Ubi autem adversus eos et eorum iudicium regie maiestati aut baronibus per aliquos acclamatum fuerit, regia maiestas cum baronibus suis iudicium examinet, et si acclamatio contra veritatem facta reperitur, acclamatores puniantur premissa pena consueta.

XV. Quintus decimus est, quod honorem comitatus nullus, nisi nobilis tenere possit.

XVI. Sextus decimus est, quod nullorum iobagiones indebite abducantur sub penis in decreto dicti quondam domini Sigismundi regis contentis. Et si comites ac vicecomites et iudices nobilium comitatus alicuius indebite abductos iobagiones ad requisitionem querulantis non reducerent gravamine consueto, honore suo priventur. Ubi autem aliqui iobagiones suos libere non dimitterent, teneantur omnes nobiles contra tales insurgere in adiutorium comitis, maxime si idem ad compellendum tantam non habeat facultatem. Preterea si solus comes parochianus contra ius legesque regni abduceret iobagiones, modo simili honore sui comitatus privetur

XVII. Decimus septimus est, quod tantum ille cause in foro et sede spirituali tractentur et iudicentur, que in dicto decreto nostro tempore coronationis nostre edito continentur et alie non. Et ubi contrarium acceptaretur, pro habendo superinde remedio petatur regia deliberatio.

XVIII. Decimus octavus est, quod nos ius patronatus omnium ecclesiarum vel monasteriorum sigilla habentium auferamus ab omnibus et pro nobis retineamus, quia multe incommoditates eveniunt ab eis regno et regnicolis, quod suos patronos fovent et sigillo suo in favorem illorum libere uti non possunt.

XIX. Decimus nonus est, quod nullus penitus regnicolarum sive sint clerici, sive seculares, contra libertatem regni, qua a tempore quondam sanctissimi Stephani regis illibate utitur, directe omisso medio conquestum a curia Romana contra quempiam reportare possit, sed quilibet prius hic in regno coram suis iudicibus ordinariis ius suum prosequatur, et ita tandem, si voluerit, per viam appellationis causam suam introducat. Quibus contra facientes beneficiati suo beneficio priventur, non beneficiati autem et laici penam capitis luant.

XX. Vigésimus est, quod in bonis ac nundinis et foris regnicolarum factores nostri quascunque res ab aliquo sine solutione et competenti pretio occupare et auferre non valeant.

XXI. Vigésimus primus est, quod pedites et equites nostri sive tempore exercitus, sive alias in eorum progressibus victualia sine pretio auferre non possint. Et si in contrarium huius fieret attemptatum, extunc capitanei eorundem peditum vel equitum debita pena puniantur. Ubi autem nobis pro dampno per ipsos illato querimonia porrigeretur, per eos satisfactionem impendere faciamus de dampno premissio.

XXII. Vigésimus secundus est, quod capitula et conventus in redemptionibus litterarum et executionibus viarum observent illum modum, qui in prefato decreto quondam domini Sigismundi regis continetur. Ubi si ille modus non observaretur, et superinde comprobatio per attestaciones nobiliurn illius comitatus per modum communis inquisitionis sive congregationis generalis facta dari possit, contra facientes sua amittant beneficia.

XXIII. Vigésimus tertius est, quod nos bona indebite occupata reddi et restitui faciamus illis, quorum sunt.

XXIV. Vigésimus quartus, quod viri ecclesiastici neque maiores, neque minores deinceps dicentur aut aliqua taxa graventur; tamen illi ex eis, qui exercituare tenentur, id faciant secundum antiquum modum.

XXV. Vigésimus quintus est, quod tributa in locis suis exigantur secundum antiquum modum, tempore dicti scilicet domini Sigismundi regis observatum.

XXVI. Vigésimus sextus est, quod nulla fassio invite facta vel facienda vires habeat, postquam veritas ostenderit, sive docuerit eam invite fuisse factam.

XXVII. Vigésimus septimus est, quod bona post coronationem nostram per quempiam occupata infra tricesimum diem a die datarum presentis decreti computandum remittantur; et si aliqui non remiserint, tales in facto potentie convincantur et in primis octavis contra tales sententia diffinitiva per iudices ordinarios decernatur absque ulteriore prorogatione.

XXVIII. Vigésimus octavus est, quod omnes illi, qui per se nobiles regni nostri maiores vel minores sine iusta causa interfecerint aut per alios interficere fecerint, brevi evocatione in presentiam nostram evocentur ordine infrascripto. Quod videlicet actor extrahens litteras evocatorias a nobis cum capituli aut conventus et nostro hominibus contra illum, contra quem huiusmodi littere evocatorie extracte sunt, procedere non valeat, nisi prius huiusmodi litteras una die tempore sedis iudicarie illius comitatus, ubi id fieri debebit, more consueto in ipso loco sedis nobilibus illius comitatus invicem constitutis publice presentare debeat, ab eisque petat unum nobilem, coram quo fiat ipsa evocatio; et facta executione superinde litteras tam capituli aut conventus, et comitatus pro sui parte extrahat. Qui quidem in causam attractus a die evocationis infra vigésimum quintum diem coram nobis, ubi eotunc, in regno nostro Hungarie Deo duce constituemur, constitui teneatur secundum formam et vim insinuationis iudicium et iustitiam accepturus. Ita tamen, quod in causam attractus suam innocentiam nunquam iuramento, sed communi inquisitione aut duellari certamine expurgare valeat. Tandem ipse in causam attractus, si convictus fuerit, pro ipso homicidio non possessionem aut possessions, aut portions possessionarias amittat, sed pena mortis sui proprii capitis puniatur, et preter voluntatem agentis nulla redemptio capitis fieri valeat. Ubi autem contra ipsum in causam attractum minus iuste et sine causa dicto ordine iuris processum fuerit, et ipse communi inquisitione aut duellari certamine suam innocentiam purgaverit, agens contra eundem in causam attractum in emenda capitis pro indebita inquietatione convincatur et iudex super ipsa emenda capitis de iuribus possessionariis ipsius agentis in causam attracto satisfacere valeat, ubi nulla sit portio iudicaria.

XXIX. Vigésimus nonus est, quod castella infrascripta, videlicet in comitatibus Simigiensi castellum Zenyer, [in Zempliniensi] castellum Zropko, in Maromarwsiensi castellum Dolha, in de Bereg castellum Gellyenes Ladislai Wpory, in Zempliniensi castellum Abara eiusdem Ladislai Wpory, in eodem Zempliniensi castellum Czeeke, in de Posega castella Knesewcz et Farklewcz Blasii Hwzar, in de Walko castellum Lanka sub nota perpetue infidelitatis infra viginti quinque dierum spatia a die datarum huius decreti computando distrahantur et penitus aboleantur.

XXX. Tricesimus est, quod nos ad supplicationem comitatus Simigiensis tributum in Chorgo in eodem comitatu Simigiensi habito exigi solitum distrahi debere concessimus, ita ut peramplius illic tributum non exigatur.

XXXI. Tricesimus primus et postremus est, quod presens decretum ab omnibus sub penis in eodem articulariter specificatis observetur, et quod ad singulos comitatus scribatur et deferatur idem decretum ad locum sedis iudicarie singulorum comitatum, quod in singulis conventionibus nobilium intersit; et comites vel vicecomites ac iudices nobilium ipsorum comitatum omnes et singulos articulos in eodem expressos in illis rebus, in quibus ipsos tangunt, inviolabiliter observent et per alios observari faciant. Omnes autem contrarium facientes iidem comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium tamquam communis iustitie defensores puniant penis in ipso decreto expressis. Et si qui a nobis in contrarium decreti pro eorum partibus litteras extraxerint, eodem non observentur. Ceterum, si aliquibus ipsi comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium in aliquo contrarium decreto facerent, pro tali eorum facto et perpetratione malorum et illatione dampnorum evocentur in curiam nostram cum insinuatione, ubi vigore litterarum nostrarum in contrarium decreti a nobis ipsis transmissarum nunquam se defendere valeant, sed convincantur in facto potentie.

Quibus exhibitis iidem prelati, barones et nobiles regni nostri supplicarunt nobis, ut eosdem articulos ratos et gratos habentes admittere et approbare dignaremur. Unde nos admissa supplicatione eorundem huiusmodi articulos, quia iidem non mediocriter communi utilitati regni nostri conferre cernebantur, presentibus litteris nostris de verbo ad verbum inscriptos ratos et gratos habentes, admittimus et approbamus ac ab omnibus pro vero decreto regni teneri volumus. Nos etiam similiter tenebimus harum nostrarum litterarum vigore et testimonio mediante.

Datum Bude, feria quarta proxima ante festum beati Mathei apostoli et evangeliste, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo septuagesimo primo, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. quarto decimo, coronationis octavo, Bohemie vero tertio.

18 SEPTEMBER, 1471

We, Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia,¹ etc. make known to all to whom it may concern by these presents that when, because of diverse matters emerging everywhere,² we announced this present diet to all our kingdom's prelates, barons, and noblemen and held mature deliberation with them about those matters, these same prelates, barons, and noblemen, desiring to be secure in certain particular privileges and liberties, which they considered not to have been set forth adequately in previous decrees, presented and handed over to us the following articles:

1 The first is, that we shall call a diet every year at the time of the feast of the Ascension of the Lord³ for all of our the gentlemen of the realm, if it is necessary.

2 Second, that neither ourselves, nor the justices of our court, nor the prelates shall have the liberty to arrest nobles without due process of law, except, if any of them is a steward and leaves his lord without completing his service; in which case he can then be arrested.⁴ As for the officeholders, the process set forth in the decree of the late King Sigismund shall be maintained.⁵

3 Third, that in the matter of tithes, that rule shall be maintained which is set forth in the decree issued in Székesfehérvár on the occasion of our coronation,⁶ except that if in a particular county, the nobles should wish to assign to the tithe collector some nobleman or in similar fashion, a parish priest⁷ from that county in the time of tithe-collecting who would accuse him before his

¹ The Czech royal title appeared for the first time in the decree of 1470 [after 24 November], DRH Matth., pp. 182-9, after Matthias's election to the throne of Bohemia by the Catholic estates on 3 May 1469.

² The understatement of "diverse matters" refers, of course, to the conspiracy headed by John Vitéz, which had called Prince Casimir to Hungary in order to depose Matthias. Two days after the issue of this decree the prince declared war on Matthias and the tragic course of events, which led to the downfall of Archbishop John and the death of Janus Pannonius in the spring of 1472, began.

³ Annual diets were regularly promised by Matthias as well as his predecessors. The date proposed here, Ascensio Domini, precedes Pentecost (stipulated in 1458Sz: 13 and 1458:37) by 10 days. However none of these fixed dates were kept.

⁴ Cf 1458: 23; 1468:7, and their antecedents. This article empowers the judges to enforce the dependence of noble retainers (familiares) on their domini, despite their noble liberty. The noble retainer was a lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron or major landowner. He kept his noble privilege and was subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which he received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), pp. 137–40, and Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 110–31. See also: János M. Bak, "Feudalism in Hungary?" in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011) pp. 203-17.

⁵Cf. 1435/I:6

⁶ 1464: 24.

⁷ The deployment of a noble controller, or the attachment of a noble magistrate to the tithe-collector was decreed earlier but no mention was made of a plebanus. (In the thirteenth-fourteenth century, plebanus was bishop for improper tithing if he acted so; nevertheless, if they did not do that, the tithe-collector can proceed in his duties.

4 Fourth, that our royal salt chambers shall be kept in the same places as they used to be in the time of the lord King Sigismund,⁸ and in a manner and with the privileges as were customary then; and they shall be located on the borders and in such places where salt is easy to obtain.⁹

5 Fifth, that general assizes are no longer to be held, unless in accordance with the ancient custom of our kingdom.¹⁰

6 Sixth, that the defense of the border fortifications, be they the king's or the barons' or belonging to any other noble of the realm, namely those, in the upper or lower lands¹¹ or in the

the name for the priest of a parish which, exempted from the archdeacon's jurisdiction, had the right to collect tithes. For similar arrangements and the office of the pievano in Italy, see Robert Brentano, Two Churches. England and Italy in the thirteenth century (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1968), pp. 68-76; on the origins of this system, see Guido Mengozzi, La citta italiana nell'alto Medio Evo ed. 2. (Firenze: La Nuova Italia, 1973), pp. 223ff. In the fifteenth century the term was used generally for a parish priest. The measure decreed here did not last long, for in 1481, no priest is mentioned among the possible controllers of the tithe-collectors.

⁸ Cf. 1405/I: 20, 1405/II: 8, also 1427A:8.

⁹ The Codex Cassoviensis has here in metis et locis, meaning both the border posts and other locations, which makes better sense. The location of royal chambers of salt changed over times so that for the fifteenth century, András Kubinyi in "Königliches Salzmonopol und die Städte des Königreichs Ungarn" in Stadt and Salz im Mittelalter, ed. Wilhelm Rausch (Linz: Wimmer, 1988), pp. 213-32, counted sixty-six places, which at one time or another housed a salt distributing chamber. Most of them were in market towns, a quarter in royal cities, and a few in ports; see also István Draskóczy, "Salt Mining and Trade in Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages" in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

¹⁰ General assizes held by the palatine, often for several counties together were resented by the nobility partly for reasons of expenses. After several protests they were finally abolished in Matthias's Decretum Maius (1486:1).

¹¹ "Upper Hungary" meant today's Slovakia; "Lower Hungary" the southern borderlands, between Srem and Severin, with Timisoara at its center.

kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia as well as in Transylvania, shall be entrusted to Hungarians, that is, to deserving and appropriate persons and not to foreigners.¹²

7 Seventh, that for military service and mobilization of the banderia of the prelates and our barons and the general levy of the gentlemen of the realm, the same procedure shall be observed as that in the time of the late lord King Sigismund;¹³ and if any suffer damage in their properties, they shall have action at law in accordance with the exigencies of their property.¹⁴

8 Eighth, that we shall use four or five seals, namely the golden seal, the double, the secret, and the judicial seals, and the signet ring.¹⁵

9 Ninth, if anyone billeted, in time of military campaign or at any other time, in the houses or mansions of nobles or ecclesiastics without their permission, should cause, or has caused, damage, or should break into, or has broken into cemeteries or churches, such a person should be summoned into the octave court with terminal summons.. And if the plaintiff so demands – but only in the process of common inquest – sentence and justice must be rendered on their behalf, as it is also mentioned at the end of our said decree issued at our coronation.¹⁶

10 Tenth, that we shall not seize anyone's properties upon a simple complaint, but always proceed according to the ancient custom of the realm, by due process of law in matters of occupation. Donated properties are not to be confiscated from the hands of their possessors until ¹² Cf. 1439: 5 and 1444: 2, 32, also 1458:4. This time, as the border castles are mentioned in particular, the diet's opposition was aimed probably at those mercenary captains, who, as the famous Czech František Hag, held castle and county Trencsén until his death at the siege of Sabač in 1476. There were also a number of Polish and Austrian lords who held their castles as allods and Matthias could not dislodge them at his will, such as Vitovec, former captain of Ulrich of Cilli, who in spite of earlier decrees was allowed to keep the county of Zagorje (MNL OL DI. 33195), just as Friedrich Lamberger retained the Medjumurje, and Andrew P(B)aumkircher Császárvára. In the North, Arva and Likava could be recovered from the Pole Peter Komorowski only in 1474. See: Tamás Pálosfalvi, "Vitovec János. Egy zsoldoskarrier a 15. századi Magyarországon" [Jan Vitovec: the career of a mercenary in fifteenth-century Hungary] Századok, 135. (2001) 429–472.

¹³ Cf. 1435/II:1-2 and Prop:1.

¹⁴ On the basis of this decree Matthias issued several specific orders of mobilization, mainly against the Polish troops of Prince Casimir; see DRH Matth., p. 194, n. VII/2.

¹⁵ On the use of seals in the chancelleries of Matthias, see András Kubinyi, "Die Statsorganisation der Matthiaszeit," in: Idem, Matthias Corvinus (Herne: Schäfer, 1999) 5-96, here 3–44. This article aims particularly against the king's use of his Bohemian royal seal (and chancellery personnel) in matters Hungarian. Kumorowitz (pp. 9-10) notes several cases—actually, all after this dietal decree—in which Matthias used one of his four or five Bohemian seals on charters for Hungarian subjects (1472: MNL OL DI 17337; 1478: MNL OL DI 18107). At least of one case is known in which upon the grantee's request the Czech seal was replaced by a Hungarian (Kumorowitz, p. 18)

¹⁶ Cf. 1464:28 and its antecedents, as far back as 1405, also 1468:8.

possession of the donated estate is decided by lawful process; and unjustly seized properties shall be returned unconditionally.¹⁷

11 Eleventh, that henceforth we shall not levy or cause to be levied in general any tax or contribution for any reason from the gentlemen of the realm without their will and consent other than the chamber's profit.¹⁸

12. Twelfth, that we shall not annul letters of sentence issued in the royal court but, when pardon is granted to the litigant parties, we shall order that these letters of sentence be presented at the next octave court in order to be annulled or confirmed, as it is customary in these matters; in the meantime, by the force of the same letter of sentence the estates and other properties shall remain in the hands of their possessors. And if any action occurred to the contrary, we shall cancel it.¹⁹ Nor should any of our letters issued contrary to the laws and ancient customs of our realm have force. Moreover, judges of our kingdom are not to be blamed if they disregard such letters when passing judgment.²⁰

13 Thirteenth, that we shall not give two benefices to one person,²¹ and if we so gave, in times of campaigns we shall compel the person holding two or more benefices to perform military service in the ancient fashion according to his ability.²²

¹⁷ Cf. 1464:18.

¹⁸ The right of the estates to approve taxes or the king's promise, not to levy them at all, was contained in virtually every decree of Matthias, beginning with June 1458:44. However, a more elaborate control of the estates over royal finances emerged only after Matthias's reign. The king's pardon for John Vitéz on 19 December 1471 suggests that the estates did approve a tax or a subsidy in 1471, in the amount of 80d per porta. This was indeed collected in some counties (see MNL OL DI 65105), but may not have been a national taxation, only a fine in lieu of participating in the general levy. In general, see Kubinyi, "Staatsorganisation," pp. 52-64.

¹⁹ Cf. 1468:17. (DRH Matth., p. 178.)

²⁰ In spite of Matthias's claim (e.g. in the Preface to the Decretum Maius of 1486) to have "always contemplated" issuing laws of perpetual validity, in the Romanist sense of the prince's legislative power, the estates insisted on what they regarded as ancient custom and demanded that the king observe it. A gloss in the so-called Somogyvár Formulary, quoted in Franciscus Döry, Georgius Bónis, Vera Bácskai, Decreta Regni Hungariae. Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301-1457 (Budapest Akadémiai 1976) p. 54 sheds light on the perception of the times regarding the validity of legal enactments. This gloss, copied in the times of King Matthias (even if reflecting legal thinking that was valid earlier as well), suggests that ancient custom (which it equates with lex) was the most firm basis of judgment, as statute law by the prince may not have been known to all. Without a hierarchy of laws, it was up to the judge to choose between custom, ancient law, and recent statutes in his deliberations. Even parties in a suit seem to have the right to do so. On this, see the reflections of Zsuzsanna Teke in the Introduction to DRH Matth., pp. 37-38.

²¹ This demand goes back to at least the Golden Bull of 1222 but was rarely observed, especially when a honor included both a baronial, court office and one more county ispán posts. See also 1458:7.

²² The implication here is that holders of multiple benefices should equip banderia (or whatever size of troops they are required to) according to their obligations in all their prebends.

14 Fourteenth, the protonotaries shall, under the usual penalty, render justice to each person, and neither they, nor their fellow-judges, can be solicitors. And should someone bring accusation against them or against their sentence to the royal majesty or to the barons, the royal majesty shall examine the sentence with his barons, and if they found that the accusation is false, the accuser shall be punished with the said usual punishment.²³

15 Fifteenth, that the office of county ispán is not to be held by other than a nobleman.²⁴

16 Sixteenth, that under the penalty declared in the decree of the late lord King Sigismund,²⁵ no one's tenant peasants shall be unlawfully abducted. And if the ispán and alispán and the noble magistrates of any county should not return someone's unlawfully abducted tenant peasants, along with the usual fine, upon the complainer's request, they shall be deprived of their offices. Should anyone not dismiss his tenant peasants freely, all nobles are bound to rise up in aid of the ispán against such a person, especially if he did not have the power to force these men. Moreover, if the county ispán himself abducted tenant peasants contrary to the justice and law of the realm, he shall similarly be deprived of his office.²⁶

²³ The jurors sitting with the protonotaries could have been arbiters selected by the litigants, if the judges acted as arbitrators, or noble jurors if they sat as one of the royal benches. The “usual” punishment may refer to that for contempt of court, 25 marks according to 1435/I:7.

²⁴ Cf. Comp. ante 1440: 7, but this stipulation was not mentioned later and we know of no non-noble ispán, only of some alispáns. However, strictly speaking, the king's able treasurer, the Viennese converted Jew, John Ernuszt, who became ispán in Co. Turóc, was not a nobleman, even if he received an estate from the king; see Johann Christian. Engel, Geschichte des Ungarischen Reiches (Halle: Gebauer, 1797), p. 193; more recently: I. Madzsar, “Ernuszt János és haza Budán” [J E. and his house in Buda], Századok. 52 (1918): 56-71. The mercenary captain Hag (see above, n. 12) did not even obtain a royal grant, only mortgaged properties, and still held the comital office of Trencsén. It was also—erroneously—believed by some contemporaries that István Bode of Szeged, count of the chamber of salt and ispán of Co. Csongrád (later mayor of Buda) was not a nobleman (see András Kubinyi, “Budai és pesti polgárok családi összeköttetései a Jagelló-korban” [Family connections of burghers of Buda and Pest in the Jagiello age], Levéltári Közlemények 37 [1966]: 264-68).

²⁵ This prohibition became referred to as the “statute of King Sigismund” (cf. DRH Matth. p. 87, n. XV/2); namely his Decretum maius, 1435/I:7. However, the fines were raised: from three to six and twelve Marks, respectively. Tenant peasant (jobagio, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid. The prohibition of hindering them doing so was mainly the interest of the lesser nobility, whose peasants were sometimes moved (or lured) to the estates of greater landlords who were able to offer better conditions. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

²⁶ Cf. 1458Sz :15.

17 Seventeenth, that only those cases should be tried and adjudicated in ecclesiastical courts and sees as were included in the said decree issued at our coronation, and no others. And if a case is so tried in contravention of this, the king's decision for remedy shall be requested.²⁷

18 Eighteenth, that we shall deprive everyone of the right of patronage over churches and monasteries bearing a seal and keep it for ourselves, because much trouble for the realm and its inhabitants arose from those who thus favor their own patrons and, due to that favor shown, are incapable of the free use of their own seal.²⁸

19 Nineteenth, that no gentleman of the realm, be he ecclesiastic or layman, should, contrary to the freedom of the realm that has been enjoyed since the time of the most holy late King Stephen, lodge a complaint against anyone directly at the Roman curia bypassing the intermediate court, but each one should first seek his justice here in the realm before his ordinary, and only thereafter, if he so wishes, take his case to the curia by appeal. Those who act contrary to this, shall lose their benefices if they are beneficed; and those who are not, or are laymen, shall be punished with capital punishment.²⁹

20 Twentieth, that our stewards may not seize or confiscate any type of goods from anybody on the estates, fairs, and markets of the gentlemen of the realm, without payment and proper price.³⁰

21 Twenty-first, that neither in times of campaigns nor while travelling on other business, may our foot soldiers and cavalymen confiscate food without payment. And if they should attempt to act otherwise, the commander of the foot soldiers or cavalymen shall be punished with suitable

²⁷ See 1464:17.

²⁸ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35. Royal attempts at banning the abuse of the authentic seal by the loca credibilia go back to at least 1351: 3, when lesser convents lost the right to authenticate private legal transactions. During the upheavals of the mid-fifteenth century several chapters and convents, formerly under royal control, came into the hands of secular lords, and even Matthias granted the right of patronage over such royal churches to his followers, thus reducing the central supervision of the notarial functions in these institutions.

²⁹ Cf. the Placitum regium of Sigismund, 1404/I. The imputation that this restriction originated in the times of St. Stephen was not mentioned in the earlier laws, but was, of course, typical of medieval perceptions about ancient law and custom. Cf. also 1440:4; 1445:16 and 1447: 33.

³⁰ Cf. the regulations about purchases for the army in 1439:18, repeated in 1458:17.

punishment. Moreover, should a complaint be submitted to us as to the damage they caused, we shall take care that satisfaction be given by them for the said damage.³¹

22 Twenty-second, that chapters and convents shall keep the regulation included in the aforementioned decree of the late lord King Sigismund concerning the charges for the redemption of letters and for travel.³² Should that regulation not be observed, and this can be proven by the nobles of the said county through means of common inquest or at the county assembly, violators shall lose their benefices.

23 Twenty-third, that we shall cause unlawfully seized estates to be returned and restored to those to whom they belong.³³

24 Twenty-fourth, that henceforth ecclesiastics, be they major or minor, should not be burdened by any tax or levy; those, however, who are bound to render military service, shall do so in the ancient manner.³⁴

25 Twenty-fifth, that tolls shall be exacted in their usual places in the old manner, that is, as was customary in the time of lord King Sigismund.³⁵

26 Twenty-sixth, that no recognizance, made unwillingly, shall be binding, when the truth emerges and demonstrates that it was made unwillingly.³⁶

27 Twenty-seventh, that properties seized by anyone after our coronation shall be returned within thirty days calculated from the date of the present decree; and whoever does not return

³¹ This regulation has been repeated ever since the early fifteenth century, e.g. 1405/II: 1, or 1435/II:6 down to 1464:28.

³² The detailed arrangements in 1435/I: 10, repeated in 1458:28 became the point of reference for centuries.

³³ The obligation to return seized property was already decreed in the early twelfth century (Colo: 32) but became a repeated clause of fifteenth-century laws, see e.g. 1435/I: 3, 1439:29, and 1458:1.

³⁴ Even though ecclesiastical exemption from taxes was long accepted custom, Matthias (just as his predecessors) did tax the clergy for the extraordinary costs of war. On 9 April 1471, for example, he ordered the abbot of Lekér (Co. Bars) to pay 20 golden florins for the war against the infidel (heretical) Czechs under penalty of the seizure of the abbey's lands, see MNL OL DI 17205 and Kovachich, Supplementum, 2: 210-11.

³⁵ See. 1435/I: 20-21.

³⁶ This was, of course, a basic legal tenet (cf. 1447:29) enforced in classical Roman law by a variety of procedural actions (calumnia; oath-taking; false accusation) and protection of the legal persona of the testis idoneus: the witness who gives evidence freely, without compulsion or undue influence. See Adolf Berger, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Roman Law (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Assoc. 1953) 735-56, s.v. "testis"; Joseph A. C. Thomas, Textbook of Roman Law, pp. 86, 256, 318.

them, shall be condemned of an act of might and the judges ordinary shall pass final sentence in the next octave court without further delay.³⁷

28 Twenty-eighth, that all of those who killed nobleman, be they major or minor, without just reason, or caused them to be killed by others, shall be summoned to our presence with a short summons in the following manner: namely, that the plaintiff, after receiving the letter of summons from us, should not proceed with a man of the chapter or convent or with our man against the person against whom he received the letter of summons, unless first, he presents that letter on the day of the meeting of the court of that county where this ought to be transacted, in the customary fashion, publicly, in that very place to the assembled noblemen of that county, and requests of them a noblemen, in whose presence the summons shall served; and once the summons is made, he shall receive a letter about it from the chapter or the convent and the county. And the defendant is required to appear before us within twenty-five days, wherever we shall be staying, with God's guidance, in our kingdom of Hungary,³⁸ to receive sentence and justice by the content and power of the summons. Nonetheless, the defendant shall not have the right of proving his innocence by oath, only by common inquest or by judicial combat. Moreover, he who was accused, if convicted, shall not lose his estate or estates or parts of his estates for that murder, but shall be punished with death and the loss of his head; redemption of his head will not be granted without the agreement of the plaintiff. However, if the accused was charged unjustly and contrary to the order of law and if he proves his innocence by common inquest or by judicial combat, the plaintiff must be condemned in his compensation for unjust harassment; and beyond the composition the judge shall have the right to give satisfaction to the defendant from the property rights of the plaintiff, and no judicial part is to be given from it.³⁹

29 Twenty-ninth, that the following castles: the castle of Szenyér in County Somogy, the castle of Sztropkó in Zemplén, the castle of Dovhe in Máramaros, László Upori's castle of Gelénes in Bereg, the same László Upori's castle of Abara and Cejkov in Zemplén,⁴⁰ Blaise

³⁷ Cf. above, Art. 23. The king actually issued commands in pursuance of this article, e.g., on 24 September 1471 he ordered that the estates of the brothers Horka of Korcsva in Co. Ung, seized by Thomas of Kisezra, be returned to their lawful owners, see MNL OL DI 223415.

³⁸ This expression refers to the court of personal royal presence that functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and was led by the chancellor. After 1464, when it was united with the court of the special personal presence, it became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary, the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff.

³⁹ In spite of the abolition of the short summons in 1464:4, this efficient form of administration of justice did not vanish. Bónis (Jogtudó értelmiség, p. 263) argues that the stipulation of 1468:2 (DRH Matth., p. 174-5), according to which occupied estates had to be returned within fifteen days, opened the way to the factual re-introduction of this procedure, and there is evidence that the court of personal presence held sessions between octaves in the 1460s. This paragraph allows short summons to the court of personal presence in the case of the killing of nobles, but now the county court is included into the procedure of citing the culprit, intending perhaps to reduce the nobility's resistance to the new form of judicial efficiency.

⁴⁰ László Upori was a nobleman from Co. Zemplén, ispán of Máramaros.

Huszár's castles of Kneževac and Frkljevci in Pozsega, and the castle of Lanka in Co. Valkó,⁴¹ must be demolished and destroyed completely within twenty-five days of the date of the present decree, under the punishment of perpetual taint of infidelity.

30 Thirtieth, that upon the request of the county of Somogy, we order that the toll customarily exacted in Csurgó, in the county of Somogy, be abolished thus that this toll never be exacted again there.⁴²

31 Thirty-first and last, that the present decree be obeyed by everyone, under the punishments specified in its articles, and that this decree be copied for each county and delivered to the seat of the court of each county, so it might be at hand for every assembly of the nobles, and that the ispáns or alispáns and the county magistrates of the counties inviolably keep, and cause others to keep, each and every one of the articles included in it, for the cases to which they pertain.⁴³ The said ispáns or alispáns and the county magistrates, as defenders of the common justice, should punish all those acting against it with the punishments specified in this decree. And if anyone should receive a letter from us that is contrary to the decree, it shall not be valid. Furthermore, should the ispáns or alispáns and the county magistrates themselves act in any respect contrary to the decree, in return for such action, commission of crimes and infliction of damages, let them be summoned with terminal summons to our court, where they may not defend themselves with our letter given to them contrary to the decree, but let them be condemned for acts of might.

When these articles were presented, the same prelates, barons, and nobles of the realm begged us to deign to accept, confirm, and considered approved these articles. We, therefore, accepted their petition and, because we considered these articles as specified to serve the common good of our realm in no small measure, we have had these articles copied verbatim into our present letter; we have accepted, confirmed, and considered approved these articles which we wish to be regarded by all as a true decree of the realm. We, by the force and testimony of these, our presents, shall so regard these articles.⁴⁴

⁴¹ Of these castles we know about Szenyér that it was a minor stronghold in the hands of a robber, John Antimus, who was duly convicted (see Iván Borsa, "Egy középnemesi család a középkori Somogyban" [A moyenne noble family in medieval Co. Somogy], Somogy megye múltjából 11 [1980]: 30), and of Stropkov that it was in the hands of Polish highwaymen. The others must have had similar reputations.— The list has minor faults, mainly in the punctuation, in DRH Matth. p. 201, which we have tacitly corrected.

⁴² The market town of Csurgó was the property of the Hospitallers' Priory of Vrana; thus, perhaps the claims of an absentee lord was the reason for the local nobility's opposition to the toll.

⁴³ It is indicative of the immense loss of charters in the kingdom of Hungary that no original of this decree, which must have been sent out in at least some fifty copies, survived.

⁴⁴ Cf. the similar penal clauses in the decrees of 1439 and 1444

Given in Buda, on the Wednesday prior to the feast of St. Matthew the Apostle and Evangelist, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and seventy-one, in the fourteenth year of our reign as king of Hungary etc., in the eighth year of our coronation and in the third year of our reign as king of Bohemia.

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

OF 2 OCTOBER, 1474

This decree is in fact a resolution of the estates, approved by the king. Engaged in Bohemian affairs, where Wladislas of Jagiello was invited to the throne by the Hussite estates, Matthias called several diets which either did not take place (such as the one on December 1473) or had to be held in his absence. The diet that assembled on or around 21 September 1474 in Buda had been called by Matthias from Troppau (in Silesia, today Opava, in the Czech Republic), but he was unable to return to Hungary, having been surrounded in Wrocław by Polish troops. The barons and the county nobles, nevertheless, felt empowered to pass decrees and issue them under the king's name. Although Matthias is reported to have been “shocked” by the news of the diet (so the Elector of Saxony wrote on 28 September, see Fontes rerum Austriacarum 2:26, pp. 290-1), he may have been surprised only by certain specific decisions, but the diet was altogether legitimated by him. In a charter of 13 February 1475 (MNL OL DI 81774), he referred to the decree of 1474 as de consensu nostro speciali editum.

A special charter confirming the decree, was issued under the king's seal, probably one left in Buda, and dated in Buda (DRH Matth, p. 219) while Matthias was still absent. The text, however, expressly emphasized royal authorization, which may have been given by the king in advance.

MSS.: One damaged original on paper (with many lacunae, which have been amended in DRH Matth. and will not be noted in our text), with twelve different, mostly damaged, seals en placard, Zagreb, Croatian National Archives, Documenta medievalia varia No. 475.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1: 372-9; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], p. 213-18.

LIT.: Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Notitiae preliminares ad Syllogem decretorum comitialium, (Pest: Trattner, 1820) pp. 253-54; Erik Fügedi, “Mátyás király jövedelme 1475-ben” [The Income of King Matthias in 1475], Századok 109 (1982): 485-506; János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter,” in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987, pp. 347-87; now see also István Draskóczy, “King Matthias’ Revenue and the Royal Treasury,” in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), pp. 283-4.

2 OCTOBRIS 1474

Nos prelati et barones ac electi nobiles regni Hungar[ie] in presenti congregatione Budensi [c]ongregati totum idem regn[um] representantes, significamus tenore presentium, quibus expedit un[iversis, quod cum] nos hiis diebus de voluntate et mandato serenissimi principis et domini, domini Mathie Dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemie etc. regis domini nostri naturalis in hanc civita[tem Budensem] ad tractandas diversas res regni et presertim factum defensionis fidei contra Turco[s], qui idem regnum Hungarie diversis prediis et spoliis affecerunt et in futurum fortius, quam a[lias unquam] dilacerare pretendunt, concernentes convenissemus factaque et negotia atque necessitudinem prefati regni Hungarie diutius inter nos pertractassemus, devenimus tandem communiter in in[frascriptos] articulos, quos sicuti nunc pro utiliori statu, comoditate et necessitate totius ipsius regni Hungarie ac incolarum eiusdem utiliter convenire cognovimus, ita communi volunt[ate et] parili consensu conclusimus et finaliter determinavimus.

I. Primo, quod subsidium unius floreni auri pro defensione dicti regni Hungarie contra Thurcos de singulis portis per tot[um regnum] modo infrascripto detur, quod per nos ac regnicolas inclusum et determinatum de omnibus bonis tam domini nostri regis et domine genetricis sue, quam etiam nostris et aliorum [quorumcunque] possessionatorum hominum etiam qualitercunque exemptorum, necnon de civitatibus regalibus irremissibiliter persolvatur et nemini relaxetur. Si qui autem aliqui exempti istud [subsidium] non redderent, extunc neque alii solvere teneantur.

II. Secundo, quod sales pro huiusmodi subsidio modo infrascripto omnibus nobis verissime persolvantur.

III. Tertio, quod e[ligantur] per nos duo notabiles viri vel plures ad camaras salium in Transsilvaniam et Maromorosium, ad quorum manus dominus thesaurarius omnes sales, qui i[n cameris] sunt, sine omni difficultate assignari faciat et assignet. Quos quidem sales idem dominus thesaurarius teneatur deduci facere tam in aquis, quam super terras in exp[ensis] regiis ad camaras filiales, ubi dicti electi viri teneantur distribuere comitatibus secundum numerum portarum. Qui autem ire voluerint per se in curribus propriis, ad ca[meras] Transsilvanensem vel Maromorosensem, habeant liberam facultatem et illis solvantur sales tam pro expensis, quam etiam laboribus et numero portarum. Postquam autem isti viri electi, cer[tos] reddiderint comitatus, quod sales in manibus eorum sunt, eo facto incipiatur exactio presentis subsidii, prius tamen fiat connumeratio iuxta modum inferius specificandum.

IV. Quarto, q[uod] de quolibet comitatu ad dispositionem presentis subsidii eligantur duo nobiles potiores ad computandum et connumerandum universas et singulas portas omnium possessionatorum hominum, prout mo[ris] erat temporibus divorum regum secundum consuetudinem lucri camere, ita ut porte numerentur et non fumus neque sessiones deserte et alia loca deserta numerentur. Isto declara[to], quod si ob metum huius subsidii ad aliorum domus post congregationem presentem se contulissent, per hoc non sint supportati, nisi illi, quibus facilitates ad solvendum non suppetarent, que v[ideant] secundum conscientias eorum connumeratores deputandi.

V. Quinto, quod ipsi nobiles electi connumeratores stipendia sua habeant a domino thesaurario ad rationem regie maiestatis.

VI. Sexto, quod quamvis lucrum c[amere] anni futuri sit relaxatum etiam modo ex novo relaxetur.

VII. Septimo, si regia [maies]tas vel hoc regnum a sanctissimo domino papa vel ab aliis principibus Christianis pro facto fidei subsid[ium] habeat, sive non, usque ad annum integrum nulla exercituaione vel alio gravam[ine q]uocunque impediatur regnicole. Si autem contingerit imperatorem Turcorum cum sua potentia adven[ire], obligentur regnicole more ab antiquo consueto exercituare.

VIII. Octavo, quod istud subsid[ium] non alias nisi contra Thurcos exponatur.

IX. Nono, quod illi comitatus, qui singulos viginti quinque denari[os] solverunt, presens subsidium ad numerum illorum exactorum [denariorum solvant].

X. D[ecimo, quod] octave infra annum integrum non celebrentur, maxime ex eo, quia maior pars regni vel quasi totum regnum erit in exercituaione contra Thurc[os et etiam propter labores presentis] subsidii.

XL. [Undecimo, quod] bona quorumcunque post recessum dicti domini regis [o]ccupata per quoscunque remittantur. Si autem aliquis talium occupantium rebellaret in hac parte, [tunc person]a regie maiestatis bona talis presentem dispositionem contempnentis occupare possit, [b]onaque [occupata ill[is] reddantur, a quibus fuerunt occupata.

XII. Duodecimo, quod super invasionibus domo[rum e]t possessionum ac interemptionibus et verberationibus nobilium post recessum domini nostri regis commiss[is] et perpetratis, vel etiam in futurum fiendis persona regie maiestatis faciat iustitiam, prout in[for]matum est a domino rege.

XIII. Tredecimo conclusum est universaliter per nos, quod tale subsidium per conn[umeratinem] salium regalium vel alie exactiones amplius nullomodo fiant.

XIV. Decimo quarto, quod iobagiones quorumcunque usque ad annum integrum non dimittantur. Si autem aliqui eorum salientes recesserint, [vel] non habita licentia et iusto terragio eorum minime deposito aliqui eosdem deduxerint, tales reddantur suo domino iuxta antiquam consuetudinem cum gravaminibus consuetis.

XV. Decimo quinto, quod ex[ercituantes] descendentes contra Thurcos vel etiam alias utantur in expensis propriis et non cum spoliis, sicuti usque modo fecerunt; neque etiam in domibus nobilium descensum facere audeant. Ita [tamen], quod si aliqui contra hunc articulum fecerint, evocentur brevi evocatione coram regia maiestate vel in absentia regis coram persona sua.

XVI. Sexto decimo conclusum est per nos, ut nos pre[lati et] barones faciamus dicere decimas iuxta antiquam consuetudinem regni, ita videlicet ut recipiatur iuramentum a quocunque homine et ultra non dicetur aliquis; et huiusmodi decime e[xigantur] iuxta decreta condam serenissimorum regum Hungarie Lodovici et Sigismundi.

Quos quidem articulos et omnia in eis contenta per nos, ut premissum est, unanimi voluntate conclusos [tamquam utiles] et pro presenti necessitate dicti regni Hungarie et pro re publica ipsius convenientes acceptavimus et approbavimus, immo nominibus et in personis universorum regnicolarum dicti regni accep[tamus] et approbamus observabimusque, quantum in nobis est, per omnes regnicolas huius regni cuiuscunque status, condicionis et linguagii existant, observari faciemus. Harum litterarum [nostrarum], quibus sigilla nostra sunt apposita, vigore et testimonio mediante.

Datum Bude, die dominico proximo ante festum beati Francisci confessoris, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo septua[gesimo quarto.]

2 OCTOBER, 1474

We, Hungary's prelates, barons and elected noblemen, representing the entire realm in the present diet convened in Buda, make known to all to whom it may concern through these presents that recently, when we assembled here in this city of Buda, by the will and order of the most serene prince and lord, lord Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, etc., our natural lord, to discuss various matters of the realm, especially the defense of the faith against the Turks – who have been ravaging and plundering this kingdom of Hungary in different ways and will devastate her even more forcefully in the future – and, after having deliberated among ourselves at length about the affairs, business, and needs of the said kingdom of Hungary, we finally agreed on the following articles which we believed would be beneficial to the better state, advantage and needs of this entire kingdom of Hungary and her inhabitants, we finally agreed on and defined them in common agreement and uniform accord.

1 First, that for the defense of the said kingdom of Hungary against the Turks one golden florin of subsidy is to be given from every porta in the entire realm in the following way: That we and the gentlemen of the realm agreed upon and decided that it is to be paid without exception from the estates of our lord king and the lady, his mother,¹ as well as from our estates and other exempted men of property, and by the royal cities, and no one should be exempt from payment.² However, if any exempted man did not pay it, then the others should not be obligated to pay either.³

2 Second, that as a compensation for this said subsidy, salt shall be given to all of us in the manner described below.⁴

¹ Elisabeth Szilágyi held at that time still a great part of the enormous Hunyadi family wealth, castle Mukačeve with Co. Bereg, the town of Debrecen, and a great number of market towns and villages mostly in eastern Hungary (see Bálint Hóman, Gyula Szekfű, Magyar történet, [Hungarian history] 4th ed., 2:560 and map between pp. 423-28 (Budapest: Kir. M. Egyetemi Nyomda, 1942). She died in 1483 and bequeathed these properties to John Corvin, her illegitimate grandson.

² The cities, apparently not represented at the diet, protested against this infringement on their liberties, and the king granted many of them exemption from the subsidy; see the charters quoted in DRH Matth., p. 214 n. 1/2. See also, András Kubinyi, “Zur Frage der Vertretung der Städte im ungarischen Reichstag bis 1526,” in: Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 65-102.

³ This “escape clause” was one of the reasons why this time (as in many other instances) much less was collected than expected; see András Kubinyi, “Die Staatsorganisation der Matthiaszei,” in: Idem, Matthias Corvinus (Herne: Schäfer, 1999), pp. 5-96, here 52-63.

⁴ Salt was, as everywhere in medieval Europe, a rare commodity and an early royal monopoly; also, it was used to pay soldiers (see 1405/I:20 and 1471:4). The intent of this measure may have been to give the estates some control over the most important royal income, the salt monopoly, see István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and Trade in Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages” in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.. No wonder that the king, once he returned from Silesia cancelled its implementation.

3 Third, that two or more respected men shall be elected by us to the salt chambers of Transylvania and Maramureș, into whose hands the Lord Treasurer⁵ should surrender all the salt in the chambers, or have it surrendered to them without any hindrance. And the same Lord Treasurer shall be required to have this salt transported by land and water to the subsidiary chambers at royal expense,⁶ where the said elected gentlemen are obliged to distribute it among the counties according to the number of the portae. Those, however, who want to go to the chambers in Transylvania and Maramureș with their own carts, are allowed to do so, and salt shall be given to them for their expenses and labor, as well as for the number of portae. Moreover, after those same elected men will have notified their counties that the salt is in their hands, exaction of the present subsidy should forthwith begin, but first a census must be conducted in the manner described below.

4 Fourth, that for dealing with the present subsidy two substantial noblemen shall be elected in every county to assess and count each and every porta belonging to all propertied men, as was the custom in the times of the former kings in regard to the chamber's profit: so that the gates shall be counted, but not the smoke, nor the deserted plots, nor other abandoned places⁷ – but with this provision: if anyone, fearing this subsidy, moved to someone else's house after this present diet, he should not be exempted, unless his means are insufficient for payment, which resources the counting men should examine according to their conscience.⁸

⁵ The Lord Treasurer between 1467 and 1476 was Sigismund Ernuszt, of Csáktornya), (d. 1504) bishop of Pécs 1473-1504, the engineer of Matthias's monetary and fiscal reforms.

⁶ The salt monopoly was one of the major incomes of the crown. At the time of this decree, it may have been almost half of all the regular revenue, amounting to more than 100 thousand gold florins; see Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental," pp. 357-60. Cf. 1405/I:20; 1439:11 and 1458:10. The location of royal chambers of salt changed over times so that for the fifteenth century, András Kubinyi in "Königliches Salzmonopol und die Städte des Königreichs Ungarn" in Stadt and Salz im Mittelalter, ed. Wilhelm Rausch (Linz: Wimmer, 1988), pp. 213-32, counted sixty-six places, which at one time or another housed a salt distributing chamber. Most of them were in market towns, a quarter in royal cities, and a few in ports.

⁷ The chamber's profit, (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages..It amounted to 20d per tenant plot (porta). The precise prescription here—plots or portae instead of hearths—may imply that in the preceding years (1471-72) taxes were levied on every family (household, feux), as Erik Fügedi in "Das Königreich Ungarn 1458-1490" in Schallaburg, '82. Matthias Corvinus and die Renaissance in Ungarn (1458-1541). 8. Mai-1. November, 1982 (Vienna: Niederösterreich. Landesausstellung, 1982) p. 490) assumed. Considering that by this time often 3 or 4 families lived on one plot, the portal tax was raised to 30 or 40 denarii according to the number of household. In the 1470s the treasure counted on some 400m thousand florins, more than half of the regular income from this tax. See Kubinyi, "Die Staatsorganisation," pp. 52-64.

⁸ By 1474 many estates in Lower Hungary were seriously depopulated and ravaged by Ottoman raids ever from the early fifteenth century. A typical example for this is a 1478 conscription of estates in Co. Valkó along the River Drava, in which more than half of the plots lacked a building on them, and besides 45 inhabited villages, 50 deserted ones were recorded, see István Szabó, "Magyarország népessége az 1300- as és 1526. évek között" [Population of Hungary between the 1330s and 1526], in Kovacsics, József, ed.

5 Fifth, that the elected census takers shall receive payment from the Lord Treasurer at royal expense.

6 Sixth, although the chamber's profit for the coming year has already been remitted, it shall also be cancelled anew.⁹

7 Seventh, whether the royal majesty or the realm receives subsidy from His Holiness the Pope or from other Christian princes for the defense of the faith,¹⁰ or not, the gentlemen of the realm shall not be burdened with military service or with any other duty whatsoever for an entire year. If, however, the Turkish Emperor should happen to attack with force, the gentlemen of the realm would be required to go to war in accordance with ancient custom.

8 Eighth, that this subsidy shall be used only against the Turks, and not otherwise.

9 Ninth, that those counties that used to pay twenty-five pennies each, should pay this present subsidy according to those terms.¹¹

Magyarország történeti demográfája (Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi K., 1963), pp. 65-66. In the late fifteenth century, the number of families living on one tenant plot, originally regarded as necessary and sufficient for a household, often increased to four or more (see Reg. 1467). István. Szabó (Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez [Studies on the history of the Hungarian peasantry], pp. 13-14 (Budapest: Teleki Pál Tud. Int., 1942) found that in some parts of the country one third or less of the tenant peasants held a full virgate, while quarter-virgaters amounted to up to 40-50% of the rural population. On the other hand, there is evidence for peasant tenants with sufficient land to their name to have moved together precisely in order to avoid paying the portal tax separately; on these problems see now András Kubinyi, "Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen und Wirtschaft in den Besitzungen der Magnatenfamilie Garai in Ungarn," Festschrift Othmar Field, pp. 367-77 (Graz-Wien: Leykan, 1987). The number of cottars is difficult to judge, but early sixteenth-century sources register some 16-20% inquilini in the villages and around 25% in the agrarian towns, suggesting an immigration of the poorer peasants into market-towns. The differentiation among those legally classified as "cottars" was considerable; laws about the obligation of some cottars to pay taxes implies that they held land as farmers, see Szabó, Tanulmányok, pp. 25-30.

⁹ As Fügedi ("Mátyás király," p. 490) pointed out, the perception of contemporaries that Matthias frequently collected the portal tax (chamber's profit) and the subsidy more than once a year—a statement that survived in the literature until our days—was not altogether accurate. Kubinyi (in "Staatsorganisation," pp.58-9) counted together all known instances of tax collection during Matthias's fifty years of reign and found that in the over-all average the king levied taxes 1.3-times a year, which means that double taxation happened every third year!

¹⁰ This was regularly stipulated at the levy of war taxes, ever since 1397:63, and, considering the enormous expense the country had to cover for the defense of the southern border, the fisc could not help keeping it, faute de mieux, in the majority of cases.

¹¹ There is no evidence on this type of tax; maybe the chamber's profit (usually 20d) was collected in a somewhat higher amount to make up for lost assessments since November 1473, the last date of taxation.

10 Tenth, that octave courts shall not be held for an entire year, particularly because most of the realm and almost the entire kingdom will be on military service against the Turks and also because of the burden of the present subsidy.¹²

11 Eleventh, that all the estates, seized after the departure of the said lord king,¹³ shall be returned by everyone. However, should any such usurper resist this matter, the royal majesty shall have the right to seize the estate of those disobeying the present decree, and to restore the seized properties to those from whom they had been seized.

12 Twelfth, that the court of personal presence of the royal majesty now and in the future shall render justice in accordance with the orders of the lord king in cases where, after the departure our lord king, the mansions and estates of noblemen were attacked or nobles were killed or beaten.¹⁴

13 Thirteenth, we unanimously decided that such a subsidy through the accounting of royal salt, or other levy of taxes should not occur in the future in any way.¹⁵

14 Fourteenth, that no one has to release his tenant peasants for a whole year. If someone among these peasants, however, runs away or is taken away without permission and payment of the proper rent, these men should be returned to their lords according to the ancient custom, along with the usual fine.¹⁶

¹² It is to be noted that, while in Art. 7 the estates tried to avoid mounting a general levy, here they acknowledged the fact that no courts will be held because of the campaign. The suspension of regular sessions of the octave courts was usual in wartime (e.g. 1454:10, 1458:4). This was, among others, the reason for the judicial reforms, such as the short summons and so on, see 1464.

¹³ Matthias had left for the Silesian campaign on 29 May 1474.

¹⁴ There are several citations known which refer to this article and summon culprits extra octavam to the court of personal presence (e.g. MNL OL DI 81774, 103776). By this decision the estates in fact readmitted the short summons against which they had protested in 1464 (see above, with n. 6).

¹⁵ This was promised by the king and even the regent ever since 1458, and, of course, never kept. Matthias levied taxes after this decree already in 1475, and annually thereafter (see n. 9, above).

¹⁶ Cf. 1405/I:6 and its many repetitions. There is still no good monograph on the issue of the free movement of tenants in medieval Hungary, especially one that would differentiate between the peasants' right to change lords and the forcible abduction of working hands. It seems that both the well-off tenants (in search of better economic possibilities) and the poorest peasants (in search of livelihood) moved around, much more than other rural folk in late medieval Europe. The prohibition of detaining tenants was aimed probably at lesser nobles, who could not offer such advantageous deals (reduction of dues, etc.) as the great landowners, while the measures against abduction were aimed at the aristocracy's abusing their military might. See, András Kubinyi, "Horizontale Mobilität im spätmittelalterlichen Königreich Ungarn," in Gerhard Jaritz, A. Müller, ed. Migration in der Feudalgesellschaft pp. 113-39 (Frankfurt-New York: Campus, 1988); briefly also in János M. Bak "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruïn, pp. 387-400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2010).

15 Fifteenth, that soldiers, serving in a campaign against the Turks and in other cases as well, should live on their own means, not by plundering, as they have done before; they shall not dare billet in the houses of noblemen. Should any one act contrary to this article, he should be summoned with short summons to the royal majesty, or, in his absence, to the court of personal presence.¹⁷

16 Sixteenth, we decided that we, lord prelates and barons, would see to the exaction of tithes in accordance with the ancient custom of the realm, that is, that an oath should be exacted from every single man and no one should pay a tithe beyond that (declaration of oath); and these tithes shall be collected according to the decrees of the late most serene kings of Hungary, Louis and Sigismund.¹⁸

We have accepted and approved by our common will these articles and all their contents, decreed by us, as stated above, as useful for the present needs of the said kingdom of Hungary and for the commonwealth thereof; moreover, we shall accept and approve them in the name and person of all the gentlemen of the realm in the same kingdom and will keep them as far as we are able and will make all gentlemen of the realm, of whatever state, rank and tongue, keep them. By the force and witness of these presents of our, to which our seals are appended.¹⁹

Given in Buda, on the Sunday preceding the feast of St. Francis the Confessor, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and seventy-four.

¹⁷ Cf. 1471:21 and its predecessors since the early fifteenth century.

¹⁸ Cf. 1351:6, 1411:5-6, 1435/I:7.

¹⁹ Not all seals can be identified. Six seem to have been of ecclesiastics, among them Urban of Nagylucse, at this time provost of St. Nicholas in Székesfehérvár and officer of the Treasury (later bishop of Győr 1481-6, of Eger 1486-91, Chief Treasurer 1479-90), and Nicholas Bátori, bishop of Vác;(1474-1506); of the six other seals of secular barons, those of Michael Ország of Gút, (lord chief treasurer 1436-37, 1440-53, count palatine 1458-84), Imre Zapolya (a. k. a. Szapolyai chief treasurer 1459-64, governor of Bosnia, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1464-65, ispán of Spiš 1465, count palatine 1486-87); Stephen Bátori, (judge royal 1471–1493, voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely 1479–1493); and Matthew of Marót, (ban of Mačva, 1469–1476) can be more or less unequivocally identified; see DRH Matth., p. 213. On some of them, see the section on “Potentates around the king,” in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), pp. 266-73.

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)
OF 29 MARCH, 1478

This decree displays nicely the procedure of the estates' agreeing to the taxation, in return submitting their requests (later to be called gravamina) and the king approves them. Matthias invited the counties to the diet from his Austrian headquarters (Korneuburg, 22 December 1477) for St. Valentine's Day, 1478. At that date, cases pending before the court of the personal presence were also to be heard. Since this was in fact done, we have definite evidence that a fair number of counties had sent their deputies to Buda, combining the attendance at the diet with other legal matters (see the charters quoted in DRH Matth., p. 236, n. 4).

MSS.: Four contemporary copies on paper, MNL OL D1 65961,103817, 88600, and 45713.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Ignatius Batthyany, Leges ecclesiastici regni Hungariae et provinciarum adjacentium. 3. vols. Alba-Carolina: Typis episcopalibus, 1785–1827, pp. 513-4 (excerpt); Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1: 378-87; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [= DRH Matth.], pp. 237-43.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, "A magyar állam a középkor végén," [The Hungarian state at the end of the Middle Ages], in: Magyar Művelődéstörténet, ed. Sándor Domanovszky, et al. 2: 58, 61 (Budapest: Kir. M. Egyetemi Nyomda, n. d. [1942]); Erik Fügedi, "Mátyás király jövedelme 1475- ben" [The Income of King Matthias in 1475], Századok 109 (1982): 485-506, here p. 490 now see also István Draskóczy, "King Matthias' Revenue and the Royal Treasury," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), pp. 283-4.

29 MARTII 1478

Nos Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, Bohemie etc. memorie commendamus per presentes, quod redeuntibus iam pridem nobis dato divinitus nobili triumpho et felici victoria de bello Austrie in hanc urbem nostram Budensem, convenientibus ibidem tunc in dieta generali fidelibus nostris universis prelati, baronibus ac proceribus et electis omnium comitatum regni nostri nobilibus tractantibusque eisdem de hiis, que utilitatem bonam pacem et tranquillum statum ipsius regni precise concernerent, quibus sic diutius laborantibus volventibusque et revolventibus rebus et negotiis defensionem et conservationem regni respicientibus iidem domini prelati et barones ac nobiles antedicti inter ceteras eorum laudabiles ordinationes presentarunt nobis certos articulos, utpote infrascriptos supplicantes humiliter nostre maiestati, ut eosdem articulos acceptare et ratificare eosque et eorum quemlibet ex innata nostra benignitate conservare dignaremur.

I. Quorum quidem articulorum primus talis est:

Serenissime princeps!

Quamvis a magno tempore satis simus gravati, tamen considerata opportuna necessitate, attenta etiam petitione maiestatis vestre nuper per suos fideles oratores, in presenti congregatione facta, confisi insuper in benignitate eiusdem, ut deinceps inantea nos benevolentia sua regia prosequetur nobisque dominus gratiosissimus et benignissimus existat ac etiam in omnibus consuetudinibus antiquis nos gratiose conservabit, contribuimus hoc anno presenti maiestati vestre de singulis portis iobagionum nostrorum florenum unum cum lucro camere computandum.

II. Secundus articulus. Item ut maiestas vestra eo melius necessitati sue ac libertati et restaurationi regnorum suorum providere defensionique contra insultus Thurcorum magis intendere possit, pollicemur in sequentibus quinque annis, scilicet a futuro festo Circumcisionis Domini, anni videlicet eiusdem millesimi quadringentesimi septuagesimi noni similiter contribuere vestre maiestati de singulis portis iobagionum nostrorum, prout infra notabitur, simul cum lucro camere maiestati vestre computandum florenum unum.

Hoc tamen declarato, quod prima contributio exigatur in festo Circumcisionis Domini proxime futuro, relique autem usque ad completionem quinque annorum integrorum semper in festivitatibus beati Martini exigantur.

Ita videlicet quod maiestas vestra dignetur acceptare articulos infrascriptos:

III. Primo quod istis annis sequentibus prelati, barones, proceres, nobiles et quicumque regnicole huius regni sub quacunque occasione contra quoscunque inimicos vestre serenitatis et regni sui exercituare non teneantur; excepto dumtaxat, si Romanorum et Thurcorum imperatores ac Polonie et Bohemie reges ac bassa Romanie dum cum exercitu imperiali hoc regnum maiestatis vestre personaliter invadere contigeret; quodsi aliquo casu accideret, tunc quilibet regnicolarum iuxta antiquam regni consuetudinem exercituare teneatur et nec aliquis se ab ingressu exercitus huiusmodi, pecuniis exonerare et redimere possit.

IV. Item dicatio presens et futura hoc modo fiat, quod nobiles unius sessionis, domus allodiales nobilium et presbyterorum ac familiares eorundem, qui expensis dominorum suorum nutriuntur, villici quoque et nimium pauperes non dicentur neque loca deserta nec molendina.

De capitibus dicarum duo denarii et non plures recipiantur et neque villicus neque villa expensas dicatoribus dare teneatur.

Pro uno floreno centum denarii recipiantur et non ultra.

Inquilini autem illi dicentur, qui terras arabiles sessionum vel vineas proprias colunt, alii vero non dicentur.

V. Pretera in omni comitatu adiungatur semper dicatori unus idoneus, qui cum iuramento teneatur videre et facere secundum contenta presentis decreti ea, que et serenissimo domino regi ac ipsi comitatui iusta sunt; et insuper in una sede iudiciaria ad hanc rem deputanda teneantur in quolibet comitatu omnes villici importare capita dicarum a tribus annis integris et cum iuramento et etiam in registro ipsi comitatui presentare; et ea domino regi comitatus ipse fideliter conscribere debeat.

VI. Item quia hoc regnum serenitatis vestre super omnia alia gravamina et oppressiones per exercituantes equites et pedites ad ultimam desolationem et exacerbationem magnam in tantum devenit, quod iam pauperes incole regni huius vix vite necessaria habere possunt, humillimis et devotis precibus supplicamus maiestati vestre, ut eadem consideratis nostris obsequiosis fidelitatibus, attentis etiam desolationibus regni sui, ut idem aliqualiter respiret et vires suas pristinas recuperet, dignetur tenere talem modum et viam, ne deinceps ipsi incole huius regni per ipsos exercituantes – quemadmodum hactenus – oppressionem et desolationem patiantur neque per labores castrorum finitimorum et exactiones victualium opprimantur demptis edificationibus castrorum Kewy, Posasyn et Haram, que si reparabuntur, comitatus illis propinqui adiumento esse debebunt; et quod exercituantes in domibus nobilium et allodiis non descendant.

VII. Item quod infra istos prescriptos quinque annos per omnes comitatus huius regni congregationes generales seu iudicia universalia in comitatibus fieri solita non celebrentur propter inopiam ipsius regni demptis comitatibus Posega, Walko, Sirimiensi, Baranya ex alia parte Drawe tantum, Chanadiensi, Themesiensi, in Zarand et Orodiensi, in quibus diversa furticinia, latrocinia, mutilationes hominum venditiones, decollationes aliaque multiplicia malorum genera committi dicuntur, propter que iudicia generalia non omittantur, sed celebrentur; ita videlicet, quod in pretactis iudiciis pecunie descensuales non exigantur, sed neque birsagia, insuper etiam factum possessionum in ipsis iudiciis non iudicetur. Preteritis autem istis annis huiusmodi congregationes generales non aliter, nisi consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac procerum regni celebrentur.

VIII. Item pro possessionibus et bonis occupatis sive per donationem regiam sive alio modo commissis possint fieri contra occupatores breves evocationes et procedatur contra eos iuxta regni consuetudinem ordine iuris. Si vero tempore statutionis contradictores legitimi apparuerint, impetrator talis possessionis non debet introire nec permanere in dominio possessionis. Quodsi ausu temerario factum fuerit, procedatur contra eum ordine iuris per breves evocationes et vincatur talis in estimatione illius possessionis vel bonorum, sicuti antiquitus fuit.

IX. Item quod serenitas vestra ad simplicem querimoniam quorumcunque possessiones et bona nobilium occupari facere non permittat.

X. Item quod maiestas vestra absque iuris ordine maiorem vel minorem non captivet, nisi eos, quos iura regni consueta captivari permittunt; neque aliquem ex prelatibus, baronibus, proceribus et nobilibus huius regni exulet vel captivet sine sententia et consilio dominorum prelatorum, baronum, procerum et nobilium, sicuti antiquitus erat consuetum.

XI. Item quod iudicia octavalia in sede banorum Machoviensium amodo imposterum non celebrentur et quod iudicia in facto possessionum infra revolutionem duorum annorum preteritorum facta reportentur ad octavas in presentiam dominorum prelatorum, baronum ac magistrorum prothonotariorum et electorum nobilium regni ad discussionem et revisionem.

XII. Item quod breves evocationes in omnibus articulis prius superinde per regiam maiestatem et dominos prelatos et barones, proceresque regni editis tam sub palatinali quam comitis Stephani de Bathor sigillis emanari et iudicari possint, sicut sub sigillo personalis presentie regie maiestatis et quod reverendissimus dominus Colocensis necnon magnifici domini palatinus et comes Stephanus de Bathor ac prelati et barones ad iudicium et iudicandum nunc in presenti congregatione electi vel saltem eorum media pars semper in iudicio tam octavarum quam etiam brevium evocationum interesse debeant et eorum auctoritate et presentia quelibet causa saltem gravis diffiniri.

XIII. In adiudicatione siquidem brevium evocationum et octavarum talis teneatur modus, quod videlicet inter ipsas quattuor octavas hactenus celebrari solitas octave festi beati Michaelis archangeli cunctis causantibus regni nostri communiter more alias consueto absque omni occasione adveniendi celebrari debeant, pro ceteris autem tribus octavis pronunc certis rationibus obmissis taliter conclusum est, ut vice, loco et terminis octavarum pretermisissarum iudicia brevium evocationum vigesimo quinto die festorum ad hoc ab antiquo deputatorum, utpote beatorum Georgii, Iacobi et Epiphaniarum Domini inchoando sequentibus aliis viginti diebus ferialibus sine intermissione continuentur.

XIV. Item quod serenitas vestra ea omnia que pro restauratione et conservation regni sui articulatim in hoc registro sunt conscripta, benigne acceptare et roborare atque considerata fidelitate nostra nos in omnibus consuetudinibus et libertatibus antiquis secundum decreta predecessorum regum serenitatis vestre, quorum decreta tempore coronationis sue Albe confirmavit, tenere et conservare dignetur gratiose.

XV. Item in dicationibus decimarum teneatur antiquus modus, ut dicatores debeant contentari iuramentis rusticorum; ubi autem voluerint valeant examinare acervos cum birsagiis consuetis. Insuper ubi decime cum pecuniis exiguntur, iudices nobilium deputentur cum dicatoribus, qui vadant, si volunt, in eorum propriis expensis et non decimatorum et fideliter attendant dicationes. Ubi vero dicatores iniuste dicare vellent, iudices nobilium desistant ire cum eisdem; si vero rusticus aliquis iuramentum prestiterit, tunc dicator rusticum sic iuratum amplius vexare vel dicare non possit, nisi in tantum, sicuti prestitit iuramentum. Ex quo autem in quibusdam comitatibus dicatores decimarum rusticos, qui pro eorum frugibus iuramentum prestiterint, ratione huiusmodi iuramenti talem rusticum iuratum in duabus capetiis frugum dicare consueverunt, id amplius nequaquam facere queant, si non fuerit consuetudo.

Quibus quidem articulis, per eosdem prelatos, barones ac nobiles comitatum regni antedictos nostre maiestati – ut premissum est – presentatis, cum ad humillimam supplicationem eorundem nobis porrectam, tum etiam ex eo, quod predictos articulos ad bonam pacem et tranquillum statum utilitatemque dicti regni nostri ordinatos esse conspeximus, eosdem articulos acceptavimus et ratificavimus dictosque prelatos, barones, nobiles et eorum quemlibet in eisdem conservare polliciti sumus, immo acceptamus et ratificamus pollicemurque harum nostrarum vigore et testimonio litterarum mediante.

Datum Bude predicta in Dominica Quasimodo anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo septuagesimo octavo.

29 MARCH, 1478

We, Matthias, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Bohemia, etc, wish to be remembered through these presents that, after we had returned from the war in Austria with the help of God in noble triumph and happy victory¹ to this our city, Buda, and all our faithful prelates, barons, lords, and the nobles elected by all the counties of our kingdom assembled there in a diet and discussed those things which directly concern the benefit, peace, and undisturbed state of the same kingdom, and exerted themselves to discuss and debate at length matters and affairs regarding the defense and protection of the realm, the same lords prelates, barons, and aforementioned nobles submitted to us, among other commendable dispositions, the particular articles which are listed below, beseeching humbly our majesty to deign to accept and confirm these same articles and to maintain each one of them by our inborn benevolence.

1 The first of those articles is this:

Most serene prince!

Although we have been considerably burdened for a long time, nonetheless, considering the present necessities and taking into account your majesty's request, recently made by your envoys in the present diet and, moreover, trusting in your benevolence that henceforth you will grant us your royal goodwill and will be our most benevolent and benign lord and will graciously keep us in all our ancient customs, we shall pay your majesty this year one florin for every porta of our tenant peasants, counted together with the chamber's profit.²

2 Second article. Likewise, we promise, so that your majesty might better meet his needs and look after the freedom and restoration of his kingdoms and better provide for the defense against the raids of the Turks, that in the next five years, that is from the next feast of the Circumcision of the Lord³ in the year of one thousand four hundred and seventy-nine, we shall similarly pay your majesty one florin for every porta of our tenant peasants, counted together with the chamber's profit as noted below.

¹ Matthias had attacked Emperor Frederick III in his hereditary lands in mid-1447 and stood before Vienna, when negotiations were arranged by Pope Pius II. These finally lead to a peace treaty, signed on 1 December 1477 in Korneuburg and Gmünden, respectively (see Karl Nehring, Matthias Corvinus, Kaiser Friedrich III. und das Reich. Zum hunyadisch-habsburgischen Gegensatz im Donauraum, 2d ed. (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1989), pp. 89-95).

² It was usual ever since King Sigismund's time to combine the "extraordinary" subsidy with the chamber's profit, a traditional direct tax that grew out of the revenue from devaluating the money. It amounted usually to 20d, thus the one florin extra tax was in fact only 80d. On all this, see, e.g. András Kubinyi, "Die Statsorganisation der Matthiaszeit," in: Idem, Matthias Corvinus (Herne: Schäfer, 1999) 5-96, here pp. 52-60.

³ 1 January.

With this provision, however: that the first tax should be collected on the next feast of the Circumcision of the Lord⁴ and the rest should always be collected, until the entire five-year-term is over⁵ on the feast of St. Martin.⁶

Your majesty should thus deign to accept the following articles.

3 First, that in the following years the prelates, barons, lords, nobles, and other gentlemen of the realm of whatever kind shall not be required to go to war on any occasion and against any enemies of your majesty and your realm, unless the Roman or the Turkish emperor or the kings of Bohemia and Poland or the pasha of Romania⁷ should personally attack your majesty's realm with an imperial army; should this circumstance occur, then every gentleman of the realm shall be required to go to war according to the ancient custom of the realm and no one may redeem and buy himself off with money from military campaign.⁸

4 Then, that the current and the future tax collection should be transacted thus that nobles possessing one plot, the households and servants who live on the expense of their lords on the allod of the nobles and priests, and the reeves, and the very poor should not be taxed, neither should abandoned sites and mills. Two pennies and no more shall be exacted for the tallies; neither the reeve nor the village shall be required to pay the expenses of the tax collectors.⁹

⁴ Actually, the king demanded the subsidy for 1479 as early as 12 December 1478; MNL OL DI 230011.

⁵ 11 November.

⁶ The fact that Matthias engineered the approval of the diet in advance for five years was not of major importance, for the diets usually granted the king's demands anyhow, and if they would not, the royal council did.

⁷ The measure's meaning is that if the sultan or the beylerbey of Rumelia, i. e., the commander-in-chief of the European army of the Ottoman Empire, would attack, the levy can be called, but not if merely the lesser beys or pashas of the frontier region conduct forays into the country.

⁸ This last clause may refer to the arrangement included in the military ordinance of 6 April 1464 (DRH Matth., pp. 152-5), which allowed the redemption of military service at the rate of 10 gold florins for every mounted soldier (that was to be armed and mobilized after every 12 portae). This was unusual in Hungary, but may have been useful for the king, who by that time proceeded aggressively with building up his professional army (see Gyula Rázsó, "The Mercenary Army of King Matthias Corvinus," in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds., From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary. (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982), pp. 125-40, esp. pp. 127-28). Now also: Tamás Pálosfalvi, "King Matthias' Army," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), pp. 295-7.

⁹ The stipulations follow the traditional modus of collecting the chamber's profit, see e.g., 1351:5; 1411:3. The mention of mills is unusual and unclear. As to abandon plots, see the examples in András Kubinyi,

One florin shall be exchanged for one hundred pennies and no more.¹⁰

Those zsellérs shall be taxed moreover, who have plow-land on their tenement or cultivate their own vineyard; others, however, shall not be taxed.¹¹

5 Furthermore, a suitable nobleman shall be regularly assigned to the tax collector in every county, who shall be required by oath to take care of and do what is just for the most serene lord king and the county according to the content of the present decree; and in addition, every reeve in every county shall be required to deliver the tallies¹² of three full years to a county court session designed for this purpose and to present them to the county with an oath and a register; and the county shall be required faithfully to compile a list of these for the lord king.

6 Then, because this realm of your majesty, in addition to other grievances and oppressions, has arrived at a state of final destruction and great misery, because of the cavalymen and the foot soldiers, so that the poor inhabitants of the realm can hardly meet the necessities of life, therefore we humbly and deferentially pray that, considering our compliant faithfulness and taking into account the devastation of your realm, in order that it may somehow recover and regain its former strength your majesty deign to take the appropriate measures so that henceforth the inhabitants of the realm will not suffer violence and demolition from the soldiers as they have suffered hitherto,¹³ and they shall not be burdened with the construction of fortifications and supplying food, except for the fortifications of Kevi, Pojejena and Haram/Palanka,¹⁴ which, if they are renovated, ought to receive help from the adjacent counties, and that the soldiers should not be billeted in the houses and allods of the nobles.

“Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen und Wirtschaft in den Besitzungen der Magnatenfamilie Garai in Ungarn,” Festschrift Othmar Field, pp. 367-77 (Graz-Wien: Leykan, 1987).

¹⁰ This official exchange rate was not always observed; see Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

¹¹ Due to the partible inheritance and other factors, the number of landless peasants (inquilini) increased in the later Middle Ages; many of them lived on tenant peasants’ plots and supplied the wage labor in times of seasonal employment. See István Szabó, “Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén” [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], in Idem, Jobbágyság, parasztság: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. pp. 167-200 (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1976)

¹² The capita dicarum (in Hung.: rovásnyél, “rod of assessment”) were some kind of tallies. Lajos Thallóczy described one that survived, (by the courtesy of Károly Tagányi) in “Adatok a magyar pénzügyi kezelés történetéhez” [Data on Hungarian administration of finances], Magyar Gazdaságtörténeti Szemle (1895): 119-20. The object, found by coincidence in a sixteenth century file, was a 5 cm long piece of thin wood.

¹³ The complaint about the excesses of the soldiers is recurrent; see, among others, 1405/II:1; 1435/II:6; and 1454:8.

¹⁴ The reason for expressly naming these three castles—Kevi in Co. Keve (today: Kovin in Croatia), Pozsaszin, in Co. Krassó (today: Pojejena in Romania) and Haram in Co. Krassó (today: ruins near Banatska Palanka in Serbia)—may have been that they were taken at some time by the Ottomans and destroyed; however, we know this for certain only about Keve/Kovin

7 Then, that because of the poverty of the realm, during the aforementioned five-year period the general county assemblies and the customary common assizes should not be held in any county of the realm except for the following counties: Pozsega, Valkó, Szerém, Baranya (only on the far side of the River Drava), Csanád, Temes, Zaránd and Arad,¹⁵ in which various thefts, robberies, maimings, selling of men, beheadings and a multitude of other misdeeds are said to be committed; thus those counties should not omit the common assizes, but hold them in such a way, however, that in these courts neither billeting funds,¹⁶ nor fines should be levied; moreover, cases concerning estates should not be judged in these courts. After these years will have passed, moreover, such general county assemblies should not be held other than with the counsel of the lord prelates, barons, and the lords of the realm.

8 Then, in cases of seizure of estates and properties, committed either on the basis of royal grant or otherwise, short summons should be issued against the occupants, and they should be prosecuted at law according to the customs of the realm. And if on the occasion of introduction legal objectors should appear, the requestor of such property ought not enter nor establish ownership on the property. And if this is done out of arrogance, that person shall be prosecuted with due process of law by short summons, and such a man shall be condemned in the estimated value of those estates or properties, according to ancient practice.¹⁷

9 Then, that your majesty should not allow the seizure of estates and properties of noblemen upon anyone's simple complaint.¹⁸

10 Then, that your majesty should not arrest anyone, whether of major or minor status, without due process of law, except those who can be arrested according to the customs of the realm, and should not exile or arrest any prelate, baron, lord or noblemen of the realm without the

¹⁵ The burdens placed on the counties by the palatinal assizes was a recurrent complaint. It was finally abolished in the Decretum Maius (1486:1). The counties listed are located on the southern border regions of the country, where, apparently, public safety deteriorated considerably.

¹⁶ This term refers to those expenses, which the palatine and his entourage levied, and goes back to the ancient right of hospitality (droit de gîte), the descensus of the eleventh century. While no specific amount is known, it may have been identical with the sums paid for exemption from holding such assemblies.

¹⁷ Short summonses were issued with the stipulation of the summoned party appearing in court within 32 days or the next regular (so-called octavial) session. It was often combined with "terminal summons" (citatio cum insinuatione), implying that the case would be decided even if the party did not appear in court.

-- Objection to an institution, that is the act of introducing a new owner into a property granted to him, was called repulsio, an action by a party in physical possession of a property, which had been adjudged in court to another, by which he might impede the institution with ritual violence (with a drawn sword or similar weapon). This had the consequence of forcing the matter back into court for a retrial. Repulsio could only be performed once. Cf. 1405/II: 2; 1435/I:3; 1439:29; 1464:7, 12, and 1471:23.

¹⁸ Cf. 1464:18; 1471:10.

sentence and counsel of the lords prelates, barons, lords, and noblemen, as has been the custom from ancient times.¹⁹

11 Then, that henceforth in the future no octave court be held in the seat of the bans of Mačva and that the sentences concerning cases of properties, passed in the last two years, shall be returned for consideration and review before the lords prelates, barons, the masters protonotaries, and elected nobles of the realm.²⁰

12 Then, that short summons in the case of every article issued earlier by the royal majesty and the kingdom's prelates, barons, and lords²¹ may be issued and treated under the seal of the palatine,²² of count Stephen Bátori,²³ and of the personal presence of the royal majesty,²⁴ and that the most reverend lord archbishop of Kalocsa,²⁵ and the honorable palatine and count Stephen Bátori, and those prelates and barons who were elected in this diet to judge and to pass sentence, or at least half of them, ought to be present at the octave courts and the courts of short summonses, and at least every important case ought to be decided with their opinion and in their presence.²⁶

¹⁹ This habeas corpus clause goes back, of course, to Art. 2 of the Golden Bull of 1222, but was repeated regularly in later decrees, e.g., in 1439:27 and 1471:2.

²⁰ This measure aimed at reducing the regional power of the Újlaki family. Nicholas of Újlak, king of Bosnia, formerly a close companion of János Hunyadi, died in 1477, and his son, Lawrence, while not inheriting the royal title, kept the banate of Mačva. The cancellation of the special octave court in the banate ended the jurisdiction of the ban over the neighboring counties. See: András Kubinyi, "A kaposújvari uradalom és a Somogy megyei familiárisok szerepe Újlaki Miklós birtokpolitikájában" [The role of the estate of Kaposújvar and the retainers from Co. Somogy in the property policies of Nicholas of Újlak/Ilok,] Somogy megye múltjából 4 (1973): 33.

²¹ This measure extends the use of the short summons, earlier objected to by the estates, to all of the leading royal judges and thus virtually cancels the preceding decisions. By calling it a "custom of the realm" and allowing its use against usurpers as well, the innovation seems to have been generally accepted. Nevertheless, it was soon abolished in 1486:2.

²² The count palatine was Michael Ország of Gút (1458-1484), on him, see Tamás Pálosfalvi, in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), p. 267.

²³ Stephen of Bátor (Mori) was judge royal between 1471 and 1493, see Richárd Horvát in Matthias Corvinus, the King, p. 268

²⁴ The court of the personal presence functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and it was led by the chancellor. After 1464, when it was united with the court of the special personal presence, it became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary, the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff.

²⁵ The archbishop of Kalocsa was Gabriel of Matucsina from 1472 to 1478.

²⁶ Cf. 1464:5 with the difference that even half of the expected barons and prelates can constitute a quorum in the court.

13 In the matter of short summonses and octave courts the following should be the rule: among the four octaves hitherto normally held,²⁷ the octave of the feast of St. Michael the Archangel²⁸ ought to be held in the customary fashion for every litigant of our realm, disregarding any devisable excuse; however, instead of the other three octaves, neglected at present for certain reasons, we decided that instead of the cancelled octaves, on their sites and dates, courts of short summons should be held beginning with the twenty-fifth day of the feasts fixed for this purpose in the past: namely, the feasts of St. George, St. James, and the Epiphany of the Lord,²⁹ and last continuously for twenty-five weekdays without interruption.

14 Then, that your serenity should kindly deign to accept and confirm what is written in this register article by article for the restoration and preservation of this realm and to give due account to our loyalty and to deem graciously to keep and maintain us in all our ancient customs and liberties, in accordance with the decrees of your serenity's royal predecessors, which you confirmed in Szekesfehervar on the occasion of your coronation.³⁰

15 Then, in the matter of the collection of tithes the ancient method should be maintained, namely, that the tithe-collectors must be content with the oath of the peasants; and if the collectors wish, they shall be free to examine the rick under the usual fines. Moreover, where the tithes are exacted in money,³¹ county magistrates shall be sent with the tithe-collectors, who, if they wish, go at their own expense and not at the tithe-collector's, and they shall faithfully watch the tithe-collectors. And where the tithe-collectors might wish to exact the tax unjustly, the noble magistrates should not go with them. And if some peasant takes an oath, the tithe-collector may not harass the oath-taking peasant further nor exact more than the amount for which the peasant took the oath. And because, in some counties, the tithe-collectors have customarily exacted, on the ²⁷ Traditionally, there were four ocatava courts annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times. The present article can be seen as a step towards a more continuous session of the royal courts of justice.

²⁸ 6 October.

²⁹ 24 April, 25 July, and 6 January.

³⁰ The decree of 6 April 1464

³¹ In spite of repeated decrees about rendering the tithe in kind only (see e.g. 1351:6, 1411:5), it seems to have become general to pay it in coin. In 1447:35 this practice was abolished because of the frequent disagreements around the value of coins. 1458:34 repeated the original rule of payment in kind, but 1464:24 left the mode of tithing open to agreement with the bishop. Here, the traditional way is once again emphasized, only to be replaced by a compromise in 1478:15, accepting both forms, and finally, in 1481 tacitly dropping the collection in kind altogether. — Otherwise, the stipulations just repeat the traditional procedure, codified first in the eleventh century (Syn. Szab.: 40). See: Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed monograph on the issue is still missing.

pretext of this oath, two shocks from the peasants swearing an oath as to their grain, they may not do it any more, unless it was the custom.

These articles, as mentioned above, being presented to our majesty by the aforementioned prelates, barons, and noblemen of the counties of our realm, we accepted and confirmed them, because, first, of their most humble prayer directed to us, and second, because we regarded these aforementioned articles as set out to the good peace, tranquil state, and benefit of our realm; and we have promised to maintain the said prelates barons, noblemen in each one of them; indeed, we accept, confirm and promise this by the force and testimony of our present letter.

Given in the aforementioned Buda on the Sunday of Quasimodo, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and seventy-eight.

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

OF 15 JULY, 1481

This decree was passed on a diet held during a brief truce between Frederick III and Matthias, from 31 May to 15 July, 1481. While most of its paragraphs deal with the ways and modes of tithing, it also contains limitations of different burdens on the county nobility, such as fees and expenses for assizes.

MSS.: 4 originals or contemporary copies, on paper. Two in Budapest: one fragmentary (MNL OL DI 32331), and one complete (MNL OL DI 26359); one in the archives of Košice, and one in the National Archives of Croatia (for details, see DRH Matth., p. 245-46).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Ignatius Batthyany, Leges ecclesiastici regni Hungariae et provinciarum adjacentium. 3. vols. Alba-Carolina: Typis episcopalibus, 1785–1827, pp. 514-9 (excerpt); Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:388-97; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], pp. 246-51.

LIT: Andor Csizmadia, “Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn.” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257.

15 IULII 1481

Nos Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, Bohemie etc. memorie commendamus tenore presentium significantes, quibus expedit, universis, quod nos una cum dominis prelati et baronibus ac proceribus et electis omnium comitatum regni nostri nobilibus totum hoc regnum nostrum Hungarie representantibus in presenti dieta seu convention generali hic Bude nobiscum constitutis super bono communi et reformatione status omnium tam spiritualium quam etiam secularium personarum maiorum scilicet et minorum earundem et regni ipsius defensione et debita eiusdem conservatione diutius laborantes et mature tractantes communi omnium eorundem dominorum prelatorum, baronum procerumque et regnicolarum nostrorum voto et unanimi voluntate inter cetera et alias bonas ordinationes dispositionesque et statua in hos infrascriptos tandem et perpetuo duraturos convenimus articulos:

I. Imprimis, quod domini prelati et ceteri ecclesiastici decimas habentes de nullis aliis rebus preterquam vinis, frugibus, agnellis, apibus, milio, siligine, ordeo et avena iuxta antiquam regni consuetudinem decimas exigant.

Quodque deinceps omnes alie inordinate exactiones, quas decimatores eorundem dominorum prelatorum et ceterarum ecclesiasticarum personarum, temerarie facere consueverunt, cessare debeant nec ullo pacto imposterum fiant.

II. Item quod ad nobiles uxoresque et familiam eorundem ratione non solutionis decimarum; propter rusticos et iobagiones eorundem interdictum ecclesiasticum per ipsos dominos prelatos aut decimatores eorum non imponatur, nisi ipsi sint causa notoria, propter quam rustici et iobagiones decimas solvere recusarent.

III. Item quod Rasciani et ceteri huiusmodi scismatici ad solutionem decimarum non astringantur et neque per comites parochiales instar aliorum ad huiusmodi decimarum solutionem compellantur.

Quodque ad Christianos, in quorum medio tales scismatici morantur, aut econtra ratione ipsorum scismaticorum et non solutionis decimarum interdictum ecclesiasticum non imponatur.

IV. Item quod si qui Christiani cum prefatis talibus Rascianis et scismaticis societatem sive contractum habuerint et araturas sive alias agriculturas pari auxilio fecerint, de parte fructuum Christianis cedenti decime solvantur, de reliqua vero parte talibus scilicet schismaticis cedenti tales decime non exigantur.

Hoc tamen adiecto et per expressum declarato quod tales Rasciani sive scismatici non censeantur et neque sint in perpetuum ab huiusmodi decimarum solutione exempti, sed tantummodo per aliquos annos et interim, quoad scilicet bono modo se tales alienigene et transfuge in regno Hungarie et dominiis sacre corone subiectis firmabunt et ut talium transfugarum exemplo etiam alii ditioni Turcorum subiecti ad veniendum tanto promptiores efficiantur, quanto tales, qui iam venerunt, tanta prerogativa se conspexerint donatos.

V. Item quod centum regales denarii ubique pro uno aureo recipiantur quodque pro quatuordecim capetiis unus aureus aut centum denarii tantummodo exigantur, prout est consuetum.

VI. Item quod de capitibus dicarum a villicis nil exigatur, sed facta plenaria decimarum solutione decimatores teneantur aut illa dicarum capita reddere aut aliter per litteras illos villicos committere expeditos.

VII. Item quod decimatores deinceps non apud villicos, sed apud plebanos parochiales descendant.

Verumtamen villicus loci, ubi scilicet decimatores ipsi aut prandium aut cenam fecerint, teneatur illis mittere duo fercula duos cubulos sive duo quartalia Budensia avene, duas tortas sive duos panes circulares et duas pintas vini.

Hoc etiam adiecto quod villici villarum vicinarum, in quibus scilicet tales decimatores prandium aut cenam non fecerint, nihil eisdem decimatoribus solvere teneantur, sed totaliter exempti habeantur ex eo potissimum, quod illi etiam alias in exactione et collectione ipsarum decimarum satis laborare habent.

VIII. Item quod nullus prelatorum deinceps possit decimas suas arendare.

Quodsi quispiam eorum gravi compulsus necessitate locare coactus fuerit, conductor sive arendator ille non presumat ordinationem et limitationem sive continentiam decreti quondam serenissimi regis Sigismundi imperatoris transgredi, sed dicare debeat iuxta illud decretum et secundum quod unusquisque dominorum prelatorum aut aliarum ecclesiasticarum personarum decimas habebentium cum suo comitatu concordavit.

Quodsi arendator seu conductor ille his stationibus et dicto decreto quondam serenissimi domini Sigismundi imperatoris contraverint, homo per comitatum electus cum decimatore deputatus plenam exnunc datam habeat facultatem illum captivandi et regie maiestati presentandi.

Regia vero maiestas de illa pecunie summa pro qua ille tales decimas conduxit, illi prelato satisfacere et respondere, illum vero conductorem male et contra statuta decretaque dicantem castigare habebit.

IX. Item quod nullus prelatorum aut decimatorum ratione decimarum usque festum Purificationis Marie virginis ponat interdictum, sed imprimis circa festum beati Nicolai confessoris ammoneat quemlibet ad solutionem et tandem circa prefatum festum Purificationis Marie virginis contumaces et solvere recusantes subiciantur interdicto ecclesiastico.

Ubi vero vina non procreantur, sed tantummodo fruges et blada, ibi tales decime exigantur temporibus hactenus solitis et consuetis.

Prima autem decimarum solutio fiat ad festum Nativitatis Domini, reliqua vero ad predictum festum Purificationis Marie virginis.

X. Item quia multe hactenus differentie et inordinationes in decimarum dicatione et earundem exactione fuerunt, statutum igitur et diffinitum est, quod dum tempus huiusmodi dicationis decimarum adventaverit prelatusque ad eam mittere voluerit, debeat prius nobilibus illius comitatus in sede eorum iudiciaria significare.

Qui quidem nobiles teneantur unum bonum et probum de medio eorum eligere iustum et conscientiosum et prelato non suspectum et cum ipsis decimatoribus ad expensas ipsius prelati mittere.

Idem vero homo per ipsos nobiles electus publice in ipsa sede iudiciaria iuramentum prestare debeat, quod scilicet tam prelato quam etiam incolis illius comitatus fidelis erit nec quicquam sinistre et perperam sive iniuste pro aliqua parte fieri permittet quodque neutri parti favorabilior erit.

Qui quidem decimator si non debite et iuxta visionem atque iudicium ipsius hominis hoc modo electi dicaverit prefatisque ordinationibus et dispositionibus temerarie contravenerit, idem homo electus illos dicatores relinquere et amplius cum eisdem procedere non audeat.

Quodque si prelatus requisitus non emendaverit et non rectificaverit, conclusum est, ut quandocumque id regie maiestati ex legitima et sufficienti probatione constiterit, habita prius iusta et diligenti super his inquisitione, ex quo in prioribus decretis super ipsarum decimarum exactione talibus penitus nulla pena inflictata est, de nostra et omnium prelatorum et baronum procerumque regnicolarum communi et unanimi voluntate tales hanc penam perpetuo duraturam patiantur, quod talis prelatus vel alia ecclesiastica persona nunquam decimas suas de cetero cum pecuniis exigere possit, sed eas de rebus illis, quas terra produxerit, in specie recipere et colligere teneatur, ita tamen quod ex utraque parte sine fraude et calumpnia cum veritate et iustitia res agatur.

XI. Item quod decime cum gravaminibus solitis et consuetis et non aliter exigantur.

XII. Item quod decime ipse secundum decretum et consuetudinem atque ordinationem seu dispositionem, quam unusquisque dominorum prelatorum cum suo comitatu habet, exigantur.

XIII. Item quod si quispiam hominum in exactione decimarum regie maiestati iniuste conquestus fuerit, diffinitum est et conclusum, quod comperta veritate et visa illius iniusta querela eo facto talis in emenda lingue convincatur.

XIV. Item conclusum et diffinitum est, quod nos rex Mathias prefatus a festo beati Martini confessoris proxime venturo usque ad aliud festum similiter beati Martini immediate sequens in corpore regni nostri Hungarie generale iudicium celebrari non faciamus.

Interea autem domini prelati et barones, ceterique regni proceres providere et de alio modo cogitare habebunt, quo malefactores extirpentur.

Quodsi fiet, nos tandem huiusmodi generale iudicium non solum non celebrare pollicemur, verum etiam insuper ita deponemus et abolebimus, quod nunquam amplius in ipso regno nostro celebretur.

XV. Item quia illis donationibus, quas nos Mathias rex prefatus servitoribus nostris de illis bonis, que ad sacram coronam sive per infidelitatis notam sive defectum seminis aut alia ex quacunque causa devolvuntur, facere consuevimus, multi tempore stationis contradicere soliti sunt, conclusum et dispositum est, quod talibus donationi nostre, contradicentibus terminus unius anni deinceps prefigatur et interim in dominio talium bonorum relinquuntur.

Elapso autem anno uno illo die, quo statutio donationis nostre fiebat, iura et privilegia sua coram nobis producere debeant.

Quibus productis si illos contradictores ius plenum habere compererimus, ipsos in pacifico dominio ipsorum bonorum perpetue relinquemus.

Si autem producere non possent aut non curarent, extunc donatio ipsa vigorem habeat et illi, cui donaverimus, statuantur fructusque possessionum collatarum infra id temporis perceptos; ipsi contradictores restituere teneantur.

Quodsi iura et privilegia sua apud manus alienas fore allegaverint, dimidio anno ante termini prefigendi completionem nobis revelare teneantur.

Nos vero tales, apud quorum scilicet manus fuerint, ad eorum iurium et privilegiorum restitutionem compellere et astringere per omnia remedia habeamus.

XVI. Item quia in presenti dieta seu conventionione plurimi regnicole conquesti sunt, quod capitula et conventus sigillis utentes in emittendis eorum testimoniis incolas regni ultra dispositum eis salarium gravarent et ad vota eorum taxarent, conclusum itaque super hoc et diffinitum est, quod comitatus, in quo deinceps id fieri continget nobis Mathie regi prefato rescribere sub firmo iuramento teneatur nosque tales inordinationes rectificare atque eos, qui tales inordinationes temere committere presumpserint, taliter punire et castigare habeamus, quod etiam ceteri ab eis exemplum capiant.

XVII. Item quod prelati ecclesiarum et eorum vicarii citationes et monitiones generales non expressis illorum nominibus, contra quos huiusmodi citationes vel monitiones peterentur, dare non debeant neque etiam personas laicas et seculares pro levibus causis et presertim illis, que ecclesiasticum forum non concernunt, advocare.

Sed cum citationes aliquas, vel etiam monitiones ad alicuius instantiam decernunt expressis illorum citandorum vel monendorum nominibus et causis, pro quibus citari vel moneri debent, decernant et pro levibus causis citationes non decernant, sed unumquemque sive ecclesiasticorum sive laicorum ad suum patronum remittant.

Si vero aliquae essent cause, mere ecclesiasticum forum concernentes, in his unusquisque ecclesiasticarum vel secularium personarum coram ordinario suo primum prosequatur, et deinde si contentus illius iudicio non fuerit, ad suum metropolitanum appellet et sic consequenter.

In decernenda tamen citatione et monitione ab unoquoque iuramentum de calumpnia exigatur.

Quos quidem articulos nos rex Mathias prefatus per nos ac dictos dominos prelatos et barones necnon proceres et electos nobiles modo premissis de beneplacita omnium voluntate et consensu pro bono communi tam spiritualium quam etiam secularium generaliter confectos acceptamus, approbamus et perpetuo duraturos observaturosque ratificamus harum nostrarum vigore et testimonio litterarum mediante.

Datum Bude in festo Divisionis apostolorum anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo octuagesimo primo, regnorum nostrorum Hungarie etc. anno vigesimo quarto, Bohemie vero tredecimo.

15 JULY, 1481

We, Matthias, by grace of God, king of Hungary, Bohemia, etc. wish to be remembered and make known to all to whom it may concern by these presents that we, together with the lords prelates, barons, lords, and the noblemen elected from all the counties of our realm who, representing this our entire kingdom of Hungary, appeared with us here in Buda at this diet, that is, in general assembly, exerted ourselves at length and held mature deliberations concerning the common good and betterment of the state of every person, be he ecclesiastic or layman, of major or minor status, as well as concerning the defense and proper preservation of the realm; after due deliberation, we agreed with the common desire and unanimous will of the said lord prelates, barons, lords, and gentlemen of the realm, among other good orders, measures, and statutes, on the following articles which are to remain valid for ever:

1 Above all, that the lord prelates and other ecclesiastics receiving tithes should not collect tithes on anything other than wine, grain, lambs, bees, millet, rye, barley, and oats according to the ancient custom of the realm.¹

Also, henceforth all those unjust tithe-collections, recklessly and commonly practiced by the tithe-collectors of the same lords prelates and other ecclesiastics, must cease and should not occur in the future by any means.

2 Then, the lord prelates or their tithe-collectors should not impose an ecclesiastical interdict upon the noblemen, their wives or family on the pretext that their peasants and tenant peasants did not pay the tithe unless for the well-known cause that the peasants and tenant peasants refused to pay the tithe.

3 Then, that the Serbs and other such schismatics shall not be required to pay tithes, neither should they be forced by the county ispáns to pay the tithe following the example of others.²

Also, no ecclesiastical interdict shall be imposed upon Christians among whom such schismatics dwell, and vice versa, because the schismatics do not pay their tithe.

4 Then, if any Christians form a partnership or make agreement with these aforementioned Serbs and schismatics to perform jointly tillage and other agricultural work, the tithe must be paid from the part of the crop or produce belonging to the Christians; from the rest, however, that is, from the part belonging to the schismatics, tithe shall not be demanded. But with the following express provision: that these Serbs or schismatics are not to be regarded as being eternally exempted from paying tithes, nor should be eternally exempted, but only temporarily; that is, until these foreigners and refugees shall regain their wealth and health in Hungary and in the lands belonging to the Holy Crown, so that, following the example of these refugees, other people living under Turkish rule would be the more willing to come here the more they see what great privileges those have received who already came here.³

¹ This has been codified many times, ever since 1222:20, but in all likelihood, the tithe was paid in coin in most of the cases.

² The issue of tithing non-Catholics came up earlier in regard to the Vlach (Romanian) inhabitants of Transylvania. Their being forced by Bishop Lépes to pay the tithe may have been one of the causes of the peasant uprising of 1437 (see Joseph Held, "The Peasant Revolt of Babolna 1437-38," Slavonic Review 36 [1977]: 25-38, esp. pp. 29-31.) With the advance of the Ottoman Turks on the Balkans the number of Orthodox who fled to Hungary from Serbia, which became finally part of the Ottoman Empire in 1459, increased to an extent which called for special regulations. The assumption of joint tillage between Catholics and Orthodox may suggest the existence of communal farming in certain villages.

5 Then, that one hundred royal pennies shall be accepted as one golden florin and only one golden piece or one hundred pennies shall be exacted for fourteen ricks, as is customary.⁴

6 Then, that nothing shall be exacted from the reeves for the tallies, but when the tithes are fully paid the tithe-collectors shall be required to return the tallies⁵ or otherwise declare these reeves quit by a letter.⁶

7 Then, that henceforth the tithe-collectors shall not lodge at the reeves but at the parish priests.

³ Kings of Hungary encouraged the immigration of southern Slavs, both lords and warrior-peasants (the vojniki), ever since the early fifteenth century. The Hungarian-Croatian border defense system, built up under King Sigismund and his barons (Pipo Scolari, the brothers Tallóci, etc.) was based on the cooperation of the garrisons of fortified castles and experienced swift mobile troops. Most of the latter were recruited from among the Serbs and other Slavs who took refuge in Hungary, frequently under the command of their lords (such as the Jakšić, the Belmošević, the descendants of Prince Fružin, and others). They supplied troops well versed in guerilla warfare against the marauding Ottoman auxiliaries; see Ferenc Szakály, “The Hungarian-Croatian Border Defense System and Its Collapse” in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary. (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982), pp. 141-58, esp. 144-45; and András Kubinyi, “The Road to Defeat,” ibid. pp. 169-70.

⁴ The official exchange rate remained 100d for 1 florin but there is evidence that in practice a few pennies agio was granted for the coins gold content. This is already conscious monetary policy, combining the exchange rate with appropriate regulation of emission; see Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

⁵ Up to Matthias's reign it seems to have been usual to charge 2 pennies for the tallies (last so decreed in June 1458:39), but already in 1470 a royal mandate and a dietal decree stipulated that nothing be charged for them, i. e., for the assessment and accounting of the tithe (see DRH Matth. . p. 183 n.1 and p. 186).

⁶ The tithe collector either issued a writ or returned the tallies to the village elder to acknowledge receipt of the tithes due. The capita dicarum (in Hung.: rovásnyél, “rod of assessment”) were some kind of tallies. Lajos Thallóczy described one that survived, (by the courtesy of Károly Tagányi) in “Adatok a magyar pénzügyi kezelés történetéhez” [Data on Hungarian administration of finances], Magyar Gazdaságtörténeti Szemle (1895): 119-20. The object, found by coincidence in a sixteenth century file, was a 5 cm long piece of thin wood.

However, the reeve of the place, where the tithe-collectors have dinner or supper, is required to serve them two dishes of meal, two cubits or two quarts of a Buda measure of oats, two milk-loaves or two round loaves of bread, and two pints of wine.

With this provision: that the Reeves of the neighboring villages, that is, where these tithe-collectors do not have dinner or supper, shall not be required to pay anything to the tithe-collectors but shall be totally exempted, the more so as they have quite enough work with the exacting and collecting of the tithes.⁷

8 Then, that henceforth no one among the prelates may farm out his tithes.

If some prelate, pressed by great need, should be forced to farm out the tithe, the contractor or farmer shall not dare to contravene the orders, rules, and content of the decree of the late most serene lord King and Emperor Sigismund,⁸ but ought to collect the tithes according to that decree and according to the agreement made between each lord prelate, or other ecclesiastic entitled to the tithes, and his county.

If the contractor or tithe-farmer should act contrary to these orders and the decree of the said late most serene lord Emperor Sigismund, the person elected by the county and sent with the tithe-collector shall have the right, granted to him herewith, to arrest and hand him over to the royal majesty.

And the royal majesty will be required to give satisfaction and account to the prelate for the whole amount for which all the tithes were farmed, and to punish the contractor who collected tithes wrongly and contrary to the order and the decree.

9 Then, that no prelate or tithe-collector shall impose an interdict because of the tithes until the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary,⁹ but first shall warn everyone at the feast of St. Nicholas the Confessor¹⁰ to pay, and only then shall those stubbornly refusing to pay be subject to ecclesiastic interdict at the time of the said feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary.

And where vine does not grow, but only grain and wheat, these tithes shall there be collected at the hitherto customary times.

The date of the first payment of tithes, however, shall be on Christmas Day, and the rest on the aforementioned feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary.

⁷ The categorical prohibition of farming out the tithe seems to have been mere ideology, for it was customary at least since the fourteenth century, and the next sentence realistically admits that it “may occur.” See Csizmadia, “Die rechtliche Entwicklung.”

⁸ 1411:5-6.

⁹ 2 February

¹⁰ 6 December.

10 Then, since much disagreement and discord has occurred in the exacting and collecting of tithes, it has therefore been decided and ordered that when the time of such exacting of tithes approaches and the prelate wants to send out somebody to do it, he must first make declaration to the noblemen of the county at their court of justice.

The noblemen then should be required to elect a good and honest, just and conscientious man from among themselves who is trusted by the prelate, and send him with the tithe-collectors at the same prelate's expense.¹¹

The man elected by the nobles must publicly swear an oath in the same county court that he will be faithful to the prelate as well as to the inhabitants of the county, and that he will permit nothing unjust or wrong to occur to the disadvantage of any party, and that he will not favor one party to another.

If the tithe-collector should exact the tithe incorrectly and not in accordance with the view and decision of the man so elected, and if he should act recklessly contrary to the said orders and regulations, the elected man should leave the tithe-collectors and ought not dare to accompany them further.

If the prelate to whom appeal was made does not redress and correct the fault, we decided by common and unanimous will of ourselves and all the prelates, barons, lords, and gentlemen of the realm, that, as soon as this situation comes to the royal majesty's knowledge through lawful and sufficient evidence – because in earlier decrees concerning the collection of collecting tithes no punishment whatsoever was imposed upon these people – they shall be punished, after a just and adequate inquest, with this perpetual punishment: that such a prelate or other ecclesiastic henceforth may not collect his tithes in cash at any time, but he must accept and collect them in kind, in such fruits as the land yields,¹² thus, moreover, that both parties shall proceed frankly and justly, without any dishonesty and false statement.

11 Then, that the tithes shall be collected with the usual and customary fines and not otherwise.

12 Then, that the tithes shall be collected according to the decree and custom and in accordance with the agreement and decision made between each lord prelate and his county.¹³

¹¹ Cf. 1471:3. Apparently the delegation of a plebanus (parish priest) proved to be a short-lived arrangement and the procedure returned to custom followed earlier and to the traditional mode similar to the assessment and exaction of the chamber's profit.

¹² It is peculiar that tithing in kind is specified as "perpetual punishment," while the levy of the tithes in money has been prohibited ever since 1222 (see n. 1, above).

¹³ The wording of this paragraph is noteworthy for medieval conceptions about valid rules, as it combines law, custom, and specific agreement between lord and subject without any hierarchy. Also, the strength of the county as a local unit of administration is apparent, for the prelates are supposed to make arrangements with each of them and not with their entire diocese. Hungarian dioceses usually contained four or more counties.

13 Then, it was decided and ordered that if someone unjustly lodged a complaint with the royal majesty concerning the collecting of tithes, and if the truth comes to light, and his complaint proves unjust, he must be immediately convicted to the fine of his tongue.¹⁴

14 Then, it was decided and ordered that we, the aforementioned king Matthias should not hold general assizes in the territory of our kingdom of Hungary from the next feast of St. Martin the Confessor¹⁵ until the following feast of the same St. Martin.

In the meantime, however, the lord prelates, barons, and the other lords of the realm shall be required to ensure and devise other means to root out criminals.

If this is done, we not only promise not to hold general assizes, but we shall also abolish and eradicate it so that general assizes would never again be held in our kingdom.¹⁶

15 Then, because frequent objections were made at institutions against grants that we, the aforementioned King Matthias, used to make to our servants from those estates that escheat to the Holy Crown due to the charge of infidelity or default of issue or some other reason, we decided and ordered that for those who object to our donations, a year's deadline should be fixed, and until that date they shall be left in the dominion of such estates.

When that year expires, however, on the date when the institution to our donation was made, they shall be required to present publicly their rights and letters of privilege to us.

If they present those and we find that the contradictors have full rights, we shall leave them in the perpetual dominion of these estates.

However, should they be unable or unwilling to present their claims, the donation shall maintain its validity and those to whom we have given it shall be granted institution; and the contradictors shall be required to refund the revenues exacted during that time from the granted estates.

But if they assert that their rights and letters of privilege are in the hands of others, they must so inform us half a year before the fixed deadline.

And we shall be required to compel and force by every means those who have them in their hands to return these rights and privileges.¹⁷

¹⁴The fine of the tongue, (emenda lingue) was a judicial fine for procedural faults, amounting to 100 florins and causing the suspension of the trial. Until the culprit paid the fine, his ability to sue at court was suspended, "his tongue tied."

¹⁵ 11 November.

¹⁶ On the opposition of the estates to general assizes and the concomitant expenses, see 1464:21. They were finally abolished in the Decretum Maius (1486: 1).

¹⁷ This goes back at least to 1435/I:17.

16 Then, because in this present diet or assembly many gentlemen of the realm complained that the chapters and convents bearing seals burden the inhabitants above the fixed fees¹⁸ and exact charges from them according to their will, it was therefore decided and decreed in this matter that the county where such a thing henceforth should occur, must write, under a firm oath, a notice about it to us, the aforementioned King Matthias, and we shall be required to redress these irregularities and punish and discipline those who recklessly presume to commit such irregularities, so that others may take an example from them.

17 Then, that the prelates of churches and their vicars must not issue general citations and warnings in which the names of those against whom these citations and warnings are issued are not indicated; nor shall they summon laymen for matters of minor importance and especially for such matters as do not pertain to an ecclesiastic court.

But when, upon someone's request, they order any sort of citation, as well as warning, they must do so with the indication of the names of those who are being summoned or warned and with the indication of the case in which they are to be summoned or warned. And in matters of minor importance they shall not order citations but shall send each person, whether ecclesiastic or lay, to his own lord.

But if some matter should belong purely to an ecclesiastic court, every ecclesiastic or layman should first seek justice publicly before his ordinary,¹⁹ and then, should he not be satisfied with the decision, he should appeal to his archbishop, and so forth.

On the occasion of ordering the citation or warning, everyone must swear an oath concerning frivolous prosecution.

These articles, drawn up for the common good of matters spiritual as well as secular, by us and the said lord prelates, barons, and nobles elected in the aforesaid manner, with the good will and agreement of all, we, the said King Matthias, accept, validate, and confirm, by the force and testimony of this present charter, will be observed and remain valid for all time.

Given in Buda, on the feast of the Division of the Apostles, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and eighty-one, in the twenty-fourth year of our reign as king of Hungary, etc. and in his thirteenth year as king of Bohemia.

¹⁸ The reference is to the list of fees in 1435/I:10, which was repeated several times later (e. g., 1458:28, 1486:75).

¹⁹ The ordinarius here refers to the bishop's judicial deputy in his court spiritual.

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

OF 25 JANUARY, 1486)

Decretum maius

Even if the king's claim to have “always contemplated” issuing a set of laws for his realm may have been unfounded, Matthias followed the European trend when he attempted to summarize royal legislation and customary law in a formal code. Around Christmas, 1485, after the successful siege of Vienna, the king returned to Hungary and called a diet. The details of the diet's preparations are described by the court historian, Antonio Bonfini (*Decades*VII), but he did not have first hand information, as he was absent from Buda in 1486. The king seems to have consulted with his chief officials, the treasurer, judge royal, and palatine-designate, and invited the nobility to New Year's Day, 1486. The diet began on or around that day and sat for more than three weeks. After the election of the new palatine on 24 January, the law-book was issued. It soon acquired the designation of Decretum Maius, especially, once it was printed in Leipzig in 1488 (and again in 1490). Bonfini, writing probably in 1492, found it appropriate to—more or less correctly—paraphrase it article by article (loc. cit. 6–71), which he did not do with any other law of Matthias. It has been suggested that this decree, which makes extensive use of older legislation and summarizes, with some additions, the legal development of the preceding decades, was compiled by Thomas of Drág, (whom Bonfini calls with Humanist Classicism praetor regni), judge of the bench of personal presence—on whom see Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary]. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971) pp. 256–57—probably with the help of a lawyer trained in Roman law.

While it was an attempt at a more or less systematic code for “everlasting” validity, and many of its arrangements of legal procedure were repeated by Matthias’ successor, they did not become standard for quite a long time, especially due to the end of the independent kingdom and the division of the country for 150 years after 1526.

MSS.: Two originals in book-form, their seals lost (MNL OL D139323 and 283736) and an authentic copy from 1492 (Ibid. 26360).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Constitutiones incliti regni Hungariae, Leipzig: Moritz Brandis, 1488 (2d ed. Ibid.: Conradus Kachelofen, 1489/90); Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:402–69; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458–1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], pp. 265-310.

LIT.: Antonio Bonfini, Rerum Ungaricarum decades, I. Főgel, B. Iványi, L. Juhász, eds. 4/1 pp. 129–34 (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1941) Cf. Péter Kulcsar, Bonfini magyar történetének forrásai es keletkezése [Sources and development of Bonfini's Hungarian history], pp. 198–202 (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1973); György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei [Elements of our medieval law], (Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi K., 1972), pp. 77–82; Idem, “King Matthias the Legislator,” The Hungarian Quarterly 6 (1944) 699–710; Vilmos Fraknói, Matthias Corvinus, König von Ungarn (1458–1490) (Freiburg i. Brsg.: Herder, 1891), pp. 233–72; Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial structure and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899)); János M. Bak, “Tradition and Renewal in the Decretum Maius of King Matthias,” in Matthias Rex 1458–1490: Hungary at the Dawn of the Renaissance <http://renaissance.elte.hu/wp-content/uploads/2013/09/Janos-M.-Bak-Tradition-and-Renewal-in-the-Decretum-Maius-of-King-Matthias.pdf>. (See now below under Studies to medieval Hungarian laws) -- On the editio princeps, see Cs. Csapodi, M. Vértesy, Catalogus incunabulorum que in bibliothecis publicis Hungariae asservantur, Intr. by E. Soltész; G. Sajó, ed., Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1970, 1: 1074–75.

25 IANUARIII 1486

Mathias Dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Gallitie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex necnon Silesie et Lucemburgensis dux marchioque Moravie et Lusatie ad perpetuam rei memoriam.

Decet reges et principes, qui superna dispositione in supreme dignitatis specula constituuntur, non solum armis, verum etiam legibus esse decoratos et bonorum stabiliumque potius institutorum rigore quam absolute potentie vel dampnande abusionis severitate populos subiectos et simul imperii sui habenas moderari.

Proinde ad universorum notitiam volumus pervenire, quod postquam nos maximo et inexpectato Dei munere ac eiusdem inefabili incomprehensibilique providentia ad hoc regie dignitatis fastigium (licet immeriti) sublimate fuimus, semper in animo volvimus, semper cogitavimus et cordi semper habuimus, ut eas inordinationes et perditas abusiones, que in hoc regno predecessorum nostrorum serenissimorum dominorum regum et nostra etiam tempestate hactenus, potissimum vero in iudiciis fuerunt, abolere et extinguere ac statuta decretaque ita salutaria, ita stabilia condere possemus, que ad laudem et gloriam imprimis redemptoris nostri ac deinde nostrum ac totius regni nostri honorem, salutem, commodum et tranquillitatem condita plane dinoscerentur, queque pro legibus et iure scripto perpetuo haberentur nec unquam illa pro arbitrio variare aut novas et contrarias leges cuiquam ferre liceret, prout hactenus in cuiuslibet novi regis assumptione factum fuisse non est obscurum fecissemusque satis huic sancto proposito et desiderio nostro, nisi urgentissimis ipsius regni nostri necessitatibus, potissimum in orarum finiumque eiusdem rectificatione simul etiam atrocissimorum hostium exterminatione, quibus regnum ipsum refertum invenimus, prepediti fuissimus.

Adeo quippe fines regni partim per Bohemos, partim Alemanos, partim Turcorum continuas incursiones, partim vero vicinas alias nationes et quidem omnes inimicas distracte occupateque fuerunt, ut nil prorsus preter corpus regni et id quoque diversis – ut prefertur – hostibus refertum dilaceratumque restabat, quibus rebus effectum est, ut huicemodi salutare propositum, licet admodum necessarium in aliud tempus differre sumus coacti. Et maxime quia sperabamus, quod postquam hostes prefatos, qui pluribus annis regnum ipsum ferro et igne vastaverant et qui illud tanquam hereditarium tenere posse iam non dubitabant (sic enim in illo pedem fixerant, ut iam connubia etiam facere et affinitates cum regnicolis contrahere ceperant) superarem pacem, otium et simul quietem e vestigio comparare et eiusmodi desiderium commodius complere possemus.

Verumtamen sive operatione inimici generis humani, qui bonis salutaribusque votis semper insidiatur, sive pravorum hominum suggestione et ineffrenata dominandi libidine effectum est, spes et opinio nos in hac parte fefellit. Nam postquam cum Dei auxilio hostes ipsos exterminavimus et oras finesque regni omni ex parte gravissimis licet laboribus, expensis et multorum nostrorum cede non modo rectificavimus, verum etiam plurimum undique extendimus et dilatavimus iamque id, quod cordi semper habuimus, complere molimur, ecce serenissimus dominus Fridericus Romanorum imperator et dux Austrie etc., quem perinde ac patrem carissimum semper coluimus et observavimus et cui omnibus in rebus gratificari studuimus, bellum nobis, sic – ut premittitur – longis gravissimisque armis et fessis et exhaustis indixit et continuo regnum nostrum invasit illudque gravi et irrecuperabili iactura, incendio, spolio et diversis aliis execrandorum malorum generibus affecit, quo factum est, ut rursus (licet inviti) arma capere et nos regnumque nostrum defendere ac vim vi propulsare coacti sumus sicque sexennio huiusmodi bello nos vacare oportuit.

In quo quidem bello eo deventum est, quod rebus nostris Deo favente et iustitiam simulque iniuriam nostram ex alto prospiciente non solum nos et regnum nostrum ab ipsa imperiali celsitudine, a qua sic provocati sicque lacessiti fuimus, tutati sumus, verum etiam illum in Austria, patria scilicet sua hereditaria agentem adorsi Viennam, civitatem celeberrimam et eius provincie caput et solium semestri fere obsidione cinctam expugnavimus et deinde maiorem eius totius provincie partem similiter subiugavimus subiugassemusque et eius reliquias, nisi domesticis insolentiis et querelis revocati fuissetus.

Sed dum hiis rebus vacamus, dum successus nostros urgemus, dum fortunam simulque victoriam prosequimur, magna interea propter longam absentiam et occupationem nostram homicidarum, furum, latronum, predonum, falsariorum, incendiariorum et similium sceleratorum oritur in regno multitudo ita, ut non viator nec frater a fratre nec hospes ab hospite tutus esset.

Propter quod et simul, ut tandem prefatum desiderium nostrum explere tranquillitatie regnicolarum, prout semper optavimus, consulere possimus, in hoc regnum nostrum, ad cuius regimen divina – ut premisimus – dispositione assumpti sumus, frequenti regnicolarum pulsati lamentatione descendimus generalemque dietam hic Bude celebrandam cunctis prelatis, baronibus, proceribus et aliis nobilibus instituimus, ubi cum eisdem una ceterisque de quolibet comitatu electis nobilibus et universum hoc regnum representantibus ad laudem imprimis Dei et eius genitricis virginis Marie sanctorumque regum, patronorum scilicet huius regni et deinde pro nostro et totius regni honore, salute, bono statu, utilitate, comodo et tranquillitate in subscripta capitula et articulos pro legibus et iure scripto perpetuo duraturos et observandos pari et unanimi omnium voluntate, consilio et assensu convenimus et concordavimus.

I. Quorum quidem capitulorum sive articulorum primus est: Imprimis diffinitum et conclusum est, quod iudicium generale sive palatinale aboleatur et amodo nullo unquam tempore celebretur.

Sed tamen ne per hoc malefactoribus male agendi data concessaque videatur licentia, ordinatum est, quod si quando comitatus aliquis a latronibus, furibus, homicidis, incendiariis, falsariis et aliis huiusmodi flagitiosis sentiret se molestari et tales malefactores ibi multiplicari cognosceret regia maiestas ad petitionem illius comitatus annuere et eidem liberam concedere facultatem debet, quod illos cum comite exquirere et exterminare possit et valeat.

II. Item quia in celebrationibus proclamatarum congregationum plurime enormitates et inaudita scandala, pericula etiam inopinata ex improvise fieri solent, ad tollendum igitur huiusmodi periculosum et extra hoc regnum inauditum iudicium vel potius corruptelam pari universorum regnicolarum voluntate, consilio et deliberatione statutum et diffinitum est, quod amodo nullo unquam tempore huiusmodi proclamate congregationes celebrentur, sed penitus cessent et perpetuo abolite sint et habeantur.

Item conclusum est, quod etiam breves evocationes consimiliter cessent et aboleantur.

III. Item quod singulis annis, nisi intercesserit legitima et gravis aliqua regie maiestatis aut regni necessitas infallanter sive regia maiestas agat in regno suo sive non, celebrentur due octave videlicet sanctorum Georgii et Michaelis ita videlicet quod illarum celebratio seu primus dies aut terminus incipiat statim vigesima die post festa prefata. In quibus duo adminus ex iudicibus ordinariis interesse debeant, ceteri vero si propter urgentes aliquas necessitates interesse nequeunt, vices gerentes eorum nichilominus interesse debeant et teneantur. Eorum autem loco, qui interesse non poterunt, regia maiestas alios ex dominis prelatiis et baronibus substituere debeat. Sine tamen presentia prefatorum duorum iudicum ordinariorum octave ipse non debeant neque possint celebrari; durent autem quousque necessarium videbitur.

Item diffinitum est, quod in Transsilvania et Sclavonia similiter singulis annis due alie octave videlicet Epiphaniarum Domini et sancti Iacobi celebrentur et similiter vigesima die huiusmodi festivitatum inchoentur et durent, quousque necessarium videbitur.

IV. Item quia finalis causarum decisio, potissimum vero in facto possessionario per varios hinc inde terminos variasque dilationes in longum serpere consuevit adeo, ut interdum vix in una hominis etate finaliter causa terminari posset, propter quod partes laboribus et expensis vehementer gravantur et nonnunquam ad extremam inopiam devenire coguntur, quamobrem conclusum est, ut amodo universe cause etiam in facto possessionum ac iurium possessionariorum coram quovis iudice deinceps movende absque omni prorogatione et dilatione semotaque omni exceptione in quatuor octavis finaliter terminentur.

V. Item ordinatum est, quod causantes sive litigantes in omni causa concordandi liberam habeant facultatem. Iudex vero eos inhibere neque pro pace seu concordia quicquam ab eis extorquere possit.

VI. Ceterum ex quo ordinatum est, quod universe cause in facto iurium possessionariorum movende in quatuor terminis sive octavis finaliter terminari debeant, idcirco statutum et diffinitum est, quod evocationes cum insinuatione, que super factis potentiariis, dampnorum illationibus aliisque nocumentis et iniuriis fuerint, in primis octavis post factam evocationem celebrandis finaliter terminentur. Si vero in facto possessionario fuerint et maxime si iurium et litteralium instrumentorum exhibitionem necessario requirere dinoscerentur, usque ad secundas octavas, sed non amplius pro huiusmodi privilegiorum productione differri possint et valeant. Evocationes vero cum insinuatione, in quibuscumque factis fuerint, sub sigillis omnium iudicum ordinariorum tam scilicet regiorum quam palatinalium et iudicis curie atque etiam banorum Sclavonie, Croatie et Dalmatie, sed et waywode Transsilvanie libere decernantur.

VII. Ulterius quia solent plurimi se a facie iuris prorogationum suffragio impune absentare et partem adversam iustam contra se actionem habentem longo litium processu gravare, quod malum ut amodo tollatur et unicuique iustitia debito tempore administretur, statutum est et sancitum, quod prorogationes regie maiestatis temporibus octavarum nemini suffragari valeant, nisi hiis, qui extra fines et oras regni Hungarie in castris et in servitiis vel in legationibus regiis vel regni fuerint vel occupabuntur in bello et ad illud cum ceteris una tempore debito proficiscentur. Illis etiam qui extra fines regni in castris – ut preferitur – fuerint, in tribus tantummodo octavis eiuscemodi prorogationes observentur, in quarta autem respondere et iuri stare teneantur. Preterea si duo vel etiam plures fratres indivisi fuerint et eorum pater aut eo mortuo frater maior natu domi fuerit, ceteri vero fratres vel eorum alter sive in bello sive in castris – ut preferitur – extra regnum occuparentur, prorogationes illis similiter non observentur. Si tamen fratres divisi fuerint, obtenta prorogatione frui possint et gaudere. Si qui autem huiuscemodi prorogationes a regia maiestate false impetrare presumpserint, hoc est, si vel fratres suos in bello vel in castris extra regnum aut in legationibus occupatos finxerint, in emenda lingue eo facto convincantur. Pro qua quidem pena personaliter, si presentes fuerint, si vero absentes, procuratores per iudicem, coram quo res agetur, capiantur et immediate pena ipsa ab eisdem irremissibiliter extorqueatur.

VIII. Item quia in executionibus faciendis magni refert, qualiter se homines regii habeant et quales illi sint, idcirco ordinatum est, quod in quolibet comitatu comes cum universitate nobilium teneatur ex potioribus nobilibus et personalem inibi residentiam facientibus decem vel duodecem aut octo vel eo plures aut pauciores iuxta comitatus exigentiam eligere et illi dumtaxat debeant et possint ad faciendas inquisitiones, evocationes statutiones et alias executiones cum testimonio capituli vel conventus proficisci, qui onus illud infra unum annum integrum supportare teneantur. Quamprimum autem eligentur, sicuti electi capitulares et conventuales ita et illi in sede iudiciaria iuxta subscriptam formam, iuramentum deponere teneantur. Et si qui onus eis impositum suscipere recusaverint, in viginti quinque marcis per comitem confestim et irremissibiliter exigendis convicti habeantur eo facto. Cum vero de aliqua executione revertentur, sicuti testimonium capituli vel conventus in capitulo vel conventu, ita et ipsi similiter in capitulo vel conventu iuramentum prestare debeant et teneantur, quod id, quod viderunt, fecerunt, audierunt, resciverunt et executi sunt, suo modo fatebuntur. Si qui vero ipsorum falsitatem aliquam quacumque ex causa commisisse reperti fuerint, honorem et humanitatem perdidisse censeantur et insuper in viginti quinque marcis per comitem immediate et irremissibiliter exigendis convincantur eo facto; quodque de cetero nunquam testimonium de aliqua re neque intra neque extra iudicium sine speciali gratia regie maiestatis facere valeant.

IX. Item quia in quolibet comitatu nobiles, qui ceteris et condicione et facultatibus reperiuntur inferiores, pro iudicibus nobilium eligi consueverunt, quo fit, ut plurime levitates timore, favore et premio per illos committuntur, eam ob rem statutum est, prout etiam temporibus condam serenissimi domini Sigismundi imperatoris et aliorum regum observatum fuisse plane constat, quod deinceps non tales, sed boni et digni beneque possessionati nobiles in quolibet comitatu ex residentibus eligantur. Quicumque vero sic electi assumere onus illud recusaverint, in quinquaginta marcis immediate et irremissibiliter per comitem exigendis convincantur eo facto. Qui quidem iudices nobilium arma et sigilla cognoscibilia habere debeant et teneantur.

X. Item quia per homines capitulorum et conventuum, qui pro testimoniis transmittuntur, pro favore, pretio, dono, odio, timore et complacentia plurime et incredibiles enormitates tam in fassionibus quam etiam litterarum emanationibus committi solent, hoc vero ex eo potissimum fieri consuevit, quia non canonici, sed rectores altarium vel capellani et frequenter etiam scolares et mendicantes et quidem tales ad executiones mittuntur, qui facillime corrumpi possunt, idcirco – ut huic malo debita provisione occurratur – statutum est, quod in omni loco capitulari et conventuali teneantur canonici et fratres in manibus prelati vel vicarii sui iuramentum de servanda in executionibus iustitia deponere, quodque deinceps nemo alius de capitulo nisi canonicus, de conventu vero, nisi frater in sacerdotio constitutus ad executiones mittantur. Hi vero seriatim transmitti debeant. Et quodcumque ab aliqua executione revertuntur, que executi sunt, sub iuramento referant. Pro via autem et redemptionibus litterarum teneatur ille modus et ordo, qui tempore condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris tentus fuit et qui etiam in presenti decreto inferius est declaratus. Cum autem pro aliqua evocatione vel inquisitione facienda vel alia quacunque re emittuntur, inquisitionem ipsam cum homine regio, qui bonus et conscientiosus atque bene possessionatus esse debeat, facere debeant singillatim tam a nobilibus quam ignobilibus et ab omnibus etiam aliis, quos habere poterit. Antequam tamen inquiret, strictissimum iuramentum ab eis exigere teneatur, quod quicquid ab eis interrogabit, fideliter et veraciter confitebuntur. Postmodum vero nominatim unde scilicet sint et si ignobiles fuerint, cuius sunt iobagiones, cuius etiam condicionis et item quid de re, de qua inquit, quilibet ipsorum scire confitebitur, de verbo ad verbum singulorum scilicet attestationem scribere debeat et teneatur. Si qui vero huiusmodi ordinationis transgressores reperti fuerint, tanquam periuri et falsarii atque communis boni communisque iustitie proditores eorum beneficiis eo facto privati sint et habeantur et prelati eorum aliis illa conferre teneantur neque eis quoquo modo gratiam facere valeant.

XI. Item quia propter incuriam et negligentiam abbatum et prepositorum regularium, potissimum vero constitutionum non observantiam conventus eorum multum inordinate, dissolute et scandalose vivere ac in emanationibus litterarum et in inquisitionibus faciendis plurimas enormitates et falsitates committere solet, idcirco de regie maiestatis voluntate et dominorum prelatorum, baronum et procerum ceterorumque regnicolarum communi consilio conclusum et diffinitum est, quod amodo abbatias, et preposituras conventuum regularium, potissimum vero sigilla habentium, nulli alii, nisi religiosi eius ordinis, cuius abbacie vel prepositure fuerint, tenere possint. Quodque ipsi abbates et prepositi simul cum omnibus eorum fratribus regularem vitam iuxta ordinis sui statuta servare teneantur.

XII. Item quod episcopi, in quorum dioecesi huiusmodi abbates et prepositi fuerint, teneantur eosdem atque etiam eorum conventus bis singulis annis personaliter visitare. Si autem maioribus occupati vel absentes fuerint, per ipsorum vicarios et prepositos aut alios bonos et doctos viros ecclesiasticos hoc nichilominus facere teneantur. Et si abbates, vel prepositi ipsi regulam eorum non observare vel alias malam vitam ducere aut etiam episcopis suis inobedientes fore dinoscuntur, deponantur per eosdem et melioribus eorum beneficia conferantur. Ex conventu etiam fratrum, si qui mali et inobedientes fuerint, per visitatores eiciantur. Nam si abbates et prepositi boni erunt, fratres boni fiant, necesse est. Sicque neque in litterarum emanationibus neque aliis in rebus falsitas committi poterit.

XIII. Item solent nonnulli in evocationibus ponere: de consensu et voluntate t(alis) et t(alis), quod directe contra Deum et eius iustitiam fore dinoscitur. Quis enim scire potest, an consenserint vel quod commissum dicitur fuisse, voluerint. De occultis siquidem et intentione preter Deum nemo recte iudicare potest. Idcirco statutum est, quod deinceps nunquam tales evocationes decernantur. Nunquam etiam uxores, matres, filie et sorores nobilium evocentur, nisi forte causa et ratione talium iurium possessionariorum moveretur, que illas equaliter concernere dinoscerentur. Cum clausula tamen prefata, hoc est: de consensu et voluntate et instigatione t(alis) et t(alis) nullo unquam tempore evocari debeant. Quod si fieri contingeret, per iudices ordinarios et magistros prothonotarios nunquam observentur nunquam etiam admittantur.

XIV. Item de communibus inquisitionibus celebrandis ordinatum est, quod pro partium evidentiori iustitia communis inquisitio sicuti hactenus, ita etiam imposterum celebrari possit. Celebrari tamen debeat tali ordine, quod quotienscunque eiusmodi inquisitio fieri debebit, per utramque partem uno die in sede iudiciaria eiusdem comitatus celebretur. Preterea quod testimonium capituli vel conventus et regii homines iidem pro qualibet parte, et non diversi fiant. Quodque singuli attestantes singillatim iurare et per ipsius capituli vel conventus atque regios homines de negotio, de quo experiri volent, interrogari et examinari debeant. Et item quod tempore inquisitionis sive attestations huiusmodi partes causantes interesse non valeant, sed per ipsos regios et capituli vel conventus homines excludantur et remotis illis seorsum – ut prefertur – quilibet interrogari et examinari debeat. Ad huiusmodi autem attestacionem faciendam periuri, infames et qui honorem et humanitatem perdiderunt, preterea ignobiles, etiamsi possessionati fuerint, per regiam maiestatem non nobilitati, acceptari et admitti non debeant.

Item quod in oculata revisione modus et antiqua consuetudo servetur.

Item quia hactenus propter inordinatam celebrationem communium inquisitionum interdum favore vel odio, interdum vero metu partium plurima periuria et quidem evidenter commissa sunt, ad evitandum igitur et conterendum huiuscemodi animarum laqueos et simul ad tollendam hanc pestiferam peccandi occasionem diffinitum est, quod tametsi in superiori articulo satis declaratum sit, qualiter inquisitionum et aliorum etiam iuridicorum processuum executiones fieri debeant, tamen ut magis huiuscemodi dampnanda periuria cessent et extinguantur, in executionibus ipsarum inquisitionum talis ordo servetur, quod dum ex reportatione inquisitionum querele sic, prout facte fuerint, reperientur, non reus – prout hactenus consuetum extitit – se purgabit, sed actor suo et coniuratorum suorum, paucorum scilicet vel plurium iuramentis iuxta rei exigentiam et iudicis deliberationem actionem fulciet et confirmabit Ita videlicet, quod si actio pro dampnis fuerit, iudex iuxta qualitatem, quantitatem et exigentiam dampnorum secundum regni consuetudinem actori iuramentum iudicabit. Et si actor ipse inquisitionem pro sui parte reportabit, causamque obtinebit, reus in facto potentie amodo non convincatur, sed eius loco in viginti quinque marcis, puta in centum aureis, immediate persolvendis ac inter iudicem et actorem equaliter dividendis eo facto convictus sit et habeatur et insuper dampnificato damna persolvere et de illis plenariam satisfactionem impendere teneatur. Casu vero quo in factis eiusmodi dampnorum tempore inquisitionis fassiones attestantium dispares fuerint, iudex decernere habebit, an actor pro dampnis sibi illatis iurare, vel reus se purgare debebit.

XV. Ceterum diffinitum est, quod amodo imposterum nemo in facto potentie, etiamsi quis commissa per ipsum mala vel in iudicio vel etiam alias proprio ore confiteretur, nisi in his subscriptis casibus convincatur, puta: propter invasionem domorum nobilium, item occupationem possessionum et utilitatura atque pertinentiarum earundem ac detentionem nobilium sine iusta causa, preterea vulnerationem verberationem vel interemptionem nobilium. In his vero casibus taliter iudex procedere debet: Quod si actor pro sui parte inquisitionem modo et ordine supranotato reportaverit, in ampliorem rei verificationem, si partes voluerint, causam ipsam ad communem inquisitionem decernat. Si vero reus ipsam inquisitionem acceptare recusabit, extunc actor, pro maiori verificatione actionis sue, iuxta regni consuetudinem hactenus in hac parte observatam, ad caput illius adversarii iurare habebit. Si autem partibus volentibus ipsa causa immediate prescripta communi inquisitione diffiniatur et ipsa communis inquisitio pro parte actoris pure et simpliciter reportabitur, sententia pro parte actoris feratur. Si tamen reportatio ipsa dispar fuerit, iudex ex attestantium fassionibus decernat, uter illorum, actor scilicet, vel reus iuramentum deponere debet. Ubi vero in his prescriptis casibus, factum scilicet potentiarium tangentibus castellani, officiales aut alii familiares vel iobagiones dominorum vel aliorum quorumcunque regnicolarum delinquent et quoscunque offenderent, eorum domini propterea penam facti potentie non incurrant, sed super innocentia, quod scilicet non de eorum voluntate malum illud sit patratum – prout iuri et iudici consonum videbitur – se purgare debent. Verumtamen si tales apud eorum dominos remanerent, ex parte eorundem ipsi domini meram iustitiam iuxta iuris equitatem facere et administrare tenebuntur. In aliis autem casibus, puta dampnorum et iniuriarum illationibus et ceteris similibus modus et ordo prescriptus observetur.

XVI. Ceterum quia tempore attestationis, communis inquisitionis, oculate revisionis, statutionis et restatutionis necnon estimationis iurium possessionariorum per partem convictam hactenus nonnunquam repulsiones in contemptum iudicii et iustitie fieri solite sunt, pro quibus prima vice in una marca auri, secunda vero in duabus id facientes iuxta consuetudinem hactenus observatam convincebantur, quare, ut huiusmodi violentorum et iuris iustitieque turbatorum temeritas debito remedio compescatur, statutum et sancitum est, quod quicumque imposterum – cuiuscunque status et condicionis existat – qualitercunque et in quacunque causa, etiam sententie capitalis id facere presumpserit, contra partem adversam in facto potentie et insuper, si in causa statutionis vel restatutiones aut estimationes fuerit, in estimatione illorum iurium possessionariorum, que statui vel restatui aut estimari debuerunt, si vero id tempore communis inquisitionis vel oculate revisions continget, similiter in facto potentie, preterea in amissione cause convincatur et convictus habeatur eo facto.

XVII. Item ordinatum et conclusum est, quod trine forenses proclamationes, que hactenus in facto possessionum et iurium possessionariorum, preterea in exhibitionibus litterarum et litteralium instrumentorum atque etiam in facto obligationum, ceterisque aliis causis fieri solite sunt, cessent et deinceps nullo unquam tempore fiant, sed penitus aboleantur, quandoquidem abusio et corruptela potius quam lex dici potest.

In obligationibus vero talis modus servetur, quod secundum quod se quisque obligavit, facta legitima evocatione, in primis octavis iudicium et iustitiam recipiat et ad hoc vigore presentis decreti astrictus habeatur.

XVIII. Item quia in duellorum dimicatione plurime hinc inde fraudes committi possunt, raro enim illi, inter quos illud fit iudicium, per se decertant, sed pugiles conducunt, qui nonnunquam dono, favore et promissis corrumpuntur, sique partem suam quantumvis iustam, quandoquidem non ipsimet decertare consueverunt, succumbere patiuntur, quare statutum est, quod amodo illud iudicii genus extra hoc regnum in mundo inauditum perpetuo aboleatur et in factis potentiariis iuriumque possessionariorum fieri nunquam debeat. Duellum siquidem tunc solummodo fieri deberet et ad hoc ordinatum extitit, quando omnis probatio deficeret. In factis vero potentiariis et possessionariis partes probationes semper habent et etiam alioquin, iudicium duelli ad curiam regiam militarem et non ad sedem iudiciariam pertinet. Accedit, quod in iudiciis specialis presentia regie maiestatis semper interesse, litteras etiam sigillare debet, is vero ut plurimum spiritualis esse consuevit, intererunt preterea archiepiscopi, episcopi et plures alii spirituales et idcirco non convent, ut in sede iudiciaria duellum decernatur. Proinde his et plurimis aliis bonis respectibus rationabilibusque ex causis hoc iudicii genus perpetuo aboleatur et nunquam decernatur, nisi in causis, in quibus omnis probatio deficeret, ut si solus a solo in itinere nullo spectante spoliaretur vel quicumque alter alteri sine alicuius testimonio commodaret aut aliquid ad secretas aures diceret et aliter neque spoliolum neque creditum neque etiam verba prolata probari possent. In quibus casibus huiusmodi duellum decerni quidem potest, non tamen in sede iudiciaria, sed in curia militari regie maiestatis. Ad illam siquidem – ut prefertur – et non ad sedem iudiciariam, eiuscemodi genus iudicii pertinere plane dinoscitur.

XIX. Ceterum ex quo decisio quarumlibet causarum etiam in facto possessionum et iurium possessionariorum deinceps movendarum pro regnicolarum quiete et communi equitate ad quatuor tantummodo octavas – ut prefertur – restricta est et reducta, statutum est, quod quilibet in causam ratione iurium possessionariorum attractus in primis octavis proclametur, quo evocatio ipsa magis ad eius notitiam perveniat. Et per magistrum, coram quo causa ipsa mota fuerit, debeat fieri – ut moris est – signatura. Et si non comparebit in primis octavis, in nullo onere seu birsagio vincatur. Si vero neque in secundis neque in tertiis comparebit, teneatur solvere birsagium ab antiquo consuetum. In quartis autem octavis sive compareat et se causamque suam defendat sive non; causa ipsa iuxta vim premissi articuli non obstante quavis allegatione finaliter terminetur et diffiniatur.

XX. Item conclusum et ordinatum est, quod deinceps nullus omnino magistrorum prothonotariorum private in hospicio extra scilicet tabulam seu sedem iudiciariam regie maiestatis causam aliquam sive ratione possessionum sive actuum potentiariarum sive aliorum quorumcunque negotiorum motam vel movendam adiudicare et sententias ferre audeat, sed universe cause tam maiores quam minores in sede iudiciaria in presentia certorum iudicum ordinariorum discutiantur. Quodque nulle prorsus littere, potissimum in causis arduis et que finalem rerum decisionem contingunt, per magistrum alias extrudentur, nisi in sede iudiciaria, ubi prius alta et intelligibili voce publice perlegantur et deinde pro maiori cautela et evidentia iustitie ultra sigillum, quo ipse magister prothonotarius illas muniet, alius etiam magister prothonotarius se subscribere debeat et teneatur ita, quodsi causa coram regiis prothonotariis agatur, prothonotarius palatinalis, si vero coram illo, regius aut iudicis curie ad litteras manum apponere et se subscribere teneatur.

XXI. Item quia nonnulli se a iudicio et iurisdictione banorum, wayvodarum, comitum et vicecomitum parochialium eximi et solummodo iudicio et iudicatu regie maiestatis preservari procurarunt, sub cuius exemptionis confidentia ceteros plurimis dampnis, iniuriis, oppressionibus, nocumentis et aliorum malorum generibus impune afficere consueverunt, quare statutum est, quod universe huiusmodi exemptiones hactenus qualitercunque concesse et per quoscunque impetrate demptis dumtaxat perpetuis comitibus, qui ex vetustissima divorum regum ordinatione solius regie maiestatis iudicio reservati intelliguntur, revocentur, cassentur et nullius vigoris aut firmitatis habeantur. Merito quippe concessa immunitate et gratia privari debent, qui illa abutuntur. Et si imposterum per quospiam similes exemptiones et gratie forte impetrarentur, ille quoque vigore presentis decreti nullius vigoris intelligantur.

XXII. Ceterum quia ex parte illicite occupationis illorum bonorum et iurium possessionariorum, que per regiam maiestatem servitoribus et aliis fidelibus suis donantur, vane querele et clamores non solummodo apud maiestatem suam, verum etiam in universo regno fieri consueverunt, causantur enim plurimi, quod quamprimum bona aliqua a sua celsitudine per suos aut alios impetrantur, illa protinus nullo habito scrutinio, an scilicet iuste et legitime maiestas sua donare potuit, occuparent et non obstante illorum contradictione tenerent, quare statutum est et sancitum, quod amodo si quibus bona aliqua per regiam maiestatem quocunque nomine et titulo donata fuerint et contra iura, decreta et consuetudinem regni quacunque arte dominium illorum non obstante etiam contradictorum inhibitione capient, comes per contradictores requisitus teneatur e vestigio illos ammonere, quo manus suas de illis excipiant. Et si ad primam eius requisitionem et ammonitionem id facere recusaverint, secundo per eosdem contradictores requisitus teneatur vigore presentis decreti scita prius veritate illos captivare et de illis bonis eicere et insuper ad solutionem communis estimationis eorundem bonorum per omnia remedia compellere. Ad cuius rei executionem si comes per se impotens esset, comitatus per ipsum requisitus penes eundem insurgere et ei opportuno favore, subsidio et auxilio assitere debeat et teneatur. Si vero adeo potentes fuerint, ut comes etiam cum auxilio comitatus id facere non potest, regia maiestas per comitem avizata bona ipsa occupari facere teneatur.

XXIII. Item conclusum est, quod si deinceps aliqua bona a regia maiestate impetrata fuerint et impetrans insteterit, ut ea regia maiestas nomine suo occupare faceret simulque procuraret, ut littere donationales scriberentur, quasi illa de manibus suis regiis collata essent, eiusmodi littere donationales quoad illam clausulam: de manibus regiis nullius vigoris et firmitatis sint et habeantur et quod neque per comites, sed neque in octavis per iudices ordinarios et magistros prothonotarios observentur.

XXIV. Ulterius quod universa bona, possessiones et iura possessionaria, que ab anno proxime transacto, videlicet millesimo quadringentesimo octogesimo quinto usque in presentem diem festi Epiphaniarum Domini anni eiusdem millesimi quadringentesimi octogesimi sexti inclusive per regiam maiestatem quibuscunque donata sunt, si et in quantum illa contra iura, decreta et antiquam consuetudinem regni occupata sunt, illorum detentores et occupatores requisiti prius et moniti cum litteris regiis aut palatinalibus infra spatium unius mensis integri a die requisitionis et monitionis computando remittere debeant et teneantur. Alioquin comes cum aliis nobilibus illius comitatus penes eum eligendis et deputandis illis, quorum fuerunt reddere in eisdemque illos conservare debeat. Si autem detentores illi potentes fuerint, comes vero ad hoc exequendum impotens et insufficiens, comitatus vigore presentis statuti insurgere et in hac parte ipsi comiti assistere debeat et teneatur. Illi autem detentores, si ex regia donatione in bonis illis ius sibi acquisitum fuisse sperabunt, iure regni requirere debeant. Si vero detentores adeo potentes fuerint, ut comes etiam cum auxilio totius comitatus id facere non potuerit; regia maiestas per comitem avizata occupari, et premissa exequi facere debeat et teneatur.

XXV. Ceterum quia fieri solet, quod nonnulli bona et possessiones suas necessitate cogente pignori obligant et eadem tempore medio venditis etiam aliis rebus suis, licet redimere vellent et ad hoc pecunias paratas haberent, tamen illi, quibus obligarunt, immemores salutis et honoris remittere nollent, sed ad octavas eius rei decisionem differrent, ut scilicet interea fructus illarum percipere valeant. Propter quod nonnunquam eiusmodi possessiones et bona ab ipsis pauperibus et eorundem heredibus perpetuo alienantur, ex quo pecunias utcumque ad id dispositas aut expendere coguntur aut casu amittunt. Ut igitur illorum feneratorum malitia compescatur et horum inopum indempnitati consulatur, statutum et sancitum est, quod quodocumque eiusmodi feneratores per aliam partem iuridice et legitime requisiti pecunias eorum levare vel illis levatis bona impignorata reddere et remittere noluerint, sed causam ad octavas distulerint in primis octavis causa ipsa diffiniri et sic adiudicari debeat, quod sine ulla solutione bona illa remittantur et per iudicem statim restatuantur et insuper fenerator ille in tanta summa pecuniarum, in quanta bona illa sibi obligata fuerunt, contra partem alteram convincatur eo facto.

XXVI. Ceterum quia quotiescunque bona aliqua aut iura possessionaria sive per defectum seminis sive aliter ad coronam et consequenter collationem regie maiestatis devolvi contingunt, plurimi insurgere et bona ipsa iure ad eos devoluta acclamare soliti sunt sicque regie celsitudinis aures non modo importunes clamoribus obtundunt, verum etiam maiestatem suam maioribus intentam, ne se de illis intromittat, prohibent, turbant et impediunt, illis etiam quibus maiestas sua bona huiusmodi donat, ne sibi statuam, contradictionis velamine obviant, hoc vero idcirco maxime facere consueverunt, ut interea quoad iure determinabitur, an ad regiam maiestatem vel alios bona ipsa sint devoluta, fructus, proventus et alias illorum utilitates impune percipere possint, quare presenti decreto sancitum est, quod in quocumque comitatu aliqua iura per defectum seminis quorumcunque decedentium devoluta fuerint et de huiusmodi possessionibus manifeste non constabit, sed dubium erit, an ad ius regium vel aliquos fratres de genere decedentis seu heredes feminei sexus pertineant, extunc regia maiestas infra huiusmodi rei dubie decisionem bona illa occupari et ad manus alicuius probi et idonei hominis, quem scilicet maiestas sua ad hoc deputabit, tanquam ad manus communes et fideles dari et assignari facere debeat, qui interim – quoad dubium illud solvetur et causa finaliter decidetur – cum solitis et iustis proventibus teneat. Si quid autem ultra solitum et ordinatum census extorsit, illi, cui post cause decisionem bona ipsa cedent, reddere debeat et teneatur. Hoc adiecto, quod si qui bona ipsa ad eos devoluta fuisse affirmaverint, infra unum integrum annum, prout etiam in sequenti articulo tangetur sive celebrentur octave sive non, teneantur coram palatino iura sua producere et docere bona ipsa ad eos pertinere. Quod si facere poterunt, palatinus eisdem statuere mandet et faciat cum effectu. Si autem in probatione defecerint, dentur et assignentur eadem bona ad manus illorum, quibus per regiam maiestatem fuerunt donata et si qui ulterius ad illa ius habere speraverint, eadem de manibus regii requirant legitime. Ubi autem uxores vel filie huiusmodi hominum absque herede masculino decedentium in illis possessionibus remanserint possessiones eadem a manibus eorum occupari et auferri non debeant, priusquam de earum iuribus, videlicet an hereditarie et perpetuo ad ius femineum partineant, an ne, veritas inquiratur. Quam quidem veritatem femine ipse infra unum annum – ut preferitur – ostendere debebunt et tenebuntur. Et si repertum fuerit easdem possessiones iuri femineo non competere, extunc dictis uxoribus talium decedentium, antequam de dominio illarum excludantur, per regiam maiestatem aut alios, ad quos reperte fuerint devolute vel etiam quibus maiestas sua easdem possessiones forte donaverit, de earum dotibus et iuribus plenaria satisfactio impendatur. Filiabus vero usque ad tempus maritacionis earum domus paterna, cum quarta parte possessionum paternarum pro quarta filiali secundum antiquam consuetudinem regni sequestretur et possidenda relinquatur. Postquam vero maritate et traducte fuerint, de earum iure quartalicio pecuniaria solutione mediante satisfiat. Ubi autem alicuius filia vel soror sive de curia alicuius baronis vel nobilis sive etiam de propria domo paterna vel aliunde undecunque cum consensu et voluntate patris aut fratris homini impossessionato nupserit, illius puella in quarta illa puellari per ipsum patrem aut fratrem nobilitari debeat. Si vero sine consensu et voluntate patris aut fratris id fecerit, in portione sua puellari non nobilitetur, sed tamen pecuniaria solutione eidem satisfieri debeat. Et in hoc casu ius suum quartalitium non cum possessione, sed cum pecuniaria satisfactione requirendi habebit facultatem, prout et quemadmodum huiusmodi consuetudo et ordinatio etiam hactenus conservata fuisse plane dinoscitur.

XXVII. Preterea ordinatum est, quod si cui per regiam maiestatem bona et possessiones et quecumque alia iura possessionaria sive per defectum seminis sive nomine iuris regii aut alio quocunque titulo donata fuerint et tempore statutionis contradicetur, impetrans contradictioni parere et locum dare teneatur et illorum dominium contra ipsam contradictionem non capiat. Sed tamen si contradictor de recenti in possessionem illorum bonorum se ingressit et prius illorum dominium non habuit – prout etiam in superiori articulo tactum est – infra unius anni integri spatium a die datarum litterarum donationalium computando sive interea celebrentur alique octave sive non, teneatur contradictor coram regia maiestate aut palatino vel magistris suis prothonotariis ad id deputatis iura sua producere, rationem contradictionis reddere et simul ostendere bona illa optimo iure ad se pertinere. Alioquin elapso termino per regiam maiestatem aut palatinum vigore presentis statuti eiciatur de bonis illis et assignentur illi, qui impetravit. Et insuper idem contradictor compellatur ad integram restitutionem quicquid utilitatis interea ex illis bonis percepit. Si vero bona ipsa etiam prius apud manus contradictoris fuerint, impetrans iuxta prescriptos articulos in octavis vigore presentis decreti de manibus eiusdem iure requirere debeat.

Item dos uxorum qualitercunque decedentium salva semper maneat, et illa nunquam fraudentur.

XXVIII. Item quia inter prelatos ceterosque viros ecclesiasticos ac nobiles nonnunquam lites et controversie suboriri consueverunt et pars partem omni via, modo et arte gravare laborat, pro tranquilliori igitur statu et comodo regnicolarum, ne scilicet pars in partem in hoc casu habeat imperium, statutum est, quod si prelati et alii viri ecclesiastici contra nobiles in presentia cuiuscunque iudicis litem moverint, pro re et causa, pro qua scilicet agetur, lite ipsa pendente sine certa scientia regie maiestatis interdictum in eos ponere vel contra ipsos sententiam excommunicationis ferre non debeant, ne potius ex passione, quam equitatis amore tulisse eam videantur. Et si prelati vel alie ecclesiastice persone in presentia alicuius iudicis iuris ordine convicti fuerint, in eadem gravamina, quibus adversarios onerare intendebant, eo facto incidant.

XXIX. Item quia mercatores et negotiatores ceterique pauperes, qui aut questus gratia aut pro necessaria victuum acquisitione vel etiam pro aliis ipsorum rebus per regnum hinc inde proficisci habent, per varias arestationes multipliciter gravari, impediri, molestari et dampno irrecuperabili affici consueverunt, ordinatum itaque est et sancitum, ut amodo perpetuis semper successivis temporibus talis in arestationibus modus servetur, quod si quispiam causabitur alium sibi debere (nisi debitum fuerit liquidum, hoc est, nisi debitor fuerit apertus et manifestus, qui vulgari et materno sermone zembevalo ados nuncupatur, is enim etiam in communi loco arestari poterit) non protinus illum vel alium aut alios pro suo arbitrato debeat arestare, sed prius teneatur rem ad aures comitis illius comitatus, in quo debitor fuerit, deferre, qui vigore presentis decreti tenebitur e vestigio dominum debitoris ammonere et simul requisitum facere, quo illum iuri detineat. Et si creditori non satisfaciet, teneatur sub pena duodecim marcarum gravis ponderis per comitem exigendarum ad primum diem iuridicum ad sedem iudiciariam actori responsurum adducere. Ubi si ille defendere se et expurgare non poterit vel dictus dominus suus eum in secundo termino iuridico presentare et statuere non curabit, comes ipse teneatur, et sit obligatus de bonis eiusdem domini sui actori non solummodo de sorte capitali, verum etiam de universis expensis per creditorem vel actorem factis ex integro satisfacere. Si vero debitor seu reus per dominum suum detentus in sedem iudiciariam transmissus ibique convictus fuerit, idem dominus suus iuxta iudiciariam deliberationem et commissionem comitis de rebus et bonis debitoris tam – ut prefertur – de summa capitali quam etiam expensis factis satisfacere debeat et teneatur et ad hoc per comitem compellatur. Cui quidem reo si facultates ad satisfaciendum non sufficient, imprimis res, quas habuerit, dentur et estimentur creditori et tandem caput quoque illius tradatur in manibus dicti creditoris. Si autem alicubi in hac parte comiti non parerent ita, quod iuxta vim presentis decreti debitum suum facere non permetteretur, sed cogeretur rem ad aures regias deducere, extunc dominus possessionis, in qua scilicet ipsi comiti refragabitur, in viginti quinque marcis per regiam maiestatem irremissibiliter extorquendis convincatur eo facto. Et nichilominus teneatur maiestas sua et ad hoc sit obligata de quantitate et summa debita creditori vel actori simul cum expensis per ipsum factis sine ulla prorsus dilatione satisfacere ad integrum.

XXX. Item statutum est, quod dum prelati, barones et quicumque alii nobiles, sive ad regiam maiestatem vel eius curiam sive ad bellum vel quocumque alias et sive in rebus privatis sive publicis proficiscentur, sine dampno, nocumento, iniuria et impedimento aliorum regnicolarum semper et ubique proficisci debeant et teneantur.

XXXI. Item quia regnicole per progressum et descensum militantium plurimum hactenus – ut prefertur – gravati et dampnificati fuerunt, statutum itaque est et sancitum, quod tam gentes regie quam aliorum quorumcunque regnicolarum tam scilicet equites quam pedites que per regnum proficisci habebunt, teneantur deinceps ubique pretia omnium victualium tam scilicet equis quam hominibus convenientium persolvere et nusquam dampnum inferre presumant. Quodsi aliqui non regie, sed aliorum contravenerint, illarum dominus pro dampnis irrogatis ob iniuriam et iacturam passo iure requiratur. Si vero regie fuerint, tenebitur semper maiestas sua cum illis aliquem bonum et bene possessionatum hominem suum deputare, qui cum eis procedat et nusquam dampnum inferri patiatur. Et si aliter facere presumpserit atque pro dampnis et iniuriis querela ad regias aures deducta fuerit, teneatur maiestas sua ex parte illius talem tantamque iustitiam et satisfactionem impendere, quod non solummodo dampna illata, sed etiam expense, quas dampnificatus sive querulans fecerit, refundantur. Ne autem occasione solutionis et pretii victualium differentiam seu contentionem aliquam oriri contingat, diffinitum est, quod tam regiis, quam etiam aliorum gentibus ad bellum profecturis teneantur ubique locorum victualia dare et administrare iuxta registrum, et limitationem regie maiestatis, quam tunc maiestas sua, iuxta temporis condicionem facere et ductoribus huiuscemodi gentium suarum dare debebit et eorum pretia gentes ipse similiter iuxta continentias eiusdem registri seu limitationis sine difficultate semper persolvere debeant et teneantur. Ceterum quia nonnullae gentes, potissimum vero levis armature sive huzarones hoc facere consueverunt, quod post descensum exercitus aut etiam expirato stipendio eorum non in bonis propriis ipsorum, sed aliorum iacent seque reficiunt et plurima istius dampna, molestias et alia nocumentorum genera impune committunt, statutum itaque et diffinitum est, quod tales amodo nusquam in bonis aliorum manere seu iacere possint, sed teneantur ad propria redire et ibi, si volent, nova stipendia expectare. Quodsi qui forte temere aliud attemptare presumerent et hii, in quorum bonis agerent, moleste ferrent, debeant comiti illius comitatus significare et eum requirere, quo illas removeat. Ille vero e vestigio teneatur eas ammonere, quod recedant et dampna irrogata persolvant et si non paruerint, eos captivet et personas ad castigandum regie maiestati transmittat; de rebus vero et bonis suis et familiarium suorum, dampna illata rectificet et persolvat. Si autem comes per se ad hoc impotens et insufficiens erit, comitatus penes eundem insurgere teneatur. Si autem comes tepidus vel negligens fuerit et dampnificatus querelam regie maiestati porrexerit, debeat et teneatur maiestas sua de propriis bonis et rebus ipsius comitis versa illa dampna rectificare et etiam expensas refundere et insuper gentes ipsas de possessione querulantis removeare.

XXXII. Item quia Veneti et Poloni omni arte omnique via, technis conati sunt et semper conantur ad terras et dominia, ad sacram coronam pertinentia pedem inferre et illa usurpare, prout etiam aliquam partem de facto usurparunt, proinde statutum est et sancitum sub nota perpetue infidelitatis, ut nemo regnicolarum audeat illis aut eorum alicui castra, fortalitia, civitates, oppida et possessiones aut alia bona immobilia vendere, inscribere, impignorare, commendare, donare vel aliter qualitercunque dare vel assignare.

XXXIII. Item quia officiales et servitores dominorum ex confidentia, quam in eorum dominis locatam habent, plurimis dampnis, iniuriis, molestiis et impedimentis certos afficere consueverunt, quare ut eorum temeritas et licentia compescatur et simul ut etiam eorum domini providentiores efficiantur, sancitum est et conclusum, quodsi qui nobiles et possessionati castra vel alia officia ab ipsorum dominis tenuerint malaque ex illis perpetraverint, teneantur eorum domini scita prius veritate ad requisitionem comitis, sub quo fuerint, lesis iustitiam administrare et satisfactionem impendere, commissaque omnia rectificare. Si vero eiusmodi malorum patratores non fuerint in officiolatu aliquo constituti, sed stipendium dumtaxat ab eorum dominis habuerint et in propriis suis domibus manserint aut aliter dominis ipsorum serviverint et sic mala huiusmodi commiserint, ipsimet teneantur coram comite suo comparere, iuri stare et se expurgare. In hoc autem casu talium domini non debeant neque audeant se de illis intromittere neque eos defendere, sed ad comitem predictum eos remittere teneantur. Si qui vero aliter facere presumerent, convincantur eo facto in dupplo homagio illius servitoris et nichilominus comes servitorem illum captivare et ex parte sua leso debitam iustitiam administrare teneatur. Domini vero huiusmodi servitores suos, qui scilicet alios dampnificabunt aut aliqua mala perpetrabunt sive etiam qui factures fuerint et commissa sibi bona male dispensabunt vel non data bona ratione aufugient, non obstante privilegio et immunitate nobilitatis libere ubicunque poterunt, captivare et ad satisfactionem astringere possint et valeant. Si quis tamen servitorem captivabit et ille causabitur se iniuste captum facta contra dominum evocatione in primis octavis causa discutiatur et iustitia capto ex parte domini sui administretur.

XXXIV. Preterea si cuius servitor vel factor aufugiet et alterius domini servitio se subiciet, requisitus et ammonitus dominus novus per priorem teneatur illum e vestigio licentiarum et a se dimittere; alioquin in dupplo homagio servitoris illius convictus sit et habeatur eo facto. Et nichilominus si nullo modo dimittere voluerit, evocetur per lesum ad octavas primum celebrandas, ubi eidem ex parte illius plenaria et condigna iustitia administrari debeat.

XXXV. Ulterius de tributorum et teloniorum exactionibus ordinatum est, quod per totum hinc annum usque ad futurum scilicet festum Circumscisionis Domini comites quorumlibet comitatum cum certis et potioribus nobilibus illorum comitatum quotquot loca teloniorum in illo comitatu habentur et si illud pro pontibus aut aggeribus vel in terra arida aut aliter exigitur et item quot ulnarum tam pontes quam aggeres illi existunt, regie maiestati fideliter rescribere teneantur, ut tandem maiestas sua cum dominis prelatis et baronibus possit et debeat limitare, quantum quisque in suo tributo ab itinerantibus exigere valeat. Si qui vero postea ultra huiusmodi limitationem amplius aliquid extorquere et huic sanctioni contravenire non formidarent, teneatur comes cum electis nobilibus rectificare et levis tam de exactis quam etiam de expensis satisfacere. Si vero incorrigibiles fuerint, prohibeat comes, quod usque ad gratiam regie maiestatis ulterius ibi tributum exigere non presumant et insuper provideat, quod interea libere, et sine ulla tributi solutione locum illum quilibet pertransire possit. Tales vero pertranseuntes comes ab illis transgressoribus defendere teneatur. Si qui autem comites per se telonia in illo comitatu, in quo officium tenent, habent, vicinorum aliorum duorum comitatum comites debeant tributa illius comitis conspiciere et illorum rationem et causam atque qualitatem – ut prefertur – regie maiestati rescribere.

XXXVI. Item a rusticis uxores de aliis villis ducentibus deinceps nullum prorsus tributum exigatur. Quodque a sartoribus et rasoribus, non quadraginta denarii, prout hactenus solutum fuit, sed dumtaxat tantum, quantum ab aliis artificibus et viatoribus exigitur, in locis tributorum exigatur.

XXXVII. Adicientes statutis superioribus, quod nullus comes, banus, wayuoda seu alius officialis regius cuiuscunque denominationis et dignitatis existat, ecclesias episcopales, archiepiscopales, abbatiales, prepositales et alias quascunque regio iure patronatus disponendas, earundemque tenutas, pertinentias, decimas et possessiones in tres terminos et limites sui honoris seu officiolatus absque speciali mandato regio occuare aut se de eisdem partialiter vel totaliter ingerere presumat.=8

Martii 1435: XIX

XXXVIII. Ut autem officiales et comites nostri pretacti nobiles et incolas regni nostri sub suo honore et iudicatu constitutos indebitis birsagiorum exactionibus gravandi occasionem non habeant, antiquam in hac parte consuetudinem regni nostri imitando declaramus, quod nullus iudicum secularium iudicia seu birsagia extorquere possit, nisi tempore congregationis palatinalis vel alterius per regiam maiestatem ad congregationes generales celebrandas deputati in singulis comitatibus celebrande secundum consuetudinem ab antiquo observatam, exceptis casibus infrascriptis, quibus etiam extra tempus dictarum congregationum generalium birsagia exigi debite possint.

Primo videlicet propter violentam retentionem aut dampnificationem jobagionum petita licentia, iusto terragio deposito allisque suis debitis persolutis ad alterius possessionem se transferre volentium, quo casu comes parochialis cum suis iudicibus nobilium, absque quibus nullum in talibus processum facere debet, ab hiis, qui in hoc casu culpabiles legitime inventi fuerint, iudicium seu birsagium trium marcarum toties quoties et quandocunque culpabiles inventi fuerint, sine expectatione extorquere potest, jobagionem retentum seu dampnificatum cum omnibus bonis suis, dampnis etiam recuperatis liberum abire permitti faciendo.

Item si quis jobagionem alterius non petita nec obtenta licentia, vel petita sed non obtenta ante dies quindecima huiusmodi petite licentie potentialiter abduxerit, talis pro abductione violenta jobagionis huiusmodi birsagium trium marcarum solvet et eundem jobagionem cum aliis tribus marcis birsagialibus per comitem parochialem cum iudicibus nobilium restituere compellatur. Si vero jobagio aliquis non obtenta licentia sed furtive ad possessionem alterius recesserit et idem, ad cuius possessionem accesserit, requisitus reddere recusaverit, extunc ad restitutionem ipsius jobagionis fugitivi comes parochialis talem cum birsagio trium marcarum compellere debeat et teneatur.

Item violator sedis iudicarie birsagium viginti quinque marcarum persolvat.

Item quicumque furem vel latronem aut aliquem publicum malefactorem captivaverit et eum de captivitate sua voluntarie abire permiserit, solvere debet comiti parochiali homagium malefactoris prenotati.

Item ubicunque lucrum camere tempore debito solutum non fuerit, comes parochialis cum iudicibus nobilium de qualibet villa non persolvente post emanationem litterarum birsagialium per iudices nobilium contra tales dari solitarum exigere debeat ipsum lucrum camere cum birsagio trium marcarum.

Consimiliter quia certa scientia meminimus nostrorum predecessorum litteris et per nostram maiestatem frequentius litteratorie ex laudabili consuetudine regni nostri precipi solitum esse et usitatum fore decimas ecclesiarum de singulis villis decimas persolvere post interdictum ecclesiasticum certo consueto tempore observari commissum recusantibus per comites parochiales aut vices suas gerentes exigi debere cum singulis tribus marcis, ideo presentis ordinationis et statuti vigore eandem consuetudinem ratam habentes, innovantes et imitantes committimus, quod post interdictum ecclesiasticum in singulis diocesibus et locis temporibus hucusque solitis impositum de singulis villis, que per unius mensis spatium huiusmodi interdictum ecclesiasticum animo indurato tollerando easdem decimas persolvere recusaverint seu non curaverint, mox elapso ipsius mensis spatio comites vel vicecomites parochiales per decimatores requisiti decimas easdem cum singulis tribus marcis birsagialibus pro se indilate exigendis eis, quibus solvi debent, absque dilatione et defectu persolvi facere teneantur.

Item quodocunque nobiles alicuius comitatus vigore litterarum regalium per modum proclamate congregationis sub pena trium marcarum in eisdem litteris regalibus expressa convocati fuerint, quicumque ad illam congregationem non venerint, nisi egritudine, senio, viduitate, orphaneitate, paupertatis impotentia, absentia remota vel eorum arduis negotiis rationabiliter se excusare potuerint, comes parochialis et iudices nobilium predictas tres marcas in dictis litteris nostris expressas indilate exigere possunt.

Item palatinus et iudex curie et ceteri iudices ordinarii ecclesiastici et seculares universa iudicia in causis coram eis vertentibus aggregata statim ipsis causis finitis ac per sententiam finalem conclusis primo parti adverse de sua portione satisfactionem impendere teneantur et ad partem suam iudiciariam cedentia exigendi liberam habent facultatem.=8 Martii 1435: VII.

XXXIX. Item quia de violentis indebitisque colonorum sive rusticorum abductionibus varii clamores varieque querele varie etiam lites et controversie oriuntur, proinde statutum est, quod universi coloni ab uno anno usque ad presentem diem festi Epiphaniarum Domini per quoscunque indebite et contra consuetudinem regni abducti ad requisitionem comitis eorum dominis restituantur. Si qui enim non restituerint, in homagio coloni convincantur eo facto, cuius medietatem comes pro se, reliquam vero medietatem pro illo, cuius fuit colonus, exigere teneatur. Et comites hoc in quolibet comitatu et in bonis quorumlibet exquirant et exequantur. Imprimis autem incipere debeant in bonis regie maiestatis et illustrissime domine regine, deinde vero in aliorum bonis. Deinceps autem nemo aliorum iobagiones violenter et contra consuetudinem regni sub pena sex marcarum abducere, nemo etiam sub eadem pena iobagiones suos iuxta consuetudinem regni abire volentes aliqua excogitata calumnia retinere audeat ita, quod pauperes liberam et manendi et discedendi habeant facultatem. Si quispiam autem causabitur suos violenter et indebite abductos, comes illius comitatus cum electis regiis et aliis bonis hominibus discernat et si querelam iustam agnoverit, abductos reddi faciat et penam premissam a violento extorqueat. Si qui autem imposita calumnia vel aliqua excogitata novitate suos retinuerint, puta si tunc solummodo taxam ad eos imposuerint, quando illos velle abire cognoverint vel longo tempore ante imposuerunt et nondum exegerunt et hoc maxime, ut illos hoc pretextu semper obnoxios allegare et exinde retinere possent, in pena premissa, hoc est sex marcis per comitem immediate et irremissibiliter exigendis eo facto convincantur. Taxam etiam extraordinariam si qui exigere volent, infra sexaginta dies exigant, alioquin postmodum taxa ipsa calumpniosa intelligatur.

XL. Ceterum quamvis ab eo tempore, quo regia maiestas divina dispositione ad regiam dignitatem sublimata est, in omni dieta, in omni conventu, in omni denique congregatione regnicolarum tractatum semper fuerit de solutione decimarum, qualiter scilicet et quo ordine ille solvi deberent, plurime etiam superinde constitutiones facte extiterunt, nunquam tamen adhuc modus et via reperta est, quod partes contente fuissent et querele cessassent. Et idcirco etiam in presenti dieta, licet multum diuque tam a regia maiestate quam etiam regnicolis super hoc cogitatum fuerit, melior tamen et convenientior via et modus reperiri non potuit quam fuit tempore coronationis regie maiestatis repertus, eam ob rem statutum est et conclusum, quod amodo perpetuis successivis temporibus decime ipse solvantur et exigantur iuxta dispositionem tempore prefate coronationis regie maiestatis factam. Hoc tamen adiecto, quod quodocunque decimatores in aliquo comitatu exigere volunt, unum aut duos ex hiis nobilibus, quos regia maiestas in omni comitatu deligere habebit, ad expensas episcopi vel capituli secum ducere teneantur, qui imprimis provideant, quod decime ipse ubique iuste et bono modo exolvantur, deinde quod decimatoribus iniustas et superfluas decimas dicare non permittant, qui quidem decimatores si eis non parebunt, teneantur episcopo vel capitulo rescribere et eum avisare. Et si ille vel illud non providebit et non rectificabit, teneantur regie maiestati significare, que pro bono communi et regnicolarum quiete pro sua gratia et clementia hoc onus subire debeat, quod tam ex parte episcopi vel capituli quam etiam decimatorum talem iustitiam faciat, quod comitatus bene et merito contentus esse valeat. Interim vero exactio decimarum cessare debeat et eius occasione episcopi interdictum ponere non valeant.

XLII. Item ordinatum est, prout etiam per serenissimum quondam dominum Sigismundum imperatorem ordinatum fuisse constat, quod decimatores iuramentis decimantium contentari debeant et si contentari noluerint, acervum liberam examinandi habeant facultatem. Qui si plus invenerint quam rusticus dixerit, superfluitatem auferant et ultra hoc iustam eidem decimam ad solvendum imponant. Si vero iuxta dictum rustici comperient, rustico pro dampno in subversione acervi illato, unum aureum e vestigio solvere teneantur. Quem si solvere recusarent vel difficultarent, rusticus ipse equum decimatoris libere auferre valeat. Quod ut facilius et comodius facere possit, presenti decreto cavetur, quod decimatores antequam acervum examinare incipiant, equis descendere et in domo vel in curia rustici decimantis illos ligare teneantur.

XLIII. Item quod in diocesi Agriensi rustici animalia dicata solummodo usque ad festum sancti Michaelis archangeli servare teneantur. Et si postmodum ipsa animalia casualiter perierint, rustici ipsi propterea nullo modo gravari debeant, sed tamen iurare teneantur, quod non eorum culpa neque malitia et neque voluntate perierunt.

XLIV. Item solent nonnulli in certis comitatibus tempore decimarum in possessionibus suis unum hortum cum bladis, frugibus et item unum cellarium cum vinis pro se retinere et decimas provenire debentes pro se exigere. Et quia huiusmodi abusio contra sanctorum regum ordinationem inducta esse dinoscitur, sic enim per illos ordinatum fuisse constat, quod villici dumtaxat et hii quoque propter labores, servitia et expensas, quas in colligendis decimis ipsis facere habent, relaxarentur, proinde statutum est, quod huiusmodi abusio sopiatur et perpetuo abolita intelligatur ita, quod nullus hortus nullumque cellarium dominis terrestribus in decimatione relinquatur. Renitentes vero et transgressores comes per remedia opportuna constringat, qui si tepidus fuerit aut simpliciter facere recusaverit, regiam maiestatem superinde aviare debeat, que tandem illos compellere teneatur.

XLV. Item conclusum est, quod si qui regnicolarum – cuiuscunque status et condicionis existant – super decimis cum quibuscunque personis et a quocunque tempore in curia Romana hactenus litigassent vel etiam in presentiarum litigarent, causas ipsas amodo cessare ibi faciant et usque ad primum diem mensis Maii, festum beatorum Philippi et Iacobi apostolorum proxime venturum, ad hoc regnum in sede iudiciariam regie maiestatis discutiendas revocare teneantur. Ad quem quidem terminum si qui revocare et coram regia maiestate comparere neglexerint, ea ad partis comparentis instantiam non obstante illorum contumacia vel absentia, quod iustum fuerit, decernere et causam ipsam finaliter terminare et tam de sumpna et dampno capitali, quam etiam de expensis sententiam ferre atque eam debite executioni vigore presentis decreti demandare debebit.

XLV. Ceterum ordinatum est, quod deinceps nemo omnino regnicolarum neque pro decimis neque pro aliis quibuscunque rebus in dicta curia Romana litigare presumat. Si qui autem dominorum prelatorum aut alie ecclesiastice persone, cum quibuscunque regnicolis aut econtra vel ratione exemptionis vel etiam super eo, utrum iuste et integre decime eis solvi debeant vel alio quocunque modo super decimis aut etiam aliis rebus quibuscunque lites movere vel motas prosequi voluerint, id eis coram regia maiestate libere, sed nusquam alias liceat, que ex suscepti regiminis officio unicuique iuxta allegata et approbata, quod iustum fuerit, decernere habebit. Hoc tamen per expressum declarato, quod causas decimarum non alii iudices regni, nisi sola regia maiestas personaliter semper discutere valeat atque possit.

XLVI. Item quod regia maiestas ad simplicem querelam – quantumvis gravem et enormem – bona regnicolarum non faciat occupare. Sed accepta querela scribat ad comitem et electos nobiles illius comitatus eisdemque committat, ut querelam resciant et regie maiestati fideliter rescribant. Que tandem ex illorum attestacione videat, cognoscat et deliberet, quid illis faciendum erit et an bonorum occupationem vel aliam penam merebuntur.

Item quod regia maiestas neminem regnicolarum sine baronum et prelatorum consilio, nota vel crimine infidelitatis damnare debeat.

XLVII. Conclusum est, quod nemo regios infideles ad castra, munitiones, civitates vel alia loca sua acceptare et ibi conservare atque defendere audeat. Si quispiam tamen infidelium ex confidentia ad aliquem dominorum vel amicorum suorum confugeret, eum ille suscipere et infra duodecim dies, sed non ulterius, apud se et in domo sua impure conservare possit. Et si ille vel pro gratia obtinenda vel ad ostendendam obedientiam aut etiam innocentiam suam declarandam venire ad regiam maiestatem voluerit, is eum secum una, si volet, ad suam maiestatem – ubicunque fuerit – ducere vel etiam cum litteris et hominibus suis mittere sub salvo conductu regie maiestatis, qui omnibus talibus vigore presentis decreti exnunc datus et concessus intelligitur, libere valeat, libere etiam pro illo supplicare, laborare et intercedere pro gratia possit. Verumtamen si gratia ipsa a maiestate sua impetrari et obtineri non poterit, rursus ad castra, munitiones, civitates, oppida vel alia loca et bona sua ilium suscipere et admittere nullo modo audeat. Quod si qui forte aliter facere attentarent, huiusmodi castrum, munitio, civitas, oppidum, possessio sive locus, ad quem scilicet tails infidelis acceptaretur, eo facto ad regium fiscum devolvatur et extunc devolutus intelligatur, de quo regia maiestas vigore presentis sanctionis liberam pro suo arbitratu disponendi habeat facultatem.

XLVIII. Ceterum si in bonis aliquorum fures, latrones, homicide, incendiarii et monetarum sive litterarum vel etiam manuum alienarum falsatores fuerint et domini huiusmodi bonorum requisiti per comitem illos de bonis suis non expulerint, teneatur comes mittere ad capiendum eosdem malefactores. Et si rustici sive incole possessionum, in quibus tales fuerint, contra homines comitis insurrexerint et eis resisterint, quominus illos capere possint, comes possessionem non statim occupet, sed teneatur secundo maiori manu maiorique potentia ad illam mittere et tam prefatos malefactores quam etiam rusticos illos capi facere. Ubi si officiales domini loci illius simul cum rusticis vel etiam seorsum cum aliis suis complicitibus insurrexerint et illos capi non patientur, promiserint tamen quod illos in sede iudiciaria coram comite iuri statuent, homines comitis parere et contenti esse debebunt et in hoc casu comes possessionem non occupet. Verumtamen si illos neque capere patientur neque – ut prefuritur – statuere promiserint, possessionem ipsam usque ad gratiam regie maiestatis occupare debeat et teneatur. Si vero dominus talis loci in hoc casu contra comitem vel eius homines personaliter insurrexerit et obsteterit, ne prefati malefactores vel etiam rebelles illi rustici capi possint et neque illos – ut premissum est – in sede iudiciaria statuere promiserit vel si promiserit et non fecerit, possessio ipsa, in qua hoc fieri continget, fisco regio in perpetuum applicetur et ad illud vigore presentis decreti exnunc devoluta intelligatur, quam regia maiestas vel pro se retinendi vel etiam aliis donandi liberam habeat facultatem.

XLIX. Item quod si aliquae minere auri et argenti, salis vel alie fodine in possessionibus nobilium vel aliorum possessionatorum temporum processu reperirentur absque debita competentique recompensa per regiam maiestatem non auferantur. Sed si illas, maiestas sua habere voluerit, pro possessionibus illis, in quibus huiusmodi minere habebuntur, alias eque utiles et fructuosas dare debeat. Alioquin tantummodo ius regale seu urburas ad fiscum pertinentes percipi faciat et possessiones ipsas simul cum omnibus suis utilitatibus, proventibus et iuribus eisdem nobilibus pacifice possidendas relinquat.

L. Item conclusum est, quod iudicium et iudicatus comitum Zagorie in Varasino hactenus celebrari solitum aboleatur et amodo nullo unquam tempore celebretur, quodquee causantes in illo comitatu ad sedem seu iudicium banorum Sclavonie, spectare debeant et teneantur.

LI. Item si qui hominum – cuiuscunque condicionis et preeminentie existant – deliberative homicidium perpetraverint, omni redemptione semota interficiantur. Et si tales homines fuge presidio se defensaverint – ubicunque et quandocunque reperti fuerint – eandem penam incurrant, observato tamen iuris ordine. Et comes vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium illius comitatus, ubi talis homicida repertus fuerit, ipsam iustitiam, iuxta regni consuetudinem administrare teneantur. Et nemo tales in castra et domos suas sub pena de infidelibus et aliis malefactoribus superius expressa acceptare et admittere audeat. Si vero homicidium non ex preconcepta malitia neque animo deliberato, sed casualiter aut aliter inopinate acciderit occisor cum propinquis occisi liberam concordandi habeat facultatem.

LII. Item difinitum est, quod si quipiam causantium sive coram palatino vel iudice curie, sive ceteris iudicibus ordinariis ecclesiasticis vel secularibus tempore octavarum in birsagiis sive iudiciorum oneribus convincerentur, ad solutionem huiusmodi onerum seu birsagiorum statim in fine litis per iudicem compellantur. Et si per sententiam finalem causa concludetur, primo parti adverse de sua portion de bonis convicti satisfactionem impendere teneatur et deinde ad partem suam iudiciariam cedentem – prout etiam hactenus observatum fuit – liberam exigendi habeat facultatem. Similiter etiam si qui coram comitibus parochialibus in sede iudiciaria in aliquo onere convincerentur, infra quindenam facta prius ammonitione solvere teneantur. Et si facere non potuerint vel simpliciter noluerint, comites ipsi ad tanta bona et possessiones, que onus seu birsagium equivalent, liberam descendendi habeant facultatem.

LIII. Item quia nonnulli causas suas etiam exigui momenti de sede et iudicio banorum, wayvodarum, comitum et vicariorum, aliorum etiam iudicum ordinariorum in curiam regiam provocare consueverunt, ut scilicet partem adversam longioribus gravioribusque litibus, laboribus, expensis, iniuriis et dampnis afficere ut vel sic gravare possint, pro quiete itaque et relevamine regnicolarum et potissimum oppressorum et pauperum communi consilio, voluntate et assensu dominorum prelatorum, barorum, ceterorumque regnicolarum statutum et sancitum est, quod si quispiam de cetero causam aliquam de presentia cuiuscunque iudicis in curiam regie maiestatis provocaverit ibique iudicium prius factum approbatum fuerit, in dupplo birsagio, in quo convictus propter appellationem intelligitur, convinci debeat eo facto et immediate per iudicem suum ordinarium irremissibiliter extorqueatur

LIV. Ceterum solent nonnunquam partes in causis et in iudiciis succumbentes eorum iudices calumniare, infamare et in eos iniuriose invehi, quasi eis non esset iustitia per illos administrata, propter quorum iniquam et dampnandam vociferationem plurima scandala et alia malorum genera plerumque suboriuntur. Proinde ad compescendam illorum linguam communi omnium sententia decretum est, quod nemo omnino magistris prothonotarios infamare aut in eos iniuriose invehi audeat, sed si quis iniustum sibi iudicium factum putaverit, ab illorum presentia et iudicio cum honestate, honore et reverentia ad regiam maiestatem aut palatinum seu iudicem curie aut eorundem palatini et iudicis curie vices gerentes appellare debeant. Quod si quispiam premissa facere non formidaverit et linguam non compescuerit atque infamiam, qua magistris ipsos aut eorum alterum afficiet, probare non poterit, extunc vigore presentis decreti in ea pena de facto vincatur, qua magistris ipsi convinci deberent, si obiecta in eos aut alterum eorum probari possent.

LV. Preterea ordinatum est, prout etiam per serenissimum condam dominum Lodovicum regem diffinitum fuit, quod si quis nobilium ordine iudiciario sive in facto potentiario, succubitus duelli sive in pena calumnie vel delationis exhibitionisque falsarum litterarum aut sententie capitalis sive alio quocunque facto in presentia palatini et iudicis curie aut alterius cuiuscunque iudicis convictus fuerit, iudex cause talem convictum captivare et tribus diebus causa pacis et concordie detinere debeat. Et si concordare nequiverint, extunc ad manus adversarii ad infligendam sibi penam a iure statutam et debitam iuxta regni consuetudinem assignet. Qui si huiusmodi convicto mortem vel aliam penam a iure – ut preferitur – statutam intulerit, a iudice et parte adversa sine solutione alicuius pecunie vel gravaminis absolutus habeatur. Quodque filii, fratres, proximi, uxores, sorores et consanguinei eiuscemodi convicti et condempnati pro illius excessu non debeant aggravari ita, quod neque proprie possessiones et portiones illius, neque alia bona demptis dumtaxat illis rebus, que apud ipsum tempore captivationis reperientur, per iudicem auferantur, sed omnino in filios et heredes sive generationes suas condescendant illique in eisdem omnibus bonis, possessionibus, domibus, et iuribus possessionariis salvi, liberi et quieti permaneant. Hoc tamen adiecto, quod si premissis modo convictus et condemnatus cum suo adversario qualitercunque concordare poterit, id ei semper facere liceat et pro huiusmodi concordia iudex nullum prorsus birsagium aut aliquam aliam solutionem vel ab ipso convicto vel etiam parte adversa capere et exigere possit, sed libere et absque ulla penitus solutione concordiam et pacem ipsam facere valeant.

LVI. Item quod filius pro delictis et excessibus patris et econtra nec in persona nec in possessionibus aut aliis rebus condempnetur aut aliter puniatur.

LVII. Ulterius quod episcopi, capitula, abbates, prepositi, conventus et cetera ecclesie possessionate cum tribus litteris inquisitoriis super possessionibus acquirendis, nisi regia maiestas destinatis probis viris, quos maluerit, experiatur et informetur inter nobiles et ecclesias possessionem aliquam nec acquirere nec retinere possint, nisi cum litteris privilegialibus. regie maiestatis aut iudicum vices gerentium sue maiestatis, prout hec etiam tempore condam serenissimi domini regis Lodovici decreta et observata fuisse dinoscuntur.

LVIII. Item ordinatum insuper est prout etiam in decreto serenissimi domini Sigismundi imperatoris continetur, quod violator sedis iudicarie in birsagio viginti quinque marcarum irremissibiliter extorquendarum convincantur eo facto.

LIX. Item ordinatum est, quod minuti conventus et presertim conventus de Zenthjog, deinceps ab emanatione litterarum cessent et omni careant firmitate.

LX. Item ordinatum est, quod regia maiestas cum consilio et voluntate dominorum prelatorum et baronum suorum debeat in quolibet comitatu aliquem baronem vel alium notabilem et bene possessionatum hominem, qui scilicet sufficiens et idoneus videbitur, in comitem parochialem preficere et ille teneatur ex eodem comitatu et non aliunde notabilem, item aliquem, pro vicecomite vel vicecomitibus eligere. Qui omnes iuxta subscriptam iuramenti formam iuramentum comes coram regia maiestate, vicecomites vero in ipso comitatu prestare teneantur.

LXI. Item solent plerumque exercitantes in eorum progressibus, ecclesias propter commeatus sive victualia et alias res per colonos pro securitate ad easdem collatas Dei et hominum timore postposito violare et inde non solum victualia necessaria, sed etiam alia omnia bona eorundem colonorum surripere et ibi alia etiam enormia et dictu quoque nefanda impune committere. Quare ut eorum temeritas et detestanda licentia compescatur, sancitum est, quod amodo nemo omnino sive eques sive pedes fuerit et sive cum exercitu sive aliter qualitercunque iter facere habeat, hostia ecclesiarum infringere vel aliter ecclesias prophanare aut victualia vel aliquas alias res inde violenter excipere audeat. Ubi vero deinceps contraventum fuerit, si capitaneus eiuscemodi copiarum nobilis fuerit tam iura sua possessionaria quam etiam alia omnia bona sua amittat et ad fiscum regium devoluta sint et habeantur eo facto. Si autem eiuscemodi transgressores ignobiles fuerint, comburantur. Hanc vero executionem supremus capitaneus exercitus facere teneatur. Qui si neglexerit vel forte ipsemet sanctionem istam transgredietur, avizata regia maiestas superinde pro sua gratia et iustitia atque innata clementia executionem fieri demandet. Et si gentes ille maiestatis sue fuerint, ecclesiam reconciliari faciat, si vero aliorum fuerint, illi, quorum erunt, huiusmodi reconciliationem facere teneantur. Hoc adiecto, quod si tales exercituantes victualium inopia laboraverint, plebanus aut iudex aut villicus loci ecclesiam aperire et illis gentibus coram illo, quem capitaneus earundem copiarum ad id deputaverit, pro iusto, digno et convenienti pretio et solutione victualia de ecclesia dare teneantur.

LXII. Item quod gentes huiusmodi in ipsarum progressu in domibus nobilium nusquam descendere et neque res et bona colonorum sive rusticorum de domibus et curiis nobilium violenter auferre presumant. Transgressores vero eandem penam quam violatores ecclesiarum incurrant eo facto.

LXIII. Ceterum quia archidiaconi, vicearchidiaconi et plebani propter eorundem insatiabilitatem non contenti iustis et veris ipsorum proventibus quandam detestandam et extra hoc regnum inauditam corruptelam, potissimum vero in comitatu Simigiensi induxisse dinoscuntur, videlicet, quod dum contingit aliquem quocunque modo interfici, etiamsi testatus decedat, sepultura illi in ecclesia et etiam in cimiterio interim negatur, donec ultra omnia funeralia et alia pro locorum consuetudine et diversitate in talibus fieri solita una marca argenti vel quatuor aurei solventur. Que res quia non solummodo abusus et corruptela, verum etiam quoddam sacrilegii et simonie genus merito censerit potest, eam ob rem presenti decreto statutum est, quod amodo deinceps eiusmodi exactionis genus ubique et signanter in dicto comitatu Simigiensi cesset et perpetuo aboleatur et nemo archidiaconorum, vicearchidiaconorum et plebanorum eorumque vices gerentium sub pena amissionis beneficiorum extorquere presumat, prout etiam hoc tempore quondam serenissimi domini Karoli regis Hungarie etc. in prefato comitatu Simigiensi per bullas apostolicas ad petitionem et instantiam eiusdem domini regis cassatum et extinctum fuisse ex eisdem bullis in presenti congregatione regnicolarum publice perlectis manifeste dinoscitur.

LXIV. Item quia ex comitatibus sepe numero universitas nobilium interdum pro rebus totius comitatus, interdum vero iussu regie maiestatis nuntios et electos nobiles ad maiestatem suam mittere solet, nonnulli autem sunt tam scilicet spirituales quam etiam seculares domini, item nobiles, abbates, prepositi, capitula et conventus, qui instar aliorum de bonis ipsorum expensas huiusmodi nuntiis et electis dare recusant et se ab huiusmodi expensarum contributione penitus subtrahunt, qua in re universitati nobilium et potissimum, qui inferioris condicionis existunt, non mediocri iniuria inferri dinoscitur, quare presenti decreto sancitum est, quod amodo omnes et singuli – cuiuscunque status et condicionis possessionati homines existant et in quocunque comitatu constituentur – expensas per communitatem disponendas de bonis et possessionibus suis ad ratam sive sortem eorundem in medium communitatis semper persolvere et persolvi facere debeant et teneantur demptis tamen illis dominis prelatiis et baronibus, ceterisque possessionatis, qui tempore congregationis ad regiam maiestatem nominatim et personaliter per litteras vocabuntur. Verumtamen alias cum scilicet factum comitatus agitur, quilibet contribuere teneatur. Renitentes autem comes illius comitatus etiam cum gravaminibus in talibus fieri solitis, hoc est cum onere trium marcarum levis ponderis, compellere debeat et teneatur.

LXV. Item quia ad sedem iudiciariam nobilium quorumlibet comitatum causantes et nonnulli alii qui sedem ipsam ingrediuntur, cum familiaribus et iobagionibus armatis et quidem maiori, quo possunt, numero intrare ac ceteros armis vel multitudine terrere solent, quare tum ex eo, quod deinceps quilibet in huiusmodi sedem iudiciariam quiete, libere et sine omni metu et periculi suspicione intrare et ibi honeste, pacifice et absque omni prorsus impedimento perseverare possit, tum vero ne leges et iura inter arma silere videantur, conclusum est, quod tam nobiles, quam etiam eorum familiares et iobagiones sedem iudiciariam ingressuri arma omnia – cuiuscunque generis existant – in hospitiiis deponere et inermes in ipsam sedem ingredi debeant ut ibi non armis, sed iure contendendum noscant. Transgressores vero si ignobiles fuerint, comes arma eorundem auferat et insuper eosdem in ciponem ponat ibique duobus diebus et totidem noctibus absque esu et potu detineat. Si vero nobilis extiterit, modo simili arma auferat et insuper unam marcam gravis ponderis ab eodem extorqueat.

LXVI. Item quia in nundinis et foris ebdomadalibus, preterea in tabernis plurime hominum interemptiones, vulnerationes, verberationes et item multe rixe et infinita aliorum malorum genera committi consueverunt, furor siquidem ubique arma ministrat, idcirco ut deinceps etiam huic malorum generi debita provisione occurratur, consimiliter statutum est, quod omnes et singuli – cuiuscunque condicionis existant – ad nundinas, fora et tabernas proficiscentes arma omnia in hospitiiis deponant et inermes ad emendum et vendendum et bibendum proficiscantur, ibique pena sub eadem vivant et commorentur.

LXVII. Item quia in superioribus articulis, quanta comes parochialis in executione iustitie agere habeat, plane declaratur, ut autem debito modo et sine aliquo impedimento officium suum exequi valeat, statum et diffinitum est, quod quicumque contra comitem aut vicecomitem in eiusmodi executionibus insurgerent et eidem vim inferre presumerent sicque ipsam coercerent, quod iustitiam, quam executioni demandare deberet, exequi non posset, extunc tales scita tamen prius mera rei veritate nota infidelitatis multentur. Si vero servi vel rustici fuerint ipsos domini eorundem sub pena viginti quinque marcarum in manus comitis ad dignam eisdem penam infligendam dare et assignare teneantur et insuper de innocentia, quod scilicet non de eorum voluntate et commissione id factum sit, iuxta regni consuetudinem se purgare debeant et teneantur. Si autem servi vel rustici perpetrato facinore aufugerint, comes pro iniuria eidem illata illos perquirat nichilominusque domini eorum – ut prefertur – de innocentia se purgare teneantur.

LXVIII. Item quia de iudicibus ordinariis frequenter mentio fieri solet et dubitatur a plurimis, qui sint et intelligantur iudices illi, idcirco declaratur hic per expressum, quod iudices ordinarii sunt: imprimis palatinus, deinde iudex curie et postmodum secretarius cancellarius, si presens fuerit sin autem non locum tenens, hoc est, qui sigillum iudiciale regie maiestatis pro tempore tenet. Appellantur autem iudices ordinarii, quia quamlibet causam discutere et ipsi soli eorumque vices gerentes ad sedem iudiciariam non vocati intrare et etiam alios, si quos pro testimonio aut alia re volent, advocare possunt. Isti autem subscripti videlicet magister tavernicorum, magnus senescalcus, banus Dalmatie, Croatie et Sclavonie et wayvoda Transsilvanus non censentur iudices ordinarii et idcirco ad sedem iudiciariam regie maiestatis non vocati intrare non debent neque tenentur; sed tamen ex quo sunt iudices et officiales iurati, si quando sponte intrare voluerint sive regia maiestas presens fiat sive non, admitti et locum honorificum semper habere debebunt. Quorum etiam protonotarii et in iudiciis vicesgerentes similiter admitti debebunt. Neminem tamen ad ipsam sedem iudiciariam sine permissione et annuentia predictorum trium iudicum ordinariorum vocare poterunt. Hoc per expressum declarato, quod prefati iudices ordinarii etiam in absentia regie maiestatis sine istis aliis omnia iudicia libere facere possunt. Ut autem iudicia cum honestate, gravitate et maturitate, sine scilicet aliquo rumore, tumultu, strepitu et turbatione celebrari possint, statutum est, quod fores domus iudicarie semper pateant et nemo, nisi vocatus, intrare audeat. Alioquin transgressor penam alias superinde decretam, hoc est centum aureorum incurrat, pro quibus statim capiat et in turri manca usque ad restitutionem teneatur.

LXIX. Item solent procuratores lucri gratia plurimarum personarum causas suscipere et satis negligenter ad earum defensionem attendere nullumque casum facere, si quando eorum principales in birsagiis convincerentur et hoc potissimum ex eo, quod antiqua consuetudine huiusmodi birsagia tempore dumtaxat celebrationis iudiciorum generalium, extorqueri solebant. Cum vero huiusmodi iudicia generalia – prout superius tactum est – abolita sint et deinceps nunquam celebrentur, idcirco ordinatum est, quod deinceps nullus procuratorum, plurium quam quatuordecim personarum causas suscipere et supportare audeat. Ubi autem in birsagiis convincentur, statim post finem litis et cause decisionem de bonis et possessionibus sui principalis tam ad partem iudicis quam etiam adversarii statuatur.

LXX. Item quod omnes cause et lites, que hactenus super quibuscunque rebus et negotiis mote sunt, eodem ordine et processu iuris – quo hucusque consuetum fuit – prosequi, terminari et finiri debeant, ita videlicet quod prescripti articuli solummodo de futuris et non de preteritis confecti intelligantur.

LXXI. Item conclusum est, quod si qui – cuiuscunque condicionis sive scilicet ecclesiastice sive seculares persone existant – causarentur privilegia sua per Turcos, Bohemos, Polonos, Alemanos aut alios quoscunque hostes et emulos ablata aut igne consumpta et perdita fuisse vel etiam si quispiam ecclesiasticorum allegaret ecclesiam suam apud manus laicales – prout nonnunquam factum est – diu tentam fuisse et tunc per ipsos laicos iuribus et privilegiis spoliata vel aliter defraudata fuisse, si tales ad litteratorium mandatum regie maiestatis vel requisitionem aliorum iudicum ordinariorum cum nobilibus illius comitatus, in quo bona illa, super quibus iura et privilegia amissa causabantur, in rebus a sexaginta annis circa ita actum esse comprobare poterunt, eiusmodi comprobatio et attestatio nobilium semper et in omni iudicio pro principali et capitali privilegio teneatur et reputetur.

LXXII. Item quod seculares persone contra ecclesiasticas in iudicio in maiori onere non convincantur, quam ecclesiastice contra seculares convincerentur.

LXXIII. Item ordinatum est, ut omnis scrupulosa suspicio, que contra iudices et iustitios regni et item comites, vicecomites, iudices nobilium atque etiam electos nobiles ceterosque officiales de favore vel odio concipi posset, de cordibus quorumlibet removeatur, iuxta decretum serenissimi condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris statutum et sancitum est, quod perpetuis semper successivis temporibus omnes iudices et iustitiosi huius regni tam ecclesiastici quam seculares qui videlicet in palatinum, iudicem curie regie magistrum tavernicorum cancellarium aut vicecancellarium, in protonotarios seu vices gerentes iudicum pretactorum et etiam assessores eorundem, banum Sclavonie, wayvodam Transsilvanum et in comites quorumlibet comitatuum ac iudices nobilium eligentur et assumentur, eorundem vices gerentes et substituti tempore assumptionis ipsorum ad huiusmodi officia in conspectu regie maiestatis iuramentum honestum de servanda fidelitate et administranda iustitia prestare debeant. Vicecomites tamen et iudices nobilium coram suo comitatu huiusmodi iuramentum prestare teneantur.

Forma vero iuramenti, sequitur in hec verba: ego t(alis) iuro per Deum vivum et gloriosam Dei genitricem virginem Mariam et per omnes sanctos et electos Dei, quod omnibus coram me causantibus et in omni negotio, quod ad officium meum pertinebit, absque cuiusvis persone, divitis scilicet et pauperis acceptione, prece, premio, favore, timore, odio, amore et complacentia remotis et postpositis – prout secundum Deum et eius iustitiam faciendum cognovero – iustum et verum iudicium, iustitiam atque executionem omnibus in rebus pro meo posse faciam. Sic me Deus adiuvet et omnes sancti!

LXXIV. Ceterum ne in redemptionibus litterarum capitularium et conventualium necnon super satisfactione viarum seu laborum, quos testimonia capitulorum et conventuum in executionibus facere habent, discordiam oriri contingat, conclusum est, quod in hac parte servetur limitatio tempore serenissimi condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris facta et tandem per regiam maiestatem tempore felicis coronationis confirmata.

LXXV. .Et ut materia discordie super facto redemptionis litterarum capitularium et conventualium, necnon super satisfactione viarum seu laborum testimonialis capitularibus et conventualibus fienda hactenus sepius suboriri consueta de cetero cesset et, succidatur, presenti ordinatione antiquam tamen et laudabilem consuetudinem imitantes statuimus, ut in omnibus locis, tam capitularibus, quam conventualibus pro qualibet littera evocatoria per se, videlicet evocatoria prima, secunda et tertia in capitulo aut conventu simul cum eorum notario et scriptore pro redemptione littere recipiantur seu solvantur singuli denarii viginti quatuor maioris monete.

Item pro qualibet littera prociamatoria denarii centum.

Item pro qualibet littera procuratoria denarii viginti quatuor.

Item pro qualibet littera prohibitoria, protestatoria et aliis similibus, si patenter emanantur, denarii viginti quatuor, si vero clause, denarii duodecim.

Item pro qualibet littera fassionali emanata privilegialiter denarii centum, patenter vero denarii viginti quatuor, clause autem denarii duodecim. Item pro qualibet littera inquisitoria sive patenta, sive clause denarii viginti quatuor.

Item de paribus antiquarum litterarum in conservatoriis requisitarum custodi seu requisitori per se denarii centum et pro redemptione littere requisite, si non habuerit multum de scriptura et patenter confecta fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, si vero labor scribendi fuerit magnus et littera privilegialiter confecta, denarii centum.

Item de simplicibus transcriptis seu transcriptionalibus litteris patenter emanatis, ubi labor scribendi magnus non fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, ubi autem littera fuerit prolixa aut privilegialiter emanata, denarii centum.

Item de littera statutoria, in qua contradictio facta fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, de litteris vero statutorialibus perpetuis, in quibus contradictio facta non fuerit, recipiatur redemptio litterarum secundum quantitatem possessionis et numerum sessionum modo subscripto, videlicet de sessione una, duabus aut tribus vel quatuor in toto denarii centum, ubi autem fuerint ultra quatuor sessiones usque ad decem, pro qualibet sessione denarii triginta tres, ubi vero fuerint ultra decem usque viginti, de qualibet sessione denarii viginti quatuor; ubi autem fuerint ultra viginti usque centum, de qualibet sessione denarii duodecim; si vero fuerint ultra centum usquequaque, de qualibet sessione denarii octo. Item de litteris reambulatoriis metalibus, in quibus contradictio et evocatio facta non fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor; in reambulationibus autem metalibus, in quibus simplex consignatio vel cum hominibus regiis de curia regia transmissis similis consignatio vel finalis metarum erectio cum iuramento super terram in forma iudiciaria aut partibus concordantibus facta fuerit, pro redemptione littere denarii quadringenti. Ubi autem partibus in huiusmodi reambulationibus et demonstrationibus metalibus discordantibus causa ad curiam regiam reducta fuerit, tunc pro redemptione talium litterarum denarii ducenti. Item de communi inquisitione ordine iudiciario commissa denarii centum.

Item de revisione possessionarie occupationis denarii centum.

Item de occupationibus possessionum hominum in sententia capitali convictorum et rerum ablationibus iudiciaria commissione mediante fiendis de rebus ablatis ex antiqua consuetudine capitulum habebit decimam partem; pro redemptione autem littere denarii centum.

Item de estimationibus possessionariis iudiciaria commissione fiendis denarii centum.

Item de possessionariis divisionibus de singulis possessionibus divisis singuli denarii centum.

Item de expeditoria iuramentali denarii viginti quatuor.

Item de expeditoria iuramentali continente nomina coniuratorum denarii centum.

Item de solutionibus pecunialibus coram capitulis vel conventibus, vel eorum testimoniis fieri solitis capitulum seu conventus decimam et nonam partes exigere non possint, nisi quando propter discordiam partium in eorum sacristiis seu conservatoriis huiusmodi pecunie reposite fuerint; de talibus nempe de iure decimam et nonam recipere possint, ad illius tamen partis rationem, que causam dederit pecuniam huiusmodi in conservatoriis reponendi.

Personis autem testimonialibus capitulorum et conventuum pro singulis diebus, quibus in itinere fidedignitatis processerint, solvantur singuli duodecim denarii maiores, sive in propriis equis, sive in equis causantium ambulent et ducantur; ita tamen, quod in victualibus et expensis causantium et ipsos ad facta sua conducentium simul cum equis et familiaribus eorum de domo iterum in domum semper duci debeant et reduci.

LXXVI. Preterea. ex quo in iudiciis in curia nostra regia fieri consuetis coram iudicibus ordinariis eiusdem curie ac eorum notariis supratactis littere et redemptiones earum necessario occurrunt, ideo ad tollendam cuiuslibet altercationis occasionem, que inter ipsos notarios et causantes emergi possent, antiquam consuetudinem redemptionis litterarum earundem modo subscripto duximus similiter declarandam, videlicet quod in ipsa curia nostra notariis ipsius curie iudiciarie de una littera prorogatoria communi solvantur denarii duodecim;

de littera iudicali seu birsagiali similiter denarii duodecim;

de simplici littera inquisitoria similiter denarii duodecim; de secunda evocatoria denarii viginti quatuor;

de tertia evocatoria denarii centum;

de proclamatoria denarii centum;

de littera iuramentali tertio vel sexto se alicui adiudicata denarii quatuor;

de eo, qui iurabit duodecimo vel vigesimo quinto aut quinquagesimo se, denarii centum;

de communi inquisitione denarii centum;
de littera duellari denarii ducenti;
de iuramentali super caput denarii ducenti;
de prima instrumentali exhibitione denarii viginti quatuor; de secundaria et tertiaria instrumentali exhibitione cum gravanine assumpta similiter denarii viginti quatuor;

de prorogatoria respondententi cum tribus marcis denarii viginti quatuor; de littera procuratoria patenti denarii viginti quatuor;
de littera fassionali communi denarii viginti quatuor;
de aliis litteris generalibus, videlicet prohibitoriis et similibus denarii viginti quatuor;
de prohibitoria facie ad faciem denarii centum;
de littera sententionali facti potentialis conservatori sigilli floreni decem per centum, scriptori autem denarii ducenti;
de litteris statutoriis et reambulatoriis simplicibus denarii viginti quatuor;
de litteris autem adiudicatoriis reobtentiois possessionum seu aliarum rei'um iuxta quantitatem possessionis seu rei reobtente habita concordia inter causantes et prothonotarios fiat solutio.

LXXVII. Statutiones autem possessionarie, metarum reambulationes et revisiones aliter fieri non debeant nisi vicinis et commetaneis huiusmodi possessionum inibi legitime convocatis. Et ut fraus et dolus in talibus melius evitetur, nomina singulorum vicinorum et commetaneorum tempore premissorum processuum illuc principaliter convenientium in litteris capitularibus et conventualibus superinde emanandis seriatim conscribantur.

LXXVIII. Postremo conclusum est, quod regia maiestas prescriptam ordinationem quoad omnes articulos, clausas, capitula et puncta per quoscunque inconcusse observari faciat. Transgressores vero sic emendet, puniat et castiget, quod regnicole sicuti eam ipsam ordinationem pari et unanimi omnium consensu, voluntate et consilio maturaque deliberatione fecerunt, ita omnes maiestati sue gratias meritas agere valeant.

Quos quidem articulos sive capitula nos Mathias rex prefatus cum supradictis dominis prelati, baronibus, proceribus et ceteris nobilibus electis, totum scilicet hoc regnum representantibus et in presenti generali dieta nobiscum existentibus matura prehabita deliberatione quoad omnes eorum continentias de eorundem dominorum prelatorum, baronum, procerum et totius regni consilio, voluntate et assensu pro perpetuo ipsius regni decreto et statuto ac pro lege necnon iure scripto tenendos et duraturos sancimus, stabilimus, auctorisamus, autenticamus et confirmamus atque ad eorundem observationem universos successores nostros reges et item totum hoc regnum sic obligamus, ut nullo unquam tempore neque scilicet in novorum regum electione vel coronatione, sed neque in dietis seu congregationibus generalibus vel particularibus regnicolarum quicquam ex illis variare seu immutare liceat, sed in omnibus clausulis et punctis inconcusse et inviolabiliter observetur.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam articulos ipsos in presentem libellum conscriptos et insertos de eorundem dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium ac totius regni voluntate et consilio secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, appensione fecimus communiri.

Datum per manus reverendi in Christo patris domini Ioannis episcopi ecclesie Waradiensis, aule nostre secretarii cancelarii, dilecti et fidelis nostri anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo octogesimo sexto in festo Conversionis beati Pauli apostoli, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. vigesimo nono, Bohemie vero decimo septimo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus dominis Ladislao Gereb, electo et confirmato ecclesie Albensis Transsilvane, apostolice sedis legato, Strigoniensi sede vacante, Petro Colocensi archiepiscopo, Gabriele cardinali Agriensis, prefato Iohanne Waradiensis, Osvaldo Zagrabiensis, Sigismundo Quinque Ecclesiensis, Urbano electo et confirmato Iaurinensis, summo thesaurario nostro, Alberto Wesprimiensis, Iohanne Chanadiensis, Nicolao Waciensis, fratre Gregorio Nittriensis, Iohanne Sirimiensis et Matthia electo Boznensis, ecclesiarum episcopis ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus.

Item spectabili et magnificis Emerico de Zapolia comite perpetuo terre Scepusiensis et predicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino, comite Stephano de Bathor iudice curie nostre et wayvoda Transsilvano, Matthia Gereb regnorum nostrorum Dalmatie, Croatie et Sciavonie, Laurentio duce de Wylak, Machoviensi, Andrea de Zokol et Francisco de Harazth Zewreniensi banis Ladislao de Pakos thavernicorum. nostrorum, Wilhelmo comite Zagorie dapiferorum, Georgio de Thwroc, pincernarum, Ladislao Orzagh de Gwth agazonum nostrorum regalium magistris, Paulo de Kynys Themesiensi et Nicolao Banfy de Lyndwa Posoniensi, aliisque quam pluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

25 JANUARY 1486

Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, Duke of Silesia and Luxemburg and Margrave of Moravia and Lusatia,¹ for the everlasting memory of the matter.

It is fitting that kings and princes who by heavenly decree are placed at the summit of the highest office, be adorned not only by arms but also by laws and that the people subjected to them, as well as the reins of authority, are restrained by the strength of good and stable institutions rather than by the harshness of absolute power and reprehensible abuse.

Therefore, we wish to make known to all, that after God's greatest and most unexpected gift and His ineffable and incomprehensible providence raised us (though unmerited) to this pinnacle of royal dignity, we have always kept in mind, always considered, and always had as our heart's concern, how we could abolish and eradicate those disorders and wretched abuses, especially in the administration of justice, which have occurred in this kingdom in the time of the most serene lord kings, our predecessors, and even up to our own time, and how we could establish statutes and decrees of a salutary and firm nature, which would be recognized as manifestly established, in the first instance, for the greater glory and praise of our Redeemer and, secondly, for the honor, salvation, benefit and peace of ourselves and our entire kingdom and which are to be acknowledged as statute and written law, binding forever; and no one should be allowed to change them at his own discretion or pass new statutes and laws contrary to them, as is known to have happened to this day each time a new king has ascended the throne; and we would have fulfilled satisfactorily this sacred purpose and desire of ours, had we not been detained by the most urgent needs of this kingdom of ours, above all in the restoration of its borders and frontiers as well as the destruction of the most cruel enemies whom we found to have overrun it.

For the borderlands of our kingdom were, by the invasions partly of Czechs, partly of Germans, partly by the constant incursions of Turks and other neighboring nations, so devastated and occupied by all these enemies, that nothing was left except the heartland of the country and even that was invaded by various enemies, as mentioned above; and because of these circumstances we were forced to postpone this beneficial and altogether necessary intention of ours to another time. Mainly because we hoped that once we had conquered the forenamed enemies who were for many years destroying the kingdom by fire and sword and who had begun to trust that they could keep it forever (for they had taken such a foothold that they began to enter marriages and become kin with our subjects), then we could acquire that peace, leisure, and calm in which we could fulfill our desire more easily.

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of "kingdoms" that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, "Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European sources," in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45. Here, Matthias added the lands he had occupied, even when only temporarily, in the course of his campaigns against George Podebrad.

However, either because of the machinations of the enemy of the human race who always plots against good and noble intentions or because of the inclination of wicked persons and their unrestrained lust for power, our hope and expectation in this matter deceived us. For now that we have, with God's help, destroyed the enemy, and have been able not only to reestablish but even largely to extend and expand our borders on all sides though at the cost of much effort, expense and the death of many our own and were planning to accomplish what we have always held as our heart's concern, then the most serene lord Frederick, Emperor of the Romans and Duke of Austria, etc., whom we had always revered and esteemed as our dear father and whom we had always tried to please in all matters, declared war on us when, as mentioned before, we were tired and exhausted after long and heavy warfare, and he invaded our kingdom immediately, causing severe and irreparable damage, burning, and ravaging, and committed various other accursed evil deeds. Thus it happened that (against our own will) we were forced to take up arms again to defend ourselves and our kingdom, returning force against force and thus engage ourselves in a six-year war of this sort.

This war then reached the point where, with the help of God who from above saw our just cause and the injustice inflicted upon us, we were able not only to defend ourselves and our kingdom against his imperial highness who had thus provoked and wounded us, but attacking him while he was present in his own hereditary domain of Austria, after almost a half-year long siege, we captured the renowned city Vienna, the chief town and capital of his province. Thereafter we conquered the larger part of the entire province and would have conquered the rest had we not been called to return by disorders and complaints at home.²

But while we were occupied with these matters, while we pressed on our successes and followed up our good fortune and victory, because of our prolonged absence and preoccupation, such a great number of murderers, thieves, brigands, bandits, forgers, arsonists, and similar evildoers rose up in our kingdom that no traveler could be safe, nor brother from brother, nor stranger from stranger.

For this reason and in order that at the same time we may fulfill our said intention and secure peace, as we have always wished, for our subjects, who have besieged us with their frequent lamentations, we returned to this kingdom at whose governance, as already mentioned, we have been placed by divine disposition and we have ordered all our prelates, barons, lords and other nobles to hold a common general assembly here in Buda,³ where with them and with the rest of the nobles who were elected by each county and who represent the entire kingdom, above all for the greater glory of God and His mother Mary and of the holy kings the patrons of this kingdom;⁴ thereafter for the honor, benefit, advantage, prosperity and peace of ourselves and of the entire kingdom, with equal and unanimous will, advice and participation we have concluded and agreed on the following chapters and articles which are to be kept in force and respected forever as statute and written law.

²The narrative introduction summarizes Matthias's Ottoman and Czech wars from 1468 to 1486, the Polish incursions, and, in particular, his conflict with Emperor Frederick III; for these see Karl Nehring, Matthias Corvinus, Kaiser Friedrich III. und das Reich. Zum hunyadisch-habsburgischen Gegensatz im Donauraum, 2d ed. (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1989), passim.

³The main political reason for calling the diet may have been the election of a new count palatine.

1 Of which articles the first is this. First of all, it was decided and concluded that the general assizes or palatinal courts of law be abolished; in the future they may never be held in any place.⁵ However, so that it may not appear that we are granting and giving leave to evildoers for committing evil, it was ordered that if any county should notice any bandits, thieves, murderers, arsonists, forgers or any similar evildoers disturbing it and recognize that these evildoers multiply there, the royal majesty is obligated at the request of that county to grant it the right and ability, together with the ispán, to search out and destroy them.

2 Then, since unexpectedly too many irregularities and shocking scandals as well as unforeseen accidental dangers have often arisen in the practice of extraordinary county assemblies,⁶ therefore, for the purpose of abolishing this dangerous and outside this kingdom unheard of way of administering or rather corrupting justice, it was decided and ordered by the unanimous will, advice and consent of all gentlemen of the realm⁷ that from this time on such extraordinary county assemblies may never at any time be held, but that they must cease completely and be and remain forever abolished.

Then, it was decided that short summons be similarly discontinued and abolished.⁸

⁴ It is noteworthy that the divine legitimation combines the Virgin Mary and the Hungarian royal saints in one sentence. An indication for the cult of Mary under Matthias may be the fact that the new money minted by the king after 1471 had the Madonna with the inscription PATRONA VNGARIE on its obverse, see Schallaburg, '82. Matthias Corvinus and die Renaissance in Ungarn (1458-1541). 8. Mai-1. November, 1982 (Vienna: Niederösterreich. Landausstellung, 1982). pp. 220-21; now also: Márton Gyöngyössi, "King Matthias' Mint – the Great Monetary Reform," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008) pp. 285-7.

⁵ This measure finalized the repeated demand of the counties (see 1464:21, 1471:5, 1478:7, 1481:14) not to hold general assizes (usually presided by the palatine, hence their double name). Cf. Imre Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet, pp. 74-75.

⁶ Extraordinary county assembly (proclamata congregatio): in major criminal cases county nobles were gathered in a single place and examined under oath. See István Tringli, Le contee in Ungheria nel periodo degli Angiò. In: L'Ungheria angioina. A cura di Enikő Csukovits. (Bibliotheca Academiae Hungariae – Roma, Studia 3. Rome: Viella, 2013) pp. 139–178. Their abolition seems to have been observed, while not all other reforms survived the king.

⁷ Regnicola (verbatim: inhabitant of the kingdom) was used to describe the enfranchised nobles of the country; we translate it as gentleman of the realm.

⁸ Short (or final) summons (citatio brevis) were summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was

3 Then, that (unless some legitimate and important matter of the king or of the kingdom intervened) two octave courts must be held each year, regardless of whether the royal majesty is present in the kingdom or not, namely on the feast days of St. George and of St. Michael, in such a manner that their first session or first day begins promptly on the twentieth day following the said feast days,⁹ at which sessions at least two of the judges ordinary¹⁰ must be present; as for the others, if they cannot attend because of some urgent need, their deputies are obligated to be present. In place of those who are unable to attend, the royal majesty must designate others from among the prelates and barons. Without the said two judges ordinary, however, these octave courts cannot and must not be held; and they must be held as long as it appears necessary.

Then, it was decided that in a similar way, in Transylvania and in Slavonia two other octave courts must be held each year, namely those of Epiphany and of the Feast of St. James. They shall likewise begin on the twentieth day after these feast days and be held as long as it seems necessary.¹¹

4 Then, since final sentence, especially in cases of ownership, has been hitherto by various terms and diverse prorogations become so lengthy that sometimes a case can hardly be completed within a lifetime and thereby placing heavy burdens of travail and cost on the parties, sometimes driving them into extreme poverty; therefore, it was decided that in the future all cases, also those pertaining to estates and property rights, regardless of by which judge they were initiated, must henceforth be settled within four octave terms without any prorogation or delay and excluding any exceptions.¹²

often combined with a terminal summon. Although they were summarily abolished here, they apparently continued to be used. The county nobles resented these swift judicial procedures, and it is possible that Matthias agreed to their being abolished in order to win support for his bastard son's, John Corvin's election to the throne. In practice, the short summons were not discontinued even after 1486, see György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1971), p. 265.

⁹ Octavial courts (octava), the session of royal courts of justice; used to be held four times annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Now only the latter were to be continued.

¹⁰ On the justices ordinary see Art. 68, below.

¹¹ The octave courts of St. George's and Michaelmas came to be called "complete and great" (integra et magna) later in the century. The dates for octave courts in Slavonia and Transylvania (6 January and 25 July, respectively) were decreed here for the first time, although such courts were held there ever since the late fourteenth century, only their dates were set by the ban or the voivode (see Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet, pp. 210, 213–4). It is worth noting that the four dates were set so that judges and dignitaries (or even actors) could attend all without missing another.

¹² The fight against delay in judicial procedure was a constant matter; first appearing in 1351, and many times later. It is well known that these attempts remained futile well into modern times.

5 Then, it was ordered that the opposing or litigating parties may be free to reach an agreement in every law suit. The judge, moreover, may not forbid them to do this nor may he extort anything for their concord or agreement.¹³

6 Moreover, since it was ordered that all cases pertaining to property rights must be finally concluded within four terms or octaves, therefore, it was ordered and decided that terminal summons which pertain to acts of might, damages and other torts and injuries must be settled definitively at the first octave court following the delivery of the summons. However, if they pertain to matters of estates and particularly if they make the producing of titles or of documents necessary, then because of the producing of such letters of privilege, they may be prorogued until the second octave session, but not further. Terminal summons¹⁴ concerning whatever case may be ordered under the seal of every judge ordinary, that is, by royal, or palatinal judges or the judges of the royal court, as well as of the bans of Slavonia, Croatia, and Dalmatia and also of the voivode of Transylvania.¹⁵

7 Further, since many persons have been able to avoid unpunished the court of justice by taking advantage of prorogations while the opposing party who has a just case against them is often burdened by the long duration of the suit, in order that in the future this evil may cease and everyone receive justice in due time, it has been established and sanctioned that no one may enjoy any prorogations from the royal majesty at the time of an octave court except those who serve in castles beyond the borders and frontiers of Hungary, in affairs or embassies of the king or the kingdom, or are engaged in war and have gone to war with the others at the prescribed time. Those who (as previously mentioned) are in castles outside the kingdom's borders may benefit from such prorogations for only three octave terms; at the fourth they must answer and stand trial. Furthermore if two or more brothers have undivided property and their father, or if he is dead, the older brother, remains at home while the other brothers or any one of them are engaged in war or in castles outside the kingdom (as mentioned before) then no prorogations may be granted. If, however, the brothers have the estate divided among them, then they may receive and enjoy the prorogation. Those who acquire such prorogations from the royal majesty under false pretense, that is, if they pretend that their brothers are engaged in war outside the kingdom or in castles or embassies, they must be perforce convicted of the fine of their tongue. For this punishment the judge hearing the case is to seize them in person if they are present or their lawyers if they are absent and force them to pay immediately without remission.¹⁶

¹³ Almost verbatim identical with 1435/I:4, 1439:30 and 1458:34 and has been customary as far back as known. (Bonfini, loc. cit., did not find it relevant to mention this article.)

¹⁴ Terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione) was issued once the party did not respond to three previous summonses. It implied that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the person summoned. Its use had been limited to the court of personal presence, but widened already in 1445, and here to all major courts.

¹⁵ These arrangements summarize in essence the judicial practice of the preceding decades, see e.g., 1464:5.

¹⁶ Cf. June 1458:42, 1459:22, 1462:1, 1464:4-8, which are summarized here and made somewhat more stringent.

8 Then, as it is of great importance to the performance of legal acts how the king's bailiffs¹⁷ behave and what kind of persons they are, therefore, it was ordered that in each county the ispán with all the nobles present is obligated to select from among the more substantial nobles who personally reside in the county ten to twelve persons or eight or more or less, according to the needs of the county, and only these persons may and must go out with the witness of the chapter or convent to carry out inquisitions, summons, institutions, and other legal acts; and they must bear this burden for an entire year. As soon as they are chosen they must take an oath at the court of the county as do the chosen representatives of the chapters and convents according to the prescribed model. And those who refuse the burden placed upon them are to be fined perforce twenty-five marks which the ispán must collect without delay or remission. When they return from any kind of legal act, they are obligated to give sworn testimony, just as the representatives of the convent or chapter are required to do in the convent or chapter house, of what they saw, did, heard, learned, and enacted in proper order. If indeed any of them are proven guilty of any kind of fraud, committed for any reason, they are to be considered as having lost their honor and personal dignity, and, in addition, the ispán must sentence them perforce to an immediate and not remittable fine of twenty-five marks; and from that time on they may never again testify in any matter neither in nor out of court without the king's special pardon.¹⁸

9 Then, as in some counties it is customary to select for magistrate such nobles who are known to be inferior to the others in ability and wealth; as a result of which practice, it happens that out of fear, favor or for payment they commit a great deal of levity, therefore, it was decided that henceforth not such people, but only upright, deserving, and wealthy landed nobles should be selected from among those who reside there, as is well known to have been the custom during the reign of the late most serene lord Emperor Sigismund and of other kings. However, if anyone among those selected in this manner shuns to accept this burden he must be sentenced perforce to pay the ispán fifty marks without delay or remission. These magistrates are required to have and must use distinct coats of arms and seals.¹⁹

10 Then, since the men who are sent out by chapters and convents as witnesses have frequently committed for favor, money, gifts, hate, fear or complacency, many and unbelievable irregularities both in their testimonies and in the issuing of letters; and this situation has happened mainly

¹⁷ The king's bailiff, homo regius (or homo of any other judge) was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses, arranged inquests, and assisted in the process of trial and punishment. He was usually commissioned by the parties of a suit from among the better-off nobles of the county (see Art. 9), but occasionally sent out from the king's court. He was usually accompanied by a witness from a place of authentication, see n. 21, below.

¹⁸ See above, here, however, the elected nobles, as jurors on the bench of the magistrate, had a different role from the king's bailiff. It may have been Matthias's intention to strengthen the role of the lesser nobility in the counties, but this is not quite unequivocal. The obligation to serve was decreed in regard to the county magistrates already in 1435/I:8.

¹⁹ Cf. 1435/I:2; however, the fine of magistrates' refusal to serve has been doubled here. There is evidence for the seals of the magistrates in the later fifteenth century, but it is unknown, how many of them had one; the county as a corporation, did not have its own seal until the sixteenth century.

because, instead of canons, frequently altar directors, chaplains and even students and mendicants and other easily corruptible persons of this sort are sent out to perform legal acts; therefore, in order to stop this evil by suitable means, it was decided that in every chapter or convent the canons and monks must swear an oath to the prelate or his vicar that they will observe justice while performing legal acts, and also, that henceforth from the chapters only canons and from the convents only monks in priestly orders may be delegated. And they must be sent out in sequence. And when they return from legal acts which they have completed they must give account under oath. For their travels and the redemption of letters they must adhere to the manner and order which was observed in the days of the late lord Emperor Sigismund and which is also explained subsequently in the present decree. When they are sent out to serve a summons, to inquests, or for any other matter, they must conduct the inquest together with the king's bailiff who must be a good, conscientious, and well-endowed person, from each person separately, both from nobles and not nobles and any other person they can get to testify. Before the inquest, however, the strictest oath must be taken from them that they will answer in good faith and truthfully to everything asked from them. Thereafter, their names, whence they come and, if they are not nobles, whose tenants they are, and what their station is, must be recorded in writing; then, each person's statement in regard to the matter of the inquest must be recorded whatever he knows, that is, the individual testimonies word for word. Those, however, who are found to transgress this order must perforce lose their prebends as perjurers, forgers, and betrayers of the common good and common justice, and their ecclesiastic superiors are obligated to confer these on others, while they may in no way be pardoned.²⁰

11 Then, because of the lack of care and negligence of abbots and priors of canons regular, especially of those who do not observe the rule of their order, their convents live in a very disorderly, dissolute, and scandalous manner, and also commit a great many irregularities and frauds in issuing documents and conducting inquests. Therefore, by the will of our royal majesty as well as the joint counsel of the prelates, barons, lords, and other gentlemen of the realm, it has been concluded and decided that in the future abbeys and priories of canons regular and particularly of those with authentic seal may not be held by anyone who is not a religious of the same order to which the abbey or priory belongs. And that the abbots and priors together with all their monks must live a monastic life in keeping with the rule of their order.²¹

²⁰ Cf. 1435/I:8; on the procedure of inquest and the observance of these prescriptions (esp. of noting all the details of the witnesses, which was by no means as systematically observed as the law prescribes), see below, Art. 14, and Erik Fügedi, "Verba volant..." in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986), ch. IV, pp. 6-8.

²¹ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's

12 Then, that the bishops to whose diocese these abbeys and priories pertain, must visit them and their convents twice a year personally. If they are engaged in more important matters or are absent, they must still accomplish this through their vicars and provosts or other upright and learned ecclesiastics. And if it is ascertained that abbots or priors are not keeping their rule or otherwise lead a bad life or else are found not to obey their bishops, then they should be deposed by the visitors and their benefices conferred on more deserving persons. Evil or disobedient monks shall also be expelled from the convent by the visitors. For if the abbots and priors are good, the monks must also necessarily be good. Thus, no fraud can be committed in the issuing of documents or in other matters.²²

13 Then, there are some who would place the following expression into a summons: “by the consent and will of so and so” which appears clearly to be against God and His justice. For who could know whether a person agreed to or willed that which has been committed? No one but God can judge correctly about a secret or an intention.²³ Therefore, it was decided that henceforth no such summons may ever be made. Nor may the wife, mother, daughters or sisters of a nobleman be summoned unless the case and lawsuit happens to pertain to such property rights which apply to them equally. And the aforementioned clause, namely “with the will, order, and urging of so and so,” must never be used to summon them. And if it should still happen, the judges ordinary and the protonotaries must not pay attention to it and must never permit it.²⁴

Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35. The concern about the conditions in these convents and chapters was a continuous one, see e.g. 1351:3, 1435/I:8. At this time, the usurpation of monasteries and collegiate chapters by great lords during the interregna, on the one hand, and the depopulation of many a convent, on the other caused special concern. In the late fifteenth century there were 15 cathedral chapters, 9 collegiate chapters and 23 Benedictine, Premonstratensian and Hospitaller convents that served as places of authentication.

²² Visitation was stipulated under Matthias as early as in 1458:46. In 1489 the king, together with the papal legate, issued orders for the reform of all orders and specified thirteen issues for visitation, see a László Erdélyi, P. Soros, A Pannonhalmi Szt. Benedekrend története [History of the Benedictine Order of Pannonhalma-Martinsberg] (Budapest: Szt. Benedekrend, 1902-16) 3: 1905, No. 87. Medieval visitation records survived, e. g., for the cathedral chapter of Esztergom from 1397, or for the Benedictine houses from 1508 (for the latter, see Géza Érszegi, “Alltagsleben und Sachkultur ungarischer Benediktinerkloster im Spätmittelalter,” in Klösterliche Sachkultur des Spätmittelalters, pp. 195-215 (Vienna: Akad. d. Wiss., 1980).

²³ This comment as to God’s ability to discern is based on Scripture, often cited in moralizing discourse: 1 Samuel 16.7 and Hebrews 4.12 (cf. similar statement at Jeremiah 11.20 and 20.12).

²⁴ The prohibition of implying consent and, thus, to be accessory to the crime, is an interesting legal doctrine illustrating the application of (Roman) civil law principles to public and criminal law. In this instance, the doctrine of implied consent may be traced to Roman civil law on (1) consensual contracts (see Justinianian Institutes 3.22 with Moyle’s commentary, pp. 431-33). Cf. Adolf Berger, Encyclopedic Dictionary of Roman Law (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1953), p. 408, s.v. consensus); (2) the doctrine of intent to commit a crime (the mens rea), as expressed, for example, in the intent to commit theft, animus furandi (Gaius Institutes 3.197ff.; Digest 9.2.41.1; see Joseph A. C. Thomas, Textbook of Roman Law [Amsterdam: North-Holland, 1976] 1, pp. 354-55).

14 Then, regarding the practice of common inquests we decided, that in order to help clarify the just cause of each party, common inquests could be held hereafter, as hitherto. However, they have to be held so that whenever the inquest is needed, both parties must have it carried out on the same day at the same county's court. Besides, the witness of the chapter or convent and the king's bailiff must be the same for both parties and not different ones. Each witness must take an oath separately and be interrogated and heard separately by the witness of the chapter or convent and the king's bailiff concerning the matter which they intend to uncover. And then, the litigating parties must not be present during such an inquest or interrogation but must be excluded by the king's bailiff and the witness of the chapter or convent and only in their absence must each witness be questioned and heard (as mentioned before). Moreover, perjurers, persons of ill-repute, and those who lost their honor and personal dignity, further, non-nobles even those with property, but whom the king did not ennoble, may not be accepted and admitted to such testimonials.²⁵

Then that in matters of view the way and mode of ancient custom be observed.²⁶

Then, since hitherto the disorderly administration of common inquests brought about many, often very evident, perjuries because of favor or hate, sometimes for fear of the litigating parties; therefore, in order to avoid and eliminate these traps of souls and also to remove this dangerous opportunity to commit sin, it was concluded that although the above article defines clearly enough how the inquests and other legal procedures should be administered, nevertheless, in order that such perjuries may cease and be eradicated as soon as possible, the following order must be kept in the administration of those inquests: if it becomes clear from the result of the inquest that the complaints prove to be true, then not the defendant must clear himself as it has been customary until now, but the plaintiff should support and strengthen his case with the sworn statements of a greater or lesser number of oath-helpers depending on the nature and seriousness of the matter and the judge's decision. Namely, if the lawsuit is about damages, then in accordance with the customs of the realm, according to the nature, quantity and quality of the damages, the judge shall order the plaintiff to swear an oath. And if the plaintiff can present testimonies in his favor and wins the lawsuit, the defendant must not be arrested afterwards for an act of might²⁷ but instead shall be ²⁵ The group of those excluded from rendering testimony is worth noting. Hungarian customary law regarded property holding and noble status so closely connected that the Tripartitum uses impossessionatus and ignobilis as synonymous terms (e. g. I: 29 § 7). Royal grant of land or even mere royal consensus to purchased land was seen—even without explicit reference to it—as granting noble status. The restriction seems to be part of a trend which gradually closed off the ranks of nobility and—implicitly— those, whose “word” was worth credit.

²⁶ The inspection of locales, possessions, etc., the prerequisite for the inquest is meant. The oculata revisio was a more stringent procedure than a general inquest: neighbors, abutters, and fellow nobles of the county were heard under oath, and if it vindicated the plaintiff, it counted as full proof, without additional oath. (Hajnik, Birósági szervezet, pp. 299-300).

²⁷ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial (abolished in this decree). A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that sentenced to an immediate payment of a fine of 25 marks or 100 gold florins²⁸ which is to be divided evenly between the plaintiff and the judge, and in addition, restitution must be made to the person harmed to full satisfaction. If in such a lawsuit about damages the testimonies of witnesses differ from each other, it is the judge's duty to determine whether the plaintiff should swear about the damages caused or the defendant should clear himself.

15 Furthermore, it was decided that in cases of acts of might, no one may be convicted on the basis of his own confession whether at the court of law or elsewhere, except in the following cases, namely for attacking the homes of nobles, then for seizing their estates, benefits and appurtenances, for detaining nobles without just cause, further for wounding, beating or killing any nobleman. In these cases the judge must precede in the following manner: if the plaintiff can produce evidence in the manner and order described above, then, for better proof of the matter he should submit the case to common inquest if the parties so desire. If the defendant is reluctant to accept the inquest, then the plaintiff should swear upon the head of his adversary in order better to prove his action according to the custom of the realm in this matter.²⁹ If by the will of both parties, the lawsuit can be decided by means of common inquest and that common inquest ends clearly and simply in favor of the plaintiff, then the judgment shall be awarded to the plaintiff. But if the testimonies do not agree, then the judges must decide on the basis of the testimonies of the witnesses whether the plaintiff or the defendant should be made to swear the oath. And if in the above described cases which pertain to acts of might, castellans, officials or other retainers or tenant peasants of the lords or of any other gentleman of the realm were the culprits and offended someone, then the lords should not be condemned for an act of might, but must clear their names as to their innocence, namely, that the crime was not committed in accord with their will as it appears suitable to the law and the judge. Nevertheless, if such persons remain with their lords, the lords must administer true justice on their behalf according to the equity of the law. In other cases, however, such as those regarding damage, injury and the like, the manner and order prescribed above is to be observed.

16 Furthermore, since hitherto at times of rendering testimony, common inquests, inspections, institutions and renewed institutions as well as at evaluations of property rights the losing party frequently resisted in contempt of the court and of justice, and was by the prevailing custom fined one mark of gold in the first case and two for the second time therefore, in order to restrain the rashness of such disturbers of law and justice by suitable means, it was decided and ordered that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one.

²⁸The exchange rate of 25 marks silver=100 gold florins was usual ever since the fourteenth century.

²⁹Once the general assizes were discontinued, the plaintiff had the right— after a general inquest, in which his claim was proved and supported by suitable number of oath-helpers—to swear a iuramentum ad caput and the defendant was not allowed to counter it by his oath. Such a decisive oath came to be allowed also when the plaintiff presented three favorable letters of inquest and the defendant refused to submit to a fourth one. The major innovation in this article was that in cases of acts of might the capital oath could be simply ordered against the defendant, provided that the plaintiff produced the letters of inquest; see also Hajnik, Birósági szervezet, pp. 314-15.

if in the future any one of any estate or condition dares to do this in whatever way and for any case even in that of capital punishment, then he must be convicted at once for the act of might against the opponent, and, furthermore, if this took place in regard to institution, renewed institution or evaluation, then he is to be fined at the value of the property right that was to be given institution, renewed institution or was to be evaluated; and if it took place at a common inquest or inspection, he be likewise condemned right away for an act of might and the loss of the lawsuit and is to be regarded as condemned.

17 Then, it was decided and ordered that the practice of proclamation at three fairs which until now has been done in cases of estates or property rights, further for the producing of letters and instruments, for legal obligations, and other suits, cease and never be practiced again but altogether abolished, for this can only be considered abuse and corruption rather than law.³⁰

In regard to obligations the following rule should be practiced: whoever obligated himself should receive by the force of the present decree sentence and justice at the first octave court after lawful written summons.³¹

18 Then, since the waging of judicial combats gives rise to much fraud, for those who have to fight this ordeal seldom fight for themselves but hire fighters³² who often accept gifts, favors, and promises, and since they are not usually dueling for themselves, even allow their party, however

³⁰ The abolition of summons on three fairs that usually followed two unsuccessful summonses, was already decreed in Matthias's inaugural law, June 1458:1 (expressly against 1439: 32), apparently without success.

³¹ According to Bónis (Középkori jogunk elemei, p. 97), the term obligatio in medieval Hungary meant mortgaged property—one meaning (among many) of obligare/obligatio in classical Roman legal terminology. Obligatio (and the older term, subsignatio/subsignare) in the sense of real property used as security referred to two procedures in Roman public law. Usually: private property registered with public authority as a security for an owed obligation (what in English is commonly known as a “performance bond”); less commonly, private property registered with public authority for public funds advanced for some purpose. See, in general, Digest 13.7.16.1; 44.7.1; 50.17.205; Fritz Schulz, Classical Roman Law (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1951), pp. 401-5; Theodor Mommsen, Gesammelte Schriften I (Berlin: Weidmann, 1905), pp. 96-114; III (1907), pp. 145-52. The present context, however, concerns legal documents in general; the sense of obligationes here may include property recorded as real security, but need not be so restricted. Obligatio may mean simply (as elsewhere: Antal Bartal, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis Regni Hungariae, (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1901; rept ibid., 1981), p. 448: obligatio = chirograph) any document properly signed and presented for a legal purpose (cf. Cicero II Verrines 1.137). Cf. also 1397:51.

³² The anachronistic procedure of judicial combat was to be restricted by this article to cases, where no other proof could be adduced. (By the late fifteenth century duel did not feature in the judicial procedure of any other European country, save in matters of honor.) The champions (called pugil) received impressive sums for their service: on April 3, 1323, the town of Szatmár promised to pay 3 Marks silver in case of victory to its professional fighter, see see Iván Nagy and Gyula Nagy, eds. Anjou-kori okmánytár. Codex Diplomaticus Hungariae Andegavensis (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1879-1920), 2: 71. Cf. Blazovich László and Géczy Lajos, eds. Anjou-kori oklevéltár. Documenta res Hungarican tempore regum Andegavensium illustrantia 7 (Budapest-Szeged 1991) No. 93.

just, to fail, therefore, it was decided that this kind of judgment, which is unheard of elsewhere in the world, be forever abolished and have no place in cases of acts of might or property rights. The only time that judicial combat may be appropriate and it was defined for that purpose is when all evidence is lacking. However, in cases of act of might and property rights, the parties always have evidence; furthermore, ordering a judicial combat is in the jurisdiction of the royal military court³³ and not of the courts of law. Additionally, the judge of the special presence of the royal majesty³⁴ is always required to be present at the court of law and must seal the letters, and he is usually an ecclesiastic; archbishops, bishops and other ecclesiastic persons are also present and thus it is not fitting in a court of law to consider judicial combat as a sentence.³⁵ Therefore, because of this and many other good reasons and beneficial viewpoints, this kind of ordeal is to be banned forever except for those cases where all evidence is lacking, such as when one person robs another person alone on the road without anyone seeing it, or if a person makes a loan or tells a secret to the ears of another person without any witnesses and there would be nothing to prove the robbery, the loan, or the spoken words. In these cases a sentence to judicial combat is permitted, however, not at the court of law but at the royal military court. For it is well known, as mentioned before, that such a decision belongs to the latter rather than to the court of law.

19 Furthermore, in consequence of the decision that in the interest of justice and the peace of all gentlemen of the realm, all decisions in future cases pertaining to estates and property rights be, as was said before,³⁶ limited and restricted to only four octave court sessions, it was decided that all defendants summoned in cases of property rights be proclaimed at the first octave court so that they may be better informed of the summons. And the judge before whom the case was opened must endorse it as is customary.³⁷ And if the defendant does not appear at the first octave court, he may not be burdened with any dues or fines. But if he will not appear at the second nor at the third

³³ It has been widely assumed that the royal military court existed at least since the fourteenth century—see Ágnes Kurcz, Lovagi kultúra Magyarországon a 13-14. században [Chivalric culture in 13th-14th C. Hungary], p. 55 n. 90, (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1988)—but no evidence about it survives preceding this decree.

³⁴ The two royal courts, those of the special and the personal presence, were united under the name of personalis presenciac in 1464. Its presiding judge was for a while inconsistently called personalis presencie regie in iudiciis locumtenens or chancellor of the personal presence; finally, the former term or simply personalis became accepted.

³⁵ Ecclesiastical persons were not supposed to participate in judgments connected with blood.

³⁶ See Art. 4 above

³⁷ The signatura, to which reference is made here, was in practice ever since the late fourteenth century and was the consequence of increased volume of judicial documents, see György Bónis, “A kúriai irodák munkája a XIV. és XV. században” [Operation of curial offices in the 14th-15th C.], Levéltári Közlemények 34 (1963): 197-243, here pp. 224-29. They were brief notes about the progress of the case, sometimes written on the bottom of a letter (e. g., of prorogation), finally acquiring their regular place on the left side of the dorso, written across. Bónis (loc. cit. p. 224) gives an example from 1349 which contains the brief information that “the plaintiff did not appear, the defendant was represented by his lawyer certified by palatinal letter of advocacy and the case was postponed to the next octave.” These notations were indeed written by the protonotaries, as stipulated here (loc. cit., p. 228).

octave court, he must pay the fine according to ancient custom. On the fourth octave, however, the case has to be decided and finished according to the terms of the aforementioned article, whether the defendant is present and defends his case or not, notwithstanding any verbal argument.

20 Then, it was decided and ordered that henceforth no protonotary may dare to pass a decision or pronounce sentence privately in his home outside of the royal bench³⁸ or court of the royal majesty in any matter, whether in lawsuits about estates or acts of might or any other lawsuit that is pending or to be initiated; instead every case, large or small, must be examined at the court of law in the presence of the other judges ordinary.³⁹ The protonotaries may not issue any letters, especially those which pertain to important matters and final decisions, anywhere else but the court of law, where they must be read out publicly in a loud and clear voice, and for additional safety and public testimony, the letters must not only be confirmed by the judge's seal and signature, but shall also be signed by another judge, in such a manner that, if the case is in the court of the judge royal, then the judge of: the palatine, and if it is before the latter than the protonotary of the king or the judge royal must add his handwriting and signature to the letter.⁴⁰

21 Then since some persons have procured exemptions from the jurisdiction of the bans, voivodes, county ispáns or alispáns so as to belong solely under the jurisdiction and judgment of the royal majesty, and – presuming to be secure under this exemption – have caused others much damage and injury, oppression, and other evil and harmful deeds unpunished, therefore, it was ordered that all such exemptions received until now by anyone, excepting the hereditary ispáns of whom it is known that they belong only under the jurisdiction of the royal majesty by very old rulings of the holy kings, are to be revoked, annulled, and be without force or consequence. For it is proper to revoke exemptions and privileges from those who abuse them. And if in the future, someone may procure similar exemptions and privileges, those must be regarded as invalid by the force of the present decree.⁴¹

³⁸ The word tabula is used here for the first time for the royal judicial bench. It became the standard expression for the royal courts: Tafel, tábla; hence, the widespread denomination for Hungarian noble judges, táblabíró (judge of the tabula), and, by extension, for the legalistic-parochial style of the eighteenth- nineteenth century.

³⁹ Bónis (“Kúriai irodák,” p. 242) summarizes the central role of the protonotaries (masters in sentencing) as follows: “He was the first to be addressed by the parties, he handed out the charters and writs, he was paid the fee for them and—as the sources frequently admit—the presents assuring his benevolence.” On the careers of protonotaries in the royal courts, several examples are quoted in Bónis, Jogtudó értelmiség, passim.

⁴⁰ There is extensive archival evidence for countersignatures by one or more protonotaries at the court. Imre Szentpétery (Magyar oklevéltan [Hungarian diplomatics], pp. 179-80, Budapest: MTT, 1930) lists a number of signatories, including cases where the fellow protonotary corrected the original record.

⁴¹ Exemption or immunity from comital (or other local) jurisdiction was as old as the aristocracy in Hungary and went back to the eleventh century. Matthias's attempt at reducing these positions to the comites hereditarii may have been one more measure aimed at winning the sympathy of the lesser nobility. On the other hand, he increased their number by granting the title to Emeric of Zápolya for Szepes, John Ernuszt for Turóc, and allowing Nicholas Banfi, ispán of Pozsony, the use of a red wax seal, and so on, while earlier only a few bishops enjoyed this right for the county of their see. In his later years, in turn, the king attempted

22 Furthermore, since the illicit seizures of estates and property rights bestowed by the royal majesty on his servitors and other followers have been causing many complaints and protests not only to the royal majesty but all over the kingdom—for many complain that as soon as the king’s followers or others obtain from his highness some property, they take possession of it ignoring any protest and keep it before an examination can determine whether his majesty can grant the property justly and legally—therefore, it was decided that henceforth all those who received property from the royal majesty under any name or title, and take forceful possession by any means even against the protests of the opposing parties contrary to the rights, laws, and customs of the realm, will have to be warned by the ispán upon the request of the opposing parties to keep their hands off of it. And if they refuse to do so upon his first request and warning, on the second request of the opponents he must, after proper verification, arrest and expel them from the said property by the force of the present decree and in addition use all means to exact payment from them in the amount of the common evaluation⁴² of that property. If the ispán is not powerful enough to execute this alone, then upon his request the county must rise to assist and support him with suitable means. As for those who are so powerful that the ispán cannot evict them even with the help of the county, then his royal majesty is obligated, after notification by the ispán, to seize the said property.⁴³

23 Then, it was decided that henceforth if anyone should obtain from the king any property and ask the royal majesty to seize it in his own name and arrange that the letter of donation be formulated in such manner as if the royal majesty were to grant it from his own hand, such letter of donation with the clause “by the king’s hand” shall have no force or validity and is to be honored neither by the ispáns nor by the judges ordinary or the protonotaries at the octave courts.⁴⁴

24 Moreover, all those properties, estates and property rights which the royal majesty has granted to anyone during the year of one thousand four hundred and eighty-five until the present feast day to abolish some of the perpetual comital titles, stripping even a few bishops of it (see András Kubinyi, “A megyésispánok 1490-ben és Corvin Janos trónörökösödésének problémái” [The county ispáns in 1490 and the problems of the inheritance of the throne by John Corvin], Veszprem megyei múzeumok közleményei 16 [1982]: 169-71). Whether any of these decisions ever became reality is, considering the strength of the aristocracy, highly doubtful. On Matthias's attitude to the aristocracy and the nobility, see also Erik Fügedi, “The Aristocracy in Medieval Hungary: Theses”, in Idem, Kings, Bishops, ch. IV, pp. 14-15.

⁴² Judicial estimation (estimatio) was the assessment of the value of immovable and movable property, usually on the traditional basis (estimatio communis, see Tripartitum I 133), but occasionally a tenfold (estimatio perennalis) valuation for immovable property was used. The low common estimation assured kinsmen’s and even neighbors’ and abutters’ ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed on families having to pay the filial quarter in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation.

⁴³ Note the assumption of powerful men, able to resist the ispán and the county posse even under the centralized and strong government of King Matthias. Cf. 1439: 24, 1471 : 22.

⁴⁴ Taking possession of donations granted directly “from the royal hand” seems to have been easier than others, therefore, grantees insisted on this procedure; a parallel to this arrangement can be seen in 1439:24, which prohibited that the royal fisc should pursue litigations in lieu of a grantee, thus limiting the advantages gained by proximity to the court.

of the Epiphany in one thousand four hundred and eighty-six,⁴⁵ inasmuch as anyone seized them contrary to the rights, laws, and ancient customs of the realm, their usurpers and occupants must return these properties after being notified and warned by means of the king's or the palatine's letter within a month from the date of the notification or warning. Otherwise the ispán with the aid of nobles to be chosen and appointed from the county must return the property to its previous owners and defend them in their rights. If, however, the usurpers are powerful and the ispán is unable and insufficient to complete this, the county must and is obligated to rise and assist him in this matter. Should the detainers believe that they have acquired some right by the king's donation, they must seek that right according to the laws of the kingdom. However, if the detainers are so powerful that the ispán with the help of the entire county is not able to do this, then after notification by the ispán, the royal majesty is obligated to have the estates seized and the aforesaid accomplished.⁴⁶

25 Furthermore, since it occurs that some persons, pressed by necessity, mortgage their properties and estates and although after some time they want to redeem them from the sale of their other possessions, and have the necessary cash, yet the lenders, forgetting their own salvation and honor, refuse to return them and instead refer the matter to the octave court for judgment so that they may enjoy the income during the interval. The estates and properties of those poor people and their heirs are because of this forever alienated, and the money they have saved for this purpose they are compelled to spend or by chance lose it. In order to restrain the viciousness of such usurers and provide compensation to the poor, it was decreed and decided that if any such usurer who, challenged legally through the court by his opponent, refuses to accept the money or after accepting refuses to return the mortgaged properties and wants to refer the case to the octave court, then the case must be concluded at the first octave by ordering that the same properties must be returned without any payment, and that the judge should command their immediate return, and, in addition, that the usurer must be fined perforce the amount equal to the loan obligation on the properties in favor of the plaintiff.⁴⁷

26 Furthermore, since sometimes when for default of issue⁴⁸ or for other reason properties and property rights devolve to the crown and consequently become subject to donation by the royal

⁴⁵ 6 January 1485 to 6 January 1486; this passage suggests that the diet indeed opened in the first week of January, 1486.

⁴⁶ Cf. June 1458:22, 11, 14:1464, and their predecessors.

⁴⁷ While mortgaging property was a general practice (and not a "last resort" of some impoverished men, as the text might suggest), problems arose, when the creditor did not return the mortgaged property once the mortgage was paid. This led to innumerable lawsuits, for which there is ample evidence in the records.

⁴⁸ Default of issue (defectus seminis, often just defectus) meant the lack of legitimate (male) heirs among the co-inheriting kinsmen after the death of a nobleman, unless one of the daughters was preferred (see below, n. 50)). Considering the wide circle of relatives with inheritance rights, defectus was crucial for the escheat of property to the crown and thus becoming available for donation with the ever decreasing royal domain.

majesty, many persons come forth and loudly proclaim that those rights have devolved to them, by which they not only deafen the ears of the royal highness with their unwelcome clamor but detain his majesty from more important tasks, and hinder, trouble, and prevent him from acting in this matter and also oppose, under the pretext of objection, that those upon whom his majesty bestows such properties obtain institution.⁴⁹ They do this in order to enjoy unpunished the fruits, revenues, and other profits until the court decides whether those rights have devolved to the royal majesty or to others. Therefore, it was ordered by the present decree that if in any county an escheat occurs for default of issue of a deceased person and it is not unequivocally known but rather doubtful whether such an estate should belong to the royal right, to the relatives of the deceased, or to heirs on the female side,⁵⁰ then, until the uncertain matter is decided the royal majesty must assign the estate to be seized and placed in the service of the community and loyal men, namely into the hands of an honest and able person whom the royal majesty will appoint for this task, who shall keep the customary and just income until the doubt is resolved and the case reaches final judgment. Anything that he might extort in excess of the customary and just rent he is obligated and compelled to return to that person who receives the property after the case is decided. In addition, claimants to the property have to present their rights to the palatine and bring proof that those rights belong to them within the course of one year (as described in the following article), whether an octave court is held or not. If they are able to prove this then the palatine shall order and arrange for institution to be granted. However, if they fail the proof, the properties must be given and handed over to those on whom the royal majesty had bestowed them; and those who hope to have right to them must seek it from the royal hands by lawful means. Where in the estate of persons without male heirs wives and daughters remain, property should not be taken from their hands and seized until the truth is discerned concerning their rights, namely whether it pertains by heredity and perpetual right to the female line or not. The same women must and are obligated to demonstrate the truth within a year's time as stated above. If it is found that these estates do not pertain to the female line, then before the wives of these heirless men are excluded from the dominion over those estates, they must be fully compensated in regard to their dower and other ⁴⁹ Institution (introductio or statutio) was the procedure required to validate the acquisition of property. Grantees of royal donations or new owners of purchased, pledged or exchanged estates were expected to take possession of the land within a year, with the assistance of a royal bailiff specified in the charter, and witnessed by a specified place of authentication in the presence of abutters and neighbors. Institution could be thwarted by anyone present who made contradiction or repulsio, i.e., opposed the execution (see below Art. 27). Moreover, any interested party could object to the institution by announcing his protest (prohibitio) within two weeks, thus initiating a lawsuit.

⁵⁰ Women were usually entitled to inherit only movable goods or landed property that had been bought for cash. Nevertheless, some landed property was defined at the time of its donation by the king as being inheritable by the owner's daughters as well as his sons. Property which was inherited by daughters in this way might be referred to as descending through the female line. The sons and descendants of such a daughter might accordingly be designated "men of the female line" (homines foeminei sexus). Moreover, by preference (preferentia in filium, in heredem masculinum, Hung. fiúsítás), a royal privilege by which the king "promoted" the daughter (or daughters) of a nobleman without male heirs in the third (since 1397 fourth) degree, women can be authorized to inherit the paternal fortune just as if they were men, starting a new kindred.

rights by the royal majesty or those who proved to be the heirs of the estate or to whom the king might bestow the estates. The daughters, however, should be given until their marriage the paternal house and a quarter of the land should be set aside and granted them in possession under the title of filial quarter⁵¹ according to the ancient custom of the realm. After they are married and given away, their filial quarter should be compensated in the form of money. And if the daughter or sister of anyone is married to a landless man, either from the court of a baron or noble or from her paternal house or from elsewhere, with the consent and will of her father or brother, then she must be left in the possession of her filial quarter by right of nobility. If, however, she acted without the will and consent of her father and brother, then she must not receive the right of nobility to her filial quarter, but should be compensated in money. In this case she may not claim the release of the filial quarter in property but in money, for it is common knowledge that this custom and order has been hitherto observed.⁵²

27 Moreover, it was ordered that if his royal majesty confers property and estates or any other kind of property right upon someone either because of default of issue, by royal right⁵³ or any other title, and there is contradiction at the time of institution, the requestor shall defer to and admit the contradiction and shall not take possession against that contradiction. But if the contradictor took possession of those rights recently and had not possessed them before, the contradictor – as ⁵¹The “filial quarter,” first mentioned in 1222: 4, was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates (see property rights) of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Antal Murarik, in Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the basic institutions of aviticitas] (Budapest: Sárkány, 1938), pp. 163–192) saw it as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished this provision (Inst. Bk. III. tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, “Vita a leánynegyedről” [Debates on the Filial Quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), 103–7.

⁵² Repeats essentially 8 March 1435:17. The complicated procedure was necessitated by the custom of virtually unlimited inheritance within the patrilinear kindred (aviticitas), on which, see 1351; 1435/I: 17, Erik Fügedi, “Kinship and Privilege,” History & Society 2 (1994): 59–72, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service, pp. 22–7.

⁵³ Royal right (ius regium): an ambiguous term, apparently referring to royal claims to any estate which, though not actually possessed by the king, was assumed to belong to him in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. Actions were moved by or in the name of the crown against persons accused of “hiding royal rights” (celatores iurium regalium) i.e., allegedly usurping a royal claim.

mentioned in the preceding article – must present his rights to his royal majesty or to the palatine or to his protonotary commissioned to the case within one full year after the date of issue of the letter of donation, regardless whether an octave court was held or not, and give reason for his contradiction and, at the same time, make evident that those properties belong to him by better right. Otherwise his royal majesty or the palatine will expel him from those properties by the force of the present statute and give them to those who obtained them. Moreover, the contradictor has to be forced to refund whatever profit he had made in the interim from those properties. However, if the contradictor possessed the properties beforehand, the requester must, in accordance with the present decree, seek his right in the octave courts from his hands.⁵⁴

Furthermore, the dower of wives should remain intact in case of the death in whatever way of the husband, and they are never to be deprived of it.⁵⁵

28 Then, since suits and conflicts often emerge between the prelates or other clergy and noblemen, and one party strives to burden the other in every way, means, and fashion, it was ordered for the more peaceful state and well being of the gentlemen of the realm (that is, that neither party could seize control over the other)⁵⁶ that if prelates or other clergy proceed against nobles in the court of any judge, then, in the matter of the lawsuit, while the case is pending, they are not allowed to impose an interdict upon the laymen or pronounce a sentence of excommunication against them, without the royal majesty's definite knowledge, so that it may not appear that the sentences were pronounced out of passion rather than love of justice. And if prelates

⁵⁴ Cf. above, Art. 22. It seems that, lacking a central register of landholdings, royal grants or court decisions frequently included properties that had rightful owners or legitimate heirs. Owing to the great number of inheriting kinsmen, the latter may have been numerous. Contradiction became formalized as repulsio, an action by a party in physical possession of a property, which had been adjudged in court to another, by which he might impede the institution with ritual violence (with a drawn sword or similar weapon). This had the consequence of forcing the matter back into court for a retrial. Repulsio could only be performed once. Its details and its abuse are discussed in the Tripartitum II: 73-74.

⁵⁵ This goes back as far as 1222:12. Dower (dos, dotalitium) was originally the “price of the bride” paid by the bridegroom’s family to that of the bride, then a grant of the husband to his wife on the occasion of their marriage. The dower was usually given both in land and chattels, but the woman did not have free disposal of the land so given, which was managed together with her husband’s goods. After her husband’s death, the widow could keep the dower unless she remarried. In this case, the kinsmen of the deceased husband redeemed the dower from her. The term often also included those valuables that were brought by the bride in the marriage (res parafernales), which remained with the wife. See Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998) pp. 24–6.

⁵⁶ The clause refers to the Canonical-Romanistic principle of par in parem non habet imperium: within his realm, the king has no equal in authority—based on Romanistic interpretations of Digest 2.1.3 & 4.8.4 (see Pennington, The Prince and the Law [1993], pp. 20ff., 212-215). It was used also by Bracton: De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliae f.5b Woodbine's edition: II, p. 33); see Fritz Schulz, “Bracton on kingship,” English Historical Review 60 (1945): 136-76; Brian Tierney, “Bracton on Government,” Speculum 38 (1963): 295-317, here 302-3. Bónis (Középkori jogunk, p. 121) mentions that this principle was quoted as early as 1337 by Archbishop Csanád, see Nándor Knauz, Lajos Crescens Dedek, eds., Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 3 vols. (Esztergom: Horak, 1874-1924), 3: 296. Otherwise the article repeats in essence 1351:1 and its later version, 1439:32.

or other clergy should be condemned by due process of law by any judge, then they should fall immediately under the same penalty as that which they intended to impose on their opponents.

29 Then, since merchants and traders and other poor people, who have to travel back and forth in the country to make profit or obtain the necessities of life or even for other reasons, are frequently imposed, hindered, and irked by various arrests and suffer irreparable damages, it was therefore ordered and stated that henceforth always in the future the process concerning the arrests should be as follows. If someone complains that another man is indebted to him – except when the debt is manifest, that is, the debtor is open and obvious, who, in the vernacular and mother tongue is called a szembevaló adós,⁵⁷ who can be arrested in public places – he is not allowed to arrest him or someone else or others on his own but first shall report it to the ispán of that county in which the debtor lives, who, by the force of the present decree, is bound to reprimand the lord of the debtor immediately and ask him to bring the debtor into court. And if he does not satisfy the creditor, he has to be taken to the county court on the first day of the session under the penalty of twelve heavy marks, to be exacted by the ispán, to answer the plaintiff. If he could not defend or exonerate himself or his said lord would not take care of taking or hauling him to the second judicial term, the ispán is bound to fully satisfy the plaintiff from the properties of his lord and not only for the capital, but also for all the costs incurred by the creditor or the plaintiff. And if the debtor or defendant, having been arrested by his lord and hauled into court, is condemned, his lord ought and is obliged, in accordance with the sentence and the instructions of the ispán, to make satisfaction from the goods and properties of the debtor for, as said above, the capital and the costs, and he shall be held to do so by the ispán. And if the defendant's wealth would not be enough for the satisfaction, first and foremost the goods he owns shall be given to the creditor at an appraised value, then his head shall be given to his creditor as well. And if someone should not obey the ispán in this respect, that is, if he would not be allowed to exercise his duty laid upon him by this statute, but would be forced to carry the case before the king, the lord of the estate – that is, in which the ispán was hindered – shall be immediately condemned to twenty-five marks, indispensably exacted by the royal majesty. Nonetheless his majesty shall be required and bound in the same way to satisfy the creditor or plaintiff fully and without hesitation for the indebted amount and the costs made by him.⁵⁸

30 Then, it was decreed that when prelates, barons, or any other nobles are traveling to the royal majesty, to his court, to war, or to any other place on either private or public business, they shall make their way at all times and places without damaging, wronging, harming, and hindering other inhabitants of the realm.⁵⁹

⁵⁷ The Hungarian words mean verbatim: “debtor face to face.”

⁵⁸ Follows in spirit the law 8 March 1435:13-16 and 1447:17, but entrusts the ispán, rather than the “judge of the place” with enforcing payment, raises the penalties from 5 to 12 Marks, and includes the possibility of appeal to the royal court (the hindrance of which is punished by 25 Marks). Thus, the article institutes altogether a stronger protection for creditors.

⁵⁹ Repeats 1405/II:1, however, without the stiff penalties listed there.

31. Then, since the gentlemen of the realm (as mentioned before) have been suffering from much imposition and damage caused by the marching and accommodation of soldiers, it was therefore decided and decreed that henceforth the king's men, as well as those of other gentlemen of the realm, cavalymen and foot-soldiers alike, who go across the country, shall everywhere pay the price for the fodder of the horses, as well as the victuals for the men and dare never to cause damage. If not the king's men, but those of others should contravene this, the lord of those men is required to answer at law for the wrong and damage. If they are the king's men, then his majesty shall be always bound to send a good and well-endowed man of his with them, who shall accompany them and prevent them from causing any damage. And if he should dare to act contrariwise, and some complaints would reach the king's ears, his majesty shall give justice and satisfaction to such an extent that not only those damages, but the expenses paid by the injured or the complainant are indemnified. In order to avoid any kind of conflict and quarrel that may emerge concerning payment for the price of food, it was decided that food everywhere shall be given and supplied to the king's men and those of other gentlemen of the realm going to war according to the register and price list that his majesty shall compile in accordance with the conditions of the time and give it to the commanders of troops, and that prices shall always be paid by the troops according to the said royal register and price list without any demur. Furthermore, since it is the custom of some troops, especially of the light cavalry, that is, the hussars,⁶⁰ that after the dismissal of the army or when their pay expires, they idle and do not return home, but stay on someone else's property and commit there damages, wrongs, and other harmful deeds with impunity; therefore, it was decided and ordered that henceforth these troops shall not stay and idle on the properties of others, but return home, and if they like, wait there for new pay. If anyone dares to act otherwise, and those, on whose properties they stay, are disturbed, the latter should report to the ispán of the county and ask him to expel them. And he is bound to reprimand them and tell them to leave and to pay for the damages caused; and if they should not obey, he shall arrest them and send them to the royal majesty for punishment and he should recompense and repair the caused damages from their goods and properties and from those of their retainers.⁶¹ If the ispán himself is unable and incapable to do so, the county is required to rise up in his aid. If, moreover, the ispán is inattentive or negligent and the wronged person presents his complaints to his royal majesty, his majesty must repair all the damages and recompense the expenses from the ispán's own goods and chattels, and, in addition, expel the people from the complainant's estate.⁶²

32 Then, since the Venetians and the Poles have been and do not cease endeavoring in every way and by all means to gain a foothold in the lands and territories belonging to the Holy Crown

⁶⁰ Hussars (Hung: huszár) were light cavalymen, equipped with sabers and only lightly armed. They played an increasing role in the Hungarian armies, mainly as a counterweight to the Ottoman spahi cavalry. By the close of the Middle Ages some hussars were fitted with armor..

⁶¹ It is unclear, how this was to be achieved, considering that the unpaid soldiers, mercenaries or others, had hardly any property from which damages could be refunded, nor did they have retainers. The measures were probably to be applied to a wider circle of soldateska than mention before.

⁶² The article summarizes the measures about damages inflicted by the army and related issues, cf. 1405/II:1, 1435/II:6-8, 1454: 8, 1471:28, and Art. 30, 44, &c, below.

and to usurp them as they in fact have usurped some parts, therefore, it was decided and ordered that no one among the gentlemen of the realm should dare, under the penalty of perpetual charge of infidelity, to sell, transfer, mortgage, offer, donate or give away or convey in any other way, castles, fortifications, cities, market towns, and estates or other immovable property to them or to any one of them.⁶³

33 Then, since the officers and retainers of lords, using the confidence bestowed upon them by their lords, are causing considerable damage, injustice, harassment, and hindrance, therefore it was decided and ordered – in order to restrain their recklessness and licentiousness – that if nobles and landowners, who are granted fortifications and other offices by their lords and commit misdeeds from there, their lords are required, having first found out the truth, upon the request of the ispán, under whose authority they are, to administer justice and give satisfaction to the injured and to repair all damage caused. However, if the culprits of such misdeeds were not entrusted with any office, but merely receive salary from their lords and stay in their own house or serve their lords otherwise and commit such misdeeds, they themselves must appear before the ispán, stand in court and exonerate themselves. In this case, however, their lords must not and should not dare to intercede on their behalf and defend them, but they should be left to the said ispán. Those who would dare to act otherwise shall be condemned perforce for the double composition⁶⁴ of that servitor, nevertheless the ispán must seize the servitor and administer justice to the injured on his behalf. And the lords are free to arrest these retainers of theirs and make them pay compensation, regardless of their privilege of nobility, namely those, who cause damage to others or commit other misdeeds, or if as stewards poorly manage the properties entrusted to them or escape without account. However, if someone arrests his own retainer and he says that he is imprisoned

⁶³ The prohibition of alienation of Hungarian property to foreigners has a long history, ever since 1222:26. The particular reference here is perhaps to those lords of the southern and northwestern frontiers, who collaborated with Italians and Poles. One such case was that of John (Ivan) Frankopani, who in 1480 handed over the island of Krk to the Venetians, see Iván Nagy, Albert B. Nyári, eds. Magyar diplomáciai emlékek Mátyás király korából [Hungarian diplomatic documents from the age of M.] 2: 407-21 (Budapest: MTA, 1875-78); also Borislav Grgin, “The Frankapani and King Matthias,” M. A. Thesis, Central European University, Budapest, 1994, pp. 50-67.

⁶⁴ Composition (compositio), or man price (homagium) was a sum of money, which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system, widespread among Germanic peoples of the post-migration age, aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge but continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid (the wergeld) was based on the victim’s or the culprit’s social and legal status and the nature of the crime. The man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to a lesser extent the fine of the tongue.

undeservedly and sues his lord, the case must be judged in the first octave and justice must be rendered to the imprisoned by his lord.⁶⁵

34 Moreover, if someone's retainer or steward escaped and entered the service of another lord, the new master shall make him leave and dismiss him immediately upon the request and warning of the old one, otherwise he shall be straightaway regarded as being condemned in the double composition of that servitor. Similarly, if he would not dismiss him on any account, the complaining party shall sue him at the next octave court, and ought to receive there full and proper justice on his part.⁶⁶

35 Furthermore, concerning the exactions of duties and tolls it was decreed that in the course of the next year, that is until the next feast of the Circumcision of the Lord,⁶⁷ the ispáns in every county shall, with a certain number of the better-off nobles of the county, report to the royal majesty the number of toll-collecting places in that county and whether the toll is exacted on bridges or on banks or on dry land or in some other way, and then report the length of the bridges and banks in yards, so that his majesty, together with the lord prelates and barons, can determine how much can be exacted from travelers at anyone's toll-place.⁶⁸ And if anyone henceforth should ⁶⁵ Cf. 1435/I:6, 1458:23, 1471:2 and Art. 34, below. This article distinguishes clearer than any other decree two kinds of noble retainers (familiares): those who act as castellans and similar household officers of their domini, and those (probably the better-off), who have their own mansions, receive a stipend (obviously in money) from their seniors for which they perform other (military, administrative, and so on) duties; In general, the noble retainer was: a lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron (q.v.) or major landowner. He kept his noble privilege and was subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which he received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The laws refer to it very rarely, as in principle all noblemen were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See: Julius Szekfű, "Die Servienten and Familiaren im ungarischen Mittelalter," Ungarische Rundschau, 2 (1912): 524-57; György Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law], pp. 214-44 (Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tud. Int., n. d. [1947], repr. Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó, 2000); Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy, pp. 137-40; Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service, pp. 110-31, and János M. Bak, "Feudalism in Hungary?" in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011) pp. 203-17.

⁶⁶ The status of some stewards and retainers must have fallen, when a law prescribes that they ought to be returned to their domini, just as runaway servile peasants. Still, their noble status is honored insofar as the retainer, if he finds the arrest unwarranted, has the right of appeal to the royal court.

⁶⁷ 1 January 1487. (This date is an additional indication that the diet in fact opened on New Years Day 1486.)

⁶⁸ Cf. 1351:8; 1435/I:20-21, 1464:15, and 1471:25. The oft-repeated general prohibition of illegal tolls is here augmented by the duty of the ispán to secure free passage. On road tolls, see Magdolna Szilágyi, , On the Road: The History and Archaeology of Communication Networks in East-Central Europe (Budapest:

dare to exact something more beyond this regulation and thus contravene the present decree, the ispán with the elected nobles should be required to redress this and to compensate the injured parties for the exacted amount as well as for the expenses. If they should be incorrigible, the ispán should forbid the exaction of tolls there until his majesty's pardon, and, moreover, make sure that in the meantime everyone can pass that place free and without any charge. Moreover, the ispán is required to protect those crossing the tolls from the violators of the decree. And if the ispáns themselves would possess tolls in the county where they hold their office, the ispáns of two bordering counties must examine the tolls of that county, and to report in writing, as we said above, to his majesty the title, cause, and quality of those tolls.

36 Then, henceforth no toll of whatever kind is to be exacted from peasants when they bring their wives from another village.⁶⁹ Also, from tailors and cloth-cutters 40 pennies should not be demanded at the toll-places, as has been the custom to the present time, but only the amount exacted from other craftsmen and travelers.⁷⁰

37 In addition to the preceding decisions we order that no ispán, ban, voivode, or other royal official of whatever title or position should dare to seize the churches of bishops, archbishops, abbots, or provosts or any other churches under royal right of patronage or their lands, appurtenances, tithes, and estates within the confines of their power and authority without special permission of the king, nor should they dare to enter partly or entirely into these rights.⁷¹

38 In order that our said officers and said ispáns have no opportunity to burden the nobles and the inhabitants of our kingdom living under their administration and jurisdiction by arbitrary fines, we, following in this the ancient custom of our kingdom, declare that no penalties or fines are to be exacted by any secular judge at any other time but at an assembly held according to long-

Archaeolingua 2014) esp. pp. 91-106 and Eadem, "Mobility, Roads and Bridges in Medieval Hungary" in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

⁶⁹ The earlier regulation, 1351:17, decreed this exemption only for noblemen.

⁷⁰ The background of the abolished discrimination may have been the fact that cloth cutters and tailors travelled with valuable merchandise in their packs and were thus susceptible to higher tolls.

⁷¹ This paragraph and the next are verbatim borrowed from 8 March 1435:19. The royal right of patronage was not part of the honores granted to officeholders and interference in ecclesiastical prebends was always seen as an abuse; see Vilmos Fraknói, A magyar királyi hegyúri jog Szt. Istvántól Mária Teréziáig [The right of Hungarian royal patronage from St. Stephen to Maria Theresa] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1895), passim. The clause "without special permission of the king" calls attention to the fact that protection of ecclesiastical prebend had no power against the king. Actually, at the time of this decree, five out of fourteen bishoprics and other rich prebends (such as the priory of Vrana of the Knights Hospitallers) were vacant and governed by royal administrators (see Pál Engel, Királyi hatalom es arisztokrácia viszonya a Zsigmond-korban [Relationship of royal power and the aristocracy under Sigismund] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1977), p. 80).

established custom by the count palatine or by someone appointed by the royal majesty to hold general assemblies,⁷² except in the following cases when penalties can be collected at times other than at the general assembly:

First, to wit, for the forced retention and harm caused to tenant peasants, who after having paid the just rent and all their debts, requested leave to move to someone else's estate, the county's ispán with the noble magistrates (without whom he must not act in such cases) is allowed to exact the penalty or fine of 3 marks without delay at any time and as often as he finds him guilty from whomever they find guilty of this according to the law, in order to let the tenant peasant who was restrained and defrauded leave freely with all his goods and with his losses recompensed.

Then, anyone who abducts by violence someone else's tenant peasant who has neither requested nor obtained leave or has requested 15 days in advance but did not obtain it, shall pay the penalty of 3 marks for this violent abduction of the tenant and shall be forced by the county's ispán and the noble magistrates by the penalty of another 3 marks to return the same tenant peasant. If, however, any tenant peasant secretly escapes to someone else's estate without having obtained leave to move, and he to whose estate the tenant moved refuses to return him having been called upon to do so, then the county's ispán must and is bound to force him to return the tenant by a fine of 3 marks.⁷³

Then, for contempt of court the penalty is 25 marks.

Then, anyone who will have captured a thief, a robber, or any other common criminal and then deliberately releases him must pay the criminal's composition to the county's ispán.⁷⁴

Then, if the chamber's profit is not paid by the appointed date, then after the usual letter of fines is issued by the noble magistrate to the offenders, the county ispán with the noble magistrate is to collect the chamber's profit together with the fine of 3 marks to be paid by the village which has not paid the tax.⁷⁵

Similarly, since we specifically recall edicts of our predecessors and also several writings of our majesty established the custom and made it usual, that according to the honorable custom of our kingdom, ispáns of counties or their deputies collected the ecclesiastical tithe with the penalty of ⁷² As these assizes were abolished by Art. 1, above, the measure does not quite make sense.

⁷³ The guarantee of free removal of tenants from their lord's land and the prohibition of their abduction was decreed as early as in 15 April 1405/I:6 and may have been even older custom. Apparently there was still a shortage of labor in the mid-fifteenth century which might have encouraged illegal moves of peasants from one estate to another. It has been pointed out that lesser nobles were more vulnerable to such acts, for they could ill-afford to offer easier terms to their tenant, while greater lords could be more generous; see János M. Bak "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, eds. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005) pp. 387–400.

⁷⁴ The matter of bringing a captured criminal to justice was already addressed in the legislation of the eleventh century; see, e.g., Ladislav 2:3, Ladislav 3:9, 19.

⁷⁵ This procedure and penalty goes back to the beginnings of the transformation of the chamber's profit to a direct tax; see 1342.

3 marks each from villages which were reluctant to pay after the lapse of the specific and customary time following the church ban, we, therefore, approving, renewing, and following this practice, command by the force of these presents that after the imposition of the ban at times usual for the individual dioceses and places, the county ispáns or their alispáns are bound to make each village which has stubbornly suffered the ban for a month and still refuses or neglects to pay the tithe, pay this tithe on the request of the tithing-men after the lapse of a month immediately, without delay and in full, to whomever it has to be paid, along with a fine of 3 marks each for the officers themselves.⁷⁶

Then, when the nobles of any county are summoned to an extraordinary county assembly by royal mandate in which it is stated that they are under the penalty of 3 marks, the county's ispán and the noble magistrates have the right to collect without delay the said 3 marks specified in our letter from those who do not come to that assembly unless their absence is caused by illness, old age, widowhood, orphanhood, or by disability of poverty, or if they can excuse themselves reasonably on account of urgent matters.

Then, the palatine, the judge royal, and every common judge ordinary, both ecclesiastical and secular, have the right immediately after finishing a case and passing final judgment in all cases tried in the courts to give first of all satisfaction to the opposing party from his portion and also to collect the judicial fines due to him.⁷⁷

39 Then, because the violent and unjust removal of serfs⁷⁸ and peasants caused various outcries, various complaints and various law-suits and conflicts, therefore it was ordered that every serf; who was taken unjustly and contrary to the custom of the realm, from a year ago to the Feast of the Epiphany of the Lord of this year,⁷⁹ shall be returned to his lord upon the ispán's notice. Those ⁷⁶ On the payment of tithes, see the earlier decrees, e.g., Stephen 2: [20]; Syn. Szab:40; and 1351:6.

⁷⁷ The article is borrowed verbatim from 8 March 1435: 7. The judicial fines could amount to considerable sums; they started out with 3 Marks (e.g., for a prorogation issued on the request of one party) but outstanding fines doubled every session.

⁷⁸ The text of the decree here uses the late classical term colonus for the first time in a Hungarian law (except once in Coloman's law) to designate a jobagio (from Hungarian jobbágy), personally free peasants subject to their lords in terms of rent in kind and money, free to move from one estate to another. (Actually, the term already appears in a royal mandate of 30 November 1470: see Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 2:209-10, for cotters or servants, who live in their lords' mansions.) Whether this was merely a borrowing in Humanist style or rather implied increased dependence of the tenants, similar to the servile coloni of Roman law (e.g., Codex Theodosianus 11.17.1 [332 A.D.]; Roth Clausen, The Roman Colonate, (New York: Columbia University Press, 1925), pp. 17-30) cannot be ascertained. Measures restricting the personal freedom of peasants were not introduced until much later in the century, but, as Bónis (Középkori jogunk, p. 86) remarked, such a change in terminology may have facilitated the imposition of higher seigniorial dues and controls. In which case, the adoption of Roman law terminology may well have had a practical—that is, social, legal, and economic—effect in Corvinus' realm.

⁷⁹ 6 January 1485-6 January 1486.

who would not return them shall be immediately condemned in the composition of the serf, half of which is to be exacted by the ispán for himself and the other half for that lord who previously owned the serf. The ispáns shall detect and execute this in every county and on everyone's properties. They shall, however, begin with the properties of the royal majesty and of the lady queen, and then with the properties of others. Henceforth no one shall dare to take another lord's tenant peasant violently and contrary to the custom of the realm under the penalty of six marks; also, let no one dare, under the same penalty, to hold back his tenant peasants who, according to the custom of the realm, want to leave, with some devised accusation so that the poor have the right to stay or to move. If someone disputes that his tenant peasants were taken violently and unjustly, the ispán of that county, together with elected royal and other respectable men, shall inquire, and if he finds the complaint just, he shall cause the men taken away to be given back, and exact the aforementioned fine from the violent culprit. However, those who hold back their tenant peasants with an unjust accusation⁸⁰ or with some devised new thing, such as levying some tax on them when it becomes known that they wish to leave, or, having levied one long ago, but not yet collected it, mainly in order to be able to state on this pretext that they are indebted and for this reason hold them back, shall be condemned so forth in the said fine, namely six marks, directly and without exception exacted by the ispán. The extraordinary tax, if it is to be collected, shall be collected within sixty days, otherwise henceforth that tax should be regarded as an unfounded accusation.⁸¹

40. Furthermore, although the paying of the tithes has been discussed in every diet and in every assembly and meeting of the gentlemen of the realm since the time when the royal majesty by divine plan was raised to royal eminence, namely, how and in which way they are to be paid, and several decrees were passed about it, no ways and means were ever found that would have satisfied all parties and stopped the complaints. Therefore, although his majesty and the gentlemen of the realm have been thinking about it long and much in this present diet as well, but could find no better and more proper ways and means than those found at the coronation of the royal majesty, it was decided and ordered that henceforth in the future the tithe is to be paid and collected in accordance with the regulation made at the coronation of the royal majesty.⁸² Adding, however, that when tithe collectors want to collect in a county, they must be accompanied, at the expense of the bishop or the chapter, by a noble or two from among those nobles who will be selected in every county by the royal majesty,⁸³ and who shall, first and foremost, make sure that the tithe is paid fairly and in good order everywhere. They shall not allow the tithe collector to collect unjustly and exceedingly, and if the tithe collector should not obey them, they are required to write and report to the bishop and the chapter. And if he or the chapter should not take care and rectify the matter, they must alert the royal majesty, who, for the public good and for the peace of the gentlemen of the realm, by his grace and benevolence shall carry the burden of rendering such justice on behalf of the bishop and the chapter, as well as on behalf of the tithe collectors, so that the county should be satisfied well and deservedly. In the meantime, however, the collection of tithes must be suspended, and on this occasion the bishops must not impose an interdict.

⁸⁰ The expression calumnia is rarely used in its Classical meaning of unjust, construed accusation, see Antal Bartal, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis Regni Hungariae, (Budapest: MTA, 1901, repr. ibid., 1981), p. 91. In general it meant in medieval Hungary, frivolous prosecution, unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price. Term might include astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney, or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice..

⁸¹ For the prohibition of forcibly removing tenants see Art. 38, above.

⁸² See 1464:24 and its successors: 1471:3, 1478:15, and 1481:1-4, 7-12.

41 Then, it was ordered that just as it is known to have been ordered by the most serene lord Emperor Sigismund, the tithe collectors must be contented by the oath of the tithe payers and if they are not satisfied, they shall be free to examine the rick. If they find more than was said by the peasant they shall take the surplus and, moreover, impose the payment of the just tithe. However, if they find that it was declared correctly by the peasant, they shall immediately pay him one golden piece for the damage caused by overturning the rick. If they are unwilling to do so or raise difficulties, the peasant should have the right to immediately take the tithe collectors' horse. We order by the present decree that, in order to make this easier and more convenient, the tithe collectors must dismount from their horses and tie them in the tithe-payer's house or court before they start examining the rick.⁸⁴

42 Then, that in the diocese of Eger peasants are required to take care of the animals submitted as tithe only until the feast of St. Michael the Archangel.⁸⁵ And if the animals should happen to perish after this date, the peasants shall not be burdened in any way because of this, but swear an oath that the animals did not perish because of their fault, ill will, or intention.⁸⁶

43 Then, in some counties there are some people who, at the time of the tax-collection, keep for themselves a yard with wheat and cereals and then a cellar with wine, and collect the tithe from there for themselves.⁸⁷ And since this abuse seems to have spread in contrast to the orders of the

⁸³ Previous laws prescribed that the county delegate a nobleman (or a magistrate, or a parish priest) to control the tithe-collector. The royal appointment of these men is an innovation, but fits nicely into Matthias' ecclesiastical policy, which made the best use of the king of Hungary's traditional right of patronage over the bishoprics and royal churches.

⁸⁴ Cf. 1411:5-6 and 1435/I:7. This arrangement about the tithe-collector's horse as a kind of surety is new (and did not remain the practice; by 1492 it was changed to the deposit of 1 florin) and peculiar. It is, however, worth noting that the law designates the peasant's house and yard (domus, curia) with the same words that were used for noble residences.

⁸⁵ 29 September.

⁸⁶ It is not known, why this measure was specified to be valid for one diocese. A few years later, this rule was expanded for the entire country.

⁸⁷ The issue was mentioned already in 1458:34, albeit rather cryptically (as the occupatio of gardens and cellars). Apparently, the cheating did not cease, and the prelates at the diet asked for remedy. This abuse of hiding part of the produce from the tithe-collectors, seems to have been serious, as the king expressly issued a letter on 24 April 1486 to Bishop Oswald of Zagreb underlining the importance of the payment of the holy kings for it is known that they decreed only the reeves to be exempted, and even then only because of the work, service, and expenses inherent in the collecting of tithes,⁸⁸ therefore, it was ordered that this abuse must end and be regarded as abolished for ever, so that no yard and no cellar shall be left to the lords of the land for the collection of the tithes. The ispán shall force the unyielding and the violators of the decree with proper measures, and if he himself should be sluggish or directly refuse to do so, the royal majesty must be informed, who then is held to force them.⁸⁹

44 Then, it was ordered that if any gentleman of the realm of whatever station and condition has been litigating for some time or is still litigating with any person whoever before the curia in Rome in the matter of tithes, he must stop the suit there and is required to bring it for trial to the royal majesty's judicial court in this kingdom by the first of May, that is, by the next feast of Sts. Philip and James the Apostles.⁹⁰ If they were reluctant to withdraw it and to appear before the royal majesty, he will be required, upon the request of the appearing party – regardless of the other party's stubbornness and absence – to order what is just and to bring the case finally to an end and to pronounce judgment concerning the amount of capital and damage, as well as the expenses, and, by the force of the present decree, to command the proper execution of the judgment.

45 Furthermore, it was ordered that henceforth no one among the gentlemen of the realm should dare to litigate before the said curia in Rome in the matter of tithes or in any other matter.⁹¹ And if some of the lord prelates or other ecclesiastics want to initiate a lawsuit or want to continue the initiated lawsuit against any of the gentlemen of the realm, or vice versa, either by the right of exemption, or regarding whether the tithes should be paid to them justly and wholly, or in other way in the matter of tithes or in any other case, they can do it before the royal majesty, but nowhere tithe integre, pure and absque omni diminutione (Croatian Nat. Archives, Zagreb, Archivum archiep. Zagrabien. 59.); cf. DRH Matth., p. 292, n. 2.

⁸⁸ Actually, the known decrees of the “holy kings” on this subject (e. g., Syn.Sz. 40) do not specify the exemption of the villicus/reeve; the first surviving mention of it is in 1351:5.

⁸⁹ The intervention of the county ispán in assuring the correct tithing was decreed earlier, e. g., in 1411:6.

⁹⁰ The claim of the royal courts of justice to treat cases of tithing was an innovation, although it may have had precedents based on the extensive royal rights of patronage. It is not known, whether the secular courts succeeded in this attempt, which may have been triggered by a specific case of appeal to Rome. The enumeration of matters pertaining to courts spiritual (in 1462:3) included of course, issues connected with the tithes, as was typical of medieval and early modern societies in Christian Europe: see Joseph Goy, “The tithes in France and elsewhere,” in Emmanuel Leroy. Ladurie, and Joseph Goy, Tithe and Agrarian History from the Fourteenth to the Nineteenth Centuries, pp. 14-23, esp. pp. 18-19 on Hungary (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982). However, the following article restricts the unusual royal claim to jurisdiction over the tithes to the court of personal presence; earlier (e. g., in 1471:19) appeal was allowed to the papal curia. See briefly in Andor Csizmadia, “Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn.” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed monograph on the issue is still missing.

⁹¹ The prohibition of taking cases directly to Rome goes back in essence to the Placetum regium of Sigismund (1404/I). 1440:4 spells out the procedure of appeal to the Roman curia.

else; who, by the duty originating in the royal office he assumed, will be required to order for everyone, according to the statements and evidence presented in the lawsuit, what will be just. It is understood, however, that cases concerning tithes can never be dealt with by other judges of the realm, except by the royal majesty personally.

46 Then, that the royal majesty should not confiscate the properties of the gentlemen of the realm on a simple complaint, no matter how grave and extraordinary it may be,⁹² but upon receiving the complaint should write to the ispán and elected nobles of that county to examine and report the complaint faithfully to the royal majesty who shall examine, investigate, and determine from their testimony what to do in the case and whether they deserve confiscation of their property or other punishment.

Then, that the royal majesty shall not sentence any of the gentlemen of the realm for the crime of infidelity without the council of barons and prelates.⁹³

47 It was decided that no one shall dare to harbor persons faithless to the king in his castle, fortification, city or in other place and keep them there and give shelter to them. However, if one of these faithless men, out of trust, should run to one of his lords or friends, he can receive him and keep him with him in his house unpunished for twelve days, but not longer. And if that person wanted to go to the royal majesty to gain pardon or to declare his fidelity or to prove his innocence, his host is free, if he wants, to take him with him or to send him there under the protection of the royal majesty's letter of safe conduct – which, by the force of the present decree, is to be regarded as given and granted to all such persons – with his letter and men, to pray, act, and intercede for mercy on his behalf. However, if he was unable to obtain and gain pardon for him, in no way should he dare to let him return to his castles, fortifications, cities, market towns or into any other place and property, and give him shelter there. If someone might dare act otherwise, that castle, fortification, city, market town, estate or place where such a faithless man is harbored shall immediately devolve upon the royal treasury and shall be immediately regarded as devolved upon it, and the royal majesty shall, by the force of the present decree, freely have it at his disposal at his will.⁹⁴

48 Furthermore, if thieves, robbers, murderers, arsonists, forgers of money, letters, and other people's handwriting stayed on someone's property and the lord of that property, called upon by the ispán, did not expel them from his property, the ispán must send his men to seize those

⁹² Cf. 1464: 18, 1471:10, 1478:9, and their predecessors. This article confirmed that the king granted the counties the right to decide about the merit of such complaints by common inquest, which had been the custom of the realm for some time before. The confiscation of properties for the fisc was usual procedure, mostly performed by a member of the court (miles curiae), see András Kubinyi, "Die Staatsorganisation der Matthiaszeit," in: Idem, Matthias Corvinus (Herne: Schäfer, 1999) 5-96, here p. 10.

⁹³ Cf. 1439:27.

⁹⁴ Cf. 1405/II: 9, 1435/I: 20. The article may have been triggered by events following the 1471 rebellion against the king.

evildoers. And if the peasants or the inhabitants of the estate, in which these evildoers stay, rose against the ispán's men and resisted them, the ispán shall not seize the estate immediately; instead, for the second time, he must send a larger troop and force to seize the said evildoers, as well as those peasants. If the officers of the lord of that place resisted together with the peasants or with other accomplices of theirs and did not allow them to be seized, but promised to bring them into the county court to stand trial before the ispán, the ispán's men should obey and should be satisfied with this, and in this case the ispán should not seize the estate. However, if they neither allowed them to be seized, nor, as we said above, promised to present them, the ispán must and should be required to seize the estate until the royal majesty's pardon. And if in this case the lord of such place rose personally against the ispán and his men and resisted them so that the said evildoers and revolting peasants could not be seized and he did not promise to bring them, as we said above, to the county court, or if he promised but fails to do so, the estate, in which this occurs, shall devolve upon the royal treasury perpetually, and by the force of the present decree shall be immediately regarded as devolved upon it; and the royal majesty shall have the freedom either to keep it or to confer it on others.⁹⁵

49 Then, that if in course of time deposits of gold, silver, salt or other minerals should be found on the estates of nobles or other proprietors, the royal majesty shall not confiscate them without proper and suitable compensation. However if his majesty wishes to acquire them, he shall give other estates bringing the same revenue and income, in exchange for the estates where these metals were found. Otherwise he should cause the royal dues and the royal portions of the urbura to be collected, but allow the nobles to keep these estates with all their revenues and incomes undisturbed.⁹⁶

50 Then, it was decided that the court and jurisdiction of the ispáns of Zagorje, held hitherto usually in Varaždin, be abolished and never held again and that the litigants in that county be held and obligated to turn to the court or the justice of the bans of Slavonia.⁹⁷

⁹⁵ Essentially identical with 1447:7 repeated in 1458: 43. Note the assumption of armed peasants assisting their lord in retaining allegedly unjustly held property, for which there are several cases recorded. István Szabó (A középkori magyar falu [The medieval Hungarian village] Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1969, p. 182) knows of the confiscation in 1470, in the village of Újváros (Co. Szabolcs) of 6 daggers, 6 battle-axes, 3 lances and a sword and shield from the houses of 24 tenant peasants after a conflict between their lords (see MNL OL DI 55928). In the fourteenth century a nobleman was cited to court "with his 105 tenant peasants" for acts of might (Ibid. p. 156).

⁹⁶ This regulation goes back to the mining reforms of Charles of Anjou from 1327, see Ferenc Döry, et al. DRH, pp. 80-1, codified later in 1351:13 and repeated in 1405/II:13

⁹⁷ County Zagorje (today in Slovenia) was at the southwestern border of the medieval kingdom. The abolition of the count's court was in the interest of the local nobles, who in the beginning of the fifteenth century had fallen under the jurisdiction of the powerful family of the counts of Cille (Cillei, Celjski), later of those of John Vitovec (taken away from them by Matthias and granted to John Corvin in the 1480s) and have now been returned to the judicial authority of the viceroy, the ban, see Tamás Pálosfalvi, "Vitovec János. Egy zsoldoskarrier a 15. századi Magyarországon"[J. V., a mercenary-career in 15th C. Hungary] Századok 135. (2001) 429–472.

51 Then, if any men, of whatever station and eminence, commit intentional homicide, they shall be executed without redemption. And if any of these men seek safety in flight, they shall be punished with the same punishment wherever and whenever they are found, but not without due process of law. And the ispán or the alispán and the noble magistrates of the county, where the victim is found are required to administer justice according to the custom of the realm. And no one shall dare to give shelter to these men and let them into his castle and house, under the aforementioned penalty for the unfaithful and other evildoers.⁹⁸ However, if the homicide was not committed out of deliberate wickedness and intentionally, but rather happened accidentally or otherwise unexpectedly, the killer should be free to make peace with the relatives of the victim.⁹⁹

52 Then, it was established that if litigant parties, during the octave courts before either the palatine or the judge royal or other judges ordinary, be they ecclesiastic or lay, are condemned to fines or to judicial payments, the judge shall compel them to pay those payments or fines straightaway at the end of the trial. And if the case is closed with a final judgment, the judge must first satisfy the winning party from his part of the properties of the condemned and after that he is free to exact what is due as his judicial fee, as has been the custom. Similarly, if someone is condemned to some payment before the ispán of the county in the county court, he is bound to pay it within fifteen days after the first warning. And if they should not be able or not willing to do so, the ispáns are free to seize as much of property or estate as equals the value of the payment or fine.¹⁰⁰

53 Then, since many people are wont to carry their cases, even of minor importance, to the royal court from the court and judgment of the bans, voivodes, ispáns and their deputies, and to that of other judges ordinary, in order to despoil and burden their opponents with lengthy lawsuits, fatigue, expenses, injustice, and damage, it was decided and ordered with the common counsel, will, and consent of the lord prelates, barons, and the other gentlemen of the realm, for the peace and relief of the inhabitants of the realm, especially the oppressed and the poor, that henceforth if someone appeals a case from the court of any judge to the royal court and the previous judgment is upheld there, he must immediately be condemned to a double fine, in which he shall be regarded as condemned because of the appeal, and this fine must be exacted immediately and indispensably by his judge ordinary.¹⁰¹

⁹⁸ On the procedure against killers, see 1471:28. On the prohibition of harboring such criminals, see above, Art. 47-48.

⁹⁹ The distinction between “premeditated murder” and “accidental manslaughter” appears in Hungarian laws as early as in Steph I: 14, but does not feature in the subsequent centuries, except in urban statutes.

¹⁰⁰ Sigismund had limited the cases in which fines could be collected outside the general assizes (1435/I: 7), but with the abolition of these, the immediate exaction of birsagia (fines) was only a logical consequence.

¹⁰¹ Appeal proper was not usually allowed in medieval Hungary. The first case for it was codified for the towns under Sigismund (1405/I:4, 12) who were allowed to appeal not only to their “mother-city” (whose law they used), but also to the Master of the Treasury, that is, to a central court of towns. Later, appeal from the county to the royal court became also accepted practice. There was also the notion of transmissio from one royal court to another, which later was extended to the county courts, and not differentiated from appeal

54 Furthermore, since parties losing a case and judgment frequently slander, vilify, and attack falsely their judges as if they had not administered justice to them, and because of their shameful and reprehensible clamor scandals and other troubles are wont to emerge,¹⁰² therefore, in order to restrain the tongue of such people it was decreed by the common decision of all, that no one should dare at all to calumniate the masters protonotaries¹⁰³ and inveigh against them unjustly, but rather if someone believes that he has been judged unfairly, he should appeal to the royal majesty or to the palatine or to the judge royal or to the deputies of the palatine and the judge royal honestly, respectfully, and politely. If someone should dare to commit the aforesaid deeds and not control his tongue, and will be unable to prove the calumny he uttered against the masters or one of them, he shall, by the force of the present decree, fall immediately under the same penalty as that which the masters would be condemned if the charges against them or one of them could be proven.

55 Moreover, it was decreed that, as the late most serene lord King Louis had ordered, if anyone among the nobles is condemned in a process of law by the palatine or the judge royal or any other judge to defeat in judicial combat in cases of act of might, frivolous prosecution, false court appearance or use and proffering forged documents or for any other capital offense, the judge of such a case must seize that condemned man and hold him for three days to allow peace and order to be restored between the parties. And if they do not reach agreement, then he, according to the custom of the realm, must hand over the condemned man into the hands of his adversary to inflict on him the penalty as required by law. And if the plaintiff causes the death of the condemned party or inflicts any other penalty required by law, then the latter shall be released without any payment or attachment of his property by the judge and the plaintiff. And the sons, brothers, kinsmen, sisters, wife, and relatives of such a condemned and sentenced man should not be made liable for his crimes, so that the judge should not confiscate the condemned man's own estate and parts of estate or other properties of his, only the belongings that were found in his presence when he was seized; rather, all these [goods] shall descend to his sons and heirs or to his kindred, and they shall remain free, safe, and undisturbed in all these properties, estates, houses, and property rights. It is further added that if a man condemned and sentenced in the above manner somehow is able to come to an agreement with his adversary, he should be free to do so at any time, and the judge shall exact and demand no fine or other payment at all from the condemned or sentenced man for such an agreement, but the agreement or peace shall be made freely and without any payment.¹⁰⁴

(Bartal, Glossarium p. 671). The present decree wished to stop appeal in minor cases, implicitly allowing it in major ones (Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet. pp. 421-8.).

¹⁰² Verbal attack on judgments passed—essentially identical with contempt of court—was prohibited in Barbarian law; Roman legal tradition did not concern itself with such procedural matters (cf. John A. Crook, Law and Life of Rome, London: Thames & Hudson, 1967, pp. 68-97). The issue was summarily addressed in Sigismund's Decretum Maius (1435/I:7), where mere contempt of court (violator sedis) was penalized heavily, by 25 Marks; see also 1471:14.

¹⁰³ Protonotaries (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, "master in sentencing") were lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases; see below, Art. 68.

¹⁰⁴ Almost verbatim identical with 1351:9.

56 Then, that a son should not be condemned and punished, either in person or in estates or in other property for the crimes and trespasses of his father, and vice versa.¹⁰⁵

57 Furthermore, bishops, chapters, abbots, provosts, convents and other propertied ecclesiastics may not acquire any estate, with three letters of inquiry concerning the estates to be acquired, unless the royal majesty examines them and gathers information through trusted men selected by him, about the case among the nobles and men of the church, and unless letters of privilege from the royal majesty or judges acting on his behalf are granted, just as, according to our knowledge, these things were done and ordered in the time of the late lord King Louis.¹⁰⁶

58 Then, it was ordered moreover that anyone who shows contempt of the court shall be immediately condemned to a fine of twenty-five marks, to be exacted without exception, as the decree of the late most serene lord Emperor Sigismund states on this subject.¹⁰⁷

59 Then, it was ordered that small convents especially that of Szentjobb, must cease from issuing letters and these shall be without authority.¹⁰⁸

60 Then, it was ordered that the royal majesty is required to appoint in every county, with the counsel and will of the lord prelates and barons, a baron or other respected and wealthy propertied man who seems to be able and suitable to the post of county ispán; and the latter must also select a respected man from that county but not from elsewhere as alispán or alispáns. And all of them must swear an oath according to the model form written below; the ispán before the king, the ispáns in the county itself.¹⁰⁹

¹⁰⁵ Cf. 1351:19.

¹⁰⁶ Cf. 1351:20.

¹⁰⁷ Cf. 1435/I:7.

¹⁰⁸ The right to authentication was taken from a number of lesser convents already in 1351:3, repeated in 1397:28. The expressly named Benedictine convent of Siniob/Szentjobb—founded in the late eleventh century, and for a while guardian of the arm-relic of St. Stephen; hence its name which means the Holy Right Hand—recovered its right to act as a place of authentication only through the offices of John Vitéz, in the 1450s administrator of the abbey, and retained it even under its subsequent administrator, Peter of Várad, until the latter's falling out of grace (see I. Bodor, “Reneszánsz stíluselemek a Mohács előtti magyar pecséteken” [Renaissance stylistic elements on pre-Mohács Hungarian seals], Művészettörténeti Értesítő 31 (1982): 104 n. 10). That Szentjobb was given royal commission just a few days after the issue of the present decree, on 1 February 1486, which was duly performed and reported to the king (MNL OL DI 46035), shows that such a decree needed some time to be observed.

¹⁰⁹ The point of this paragraph was to assure that every county had its own ispán, preferably from the local nobility with an alispán likewise from there, while the king tended to name his retainers from the court to head several counties who then—in contravention of this article—frequently appointed men of their own choice from outside the region as vicecomites, see Kubinyi, “A megyésispánok” pp. 169-79. — For the formula of the oath, see below, Art. 73 (going back to the Decretum Maius of Sigismund).

61 Then, it often happens that soldiers on campaigns break into churches, without regard to fear of God or men, for food, victuals, and other things taken there by tenant peasants for the reason of safety,¹¹⁰ and they steal from there not only necessary victuals, but also all other properties of the tenant peasants and commit unpunished other terrible deeds, too horrible to describe. Thus, in order to curb their rashness and detestable licentiousness, it was ordered that henceforth no one at all, be he cavalryman or foot-soldier, while on campaign with the army or otherwise, should dare to force open the doors of churches or to desecrate the churches in any way or to take away food or other things from there with force. And if henceforth anyone contravenes this, and if the captain of such companies is a nobleman, he shall be deprived of all of his property rights as well as his other properties, and these shall devolve immediately upon the royal treasury and shall be regarded as such.¹¹¹ However, if the violators of the decree are not noblemen, then they shall be condemned,¹¹² and it is the duty of the captain-general of the army to carry out this execution. If he fails to do so or violates this decision himself, the royal majesty, after being informed, shall order the execution by his grace, love of justice, and inborn clemency. And if the soldiers belong to his royal majesty, he shall reconcile the church, and if they belong to others, then he, whom they belong to, shall make such a reconciliation. It is added that if such soldiers are short of food, the parish priest or the reeve or the village judge of the place must open the church and, in the presence of a person designated for this by the captain of the troops, give food from the church to the people at a fair and proper price and payment.

62 Then, that troops of this sort on their march should not at any time dare either to billet in the houses of noblemen or to take with force the goods and chattels of the tenant peasants or rustics from the houses and residences of the nobles. The violators of this law shall be immediately condemned with the same sentence as the profaners of churches.

63 Moreover, it has come to our knowledge that archdeacons, subdeacons, and parish priests, out of insatiability not being satisfied with their just and decent revenue, established such a wretched and outside this kingdom unheard-of abuse, especially in the county of Somogy, that should it transpire that someone is killed in whatever way, even if he dies testate, they refuse burial in the church and even in the cemetery until, in addition to all the burial fees and other matters customary in such cases according to the various local customs, a silver mark or four golden pieces

¹¹⁰ It was general practice to use the parish church—quite often the only stone building in the village—as a safe storage place for foodstuff and valuables, see Szabó, A középkori magyar falu, pp. 195-97.

¹¹¹ Measures against plundering troops were passed several times before, beginning with 1279:9, 1298:10, 1427A and also in 1458:18, 1464:28, 1471:21. However, the punishment prescribed here and in the following paragraph is more severe than the earlier ones were, although the king—supreme commander of the soldiery—hardly intended to enforce it. These measures aimed at winning the support of lesser nobles, often the victims of the soldateska's plundering.

¹¹² The word “to burn” here means merely “to condemn,” and is probably derived from the ordeal by hot iron, where the person “burned” was found guilty; see Bartal, Glossarium, p. 142. The verb (comburare) and derived noun (combustio) are so used in other, similar documents: see (e.g.) Marko Kostrenđić (ed.), Lexicon Latinitatis medii nevi Iugoslaviae, 1: 248 (Zagreb: Academy of Sciences, 1973).

are paid.¹¹³ Therefore, since these practices can be regarded not only as abuse and corruption but also, correctly, as a kind of sacrilege and simony, it was ordered by the present decree that henceforth this kind of exaction should cease and be abolished in perpetuity everywhere, and especially in the said county of Somogy, and no archdeacon, subdeacon, and parish priest or his vicar shall dare, under the penalty of losing their prebend, to extort it, as had been cancelled and abolished by apostolic bulls in the county of Somogy in the times of the late majestic lord Charles, king of Hungary, etc. upon the request and urging of the same lord king, as was made clearly evident from the bulls publicly recited in the present meeting of the gentlemen of the realm.¹¹⁴

64 Then, since the community of nobles often sends envoys and elected nobles from the counties to his majesty, either in matters of the county or upon the royal majesty's command, but there are many lords, both ecclesiastics and laymen, as well as nobles, abbots, provosts, chapters, and convents who are unwilling to pay, in accordance with their wealth, for the expenses of such envoys and elected men as others do,¹¹⁵ and they absolutely avoid contributing to such expenses, causing obvious and considerable injustice to the community of nobles and especially to those who are not so well-off, therefore, it was ordered by the present decree that henceforth men of property, each and every one of them, whatever their station or wherever they dwell, are required to pay and cause to be paid to the community the expenses set by the community from their properties and estates, in appropriate proportion or share, with the exception of those lord prelates, barons, and other men of property who are individually and personally invited by letter to the royal majesty at the time of a diet.¹¹⁶ However, when it concerns a matter of the county, everyone shall contribute. The ispán of the said county shall and must force the unyielding to obey even under the penalty of the fine customary in such cases, namely three light-weight marks.¹¹⁷

65 Then, since litigant parties and many others who are going to a lawsuit in the county court of the nobles of various counties usually enter with their armed noble retainers and tenant peasants,

¹¹³ Cf. 1351: 2, 1397: 27, and 1439: 34, where this practice is prohibited in general. Why exactly Co. Somogy was singled out in this article is not known.

¹¹⁴ The bull of Pope Benedict XII, Cum contingit interdum, was issued on 13 August 1335, but does not refer to Co. Somogy; see Knauz-Bebek, Monumenta Strigoniensia, 3: 265, No. 399. It is worth noting that a copy of the bull (one of which is still preserved in the archives of the cathedral chapter at Esztergom, No. 44, 2, 5) was apparently available at the time of the diet and presented to the assembly. This is a rare evidence of the use of archival records in the deliberations of a Hungarian diet.

¹¹⁵ Regular county taxation did not become practice until the seventeenth century, but occasional local levies were collected, e. g., for the expenses of palatinal courts of justice or of deputies' travel to the diet. In one instance, János Hunyadi had to order the officers of Co. Szabolcs to pay the travel costs of the deputies, see Ferenc Eckhart, Magyar alkotmány- és jogtörténet [History of Hungarian law and constitution]. (Budapest: Politzer, 1946), p. 111.

¹¹⁶ Matthias issued an order in this spirit to the city of Košice on 5 April 1487 (MNL OL DI Film 270638) specifying that they do not have to make any payment to the county, for they are travelling on the king's behest. Apparently the same nobles had to pay for other expenses, if the trip was not made on the king's invitation.

¹¹⁷ There were two kinds of Marks, the heavy, equal 4 gold florins, and the lightweight one, equal one florin.

if they can, with a great number of them, and try to intimidate others with arms and multitude; therefore, it was decided in order to ensure that everyone can enter such a court calmly, freely, without fear or sense of danger, and stay there decently, peacefully, and without any hindrance, on the one hand, and in order that it may not appear that among arms justice and laws are silent,¹¹⁸ on the other, that nobles, as well as their noble retainers and tenant peasants when they are about to enter the county court shall leave all their weapons of whatever sort at their lodgings and shall enter the court unarmed so that they may know that they should fight not with arms but with law. If non-nobles trespass this rule, the ispán shall take away their weapons and, moreover, shall put them in the stocks and leave there hungry and thirsty for two days and as many nights. And if the trespasser is a nobleman the ispán shall take his weapon in the same way and also exact from him one heavy-weight mark.

66 Then, because many cases of killing, wounding, beating of men, many quarrels and innumerable different troubles occur at fairs and weekly markets and also in taverns, as anger always takes up arms;¹¹⁹ therefore, in order to stop henceforth such troubles with suitable measures, it was similarly ordered under the same penalty that each and everyone, be he of whatever station, who is going to a fair, a market or a tavern shall put down all his weapons in his lodgings¹²⁰ and shall go to buy and sell, and drink unarmed, and should dwell and sojourn there.

67 Then, as it is clearly stated in the preceding articles what the county ispáns are to do while administering justice, therefore, in order to enable them to fulfill their duty properly and without any hindrance, it was decided and ordered that those who revolt against the ispán or the alispán during such administration and dare to interfere with him by force and compel him not to administer the justice that he is supposed to, they shall be condemned – as soon as the truth of the matter is known – for taint of infidelity. And if they are servants or tenant peasants, their lords must give and hand them over, under the penalty of twenty-five marks, into the hands of the ispán so they can obtain their deserved punishment and they ought and must as well, according to the custom of the realm, prove their innocence, namely, that it was not committed in accord with their will and instructions. And if the servants or tenant peasants, flee after committing the crime, the ¹¹⁸ Cf. Cicero, Pro Milone 11: silent enim leges inter arma...; Albinovanus Pedo, Ad Liviam 185 (= Livy 34.6.6.). The Ciceronian formulation became a commonplace in Latin literature (cf. August Otto, Die Sprichwörter der Römer, Leipzig: Teubner, 1890, p. 192); what is notable is the clear correspondence of the present text with Cicero, suggesting direct knowledge of the Ciceronian oration.

¹¹⁹ A phrase from (ultimately) Vergil, Aeneid 1.150.

¹²⁰ This medieval Hungarian version of the rule about “leave your guns outside the saloon” is surprising only in that it did not find its way into earlier Hungarian decrees. On the other hand, this decree suggests a serious attempt at an over-all regulation of social conflicts, covering a much wider field than, for example, Sigismund's Decretum Maius. This prohibition against arms in a social setting has many parallels: for example, the Roman tradition that no command could be given to the army within the city's limits (the pomerium), hence, in theory, citizens inside the city should be unarmed (Aulus Genius Attic Nights 15.275; Theodor Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht vol. 3, (Leipzig: Hirzel, 1888), pp. 386-87).

ispán, because of the insult inflicted, shall cause them to be hunted down, but nevertheless their lords must, as we said above, prove their own innocence.¹²¹

68 Then, because the judges ordinary are often talked about and a great many people are in doubt who are those justices and who are meant by them, therefore we clearly state here, that judges ordinary are: first of all, the palatine, then the judge royal and finally, if he is present, the secret chancellor, and if he is not, then his deputy, that is, the one who keeps the king's judicial seal at that time.¹²² They are called judges ordinary, because they can try any case, and they and their deputies are the only ones who can enter a court without being invited and can summon others, if they want to, for testimony or for any other matter. And the following persons, that is, the Master of the Treasury, the chief seneschal, the ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia, and the voivode of Transylvania are not to be regarded judges ordinary, therefore they cannot and need not enter the royal majesty's judicial court without being invited.¹²³ However, those of them who are judges and sworn officials, if they wish to enter voluntarily at any time, whether the royal majesty is present or not, they shall be admitted and given a place of honor. Their protonotaries and judicial deputies shall be similarly admitted. However, they ought not, without the permission and approval of the said three judges ordinary summon anyone to the same court. It is here stated expressly that the aforementioned judges ordinary can freely pass sentences in any case without the others even in the absence of the royal majesty. We decreed, in order that the judicial trials be conducted with honesty, graveness, and maturity, that is, without any noise, clamor, disorder, and disturbance, that the doors of the court shall be always kept open and no one shall dare to enter without being invited.¹²⁴ Trespassers shall be punished as elsewhere decreed, that is of one hundred golden pieces, for which they shall be immediately arrested and kept in the ruined tower until they pay the sum.¹²⁵

¹²¹ Cf. 1462:2, where, however, the fine is different and the procedure simpler.

¹²² See above, Art. 18.

¹²³ This systematic description of the high justices of the realm goes back to the 1430s, when the urban appeal court of the Master of the Treasury went out of court and settled in the city of Buda, reducing thus the circle of the royal high justices to the ones named here. The courts of the voivode and the bans were always separate from the central royal courts of justice; cf. Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445, (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 400-1.

¹²⁴ The usual arrangement was that the cases were “called out” at which time the parties could enter the room where the court tried the case; however, since the proceedings were to be “public,” the doors were kept open, only the entry restricted to the interested parties and authorized persons, in order to avoid disturbance; see Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet. pp. 228-34.

¹²⁵ The Ruined Tower was the name of the dungeon in Castle Buda; see András Kubinyi, “Rabok feliratai a budai Csonkatoronyban” [Prisoners' inscriptions in the Ruined Tower of Buda], Budapest régiségei 18 (1958): 519-25.

69 Then, it is a custom among advocates that they accept cases of many people for gain and they defend them negligently and do not care if their clients are fined mainly because by ancient custom these fines were used to be exacted during the time of general assizes. Since these general assizes, however, as we mentioned above, are now abolished and never be held again,¹²⁶ therefore, it was ordered that henceforth no advocate should dare to accept and handle the case of more than fourteen people.¹²⁷ And if someone is condemned to fines, these shall be immediately exacted after the end of the trial and the decision of the case, from the properties and estates of the client both for the judge and for the opposing party.¹²⁸

70 Then, that any case or lawsuit started in any matter or case shall be prosecuted, treated, and ended according to the judicial order and process which was customary until now, that is, in a way that the aforementioned articles shall be regarded as made for future cases and not for the past.¹²⁹

71 Then, it was decided that if persons of whatever station, be they ecclesiastic or laymen, should plead that their letters of privilege were taken away by Turks, Czechs, Poles, Germans or by other enemies and fiends, or that they were burnt or lost, or if one of the ecclesiastics should state that his church was in the hands of laymen for a long time, as sometimes happens, and he was then deprived by the laymen of his rights and letters of privilege or otherwise defrauded, then these people, upon the written order of the royal majesty or upon the call of other judges ordinary can prove with the nobles of the county where those properties are located for which the loss of rights and letters of privilege are argued, regarding things going back in time approximately sixty years, that this is the way it happened, such confirmation and noble testimony shall be always accepted, and regarded in all courts as a complete and authentic privilege.¹³⁰

¹²⁶ See above, Art. 1.

¹²⁷ The connection between the limitation of one lawyer's clients and the abolition of the general assizes seems tenuous, but one may conjecture that it had something to do with the collection of fines. Previously, if advocates, taking too many clients, performed their task laxly and their clients were fined, this may not have caused major harm because payment was not due until the next general assizes. With the new regulation fines were collected right away, thus a careless advocate put his client at an immediate disadvantage. Cf. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet, pp. 174-80, 446-47; Eckhart, Magyar alkotmány- és jogtörténet, pp. 389-91; E. Varga, "A hivatásos ügyvédi osztály kialakulása" [Development of the professional class of advocates], in Domanovszky Emlekkönyv, pp. 625-42; András Kubinyi, "'Írástudás és értelmiségi foglalkozásúak a Jagelló korban'" [Literacy and professionals in the Jagiello age], Magyar Herald 1 (1984): 186-208.

¹²⁸ See above, Art. 52.

¹²⁹ The principle of excluding the retroactive validity of a law is, of course, a Roman legal tradition going back to the earliest Roman law code, the XII Tables of the mid-fifth century B.C., which stipulated that new legislation (on a given topic) replaced any earlier pertinent legal enactment; legislation therefore began ab initio and was thus not (in general) retroactive: see Livy 7.17.12 (cf. 9.34.6-7); Wolfgang Kunkel, An Introduction to Roman Legal and Constitutional History ed. 2 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973), pp. 23-34. Bónis (Közepkori jogunk, p. 79) points out this article as another proof of the influence of learned law on this decree.

¹³⁰ Cf. 1464: 20; the sovereignty of the noble assembly in the county to decide about matters of property and privilege was a cardinal feature of medieval Hungarian culture; cf. Erik Fügedi, "Verba volant... Oral

72 Then, that laymen shall not be condemned more severely in cases against ecclesiastics than the ecclesiastics are in cases against laymen.¹³¹

73 Then, it was decided and ordered in accordance with the decree of the late most serene lord Emperor Sigismund, in order to remove from everyone's heart all anxious suspicion that could arise against the judges and the justices of the realm, as well as against the ispáns, alispáns, noble magistrates and the elected nobles and other officials, that all the judges and justices, both the ecclesiastics and the laymen who are elected or appointed palatine, judge royal, Master of the Treasury, chancellor or vice-chancellor, or protonotaries or deputies of the aforementioned judges, ban of Slavonia, voivode of Transylvania, and ispán and noble magistrate of any county or designated as their deputies, shall take an honest oath in the presence of the royal majesty, when being inaugurated, to keep their allegiance and administer justice. The alispáns and the noble magistrates, however, must take their oath before their county.

The model form of the oath is the following: I, So and So, swear by the living God and by the glorious mother of God, Virgin Mary, and by all the saints and elect of God that I shall administer just and proper judgment, justice and execution according to my ability to all who litigate before me and in every case belonging to my office, to every person, to rich and to poor without selection, putting aside and disregarding any request, prize, favor, fear, hatred, love and compliments, as I understand should be done in accordance with God and His justice. So help me God and all the saints!¹³²

74 Then, in order to avoid disagreement regarding the charges for redeeming the letters issued by chapters and convents as well as for travel expenses and for the trouble of the witnesses of the chapters or convents, it was decided that in this matter those tariffs shall be kept that were defined in the times of the late most serene lord Emperor Sigismund and were confirmed by the royal majesty on the occasion of his happy coronation.¹³³ (=8 March 1435: 10.)

75.¹³⁴ And in order that the causes for disagreement, which until now frequently arose regarding the charges for redeeming letters issued by chapters or convents, as well as for travel expenses so that the trouble of the witnesses of the chapters or convents should cease to exist in the future and Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility," in Idem, Kings, Bishops, &c ch. VI, pp. 9-10. The stipulation of sixty years as the reasonable "memory of men" is an interesting hint at collective memory, clearly counting on transmission of memorable events (such as introduction, perambulatio, and so on) to a second generation.

¹³¹ Cf. Art. 28, above and its predecessors.

¹³² Almost verbatim identical with 1435/I:1

¹³³ 114. Cf. 1435/I: 10 and 1458: 35 (Matthias confirmed Sigismund's decree already at his enthronization, not at the 1464 coronation). After the introductory words the decree repeats verbatim Sigismund's ordinance on the tariffs continued in Art. 75 and 76.

¹³⁴ This article is almost verbatim borrowed from 8 March 1435: 10. This Sigismundian list remained a point of reference for a long time. The detailed list indicates all the legal transactions in which the witnesses of the places of authentication (see n. 20, above) had to participate.

be eliminated, we order by the present ordinance, following old and, indeed, honorable custom, that in all places of authentication, both chapters and convents, for each letter of summons, that is the first, second, and third, 24 pennies of the larger coin¹³⁵ are to be paid and rendered to the convent or chapter, together with their notary and scribe, for redemption of the letter.

Then, for any letter of final summons, 100 pennies.

Then, for any letter of advocacy, 24 pennies.

Then, for any letter of prohibition, protest, or similar document, if issued as letters patent, 24 pennies, if close, 12 pennies.

Then, for any letter of record, if issued as privilege, 100 pennies, if letters patent, 24 pennies, if close, 12 pennies.

Then, for any letter of inquest, whether patent or close, 24 pennies.

Then, for copies of ancient deeds retrieved from the archives, 100 pennies for the guardian or the retriever and for the redemption of the retrieved charter; if there was not too much writing and it was issued as letters patent, 24 pennies; but if the task of copying is extensive and it was issued as a privilege, then 100 pennies.

Then, for simple transcripts or for transcripts issued as letters patent for which the task of copying is not great, 24 pennies, but where the writing was long and was issued as a privilege, 100 pennies.

Then, for letters of institution when contradiction was made, 24 pennies, and for letters of institution in perpetual possession without contradiction, a redemption of the letter is to be paid according to the size of the property and the number of plots in the following manner: namely, for one, two, three, or four plots, 100 pennies; where there will be more than four plots but fewer than ten, for each plot 33 pennies; where there will be more than ten but fewer than twenty, for every plot, 24 pennies; where there will be more than twenty plots up to a hundred, for each plot 12 pennies; and where there will be any number of plots above a hundred, 8 pennies for each plot.

Then, for letters of inspection of boundaries, when no contradiction or summoning will be made, 24 pennies; but in the case of inspection of boundaries with simple conscription, or when similarly a simple conscription and final designation of boundaries is made with a royal bailiff sent from the court and an oath is sworn on the soil¹³⁶ in proper legal form or with the consent of the parties, for ¹³⁵ Moneta maior refers to the silver coins (denarii), the exchange rate of which was regulated in 1427B. Additional measures relating to these coins were passed both by the king and, in his absence, by the royal council in 1430 and 1432; see F. Döry et al. DRH, pp. 251–57. However, the new coins were soon displaced by debased emissions. In the 1430s, the actual small coin in circulation was the quarting, initially worth a quarter of denarius but by the end of Sigismund's reign 6000–8000 of them were worth a florin (instead of 400). Under such circumstances the regulation of fines and fees in stable money was most necessary.

¹³⁶ If one can trust later evidence, such an oath was quite a ceremony. The witness to the ownership of a piece of land (or to its being part of a community) stood in a pit, raised his three fingers and swore to his life on the condition of the disputed land. It was eternalized by a famous ballad of the poet János Arany, the redemption of the letter 400 pennies. Where, however, the case is sent to the royal court because the parties do not agree in such an inspection of boundaries, for the redemption of such letters, 200 pennies.

Then, for common inquests by judicial procedure, 100 pennies. Then, for the inspection of seizure of estates, 100 pennies.

Then, for seizing the properties of men sentenced to capital punishment and the confiscation of their chattels on court order, the chapter receives according to ancient custom the tenth of things taken away; and for redemption of the letter, 100 pennies.

Then, for estimations of estates on court order, 100 pennies.

Then, for the divisions of estates, 100 pennies from each divided estate. Then, for proof of an oath, 24 pennies.

Then, for proof of an oath containing the names of the oath-helpers, 100 pennies.

Then, from amounts paid in the presence, or with the testimony of chapters or convents, the chapter or convent has no right to take a tenth or ninth unless when such an amount is deposited in their sacristy or safekeeping because of a disagreement between the parties; from those payments they can rightfully receive a tenth and ninth at the expense of that party which caused that the amount had to be deposited in this way.

The men of the chapters and convents taken as witnesses should receive for every day which they spend on the business of authentication, 12 larger pennies, whether they ride their own horses or are taken and led on the horses of the parties; thus, they and their horses and servants are to be taken from and led home on the victuals and expenses of those in whose case they were summoned.

76¹³⁷ Besides, because the issuance of letters and their redemption frequently occur in course of normal trials in our royal court by the judges ordinary and their aforementioned notaries, in order to prevent occasions in which argument can arise between the notary and the litigants, we regarded it advisable to declare the old custom of the redemption of these letters in the following way,¹³⁸ namely, that for letters of prorogation, 12 pennies must be paid to the notary of the court of judgment;

“The false witness” (1852); see Márta Belényesy, “Le serment sur la terre au moyen age et ses traditions posterieures en Hongrie,” Acta Ethnographica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 4 (1955) 361–394.

¹³⁷ This list of payments is borrowed from 8 March 1435:11 and was referred to several times later as well.

¹³⁸ These fees reflect old received practice of the courts; they were summarily regulated earlier in a charter of Sigismund of 21 July 1417 (F. Döry et al. DRH, pp. 235–7).

for a letter of judgment or fine, also 12 pennies; for an ordinary letter of inquest, also 12 pennies; for a second letter of summons, 24 pennies; for a third letter of summons, 100 pennies; for a letter of final summons, 100 pennies; for a letter on oaths taken, if the oath is granted to be sworn with two to five oath-helpers, 24 pennies;
from him who swears with twelve, twenty-five, or fifty oath-helpers, including himself, 100 pennies;
for a common inquest, 100 pennies;
for a letter on judicial combat, 200 pennies;
for a letter on capital oath, 200 pennies;
for the first presentation of legal instruments, 24 pennies;
for second or third presentations of legal instruments under specific penalty, similarly 24 pennies;
for letters of prorogation on summons to respond at 3 marks fine, 24 pennies; for letters patent of advocacy, 24 pennies;
for a common letter of record, 24 pennies; for other common letters, such as those of protest and similar ones, 24 pennies; for a letter of protest face-to-face, 100 pennies; for a letter of sentence in cases of act of might, to the keeper of the seal, 10 florins with 100 pennies each, and to the scribe, 200 pennies; for a letter of institution into estates and simple inspection of boundaries, 24 pennies; for a letter of sentence on the recovery of an estate or other things, the fee should be decided by agreement between the litigants and the protonotaries according to the size of the recovered estate or chattels..

77 No institution of properties, inspection and revision of boundaries is to be conducted otherwise than with the legal invitation of the neighbors and abutters of such an estate. And in order better to avoid fraud and deceit in such cases, the names of the individual neighbors and abutters who appear as principals during the said proceedings are to be written, one by one, into the letter issued by the chapter or convent about them.

78 Finally, it was decided that the royal majesty must cause all the articles, clauses, chapters, and points of the aforementioned orders to be kept inviolably by everyone. And he shall correct, punish, and chastise violators in such a way that the gentlemen of the realm, issuing these orders with the unanimous and concurrent will, counsel and mature deliberation of all of us, can render suitable gratitude to his royal majesty.

We, the aforementioned King Matthias, together with the aforementioned lord prelates, barons, lords, and other elected nobles representing the entire realm, attending us during the present general diet, after mature deliberation, with the counsel, will, and approval of the said lord prelates, barons, lords, and the whole realm, sanction, establish, validate, verify, and confirm these articles or chapters to be kept and remain perpetually as decree, statute, law, and written right for the entire said realm regarding all their content; and we oblige all our royal successors and also the entire realm to observe them, so that no part of them be ever changed or altered at any time, neither at the election or coronation of kings nor at the diets, namely the general or partial assemblies of the gentlemen of the realm, but rather all clauses and points shall be kept firm and intact.

For the memory and perpetual force of this matter, we have ordered with the will and counsel of the lord prelates, barons, nobles, and the whole realm, that to these articles, having been collected and incorporated into the present document, be affixed our secret seal that we use as king of Hungary.

Given in Buda, by the hand of the reverend father in Christ, lord John, bishop of the church of Oradea, private chancellor of our royal court,¹³⁹ our beloved servant, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and eighty-six, on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul the Apostle, in the twenty-ninth year of our reign as king of Hungary, etc. and in the seventeenth year as king of Bohemia.

When the reverend fathers in Christ and lords Ladislás Geréb, confirmed bishop-elect of Alba Iulia in Transylvania, legate of the Apostolic see,¹⁴⁰ the see of Esztergom being vacant, Peter, archbishop of Kalocsa,¹⁴¹ the bishop cardinal Gabriel of Eger,¹⁴² the said John of Oradea,¹⁴³ Oswald of Zagreb,¹⁴⁴ Sigismund of Pécs,¹⁴⁵ Urban, confirmed bishop-elect of Győr, our chief

¹³⁹ Vitéz (of Sredna), John (d. 1472) bishop of Oradea 1445-65, archbishop of Esztergom 1465-72, secret chancellor 1453-64, high chancellor 1464-71.

¹⁴⁰ Vingárti Geréb, Ladislás, bishop of Transylvania 1475–1501.

¹⁴¹ Váradi, Peter (d. 1501) archbishop of Kalocsa 1480-1501, secret chancellor 1479-84.

¹⁴² Rangoni, Gabriel (b. 1420, d. 1486) bishop of Transylvania 1472-75, of Eger 1475-86, chancellor 1472-86, cardinal 1477.

¹⁴³ Filipec, John (b. 1431, d. 1509) bishop of Oradea 1476-90, secret chancellor.

¹⁴⁴ Laki Túz, Oswald, bishop of Zagreb 1466–99.

¹⁴⁵ Ernuszt (of Csáktornya), Sigismund (d. 1504) bishop of Pécs 1477-1504, chief treasurer.

treasurer,¹⁴⁶ Albert of Veszprem,¹⁴⁷ John of Cenad,¹⁴⁸ Nicholas of Vác,¹⁴⁹ friar Gregory of Nitra,¹⁵⁰ John of Srem¹⁵¹ and Matthias bishop-elect of Bosnia¹⁵² were felicitously governing the churches of God. And when the honorable and respected Imre of Zapolya, perpetual ispán of Szepes and palatine of our said kingdom of Hungary,¹⁵³ count Stephen Bátori, our judge royal and voivode of Transylvania,¹⁵⁴ Matthias Geréb, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia,¹⁵⁵ Lawrence, duke of Újlak, ban of Mačva,¹⁵⁶ Andrew Szakolyi¹⁵⁷ and Francis Haraszi¹⁵⁸ bans of Severin, Ladislas Paksi, Master of the Royal Treasury,¹⁵⁹ William, count of Zagorje, Master of the Table,¹⁶⁰ George Thuróci, Master of the Cupbearers,¹⁶¹ Ladislas Ország of Gút, Master of the Royal Horse,¹⁶² Paul Kinizsi, ispán of Temes,¹⁶³ Nicholas Bánfi of Lendva, ispán of Pozsony,¹⁶⁴ and many others held comital and other offices of our realm.¹⁶⁵

¹⁴⁶ Nagylucsei, Urban (d. 1491) bishop of Győr 1481-86, of Eger 1486-91, lord chief treasurer 1479-90.

¹⁴⁷ Vetési, Albert (d. 1486) bishop of Nitra 1457-58, of Veszprém 1459-86.

¹⁴⁸ Szokoli (or Szakolyi), John (fl. 1459-93) bishop of Cenad 1466-93.

¹⁴⁹ Bátori, Nicholas (d. 1506) bishop of Srem 1468-74, of Vác 1474-1506.

¹⁵⁰ Gregory, friar, bishop of Nitra 1486-91.

¹⁵¹ Vitéz, John, junior (d. 1499) bishop of Srem 1483-89, of Veszprém 1490-99.

¹⁵² Várdai, Matthias (fl. 1460-88) bishop of Bosnia 1486-88.

¹⁵³ Zapolya (a. k. a. Zápolya, Szapolyai), Imre of (d. 1487) chief treasurer 1459-64, governor of Bosnia, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1464-65, ispán of Spiš 1465, count palatine 1486-87.

¹⁵⁴ Bátori, Stephen, judge royal 1471–1493, voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely 1479–1493.

¹⁵⁵ Geréb (of Vingárd), Matthias (fl. 1461-92) ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1483-89.

¹⁵⁶ Újlaki, Lawrence, duke (d. 1524) son of King Nicholas, ban of Mačva 1477-92, judge royal 1518–24.

¹⁵⁷ Szokoli (or Szakolyi), Andrew (fl. 1480-91) ban of Severin 1486-90

¹⁵⁸ Haraszi, Francis (d. 1522) ban of Severin 1480-90.

¹⁵⁹ Paksi, Ladislas (fl. 1476-87) master of the treasury 1482-87.

¹⁶⁰ Zagorje, William count of (fl. 1463-96) master of the stewards 1482-89

¹⁶¹ Thuróci, George, master of the cellarers 1488–92.

¹⁶² Gúti Ország, Ladislas master of the horse 1484–1492.

¹⁶³ Kinizsi, Paul, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of the kingdom, 1478–1494.

¹⁶⁴ Bánfi (of Alsólendva), Nicholas (d. 1500) ispán of Pozsony Co. 1466-87, master of the doorkeepers 1490-1500.

¹⁶⁵ Such lists of spiritual and secular officeholders have been attached to most of the privilegial charters ever since the mid-thirteenth century.

JAGELLONIAN HUNGARY (1490–1526)

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF 1492 (2 FEBRUARY ?)

Even though on 15 July 1490, the diet elected Wladislas (II) Jagello and on July 31 he accepted the election conditions at Farkashida (Vlčkovce in Slovakia, earlier Farkašin; German: Farkaschin, Wolfsbruck)—see: András Kubinyi, “Die Wahlkapitulationen Wladislaws II. in Ungarn (1490),” in: Rudolf Vierhaus (ed.), Herrschaftsverträge, Wahlkapitulationen, Fundamentalgesetze, pp. 140–62 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck u. Ruprecht, 1977), text in Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest.: Athenaeum, 1901), pp. 307-11; repr. in János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 152-4—and on 18 September of the same year was crowned in Székesfehérvár, no coronation decree is known. Although the issue of such a decretum has been argued on the basis of charter references by Tibor Neumann, “II. Ulászló koronázása és első rendeletei; egy ismeretlen országgyűlésről és koronázási dekrétumról” [The coronation and first ordinances of Wladislas II: on an unknown diet and coronation decree], Századok 142 (2008) 317--37), no original or copy survived, thus the decree of 1492 remains the first known piece of legislation of the king.

A diet opened in Buda on February 2 1492 after the king’s return from an important peace treaty with the Habsburgs. and ended before 27 March. The decree with 108 articles and—a unique case—eleven special articles for Slavonia is referred to as “Decretum maius,” even though it is less systematic collection of decision than the ones of Sigismund and Matthias so called, but contains a great number of their decretal, mostly in verbatim repetition. At the end some articles are clearly in response to single complaints of the estates.

This decretum, as several others of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted them here. Moreover, we omitted not only those that are verbatim identical of earlier legal texts (marked as =) but also those that are repeated with minor, stylistic, changes (marked as ≈). For the omitted articles, we added, for information’s sake, the rubrics of the Corpus Iuris, even though they are later additions.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: A copy on parchment in book form with seal pendant in the Hungarian National Archives, MNL OL DL. 39325.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 Budapest: Franklin, 1896. Pp. 472–562.

LIT: Tibor Neumann, “II. Ulászló koronázása”(as above); Idem, “Békekötés Pozsonyban, országgyűlés Budán ... “[Peace treaty in Pressburg – diet in Buda: a chapter of Jagiello-

Habsburg relations 1490-92] Századok 145 (2011) pp. 309-15; András Kubinyi, Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagellonenzeit, in: Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer 1998) pp. 323-66.

St. Ladislas presents Wladislas II and his children (Anna and Louis) to the Virgin Mary (1511-12)
Museum of Fine Arts, Budapest

DECRETUM PRIMUM WLADISLAI II. REGIS DE ANNO 1492

Commissio propria domini regis.

Nos Wladislaus, dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, necnon Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux, marchioque Moravie et Lusacie etc. significamus tenore presencium, quibus expedit, universis: Quod cum post obitum serenissimi principis condam domini Mathie regis, predecessoris nostri bone memorie, atque exinde post vocacionem et assumptionem nostram ad regimen huius regni Hungarie superna dispositione factam multas et gravissimas hostilitates, que cervicibus huius regni incubuerant, maximas eciam domesticas simultates et interna dissidia, que omnia iam hoc regnum in ultimum periculum trahere et precipitare videbantur, divino auxilioⁱ consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum eiusdem regni nostri conplanassemus, et facta atque inita pace et concordia sub certis condicionibus primum cum serenissimo principe domino Maximiliano, Romanorum rege etc., qui preter ceteros periculo huius regni iminebat, aliis demum hostibus forensibus fuis fugatisque, domesticis vero et intestinis bellis differentiisque et dissensionibus sedatis, omnia in pacem concordiamque reduxissemus, placuit tandem eisdem dominis prelati et baronibus regni, ut pro habendis tractatibus pro eorum ceterorumque regnicolarum futura quiete necessariis ad festum Purificacionis beatissime Marie virginis proxime preteritum unam dietam seu convencionem generalem ad hanc civitatem nostram Budensem universitati regnicolarum nostrorum indiceremus. Cum itaque convenissent et plurima pro felici statu eiusdem regni tractassent et ordinassent, inter alios tractatus aliasque dispositiones nonnullos tandem nobis articulos de antiquis legibus, decretis et consuetudinibus eiusdem regni excerptos et communi omnium consilio et deliberacione relectos et de novo eciam pro temporis conditione et rerum statu conceptos obtulerunt, supplicantes humiliter, ut articulos huiusmodi ratos, gratos et acceptos habere atque pro eisdem et ceterorum regnicolarum consolacione totiusque regni quiete regia nostra auctoritate approbare, autorizare et confirmare dignaremur. Quorum quidem articulorum series sequitur in hunc modum:

I. Inprimis quod regia maiestas regnum Hungarie cum ceteris regnis, scilicet Dalmacie, Croacie, Slavonie et partibus Transsilvanis ac provinciis sibi subiectis dominosque prelatos et barones, omnes ecclesias ecclesiasticasque personas ac nobiles et civitates, necnon ceteros incolas et inhabitatores eorundem regnorum et parcium Transsilvanarum conservabit in antiquis iuribus, privilegiis, immunitatibus et consuetudinibus approbatis, in quibus scilicet per divos condam reges conservati quibusque gavis et usi fuerunt, ita quod nullas prorsus novitates, quemadmodum quondam dominus Mathias rex, in eorundem detrimentum et oppressionem et contra huiuscemodi antiquas libertates ipsorum sub aliquo quesito colore introducat, introductas vero per eundem condam serenissimum dominum Mathiam regem aboleat. Contribucionem autem seu taxam unius

ⁱ auxilio desideratur

floreni nulla ratione exigit, sed antiquis iustis, ordinariis et consuetis proventibus regalibus sit contenta

II. Item quod bona et alia quecumque iura aliorum per condam dominum Mathiam regem felicis recordacionis et reginalem maiestatem ac eciam per alios quoscumque male et preter viam iuris usque ad hec tempora quomodocumque ocupata visis et examinatis iuribus talium remittat et faciat eciam per alios remitti hiis, quorum exstiterunt.

III. Item quod coronam regni a manibus dominorum prelatorum et baronum nulla causa vel quesito colore, nulla eciam industria vel arte auferat, sed permittat et paciatur, quod iuxta veterem consuetudinem ac libertatem ipsorum certi de medio eorum per ipsos unanimiter ad hoc eligendi et deputandi illam teneant et conservent, quodque castrum Wysegradiense pro conservacione ipsius corone ab antiquo deputatum ad manus ipsorum conservatorum eiusdem corone dari et assignari faciet.

IV. Item quod Moraviam necnon Slesiam et Lusaciam utramque a corona et regno Hungarie non alienabit, sed infra tempus redempcionis iuxta inscripciones et obligaciones alias in dieta Olomucensi factas ad ipsam coronam Hungarie semper tenebit. Et si forte maiestatem suam absque herede legitimo decedere contingeret, ita providebit in vita, quod eciam post obitum suum ab eadem corona et regno infra tempus redempcionis sub aliquo colore vel via non alienabuntur. Et insuper elaborabit et efficiet, quod sex civitates iuxta pacta et disposicionem in predicta dieta factam, instar illarum aliarum provinciarum, se eidem regno et corone Hungarie inscribent et obligabunt, et superinde literas eorum dabunt et emanari facient, illasque maiestas sua ad domum thavernicalem corone Hungarie reponi et assignari faciet. Si vero successu temporum prefata dominia a corona et regno Hungarie, per illos, quibus iuxta inscripciones et obligaciones superinde factas competit, redimerentur, extunc illa totalis sumpma pecunie ad manus conservatorum corone ad Wysegrad penes coronam pro regni necessitate conservanda assignetur, tandemque ad defensionem et utilitatem regni iuxta voluntatem et consilium dominorum prelatorum et baronum exponatur et convertatur. Et de ipsa pecunia preter voluntatem et consilium ac liberum et expressum consensum eorundem dominorum prelatorum et baronum nulla ratione disponatur quitpiam vel agatur.

V. Item quod maiestas sua pro maiori parte in Hungaria maneat, ut comodius faciliusque regni necessitatibus consulere et providere possit.

VI. Item quod dum in Hungaria manebit, consiliarios, cancellarios, thesaurarium, cubicularios, dapiferum, pincernam, comites camerarios et generaliter omnes officiales maiores vel minores Hungaros teneat et habeat, prout eciam tempore condam serenissimi domini Ladislai regis felicis memorie consuetum et observatum exstitit.

VII. Item quod quando de rebus et negociis regni Hungarie aut parcium sibi subiectarum agetur, non cum aliis, preterquam cum Hungaris consiliariis tractet et consultet, et alios forenses aliasque naciones ad talem consultacionem non admittat.

VIII. Item quod wayvodatum Transsilvanensem et comitatum Siculorum ac Themesiensem, preterea banatum Sclavonie, Dalmacie et Croacie, necnon Zewreniensem, Nandoralbensem et de Jaycza aliaque loca et castra finitima, necnon civitates regales non aliis, preterquam Hungaris pro officiolatu regia maiestas dare et conferre valeat, bene tamen meritis.

IX. Item quod possessiones et iura possessionaria non forensibus, sed bene meritis, incolis tamen regni et corone Hungarie subiectis iuxta eorum merita et obsequia conferantur. Regia autem maiestas habeat liberam facultatem conferendi usque ad centum jobagiones proprio motu, quibuscumque voluerit; ultra autem centum conferat cum consilio prelatorum et baronum suorum, prout continetur in literis iuramentalibus sue maiestatis.

X. Item quod in celebracionibus octavarum iudices regni Hungarie ordinarii personaliter intersint, nisi ex causa legitima et arduis negociis regni prepediti fuerint vel alter illorum fuerit Ipsi autem vel eorum vices gerentes ac coassessores liberam, plenam et omnimodam habeant facultatem omnibus causantibus, maioribus et minoribus, cuiuscumque status et condicionis seu dignitatis existant, absque omni timore veram et sinceram iuxta regni antiquam et approbatam consuetudinem iusticiam aministrandi. Et quod regia maiestas vel domini prelati et barones neminem iudicum compellant vel astringant in favorem alicuius consuetudines et communem observanciam ac iuris ordinem immutare seu perturbare.

XI. Item quod ad simplicem querelam vel sinistram suggestionem regia maiestas neminem regnicolarum suorum, cuiuscumque status seu condicionis, existat, in personis, possessionibus seu quibuscumque rebus aliquo modo preter viam iuris et parte non audita impediatur.

XII. Item quod regia maiestas neque motu proprio, neque ad quorumcumque delacionem contra quempiam regnicolarum, cuiuscumque status seu dignitatis, aliquam occasionem nocendi sive in personis, sive in rebus concipiat et exquirat.

XIII. Item quod regia maiestas neminem regnicolarum sine prelatorum et baronum consilio nota seu crimine infidelitatis dampnare valeat.

XIV. Item quod universa castra, castella, opida, ville seu possessiones et piscine ac queque iura possessionaria per quoscumque post obitum condam serenissimi domini Mathie regis a sese qualitercumque occupata infra festum Ascensionis domini proxime venturum sub nota perpetue infidelitatis eisdem, a quorum manibus occupata sunt, per eosdem occupatores remittantur. Ubi vero ipsi occupatores contrarium facere ausu temerario presumpserint, extunc ipsi occupatores violenti per regium aut palatinalem, vel iudicis curie regie ac capituli et conventus homines illi comitatu deservientes, in quo huiusmodi iura possessionaria, puta castra, castella, opida, ville, necnon piscine seu queque iura possessionaria alia occupata haberentur personaliter amoniti, aut si personaliter reperiri nequeunt, de domo habitacionis ipsorum, in qua personalem facerent residenciam, amoniti remittere teneantur. Si autem casu in eodem contrarium facere attemptaverint, ad tricesimum secundum diem diei evocacionis exhinc fiende evocentur, et regia maiestas aut alii iudices ordinarii, quorum vel cuius auctoritate iidem occupatores amoniti et evocati fuerintⁱⁱ literas suas sentencionales contra tales, tamquam iudicialiter condemnatos dare et emanari, ac eas execucioni demandari facere, et nihilominus bona illa taliter occupata vigore eiusdem late sentencie a manibus illorum reoccupari et illis, quorum fuerunt, reddi; reliqua vero omnia bona talis violenti occupatoris, tamquam infidelis eadem regia maiestas liberam, cuicumque voluerit, conferendi habeat facultatem. Prius tamen maiestas sua de huiusmodi dampnis ex bonis et possessionibus occupatoris leso plenam impendere faciat satisfaccionem.

ⁱⁱ teneantur desideratur

XV. Item quod omnia castella seu fortalicia per quoscumque intra ambitum huius regni Hungarie et aliorum regnorum eidem subiectorum post obitum et mortem eiusdem domini Mathie regis, hoc tempore scilicet et ratione guerrarum erecta et ordinata, per hos, qui ea fecerunt et construxerunt, infra tempus prefixum sub premissa nota infidelitatis aboleantur et distrahantur, demptis dumtaxat illis, que pro defensione fidelium contra Thurcos et ceteros inimicos regni in confiniis regni erecta sunt et constructa. Quodsi quipiam ex eis ea distrahere nollent, extunc bona illa et possessiones, ubi dicta fortalicia erecta sunt, modo simili regia maiestas libere conferre valeat, quibuscumque voluerit, tamquam infidelium.

XVI. Item quia plures sunt in regno, qui post mortem condam domini Mathie regis temeritate propria aliis, in domibus eorum quiete morantibus, plurima dampna, nocumenta et iniurias irrogare et inferre presumpserunt, propterea statutum est, quod huiusmodi dampna, nocumenta et iniurias, sive in personis, sive in bonis et rebus quomodocumque passi in occasione talium dampnorum, nocumentorum et iniuriarum eos, qui irrogarunt, iudicio convenire et ab eisdem sua dampna, nocumenta et iniurias iure mediante reaquirere libere possint et valeant. Ita, quod postquam tales evocati fuerint, in primis octavis ex parte eorum absque qualibet dilacione iudicium aministretur.

XVII. Item quod regia dignitas pro tuicione regni et confiniorum ipsius conservacione hominibus suis, tam officiolatus eiusdem tenentibus, quam et aliis exercituantibus de stipendio regali dispositiones faciat, sicque regnicolas ipsi stipendiati exercituanes seu officiales confinia tenentes non predentur. Ubi autem ipsi exercituanes seu officiales ac stipendiarii regnicolas depredati fuerint, tunc tales pronuncientur instar aliorum patratorum actuum potenciariorum, ex parte quorum per iudices ordinarios regni iudicium et iusticia aministretur modo et ordine in articulo sexto immediate sequenti denotatis.

XVIII. Item quod exercitus generalis dominis prelati, baronibus, necnon regnicolis aliisque possessionatis cuiuscumque condicionis hominibus tamdiu, donec officiales et stipendiati regales exercituanes adversariis resistere poterunt, non proclametur. Dum vero necessitate urgente exercitum generalem proclamari contigerit, tunc iidem domini prelati et barones banderiatu regnique nobiles ultra metas et confinia regni ex quacumque parte eiusdem regni inviti more exercituancium non ducantur antiqua eorum libertate requirente, demptis illis, qui stipendia regalia levarent.

XIX. Item quod difficultatibus, que in modo exercituandi sepius evenire possent, via precludatur, declaratum est et statutum, quod quandocumque maiestas regia extra hoc regnum suum pro suo proprio comodo vel utilitate privata exercituare voluerit, tunc domini prelati et barones ac nobiles regni, ceterique possessionati homines inviti cum sua maiestate ire non teneantur, neque ipsorum homines mittere, et nec debeant quovis modo ad hoc compelli, nisi si officiales regie maiestatis fuerint, aut stipendium a maiestate sua ad huiusmodi exercitum levaverint. Quando autem contigerit, quod hostes aut inimici qualiscumque nacionis bello aut exercitu regnum hoc vel eius confinia hostiliter invaserint, interim, quosque officiales et stipendiarii regales huiusmodi hostibus et inimicis resistere sufficiunt, maiestas regia exercitum generalem indicere et promulgari facere non debeat. Verum si tanta fuerit hostium potencia, quod viribus dictorum officialium et stipendiariorum regalium illis resistere non sufficiens sit,ⁱⁱⁱ maiestas regia exercitum generalem necessario indicare et promulgari facere habebit. Si regia maiestas aut palatinus, vel generalis capitaneus regni pro tempore constitutus ad huiusmodi generalem exercitum personaliter proficiscetur, tunc etiam domini prelati et barones banderia habentes levatis banderiis eorum, ceteri vero barones et nobiles modo inferius declarato et ordinato ire teneantur usque ad metas et terminos regni et non extra, antiqua ipsorum libertate requirente, demptis, ut premissum est, officialibus et stipendiariis regalibus supradictis.

XX. Item quod in huiusmodi exercituali expeditione materia cuiuslibet contencionis et coaccionis excludatur, statutum est et ordinatum, quod sub unoquoque banderio integro quadringenti, sub medio vero ducenti homines exercituantes, pro una medietate armigeri, pro alia autem levis armature vulgo hwzarones nuncupati esse debeant Ceteri vero barones banderia non habentes iuxta honoris et facultatum ipsorum exigenciam ac numerum jobagionum ipsorum exercituare debebunt. Nobiles siquidem et ceteri possessionati homines minoris status de singulis viginti portis seu sessionibus jobagonalibus integris unum equitem decentem, nobiles autem unius sessionis, utputa jobagiones non habentes, de singulis decem domibus seu curiis similiter unum equitem exercituantem, adminus lanceam, clipeum ac arcum manualementem, et si fieri poterit, loricam etiam habentem mittere tenebuntur.

XXI. Item sunt etiam domini duces in hoc regno, videlicet illustrissimi domini Johannes Corvinus et Laurencius de Wylak, sunt preterea comites perpetui et liberi, utputa spectabiles et magnifici domini Stephanus de Zapolya terre Scepusiensis, necnon Johannes et Sigismundus de Bozyn et de Sancto Georgio cum fratribus eorum, ac comites de Frangapanibus et de Korbavia, qui instar baronum banderia habentium secundum exigenciam facultatum et numerum jobagionum ipsorum exercituare tenebuntur.

XXII. Domini si damna intulerunt; quomodo de his satisfactio impendatur?

Add Si autem huiusmodi dampna inferentes homines regni extranei vel forenses fuerint, ex parte talium regia maiestas plenam satisfaccionem impendere teneatur, servatis condicionibus prenotatis. Si qui autem voluerint eorum causam ratione huiusmodi damnorum in curia regia prosequi, valeant atque possint instar aliorum actuum potenciariorum. Ubi autem dampnificati falsum prestitisse in eo casu reperti fuerint iuramentum, tamquam falsarii, periuri^{iv} et calumpniatores puniantur.

XXIII. Nullæ gentes, post finitum bellum, in aliorum bona condescendant.

XXIV. De damnis, per castellanos, seu officiales arcium patris.

XXV. Item quod mete inter Hungariam et Austriam ab antiquo tempore habite per condamque Mathiam regem de novo rectificate et recuperate in eodem statu per maiestatem regiam

ⁱⁱⁱ sit deest

^{iv} Mendose: periurii

relinquantur et teneantur. Et quod de metis inter Hungariam et Moraviam, necnon Poloniam similiter rectificandis maiestas regia decernat, quid pro utilitate regnorum melius sit faciendum.

XXVI. Item quod lucrum camere in regno Hungarie, quinquagesimam in partibus Transsilvanis ac mardurinas in regno Sclavonie exigi consuetas maiestas regia more^v ab antiquo consueto, temporibus videlicet condam dominorum Sigismundi et Alberti regum, exigi faciat. Ubicunque autem idem lucrum camere tempore debito solutum non fuerit, comes parochialis cum iudice nobilium de qualibet villa non persolvente, post emanacionem literarum birsagialium per iudices nobilium contra tales dari solitarum exigi debeat lucrum camere cum birsagio trium marcarum sine omni exempcione.

XXVII. Item quod tricesime exigantur regie maiestati iuxta antiquam consuetudinem, sicuti temporibus dominorum Lodovici, Sigismundi et Alberti regum, in locis alias consuetis. De minutis autem rebus infra valorem unius floreni tricesimatores nullam tricesimam exigere presumpmant. Illas vero tricesimas, que domino Stephano de Zapolya, comiti perpetuo terre Scepusiensis et regni Hungarie palatino ac aliis dominis sunt impignorate, usque tempus redempcionis earum exigi facere habeant et debeant modo antedicto in locis consuetis.

XXVIII. Item quod in possessionibus et locis ecclesiarum et nobilium, seu quarumcumque ecclesiasticarum vel secularium personarum violentas exactiones victualium, procuraciones hospitalitatum et quaslibet alias aggravaciones preter voluntatem invitancium maiestas regia non faciat^{vi} nec per alios fieri permittat. Sed neque in domibus et in locis prelatorum et baronum ac aliarum quarumcumque secularium et ecclesiasticarum personarum pro tractatibus habendis et aliis quibuscumque negociis disponendis, ipsis invitatis, morabitur, aut eos expensis, victualibus, curruum et sarcinarum vecturis, nunciorum et familiarium ac quorumcumque ad suam maiestatem pertinencium procuracionibus ultra eorum spontaneam voluntatem in aliquo gravabit, sicut abusive et contra eorum voluntatem tempore prefati condam domini Mathie regis erat inchoatum.

XXIX. Item quod amodo et deinceps nemo archidiaconorum, vicearchidiaconorum et plebanorum, eorumque vices gerencium sub pena amissionis beneficiorum marcam illam argenti vel quatuor aureos ultra omnia funeralia alias de funere interfectorum abusive recipere consueta^{vii} exigere presumpmat, prout hoc tempore dominorum Caroli, Lodovici, Sigismundi et Alberti regum per bullas apostolicas ad instantem petitionem eorundem regum cassatum et extinctum fuisse manifeste dinoscitur. Ab interfectoibus autem liberam habeant exigendi facultatem.

XXX. Item conclusum est, quod ubicunque ac in quorumcumque, tam dominorum prelatorum et baronum, quam eciam nobelium^{viii} seu aliorum possessionatorum, cuiuscumque condicionis existant, hominum terris territoriisque et metis, alique minere auri vel argenti, cupri, ferri aut quevis metalla et fodine reperirentur, demptis fodinis salium, que solius regie maiestatis dominio et usui reservate essent, hii et horum heredes, in quorum possessionum terris invenirentur, fodinas

^v more desst

^{vi} mendose: faciet

^{vii} mendose: consuetos

^{viii} mendose: add.: possessionum

et montana huiusmodi fodere colereque et successivis semper temporibus laborari facere, ac usus et fructus eorum percipere valeant atque possint. Ita tamen, ut iura regalia seu urbure iuri regio pertinentes exhincque provenientes, consuetudine aliarum fodinarum requirente, regie maiestati fideliter administrentur. Quodque forent plerique ex dominis prelati, baronibus et pocioribus nobilibus huius regni, qui ex divorum predecessorum regum Hungarie donacione et annuencia in terris eorum propriis fodinas auri, argenti, cupri, ferri ac aliorum metallorum diversorum, exceptis fodinis, ut premissum est, salium, colerent et laborari facerent, illi secundum indulta donacionesque et annuenciam prescriptorum regum contentaque privilegiorum suorum libere et absque omni impedimento colere atque laborari facere, ac earum proventus capere valeant atque possint.

XXXI. Item monete seu pecunie extranee in regnum non inducantur et nec acceptentur. Contrarium autem facientes pena alias consueta mulctentur, demptis in confinibus regnorum commorantibus.

XXXII. Item quia nonnulli sunt^{ix} in hoc regno negociatores et alii varie nacionis homines, qui facultates regni ultra modum exhauriunt, thesaurum ipsius regni, aurum scilicet et argentum de eodem regno exportando et ipsum regnum eisdem destituendo, ut igitur publice utilitati et communi bono dicti regni consulatur, statutum est communi omnium dominorum prelatorum, baronum et regnicolarum consilio et deliberacione, ut nullus omnino hominum, cuiuscunque status, nacionis vel condicionis existat, aurum vel argentum conflatum et non redactum in monetam auream vel argenteam tantummodo, quacunque ex causa de regno exportare possit seu audeat. Si qui autem contra huiusmodi statutum venire vel facere presumpserint, quicunque tales, ut prefertur, aurum et argentum exportantes invenerit, extunc ipsi invenientes plenam et omnimodam ab eisdem exportantibus huiusmodi aurum et argentum ac alias res eiusdem cum detencione eciam persone proprie habeant vigore presentis statuti sive decreti auferendi et recipiendi facultatem.

XXXIII. Item, quia palatinus regni Hungarie antiqua regni consuetudine requirente ex parte regnicolarum regie serenitati, et e converso e parte ipsius regie maiestatis regnicolis iudicium et iusticiam facere habet et tenetur, regia maiestas ipsum palatinum ex consilio prelatorum et baronum et regni nobilium pari voluntate eligat. Et ut omnis suspicio, que contra ipsum palatinum et alios iudices et iusticiarios ipsius regni de favore vel odio aut quomodocunque concipi possit, de cordibus quorumlibet penitus removeatur et tollatur, semper successivis temporibus omnes et singuli iudices et iusticiarii istius regni, tam ecclesiastici quam seculares, qui videlicet in palatinum, iudicem curie regie, magistrum thavernicorum regialium, cancellarium vel vicecancellarium regalem, in prothonotarios vel vices gerentes iudicum pretactorum, ac eciam assessores eorundem in iudicio, in wayvodam Transsilvanarum, comitem Siculorum, banum regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie, banum Sclavonie, banum Machoviensem ac comites quorumlibet comitatuum et iudices nobilium eligentur et assummentur, eorundemque in iudicatu vices gerentes, substituti et assessores, tempore recepcionis eorundem ad huiusmodi honores et officia administracionis iudicii et iusticie, in manibus regiis vel deputatorum ab ipsa maiestate regia iuramentum prestare teneantur per formam infrascriptorum. Forma vero iuramenti sequitur in hec verba:

^{ix} CJH: adsunt

Ego T. iuro per deum vivum et gloriosam dei genitricem virginem Mariam, et per omnes sanctos et electos dei, quod omnibus coram me causantibus et in omni negotio, quod ad officium meum pertinebit, absque cuiusvis persone, divitis scilicet et pauperis acceptione, prece, premio, favore, timore, odio, amore et complacencia remotis et postpositis, prout secundum deum et eius iusticiam faciendum cognovero, iustum et verum iudicium et iusticiam, atque executionem in omnibus rebus pro meo posse faciam. Sic me deus adiuvet et omnes sancti.

Hoc declarato, quod palatinus, postquam eligitur, coram regnicolis iuramentum in forma prescripta manifeste prestare teneatur.

XXXIV. De iudiciibus nobilium, in singulis comitatibus eligendis.

XXXV. Abolitio iudicii generalis palatinatus.

Add.:... Casu autem, quo aliqui pociores de eodem comitatu hoc habere et petere nollent, communitas nobilium ipsius comitatus liberam a regia maiestate petendi habeat facultatem.

XXXVI. Abolitio proclamatarum congregacionum.

XXXVII. Duellorum abolitio.

XXXVIII. Trineforenses proclamaciones tollantur.

XXXIX. Item minuti conventus, et presertim conventus ecclesie de Zenth Jog deinceps ab emanacione literarum cessent et omni careant firmitate.

XL. Octavae duae singulis annis celebrentur.

Add..... Litere vero iudiciales de conservatorio per magistros semper ad fortunam levari debeant.

XLI. Octavae duae in Transsilvania et Sclavonia celebrentur.

XLII. Iudices regni ordinarii et qui ad iudicium intrare possint.

XLIII. Personæ et iuramentum regii et capituli hominum.

XLIV. Item quia propter negligenciam prepositorum regularium et abbatum habencium sub se loca conventualia sigillis testimonialibus utencia plurimi errores et scandala quamplurima in emanacionibus literarum fieri contingunt, eo presertim, quod ipsi prepositi et abbates parum auctoritatis in monachos suos sub se degentes quantum ad conservacionem sigilli habere dinoscuntur, paciunturque non tot personas, quot merito nomine conventus uti possent, sed longe pauciores sub se degere, illi vero in dispendium regnicolarum sigillis eorum libere abutuntur; ob hoc, ut alias prava abusio deinceps cesset regnicolisque tucior cautela prebeat, conclusum et ordinatum est, quod de cetero ipsi prepositi regulares et abbates sigilla testimonialia habentes teneantur et sint astricti decem vel octo personas religiosas, sacerdotes illius ordinis, vel adminus septem et non pauciores in eorum monasterio tenere et conservare, et una cum eisdem in emanacionibus literarum solertem diligenciam adhibere. Utque iidem prepositi et abbates liberius sua auctoritate frui possint, statutum est, quod amodo deinceps predicti monachi vel fratres cuiuscumque ordinis sigillis utentes sub potestate et auctoritate ipsorum prepositorum et abbatum suorum fore intelligantur, eosque iidem prepositi vel abbates iuxta eorum demerita castigandi habeant facultatem. Ita, ut si quid erroris in emanacionibus quarumcumque literarum fieri contingat, extunc prior et custos talis loci pro tali errore puniatur pena prenotata. Ut autem omnis suspicio de cordibus dubitancium evellatur, placuit, ut nomina ipsorum fratrum, videlicet prioris et custodis in fine quarumlibet literarum ante datarum earundem serius concribantur.

XLV. Item quia nonnulli clerici et alterius condicionis plerique homines, tam nobiles, quam et ignobiles in curiam Romanam, vel dum aliquis legatorum sumpmi pontificis in hoc regnum Hungarie missus introiret, incolas huius regni, presertim simpliciores, exquisitis quibusdam occasionibus, interdum eciam calumpniosis, in curiam Romanam vel presenciam ipsius legati citare et eos lite mediante, magis ac magis urgentes et vexantes ad solucionem alicuius sumpme compellere, sicque suam vitam criminose nonnumquam per phas et nephas alere et sustentare consueverunt, propterea, ut talium sceleratorum lucro gaudencium illicitus questus et via calumpniandi cesset in posterum, per barones, proceres et communitatem tocius regni huius ordinatum est et statutum, quod deinceps nullus omnino hominum quempiam ratione alicuius negocii in curiam Romanam aut presenciam cuiusvis legati citare presummat, nisi prius coram suo ordinario diocesano, archiepiscopo vel episcopo, aut eius vicario in causam convenire et cum eo iuridice procedere, tandemque dum aliqua parciam iusticiam sibi vel denegatam, aut alias se indebite aggravari^x et condempnari sentiret, causam huiusmodi in curiam Romanam aut presenciam ipsius legati per viam appellacionis et non aliter provocare deducereque et prosequi possit atque valeat. Contrarium autem facientes debita pena puniantur.

XLVI. Item quod preter factum testamenti, matrimonii, dotum et rerum paraffernalium ac iurium quartaliorum, periurii, verberacionis et spoliacionis clericorum et mulierum, et preter illas alias causas, que prophane non essent, in foro spirituali nulla causa tractetur et e converso. Casu autem, quo aliquis iudicum ecclesiasticorum causam non ad suum forum spectantem coram se reciperet et ad literas preceptorias in presenciam iudicis secularis competentis non transmitteret, extunc talis iudex ecclesiasticus beneficio sit privatus et regia maiestas beneficium sive officium illius alteri conferre possit ipso facto. Iudices autem ecclesiastici in hoc casu intelligantur vicarii vel officiales prelatorum. Si autem iudex secularis causam aliquam per iudicem ecclesiasticum in suam presenciam transmissam forum ecclesiasticum concernere agnoverit, rursus in presenciam ipsius iudicis ecclesiastici remittere debeat et teneatur.

XLVII. Nona pars frugum et vinorum a colonis exigantur.

XLVIII. Ecclesiastici personae decimam et nonam in bonis suis exigant.

XLIX. Et quod omnium et singulorum jobagiones, tam videlicet regales, quam et reginales seu dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium, qui in terris aliorum dominorum vineas haberent vel ararent, modo simili nonam partem ipsorum vinorum et frugum, aut akones consuetos, cum muneribus solitis domino terrestri dare et persolvere teneantur. Ubi vero aliqui huiusmodi solucionem non facerent vel facere negligerent quovis modo, extunc hereditates ille, de quibus eandem solucionem facere tenerentur, eidem domino terrestri perpetuo remaneant ipso facto. Isto tamen declarato, quod si aliqui^x populorum regalium vel reginalium aut aliorum quorumcumque super huiusmodi nonis vel akonibus libertates allegantes habere conquerentur, inter tales et dominum terrestrem per iudices ordinarios regni in primis octavis iudicium et iusticia administratur.

L. Nobiles decimas dare non teneantur.

LI. Item solent nonnulli regnicole in eorum causis contra sese, potissimum in facto possessionario motis, servatis pertransitisque legitimorum terminorum et litium processibus, literarumque tandem ac aliorum cunctorum probabilium documentorum hincinde pro finali conclusione huiusmodi negocii produccionibus factis, in ultimo cause termino, dum eciam iudices ordinarii sedis iudiciarie regni magistrique prothonotarii et iurati eiusdem sedis assessores suam tulissent sententiam, earundemque parcium altera se in huiusmodi causa deficere et succumbere agnosceret, ac litere adiudicatorie exinde vel iam emanate et extradate extitissent, aut post latam et pronuncciatam sententiam extradari deberent, procuratores eorum revocare et causam condescendi facere velle aut novum iudicium impetrare, vigore cuius partem alteram ab execucione literarum adiudicatoriarum sepius prohiberent, ut sic eorum iustis iuribus privarentur. Propterea statutum est, ut amodo imposterum huiusmodi causantes nonnisi lite pendente et causa nondum decisa procuratores eorum revocare et causam condescendi facere possint. Novum autem iudicium impetrent semper, si voluerint. Verumtamen eius vigore partem alteram ab execucione late sentencie literarumque adiudicatoriarum superinde emanandarum extraccione vel extradacione iudices ordinarios vel eorum prothonotarios nequaquam valeant inhibere. Ymo et ipsa pars triumphans huiusmodi literas adiudicatorias, non obstantibus ipsis literis novi iudicii sic impetratis, debite execucioni demandari facere, pars denique ipsum novum iudicium impetrans, habita execucione dicte late sentencie, suam causam vigore ipsius novi iudicii, dum voluerit, execucioni demandare et idem prosequi possit.^{xi} Casu vero, quo altera parcium sive racione iurium possessionariorum, sive aliorum quorumcumque negociorum per non venienciam, eo quod fortasse certis suis negociis prepedita comparere nequiret, sentencionaliter quoquomodo convinceretur, extunc talis pars, sic per non venienciam convicta et novum iudicium impetrare, et tam iudices ordinarios ac prothonotarios eorundem ab extradacione literarum adiudicatoriarum sentencionalium, quam et partem adversam ab extraccione et execucione earundem literarum semper, dum voluerit et poterit, inhibere valeat atque possit.

LII. Item quod omnes cause, in quibus per regiam maiestatem nova iudicia impetrata fuerint, in primis octavis inter omnes alias causas leventur et iudicentur.

^x CJH: maneant perpetuo

^{xi} CJH om.

LIII. Ceterum licet in generali novo decreto ante obitum serenissimi principis dicti condam Mathie regis per ipsum dominum Mathiam regem ac universos dominos prelatos, barones et regni nobiles ordinatum fuerint, ut in singulis comitatibus regni ex nobilibus pocioribus certi iurati eligerentur, qui in sedibus iudiciariis talium omnium comitatum iudicia facere, necnon inquisitiones, amoniciones, statuciones, metarum reambulaciones et alias cunctas iudiciarias execuciones perficere et peragere deberent; tamen, quia hoc et id ipsis regnicolis admodum onerosum esse visum est, ex eo, quod ipsi ad easdem sedes iudiciarias dictorum comitatum in presenciam annotatorum iuratorum electorum pro habendo causancium iudicio singulis tredecim aut quindecim diebus accedere et iuri stare cogentur; pro eo eciam, quod cum ipsi huiusmodi iuratos electos ad aliquas execuciones faciendas adducerent, multis exhinc fatigiis et expensis plurimum gravarentur, propterea conclusum est, ut de cetero electio et officium talium iuratorum electorum nobilium cesset omnino et aboleatur, sed comes ac vicecomes et iudices nobilium comitatum regni in ipsis sedibus iudiciariis iudicia administrare, alias eciam execuciones sive iudiciarias commissiones, puta inquisitiones, evocaciones, statuciones, amoniciones, metarum reambulaciones et alios quoslibet iudiciarios processus homines regii cum testimoniis capitulorum aut conventuum iuxta modum et ritum, ante predictum novum ultimum decretum prefati condam domini Mathie regis in talibus observatum exequi perficereque et celebrare debeant et teneantur.

LIV. Causæ iurium possessionarium in quatuor octavis terminentur.

Add.: ... Ita videlicet, quod pars in causam attracta ad exhibenda iura sua, quibus se defendere voluerit, ultiores octavas eciam cum onere habere nullo modo valeat, sed in ipsis quatuor octavis omni ulteriori processu iuridico semoto sua privilegia exhibere teneatur.

LV. Item in causis racione illacionis dampnorum, ceterorum nocumentorum, iniuriarum ac actuum potenciarum minorum motis, eciamsi patratore ore suo proprio coram suo iudice confiteretur, nemo deinceps in facto potencie, sed solum in solucione huiusmodi dampnorum illatorum et expensis actoris eidem tantummodo persolvendis, insuper pro premissis actibus potenciarum in viginti quinque marcis gravis ponderis, centum florenos auri facientibus, inter iudicem et actorem equaliter dividendis convincatur, et per iudicem ad solucionem statim compellatur.

LVI. In causis vero maioribus, scilicet racione invasionis domorum nobilium sine iusta causa, occupacionis possessionum et pertinenciarum earundem, detencionis nobilium sine iusta causa, verberacionis et vulneracionis ac interempcionis nobilium motis, in hiis taliter iudex procedere habebit: Quodsi actor pro sui parte inquisitionem modo et ordine supranotato reportaverit, in ampliorem rei verificacionem, si partes voluerint, causam ipsam ad communem inquisitionem decernat. Si vero reus ipsam inquisitionem acceptare recusabit, extunc actor pro maiori verificacione accionis sue iuxta regni consuetudinem hactenus in hac parte observatam ad caput illius adversarii iurare habebit. Ita tamen: si adversarius ille sive in causam attractus in eodem comitatu, ubi mala sunt patrata, propriam personalemque et continuam facit residenciam, ubi autem talis in causam attractus in aliis partibus seu provinciis regni personaliter facit residenciam, ac in eius ausencia huiuscemodi mala patrata sunt et commissa, tunc iuxta contenta literarum inquisitoriarum propter suam innocenciam se iuramento expurgabit. Ex parte denique familiarium et suorum jobagionum vigore prefati articuli fiat iudicium et iusticia lege regni requirente.

LVII. Repulsionum pœna.

LVIII. Evocationibus cum clausula “De consensu et voluntate...” locus non detur.

Add.: ... demptis tamen, si tales persone, que huiusmodi patratores malorum et totam eorum familiam auxilio et consilio gubernarent et dirigere haberent ac tutarentur.

LIX. Donatarius bona, in quibus contradictio facta est, pro se occupare non ausit.

LX. Bonorum impetrator suo nomine sibi collata bona occupet.

LXI. Donatarius nomine suo proprio trahat litem.

LXII. Item si quippiam quorumcumque regnicolarum aliqua iura possessionaria nomine iuris regii pro se impetrarent et eadem ipsi iuri regio pertinere comprobare non valerent, in estimacione talium iurium possessionariorum impetratorum, si vero tales impetrantes ante finalem decisionem cause in facto huiusmodi iurium impetratorum mote se in dominium iurium impetratorum ac proventuum eorundem percepcione occupative seu alio quovis modo intromitterent, contra partem lesam seu litigantem et expensis fatigatam in facto potencie convincantur.

LXIII. De donationibus regis per defectum seminis devolutibus.

LXIV. Item dotes uxorum qualitercumque decedencium eciam iuridice interimendorum semper salve maneant et illese.

LXV. De bonis pignoratis et pœna fœneratorum.

LXVI. Item palatinus et iudex curie ac ceteri iudices ordinarii, ecclesiastici et seculares universa iudicia seu birsagia in causis coram eis vertentibus aggregata statim ipsis causis finitis ac per sentenciam finalem conclusis primo parti adverse de sua porcione satisfaccionem impendere teneantur et tandem ad partem suam iudiciariam cedentem exigendi liberam habeant facultatem.

LXVII. Violationis sedis pœna.

LXVIII. Concordandi libera facultas in omnibus causis.

LXIX. Prothonotarii in hospitis nullas causas judicent.

LXX. Iudices regni ordinarios diffamantium pœna.

LXXI. Quibus prorogationes suffragentur?

LXXII. Appellans male ad iudicem superiorem in duplo convincitur.

Add Hoc tamen expresso, quod si in dicta sede iudiciaria prefatorum comitatuuum alicui parti iuramentum sola sua in persona deponendum adiudicatum fuerit, extunc pars illa a tali adiudicacione appellare non possit.

LXXIII. Preterea quia prefati comites et vicecomites, quando cause in dicta curia regia vel approbate, vel autem emendate ad ipsos remittuntur, quod iudicium factum iuxta iudiciariam commissionem iudicis sui ordinarii exequantur, frequenter autem favore partis adverse vel aliquo alio respectu huiusmodi execucionem facere negligunt, itaque quod pars pro parte, cuius huiuscemodi iudicium factum sit, iure suo non frustretur, statutum est et ordinatum, quod postquam ipsi comites et vicecomites cum literis iudicis remittentis requisiti fuerint, execucionem ipsam infra quindecim dies a die ipsius requisicionis facere absque aliqua iusta et rationabili causa neglexerint, extunc tales comites et vicecomites in viginti quinque marcis gravibus per iudicem, cuius mandatum executi non fuerint, indilate et irremissibiliter exigendis convincantur eo ipso. Verum quia cause de sede iudiciaria iudicum nobilium quorumlibet comitatum per appellacionem ad curiam regiam recepte usque modo semper ad octavas transmitti et in eisdem solummodo octavis revideri discutique et determinari consueverunt, per hocque maiorum causarum in ipsa scilicet curia regia inchoatarum discussiones et revisiones sepe sepius vel negligi aut obmitti et in posteriores octavas non sine gravi dispendio parcium differri debuerunt, eapropter, ut parcium ipsarum indulgeatur fatigiis et expensis, litibusque brevius finis imponi possit et valeat, statutum est et ordinatum, quod amodo deinceps quelibet cause de ipsa sede iudiciaria nobilium comitatum quorumcumque medio eciam tempore ad quoscumque terminos competentes, hoc est extra octavas per appellacionem ad prefatam curiam regiam recipi et transmitti in eisdemque terminis per iudices suos ordinarios, in quorum scilicet presenciam transmittuntur, hic Bude revideri discutique et determinari possint et debeant. Item quia nonnulli in causam attracti causas tam ratione iurium possessionariorum, quam eciam aliorum quorumcumque negotiorum contra eos motas soliti fuerunt usque modo frequenter variis subterfugiis exquisitis longe protrahere et actores laboribus et expensis indebite gravare, presertim vero cum actor causam suam iam per observaciones legitimorum terminorum ac cunctorum iurium et probabilium documentorum suorum exhibicionem cum gravibus suis laboribus et expensis coram suo iudice ordinario usque ad finalem conclusionem in tantum deduxisset, quod in eadem causa solummodo iudicium finale fieri, sive sententia proferri et pronunciarum deberet, tunc in causam attractus videns se succumbere, nec aliter causam ulterius differri posse, calumpnia excogitata literas expeditorias contra actorem se habere allegando et per hoc causam suam adhuc in alias tunc affuturas octavas prorogari et differri procuraret. Quapropter, ut talibus calumpniis debito remedio occurratur, statutum est et sancctum, quod amodo deinceps, quicumque in causam attractus in primo responsionis sue termino literas expeditorias se contra actorem habere allegaverit, ad exhibendas et producendas easdem octavas tunc quamprimum sequentes habere possit. Dum autem post terminorum legitimorum observaciones, hoc est tempore finalis conclusionis cause, ipse in causam attractus huiusmodi literas expeditorias se habere allegaverit, tunc nisi illas in continenti exhibeat et producat, nullas penitus alias octavas futuras ad producendas et exhibendas easdem habere possit.

LXXIV. De convictione in capitali causa.

LXXV. Comites parochiales et vicecomites in executione iudicii non impediuntur.

LXXVI. Seculares persone contra ecclesiasticas personas in maiori onere non convicantur, quam ecclesiastice contra seculares convincerentur.

LXXVII. Ecclesiastice persone cum tribus literis inquisitoriis possessiones nec requirere, nec retinere possint.

LXXVIII. De inmutatione literarum ablatarum sive combustum.

LXXIX. Sedem iudicariam armati non intrent.

Add.: ... Ingredientes vero nobiles vel alios cuiuscumque status homines ad sedem iudicariam cuiuscumque comitatus intra ambitum regni vel de eadem sede ad propria regredientes in ipsa sede aut in eodem itinere quicumque turbare, molestare, verberare vel interficere presumpserint, nota infidelitatis alias consueta convincantur.

LXXX. Item quicumque furem vel latronem aut alium quemcumque malefactorem publicum captivaverit et eundem de captivitate sua voluntarie abire permiserit, comiti parochiali homagium illius malefactoris, lesis vero dampnum irrogatum restituere debeat et teneatur. Si vero comes parochialis talem malefactorem in suas manus traditum abire permiserit, extunc ipse comes homagium eiusdem malefactoris illi, qui sibi ipsum malefactorem tradiderit, solvere et leso de dampnis suis satisfacere debeat et teneatur. Vicecomites autem quorumlibet comitatuum semper esse debeant de eodem comitatu ex pocioribus nobilibus.

LXXXI. De modo captivatione publicorum malefactorum.

LXXXII. De homicidio voluntarie et deliberate.

LXXXIII. Nemo regios infideles ad loca sua acceptare et ibi conservare audeat.

LXXXIV. Item quod mercatores forenses et extranei, cuiuscumque nationis existant, ad mercandum seu forizandum in medium regni ad loca alias consueta, ad forizandum et emendum ac cambiendum deputata negociaciones suas peracturi accedant.

LXXXV. Nobiles et ecclesiastice persone ad loca tributorum ire non teneantur.

Add.: Contrarium facientes in pena solucionis homagii vivi talis impediti convincantur. ...

... Contravenientes pena predicta puniantur.

LXXXVI. Exemptio certarum rusticorum et fabrorum de tributibus.

Add.: Et insuper ab hominibus fruges ad loca molendinorum deferentibus nec in eundo, nec in redeundo tributum exigere valeat. Et nichilominus vina, fruges et alia victualia et muneralia dominorum terrestrium per quecumque loca tributorum ad domos vel curias dominorum suorum deferentes nullum tributum solvere teneantur, neque ad solucionem tributariam compellantur pena sub predicta.

LXXXVII. De tributis, falsis viis etc.

Add.: ... ita tamen, quod nemo in terris aliorum vias falsas stare et custodire audeat. Ubi autem aliqui in pontibus vel navibus propter malam conservacionem eorum dampnum patientur, extunc huiusmodi dampnum passis per hos, quorum pontes et naves sunt, de dampnis satisfaccio impendi debeat.

LXXXVIII. Ceterum quia nemo regnicolarum in preiudicium vadorum privilegiatorum falsa vada et oclulta tenere et conservare potest, neque debet, ob hoc decretum et ordinatum est, quod amodo de cetero nullus omnino regnicolarum vada navesque et carinas oclultas aut sinistras pertranseuntibus sive transvadantibus tenere et conservare audeat sub pena amissionis illius possessionis, in qua id, ut premittitur, in preiudicium vadorum privilegiatorum fieri contingeret. Si qui autem mercatorum vel itinerancium comperti fuerint sinistra vada et oclulta pro se procurasse deprehensique fuerint per illa loca traiecisse, eadem regula illis observetur, que de non solventibus et pertranseuntibus iustum theolonium intelligi possit.

LXXXIX. Item quod nullus arestare volens in suis propriis aut fratrum suorum condicionalium, vel dominorum suorum possessionibus, terris aut officiolatibus pro quacumque causa arestacionem aliquam facere possit, alioquin pro indebito aresto in pena trium marcarum vincatur et arestum huiusmodi indebite factum cum altero birsagio trium marcarum relaxare et liberum permittere per comitem parochialem compellatur. Alioquin, si comes favore forsitan cuiuspiam in hac re executionem facere negligeret et tepidus foret, pars arestata aut ipsius dominus terrestris vel ipsum arestantem, vel loco illius alium seu alios, quos poterit, colonos ipsius ville seu possessionis, ubi transgressor presentis statucionis moram traxerit, tamdiu, donec ille sic, ut premittitur, indebite arestatus simulcum rebus suis libere dimittetur, sibique pro huiusmodi indebito aresto de birsagiis sex marcarum supradictis satisfactum fuerit, in loco communi arestare atque ipsa birsagia vel coram domino terrestri aut suo officiali iudiceque et iuratis civibus illius loci communis, ubi talis arestacio facta fuerit, iuridice requirere et reobtinere valeat atque possit, ipseque dominus terrestris aut suus officialis vel iudex et iurati cives ex parte ipsorum arestatorum de prescriptis birsagiis sex marcarum satisfaciendi habeant facultatem. In aliis autem factis et negociis, &c. ...

XC. Ceterum sunt nonnulli villici sive iudices et officiales, presertim in bonis et possessionibus dominorum prelatorum et baronum, qui, dum aliqui coram eis contra nobiles occasione aliquorum debitorum vel aliarum rerum conqueruntur, ad instanciam ipsorum querulancium jobagiones talium nobilium vel captivant, vel autem cum rebus et bonis eorum arestant, sicque ipsi nobiles contra privilegium et libertatem nobilitatis illorum iudicio astare plerumque coguntur. Et quia villici sive iudices aut officiales villarum, opidorum vel civitatum aut eciam domini terrestres talium locorum in talibus causis in nobiles nullam iurisdictionem exercere habent, ideo statutum est et decretum, quod amodo deinceps in nullo loco pro nobilibus sive occasione debitorum, sive quarumcumque aliarum rerum arestum fieri possit, neque ipsi nobiles per se in ipsorum personis vel rebus quovis modo impediri seu arestari valeant. Si qui autem aliquid accionis contra aliquos nobiles se habere pretendunt, hii id coram comite parochiali et iudicibus nobilium vel aliis iudicibus ordinariis talium nobilium prosequantur. Ex parte quorum ipsi comes et iudices nobilium aut alii iudices ordinarii iudicium et iusticiam ac debite satisfaccionis complementum iuxta legitimas comprobaciones ipsius actoris de regni consuetudine administrare et exhibere tenebuntur. Ubi vero aliqui contra huiusmodi statutum pro aliquo nobili jobagionem suam detinere et res suas arestare fecerint, extunc tales in vivo homagio ipsius detenti jobagionis et estimacione rerum arestatarum convincantur. Et simili modo, si ipsum nobilem in persona propria detineri vel proprias res suas arestari procuraverint, convicti habeantur.

XCI. Arestacio per cives

Add.: ... Et sic arestaciones modo premissis tantummodo fieri valeant et non aliter, demptis si quipiam vulnera, lesiones, mortem, incendia et alia similia enormia perpetrarent manifeste, in quibus casibus ex parte eorundem, si presentes sunt et comprehendi possunt, iudicium et iusticia impendatur et eisdem debita pena infligatur iure mediante.

XCII. De debitore manifeste

XCIII. Colonum non dimittendis pœna

Add demptis hiis, qui in libertatibus manserunt. Illi namque sic libertati non aliter, quam si^{xiii} tempore recessus ipsorum de omnibus censibus, tam ordinariis, quam extraordinariis medio tempore infra libertatem ipsorum fieri debendis dominis eorum satisfacciant, abire permittantur, ita tamen, quod si quitquam edificii illic infra tempus libertacionis fecerint, de eisdem libere disponere possint iuxta iudicum vel villicorum, ubi moram traxerunt, estimacionem.

^{xiii} si desideratur

XCIV. Abductionis jobagionum pœna

Add.: Ita tamen, quod nemo jobagionem alterius petita, sed non obtenta licencia, absque iuris et iusticie administracione, aliis eciam suis debitis minime persolutis, post illos eciam quindecim dies habite licencie sub pena solucionis viginti quinque marcarum, partim comiti, partim vero causantibus persolvendarum violenter abducere audeat et neque possit. Similiter hoc idem de comitibus vel vicecomitibus parochialibus intelligatur, si iidem sub confidencia officiolatus eorum violentas commiserint jobagionum abducciones, qui eidem pene et gravamini subjacere debeant.

XCIV. Literarum in capitulis taxa

XCVI. Item quia super literis in locis capitularibus et conventualibus et interdum eciam in curia nostra extra octavas transsumptis et exemplatis, ac tandem huiusmodi transsumptis in iudicio a parte contra partem productis multociens parte illa, contra quam producuntur, impugnante disceptaciones varie et exinde de earum viribus dubietates oriuntur, ad excludendum igitur et tollendum disceptaciones et dubietates huiusmodi statutum est et decretum quod sive huiusmodi litere in dictis locis capitularibus et conventualibus vigore quarumcumque literarum preceptoriarum, sive autem in dicta curia nostra sub nostro secreto vel iudiciali, aut alterius cuiuscumque iudicis ordinarii sigillo extra terminos octavarum transsumpte et exemplate existant, quando per aliquam partem ipsa transumpta in iudicio producuntur, altera parte eadem transumpta impugnante et eis fidem non adhibente, teneatur pars producens ad verificanda huiusmodi transumpta originales literas exhibere.

XCVII. Item ex quo frequenter occurrere consuevit, quod mulieres, presertim uxores baronum pociorumque et aliorum nobilium in causis earum, per ipsas scilicet contra alios, aut per alios contra ipsas motis vel movendis pro constituendis procuratoribus ad loca capitularia vel conventualia, aut propter loci distanciam et viarum discrimina aut propter alias rationabiles causas personaliter comode accedere nequeunt, vel autem propter muliebris sexus fragilitatem simul et honestatem ire verentur, ideo statutum est, quod quando huiuscemodi mulieres coram duobus canonicis aut fratribus conventualibus de eisdem locis capitularibus aut conventualibus ad earundem mulierum petitiones propter hoc transmissis procuratores constituunt, huiusmodi constitucio vigorosa sit, litereque capituli vel conventus superinde emanate in quolibet iudicio acceptentur et eis plena fides detur tamquam aliis literis procuratoriis. Hoc tamen expresso, quod hii, qui ad audiendam huiusmodi constitucionem procuratoriam mittuntur, pro via plus exigere non valeant, quam in execucionibus evocacionum vel inquisicionum, de literis quoque tandem ad eorum relacionem in capitulo vel conventu emanatis solummodo recipiatur, quantum de aliis procuratoriis literis recipi et exigi consuevit, et nullo modo plus.

XCVIII. Literarum minoris cancellariæ taxa

XCIX. Literarum maioris cancellariæ taxa

C. Quia sicuti et quemadmodum hactenus Pestiensis et Pilisiensis comitatus, ex quo prope Budam sunt, comites non habuerunt, sic nec in futurum comites habere debeant.

CI. Item quod regia maiestas ac officiales eiusdem falcaciones, messes, cumulaciones et importaciones feni per vim, uti compulsive exercebant, amplius fieri non debeant.

CII. Item quod illa dampnabilis libertas, civitati Wyssegradiensi per condam dominum Mathiam regem concessa, ea videlicet, quod nemo de quocumque excessu, sed et debito cuiuspiam iuri stare de civibus ipsius civitatis deberet, omnino extincta abolitaque, ac inanis et vana habeatur.

CIII. Item si que civitatum huius regni locum deposicionis et permutacionis apud se fieri debere et superinde privilegia habere causaretur, extunc illa vel ille civitates iuxta contenta privilegiorum suas causas coram suo iudice ordinario prosequi valeat atque possit.

CIV. Item quodsi qui populorum seu jobagionum regalium vel reginalium, aut aliorum quorumcumque super frugum et vinorum nonis vel akonibus libertates habere allegancium conquererentur, inter tales et domimum terrestrem per iudices ordinarios regni in primis octavis iudicium et iusticia adminstretur.

CV. Item intelleximus ex relacione dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium, quod domus ipsorum, quas in civitate nostra Budensi habent, quasque magis propter opportunum eorum condensum, dum ad curiam regiam frequentandam adveniunt, ibidem tenent, ab antiquis temporibus ab omni taxa et quavis solucione in medium civium prefate civitatis nostre Budensis facienda per divos reges, predecessores nostros exempte et libertate fuissent, sed a certo tempore cives predictae civitatis quandam exaccionem super predictas domos ipsorum facere cepissent, prout eciam facere contenderent. Igitur de consilio dictorum dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium statuimus et presenti consulto nostro perpetuo duraturo ordinavimus, quatenus amodo deinceps dicte domus prefatorum dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac nobilium nulli taxe, nulli penitus solucioni in consorcium dictorum civium civitatis nostre Budensis fiende sint obnoxie et obstricte, sed sicut olim eedem domus libere fuerunt, ita imposterum ab omni taxa, ab omnique solucionis genere exempte, libere et immunes habeantur, neque dicti domini prelati et barones ac nobiles racione predictarum domorum suarum in consorcium prefate civitatis nostre quitquam solvere tenebuntur. Salvo illo permanente, quodsi aliqui inquilini fuerint in domibus prefatis, illi secundum consuetudinem predictae civitatis nostre pro merito quisque, iuxta limitacionem iudicis et iuratorum civium eiusdem civitatis, et hoc intelligi volumus eciam de aliis civitatibus nostris regalibus, solucionem facere teneantur. Ita tamen, quod amplius non graventur, quam ceteri inquilini aliorum civium in eadem civitate residencium.

CVI. Ablate domus previa racione hiis, quibus indebite recepte sunt, restituantur. Si autem indebite detentores talium domorum aliquos labores et edificia super eisdem fecissent, extunc hii, quibus tales domus restituentur, de huiusmodi edificiis et laboribus iuxta limitacionem proborum satisfacere teneantur.

CVII. Preterea universorum dominorum prelatorum, baronum et procerum cunctorumque nobilium huius regni pari voto et unanimi voluntate statutum est, ut deinceps in perpetuum quicumque regnicolarum, cuiuscumque status et condicionis existat, post decessum alicuius regis Hungarie occupaciones castrorum, castellorum, civitatum vel oppidorum, villarum seu possessionum, incendia, spolia vel quascumque rapinas et alia quecumque mala comitterent, tales raptores, incendiarii, spoliatores et occupatores bonorum quorumcumque et malefactores perpetue infidelitatis pene subiaceant^{xiii} et perpetui infideles regni habeantur eo facto; et quod nec regia maiestas, eiam cum consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum, imo nec ipsum totum regnum talibus malefactoribus gratiam faciendi habeant facultatem, sed iugo perpetue servitutis et rusticitatis subiecti reatus sui penam lugeant sine fine.

CVIII. Item quia contigit iam pluries fieri, quod quando occurrentibus regni negociis admodum arduis ac communi omnium dominorum prelatorum et baronum nobiliumque regni consilio tractandis et concludendis maiestas regia necessitate id suadente universis ipsis dominis prelatis et baronibus atque nobilibus dietam seu convencionem generalem ad certum diem indixit et promulgavit, tunc cunctis nobilibus communiter vel alias, iuxta mandatum regie maiestatis, pluribus eiam ex prefatis dominis prelatis et baronibus ad diem prefixum convenientibus et congregatis certi domini prelati et barones in veniendo ad ipsam dietam ita graves se exhibuerunt, quod non ad ipsum diem prefixum, sed eo elapso post quindecim vel viginti dies venerunt, quorum expectacio convenientibus et congregatis ad eundem diem prefixum adeo fuit onerosa, quod consumptis eorum expensis, tedio affecti, negociis regni nondum expeditis, imo eiam propter absenciam ad diem prefixum non veniencium eis neque publicatis nobiles mediocres et pauperes de ipsa dieta discedere coacti fuerunt. Quapropter, ut comodum reipublice et commune bonum regni propter talium dominorum modo premissis non veniencium tarditatem non negligatur, neque eiam quovis modo turbetur, statutum est et sancitum unanimi ipsorum omnium dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac nobilium consilio et deliberacione, quod amodo deinceps, quandocumque et quocienscumque generalem regia maiestas dietam dictis dominis prelatis et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis indixerit et promulgaverit, tunc non venientes ad diem prefixum, ultra quatuor dies post ipsum diem prefixum proxime et immediate sequentes non expectentur. Qui si infra eosdem quatuor dies venerint, bene quidem, alioquin mox lapsis eisdem quatuor diebus, maiestas regia cum hiis, qui presentes fuerint in ipsa dieta, negocia regni, quorum occasione dietam indixerit, coram se recipere concludereque et determinare valeat atque possit. Non venientes vero et non comparentes, non obstante eorum absencia, omnia per comparentes conclusa pro rato habere teneantur.

Articuli autem nobilium regni Sclavonie in decreto presenti secundum deliberacionem regie maiestatis ac dominorum prelatorum et baronum regnique nobilium inserti sequuntur hoc modo:

I. Item quod regia maiestas, veluti in primo articulo presentis decreti continetur, inter cetera sua regna dictum regnum Sclavonie in antiquis eorum libertatibus, privilegiis et consuetudinibus conservare pollicitus est, sic eos pollicetur in eisdem libertatibus et immunitatibus omnibus conservare.

II. Item si maiestas sua incolis regni sui Hungarie quibuscumque ex racionibus nunc et temporum in successu aliquas soluciones fieri statuerit, extunc talium solutionum medietatem in regno suo

^{xiii} mendose: subiacere

Sclavonie iuxta ipsorum consuetudinem semper et usque ad hec tempora observatam exigere habeat et teneatur.

III. Item camere salium in illo regno fiant, prout tempore condam divi Sigismundi regis, ubicumque necessarium fuerit, fiant tamen secundum hoc,^{xiv} ut eciam dispositum est in Hungaria.

IV. Item quod camerarii in domibus incolarum sales querere non valeant sed si eosdem in campo aut foris, vel nundinis invenire poterint, eosdem auferendi liberam habeant facultatem. Querant tamen, sed sine calumpnia et coram iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus. Particulas seu minutas salium auferre non valeant.

V. Sales quarumlibet camerarum regalium, tam que ducuntur navibus, quam curribus, ac eciam maritimi, quos scilicet maritimos sales pauperes illius regni propter eorum inopiam pecuniarum defectum solent pro bladis permutare, libere emere, vendere et eisdem uti possint. De quibus maritimis salibus trecesime maiestati regie proveniunt, ita tamen, quod dum sales regales deficerent et camerarius regnicolis sales dare nequiret, et non aliter.

VI. Item vina, blada et animalia cuiuscumque generis persolutis tricesimis et tributis iustis et consuetis, quo volunt et poterunt, libere abigi et vendi^{xv} possint.

VII. Item tricesime exigantur iuxta antiquam consuetudinem, sicuti temporibus dominorum Lodovici, Sigismundi et Alberti regum, in locis alias consuetis. De minutis autem rebus infra valorem unius floreni tricesimatores nullam tricesimam exigere presumptant.

VIII. Item quod regia maiestas omnia iura et privilegia illius regni Sclavonie a divis regibus, sue scilicet maiestatis predecessoribus eidem concessa confirmare dignetur.

IX. Item ut comites non possint procedere ad quascumque execuciones, nisi de sede et commissione ac literis preceptorii regnicolarum et sedis, prout ab antiquo fuit observatum.

X. Item in requisicionibus et rectificacionibus castrorum, castellorum, opidorum, villarum seu possessionum aliorumque cunctorum iurium possessionariorum per quoscumque post obitum dicti condam Mathie regis a sese qualitercumque occupatorum servetur idem modus, prout in regno Hungarie in articulo superinde confecto declaratus est.

XI. (Vide supra Art. 16)

Add Et hoc fiat eodem modo, sicut in regno Hungarie.

Nos igitur, qui regnum nostrum prefatum et cetera eciam dominia et principatus nostros non minus legibus ac statutis, quam pace et armis regere ac gubernare cupimus, acceptis huiusmodi articulis, sed et eorundem regnicolarum nostrorum huiusmodi supplicacionibus exauditis et admissis, prescriptos articulos videntes et considerantes iustos et honestos esse, de verbo ad verbum, sine immutacione et diminucione aliquali presentibus inscriptos et insertos laudavimus et approbavimus, ratosque et gratos ac acceptos habentes pro prefatis regno et regnicolis nostris pro perpetuo ac stabili decreto valituros confirmavimus, imo laudamus, approbamus, ratificamus et confirmamus, promittentes in omnibus clausulis, articulis, capitulis et punctis observare et facere observari presentis scripti patrocinio mediante. Datum Bude predicta, in prefata generali omnium regnicolarum convencione et dieta, per manus reverendi in Christo patris, domini Thome episcopi ecclesie Jauriensis, sumpni et secretarii cancellarii nostri, fidelis nobis dilecti, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo nonagesimo secundo, regnorum nostrorum Hungarie ect. anno secundo, Bohemie vero vigesimo primo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus dominis Petro archiepiscopo Colocensi, Agriensi sede vacante, Osvaldo Zagrabiensis, Valentino electo Varadiensis, Ladislao Gereb Albensis Transsilvane, Sigismundo Quinqueecclesiensis, prefato Thoma Jauriensis, Johanne Wesprimiensis, altero Johanne Chanadiensis, Nicolao de Bathor Waciensis, Anthonio electo Nitriensis, Stephano Sirimiensis et Luca Boznensis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item spectabili et magnificis Stephano de Zapolya, predicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino ac terre Scepusiensis comite perpetuo, comite Stephano de Bathor iudice curie nostre ac waywoda Transsilvano et comite Siculorum, Paulo de Kynys comite Themesiensi ac parcium inferiorum regni nostri capitaneo generali, Laurencio de Wylak Machoviensi, Ladislao de Egerwara regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie, Francisco Balassa de Gyarmath et Georgio de Chwla Zewreniensibus banis, Ladislao Orzagh de Gwht agazonum, altero Ladislao de Lossoncz thavernicorum, Petro Gereb de Wyngarth et Nicolao Banfy de Lyndwa ianitorum, Emerico de Peren dapiferorum et Georgio de Thurocz picernarum nostrorum regalium magistris, honore comitatus Psoniensis vacante, ceterisque regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

^{xiv} hoc deest.

^{xv} mendose: vendere

Item preter predictos articulos in presenti nostro decreto articulariter inscriptos domini prelati, barones, proceres et nobiles regni nostri Hungarie predicti et alios plures articulos, tam ratione decimarum, quam ecclesiasticorum beneficiorum ac collacionis comitatum et ceterorum negociorum in scriptis nostre maiestati presentarant presenti decreto inserendos. Sed quia iidem domini prelati, barones et regni proceres super huiusmodi articulis certis ex causis et rationibus debitam atque perfectam deliberacionem ad presens facere nequierunt, pro eo deliberacionem ac finalem conclusionem articulorum huiusmodi ad futuram dietam seu convencionem generalem circa festum beati Michaelis archangeli nunc venturum, aut aliam quamprimum fiendam et celebrandam de voluntate predictorum dominorum prelatorum et baronum et regni procerum predictorum duximus prorogandam, eo modo, ut tunc, in dicta scilicet dieta seu convencione generali futura premissos articulos nunc rationibus premissis indefinite et sine finali conclusione relictos coram nobis assumpmere, ac veluti nobis ac eisdem dominis prelatis, baronibus et regni proceribus pro utilitate huius regni nostri comodius utiliusque videbitur et fieri poterit, finaliter concludere et sicuti alios articulos predictos presenti nostro decreto inscriptos approbavimus et ratificavimus, sic et eos, de quibus nunc mencio habetur, et in quibus ad presens deliberacio perfecta et conclusio fieri nequivit, prout tunc in eadem convencione ventura super eisdem concordabitur, acceptabimus, approbavimus literisque nostris superinde conficiendis ratificabimus, ymo ratificare et modo premissis approbare promittimus, harum nostrarum literarum vigore et testimonio mediante. Datum loco, die et anno supradictis.

FIRST DECREE OF KING WLADISLAS II, 1492

We, Wladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria,¹ as well as Duke of Silesia and Luxemburg and Margrave of Moravia and Lusatia etc. notify by these presents all whom it may concern, [1] that when after the death of the most serene prince the late lord King Matthias, our predecessor of blessed memory, and then after our having been called by divine disposition to and assumed the governance of this kingdom of Hungary we—by divine aid and the counsel of the lords prelates and barons of the same kingdom of ours—eliminated the many and most serious enmities that have set upon the neck of this kingdom and also the most serious domestic rivalries and internal strife, which all seemed to bring and cast this kingdom into extreme danger; and having first made and concluded peace and concord under certain conditions with the most serene prince lord Maximilian, king of the Romans etc.,² who among others threatened this country,³ and then having dispersed and routed other foreign enemies, and having restored all to peace and concord by settling the domestic and internal wars, quarrels, and dissensions, [2] then it pleased the same lords prelates and barons of the kingdom that we call a diet or general convention of the community of our gentlemen of the realm⁴ to treat upon all that is needed for their future peace and also that of all other gentlemen of the realm to the feast of the Purification of the Holy Virgin Mary just passed in our city of Buda.⁵ [3] Thus, when they came together and discussed and ordered many things for the happy state of this kingdom, among some other discussions and decisions they finally presented to us certain articles taken from the ancient laws, decrees, and customs of this kingdom, collected by common consent and the decision of all and now adapted to the conditions and state of things of our times. [4] They humbly requested that we deign to hold these articles as agreed, pleasing, and accepted, and to approve, authorize, and confirm them by our royal authority for the

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. By 1490 none of them were under Hungarian control, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerized Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Peace between Maximilian and Wladislas II was signed in Pressburg on 7 November 1491. It restored to the king of the Romans the territories that Matthias had conquered in Austria. Additionally, Wladislas paid 100 000 florins in reparations, and promised inheritance rights to the Habsburgs (as stipulated in 1463) in the event of his own death without a male heir.

³ The reference is to Wladislas’s brother, John Albert, who tried to make good his claims to the throne of Hungary by arms and gave them up only at the end of 1491.

⁴ Regnicola meant in medieval Hungary a member of the enfranchised nobility and only rarely (as its verbatim meaning) any inhabitant of the country. We translate it as “gentleman of the realm.”

⁵ 2 February 1492

comfort of theirs and of all other gentlemen of the realm and the tranquility of the entire kingdom. The text of these articles is as follows:

1. First, the royal majesty shall keep the kingdom of Hungary together with the other kingdoms, namely Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia, as well as Transylvania⁶ and the provinces subject to it, as well as the lords prelates and barons, all churches and churchmen, nobles and towns, and moreover the other inhabitants and dwellers of the same kingdoms and Transylvania in their ancient rights, privileges, immunities, and approved customs, in which the late blessed kings kept them, and which they used and enjoyed; [1] thus he may not introduce any innovations whatsoever to their detriment and oppression and against these ancient liberties of theirs under any invented excuse, as the late Lord King Matthias did. [2] Rather, he shall abolish those introduced by the same most serene late Lord King Matthias.⁷ [3] He shall not exact the contribution or tax of one florin on any pretext, but be content with the traditional, just, ordinary, and usual royal revenues.⁸

2. Then, he should return the goods and all such [property] rights of others which were up until now occupied wrongly and unlawfully by the late King Matthias of blessed memory and her majesty the queen or anybody else, and also cause others to return them to those to whom they belonged, after having inspected and examined these rights.⁹

3. Then, he shall not take the crown of the realm from the hands of the lords prelates and barons by any reason or invented excuse, nor by any art and trick, but according to their ancient custom and liberty should allow and suffer that those unanimously elected and appointed by them from among their number to this task should hold and guard it. [1] He shall give over and assign the castle of Visegrád—traditionally designed for the keeping of this crown—to the hands of these keepers of the same crown.¹⁰

4. Then, he shall not alienate Moravia, nor Silesia and Lusatia from the crown and kingdom of Hungary, but keep them for the crown of Hungary until the time of their redemption according to

⁶ The term regnum was applied not only to kingdoms but also to territories (such as Slavonia, the region between the rivers Drava and Sava). Depending on the context we may translate it as “country” in the sense of Land. Transylvania was usually called partes Transylvanicæ, but for simplicity’s sake we write Transylvania.

⁷ This point—and likewise Arts 5, 6, 7—constituted part of the election promises of the king (the so-called Farkashida agreement)—see above. In fact, much of what follows is taken directly from Matthias’s Decretum maius of 1486.

⁸ The subsidium of one florin for every taxation unit, called porta (originally defined as an extraordinary tax for the war against the Ottomans) was first raised by Sigismund and then, virtually every year by Matthias, see András Kubinyi, Matthias Rex (Budapest: Balassi, 2008) pp. 77–9.

⁹ King Matthias confiscated, among much else, the properties of the participants in the 1467 Transylvanian uprising for the benefit of John Corvin; see e.g., Kubinyi, Matthias. pp. 121–2.

¹⁰ Cf. 1464:2 regulating the guarding of the crown after its recovery from Emperor Frederick III. From no later than the mid-fourteenth century the regalia were kept in Visegrád (at the bend of the Danube).

the terms of their pledge¹¹ and other obligations made in the diet of Olomouc.¹² [1] And should His Majesty die without a legitimate heir, he will arrange while alive that even after his death [these] will not be alienated under any title or pretext from the same crown and kingdom until the time of redemption. [2] Furthermore, he will strive for and bring it about that the six cities¹³ should pledge and obligate themselves in the same way as those provinces according to the treaty and decision made in the aforementioned diet. They shall moreover issue and hand over letters which His Majesty shall order to be deposited in and given to the repository of the crown of Hungary.¹⁴ [3] If, however, in the course of time the said dominions should be redeemed from the crown and kingdom of Hungary by those to whom they pertain according to the terms of the pledges and obligations made about them, then the entire sum of money is to be given to the keepers of the crown in order to be kept in Visegrád next to the crown for the needs of the realm;¹⁵ [4] and eventually it should be laid out and applied to the defense and use of the country according to the will and counsel of the lord prelates and barons. [5] And nothing should be decided or done with this money for any reason whatsoever without the will and counsel and free and express consent of the same lord prelates and barons.¹⁶

¹¹ Inscriptio is a term essentially equal to impignoratio, i.e. pledge, mortgage, an arrangement by which all or part of an estate was assigned together with its income to a creditor. Such pledging could also be ordered by a judge for the benefit of a plaintiff entitled to satisfaction or in matrimonial suits (dower, filial quarter). The contract of pledge needed to be authenticated by a place of authentication. Relatives had preemptory rights. The creditor had full rights to the usufruct of the pledged property and could pledge it further but had to return it at a set date (32 years was the usual maximum term). This practice basically followed the Roman legal institution of pignus and antichresis.

¹² The peace of Olomouc (negotiated in 1478) between Matthias and Wladislas as king of Bohemia was ratified on 21 July 1479: it was laid that both retained their titles to the kingdom of Bohemia, and that the territories conquered by Corvinus (Moravia, Silesia and Lusatia) might be redeemed only after his death.

¹³ Görlitz, Bautzen, Löbau, Kamenz, Zittau and Lauborn in Upper Lusatia.

¹⁴ Domus tavernicalis coronæ Hungariæ refers to a depository in the castle of Buda under the jurisdiction of the Master of the Treasury, where, as far as we know, documents and other valuables were stored. The Master of the Treasury, (magister tavernicorum) was one of high royal officers originally responsible for the royal court's provisioning, derived from the Hungarian name for the guards of royal magazines (tavernici, from Slavic tovar, ware). From the fourteenth century onwards, he was no longer associated with the treasury, but was rather the presiding judge of the appeal court of certain royal cities (sedes tavernicalis).

¹⁵ The concatenation of the actual crown jewel and the metaphoric "crown", i.e. the symbolic sovereign has been noted by—among others—Fritz Hartung, "Die Krone als Symbol monarchischer Gewalt im ausgehenden Mittelalter," now in Manfred Hellman, ed. Corona Regni (Darmstadt: Wiss. Buchg. 1961), pp. 1–69.

¹⁶ These territories were never regained by the Hungarian crown but remained parts of the Bohemian crownlands until 1635, when they were acquired by Saxony.

5. Then, His Majesty shall mostly stay in Hungary, in order that he can look after and provide for the needs of the kingdom more conveniently and easily.¹⁷

6. Then, while he is staying in Hungary, he should keep and have Hungarians as counselors, chancellors, treasurers, stewards, cup-bearers, cellarers, chamberlains, and generally all major or minor office holders, just as was customary and observed in the time of the late most serene Lord King Ladislas of blessed memory.¹⁸

7. Then, when something is done regarding the matters and affairs of the kingdom of Hungary or parts subject to it, he shall discuss and consult with none other than Hungarian counselors, and not admit other foreigners and other nations to such discussions.

8. Then, he shall grant and transfer as offices neither the voivodeship of Transylvania nor the office of the ispán of the *Székel*y and of Temes, nor the banate of Slavonia, Croatia and Dalmatia as well as of Severin, Belgrade and Jajce, nor other castles and locations on the borders, nor royal cities to any other than well deserving Hungarians.

9. Goods and property rights shall not be conferred on foreigners but on well deserving inhabitants of the kingdom and subjects of the crown of Hungary according to their merits and services.¹⁹ [1] However, the royal majesty shall have free right to grant up to one hundred tenant peasants²⁰ on his own initiative to whomever he wishes; [2] but for more than one hundred he shall make grants with the counsel of his prelates and barons, as contained in His Majesty's sworn charter.

10. Then, at the octave courts²¹ the justices ordinary of Hungary²² shall be personally present unless they or any one of them is hindered by some legitimate cause or urgent affair of the realm.²³

¹⁷ This measure had been previously included in 1439:33 in respect of King Albert, the first king of Hungary to be in possession of other kingdoms at the time of his Hungarian coronation.

¹⁸ Ladislas V Posthumus; the point here is to antedate King Matthias's times, even though the latter did not employ more "foreigners" than any other ruler. A prohibition on foreigners obtaining high dignities was mentioned as early as the Golden Bull 1222:11 and then repeated several times during the reign of Sigismund and Albert (1397:48, 1439:5).

¹⁹ Cf. 1222:26, 1439:16.

²⁰ That is peasant plots; the number of peasants was the usual measure of land. A hundred tenant plots would have meant a middle-size property. In contrast to the preceding measures about foreigners, this limitation was new—and was to be rescinded in 1498:26.

²¹ Octavial courts (octava) refer to the session of royal courts of justice; of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times

²² In the late fifteenth century, the major royal courts were those of the count palatine, the judge royal, the Master of the Treasury, and the personalis presentia regia.

²³ On the mandatory presence of the judges ordinary see 1486:3.

[1] They or their deputies and the assessors shall have free, full and entire power to administer true and genuine justice to all litigants, greater and lesser men of whatever estate, condition, and dignity, without any fear according to the ancient and approved custom of the realm. [2] The royal majesty or the lord prelates and barons shall not force or compel any judge to anyone's advantage to change or disturb the customs, common practices, and the due process of law.

11. Then, the royal majesty shall not in any way impede any of his inhabitants of the realm, of whatever state or dignity, in his person, possessions or any other belongings upon a simple request or sly suggestion, without hearing the party.²⁴

12. Then, the royal majesty shall neither of his own volition nor upon the information of anyone conceive and seek opportunity to harm in his person or property any inhabitant of the realm of whatever estate or dignity.²⁵

13. Then, the royal majesty should not condemn any of the gentlemen of the realm to the taint and crime of infidelity without the counsel of the prelates and barons.²⁶

14. Then, all castles, fortified houses,²⁷ towns, villages or estates, and fishponds and any property rights occupied by anyone in whatever way after the death of the late most serene Lord King Matthias, shall by the coming feast of the Ascension of the Lord²⁸ be returned by the same occupiers to those from whom they were taken away, under the penalty of perpetual taint of

²⁴ Cf. 1464:18. A similar article in 1471:2 excluded those nobles who were retainers or officeholders of any lord, and allowed their arrest in the event of unfaithful service.

²⁵ Apparently Wladislas did not explicitly confirm the Golden Bull of 1222 (unless in the lost coronation decree). Nevertheless, this clause and the preceding one confirm in essence the habeas corpus clause contained in the Golden Bull.

²⁶ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate..

²⁷ The two types of housing may mean different types of residence. Castellum, (Hung. kastély, Germ. Schloss) is the term we used for a noble residence ("country house") that was not necessarily fortified in a military sense. The distinction between castrum and castellum is a moot point among art historians and archeologists, see e.g., György Györffy, Civitas, castrum, castellum,” Acta Antiqua Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 23 (1975), 331–334; or Gábor Virágos, Noble Residences and Their Social Context in Hungary in the Thirteenth through the Sixteenth Centuries. PhD Diss., Central European University, 2002.

²⁸ May 16 1492.

infidelity.²⁹ [1] Should, however, these occupiers presume by rash daring to do otherwise, then these violent occupiers shall be held to return them, after having been notified personally by the royal or palatinal bailiff³⁰ or that of the judge royal and the man of the chapter or convent competent for the county in which these property rights, namely castles, fortified houses, towns, villages as well as fishponds or other occupied property rights are located,³¹ or if they cannot be found personally, then at the house of their dwelling where they have personal residence.³² [2] If, however, they still act contrary in this matter, they shall be summoned for the thirty-second day from the summons issued in this matter,³³ and the royal majesty or other justices ordinary by whose authority the same occupiers have been notified and summoned, have the right to issue and hand out their letters of sentence against them as if condemned in court, and have these ordered to be executed, and moreover recover the goods thus occupied by force of the same sentence from their hands and return them to those whose they had been, and grant the rest of all the goods of the violent occupier as those of a faithless man to whomever he [the royal majesty] wants. [3] First,

²⁹ Lawlessness during interregna—to which this and the following two articles refer—is a well-known feature of medieval history, illustrated by the famous Brescia episode after Emperor Conrad II's death, when the royal castle was destroyed by the burghers "as there is no emperor." The same was decreed by King Matthias for the interregnum and civil war that followed the death of King Albert. 1464:12.

³⁰ The homo regius (or palatinalis), was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. It seems that in lawsuits bailiffs were selected by the litigants from among the nobles of their counties. Royal clerks were also commissioned as specially delegated royal bailiffs with powers more extensive than regular royal bailiffs.

³¹ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, Zsolt. "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66-73..

³² Summons were of different kinds. Personal summons: when a nobleman was summoned on the spot for having disrupted the meeting of the diet or a trial; simple summons: delivered to the respondent at his noble residence, giving notice of a protracted lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, a terminal summons, issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party (used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might) would be issued. Here short (or final) summons (citatio brevis) are meant; a summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summon.

³³ Although the short summons was summarily abolished by Matthias, 25 January 1486:2, it apparently continued to be used.

however, His Majesty shall give full satisfaction to the damaged party for the losses from the goods and estates of the occupier.

15. Then, all castles and fortifications raised and built by anyone within the borders of this kingdom of Hungary and other kingdoms subject to it, because of the wars in these times,³⁴ namely after the death and decease of the same Lord King Matthias, shall be razed and demolished by those who built and erected them within a set term, under penalty of the taint of infidelity,³⁵ [1] excluding only those which have been erected and built on the borders of the kingdom in defense of the faithful against the Turks and other enemies of the realm. [2] If any of them should refuse to destroy these [the illegal ones], then the royal majesty can freely grant the goods and estates on which the said fortifications have been built to whomever he wants, as if those of unfaithful men.³⁶

16. Then, because there are many people in the country, who after the death of the late Lord King Matthias have by their own rashness dared to inflict and cause much damage, harm and injury to others peacefully staying in their houses; [1] it has therefore been decreed that those who have suffered such damage, harm, and injury either in their persons, goods or belongings in whatever way have the right and liberty to take to court those who inflicted that damage, harm, and injury, and obtain remedy at law from them for their damage, harm, and injury. [2] Justice shall be thus administered in regard to them without any delay on the first octave after the [other party] has been summoned.

17. Then, the royal highness shall for the protection of the realm and the defense of its borders make payments out of the royal income for his men, both those holding his offices and other soldiers, so that these mercenaries or officers holding the borders do not prey on the gentlemen of the realm. [1] However, such soldiers, officers or mercenaries shall be denounced like other perpetrators of acts of might³⁷ if they pillage the gentlemen of the realm,³⁸ in regard to whom the

³⁴ See Pál Engel, The Realm of St Stephen: A History of Medieval Hungary, 895–1526, (London-New York: I.B. Tauris 2005), pp. 346–7.

³⁵ In Hungary, the need for royal permission to build castles went back to the later thirteenth century; see Erik Fügedi, Castle and Society in Medieval Hungary (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1983), pp. 48–52.

³⁶ I.e. those convicted of the charge of infidelity.

³⁷ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (sc. rape).

³⁸ This matter was regulated in great detail in Sigismund’s decree of 17 March 1427(a). See also 29 May 1439: 3 and 21 January 1486: 30–1.

justices ordinary of the realm shall administer judgment and justice in the way and form described in the sixth article after this one.³⁹

18. Then, the general levy shall not be proclaimed for the lord prelates, barons as well as the gentlemen of the realm, and men of property of whatever condition for as long as the officers and soldiers paid by the king can resist the enemy. [1] When, however, the general levy happens to be called up on account of pressing need, then the same banderial lord prelates and barons⁴⁰ and the nobles of the realm shall not be led in campaign against their will beyond the borders and frontiers of the kingdom from any part of the country, as their ancient liberty demands, except for those who collect royal payment.⁴¹

19. Then, in order to avoid the difficulties which often emerge in the course of campaigns, it has been decided and decreed [1] that whenever the royal majesty wishes to wage war beyond this realm of his for his own convenience or private interest, then the lord prelates and barons as well as nobles of the realm and other men of property do not have to go with His Majesty against their will, nor to send their men; they shall not be forced in any way to do this, unless they are officers of the royal majesty or have received payment from His Majesty for such a campaign. [2] If it should, however, happen that enemies or foes of any nation attack in force the kingdom or its frontiers by war or army, then while the officers and the paid soldiers of the king suffice to resist such enemies and foes, the royal majesty shall not announce and proclaim the general levy. [3] If, however, the power of the enemy is such that the strengths of the said officers and paid royal soldiers are insufficient to resist it, then the royal majesty will necessarily announce and proclaim the general levy. [4] When the royal majesty or the palatine or the captain general of the realm appointed at that time sets out personally for such a general levy, then the lord prelates and barons who have banderia shall also march with their flags raised, and the other barons and nobles in the way declared below, to the frontiers and borders of the realm, but not beyond, as their ancient liberty demands, except, as said above, the aforesaid officers and mercenaries of the king.⁴²

20. Then, in order that any kind of matter of contention and quarrel in the course of such a military campaign be excluded, it has been decreed and ordered [1] that there must be in any full banderium four hundred, in any half two hundred armed men, the half of whom should be armored and the other half light cavalry commonly called huszár.⁴³ [2] The other barons who do not have banderia

³⁹ i. e. Art 23, below p 14–5.

⁴⁰ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’) were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field banderia were called banderial lords.

⁴¹ These limitations (as also in Art. 19) also go back to the Golden Bull of 1222:7.

⁴² Cf. 12 March 1435:1.

⁴³ The size of banderia was regulated variously (see e.g. Prop. 1432/3, DRMH 2: 149–52). That half of them should be hussars, would appear to be new. Hussars (Hung. huszár) were light cavalrymen, equipped with sabers and only lightly armed, these played an increasing role in the Hungarian armies, shall campaign according to their dignity and means and the number of their tenant peasants. [3] Nobles and men of property of lesser standing shall send one well-equipped horseman after every twenty portæ or full peasant plots,⁴⁴ while similarly the nobles of one plot, namely those who have no tenant peasants one horseman after every ten houses or dwellings,⁴⁵ with at least a lance, shield, handbow, and, if possible, even a coat of mail.⁴⁶

21. Then, there are also dukes in this kingdom, namely the illustrious lords John Corvin and Lawrence Újlaki, moreover there are perpetual and free ispáns, namely the spectabiles and *magnifici*⁴⁷ lords Stephen Szapolyai of Spiš as well as John and Sigismund Bazini-Szentgyörgyi with their kinsmen,⁴⁸ finally the counts Frankapan and those of Krbava, who have to come to campaign to the extent of their means and the number of their tenant peasants⁴⁹ in the manner of barons having banderia.⁵⁰

22. On damages caused during campaign and their satisfaction.

= 12 March 1435:7 and 1486:30

Adding: [5] If, however, the persons inflicting such damages are men from other countries or foreigners, the royal majesty shall be held to offer full satisfaction in regard to them under the mainly as a counterweight to the Ottoman spahi cavalry. By the close of the Middle Ages some hussars were fitted with armor.

⁴⁴ On this, the so-called militia portalis, established in 1397: 6, see András Borosy, “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds., From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary. East European Monographs, 104, (Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80.

⁴⁵ The Latin word used here (curia) may indicate a residence more elaborate than a simple rural house, hinting at the petty nobles’ standing; see note 41, above.

⁴⁶ The great number of nobles of one plot, who in fact lived like peasants but held fast to their legal status, gradually lost many of their privileges, such as their full exemption from taxes; see Rady, Nobility, Land and Service, p. 154.

⁴⁷ These intitulations were among the formal privileges of the great men of the realm.

⁴⁸ These persons were the greatest landowners in the country, each holding 14–30 castles, 17–47 towns and 200–1000 villages. John Corvin (1473–1504) natural son of King Matthias, was from 1491 prince of Slavonia; Lawrence Újlaki, duke (d. 1524) was the son of King Nicholas, ban of Mačva 1477–92, judge royal 1518–24; Stephen Zapolya (aka Szapolyai) (d. 1499) was count palatine 1492–9; John and Sigismund Szengyörgyi and Bazini, were dukes, banderial lords in 1492; the Frangepán (Frankopan), were a Croatian magnate family, counts of Modrus, Krk and Senj.

⁴⁹ On the details of the military system, revising the one of Sigismund (Prop. 1432/33), see also 1498:20–2.

⁵⁰ Although the expression ‘instar’ is somewhat obscure here, it most likely refers to aristocrats having banderia who did not hold high offices of the realm. By 1498, this division of the aristocrats has been set, see 1498:22. This simply means that they field banderia according to their resources and not according to the 400 men allocation.

aforementioned conditions.⁵¹ [6] Whoever wishes to prosecute his case in the matter of such damages in the royal court, shall be able and allowed to do so as in regard to other acts of might.

[7] Should, however, the damaged persons be found to have sworn a false oath in this case, they shall be punished as if they were forgers, perjurers and slanderers.

23. Judging the excesses of troops.

= 1486:31 lines 23–42

24. Acts of might committed by castellans or officers

≈ 8 March 1435:6

25. Then, the borders which have existed since ancient times between Hungary and Austria, which were recently rectified and recovered by the late King Matthias, shall be kept and retained in the same condition by the royal majesty⁵² And the royal majesty shall decide on a similar rectification of the borders between Hungary and Moravia as well as Poland,⁵³ which should be done in the best interest of the kingdoms.

26. Then, the king shall cause the chamber's profit to be collected in Hungary, the fiftieth in Transylvania, and the mardurina as traditionally collected in Slavonia,⁵⁴ in the same way as in ancient times, namely under the late lord kings Sigismund and Albert. [1] However, where the chamber's profit is not paid on time, the county ispán together with a noble magistrate shall collect the chamber's profit from the delinquent village along with a fine of three marks, following the issue of a letter of fine, as is usually issued by noble magistrates against such [delinquents] with no exceptions.

27. Then, the thirtieth shall be levied by the royal majesty in the heretofore usual places according to ancient custom, as in the times of the lord kings Louis, Sigismund, and Albert. [1] The officers ⁵¹ The reference is obviously to the (mainly Czech) paid soldiers of the king.

⁵² The reference is to seven lordships originally pledged to Frederick III in 1447 that only returned to Hungary in 1647: Szarvkő (Hornstein), Kismarton (Eisenstadt), Fraknó (Forchenstein), Kabold (Kobersdorf), Borostyánkő (Bernstein), Kőszeg (Güns), Rohonc (Rechnitz). See István Bariska, A Szent Koronáért elzálogosított Nyugat-Magyarország 1447– 1647 [Western Hungary pledged for the Holy Crown], (Szombathely: Vas Megyei Levéltár, 2007).

⁵³ The reference to the rectification of the Hungarian-Moravian border is puzzling. Admittedly, there were frequent cross-border problems that are attested to much earlier than Matthias's rule, and there were problems already in 1467/1468 when he started the war, but none of these concerned the line of the border. The mentioning of Poland here is also obscure.

⁵⁴ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; by the late thirteenth century, it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. The fiftieth (quingagesima) was a royal tax collected mainly from Romanians. Originally levied in kind on transhumance shepherds (based upon the number of sheep) in Wallachia but later raised from those settled in villages as well. Gradually it was transformed to a tax levied in cash. Mardurina (originally a marten-fur tax) was fixed at twelve Friesach pennies after each manse.

of the thirtieth shall not dare levy any thirtieth on minor things worth less than one florin.⁵⁵ [2] Those thirtieths, however, which are mortgaged to Lord Stephen Szapolyai, perpetual *ispán*⁵⁶ of Spiš and palatine of Hungary as well as to other lords, are to be collected in the aforementioned way in their usual places until the time of their redemption.⁵⁷

28. Then, the royal majesty shall not allow the forceful exaction of victuals, billeting or any other impositions on the estates and places of churches and noblemen, or any other ecclesiastical or lay person against the will of the host, nor shall he allow others to do so. [1] Nor shall he stay uninvited in the houses or places of prelates, barons or any other ecclesiastical or lay persons whomsoever, for holding meeting or discharging other business, or burden them in any way by expenses, provisioning, delivering carts and luggage, and the sustenance of emissaries, retainers or any other men of the royal majesty whomsoever, without their express approval,⁵⁸ [2] as was improperly introduced against their will in the times of the said late Lord King Matthias.

29. Then, from now on and in the future, no archdeacon, vice-archdeacon⁵⁹ or parish priest, nor their deputies, shall dare improperly exact, on pain of loss of their benefices, that mark of silver or four gold florins beyond the hitherto customary funeral fees for the interment of the victims of murders, which was, as is well known, canceled and abolished by papal bulls in the times of the lord kings Charles, Louis, Sigismund, and Albert upon the request of these kings.⁶⁰ [1] However, they have full right to collect from the murderers.⁶¹

30. Then, it has been concluded that if mines or adits of gold or silver, copper, iron or whatever metal are found—except for salt mines, which are exclusively reserved for the property and use of ⁵⁵ The thirtieth (tricesima) was a customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. The “usual places” are listed in 1498: 34. Exemption of minor items from the customs duty had not been previously decreed.

⁵⁶ On Szapolyai, see above, n. 62. As early as the thirteenth century, a few prelates and, later, some major lords were granted the title of perpetual ispán of a county.

⁵⁷ The sizeable amount of royal revenues in the hands of the Szapolyai family came to be a recurrent problem in the 1490s and later.

⁵⁸ The prohibition of forced descensus and related burdens goes back to the Golden Bull (1222:3 and 15;); cf. 29 May 1439: 18.

⁵⁹ The archdeacon (archidiaconus): was since the end of the eleventh century the ecclesiastical administrator of a district that usually coincided with a royal county, four or more of which constituted a diocese. Later the archdeacon (also called archpriest, archipresbiter) moved to the episcopal see and became a (mainly judicial) administrative officer of the bishop, entrusting a part of his office to a priest of a major parish (plebanus) as vice-archdeacon (vice archidiaconus). See: Alexander Szentirmai, “Das Recht des Erzdechanten [Archidiakon] in Ungarn während des Mittelalters.” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte: Kan. Abt. 43 (1957): 132–201

⁶⁰ This practice had been already prohibited in a letter of Pope Benedict XII, issued at the request of King Charles I; see 1351:2.

⁶¹ The last sentence was not contained in previous legislation.

the royal majesty—wherever and within the borders of lands or properties of any lord prelate, baron or nobleman as well as of any other man of property of whatever condition, they and their heirs in the land of whose estates these were found are able and allowed to mine, maintain and have them exploited at all times in the future, as well as to take their usufruct. [1] They shall do so, however, in such a way that they faithfully render the regalian rights, that is the urbura, which belong to the royal right and emanates from it according to the custom of other mines.⁶² [2] However, there are many [persons], mostly lord prelates, barons and substantial nobles of this realm, who by the donation and permission of the previous blessed kings of Hungary, maintain and have worked mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, and other metals, again excepting salt mines as was mentioned above. They are able and allowed to maintain and have these worked freely and without any hindrance, and to keep their revenue according to the concessions, grants, and approval of the aforementioned kings and the contents of their privileges.⁶³

31. Then, foreign coins and money shall not be introduced nor accepted in the kingdom. [1] Those who act contrary shall be punished with the heretofore usual penalty, except for those who live near the borders of countries.⁶⁴

32. Then, as there are numerous merchants and other people of different nations who impoverish the resources of the kingdom by exporting its treasure, that is gold and silver, and depriving the same kingdom of these, [1] it has been decreed for the public interest and common good by the common consent and decision of all lord prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm that nobody at all, be he of whatever dignity, nation or condition, should dare or be able to export melted gold or silver which has not yet been rendered to gold or silver coins, for any reason whatsoever. [2] Should, however, anyone presume to do or proceed against this decree, then whoever finds such a person, namely exporting gold or silver, shall have full and unlimited right by the force of the present law or decree, to arrest them in person and take away from the exporters their gold, silver, and other belongings and to keep these.⁶⁵

33. Then, since the palatine of the kingdom of Hungary has, according to ancient custom of the realm, the right and duty to render judgment and justice in regard to the gentlemen of the realm against the royal majesty, and in turn in regard to the royal majesty against the gentlemen of the realm, the royal majesty shall choose this palatine with the counsel of the prelates, barons and nobles of the realm in equal concord. [1] In order that all suspicion that may arise over favor or

⁶² The urbura was the treasury's due from precious metals mined on private properties, 1/10 of gold and 1/8 of silver.

⁶³ The arrangement goes back to the mining and minting reforms of Charles I; see. 1342. For that and the following articles cf. Csaba Tóth, Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation in Hungary in the Árpadian and Angevin Periods, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 279–94 and Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” Ibid. pp. 295–308 hatred or anything else concerning this palatine and other judges and justices of the same realm be removed and banished from the hearts of all, in future each and every judge and justice of this realm, spiritual as well as secular; those namely who are chosen and appointed as palatine; judge royal; master of the royal treasury; royal chancellor or vice-chancellor; protonotaries or deputies of the said judges as well as their assessors in judging;⁶⁶ voivode of Transylvania; ispán of the Székely; ban of the kingdoms of Dalmatia or Croatia; ban of Slavonia; ban of Mačva, as well as ispán of any county and noble magistrate, and additionally their deputies, substitutes, and assessors in court, must take an oath at the time of their reception to these honors and offices of administration of justice and judgment into the hands of the royal majesty or deputies of the royal majesty in the form here written. The form of the oath follows in these words:

⁶⁴ Cf. 20 May 1439: 1. For previous legislation in this matter, see e.g. 15 April 1405: 19 and 31 August 1405: 13.

⁶⁵ Cf. 15 April 1405:15.

I, N. swear by the living God and the holy mother of God, the Virgin Mary, and by all the saints and elect of God, that I will to my ability render just and true justice and judgment as well as execution in all matters to all litigants before me and in all affairs which pertain to my office, without regard to person, to rich and poor alike, having put aside and made as naught any entreaty, price, favor, fear, hatred, love or fancy, as I will know must be done according to God and His justice. So help me God and all the saints.⁶⁷

And it is here stated that the palatine has to swear the oath in the prescribed form publicly in front of the gentlemen of the realm after his election.

34. Election of noble magistrates in the counties

= 8 March 1435:2

35. Abolition of the extraordinary court of the palatine

≈ 25 Jan. 1486:1

Adding: [2] In the event however that some powerful men in the same county are unwilling to have or seek [such an inquisition], the community of the nobles of the county⁶⁸ shall have the full right to apply to the royal majesty.

36. Abolition of extraordinary county assemblies

⁶⁶ Protonotaries (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, "master in sentencing") were practical lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases. See György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1971), briefly Idem, "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary," East Central Europe/l'Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977) 181–191.

⁶⁷ An almost identical oath was to be sworn by judges according to 8 March 1435:1. In subsequent decrees this formula was referred to as the "oath of Rákos."

⁶⁸ By communitas nobilium should be understood the periodically held county assemblies.

= 25 Jan 1486:2⁶⁹

37. Abolition of judicial combat

= 25 Jan 1486:18

38. Abolition of proclamation at three fairs and the adjudication of obligations

= 25 Jan 1486:17

39. Then, it has been ordered that small convents, especially the one at Săniob, must cease issuing letters, and these shall be without authority.⁷⁰

40. Two annual octaves shall be held

= 25 Jan 1486:3: lines 1–12 Adding: [6] Letters of judgment⁷¹ shall always be taken out from the archive by the protonotaries according to need.

41. Octaves in Transylvania and Slavonia

= 25 Jan 1486:3: lines 13–6

42. The judges ordinary of the kingdom and access to the court

≈ 25 Jan 1486:68⁷²

43. Persons and the oath of the royal bailiffs and witnesses of the places of authentication

≈ 8 March 1435:8–9⁷³

44. Then, there are often many errors and scandals in the issue of letters because of the negligence of the priors of regulars and abbots, who have under them places of authentication using seals of testimony. [1] This is mainly because these priors and abbots are known to have in respect of guarding the seal little authority over the monks living under them, and they do not have sufficient persons to merit the name of a convent but much fewer. They misuse their seals freely to the ⁶⁹ The article omits the last sentence of the Decretum maius of Matthias on the abolition of short summons, which had not in fact taken effect.

⁷⁰ = 25 Jan 1486:59. The right to authentication was taken from a number of lesser convents already in 1351:3, repeated in 1397:28. The expressly named Benedictine convent of Siniob/Szentjobb—founded in the late eleventh century, and for a while guardian of the arm-relic of St. Stephen; hence its name which means the Holy Right Hand—recovered its right to act as a place of authentication only through the offices of John Vitéz, in the 1450s administrator of the abbey, and retained it even under its subsequent administrator, Peter of Várad, until the latter's falling out of grace (see I. Bodor, “Reneszánsz stíluselemek a Mohács előtti magyar pecséteken” [Renaissance stylistic elements on pre-Mohács Hungarian seals], Művészettörténeti Értesítő 31 (1982): 104 n. 10).

⁷¹ Littere iudiciales usually mean letters of fine, but here it may refer to all types of judicial records.

⁷² The present decretum omits the last sentence of 1486: 68 which included a fine and incarceration.

⁷³ The present article omits a justificatory preamble of the 1435 law, and doubles the fine for refusing to serve as royal bailiff.

detriment of the people.⁷⁴ [2] Hence, that this kind of wicked misuse should cease forthwith and the people have a safer protection, it has been concluded and ordered that from now on these priors regular and abbots having authentic seals be held and made responsible for having in their monasteries ten or eight religious persons, priests of their order, or at the very least seven and not fewer,⁷⁵ and that together with them they should exhibit due diligence in the issue of letters. [3] In order that these priors and abbots may use their authority more freely, it has been decided that from now on the said monks or brethren of whatever order using seals should be regarded as being under the power and authority of these priors and abbots, and these priors and abbots should have the right to punish them according to their deserts. [4] So if there happens to be any error in the issue of any letters whatsoever, then the prior and custos of such a place shall be punished with the aforementioned penalty. [5] In order that all suspicion be eliminated from the hearts of the doubting, it is fitting that the names of these brethren, namely the prior and custos, be fully written out at the end of each letter before the date.⁷⁶

45. Then, because many clerks and people of different conditions, both nobles and ignobles, often summon people of this realm especially the simpler ones to the Roman curia—or when a legate of the pope comes to this kingdom of Hungary, into his presence,—in some contrived matters and sometimes even frivolously, calling them into the Roman curia or presence of the legate, and they attempt to force them to the payment of a certain sum by continuously pressing and harassing them with lawsuits, thus supporting and maintaining their life criminally by right and wrong, [1] it is ordered and laid down by the barons, lords and the community of this whole realm that in future the unlawful complaints and frivolous claims of these criminals, greedy for profit, cease; [2] henceforth nobody at all shall dare to summon anyone in any matter whatsoever to the Roman curia or to the presence of any legate, unless he first appears before his diocesan ordinary, archbishop or bishop or his deputy and proceeds with him at law; and finally if any of the parties feels either that justice has been denied him, or that he was otherwise improperly burdened and convicted, then he can take, move, and prosecute such a case in the Roman curia or the presence of its legate by appeal and no other way. [3] Those acting contrariwise shall be duly punished.⁷⁷

⁷⁴ The misuse of seals was a frequent complaint in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and it normally came about due to poor supervision of the seal, particularly when the seal was used by individual clerics rather than by the chapter or convent acting as a body. Bernát L. Kumorovitz, A magyar pecséthasználat története a középkorban [History of Hungarian sealing practice in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: Magyar Nemzeti Múzeum, 1993), p. 79.

⁷⁵ The uncertainty of the minimal numbers of canons reflects the fact that Hungarian religious orders often had problems with recruitment. Elemér Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon [Clerical society in medieval H.](Budapest: Akadémiai, 1971) pp. 212–21 lists—based on contemporary visitations (printed in László Erdélyi, A pannonhalmi Szent Benedek rend története [History of the Benedictine Order in Pannonhalma], Vol. 12/b (Budapest: Szent István Társulat, 1912)—several abbeys where only one or two monks lived around 1500, The reform that started in 1500 achieved some, however limited, results before Mohács (ibid. pp. 222–35).

⁷⁶ Cf. 1486:11.

46. Then, no case shall be tried in courts spiritual except for wills, marriages, dowers, paraphernalia and filial quarter, perjury, beating and robbing clerks or women, and other matters which are not of profane character and [in respect of lay courts] vice versa.⁷⁸ [1] Should, however, any judge spiritual accept a suit not pertaining to his court and not refer it to the presence of a secular judge upon a letter of command, then such a judge spiritual shall be deprived of his prebend and the royal majesty can confer that benefice on someone else outright. [2] Spiritual judges are understood in this case the deputies and officers of the prelates. [3] If, however, the judge secular recognizes that a certain case referred to him by a judge spiritual pertains to a court spiritual, he ought and shall return it to the presence of that judge spiritual.

47. The rendering of the ninth

≈ 1351:6: lines 1–9⁷⁹

48. Exactng the ninth from church property as well

≈ 1351:6: lines 9–17⁸⁰

49. Then, the tenant peasants of one and all, namely those of the king as well as of the queen or the lord prelates, barons and nobles, who have vineyards or plough land in the land of other lords⁸¹ must and shall give and render in the same way the ninth part of their vine and crop, the usual akones and the customary dues to the lord of the land. [1] Where, however, such payments are not made or neglected in any other way, then those properties from which these payments are due shall become outright those of the lord of the land. [2] Stating finally that if any of the people of the ⁷⁷ Cf. 1486:45. The prohibition goes back in essence to the placetum regium of King Sigismund, (6 April 1404.) and goes against the decretals of canon law, according to which the legate was ordinarius in his own legatine province, thus entitled to hear any kind of case in the first instance. (cf. Liber Extra X 1.30.1).

⁷⁸ This paragraph has a long history, see among others 1405:14 and 1462:3. See also György Bónis, “Die Entwicklung der geistlichen Gerichtsbarkeit in Ungarn vor 1526,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan. Abt. 49 (1963) 174–235.

⁷⁹ The only difference to the 1351 law is that in the present article akones consuetos, that is the ‘usual’ due from wine (akó being a measure of volume approx. 54 litres), are listed as an alternative to the traditional due of the ninth, i.e. the seigneurial claim to the “second tenth” of the tenant peasants’ produce. Whether akones were different from the ninth of the wine is unclear.

⁸⁰ In addition to the terms of 1351:6 the threat of royal collection of dues from the subjects of reluctant lords is elaborated upon, naming the ispán and alispán as responsible for collecting in the name of the king (comes et vicecomes nomine nostro regio) the ninth owed by tenants to ecclesiastical landowners.

⁸¹ This refers to peasants, who—in consequence of the shortage of labor—often rented empty plots and especially vineyards, usually in the same village where they lived, and thus may have escaped some seigneurial dues.

king, the queen or anyone else claims to have exemptions from such ninth or akones, then justice has to be administered by the judges ordinary of the realm at the first octave court.

50. Exemption of all nobles from tithes

= 29 May 1439:28

51. Many a gentleman of the realm, mostly in cases started against them in matters of property, once the deadlines in the process and the set terms have passed, and the letters and all other requisite documents have been thence adduced so as finally to conclude the suit, in the last stage of the case, even as the justices ordinary of the law court of the realm and the protonotaries and sworn assessors of the same court have delivered their sentence, when one of the parties realizes that he has failed and lost the case and that the resulting letters of adjudication either have been already drawn up and handed down or will be handed down once sentence is given and pronounced, are apt to recall their attorneys, wishing to have their cases declared failed, and to obtain a new trial on the strength of which they may often prevent the other party from executing the letters of adjudication, thus depriving it of its just rights. [1] For this reason it has been decided that henceforth such litigants can recall their attorneys and have the case fail only as long as a suit is pending and no decision has yet been reached. [2] However, let them obtain a new trial, whenever they wish. Yet this must in no way prevent the other party executing a sentence that has been passed, or hinder the issue of letters of adjudication or impede the justices ordinary and their protonotaries handing these out. [3] Rather, the winning party may have the letters of adjudication executed, notwithstanding any letter of new trial obtained in this way; thereafter the party which has obtained a new trial, once the sentence that has been delivered is executed, may, if it chooses, pursue its action by means of a new trial and have it carried out. [4] But in a case relating to property rights or any other business that one of the parties loses on the grounds of non- appearance—because he was unable to appear having been hindered by, say, some particular matters of concern to him—and he receives a sentence of condemnation, then such a party, having lost the case through non-appearance, shall always be able and, whenever he wishes, have the right to obtain a new trial and to prevent both the justices ordinary and their protonotaries from issuing letters of adjudication and sentence, and the other party from obtaining them.⁸²

52. Then, all such cases in which a new trial is obtained from the royal majesty are to be heard and adjudicated at the first octaves among all other cases.⁸³

53. Furthermore, although it was ordered before the death of the most serene prince the said Lord King Matthias in the new general decree by the same Lord Matthias⁸⁴ and all the lord prelates, barons and noblemen of the realm, that in every county of the kingdom certain jurors be elected from among the more substantial nobles, who in the courts of all these counties shall pass judgment as well as perform and carry out inquests, summonses, notices, institutions, perambulations of ⁸² Transcribed verbatim in Tripartitum. II. 77:5–9.

⁸³ Transcribed verbatim in Tripartitum. II. 77:10 (.

⁸⁴ 1486:8.

boundaries, and all other legal executions; [1] but because this was seen as being very burdensome to the gentlemen of the realm, since they had to attend and appear at the same courts of the said counties before the aforementioned elected jurors, passing judgment upon litigants every thirteen or fifteen days; and also because when the same elected jurors were sent out to perform such executions they were burdened with much labor and expense, [2] it has therefore been decided that henceforth the election and the office of such elected noble jurors cease and be totally abolished. Rather the ispán or alispán and the noble magistrates of the county shall and are held to administer justice in these law courts, and the royal bailiff with the witnesses of the chapter or convent must and are held to execute, carry out, and perform other executions or legal commissions such as inquests, summons, notices, institutions, perambulations of boundaries, and any other legal procedures whatsoever, in the way and manner as were observed in such matters before the aforementioned last new decree of the said late Lord King Matthias.⁸⁵

54. Suits about property have to be finished within four octaves

= 1486:4

Adding: [2] In the following way: that the respondent shall under no circumstances be permitted to present his rights by which he wishes to defend himself in later octaves not even under penalty, but has to present his privileges in these four octaves, without any further legal procedure.⁸⁶

[3]-[5] ≈ 1486:6.

55. Then, in suits moved for damages done or other harm or injury and minor acts of might,⁸⁷ even if the perpetrator has made a confession with his own mouth personally before his judge, no person is henceforth to be convicted of acts of might, but shall only be sentenced to pay for the damages which he caused and for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff (which are awarded to the latter alone), plus twenty-five heavy marks, equivalent to 100 florins, to be divided equally between the judge and the plaintiff, and he will be forced to immediate payment by the judge.⁸⁸

56. However, in major cases, namely, the breaking into houses of nobles without just cause, the seizing of their estates and the appurtenances thereof, the arrest of nobles without just cause, or the beating, wounding, or slaying of nobles, the judge will proceed in the following manner: [1]

⁸⁵ Some historians have sought to see here a deliberate reduction of the political role of the nobility, in contrast to the policy followed by Matthias. It seems however to have been the demand of the lesser nobility to be relieved of this duty. Moreover, the system introduced by Matthias was potentially less advantageous to noble litigants than the older system of royal bailiffs recruited from among those recommended by the plaintiff.

⁸⁶ Attempts at shortening legal procedure had a long history, see e.g. 1351:25. See also Martyn Rady, “Justice Delayed? Litigation and Dispute Settlement in Fifteenth-Century Hungary.” Central Europe, 2 (2004): 3–14. Cf. 1492:73.

⁸⁷ Under “minor acts of might”—included here for the first time in a surviving decree—were subsumed all those crimes that did not count as major acts of might, for the list of which see below Art. 56. Cf. Tripartitum II.67:5. W. failed to define the minor acts anywhere.

⁸⁸ Transcribed verbatim in Tripartitum. II.67:8.

that if the plaintiff for his part has presented evidence at an inquest in the manner and order aforementioned, then the judge shall send the case to a common inquest in order to clarify the issue should the parties so wish. [2] Should, however, the defendant refuse to accept this inquest then the plaintiff shall swear upon the head of his adversary⁸⁹ in order better to prove his plaint according to the custom of the realm observed in this matter. [3] But this will only apply if his opponent or the respondent has his own, personal and continuous residence in the county in which the offense was committed. [4] Where, however, such a respondent personally resides in another part or province of the kingdom, and the aforesaid offense was committed in his absence, he will be required to clear himself as innocent by an oath in accordance with the contents of the letters of inquest. [5] Finally, his retainers and tenant peasants are to be tried and justice administered according to the present article, as the law of the realm requires.⁹⁰

57. The penalty for repulsio

=1486:16

58. On summonses with the clause “by the consent and will of N. N.”

= 1486:13

Adding: [3] excepting the case that such persons lead, direct and protect such evildoers and their families by aid and counsel.⁹¹

59. Prohibition on entering estates in face of contradiction

= 1486:22

60. Abolition of donations “from the royal hand”

= 1486:23

61. Grantees of royal donations have to litigate in their own name

≈ 1351:14⁹²

62. Then, if some of the gentlemen of the realm obtain for themselves some property rights under the title of royal right, but are unable to prove that these pertain to the royal right, they shall be ⁸⁹ Swearing on the head of the adversary constituted a decisive oath on the part of the plaintiff. It is uncertain whether it was physically sworn on the opponent's 'head' (but probably not). See Imre Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és vegyesházi királyok alatt [The Hungarian Judicial System and Procedural Law under the Kings of the Árpád and Diverse Dynasties] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899), pp. 314–15.

⁹⁰ Transcribed verbatim in Tripartitum II.67:9–13.

⁹¹ This type of clause was often used in cases of acts of might in order to widen the circle of the accused often without any proof of their complicity. The clause added in 1492 wished to permit prosecution only in cases of “proven” consent.

⁹² The text of the 1351 article is formulated in the name of the king, while the present one is in the third person.

condemned to the estimation of such property rights. If such obtainers should enter into the ownership of such obtained rights or their income by deception, occupation or any other way before the final decision of the case moved in the matter of such obtained rights, then they shall be convicted of an act of might against the damaged party or litigant burdened with expenses.⁹³

63. Royal donations based on default of issue and the position of female heirs

= 8 March 1435:17–18

64. Then, the dowers of the wives of men deceased in any way, even those who have been legally slain,⁹⁴ shall always remain intact and safe.

65. Redemption of pledged estates and penalty for usury

≈ 1486:25

66. Then, the palatine, the judge royal and other justices ordinary, spiritual as well as secular, shall be first obliged to satisfy the opposing party immediately after the conclusion of the case and the passing of final judgment from all the judicial fees or fines accrued in the cases treated before them, and only then have the right to collect the part pertaining to the judge.⁹⁵

67. The penalty for contempt of court

≈1486:58⁹⁶

68. The right of the parties to make an out-of-court agreement

=1486:5

69. Prohibition of protonotaries from judging outside of court and the duty of judges to sign letters of judgment

=1486:20

70. Penalty for insulting judges

[1]-[3] =1486:54; [4] ≈ 1464:19

71. Prorogations allowed only in exceptional cases

= 1486:7⁹⁷

72. Penalty for losing a suit that has been transferred to a royal court

= 1486:53

⁹³ Cf. 1464:11.

⁹⁴ This refers to criminals who have suffered the death penalty.

⁹⁵ Essentially identical to 1486:52.

⁹⁶ The fine is raised from 20 to 25 marks.

⁹⁷ The earlier law allowed the payment of the fine through an attorney; this is now omitted.

Adding: [2] Stating, however, that if in the court of the aforementioned counties someone was adjudicated to swearing a personal oath then that person cannot appeal against such a judgment.

73. Furthermore, when cases are remitted to the said ispáns and alispáns, having been approved or perchance amended, they often neglect to perform some executions out of favor for the opposite party or on account of some other regard. [1] Therefore, lest the party in respect of whom the judgment has been passed be deprived of his rights, it has been ordered and decreed that if the ispáns and alispáns, after having been requested through letters of the remitting judge, neglect to perform the execution within fifteen days reckoned from the day of the request without any just and reasonable excuse, then such ispáns and alispáns shall right away be convicted of twenty-five marks of heavy weight by the judge whose order they did not execute, to be exacted without any delay or remission. [2] As cases that were transferred from a county court and the noble magistrates to the royal court by appeal were until now always sent to the octave courts and were revised, discussed, and tried only there, and because of this the discussion and revision of the majority of cases started in the royal court had to be more and more frequently neglected or put aside or postponed to later octave courts to the serious harm of the parties; therefore, in order that the parties be spared the labor and expense, and the cases be concluded faster, it has been decreed and ordered

[3] that from now on, any case can and may be transferred to and received by the royal court through appeal from the courts of any county to a proper term even in the interim, that is outside the octaves, and revised, discussed and tried here in Buda by its justices ordinary, that is the judge to whose presence it has been transferred.⁹⁸ [4] Then, as there are many defendants who prolong the cases initiated against them concerning property rights or other matters and burden the plaintiffs unjustly with expenses and labor, often with various calculated subterfuges, and especially when the plaintiff has already conducted his case, keeping the legal terms and exhibiting all their rights and instruments before his justice ordinary with great efforts and expenses to the point that only the final decision has to be made in the case, or the sentence to be delivered and pronounced, then the defendant—seeing that he will lose the case and that he cannot delay it any further—alleges with contrived vexatiousness that he has a letter of quittance against the plaintiff, and by that has his case prorogued and postponed to another, following octave. [5] Therefore, in order that such frivolous prosecution be met by proper remedy, it has been decided and ordered that henceforth any defendant who alleges that he has letters of quittance against the plaintiff in the first stage of his response shall produce and show these at the next octave. [6] If, however, the defendant alleges that he has such a quittance once the legal terms have been completed, that is when the case is finally concluded, then he will not have any further octaves to produce and display these unless he shows and exhibits them immediately.

74. Procedure in the case of capital punishment

[1]-[5] = 1486:55

[6] ≈ 1351:19

⁹⁸ This represents an early step towards the continuous sessions of octave courts, broadened later in 1498:2, 8.

75. Protecting ispáns and alispáns in their executions

≈ 1486:67⁹⁹

76. Equal penalty for ecclesiastical and lay persons in courts spiritual

= 1486:72¹⁰⁰

77. Acquisition of estates by clergy

= 1486:57¹⁰¹

78. Replacement of lost instruments

≈ 1464:20¹⁰²

79. Prohibition on entering the court armed

= 1486:65

adding: [3] Those nobles or other men of whatever condition who dare to mob, molest, beat or kill anyone within the borders of the kingdom when going to the court of any county, or when returning home from the same, either in the court or on the journey, shall be convicted of the usual taint of infidelity.

80. Then, should anyone who has captured a thief, a robber, or any other public criminal, deliberately release him, he must pay the criminal's man-price to the county *ispán*¹⁰³ and shall restore the damage caused to the persons harmed. [1] If the county ispán allows such a criminal given to his hands to leave, then the ispán shall and must pay the man-price of the criminal to the one who handed him over, and satisfy the damaged person for his losses. [2] And the alispán of any county has to be always from among the more substantial nobles of the same county.¹⁰⁴

81. The capture of criminals on any estate

= 1486:48¹⁰⁵

82. On murder and unintentional homicide

= 1486:51

⁹⁹ Replaces “charge of infidelity” with “deserved punishment.”

¹⁰⁰ This measure goes back to at least 1439:33.

¹⁰¹ Goes back ultimately to 1351:20.

¹⁰² Adding the burning of instruments by Turks and Czechs, Poles and Germans as a valid reason for obtaining title of new donation.

¹⁰³ Identical to 8 March 1435:7 para 5.

¹⁰⁴ On the alispán cf. 1486:60. The connection between the two parts of the article is unclear.

¹⁰⁵ The present article omits the last sentence about the king's right to donate the confiscated properties.

83. Hiding men unfaithful to the king

= 1486:47¹⁰⁶

84. Then, that foreign merchants and those from abroad, of whatever nation they may be, shall in order to conduct their affairs go to the hitherto usual places which are designated for selling, buying and exchanging when trading and selling within the country.

85. Exemption of nobles and clergy from tolls

≈ 1351:15

Adding: [1] Those acting to the contrary are to be convicted to the payment of the man-price of the living of the person whom they impeded.

[2] ≈ 1351:17

Adding: [3] Transgressors shall suffer the same punishment.

86. Limited exemption of peasants and certain craftsmen from tolls

≈ 1486:36

Adding: [2] Moreover, no toll may be exacted from people carrying grain to the mills, neither going nor coming. And those who carry wine, grain or victuals and other dues of the lord of the land to the houses and courts of their lords through any toll, should not pay any toll, nor should they be forced to pay any fee, under the aforementioned punishment.

87. Tolls, ferries and illicit routes

≈ 8 March 1435:20–21¹⁰⁷

Adding: [6] ... in such a way that no one should dare to block and guard such illicit routes on the lands of others. [7] Where, however, people suffer damage on bridges or ferries because of their bad repair, then those whose bridges or ferries they are, have to give satisfaction to the persons thus harmed.

88. Moreover, considering that no gentlemen of the realm is permitted or may establish and keep illicit and secret fords to the detriment of authorized fords, the following has been decreed and ordered: [1] henceforth none of the gentlemen of the realm shall at all dare to establish and keep secret or illicit fords, boats, and ferries for those traveling or crossing water to the detriment—as it was said—of the authorized fords on pain of the loss of the estate in which it happens to be. [2] If any merchant or traveler is found to have arranged for himself an illicit or secret ford and is caught having crossed there, then the same rule shall be henceforth applied to them as is understood to apply to those who do not pay when passing through legal tolls.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁶ The term for keeping unfaithful men is extended here to 40 days.

¹⁰⁷ In 1435 the inquiry into tolls was assigned to a general assembly and the palatine. In this law it is made the responsibility of the local authorities, i.e., ispán, alispán and noble magistrates. On illicit routes, see 1464:15.

89. Then, that no one wishing to arrest someone can make an arrest for whatever reason in his own, his joint-owning kinsmen's or his lord's estates, lands or [area of] office¹⁰⁹, [1] otherwise he shall be convicted of wrongful arrest to a penalty of three marks, and the county ispán shall compel him under the pain of another fine of three marks to free and let the arrested person go. [2] Should the ispán out of favor to someone neglect to act or be lax in this matter, then the arrested person or his lord of the land can arrest in a public place either the arrestor himself or instead one or more peasants¹¹⁰ of that village or estate where the transgressor of the present statute is staying. He can and may keep him until the one who—as said before—was wrongfully arrested is freely released together with his belongings and is satisfied from the fine of the aforesaid six marks. He can also and is allowed to legally recover and receive these fines either before the lord of the land or his official, judge and sworn citizens of that public place where this arrest was made. [3] And the same lord of the land or his official, the judge or sworn citizens have the right to give satisfaction to the arrested person from the aforementioned fine of six marks. In other matters however,

[4]-[8] = 8 March 1435:13(part two)-14¹¹¹

90. Moreover, there are many reeves or judges and officials, especially on the estates and properties of the lord prelates and barons, who, when someone complains against a noble because of some debt or other matter, capture or arrest tenant peasants of such nobles together with their belongings and goods at the urging of the complainant and thus these nobles are often forced to stand trial contrary to their noble privilege and liberty. [1] But because reeves or judges and officials of villages, market towns, and cities, and even the lords of such places have no jurisdiction over nobles in such cases, it has therefore been decreed and established [2] that from now and henceforth they can make no arrest anywhere in the stead of nobles either because of debts or any other matter, nor should they dare to arrest or in any way impede nobles themselves in their persons or belongings. [3] If anyone claims to have a suit against some nobles, they have to prosecute it before the county ispán and the noble magistrates or other judges ordinary of these nobles. [4] The ispáns and noble magistrates or other judges ordinary must administer and give justice and judgment in regard to them as well as due satisfaction upon the lawful proof of the same plaintiff according to the custom of the realm. [5] Should anyone—against this statute—detain a tenant peasant and his belongings instead of some nobles then he shall be convicted to the man-price of ¹⁰⁸ For previous legislation, see 1486:35.

¹⁰⁹ Officiolatus may mean both the offices to which properties or revenues were attached as well as the properties or estates themselves.

¹¹⁰ The Latin text includes here the word colonus, a late Antique expression for settled slaves. The term came to be used in the Jagellonian age interchangeably with jobbágy/jobagio. Whether that was to indicate a worsening of the status of the tenant peasants, or is merely a Classizing expression, is debatable.

¹¹¹ The 1435 law regulated these matters primarily in regard to merchants and travelers.

the living of the detained peasant and the estimation of the seized belongings. [6] Similarly, should they detain a noble or seize his belongings, they shall be convicted in the same way.¹¹²

91. Arrest by burghers

= 8 March 1435:15–16

Adding: [2] And thus arrests shall be done only in this way and none other, [3] unless some should manifestly cause wounds, injuries, death, fire or other horrible things, in which case if they are present and can be apprehended, justice and judgment shall be administered in their regard and suitable punishment inflicted by law.

92. Manifest debtors

≈ 1486:29 lines 8–1

93. Penalty for withholding released tenant peasants

≈ 8 March 1435:7 para 2

Adding: [1] ... except for those who remain in their liberties. [2] Those thus freed are only to be permitted to leave when they have at the time of their move satisfied their lords in all dues both ordinary and extraordinary to be rendered before the time of their release, in such a way, however, that if they have built anything before the time of their release they should be able to dispose of these freely according to the estimation of the judges and reeves of the place where they are living.¹¹³

94. Penalty for taking away tenant peasants

= 8. March 1435:7 [3]

Adding: [2] In such a way that no one shall dare and be allowed to violently take away a tenant peasant of another who has asked for release but not obtained it, without the administration of justice and right, and not having paid the different dues, even after the fifteenth day of the release obtained, under pain of the payment of twenty-five marks to be paid partly to the ispán, partly to the litigants. [3] The same is to be understood of the county ispáns or alispáns. Should they take away tenant peasants by the discretion of their office, they shall be subject to the same penalty and burden.¹¹⁴

¹¹² Cf. 15 April 1405: 7 where nobles were prohibited from arresting commoners; 8 March 1435:13–14; and 1486: 29 on arresting debtors.

¹¹³ The addition implies that there were two steps before tenant peasants could move: the license and the payment of outstanding debts.

¹¹⁴ These articles attempt to restrict the movement of peasants reflecting the demographic changes of the late fifteenth century that caused the widespread abandonment of peasant plots; see here István Szabó, “Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén” [Declining tenant peasantry at the end of the Middle Ages], in: Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok (Budapest; Akadémiai Kiadó, 1976) pp. 167–200. The problem is a recurrent issue in the Jagellonian decreta. The right of tenant peasants (jobagiones) to free movement from one lord to another was in many cases rather the “right” of more powerful landowners to transfer labour force from

95. Fees for the issue of instruments

≈ 8 March 1435:10¹¹⁵

96. Then, as various disagreements have arisen over letters copied and transcribed outside of the octaves in chapters and convents of authentication and also in our court, when these transcripts are later exhibited in court by one party against the other and often the party against whom these were produced attacks these, and thus doubt is raised about their force; [1] therefore, in order to remove these disputes and doubts it has been ordered and decreed that when such letters are copied and transcribed outside the octaves either in the said chapters or convents of authentication or in our court under our privy or judicial seal, or that of any of the justices ordinary, and one of the parties presents the transcript in court, but the other party attacks this transcript and does not give faith to it, then the party who presents it must also show the original letters to verify the transcript.

97. Then, as it often happens that women—especially the wives of barons, lords and other nobles—in their suits initiated by them against others or by others against them, cannot easily come in person to chapters or convents of authentication to appoint attorneys, either because of the distance of the places and the bad conditions of the roads, or any other reasonable cause, or they are afraid to go because of the frailty as well as honor of the female gender, [1] it is therefore ordered that should such women appoint attorneys before two canons or conventual brethren, sent out from the chapters or convents of authentication for that purpose at the request of the same women, then this appointment will have force, and the letters of the chapter or convent issued about this shall be accepted in any court, and full trust be given to it just as to other letters of attorney. [2] Adding, however, that those, who are sent out to hear such an appointment of attorney, should not by reason of the journey exact more than is usual in the execution of summonses or inquests, and finally they shall receive that much for the letters issued in the chapter or convent upon their report as it is usual to get and receive for other letters of attorney, and in no way more.

98. Fees for letters issued by the lesser chancellery

≈ 8 March 1435:11 and 1486:76¹¹⁶

99. Fees for letters issued by the major chancellery and the exchange rate of florins

= 8 March 1435:12

the less fortunate noblemen, frequently able to offer them better conditions. On this see briefly, János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005). Such dietal decisions were usually passed in the interest of the lesser nobility ¹¹⁵ With minor changes, such as 100d instead of 200d in cases of letters of perambulation where the case is taken to the royal court.

¹¹⁶ The list omits fees for letters in respect of procedures that had been abolished in the meantime (proclamation at three fairs and judicial combat), and, strangely, the one for letters of attorney.

100. Just as until now the counties of Pest and Pilis, being close to Buda, did not have ispáns, they should not have ispáns in the future either.¹¹⁷

101. Then, that the royal majesty and his officials shall no longer force the reaping, harvesting, gathering and transportation of hay, as has been done hitherto.

102. Then, that the harmful liberty that was conferred by the late Lord King Matthias to the city of Visegrád, namely that none of the burghers of that city could be made to stand trial for any misdeed whatsoever, not even for a debt, shall be taken as totally erased, abolished, and null and void.¹¹⁸

103. Then, if any city of this kingdom should plead that it has a right of staple and market and that it has privileges on that, then this city or these cities can and shall be allowed to prosecute their cause before their justice ordinary according to the content of their privilege.

104. Then, if any of the people or tenant peasants of the king or the queen or anybody else should make complaint, claiming exemptions from the ninth of grain and wine or from akones, then justice and judgment shall be administered at the first octave by the justices ordinary of the realm between such persons and the lord of the land.¹¹⁹

105. We understand from the report of the lord prelates, barons and nobles that their houses in our city of Buda, which they have for their suitable residence when they come to attend the royal court, have since ancient times been exempted and freed from all taxes and other payments to the burghers of our said city of Buda by the late kings, our predecessors. But a certain time ago the burghers of the said city began to raise certain payments on the said houses of theirs and they attempt to do that still. [1] Therefore, we have ordered for all time on the counsel of the said lord prelates, barons and nobles and with our present decision that, as hitherto, the said houses of the said lord prelates, barons and nobles shall not be liable or obliged to any taxes or any payments whatsoever to the community of the said burghers of our city of Buda, [2] but rather as before these houses shall be free and henceforth exempt, free and immune from all taxes and all kinds of payments. Nor shall the said lord prelates, barons and nobles be held to pay anything to the community of our said city for their said houses. [3] Excepting however that if some tenants should stay in the said houses, then they have to pay according to the custom of our said city, according to their means and by the assessment of the judges and sworn jurors of the same city, and we wish that this be understood for our other royal cities as well, [4] but in such a way that they be not burdened more than other tenants of other burghers living in the same city.¹²⁰

¹¹⁷ The count palatine was traditionally the ispán of Pest and Pilis counties.

¹¹⁸ Visegrád obtained from King Matthias a most unusual immunity for all its citizens probably in order to enhance the status of the new royal residence there. See András Végh, “Visegrád város kárhozatos privilégiuma” [The damnable privilege of the city of V.], in Beatrix F. Romhányi et al. (eds) Es tu scholaris: Ünnepi tanulmányok Kubinyi András 75. Születésnapjára (Budapest: Budapest Történeti Múzeum, 2004), pp 71–6.

¹¹⁹ See above, articles 47–9. The imposition of the ninth on all peasants and citizens renting vineyards and arable land was aimed mainly against the semi-privileged oppida (market-towns) that had previously been exempt from this due; see Szabó, as n. 114 above.

106. Houses expropriated for the aforementioned reason shall be returned to those from whom they were unduly expropriated. [1] If, however, those who kept these houses unduly have done some work or building to them, then those to whom those houses are returned have to recompense these buildings and works according to the assessment of good men.

107. Furthermore, by the common vote and unanimous will of all the lord prelates, barons, lords and all the nobles of this kingdom, it has been decreed [1] that henceforth in perpetuity should any of the gentlemen of the realm, of whatever estate or condition he may be, capture castles, fortified houses, cities, towns, villages or estates, or commit arson, theft or other robbery or any other wrong after the death of any king of Hungary, then such robbers, arsonists, thieves, occupiers of whatever goods and evildoers shall be subject to the penalty of the perpetual taint of infidelity and be regarded thereby as the unfaithful of the realm. [2] Neither the royal majesty even with the counsel of the lord prelates and barons, nor indeed the entire community of the realm, shall have the right to pardon such evildoers, but they being subject to the yoke of eternal servitude and peasantry¹²¹ shall lament without end the punishment of their misdeed.

108. Then, as it has happened many times that when the royal majesty, pressed by necessity on account of the occurrence of highly difficult affairs of the kingdom that have to be discussed and decided by the common counsel of all lord prelates, barons, and nobles of the realm, has announced and proclaimed at a certain date a diet, that is, general assembly, for all the lord prelates, barons, and nobles, then when all nobles commonly or otherwise, according to the mandate of the royal majesty, and also many of the said lord prelates and barons have come together and gathered on the set date, some of the lord prelates and barons have shown themselves so tardy in coming, that they have turned up not on the set date, but on the fifteenth or twentieth day after that. Waiting for them has been so burdensome for those who came on the set date that the middling and poorer nobles have been compelled to leave the diet having used up their money and become wearied, when the affairs of the realm have not yet been settled, and indeed not even announced because of the absence of those not coming on the set day. [1] Therefore, in order that the benefit of the common weal and the common good of the realm not be neglected, nor disturbed in any way because of the tardiness of such lords in coming as said above, it has been decreed and ordered by the unanimous counsel and decision of all lord prelates, barons, and nobles, [2] that henceforth, at whatever time and as often as the royal majesty announces and proclaims a general diet for the said lord prelates, barons and other gentlemen of the realm, then those not arriving on the set date will not be waited for more than the four next and following days after the set date. [3] If they arrive within these four days, then well and good; otherwise after the lapse of these four days, the royal majesty may and can hear, conclude, and decide with those who are present at the diet those affairs of the realm on account of which he announced the diet. [4] Those not coming and not arriving must regard everything decided by those who appeared as approved, notwithstanding their absence.¹²²

¹²⁰ Cf. Art. 13–14. of the Buda Stadtrecht, in László Blazovich and József Schmidt, eds. Buda város jogkönyve [The lawbook of the city of Buda] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 2001), pp. 309–310.

¹²¹ The meaning of rusticitas is unclear, but was seen as the restriction on free movement and other privileges of the tenant farmers in contrast to serfs. The penalty foreseen here came to be the punishment for the rebellious peasants in 1514. See 1514:14

Here follow the articles of the nobles of Slavonia included in the present decree by the decision of the royal majesty and the lord prelates, barons and nobles of the kingdom.¹²³

1. Then, that the royal majesty, as is contained in the first article of the present decree, promised among his other kingdoms to the kingdom of Slavonia that he would preserve its liberties, privileges and customs, thus he promises to keep them in the same liberties and immunities.

2. Then, should now or in the future His Majesty order the inhabitants of the kingdom of Hungary for any reason to make some payments, then he must and shall exact a half of these payments in the kingdom of Slavonia according to their custom hitherto observed.¹²⁴

3. Then, there should be chambers of salt everywhere that is necessary, just as in the time of the late blessed King Sigismund,¹²⁵ and they shall be established in the same way as is done in Hungary.

4. Then, that the chamberlains shall not search for salt in the houses of the inhabitants,¹²⁶ but if they find it in the fields or in fairs or markets, they have free right to confiscate it. [1] However, they shall search for it without vexation and in the presence of the noble magistrates of the county. [2] They cannot take away particles, that is grains of salt.

5. They can freely buy, sell, and use for themselves the salt of the royal chambers, the salt that is carried by ships as well as by carts, and also the sea salt; for the poor of the kingdom of Slavonia exchange the sea salt for grain because of their poverty and lack of cash. [1] From these sea salts

¹²² This represents an early attempt by the county nobility to avoid the expense of long-lasting diets.

¹²³ This is the only surviving case in the medieval kingdom of Hungary when special laws were issued for Slavonia, though these do not essentially differ in their content from those in the rest of the kingdom.

¹²⁴ On the mardurina, see above, n. 53.

¹²⁵ Chambers of salt were traditionally in Szeged, Lippa/Lipova, Szalacs/Slacea See András Kubinyi “Königliches Salzmonopol und die Städte des Königreichs Ungarn in Mittelalter,” in W. Rausch, ed. Stadt und Salz (Linz: Wimmer, 1988) pp. 213–32; now also . István Draskóczy, Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

¹²⁶ The maintenance of the salt monopoly was a major issue in the late fifteenth century and we have examples of this kind of confiscation of salt on the western and north-western frontiers of the realm. See n. above.

the thirtieth customs are paid to the royal majesty; however, [only] when the royal salt has run out and the chamberlain cannot give salt to the inhabitants, and not otherwise.¹²⁷

6. Then, they can freely export and sell wine, grain and any kind of animal wherever they want or can, once they have paid the thirtieth and the just and customary taxes.¹²⁸

7. Then, the thirtieth should be exacted in the heretofore usual places, just as in the times of the lord kings Louis, Sigismund and Albert.¹²⁹ The collectors of the thirtieth should not dare to exact the thirtieth from minor things below the value of one florin.

8. Then, that the royal majesty deigns to confirm all the rights and privileges of the kingdom of Slavonia granted by the blessed kings, the predecessors of His Majesty.

9. Then, that the ispáns cannot go out to executions except from the county court and by commission, with letters of command of the gentlemen of the realm and the court, as was observed since ancient times.

10. Then, in the recovery and restoration of castles, fortified houses, towns, villages, that is estates and all other property rights however occupied by anyone after the death of the late king Matthias, the same procedure shall be followed as described for the kingdom of Hungary in the article composed on this.¹³⁰

11. = Art. 16, above.

Adding: And this shall be done in the same way as in the kingdom of Hungary.

We, then, who desire to rule and govern our said kingdom and also the other dominions and principalities of ours not less with laws and statutes than with peace and arms, having accepted these articles and having listened and agreed to these submissions of the same gentlemen of our realm; and seeing and considering the aforesaid articles to be just and honest, we, having included and inscribed them in these presents word for word without any change or impairment, do confirm and approve them as fitting and pleasing, and having accepted them, we do confirm them; and we commend, approve, ratify and confirm them as a perpetual and for all times valid decree for the said kingdom of ours and its inhabitants, promising by the protection of these presents to keep and cause them to be kept in all of their clauses, articles, chapters, and points. [1] Given in the said Buda, in the aforementioned general assembly and diet of all the gentlemen of the realm by the hands of the reverend father in Christ, Lord Thomas, bishop of the church of Győr¹³¹ and our lord

¹²⁷ The gist of this measure is puzzling. Sea salt was probably regarded as of minor value and liable to customs duties only when there was a shortage of mined salt. Alternatively, the article is poorly formulated and means that the import of sea salt was limited to times when mined salt had run out.

¹²⁸ Wine from Slavonia used to be a highly regarded export commodity, although by 1492 Ottoman raids had destroyed much of the region.

¹²⁹ For the customs offices of Slavonia, see 1498:34:4.

¹³⁰ See above Art. 14.

¹³¹ Bakócz, Thomas, bishop of Győr 1486–1493, bishop elect of Eger 1493–1497, archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate high privy chancellor, our beloved faithful, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and ninety-two, in the second year of our reign in Hungary etc., in the twenty-first in Bohemia.

[2] In the time of the felicitous government of their churches of the reverend fathers in Christ, the lords Peter, archbishop of Kalocsa¹³²; and the bishops: Eger sede vacante; Oswald of Zagreb,¹³³ Valentine confirmed and elected of Oradea¹³⁴; Ladislav Geréb of Alba Iulia/Val Orad¹³⁵ Sigismund of Pécs¹³⁶; the said Thomas of Győr; John of Veszprém¹³⁷; another John of Cenad¹³⁸; Nicholas Bátori of Vác¹³⁹; Anthony elect of Nitra;¹⁴⁰ Stephen of Srem¹⁴¹; and Lucas of Bosnia¹⁴². [3] Likewise when the spectabilis and magnificus Stephen Szapolyai was palatine of the said kingdom of ours and perpetual ispán of Spiš;¹⁴³ comes Stephen Bátori, our judge royal and voivode of Transylvania as well as the ispán of the Székely;¹⁴⁴ Paul Kinizsi, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of our kingdom¹⁴⁵; duke Lawrence Újlaki, ban of Mačva;¹⁴⁶ Ladislav Egervári, ban of the kingdoms of Croatia, Dalmatia and Slavonia;¹⁴⁷ Francis Gyarmati Balassa¹⁴⁸ and George Csulai¹⁴⁹, bans of Severin; Ladislav Gúti Országh, master of the horse;¹⁵⁰ Ladislav

alater

- ¹³² Váradi, Peter archbishop of Kalocsa 1481–1501.
- ¹³³ Laki Túz, Oswald bishop of Zagreb 1466–99
- ¹³⁴ Valentine (Farkas) bishop of Oradea 1490–1495
- ¹³⁵ Vingárti Geréb, Ladislav bishop of Transylvania 1475–1501
- ¹³⁶ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, Sigismund bishop of Pécs 1473–1505.
- ¹³⁷ John Vitéz, bishop of Veszprém 1489–99.
- ¹³⁸ Szokoli, John bishop of Cenad/Csanád 1466–1493.
- ¹³⁹ Bátori, Nicholas, bishop of Vác 1474–1506.
- ¹⁴⁰ Sánkfalvai, Anthony bishop of Nitra 1492–1500.
- ¹⁴¹ Bajoni, Stephen, bishop of Srem til 1502.
- ¹⁴² Szegedi Baratin, Lucas bishop of Bosnia 1491–93, of Cenad 1493–1500, of Zagreb 1500–1510.
- ¹⁴³ Szapolyai, Stephen palatine of Hungary and judge of the Cumans, perpetual count of Spiš, 1492–99.
- ¹⁴⁴ Bátori, Stephen judge royal 1471–1493, voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely 1479–1493.
- ¹⁴⁵ Kinizsi, Paul ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of the kingdom, 1478–1494.
- ¹⁴⁶ Újlaki, Lawrence duke, ban of Mačva 1477–92, judge royal 1518–24.
- ¹⁴⁷ Egervári, Ladislav ban of Croatia, Dalmatia and Slavonia 1489–1492, master of the treasury.
- ¹⁴⁸ Gyarmati Balassa, Francis ban of Severin 1492, ban of Croatia 1504–05.
- ¹⁴⁹ Csulai Mór, George, ban of Severin 1492–1501.
- ¹⁵⁰ Gúti Országh, Ladislav master of the horse 1484–1492.

Losonci, master of the treasurers;¹⁵¹ Peter Vingárti Geréb¹⁵² and Nicholas Lindvai Bánfi¹⁵³, masters of the doorkeepers; Emeric Perényi, master of the stewards¹⁵⁴; and George Túróci, master of the cellarers¹⁵⁵; the honor of the ispán of the county of Pozsony being vacant; and others holding the offices of ispán and honors of our kingdom.

[4] Then, the lord prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom of Hungary have presented in writing to our majesty besides the aforesaid articles included one by one in our present decree, also some other articles regarding the tithes, ecclesiastical prebends, the donation of counties, and other matters. [5] But as the same lord prelates, barons, and lords of the realm were on account of certain causes and reasons unable to have proper and complete discussion, we therefore command that discussion and final decision on these articles be postponed to a future diet, that is, general assembly, around the coming Michaelmas or any other one that may be done or held by the will of the aforesaid lord prelates, barons, and lords of our realm, [6] in such a way that then, namely at the said future diet, that is general assembly, the aforementioned articles that for the reasons mentioned above remain unfinished and left without final conclusion shall be raised before us, and finally concluded with us and the same lord prelates, barons, and lords of the realm, for the profit of this kingdom of ours, as may and can be most suitable and profitable. We will agree, accept and approve in that future convention also the ones just mentioned which could not be completed and concluded in the present discussion, and will ratify them by the letters to be issued on these and we moreover do promise to ratify and in the said way approve them by the force and witness of these presents.¹⁵⁶ Given at the place, date and year as above.

¹⁵¹ Losonci, Ladislasmaster of the treasury, 1460–98.

¹⁵² Vingárti Geréb, Peter judge royal 1495–1500, master of the door- keepers 1491–95.

¹⁵³ Lindvai Bánfi, Nicholas master of the cellarers 1464–67, ispán of Pozsony 1467–1478, master of the doorkeepers 1490–1500.

¹⁵⁴ Perényi, Emeric perpetual ispán of county Abaújvár, master of the stewards 1492–1504, palatine of Hungary 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13.

¹⁵⁵ Túróci, George, master of the cellarers 1488–92.

¹⁵⁶ On these, see the law of 1495.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF 1495

A diet was held in Buda. The decree issued between May 9 and 8 June, first expands on the previous (1492) law, which is transcribed verbatim, adding specific details to single articles (paragraphs), then adding a number of measures on various issues, in all likelihood presented as wishes or complaints of the delegates.

MSS: Parchment original containing 19 leaves in book form; formerly in the Erdélyi Múzeum/Musaeum Transylvanicum (present location is unknown). Copies in the Codex Kollár (MNL OL 1/7, 311–31) and the Codex Rep. 71 no. 13 of the Esterházy archives (MNL OL Esterházy levéltár P108).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 Budapest: Franklin, 1896, pp. 563-91 (Decretum secundum)

LIT: András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagiellonenzeit” in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 323-66; Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiello Hungary” Central Europe 3 (2005), pp. 3–18; Idem, “Jagello Hungary,” in: DRMH IV, xi–xlvi.

DECRETUM WLADISLAI II. REGIS SECUNDUM DE ANNO 1495

Commissio propria domini regis.

Nos Wladislaus, dei gracia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex ac Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux, necnon Lusacie et Moravie marchio memorie commendamus tenore presencium significantes, quibus expedit universis, quod cum in dieta, sive congregacione generali universorum prelatorum, baronum nobiliumque et procerum dicti regni nostri Hungarie pro die festi Purificacionis beate Marie virginis in anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo nonagesimo secundo, novissime transacto per nos eisdem indicta et celebrata ex eorundem prelatorum, baronum nobiliumque et procerum dicti regni nostri consilio quedam statuta sive decreta pro comodo et utilitate dicti regni nostri edidissemus et stabilivissemus, minime tamen pro tunc ad plenum perfecta et completa nostris literis privilegialibus inseri et inscribi facientes ipsis dominis prelatibus, baronibus, nobilibus et proceribus dicti regni nostri dedissemus et tradidissemus, defectusque quoslibet in dieta tunc per nos proxime celebranda supplere et addenda eisdem statutis nostris addere velle promissemus, tandem prefati domini prelati et barones ac universi nobiles de singulis comitatibus dicti regni nostri electi in presenti dieta sive congregacione generali, quam eisdem urgentibus necessitatibus eiusdem regni nostri ad quintumdecimum diem festi beati Georgii martiris indixeramus, nostre maiestatis venientes in conspectum, prefatas literas nostras privilegiales, ut prefertur, prenotata nostra statuta et decreta in se verbaliter continentes, necnon quosdam articulos similiter in vim statutorum et decretorum ad perfectionem et complecionem dictorum statutorum nostrorum de novo formatos et conceptos maiestati nostre exhibere et presentare curarunt, tenorum infrascriptorum, supplicantes maiestati nostre humili precum cum instancia, ut easdem literas nostras privilegiales statutaque et decreta nostra in eisdem contenta simulcum prefatis articulis ad perfectionem et supplecionem dictorum nostrorum statutorum et decretorum, ut premittitur, de novo formatis et conceptis acceptare, approbare et ratificare, ac de verbo ad verbum presentibus literis nostris privilegialibus inseri transscribereque et transsumi facere, auctoritateque nostra regia ipsis innovando pro communi bono et utilitate atque tranquillitate dicti regni nostri Hungarie perpetuo duratura et valitura stabilire et confirmare, confirmataque observare et observari facere dignemur. Quarum quidem literarum nostrarum privilegialium, ut predictum est, premissa nostra statuta et decreta in se habencium et continencium tenor talis est:

Nos Wladislaus etc. (Vide decretum de anno 1492.) Series autem articulorum de novo conceptorum, ut premittitur, prescriptorum nostrorum statutorum et decretorum perfectionem et complecionem in se exprimentium sequitur et est talis:

I. Item primo, ex quo in articulo secundo decreti non continetur per expressum, qualis modus et ordo debeat observari in remittendis iuribus possessionariis per serenissimum principem condam dominum Mathiam regem et reginalem maiestatem ac eciam alios quoscunque usque ad hec tempora occupatis, pro eo ordinatum est, quod sive sit regia maiestas, sive alii quicunque et cuiuscunque status et condicionis existant, ad octavas quamprimum celebrandas legitime evocentur. Et si de huiusmodi occupacionibus ibidem constiterit evidenter, tunc statim et in continenti tam regia maiestas, quam alii quicumque talia bona occupata absque omni dilacione, eciam cum restitutione fructuum medio tempore perceptorum sub pena facti potencialis remittere teneantur. Et si tandem quid iuris circa illa bona habere pretendunt, id secundum legem et consuetudinem regni extra dominium huiusmodi bonorum occupatorum requirendi habeant potestatis facultatem. Et quod presens articulus eciam de futuris occupacionibus, si quando fieri contigerit, intelligatur, ita videlicet, quod prius et ante omnia propter indebitam occupacionem fiat iudicium et ipsi occupatores in facto potencia convincantur.

II. Item ad nonum articulum qui est de facultate regie maiestatis conferendi iura possessionaria, hoc conclusum est: Quod universe donaciones regie maiestatis contra seriem et continenciam ipsius articuli facte vel deinceps fiende vane, casse et viribus omnino cariture relinquuntur. Regia autem maiestas habeat conferendi facultatem quibuscunque personis, eciam extraneis usque centum jobagiones.

III. Item ad tredecimum articulum, qui est de condempnacione infidelium, hoc additum est: Quod si regia maiestas quempiam regnicolarum suorum nota infidelitatis condempnare voluerit, tunc universis dominis prelatiis, baronibus ac ceteris regnicolis unam generalem dietam sive congregacionem ad certum terminum instituat, ad quem eciam is, contra quem alique note infidelitatis obicientur, per literas preceptorias regie maiestatis mediantibus exhibitoriis ad aliquem conventum vel capitulum sonantibus personaliter et non per procuratoremⁱ evocari debet. Qui si venerit et se expurgare poterit, bene quidem alioquin si non venerit, vel si venerit et se expurgare non poterit, ipsa nota seu crimine infidelitatis condempnetur. Et talibus nec salvus conductus, nec eciam novum iudicium per regiam maiestatem concedatur. Si qui autem per sentenciam iudicum ordinariorum regni super aliquibus criminibus in nota infidelitatis convincerentur, ipsorum iudicum ordinariorum sententia rata maneat et firma.

IV. Articuli autem, qui concernunt notam infidelitatis, sunt isti:

= 28 Maii 1462: 2

Add.: Item mutilatores membrorum et eruitores oculorum preter banos, wayvodas et alios honores et confinia regni tenentes.

V. Item ex quo in articulo quartodecimo circa finem fit generalis mencio ex parte regie maiestatis, quod maiestas sua bona violentorum occupatorum, tamquam bona infidelium, cuicumque voluerit, liberam conferendi habeatⁱⁱ facultatem,ⁱⁱⁱ quod is articulus de collacione bonorum solummodo ad regnicolas et non forenses et extraneos personas referatur.

VI. Item ad vigesimum nonum de pedagogis hominum interfectorum, ubi continetur, quod nemo archidiaconorum, vicearchidiaconorum et plebanorum eorumque vices gerencium sub pena amissionis beneficiorum suorum marcam illam argenti, de qua in eodem articulo fit mencio, de

ⁱ desideratur: compariturus

ⁱⁱ mendose: haberet

ⁱⁱⁱ desideratur: additum est

funere interfectorum exigere possit, hoc additum est: Quodsi qui contrarium facerent, talium beneficia maiestas regia cuicumque voluerit, liberam conferendi habeat potestatis facultatem.

VII. Item ad articulum tricesimum octavum hoc quoque additum est: Quod loco trine forensis proclamacionis evocacio cum insinuacione decernatur preter modum de obligacionibus declaratum.

VIII. Item ad articulum quadragesimum hoc additum est: Quod tempore celebracionis octavarum maiestas regia ex officio suo teneatur tres ex dominis prelatibus et alios tres ex baronibus, necnon quatuordecim ex pocioribus et honeste condicionis nobilibus pro coassessoribus deligere et illis secundum status exigenciam de salario condigno providere.

IX. Item ad articulum quadragesimum tertium de execucionibus fidedignitatum et hominum regionum hoc conclusum est: Quod ex quo sepius fieri contingit, quod dum ipsi capitulares vel conventus ac regii homines pro execucionibus aliquilibus perficiendis necessario transmittuntur, nonnulli nobiles et possessionati ac alterius status homines contra illos insurgunt eosque aut verbali dehonestacione et plurimis iniuriis, interdum eciam vulneribus et verberibus afficiunt, quandoque eciam eos neci seu morti tradunt, contra tales vero in ipso articulo nulla pena determinata est. Quare pro utilitate regni et rei publice conservacione conclusum est, quod si quipiam tales executores iusticie iniuria quapiam vel verbali dehonestacione, in una marca auri septuaginta duos florenos auri faciente, si vero vulneribus vel verberibus affecerint, in facto potencie et sentencie capitalis, si denique mortem eisdem vel alteri illorum intulerint, in nota perpetue infidelitatis condempnentur. Si vero premissa per jobagiones et familiares quorumcunque committerentur, et illos fortasse metu pene ad bona aliorum auffugere contingeret, domini eorundem hoc casu dictis penis non dampnentur, sed teneantur innocenciam suam mediante iuramento expurgare, et ipsi profugi perquirantur ab illis, in quorum bonis comperti fuerint; et si illi eos statuere non possent, in homagiis ipsorum salva pena eisdem malefactoribus infligenda convincantur.

X. Item ad articulum quadragesimum quintum istud additum est: Quod sicut de appellacionibus ad curiam Romanam et legatos ibidem sanctitum est, ita quoque de dominis archiepiscopis in hoc regno existentibus is articulus intelligatur: Quod scilicet nullus omnino hominum per simplicem querelam, nisi per viam appellacionis de dioecesi aliquorum dominorum prelatorum causam suam in presenciam eorundem deducere possit. Hoc quoque non pretermisso, quod si quipiam prescriptum articulum simul cum presentibus transgredi ausi fuerint, tales ab accione sua et adquisicione decidant et insuper in quadraginta florenis auri per comitem vel vicecomitem et iudices nobilium irremissibiliter exigendis contra partem adversam pro expensis convincantur, si tantas res habuerint, alioquin in persona detineantur et usque debitam emendam castigentur. Cause vero, que nunc in presenciam reverendissimi domini Ursi de Ursinis legati verterentur, ipsi actores in presenciam iudicis eorum ordinarii tales causas eorum reducere teneantur.

XI. Item ad articulum quinquagesimum nonum additum est: Quod ex quo non datur ex eodem articulo plane intelligi, quali pena tales violenti occupatores bonorum et iurium per eosdem impetratorem puniantur, ob hoc ordinatum est: Quod pro huiusmodi indebita occupacione in estimacione iurium possessionariorum et insuper in dampnis illatis et interesse contra partem adversam convincantur. Si vero comes in execucionem iusticie eorum, que in ipso articulo demandata sunt, tepidus foret, et temeritate doctus isam executionem quovis quesito colore premitteret, talis officio suo destituatur et insuper ipsam estimationem et quodlibet damnum exinde emergens parti adverse refundere teneatur.

XII. Item ad articulum sexagesimum sextum de birsagiis additum est: Quod in quolibet comitatu istud quippe observetur, quod premissis contra partem adversam legitimis citationibus et terminorum completionibus birsagiisque contra eandem per actorem extractis, tandem sive compareat citatus, sive non, nichilominus comes vel vicecomes et iudices nobilium in causis coram eis vertentibus et ad sedem iudicariam ipsorum spectantibus actori ex parte in causam attracti finale iudicium et iusticiam facere, et tandem ipsa causa finita, et non antea, ipsa birsagia in duabus pro se, in tertia vero partibus pro ipsa parte adversa extorquere valeant atque possint.

XIII. Item ad articulum sexagesimum octavum de facultate concordandi litigancium hoc quoque additum est: Quod si partes contigerit inter se concordare, tunc neque birsagia per quemcunque iudicem exigi possint ante executionem, sed post executionem libere exigantur.

XIV. Item ad articulum septuagesimum primum istud additum est: Quod illis, qui in castris finitimis fuerint occupati, temporibus^{iv} treugarum nulle prorogaciones observentur. Tempore vero guerrarum non plures, quam solum unica prorogacio observetur, si personaliter in eisdem castris fuerint constituti; alioquin si quipiam ex eisdem tempore octavarum personaliter hic in curia regia aut in domibus proprie residence reperti fuerint, prorogacio eis non servetur.^v Illis vero, qui in legacionibus regiis et regni extra regnum necessario occupabuntur, solummodo infra tempus occupationis eorundem prorogacio suffragetur.

XV. Item ad articulum septuagesimum secundum istud additum est: Quod quia sunt plerique dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac aliorum nobilium, qui exempcionum sive libertatum prerogativis se munitos fore allegantes coram comitibus vel vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus, in quo bona habere dinoscuntur, contra quoslibet, tam nobiles, quam ignobiles iudicium pro se obtinent et reportant, ipsi vero causantibus contra se iuri stare recusant, ob hoc statutum est:^{vi} Quod ipsi quoque ad instanciam quorumcumque iudicio et iudicatu ipsorum comitum vel vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium parere et obtemperare debeant et teneantur.

XVI. Item ex quo in articulo septuagesimo quinto contra illos, qui comites, vicecomites et iudices nobilium tempore executionis iudicii et iusticie turbant et impediunt, nulla pena determinata reperitur, quare sanctitum est: Quod comites, vicecomites et iudices nobilium quorumcumque comitatum nisi de sede iudicaria per universitatem nobilium cum literis eorundem exmittantur, nullas executiones facere possint. Si vero ipsi vel alter eorundem de ipsa sede iudicaria modo premissis pro aliquali executione iusticie facienda transmissus fuerit, ac in prosecutione executionis huiusmodi iusticie illos vel alterum eorundem quipiam verbali dehonoratione aut alia iniuria, vulneribusque seu verberibus affecerint, aut eum seu eos neci tradiderint, eadem regula contra illos malefactores observetur, qualis de turbatoribus hominum regionum ac testimoniorum capitulorum vel conventuum superius est declarata.

^{iv} recte: tempore

^v recte: observetur

^{vi} ob hoc statum est desiderentur

XVII. Hoc tamen adiecto, quod si comites, vicecomites aut iudices nobilium proprio motu et non de sede iudiciaria ad aliquam executionem vel potius, ut frequenter iam abusive facere consueverunt, extorsionem birsagiorum sine literis sedis iudiciarie proficiscerentur et ausu temerario quempiam turbare seu molestare aut etiam in rebus damnificare presumerent, tales demptis damnis illatis in emenda capitum suorum contra partem lesam convinci debeant eo facto.

XVIII. Preterea ex quo etiam de jobagionibus fugitivis sive rusticis in eodem articulo in fine fit mencio, et contra receptatores eorundem nulla pena sanctita est, ordinatum est igitur: Quod si rusticus perpetrato facinore ad bona quorumpiam auffugerit, comes vel vicecomes aut iudices nobilium talem rusticum a receptatore expetant, et si reddere noluerit, ab eodem penam viginti quinque marcarum inter iudicem et actorem equaliter dividendarum extorquendi habeant potestatis facultatem. Si autem comes tales malefactores et profugos ad sua bona recipere auderet et ad requisicionem partis lese extradare nollet, tunc isto casu universitas nobilium cum iudicibus eandem penam viginti quinque marcarum, similiter inter iudices nobilium et partem lesam equaliter dividendarum, de bonis illius exigere possit; vel si id facere difficultaret, tunc ipse comes ratione previa in presenciam iudicum ordinariorum regni evocetur et ex parte ipsius iudicium administratur. Si autem universitas nobilium et iudices nobilium ex parte ipsius comitis iudicium facerent, et de ipsorum iudicio aliqua partium contentari nollet, tunc huiusmodi cause ad provocacionem partis in curiam regiam, in presenciam scilicet iudicum ordinariorum regni transmittantur.

XIX. Item ad articulum octuagesimum primum de furibus et aliis malefactoribus confectum, in quo id continetur, ut si qui tales malefactores de suis bonis non expulerint, tunc comes teneatur mittere ad capiendum etc. hoc additum est: Quod tales malefactores non expellantur, sed per eum vel eos, in quorum vel cuius bonis per comitem vel vicecomitem aut iudices nobilium reperti fuerint, capi et ad requisicionem eorundem vel alterius ipsorum ad sedem iudiciariam pro infligenda talibus pena adduci debeant. Si vero adducere nollent aut recusarent, in homagio talis malefactoris convincantur, et nichilominus ipsi malefactores, si postea temporum in successu capi poterunt, pena debita castigentur. Hoc per expressum declarato, quod nobiles et quivis possessionati homines privilegiati, qui liberi comites appellantur, tales malefactores castigandi habeant facultatem, et illos ad sedem iudiciariam inviti statuere non teneantur. Si autem comes vel vicecomes et iudices nobilium ac liberi comites huiusmodi malefactores eisdem presentatos vel per ipsos interceptos de suis manibus per incuriam aut voluntarie et deliberate emitterent, in emenda capitum talium malefactorum, in duabus iudici, coram quo lis inchoata fuit, in tertia autem partibus parti adverse persolvenda aggraventur, et insuper honore et officio suo destituti habeantur, nunquam ad tale vel simile officium admittendi. Emenda autem capitum dominorum prelatorum et baronum quadringentos, nobilium autem ducentos et rusticorum quadraginta florenos facere dinoscitur, antiqua consuetudine regni requirente.

XX. Item ad articulum nonagesimum, qui inter cetera pro rectificacione indebitorum arestancium ad comites sonat, appositum est: Quod ex quo duo comitatus, Pesthinensis et Pilisiensis comites et vicecomites non habent, iudices nobilium in eisdem constituti ipsam rectificacionem cum pocioribus nobilibus facere et exercere possint.

XXI. Item ad articulum nonagesimum primum^{vii} de arestacione occasione^{viii} nobilium confectum, ex quo ibi non continetur, qui sint iudices ipsius indebiti aresti et penarum propterea exigendarum, additum est: Quod in his omnibus comes vel vicecomes et iudices nobilium illius comitatus ex parte talium indebite arestatorum et eciam eorum, qui contra presens decretum se in talibus illicitis arestis pro iudicibus constituerent, iudicium et iusticiam facere ac penam, quam promiserint, iuxta contenta ipsius articuli exigere et ipsis nobilibus iniuriam passis et eorundem jobagionibus satisfaccionem impendere teneantur. Si autem tale arestum in bonis comitum factum fuerit, universitas nobilium cum iudicibus nobilium modo premissis ex parte talium comitum iusticiam faciendi habeat facultatem. Ubi vero universitas nobilium cum iudicibus nobilium id facere difficultarent, tunc ipsi comites in presenciam iudicum ordinariorum regni legitime evocentur et ex parte illorum iusticia impendatur. Si autem per universitatem nobilium et iudices nobilium ex parte ipsorum comitum iusticia administraretur, et de eorum iudicio aliqua parciū contentari nollet, extunc causa ipsa ad provocacionem partis in curiam regiam, in presenciam scilicet iudicum ordinariorum regni transmittatur discucienda.

XXII. Item ad articulum nonagesimum tercium de jobagionibus et eorundem domibus circa finem confectum hoc quoque additum est: Quod si iuxta contenta ipsius articuli ad bona aliorum abire permissi fuerint, domos, edificia sepes et quecunque alia ligna per eosdem ibidem terris iam infixā abducere nullo modo presumant. Si autem ad bona aliquorum simul cum illis violenter abducti fuerint, illi vel eisdem rebus deficientibus domini eorundem contra tales, dampnum et iniuria passos in centum florenis auri convincantur inter iudicem et actorem equaliter dividensis.

XXIII. Item ad articulum nonagesimum quintum de redempcionibus literarum hoc additum est: Quod capitula et conventus ipsum articulum sub amissione sigillorum suorum in omnibus punctis, clausulis et articulis firmiter observare debeant.

XXIV. Item ad articulum centesimum de duobus comitatibus, Pesthiensi et Pilisiensi confectum istud adiectum est: Quod ex quo ipsi duo comitatus eorum libertati prerogativa requirente comites inter se habere non consueverunt, ut inter ipsos quoque debitus ordo observetur, ordinatum est, quod universitas nobilium illorum duorum comitatuū singulis annis ad locum sedis iudicarie alias consuetum conveniant,^{ix} ibique tempore eleccionis iudicum nobilium certos ex pocioribus nobilibus eligant,^x cum quibus iidem iudices nobilium universas et singulas causas instar aliorum comitatuū, comites vel vicecomites habencium iudicare et iudicium factum execucioni debite demandare valeant atque possint.

^{vii} recte: nonagsimum

^{viii} desideratur: debitorum

^{ix} recte: conveniat

^x recte: eligat

XXV. Item, ex quo in articulo centesimo octavo de dieta regnicolarum confecto non plane reperitur, nec apparet, qualis modus et ordo debeat observari inter regiam maiestatem ac dominos prelatos et barones consiliariosque sue maiestatis et ceteros regnicolas ad ipsam dietam confluentes, imo, ut plurimum, dum ipsi domini prelati et barones ceterique consilarii maiestatis regie conveniunt, totam diem solis verbis conterunt et absque ulla deliberacione ab invicem seperantur; quo fit, ut ipsa dieta non sine gravi eorundem et eciam ceterorum regnicolarum impensa in longum adeo protrahitur, ut nobiles mediocres et pauperes tedio affecti vel discedere, vel autem inanes et superfluas expensas facere et sic expensis admodum exhausti ad propria tandem cum ipsorum damno reverti coguntur. Quare pro evitando omni incomodo, quod de cetero exinde emergi posset, ordinatum est, ut deinceps, dum aliquam dietam per maiestatem regiam celebrari vel alia consilia inire continget, maiestas sua convocatis primum dominis prelati et baronibus ceterisque consiliariis suis, singulis diebus ad locum, ubi maiestas sua voluerit cuique ipsorum iuxta honoris et dignitatis ac status condecenciam locum honorificum deputando, semotis ceteris quibuscunque tractatibus, ante omnia causas et rationes ac necessitates suas et regni, propter quas ipsam dietam fieri instituit, eisdem dominis prelati et baronibus consiliariisque sue maiestatis proponat. Quibus intellectis ipsi quoque obmissis quibuslibet privatis eorum rebus et negociis solummodo de hiis negociis, que coram eisdem proponentur, cum moderacione et gravitate sub silencio tractent, deliberent et concludant. Si vero inter ipsos aliqua discrepancia oriretur, magister ianitorum sue maiestatis, qui una cum eisdem pro huiuscemodi negociis tractandis interesse debet, imposito silencio votum cuiuslibet singillatim exquirat, ut saltem sic, accepto voto singulorum, per sentenciam sanioris partis ad unionem et concordiam reducantur, sicque adhibita eorundem omni cura, studio et diligencia dieta ipsa per maiestatem regiam eo cicius determinetur et negocia pro tempore occurrencia facilius concludantur. Regia autem maiestas dum aliquam dietam instituere voluerit, dignetur ante spacium unius integri mensis dominis prelati et baronibus ac ceteris regnicolis terminum ipsius diete per literas suas significare.

XXVI. Item ordinatum est, quod deinceps quodcumque maiestas regia quocunque arduo negotio regni interveniente dietam indicere voluerit, non electos de comitatibus, sed singulos dominos prelatos et barones nobilesque ac proceres regni convocare dignetur. Quorum communi consilio, quicquid pro utilitate et comodo regni faciendum erit, decernatur.

XXVII. Item, quia propter educionem equorum, boum, ovium et ceterorum animalium hactenus per plerosque homines, internos scilicet et externos, fieri solitam regnicole non parvam in eisdem animalibus penuriam atque caristiam paciuntur, quare, ut huic rei debitis remediis occurratur, statutum est, quod amodo deinceps nullus omnino hominum equos, boves, oves et quevis animalia infra duorum annorum integrorum spacia a die presentis congregacionis generalis computanda quovis quesito colore extra regnum gregatim seu aliter educere et expellere audeat modo aliquali. Quodsi quipiam presentem constitutionem transgredi presumpserint, extunc comes et vicecomes quorumlibet comitatum et alii quicunque homines huiusmodi animalia auferendi, duasque partes illorum pro maiestate regia habendi, terciam denique partem eorundem pro suis laboribus retinendi habeant facultatem.

XXVIII. Item, si qui regnicolarum ad nundinas vel fora (h)ebdomadalia in hoc regno celebrari solitas et consueta talia animalia ducerent,^{xi} quod isto casu ipsi regnicole huiusmodi animalia ad nundinas et fora (h)ebdomadalia liberam pellendi habeant potestatem. Si qui autem regnicolarum pro sua necessitate ad usum tantummodo suum vel carnifices ad macella ex eisdem animalibus emerint, de eisdem nulla tricesima exigatur; prout etiam istud ab antiquo fuit observatum. Ita tamen, quod etiam ipsi emptores talia animalia pena sub premissa de hoc regno expellere non adueant modo aliquali.

XXIX. Item conclusum est, quod in omnibus comitatibus, in quibus antiqua loca sedis iudicarie mutata sunt, ad priorem et antiquum locum transferantur.

XXX. Item quod beneficia ecclesiastica, quocunque nomine censeantur, extraneis et forensibus nacionibus non conferantur. Et si quibus collata fuissent, illi per maiestatem regiam ad residenciam evocentur ad terminum per maiestatem regiam ac dominos prelatos et barones prefigendum. Et si venire recusaverint, beneficia illorum maiestas regia incolis huius regni de se bene meritis conferendi habeat facultatem.

XXXI. Item volentibus dominis baronibus consiliariisque maiestatis regie ac ceteris regnicolis in presenti dieta constitutis, repugnantibus tamen dominis prelati et viris ecclesiasticis ordinatum est: Quod si aliqui forenses homines ab aliis, quam a regia maiestate vel illis, qui in hoc regno super quocunque beneficio ecclesiastico ius patronatus, quo hactenus usi fuissent, habent, aliqua beneficia ecclesiastica pro se procurarent et huiusmodi procuracione ius sibi in eisdem contra antiquam libertatem regni vendicantes in eisdem beneficiis residere auderent aut attemptarent, quod tales omnes et singuli, si deprehendi poterunt, ad aquam proiciantur, tanquam publici libertatis regni turbatores. Quicunque autem dominorum prelatorum, baronum aut aliorum nobilium in hoc regno super quibuscunque beneficiis ecclesiasticis ius patronatus habent, quod illi, qui hactenus ipso iure usi sunt, talia beneficia ecclesiastica, super quibus huiusmodi ius patronatus habuerint, incolis huius regni et non forensibus liberam conferendi habeant facultatem.

XXXII. Item quod officia seu vicariatus ecclesiastici in nullis ecclesiis regni per quamcunque personam ecclesiasticam Italicis et forensibus personis conferantur. Alioquin sententia talium irrita et nullius vigoris habeatur.

XXXIII. Item, ex quo plurima castra et fortalicia in confinibus regni sita et adiacencia propter indebitam eorum conservacionem, non sine gravi dispendio regnicolarum manibus Thurcorum devenerunt, eorum vero, que adhuc restant, pleraque adeo desolata et ruinosasunt, hominibusque ac victualibus et ingeniis carere dinoscuntur, ut quotidie de periculo timeatur; quare, ut deinceps castris illis debita provisio fiat, dignetur maiestas regia pro illorum castrorum finitimorum conservacione de victualibus, ingeniis et aliis necessitatibus eorundem providere, officialesque non alios, quam tales in eisdem conservare, qui et bonis habundent et exercitiorum militarium sint experti. Quodsi maiestas sua idoneos officiales ad ea deputaverit, et eisdem officialibus debita provisio facta fuerit, illique aliquod ex eisdem amiserint, tanquam infideles dampnentur et bona illorum fisco regio applicentur. Illi autem, qui ex eisdem aliqua amiserint, rationem amissionis dare teneantur.

^{xi} desideratur: statutum est

XXXIV. Item dignetur maiestas regia quolibet anno ab omnibus officialibus suis rationem exigere.

XXXV. Item dignetur maiestas regia exquirere illos, qui de castris finitimis et signanter de castro Nandoralbensi et Jaycza pixides, bombardas, ingenia, victualia aliasque res exportarunt, quoniam per illos indicibilia damna commissa sunt. Et si qui reperti fuerint talia commisisse, capite puniantur et bona illorum fisco regio applicentur. Si autem aliqui^{xii} de talibus rebus ac ingeniis et victualibus ad quempiam dono vel autem per empcionem scienter devenissent, talium bona, cum^{xiii} tamen iuridice fuerint convicti, ad maiestatem regiam devolvantur.

XXXVI. Item ex quo castra Thurcis finitima, ut frequenter, personis semper duabus pro officiolatibus dari consueverunt, quorum conservacio maximam custodiam et provisionem necessario requirere dinoscitur, quare ordinatum est, quod amodo de cetero huiusmodi castra et fortalicia finitima nunquam absque interessencia alterius ipsorum officialium in eisdem castris et fortaliciis pro tempore consitutorum vacua relinquuntur, sed alter ipsorum sub pena capitis semper debeat in eisdem personaliter pro illorum custodia permanere.

XXXVII. Item quia in singulis dietis et congregacionibus generalibus regnicolarum inter alias dispositiones et tractatus precipua contencio et difficultas de modo solvendi decimas agitata et intentata et extitit adeo, ut post felicem coronacionem regie maiestatis, dum maiestas sua pro comodo et utilitate regnicolarum superioribus annis generalem dietam indixisset, et in ea decretum generale communi consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac regnicolarum edidisset, nec eo tunc propter difficultates et differencias, que ex parte earundem decimarum oriebantur, quitquam plene decidi potuerat, sed is articulus una cum nonnullis aliis ad presentem dietam seu convencionem generalem pro eiusdem finali conclusionem extiterat prorogatus, quare ad tollendas omnes difficultates et contenciones, que hactenus inter ipsos dominos prelatos et barones ac regnicolas de modo solvendi decimas habite fuerunt, conclusum est, quod amodo in posterum perpetuis semper successivis temporibus omnibus dominis prelatis quarumcunque ecclesiarum, tam katedralium, quam collegiatarum, non obstante quacunque prava abusione, per quoscumque et qualitercumque hactenus introducta, integre decime persolvantur et exigantur in omni comitatu secundum modum, quo unusquisque cum prelato suo superinde haberet seu fecisset dispositionem de hiis rebus tantum, de quibus hactenus ipsi domini prelati decimas exegerunt. Superfluas autem et inconsuetas decimarum exacciones inducere non debeant modo aliquali. In casu autem, quo deinceps per decimatores aliquas superfluas et inconsuetas decimaciones fieri contingeret, talis modus observetur, quod ex quo ipsi domini prelati et cetera persone ecclesiastice ipsas decimas quandocunque per homines proprios pro eorum usu proprio exigere, interdum vero quibusdam personis in arendam locare consueverunt, ob hoc, si quipiam per talem inordinatam et superfluum decimacionem decimatorum se per homines proprios ipsorum dominorum prelatorum lesos et gravatos fore pretenderent, teneantur taliter lesi significare ipsi domino prelato vel factori suo huiusmodi inconsuetam et superfluam decimacionem^{xiv} et eum superinde avisare. Qui mox exinde avisatus mittat homines suum pro rectificacione premissorum ad locum, ubi talis rectificacio fieri debebit. Et si medio ipsius aliqua rectificacio fieri poterit, bene quidem, alioquin ipsa questio ad locum et terminum sedis iudicarie illius comitatus, in presenciam universitatis nobilium deducatur, et quitquid iidem in premissis secundum deum et eius iusticiam cognoverint, in hoc et ipsi domini prelati et pars conquerens contenti esse debebunt. Et si compertum fuerit partem conquerentem per decimatores iniuste fuisse fatigatam, pro expensis partis fatigate de propriis eorundem decimatorum rebus et bonis satisfaccio administretur. Interim vero donec de premissis ad plenum decisum fuerit, interdictum ecclesiasticum ad partem conquerentem vel eorum jobagiones minime imponatur. Si autem rectificacionem istam per arendatorem fieri debere contingeret, tunc pars conquerens nec prelato, nec factori eiusdem teneatur significare, sed antequam ipse decime exigentur, arendatores ipsi per iudices nobilium vel alterum illorum admoniti sedem iudicariam ipsius comitatus intrare sint astricti, et coram universitate nobilium omnia premissa rectificare iudicioque et decisioni illorum parere et obtemperare, de expensis quoque, si comperti fuerint superfluam et iniustam fecisse decimacionem parti conquerenti omnimodam impendere satisfaccionem. Terminus autem solucionis ipsarum decimarum, sicuti alias consuetum fuit, observetur. Elapso vero termino et non prius super tales, decimas iustas et consuetas solvere negligentes interdictum ecclesiasticum imponatur, quousque per eos solute fuerint^{xv} effective. Dominis tamen terrestribus propter rusticos decimas solvere difficultantes ecclesiasticum interdictum non servetur.

^{xii} alique deest

^{xiii} rectius: dum

XXXVIII. Item in examinacione acervorum talis modus per decimatores observetur: Quod decimatores in presenciam iudicum et^{xvi} villicorum, ubi decimas dicaverint, iuramento rustici decimas solvere debentis contentari debeant, vel si contentari noluerint, iudices vel villici talium locorum liberam habeant acervos eorundem, moderate tamen et non tali tempore pluvioso, unde ipsis rusticis aliquod damnum sequi possit, examinandi facultatem. Qui decimatores, si plus in eisdem, quam rusticus dixerit, invenient superfluitatem auferant et ultra hoc iustam eidem decimam ad solvendum imponant. Verum, priusquam acervum examinari fecerint, teneantur ante omnia in manibus eorundem iudicum vel villicorum talis loci unum florenum assignare, ut si comperti fuerint per decimatores huiusmodi acervum indebite subverti fecisse et examinasse, ipsum unum florenum manibus rustici iidem iudices et villici assignare sint astricti.

XXXIX. Item conclusum est, quod apes, agni, capreoli tempore suo, secundum consuetum modum dicentur et signentur, factaque dicacione et signacione, invito hospite, apud quem dicabuntur, non amplius, quam solummodo usque festum sancti Michaelis, et illi quidem ad fortunam decimatorum teneantur. Et si postmodum ipsa animalia casualiter perierint, rustici ipsi postea nullo modo aggravari debeant. Sed tamen iurare teneantur, quod non eorum culpa, neque malicia, et neque voluntate perierunt.

^{xiv} mendose: docacionem

^{xv} recte: non fuerint

^{xvi} recte: vel

XL. Item quia tempore vindemiarum plurimi vina eorum vendicioni exponere consueverunt, dum autem eorum vina vendidissent, decimatores vinorum privato eorum lucro guadentes quasdam abusivas extorsiones in plerisque comitatibus, et signanter in comitatu Simigiensi decimatores abbacie sancti Martini sacri montis Pannonie pro sigillis cereis ab eisdem venditoribus in quibusdam locis duos denarios, in alis vero duodecim extorquere sunt assueti. Quare ut tales abusiones de medio regnicolarum extirpentur, statutum est, quod amodo de cetero tales abusiones qualitercunque introducte penitus extincte habeantur; et secundum quod ab antiquo, temporibus abbatum legitimorum dicte abbacie in tali re observatum fuit, ita eadem consuetudo de cetero observetur.

XLI. Item quod in omni diocesi, ubi decime cum pecuniis exolvuntur, centum denarii sine omni addicione pro uno floreno recipiantur.

XLII. Item quod villici propter hospitalitatem, quam exhibere solent decimatoribus ad exaccionem et administracionem decimarum^{xvii}, non dicentur, nec de capitibus dicarum quitquam ab eisdem exigatur.

XLIII. Item ex quo inter dominos prelatos ab una, parte vero ex altera dominos barones et ceteros regnicolas racione et pretextu exaccionis pecuniarum Christianitatis et messorialium hactenus per ipsos dominos prelatos exactarum quedam differentia et contencio est exorta ipsique domini barones et regnicole huiusmodi exacciones contra eorundem libertatem et privilegia abusive fuisse introductas, e converso iidem domini prelati vigore efficacissimorum privilegiorum easdem exacciones fecisse, superindeque ambe partes literas et literalia instrumenta pro se habere, quas et que non in presenciarum, sed in ulteriori termino producere velle asserunt, quare pro eiusdem rei finali decisione conclusum est, quod ipsi domini prelati universas eorum literas et literalia instrumenta, quas et que super facto premissis pro se habent confectas et emanata, vel eciam ipsi domini barones et regnicole, si quas interim reperire poterunt, in octavis festi beati Michaelis archangeli proxime affuturis coram maiestate regia producere et exhibere debeant et teneantur. Quibus visis maiestas sua inter partes deliberacionem et finalem conclusionem faciendi in premissis omnimodam habeat facultatem.

XLIV. Item, quia racione exaccionis decimarum ac eciam nonarum inter dominos prelatos et barones ac alios nobiles et possessionatos homines plurime difficultates in eo exorte sunt, utrum scilicet primo decime aut^{xviii} none persolvi debeant, pro eo ordinatum est, quod sicuti hactenus consuetum fuit, ita et in posterum prius none, deinde autem decime persolvantur.

XLV. Item sunt plurima loca in confinibus regni sita, in quibus Rasciani, Rutheni, Walachi et alii scismatici in terris Christianorum habitant et de eisdem terris hactenus iuxta eorum ritum viventes nullas penitus decimas solvere consueverunt, quos tamen ipsi domini prelati ad decimas solvendas cogere niterentur. Et quia ipse decime in patrimonium Christi dedicate a Christi fidelibus et non aliis scismaticis hominibus, presertim vero illis ad vocacionem et assecuracionem regie maiestatis ac wayvodarum, banorum et ceterorum officialium, ipsa confinia regni tenencium dicta loca incolentibus exigi solent, ob hoc ordinatum est et conclusum. Quod amodo de cetero ab ipsis Rascianis, Ruthenis, Walachis et aliis scismaticis in quibuscunque terris Christianorum residentibus nulle penitus decime exigantur.

^{xvii} decimarum desideratum

^{xviii} mendose: ac

Nos itaque supplicationibus prefatorum dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium dicti regni nostri per ipsos maiestati nostre modo, quo supra porrectis exauditis clementer et admissis, prescriptas literas nostras privilegiales, ut premissum est, pretacta statuta et decreta nostra in se habentes simulcum preinsertis articulis de novo formatis acceptantes, approbantes et ratificantes, presentibusque literis nostris privilegialibus verbotenus sine diminucione et augmento aliquali inseri et inscribi facientes, easdem insuper literas nostras privilegiales et omnia, tam in eisdem, quam eciam pretactis articulis de novo conceptis contenta et specificata quia utilitatem et quietem statum predicti regni nostri tangere et concernere videbantur, pro ipsis dominis prelatis et baronibus nobilibusque eiusdem regni nostri innovantes perpetuo duraturas et valituras confirmamus, nosque omnia et singula in eisdem literis nostris privilegialibus et articulis contenta inviolabiliter observare et per alios observari facere promittimus et obligamus presentis scripti patrocinio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes literas nostras privilegiales appensione secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, communitas duximus concedendas. Datum Bude predicta per manus reverendi in Christo patris domini Thome postulati Agriensis, aule nostri summi et secretarii cancellarii, dilecti et fidelis nostri tricessimo secundo die diei congregacionis prenotate anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo nonagesimo quinto, regnorum nostrorum Hungarie etc. anno quinto, Bohemie vero vigesimo quarto. Illustrissimo ac reverendissimo, venerabilibusque in Christo patribus dominis Hippolito Esthensi de Aragonia, tituli sancte Lucie in Silice, Sancte Romane ecclesie diacono cardinale Strigoniensi, Petro Colocensi arciepiscopis, eodem Thoma postulato Agriensis, Osualdo Zagrabiensis, Dominico Waradiensis, Ladislao Gereb Transsilvanensis, Sigismundo Quinqueecclesiensis, Francisco electo Jauriensis, Johanne Wesprimiensis, Luca Chanadiensis, Nicolao de Bathor Waciensis, Anthonio Nittriensis, Sirimiensi sede vacante, Gabriele Boznensis, Briccio electo et confirmato Tininiensis, Christophoro Modrusiensis, Michaele electo Segniensis ecclesiarum episcopis ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item spectabili ac magnificis Sephano de Zapolya comite perpetuo terre Scepusiensis et dicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino comite, Petro Gereb de Wyngarth iudice curie nostre, Bartholomeo Dragfy de Belthewk wayvoda nostro Transsilvano et comite Siculorum, Joanne Corvino Oppavie et Lyphovie duce, necnon regnorum nostrorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie, Petro de Machkas et Jacobo Gerlysthe Zewriniensibus banis, Ladislao de Egerwara thavernicorum, Nicolao Banffy de Lyndwa ianitorum, Georgio de Kanisa et Joanne Bebek de Persewcz pincernarum, Emerico de Peren dapiferorum, Joanne Ernusth de Chaktornya agazonum et Blasio de Raska cubiculariorum nostrorum regialium magistris, Josa de Som comite Thenesiensi et generali capitaneo partium regni nostri inferiorum, aliisque quamplurimis regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

SECOND DECREE OF WLADISLAS II, 1495

On the personal order of the Lord King.

We, Wladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania and Bulgaria¹, prince of Silesia and Luxemburg, as well as margrave of Lusatia and Moravia, notify by these presents all whom it may concern that when in the diet, that is general assembly of all lord prelates, barons, nobles and lords of the said kingdom of Hungary appointed by us on the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, in the year of the Lord 1492 recently passed we proclaimed and established some statutes or decrees following the counsel of the same lord prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of the said kingdom of ours for the sake and benefit of our said kingdom. We gave and issued these for the lord prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of our said kingdom, after having had them included in our letters of privilege, even though these were not at the time at all complete or fully concluded; and we promised at that diet recently held by us that we would correct some deficiencies and would append additions to the same statutes of ours. Finally in the present diet that we proclaimed for the same urgent matters of the same kingdom of ours to the fifteenth day after the feast of St. George, the Martyr,² the said lord prelates, barons, and all nobles elected from each county, appearing before our majesty, took care to show and present our aforementioned letters of privilege, which—as said above—contain word for word our said statutes and decrees, as well as some articles newly composed and conceived which, once given the force of statutes or decrees, will complete and conclude the said statutes of ours. They besought our majesty requesting with humble insistence that we deign to accept, approve, and ratify our same letters of privilege and the statutes and decrees contained in them together with the said articles that were newly composed and conceived—as said—to complete and conclude our said statutes and decrees, and to have these included, transcribed, and copied into our letters of privilege and to affirm and confirm them by our royal authority—and as confirmed observe and have them observed—renewing them for the common good and profit and the tranquility of our said kingdom of Hungary to last and prevail forever. The content of our letters of privilege that contains and embodies our mentioned statutes and decrees is the following:

We Wladislas etc. [the decree of 1492]

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. By 1495 none of them were under Hungarian control, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² That is to 9 May 1495.

Here follows the text of the newly composed articles, which—as said above—completes and concludes our statutes and decrees, and it is such:

1. Then, first, in the second article of the decree it is not expressly established what way and rule shall be observed in the remission of the property rights occupied up till now by the serene prince and late lord, King Matthias and her majesty the queen, as well as by others. [1] Therefore, it has been ordained that they, be they either the royal majesty or anyone of any state or condition whatsoever, shall be lawfully summoned to the very first octave³ to be held. [2] And if the occupation is plainly proven there, then the royal majesty as well as anyone else shall immediately and forthwith remit such occupied goods together with the compensation for the fruits obtained in the meantime, without any delay under the penalty of an act of might. [3] And if they subsequently allege that they have some rights to these goods, they shall have the right to claim [them] out of possession of these occupied goods, according to the law and custom of the realm. [4] The present article shall also be understood as applying to any future occupations (if such should happen), so that first and before all else justice be administered in regard to an unjust occupation and the occupiers be convicted of an act of might.

2. Then, the following has been attached to the ninth article, which is about the right of the royal majesty to grant property rights: [1] that all donations of the royal majesty made (or to be made in the future) contrary to the text and content of this article shall remain vain, canceled, and lacking any force. [2] The royal majesty shall have the right to make donations to any person, even foreigners, up to one hundred tenant peasants.⁴

3. Then, to the thirteenth article, which concerns the condemnation of the unfaithful it has been added: [1] Should his royal majesty wish to condemn any of his gentlemen of the realm⁵ to the charge of infidelity⁶, he shall summon and call a general diet and congregation of the community

³ Octavial courts (octava) refer to the session of royal courts of justice; of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times of lords prelate, barons, and other gentlemen of the realm to a certain date. He, against whom the charge of infidelity is made, has to be summoned in person, and not through an attorney, through letters of command from the royal majesty via letters of exhibition addressed to some convent or chapter.⁷ [2] If he comes and can clear himself, then well and good; but if he does not appear, or if he appears but cannot clear himself, he will be condemned to the taint of infidelity. [3] Thereafter, he will not be granted safe conduct nor a new trial by the royal majesty. [4] If someone has been convicted of the taint of infidelity for some crimes by sentence of the justices ordinary of the realm, such sentence of the justices ordinary shall remain set and valid.

⁴ While royal grants not observing the restrictions of 1492 were cancelled, this time foreigners are explicitly included as beneficiaries. The limit of 100 plots was to be rescinded in 1498:26.

⁵ When legal documents refer to regnicolae (verbatim: inhabitants of the kingdom) the enfranchised nobles are meant. Our translation of “gentlemen of the realm” attempts to reflect that.

⁶ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) – see below Art. 4 -- referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis). That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment. The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

4. The cases which imply the charge of infidelity are these:

= 28 May 1462: 2

Adding: [14] Then, those who mutilate someone or gouge out his eyes, except the bans, voivodes and others holding offices on the borders of the realm.⁸

5. Then, about which there was a general comment in respect of the royal majesty in the fourteenth article towards the end, [1] that His Majesty has full right to grant the goods of violent occupiers to anyone he wishes as if the goods of unfaithful persons: that this article concerning the donation of goods refers only to the gentlemen of the realm and not to foreigners and strangers.

6. Then, to the twenty-ninth concerning the toll⁹ of the murdered persons, which states that no archdeacon, vice-archdeacon, parish priest or their deputies can exact the silver mark, which is also mentioned in the same article, for the funeral of murdered persons under penalty of the loss of their benefice, it has been added [1] that if someone should act to the contrary, the royal majesty shall have full right to grant their benefice to whomever he wishes.

⁷ Letters of command would be sent to convents or chapters that acted as places of authentication. Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66-73

⁸ Ban (banus) was the title not only of the viceroy of Croatia-Slavonia, but also of the territories south of the River Drava on the northern Balkans, by this time many of them lost to the Ottomans, and even of some commanders of border castles. The voivode was the king’s deputy in Transylvania.

⁹ Pedagium commonly meant a road toll for pedestrians, but here it clearly means a fee.

7. Then, to the thirty-eighth article it has been added: [1] that instead of proclamation at three fairs, a terminal summons¹⁰ has to be issued, except for the procedure described there regarding obligations.

8. Then, to the fortieth article it has been added [1] that at the time of the octave courts, the royal majesty be held ex officio to select three of the lord prelates, another three of the barons and fourteen of the more substantial and wealthy nobles as co-assessors, and provide a fitting salary for them according to the requirements of their estate.¹¹

9. Then, to the forty-third article concerning witnesses and royal bailiffs of executions the following has been decided: [1] that because it frequently happens that when the men of the chapters or convents as well as the royal bailiffs are sent out to perform some necessary executions, many nobles and men of property or people of other estate rise against them and insult them either by verbal abuse and various affronts, or sometimes even by wounds or beatings, occasionally even slaying them, or having them killed; against these in the said article no punishment is laid. [2] Therefore, for the good of the realm and the defense of the common weal it has been decided that if anyone verbally abuses or injures such executors of justice, he shall be condemned to one mark of gold equaling seventy-two florins; those who wound or beat them, to an act of might and capital sentence, and if they cause their death or that of any one of them, then to the perpetual taint of infidelity. [3] If the aforesaid is committed by the tenant peasants or retainers¹² of someone, and these fearing punishment flee to the estates of someone else, then their lords do not have to be condemned in the said case, but have to prove their innocence by oath; and those fugitives have to be hunted down by those in whose goods they may be found, and if they cannot present them, they shall be convicted to their man-price, without failing to inflict punishment on the evildoers.

10. Then, to the forty-fifth article this has been added: [1] inasmuch as it concerns appeals to the Roman curia and its legates, so also this article applies to the lord archbishops in this country: [2] that no one at all is permitted to bring his case to their presence, save by way of appeal from the episcopal court of one of the lord prelates. [3] Not omitting this: that if anyone should dare to transgress the aforementioned article together with these presents, they shall lose their plaint and claim. Moreover, they shall be convicted to forty gold florins against the opposing party for their expenses to be exacted unremittingly by the ispán or alispán and the noble magistrates, providing they have enough for that; otherwise they shall be detained and chastised until the debt is paid. [4]

¹⁰ The triforensis summons were abolished by Matthias. Terminal summons meant that the party has to appear in court in 32 days or the next octave court and the case will be adjudicated even if he does not attend.

¹¹ This demand was seen as a significant expansion of the political role of the lesser (middling) nobility, only the record show that they had little to say in the courts, and were often not even invited; see András Kubinyi “Beisitzer im königlichen Rat aus dem mittleren Adel in der Jagellonenzeit,” in: Idem, Stände und Ständestaat im spätmittelalterlichenn Ungarn, transl. T. Schäfer. (Herne: Schäfer, 2011), pp. 233-52

¹² The reference here is evidently to non-noble retainers, who were treated at law as similar to peasants.

[Regarding] cases which are presently before the most reverend lord legate Orso Orsini,¹³ the plaintiffs shall return these cases to their justices ordinary.

11. Then, to the fifty-ninth article it has been added: [1] that because it is not clear from the said article by what penalties the violent occupiers of goods and [property] rights shall be punished by those who obtained them, it has therefore been ordered that for such an unjust occupation, they shall be convicted to the estimation of the property rights¹⁴ and the damage caused with interest in favor of the opposing party. [2] Should the ispán prove to be lax in the execution of justice which is demanded from him in that article and led by rashness omits the execution under whatever pretext, then he shall be deprived of his office and moreover held to repay the estimation and whatever damage was done to the opposing party.

12. Then, to the sixty-sixth article concerning fines it has been added: [1] that in all counties this is also to be observed, that after lawful summons against an adversary party, once the terms have expired and the plaintiff claimed the fines from him, then, whether the summoned appeared or not, the ispán, alispán, and the noble magistrates before whom the case is treated and to whose court it pertains, shall nevertheless have the right and duty to give final judgment and justice in regard to the defendant, and finally when the case is completed (but not before) to collect those fines, two parts for themselves and one part for the opposing party.

13. Then, to the sixty-eighth article concerning the right of litigants to make agreement, this has also been added: [1] that if it happens that the parties agree among themselves, then no fines can be claimed by any judge before the execution, but thereafter they can be exacted.¹⁵

14. Then, to the seventy-first article this has been added: [1] that no prorogations can be granted in times of truce to those who are engaged in the border castles.¹⁶ [2] In times of war, however,

¹³ Recte: Orso Orsini, (of the famous Roman aristocratic family), bishop of Teano was papal legate to Hungary 1481–95, see Vilmos Fraknói, Magyarország egyházi és politikai összeköttetései a Római Szent-Székkal. I. [Ecclesiastical and political relations of Hungary with the Holy See] (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1901); András Kubinyi, “Diplomáciai érintkezések a Jagelló-kori magyar állam és a pápaság között (1490–1526),” [Diplomatic relations between the Jagellonian Hungarian state and the Papacy] in István Zombori, ed. Magyarország és a Szentszék kapcsolatának ezer éve (Budapest: METEM, 1996), p. 121.

¹⁴ The estimate of the value of immovable and movable property, was done usually on the traditional basis (estimatio communis, see Tripartitum I: 133), but occasionally a tenfold (estimatio perennalis) valuation for immovable property was used. The low common estimation assured kinsmen’s and even neighbors’ and abutters’ ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed on families having to pay the filial quarter in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation. The estimatio fori represented the true market worth of goods.

¹⁵ The permission to settle cases out of court has a long prehistory, at least since the early fifteenth century, see e. g. Comp. ante 1440: 8; 8 March 1435:4 repeated in 1439:30. However, the rule of exacting fines after the judgment seems to be new.

¹⁶ Actually, border warfare did not cease even during times of truce or peace with the Ottomans; local raids and skirmishes were continuous; see András Kubinyi, “Hungary’s Power Factions and the Turkish not more than one prorogation can be granted providing that they are personally present in those castles; otherwise, if any of them at the time of the octaves should be found here in the royal court or at their own residence, they shall not enjoy any prorogation. [3] For those, however, who are engaged abroad in important embassies of the king and country, prorogation shall be allowed as long as they are so engaged.

15. Then, to the seventy-second article this has been added: [1] that because there are many among the lord prelates, barons, and other nobles, who claiming that they are protected by prerogatives of exemption or liberty, gain and obtain justice for themselves against people of noble or non-noble estate before the ispán or alispán and noble magistrates of those counties where it is known that they have goods, yet refuse to stand trial against those who sue them, [2] it has, therefore, been decreed, that they shall and are held also to obey and comply with the justice and judgment of these ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates at the request of anyone.¹⁷

16. Then, as in the seventy-fifth article no fixed penalty is found against those who disturb and impede ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates during the execution of judgment and justice, it has therefore been decided [1] that the ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates shall not perform executions except when they are sent out from the county court by the community of the nobles, with letters of the same. [2] If they or any one of them be sent out from the court in the said way to perform an execution of justice, and in the course of the execution of justice someone insults them or any one of them by verbal abuse, or other offense, wounding or beating, or puts him or them to death, then the same rule shall be applied in respect of these assailants as for those who attack royal bailiffs and the witnesses of chapters and convents.

17. Adding this, that if the ispáns, alispáns or noble magistrates set out on their own initiative and not from the county court to some executions, or rather (as they now often improperly do) exact fines without a letter of the court, and if they dare to vex or disturb anyone or even do damage to his belongings, then, notwithstanding the damage done, they must be right away convicted to their fine of the head¹⁸ against the damaged party.

18. Moreover, as there was a comment on fugitive tenant or other peasants at the end of the same article and no punishment was decided for those who receive them, [1] it has been ordained that if a peasant, having perpetrated a crime, flees to the goods of someone, the ispán, alispán or the noble magistrates shall demand this peasant from the one who received him. Should he not want to hand him over, then they have full right to exact a fine of twenty-five marks from him, to be divided equally between the judge and the plaintiff. [2] Should, however, the ispán receive such evildoers and fugitives on his goods and refuse to hand them over at the request of the damaged party, then in this case the community of the nobles together with the noble magistrates can exact the same fine of twenty-five marks from his goods, to be likewise divided equally between the judge and the damaged party. [3] And if that is difficult to do, then the ispán shall be summoned on this account into the presence of the justices ordinary of the realm and justice shall be administered by them in regard to him. [4] But if the community of the nobles and the noble magistrates pass judgment in regard to him, and one of the parties is not satisfied with their judgment, then such cases have to be transferred to the royal court, namely to the justices ordinary of the realm at the application of that party.

Threat in the Jagiellonian Period (1490 - 1526),” in István Zombori, ed. Fight against the Turk in Central-Europe in the First Half of the 16th Century (Budapest: METEM, 2004), pp. 115–145.

¹⁷ This article has been regarded as a sign of “victory” of the county nobility against the great lords, but it is better to characterize it as a political program. Cf. Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiello Hungary (1490–1526),” Central Europe 3 (2005): 3–18, pp. 10–17. Actually, Werbőczy quoted such charters as prime examples of “invalid privileges”; see Tripartitum II 11:2

¹⁸ See below Art. 19.

19. Then, to the eighty-first article, which is drawn up about thieves and other evildoers, in which it is contained that should someone not expel such evildoers from his goods, then the ispán has to send someone to catch them and so on, it has been added: [1] that such evildoers shall not be expelled, but shall be apprehended by him or those in whose goods they have been found by the ispán or alispán or the noble magistrates and, at the request of them or any one of them, hauled to the county court for receiving punishment. [2] If they do not want or refuse to haul them to court, they shall be convicted to the man-price of the evildoer, but the evildoers shall still be duly punished if they can be caught at a later time. [3] Declaring explicitly that privileged nobles and men of property, who are called liberi comites, have the right to punish such evildoers, and they do not have to bring them to the county court if they do not want to.¹⁹ [4] If the ispáns, alispáns, the noble magistrates or the liberi comites by carelessness or deliberately and intentionally release those evildoers who have been surrendered to them or caught by them, they shall be burdened of the fine of the head of the evildoers, to be paid in two parts to the judge before whom the suit has been opened, and in the third part to the adversary party; moreover, they shall be deprived of their honor and office, and shall never be admitted to the same or similar office. [5] The fine of the head of the lord prelates and barons is known to amount to 400 florins, of the nobles 100, and of the peasants 40, as required by ancient custom of the realm.²⁰

20. Then, to the ninetieth article, which among others is addressed to the ispáns for the redress for those arrested unjustly it is added [1] that as two counties, Pest and Pilis, do not have ispáns and alispáns,²¹ in these the noble magistrates together with the more substantial nobles can make and administer this redress.

21. Then, to the ninety-first article composed on nobles arrested on occasion of [debts], where it is not written who should be the judges of the unjustly arrested persons and the penalties to be inflicted, it is added: [1] that the ispán, alispán and the noble magistrates of the county must administer judgment and justice in regard to those arrested unjustly and also those who, flouting the present decree, took it upon themselves to be judges in such illicit arrests,²² and they shall exact the fine that they deserve according to the contents of the article, and give satisfaction to the nobles who suffered injury and to their tenant peasants. [2] If such an arrest took place on the goods of the ispáns, then the community of the nobles together with the noble magistrates has the right to administer justice in regard to such ispáns in the aforementioned way. [3] Should, however, this be difficult for the community of the nobles and the noble magistrates to do, then the ispáns shall be lawfully summoned to the presence of the justices ordinary of the realm and justice be passed in regard to them. [4] If, however, justice is administered by the community of the nobles and the noble magistrates in regard to these ispáns, and one of the parties is not satisfied with their judgment, then the case has to be transferred for discussion to the royal court, namely into the presence of the justices ordinary on the application of that party.

¹⁹ The privilege of high jurisdiction, i. e., to mete out capital punishment (similar to the Blutbann in the medieval Empire), was granted to many lords from the mid-fourteenth century onward. They were called szabadispán (liber comes) as they had the same rights as the county ispáns.

²⁰ This seems to be the earliest definition of the amount of the fine of head, that is, the man-price (or composition) in a decree. In the Triparium the difference is that the nobles' and burghers' man-price is given as 200 florins (II: 43, 2, and III: 9).

²¹ See 1492:100 and also below Art. 24.

22. Then, to the ninety-third article (towards the end) about tenant peasants and their houses it has also been added [1] that should they be allowed to go to the goods of others in accordance with the contents of this article, they shall not dare to remove in any way houses, buildings, fences or any other wooden things erected by them there.²³ [2] If, however, they took them with themselves to the goods of others by force, then they or, if they are lacking in belongings, their lords shall be convicted to one hundred golden florins against those who suffered harm and injury, to be divided equally between the judge and the plaintiff.

23. Then, to the ninety-fifth article concerning the redemption of letters, it has been added that the chapters and convents must firmly observe that article in all of its points, clauses and articles under [pain of] losing their seals.²⁴

24. Then to the hundredth article about the two counties of Pest and Pilis this has been added: [1] that because these two counties upon the prerogative of their liberty do not have ispáns, in order that appropriate order be maintained among them, it has been ordered that the community of the nobles of these two counties shall gather annually at the heretofore usual place of the county court, and, at the time of the election of the noble magistrates, elect some of the more substantial nobles, with whom the noble magistrates can and may judge each and every case and, having passed judgment, make due execution, just like other counties which have ispáns and alispáns.²⁵

25. Then, because in the hundred-and-eighth article composed about the diet of the gentlemen of the realm it cannot be found clearly, nor is it apparent, what way and order should be observed

²² It is unclear to what kind of persons this passage refers.

²³ This clause clearly limits the right—or at least the possibility—of peasants moving (or being moved) from one estate to another.

²⁴ A characteristic article of these late medieval diets, containing nothing else but the confirmation of a previous piece of legislation.

²⁵ Apparently, the administration of these counties by the palatine had fallen into abeyance. See Attila Zsoldos: Pest megye monográfiája I/2. A honfoglalástól 1686-ig [Monograph of Co. Pest I/2. From the Hungarian conquest to 1686] (Budapest: Pest Megye Monográfia Közalapítvány, 2001).

between the royal majesty, the lord prelates and barons, the counselors of His Majesty, and other gentlemen of the realm who assemble at this diet; [1] and moreover, when these lord prelates, barons and other counselors of the royal majesty come together, they mostly waste the whole day with only talk and they depart without any decision whatsoever, [2] as a result of which the diet (not without serious cost for them and for other gentlemen of the realm) gets so long protracted that the middling and poor nobles affected by weariness are forced either to depart or to have unnecessary and needless expenses, and thus, exhausted by these expenses they finally return home with their losses. [3] Therefore, in order to avoid all inconvenience that might in future arise from this, it has been ordained that henceforth, when it happens that some diet is held or any other consultation is called by the royal majesty, then His Majesty shall before all else relate to the lord prelates, barons and counselors of His Majesty the causes, reasons and needs of his and of the country, on account of which he has decided to have the diet, first calling together the lord prelates, barons, and his other counselors, every day to a place where His Majesty wishes, and appointing to each a place appropriate to the requisites of their honor, dignity and status, with all other discussion set aside. [4] After hearing these, they shall temperately, seriously and quietly discuss, consult and decide the matters that were related to them, also setting aside any of their private matters and affairs. [5] If any discord should emerge among them, then the master of the doorkeepers of His Majesty, who has to be there with them to discuss these matters, imposing silence, shall inquire the vote of each of them one by one in order that, having the vote of each of them, they may at all events be brought to concord and agreement by the decision of the wiser party.²⁶ Thus, having applied their full care, dedication, and diligence the diet may be finished the faster by His Majesty, and the business arising at that time be easier settled. [6] And the royal majesty, when he wishes to hold a diet, shall deign to notify by letter the lord prelates, barons, and other gentlemen of the realm of the term of the diet one whole month in advance.

26. Then, it has been ordained that henceforth, whenever the royal majesty wishes to proclaim a diet because of any arduous matter whatsoever of the kingdom, he shall deign to convoke not the elected men of the counties, but all the lord prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of the realm individually.²⁷ He should decide with their common counsel whatever is to be done for the sake and welfare of the realm.

²⁶ This article aimed at shortening the diets, not only limiting the time spent waiting upon the assembly of the greater lords, but regulating the way of decision making in the “upper house” of the diet (although a formal upper chamber was not established until the seventeenth century). It is remarkable that the master of the doorkeepers serving as something like a speaker of the house or even a type of Hungarian ‘Black Rod’, should in good medieval manner decide according to the sanior pars, even though counting votes. See András Kubinyi, “A magyar országgyűlések tárgyalási rendje, 1445–1526,” [The order of debate in the Hungarian diets] Jogtörténeti Szemle 9/2 (2006): 3–11.

²⁷ The right of nobles to attend the diet in person was a recurrent demand of the county nobility, but did not become the rule until the 1510s. (And then, became a burden for the poorer ones and they asked to reduce their presence!) It is noteworthy, though, that the king called a diet in 1496 inviting two deputies from every county.

27. Then, since on account of the export of horses, oxen, sheep and other animals by many people, domestic and foreign alike, the people of the kingdom have hitherto suffered no little need and shortage of these animals, [1] therefore, in order that proper remedy be applied to this matter, it has been ordered that henceforth no one shall in any way dare under any pretext to lead and drive horses, oxen, sheep and any other animal out of the country either in flocks or otherwise for two full years reckoned from the day of this present general assembly. [2] Should anyone dare to transgress this ordinance, the ispán or alispán of any county as well as any other person has full right to take away such animals, giving two parts over to the royal majesty, while having the right to retain the third part for his troubles.²⁸

28. Then, should any of the inhabitants of the realm lead such animals to the markets or weekly fairs which are usually and customarily held in this country, these inhabitants of the realm shall in this case have full right to drive these animals to the markets or weekly fairs. [1] And should anyone of them buy from these animals for his needs to be used only by himself, or butchers [buy them] for the slaughterhouse, no thirtieth should be exacted from these, [2] as has been observed since ancient times.²⁹ [3] In such a way, however, that these buyers shall not dare to export such animals from the country in any way, under the aforementioned penalty.

29. Then, it was decided that in every county, where the ancient place of the county court was changed, it shall be taken back to the earlier and previous place.³⁰

30. Then, that ecclesiastical benefices, called by whatever name, shall not be donated to outsiders and foreigners. [1] And if such have been donated, they shall be called to their see by the royal majesty to a term set by the royal majesty and the lord prelates and barons. [2] Should they refuse to come, the royal majesty shall have the right to donate their benefices to well-deserving inhabitants of this kingdom.

31. Then, by the will of the lord barons, and the counselors of the royal majesty, and other gentlemen of the realm gathered in the present diet (but with the disagreement of the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons), it has been ordered [1] that if some foreign persons obtained for themselves some ecclesiastical benefices from other than the royal majesty or those who have the right of patronage that they have hitherto exercised over ecclesiastical benefices in this kingdom, and—claiming rights in them by such acquisition against the ancient liberty of the realm—dare or seek to reside in these benefices, [2] then each and every one of them, if they can be caught, shall be thrown into water, as public disturbers of the liberty of the realm.³¹ [3] Those lord prelates, barons or other nobles who have right of patronage over some ecclesiastical benefices in this country, and who have so far used this right, have free right to donate these ecclesiastical benefices, over which they have the right of patronage, to inhabitants of this kingdom and not to foreigners.³²

²⁸ It is not clear, what caused this temporary prohibition on animal export; the decree of 1514: 66 justified this measure by attempting to prohibit the influx of foreign money into the country. In fact, the export of cattle had been the mainstay of Hungarian foreign trade since the mid-fifteenth century; for a survey of the relevant literature, see Ian Blanchard, “The Continental European Cattle Trades 1400–1600,” The Economic History Review, NS, 39 (2008) 427–60; A. Fara, “An Outline of Livestock Production and Cattle Trade from Hungary to Western Europe in Late Middle Ages and Early Modern Period (XIVth– XVIth centuries)” Crisia 45 (2015), 87–95. and Balázs Nagy, “Foreign Trade of Medieval Hungary” in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 473– 90.

²⁹ Since the thirtieth as an export-import duty developed gradually from different tolls, some collecting posts remained within the country. Their right to collect duties is abolished here.

³⁰ The reason for this measure is not known.

32. Then, that no ecclesiastical offices, that is, vicariates³³ shall be granted to Italians and foreign persons in any of the churches of the realm by any ecclesiastical person. [1] Otherwise, the sentences of these will be invalid and have no force.

33. Then, as several castles and fortified places situated and lying on the borders of the country fell into the hands of the Turks because of their improper maintenance, not without great harm to the inhabitants of the realm, and others which hitherto remained standing are mostly so abandoned and ruined and known to lack people, provisions, and engines, that their peril is feared for daily, [1] therefore, in order that henceforth proper supply be given to these castles, the royal majesty should deign to provide for the maintenance of these border castles provisions, engines, and other necessities, and have as their officers none other than those who are rich in goods as well as are experts in military matters.³⁴ [2] Once His Majesty appoints suitable officers and these officers are provided for properly, should they lose some of these [castles], they shall be condemned as

³¹ These articles aimed at eliminating papal appointments to Hungarian benefices, a concern going back to at least King Sigismund's times (see 6 April 1404). Actually, such appointments were quite rare (Vilmos Fraknoi, Magyarország egyházi és politikai összeköttetései a konstanci zsinattól a mohácsi vészig (Budapest: Szent István Társulat, 1902), p. 361). There is no evidence that the strange and cruel procedure outlined here ever took place.

³² It is significant that the disagreement of the clergy to these rather drastic measures is noted. This indicates, among others, the weakness of the—virtually non-existent—“second [clerical] estate” in the Hungarian diet. However, in 1497 King Wladislas issued a license to an Italian priest to obtain any benefice in Hungary, “notwithstanding that the lords prelates, lords and nobles have recently prohibited this in their decision.” (Kovachich, Supplementum, 2:294–95.)

³³ By ecclesiastical officers are meant here the ordinaries of episcopal courts.

³⁴ According to a record of the treasurer from 1511 the upkeep of the border castles amounted to 130 thousand florins, while the total income of the treasury was estimated between 200.000 and 300.000 florins (see Ferenc Szakály, “The Hungarian-Croatian Border Defense System and Its Collapse”, in János M. Bak, and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in medieval and Early modern Hungary (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science monographs, 1982) pp. 159–178). The royal treasury was regularly unable to cover these costs and the commanders of the castles had to advance major sums from their own. They were, if at all, then rewarded by property donations; see Géza Pálffy, “The Origins and Development of the Border Defence System Against the Ottoman Empire in Hungary (Up to the Eighteenth Century),” in Géza Dávid and Pál Fodor, eds. Ottomans, Hungarians and Habsburgs in Central Europe: The Military Confines in the Era of Ottoman Conquest. (Boston: Brill, 2000), pp. 3–70.

unfaithful and their goods shall be attached to the royal fisc. [3] Those who lose any of these [castles] shall be held to give explanation for the loss.

34. Then, the royal majesty shall deign to demand every year accounts from all his officers.

35. Then, the royal majesty shall deign to search for those who took away arquebuses, cannons, engines, provisions, and other things from the border castles and especially from Belgrade and Jajce, because they caused unspeakable damage.³⁵ [1] And if someone was found to have done such things, he shall pay with his head, and his goods shall be attached to the royal fisc. [2] If any of these things, engines and provisions came to someone knowingly by gift or even by purchase, the goods of such people, once they are convicted at law, shall devolve to the royal majesty.

36. Then, as most often the castles bordering the Turks are always given to two persons to be held as an office, because their maintenance is known to require great care and attention, [1] it has therefore been ordered that henceforth and in the future these border castles and fortified places can never be left empty without one of the officers who are appointed at that time to these castles and fortified places, [2] but one of them must always stay there personally for their defense, under penalty of their head.

37. Then, as in every diet and general assembly of the gentlemen of the realm, among other arrangements and discussions, particular debate and discord is raised and generated over the way of paying tithes, to the extent that [1] when in recent years the royal majesty after his joyful coronation proclaimed a general diet for the sake and convenience of the gentlemen of the realm, and issued there a general decree with the common counsel of the lord prelates, barons and the gentlemen of the realm, not only could they not decide anything clearly on account of the dissensions and quarrels that arose over tithes, but also this article together with several others was postponed to the present diet, that is general assembly, for its final resolution.³⁶ [2] For this reason, in order to remove all debate and discord that has hitherto been had among the lord prelates, barons and the gentlemen of the realm over the manner of paying tithes, it has been decided that henceforth in the future and forever thereafter the whole tithe must be exacted in every county and paid to every lord prelate of any church, either episcopal or collegiate, notwithstanding any wicked abuse that has been introduced hitherto by anyone and anyhow, according to the manner each had or made arrangement with his prelate in this matter, and only from those things from which the lord prelate previously exacted tithes. [3] They must not in any way introduce unnecessary and uncustomary payments of tithes. [4] In the event, however, that the tithe collectors henceforth collect unnecessary and uncustomary tithes, the following is to be observed: that because the lord prelates and other ecclesiastical persons sometimes cause the tithes to be exacted by their own men for their own use, at other times farm them out to other persons, therefore, should someone maintain that he has been harmed and burdened by their lord prelate's own men through such inappropriate and unnecessary tithes of the tithe collectors, then the person who has been harmed

³⁵ These two castles were at that time the major linchpins of the southern defense. Jajce was at that time already surrounded by Ottoman-held territory.

³⁶ See above, the closing passage of 1492.

shall notify the lord prelate or his agent of this uncustomary and unnecessary collection of the tithe and advise him of this. [5] He, as soon as he is informed of this, shall send his men to correct the said things, to the place where the correction has to be done. [6] And if it can be corrected between them, well and good; otherwise the issue shall be taken to the place and term of the county court to the presence of the community of the nobles, and both the lord prelate and the complainant have to be satisfied with whatever they decide on the said matter according to God and His justice. [7] If it is found that the complainant was unjustly vexed by the tithe collectors, satisfaction has to be given from the personal goods and belongings of the tithe collectors for the expenses of the vexed party. [8] In the meantime, until full decision is made on the said matter, no ecclesiastical interdict can be imposed on the complaining party or his tenant peasants. [9] Should it, however, happen that the correction be made by the tithe farmers, then the complainant is not obliged to inform either the prelate or his agent, but before exacting the tithes, the farmers, having been given notice by the noble magistrates or any one of them, are bound to come to the county court and to correct before the community of the nobles all the above matters, to obey and comply with their judgment and decisions, and, should they be found to have collected unnecessary and unjust tithes, to give total satisfaction to the complainant for his expenses as well. [10] The time for the payment of tithes shall be observed as was heretofore customary. [11] When that time has elapsed, and not before, an ecclesiastical interdict can be imposed on those neglecting to pay just and customary tithes, until they have actually been paid by them. [12] No ecclesiastical interdict shall be imposed on the lords of the land on account of peasants who refuse to pay tithes.³⁷

38. Then, the following manner shall be observed by the tithe collectors when examining stooks: [1] that the tithe collectors must be satisfied with the oath of the peasant who has to pay the tithe, in the presence of the judge and reeve [of the place] where they assessed the tithe, or, if not content with that, the judge or reeve of these places shall have the right to examine the stooks, but only within bounds and not in rainy times, from which the peasant could suffer some damage. [2] If the tithe collectors found more in these than the peasant asserted, they shall take away the surplus and in addition impose payment of a just tithe. [3] However, before they examine the stooks, they shall before anything else give one florin into the hands of the judges or reeves of the place, so that if it is found that the tithe collectors overturned and examined the stooks unnecessarily, the judge and reeve are bound to pay that florin to the hands of the peasant.³⁸

³⁷ While the assessment and collection of the tithe had been a contested issue ever since its first regulation in the eleventh century, the present article transfers the matter to the jurisdiction of the county, since in most cases the tithes were farmed out to laymen. For previous legislation on this matter see e.g., Stephen II:20, Syn. Szab. 40, 1411:5–6 , 6 April 1464: 24; 25 January 1486: 40–4 referring to Matthias' earlier decretal, see Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn", Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan. Abt. 61 (1975) 228–257.

³⁸ According to King Matthias' Decretum Maius (1486: 41) the tithe-collector had to entrust his horse to the peasant as a security.

39. Then, it has been concluded, that bees, lambs, and kids should be tithed³⁹ and marked at the appropriate time in the customary manner; after their tithing and marking they shall not be kept longer than Michaelmas against the will of the keeper at whose place they were tithed and even then only at the risk of the tithe collectors. [1] And if after that⁴⁰ these animals are perchance lost, the peasant cannot be burdened in any way for that. [2] Yet, they have to swear an oath that the [animals] did not get lost because of their fault, malice or wish.⁴¹

40. Then, because during the wine harvest many people put up their wine for sale, and when they sell the wine, the wine-tithe collectors are accustomed to collect some wrongful payments in many counties for their own profit, especially in the county of Somogy where for the wax seals the tithe collectors of St Martin's Abbey of Szentmártonhegy [collect] at some places two pennies from these wine sellers while at other places twelve. [1] Therefore, in order that such abuses be rooted out from among the people of the realm, it has been ordered, that henceforth such abuses introduced in whatever way shall be rooted out, [2] and the same custom shall be observed as has been observed from ancient times, under the rightful abbots of the said abbey.⁴²

41. Then, that in every diocese, where the tithe is paid in cash, one hundred pennies shall be accepted as one florin without any additions.⁴³

42. Then, that the reeves shall not be taxed because of the accommodation which they give to the tithe collectors during the exaction and administration of tithes, nor shall anything be exacted from them for the tallies.⁴⁴

³⁹ The issue over which of the “fruits of the earth” were to be tithed was a recurring matter of debate: see, Csizmadia, “Die rechtliche Entwicklung.”

⁴⁰ It is unclear whether after the tithing or after Michaelmas, although the latter seems more probable (so spelled out in 1486).

⁴¹ ≈ 25 Jan 1486:42, where it is decreed for the diocese of Eger.

⁴² The custom of sealing the wine goes back to a mandate of Andrew II from 1226 in a suit between the abbey and the burghers of Székesfehérvár, where the king allowed the abbey to seal the wine produced in county Somogy lest it be ‘smuggled’ out by the burghers without paying the tithe. See László Erdélyi, Pongrác Sörös, eds. A Pannonhalmi Szent Benedek Rend története (Budapest: Stephaneum, 1902-16) vol. I. p. 61

⁴³ The payment of the tithe in kind or cash was also a contested issue for centuries.

⁴⁴ The tallies capita dicarum (in Hung.: rovásnyél, “rod of assessment”) were small wooden sticks with marks for the dues paid; several of these survived in different forms and different purposes; see Ludolf Kuchenbuch, “Kerbhölzer in Alteuropa—zwischen Dorfschmiede und Schatzamt,” in: Balázs Nagy, Marcell Sebők, eds., ...The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandred Full Many Ways. Festschr in Honor of János M. Bak (Budapest: CEU Press, 1999), pp. 303–25. Lajos Thallóczy described one that survived, (by the courtesy of Károly Tagányi) in “Adatok a magyar pénzügyi kezelés történetéhez” [Data on Hungarian administration of finances], Magyar Gazdaságtörténeti Szemle (1895): 119-20. The object, found by coincidence in a sixteenth century file, was a 5 cm long piece of thin wood.

43. Then, because some controversy and argument has arisen between the lord prelates on one side, and the lord barons and other gentlemen of the realm on the other, on account and occasion of the collection of Christians' and harvesters' pence,⁴⁵ collected until now by the lord prelates; the lord barons and the gentlemen of the realm assert that these payments were wrongfully introduced against their liberties and privilege, and conversely the lord prelates [assert] that they made these exactions upon most effective privileges, and both parties [say] that they have in their support letters and written instruments, which they want to exhibit not at this present term, but at a later one. [1] It has therefore been decided, so as to settle this matter, that the lord prelates shall and are held to produce and show to our royal majesty on the coming octave of Michaelmas all their letters and written instruments issued in the said matter that they have, and the lord barons and gentlemen of the realm [those letters] that they may retrieve in the meantime. [2] Having seen these, the royal majesty shall have full right to make decision and final judgment between the parties.

44. Then, as several difficulties have emerged between the lord prelates and barons, and other nobles and men of property in the matter of the exaction of the tithe and the ninth, namely whether the tithe or the ninth should be paid first, [1] it has been ordered, that just as it was customary hitherto, so also in the future the ninth shall be paid first and only then the tithe.⁴⁶

45. Then, there are many places situated on the borders of the kingdom, where Serbs, Ruthenians, Vlachs, and other schismatics live on the lands of Christians, and living according to their rite they have not hitherto paid any tithe whatsoever from these lands, but the lord prelates want to force them to pay the tithe.⁴⁷ [1] As the tithes, given as the patrimony of Christ, are collected from the faithful of Christ and not from other schismatic persons (especially those who live at the borders of the kingdom at the said places at the invitation and under the protection of the royal majesty and the voivodes, bans, and other officeholders), this is ordered and decided: [2] that from now on no tithe whatsoever shall be collected from these Serbs, Ruthenians, Vlachs, and other schismatics living on the lands of Christians, just as before.

So, having mercifully listened to and welcomed the humble requests of the aforesaid lord prelates, barons, and nobles of our said realm presented by them to our majesty in the above manner, we confirm the above letters of privilege of ours, which contain—as mentioned before—the aforesaid statutes and decrees, together with the above-included newly-formulated articles, to last and be valid in perpetuity; accepting, approving and ratifying, causing to be included and inserted into our present letters of privilege verbatim without any addition or deletion whatsoever; moreover renewing our letters of privilege and all that they contain and specify therein as well as the aforesaid newly-formulated articles, because they are seen to serve the profit and tranquil estate of our aforesaid kingdom, for the same lord prelates, barons, and nobles of our said kingdom. [1] And we promise and obligate ourselves by means of these presents to impeccably observe and to cause others to observe all and everything contained in our same letters of privilege and the articles contained therein. [2] To the memory and perpetual firmity of which we decided to issue these present letters of privilege, confirming them with our privy seal that we use as king of Hungary. [3] Given in the said Buda by the hands of the reverend father in Christ Lord Thomas, proposed bishop of Eger, high privy chancellor of our court and our beloved faithful⁴⁸ on the thirty-second day of the aforesaid general congregation. [4] In the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and ninety-five, in the fifth of our reign in our Hungary etc., and in the twenty-fourth of Bohemia. [5] In the time of the felicitous government of their churches of the reverend fathers in Christ, the lords Ippolito d'Este of Aragonia, cardinal deacon of the Roman Church of the title of Santa Lucia in Silice, archbishop of Esztergom⁴⁹; Peter of Kalocsa⁵⁰; and the bishops: Thomas proposed of Eger; Oswald of Zagreb;⁵¹ Dominic of Oradea;⁵² Ladislav Geréb of Alba Iulia;⁵³ Sigismund of Pécs⁵⁴; Francis elect of Győr;⁵⁵ John of Veszprém;⁵⁶ Lucas of Cenad;⁵⁷ Nicholas Bátori of Vác;⁵⁸ Anthony of Nitra;⁵⁹ Srem sede vacante; Gabriel of Bosnia;⁶⁰ Briccio elect and confirmed of Knin;

⁴⁵ This duty seems to have been exacted from landless peasants who did not pay the tithe. While it is rarely mentioned in the sources, in the late sixteenth century it was still collected, then at the rate of 6 pence per head; see also 1498:52. The tax is referred to in Kabos Kandra. Adatok az egri egyházmegye történelméhez. [Data for the history of the diocese of Eger] vol I. (Eger: Szolcsányi, 1885), pp. 392–3.

⁴⁶ This article may aim at getting the lords' share in the harvest quickly into store rather than changing the ratio of the due. The ninth was, of course, the 'second' 10 per cent (from the 90 percent left after the ecclesiastical tithes) of the peasant's harvest, though rendered usually only from grain and wine.

⁴⁷ On Orthodox communities in medieval Hungary, see Péter Rokay. "A szerbek betelepülése Délmagyarországra a XV. században" [The immigration of the Serbs into southern Hungary in the fifteenth century] in István Zombori, ed. A szerbek Magyarországon (Szeged 1991), 51–62.

⁴⁸ Bakócz, Thomas, bishop. of Győr 1486–1493, bishop. elect of Eger 1493–1497, archbishop. of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere.

⁴⁹ d' Este of Aragon, Ippolito, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, archbishop. of Esztergom 486–1497, bishop of Eger 1497–1520.

⁵⁰ Váradi, Peter (d. 1501) archbishop of Kalocsa 1480-1501, secret chancellor 1479-84.

⁵¹ Tuz (of Lak), Oswald (b. 1436, d. 1499) bishop of Zagreb 1466-99.

⁵² Dominic (Kálmáncehi), bishop of Oradea 1495–1501.

⁵³ Geréb (of Vingárd), Ladislav (d. 1502) bishop of Transylvania 1476-1501, archbishop of Kalocsa 1501-2, papal legate.

⁵⁴ Ernuszt (of Csáktornya), Sigismund (d. 1504) bishop of Pécs 147?-1504, chief treasurer.

⁵⁵ Szatmári, Francis, bishop of Győr 1495–1508.

⁵⁶ John Vitéz (Jr.) bishop of Veszprém 1489-99.

⁵⁷ Szegedi Baratin, Lucas, bishop of Bosnia 1491–93, of Cenad 1493–1500, of Zagreb 1500-1510.

⁵⁸ Bátori, Nicholas (d. 1506) bishop of Srem 1468-74, of Vác 1474-1506.

⁵⁹ Sánkfalvai, Anthony, bishop of Nitra 1492–1500.

⁶⁰ Gabriel (Polnar) bishop of Bosnia 1493–1501, bishop of Srem 1502.

⁶¹Cristopher of Modrus;⁶² and Michael elect of Senj⁶³. [6] Likewise when the spectabilis and magnificus Stephen Szapolyai was palatine of the said kingdom of ours and perpetual ispán of Spiš⁶⁴; comes Peter Vingárti Geréb, our judge royal⁶⁵; Bartholomew Bélteki Drágfi, our voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely;⁶⁶ John Corvin, duke of Opava and Liptov as well as our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia;⁶⁷ Peter Macskási⁶⁸ and James Gerlistye⁶⁹, bans of Severin; Ladislas Egervári, master of the treasury;⁷⁰ Nicholas Lindvai Bánfi, master of the doorkeepers;⁷¹ George Kanizsai⁷² and John Pelsőci Bebek⁷³, masters of the cellarers; Emeric Perényi, master of the stewards;⁷⁴ John Csáktornyai Ernuszt, master of the horse;⁷⁵ Blaise Ráskai, master of the chamberlains⁷⁶; and Józsa Somi, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of our kingdom;⁷⁷ and others holding the offices of ispán and honors of our kingdom.⁷⁸

⁶¹ Briccio (Brizio) Brizio bishop of Knin 1492 -5, later Bishop of Chersonissos (1483--89?)

⁶² Christopher (of Ragusa), bishop of Modrus 1480–1500.

⁶³ Michael Natalicius, bishop of Senj 1495–1501.

⁶⁴ Zapolya (a. k. a. Zápolya, Szapolyai), Imre of (d. 1487) chief treasurer 1459-64, governor of Bosnia, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1464-65, ispán of Spiš 1465, count palatine 1486-87.

⁶⁵ Vingárti Geréb, Peter, judge royal 1495–1500, master of the doorkeepers 1491–95.

⁶⁶ Bélteki Drágfi, Bartholomew, voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely 1494–98.

⁶⁷ Corvin, John, natural son of King Matthias I (Corvinus), prince, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1494–97, 1499–1504.

⁶⁸ Macskási Tárnok, Peter, ban of Severin 1495-1501.

⁶⁹ Gerlistye, James, ban of Severin 1495–1508.

⁷⁰ Egervári, Ladislas former ban of Croatia, Dalmatia and Slavonia, 1493-6, master of the treasury.

⁷¹ Lindvai Bánfi, Nicholas, master of the cellarers 1464–67, ispán of Pozsony 1467–1478, master of the doorkeepers 1490–1500.

⁷² Kanizsai, Stephen, master of the cellarers 1498–1505

⁷³ Pelsőci Bebek, John, master of the cellarers 1495.

⁷⁴ Perényi, Emeric, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewardss, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13.

⁷⁵ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, John, master of the horse 1493–1503, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1507–1510.

⁷⁶ Ráskai, Blaise, chief chamberlain, master of the treasury 1498–1518.

⁷⁷ Somi, Józsa, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary 1494–1508.

⁷⁸ The list of dignitaries was usually attached to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They were not witness, the list served rather as a kind of authentication of the date.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF 1498 (2 June)

April 24—June 2: diet in Buda. Decree called decretum minus.

MSS: Two originals. One is a parchment booklet of five and a half leaves, its seal pendant lost, Hungarian National Archives (MNL OL Dl. 26361); another a similar booklet of ten and a half leaves with the fragment of a seal pendant, from the family archives of the Békássy family, deposited in the Hungarian National Museum (now OSZK Cod. Lat 322. ff. 18r–25v). Variants of the first are marked A, of the second, B.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 592-641 (Decretum tertium)

LIT:

András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagiellonenzeit” in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 323-66; Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiello Hungary” Central Europe 3 (2005), pp. 3–18; Idem, “Jagello Hungary,” in: DRMH IV, xi–xlvii.

DECRETUM WLADISLAI II. REGIS TERCIVM DE ANNO 1498, ALIAS DECRETUM
MINUS APPELLATUM

Wladislaus, Dei gratie Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, necnon Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux ac Moravie et Lusacie marchio omnibus Cristi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris presencium noticiam habituris salutem in eo, qui est omnium vera salus. Gloriosissimus Deus, cuius nutu cuncta a se condita tam in ipsa superna Jerusalem, quam eciam in istis amplissimis terrarum climatibus reguntur propter hoc nos (licet immeritos) ad huius regie dignitatis culmen sive fastigium sublimavit, ut quemadmodum sua donaria nobis largissime contulit, sic nos quoque memores beneficiorum eius quieti subditorum nostrorum, quibus nos preesse voluit, salubriter provideremus, ita ut cum quibus una est nobis nascendi moriendique condicio, illis prodesse potius, quam inutiliter dominari deberemus. Deditque nobis Deus ipse duo instrumenta, quibus populum nobis subiectum regeremus, arma scilicet et iura; iura quidem, ut eos in tribus nature preceptis, scilicet honeste vivere, alterum non ledere et unicuique, quod suum est, reddi instrueremus; arma vero, ut quos timor poene legalis a malis eorum actibus non refrenaret, hos saltem vindicis gladii severitas compesceret a peccatis, et sic hominum coerceretur audacia et inter improbos innocencia tuta redderetur, et ut boni quiete viverent inter malos. Proinde ad universorum tam presencium, quam futurorum noticiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod cum nos post felicem coronacionem nostram pro comodo et utilitate huius incliti regni nostri Hungarie binis iam post sese vicibus diversas constituciones (prout temporis necessitas et rerum condicio exposcebat) ad humillimam supplicacionem et intercessionem fidelium nostrorum prelatorum et baronum regnique nobilium edidissemus, tandem iidem barones, regnique nostri nobiles universi de singulis comitatibus eiusdem regni nostri in presenti congregacione generali, quam eisdem ad festum beati Georgii martyris novissime preteritum urgentibus arduis necessitatibus ipsius regni nostri indixeramus, constituti nostrum adeuntes in conspectum, non sine amaritudine cordis eorum nobis detegere curaveruntⁱ in hunc modum: Quod quamvis nos tempore ipsius felicitis coronacionis nostre unicuique regnicolarum nostrorum, tam magnatum et pociorum scilicet, quam inferiorum libertates eorum ipsis a serenissimo condam principe, domino Andrea rege, predecessore nostro felicitis memorie concessas, per serenissimosque principes condam dominos Lodovicum et Mathiam reges, predecessores nostros felicium recordacionum confirmatas et iam a multis retractis annis in compluribus suis articulis diminutas ad utilitatem eorum reformare et renovare, confirmareque et confirmatas observare et observari facere promiserimus, forent tamen plerique huiusmodi salubri nostro proposito et desiderio eorum se opposcentes et privatum potius, quam commne bonum sectantes, per quorum impedimentumⁱⁱ nunquam hactenus votum eorum consequi potuissent; potissimum vero, cum nos novissima ad ipsorum humilimam intercessionem ad perficiendum ea omnia, que a nobis maximo cum suspiramine expectabant, congregacionem generalem pro die festo beati Martini in anno proxime transacto preterito iudixissemus, et Deo opitulante in civitate nostra Pesthiensi celebrassemus, iidem pacis turbatores inter delecta grana

ⁱ A cuararunt

ⁱⁱ A impedimenta

frumenti zizaniam imponentes omnia subvertissent; et sic ipsi barones et regnicole nostri nichil boni una nobiscum concludentes cum iactura rerum suarum satis grandi ad propria remeare coacti fuissent. Quibus expositis iidem barones et ceteri nobiles, tam pociores, quam minores quosdam articulos super libertatibus eorum ipsis tam a prefato condam domino Andrea rege, quam eciam aliis divis regibus Hungarie concessis exaratos maiestati nostre exhibuerunt et produxerunt tenoris infrascripti, supplicantes nostre maiestati prefati barones ceterique regnicole humili precum cum instancia, ut consideratis eorum oppressionibus tranquillitati istius regni nostri, quod ab infidelibus Turcis, crucis Christi persecutoribus et ceteris eiusdem regni nostri emulis undique premeretur, consulere libertatesque ipsorum in eisdem articulis conscriptas renovare et confirmare, renovatasque et confirmatas observare et per alios observari facere dignemur. Quorum quidem articulorum tenor talis est:

I. Articulus primus. De congregacione generali deinceps celebranda.

Item, quod amodo infra quatuor annorum spacia post sese immediate consequenter affutura singulis annis ad festum sancti Georgii martyris universis regnicolis, tam scilicet prelatis, quam baronibus, ceterisque nobilibus et possessionatis hominibus per regiam maiestatem in campo Rakos una congregacio generalis indicatur et celebretur. Celebracio autem huiusmodi congregacionis in quindecim diebus expleatur. Elapsis autem ipsis quatuor annis deinceps futuris, semper successivis temporibus singulo tercio anno ipsa congregacio generalis modo premissa celebretur. Si quisⁱⁱⁱ autem dominorum prelatorum et baronum vel aliorum regnicolarum ad primum diem ipsius congregacionis venire et illic infra ipsos quindecim dies perseverare nollet, talis, si fuerit prelatus vel baro, in ducentis marcis gravis ponderis, octingentos florenos auri facientibus, si autem pociores nobiles vel mediocres seu inferiores fuerint, in centum marcis, quadringentos florenos auri facientibus, per regiam maiestatem irremissibiliter exigendis condempnentur, exceptis officialibus regie maiestatis ac dominorum prelatorum et baronum ceterorumque regnicolarum ac aliis castra finitima tenentibus vel extra regnum in legacionibus regiis et regni aut dominorum suorum^{iv} necessario recuperatis, necnon infirmis, cecis, claudis et nimium pauperibus, qui nequaquam venire possent; illis eciam, qui extra regnum hoc in peregrinacionibus necessario occupabuntur; ita tamen, quod si duo vel plures fratres indivisi fuerint, vel pater filium unum vel plures habuerit indivisos, tunc sufficiat unum illorum mittere ex se ipsis ad dietam. Si autem divisi fuerint ab invicem, per singula capita venire teneantur. Nobiles autem unius sessionis ex decem unum mittere debebunt. Si autem comites parochiales vel eorum vices gerentes sub aliqua paccione, pecuniis scilicet aut muneribus allecti facultatem darent cuipiam domi remanendi; tales modo simili in centum marcis condempnentur.

II. Articulus secundus. De celebracionibus octavarum et brevium iudiciorum necnon assessoribus eligendis et eorum salariis.

Item quod singulis annis due octave magne et integre, videlicet sanctorum Georgii martyris et Michaelis archangeli et similiter due breves, que iudicia brevia appellantur, videlicet

ⁱⁱⁱ mendose: qui

^{iv} mendose add: in

Epiphaniarum domini et festi beati Jacobi apostoli in hoc regno celebrentur. Octavarum autem celebratio sive primus dies incipiatur statim vigesimo die post festa predicta et duret per quadraginta dies. Si vero post quadraginta dies aliqua iudicia fierent, nullius sint vigoris et momenti sive in causis levatis, sive non levatis. Celebracionis vero iudiciorum brevium prima dies inchoetur vigesimo die post predicta festa et huiusmodi brevia iudicia finiantur ac durent per viginti tantummodo dies feriatos, in quibus iudicia fieri possunt; ita quod dies festi inter has viginti dies pro iudiciis dirimendis non computentur. Fiant autem evocaciones ad ipsa brevia iudicia sicut ad octavas maiores ante octo dies vel ipso octavo die diei festivitatum predictarum. In hiis autem iudiciis omnibus, tam maioribus, quam brevibus ultra iudices ordinarios eciam ex dominis prelati duo et ex dominis baronibus similiter totidem et ex regnicolis sedecim nobiles potiores et prestanciores, huius regni iuris periti, illi videlicet, qui sapientia presunt, ex omnibus quatuor partibus regni per regiam maiestatem et regnum eligantur, qui semper in iudiciis decernendis interesse debeant; ita quod in octavis integris omnes illi sedecim nobiles, in brevibus autem iudiciis solummodo octo ex ipsis mutuatis et alternatis scilicet inter sese vicibus assedere teneantur. Illis autem sedecim electis nobilibus, qui, ut premissum est, pro causis discutiendis eligentur, domini regnicole de salariis competentibus providebunt, dominis autem prelati et baronibus sic electis ceteri domini prelati et barones de ipsorum salariis providere teneantur. In Transsilvania autem et Sclavonia consimiliter due octave maiores, videlicet festorum Epiphaniarum domini et beati Jacobi apostoli, necnon duo iudicia brevia festivitatum beatorum Georgii martyris et Michaelis archangeli celebrentur. Celebratio autem ipsarum octavarum et brevium iudiciorum incipiatur quinto decimo die ante predicta festa et duret quindecim diebus post inicium celebracionis earundem octavarum et brevium iudiciorum.

III. Articulus tercius. De octavis sancti Michaelis proxime celebrandis.

Item quod ad festum beati Michaelis archangeli proxime venturum in omnem eventum octave celebrentur.

IV. Articulus quartus. De magistris prothonotariis necnon assessoribus et eorum iuramentis.

Ne autem magistri prothonotarii muneribus corrumpantur, iurent et promittant sub illo stricto iuramento de Rakos unicuique iustum, rectum et divinum facere iudicium. Et idcirco stabit in beneplacito cuiuslibet causantis, si illis munera dare velit, nec ne; verumtamen si aliquis causantium poterit hoc legitime probare, quod aliquis ex ipsis magistris cuiquam propter eiuscemodi munera falsum et iniustum fecisset iudicium, extunc talis magister capite plectatur et in amissione bonorum suorum condempnetur. Et quod domini quoque prelati et barones iudicio interesse debentes pariter cum assessoribus debeant similiter prestare iuramentum in forma sacramenti de Rakos ad faciendum omnibus sine favore vel odio iudicium iustum. Et quod de rustica stirpe progenitus officium magistri tenere non debeat nec umquam ex ignobili stirpe prothonotarius eligetur.

V. Articulus quintus. De distribucionibus literarum iudicialium.

Item quod tempore distribucionis iudicialium sive birsagiorum magistri prothonotarii per se vel per scribas substitutos data literarum evocatoriarum in registro conscribere debeant et priores evocaciones posterioribus semper pius eleventur. Et quod una signatura vel iudicialium distribucio usque ad exitum litis durare debeat.

VI. Articulus sextus. De consuetudinibus conscribendis.

Quoniam autem magistri prothonotarii in iudiciis discernendis semper consuetudines regni allegare consueverunt, ob hoc huiusmodi consuetudines antique conscribantur, etsi que videbuntur regie maiestati ac dominis iudicibus rationabiles et legitime non abusive, nec irrationabiles, secundum eas iudicetur. Eligatur autem magister Adam per regiam maiestatem, qui easdem consuetudines conscribat, et domini regnicole illi provisionem facient, et cum eo superinde concordabunt. Supplicat eciam^v regie maiestati, ut et ipsa committat ad conscribendum et similiter illi provisionem faciat.

VII. Articulus septimus. De octo assessoribus in consilium admittendis.

Item, quod ex predictis sedecim nobilibus regia maiestas in negociis illis, que generaliter universum regnum tangere et concernere videbuntur, semper octo in consilium suum admittat. Qui quidem nobiles stricta fide semper iurare debebunt, ut omnia in eo ipso consilio fideliter et secreta ac pro communi bono et utilitate huius regni agent et tractabunt.

VIII. Articulus octavus. De quibusdam causis extra terminos octavarum et brevium iudiciorum per maiestatem regiam discutiendis.

Quamvis autem universe cause ratione actuum potenciariorum, tam scilicet maiorum, quam minorum in terminis celebracionis octavarum vel brevium iudiciorum hactenus consueverint terminari; quia tamen nobiles huius regni per magnates et potentes ac eciam inferioris condicionis homines, tam domi, quam in eorum itineribus ac aliis ocupacionibus crebro molestantur, et exinde sepe sepius diverse querimonie ad aures regie maiestatis porriguntur, maiestas autem sua limites statutorum suorum tanquam pius princeps transgredi nolens, huiusmodi querimonias hactenus vel ad ipsas octavas, vel autem breviam iudicia consuevit prorogare, quare statutum est, quod a modo de cetero universa et singula causa ratione et pretextu invasionis domorum nobilium, necnon detencionis, verberacionis et vulneracionis ac interempcionis nobilium sine iusta causa deinceps movende semper extra terminos octavales et brevium iudiciorum per regiam maiestatem, ubicunque sua maiestas constituta fuerit, decidi et terminari possint. Ita videlicet, quod tales, contra quos ratione premissorum actuum potenciariorum querele deponentur, per literas preceptorias ^{vi}regie maiestatis mediantibus literis exhibitoriis ad capitulum vel conventum sonantibus ad certum terminum per maiestatem regiam in eisdem literis suis preceptoriiis iuxta locorum distanciam prefigendum personaliter, ubicunque reperiri poterunt, ^{vii} aut de domibus habitacionum suarum ad comparendum coram sua maiestate sine ulteriori procrastinacione per testimonium ipsius capituli vel conventus amoneantur rationem reddituri. Qui si personaliter venerint et se expurgare poterint, bene quidem alioquin si non venerint, vel si venerint et se expurgare non poterint, observato semper iuris ordine, in sententia capitali ac amissione cunctorum iurium suorum possessionariorum rerumque et bonorum quorumlibet condempnentur.

^v B autem

^{vi} A preceptoriales

^{vii} A poterint

IX. Articulus nonus. De causis racione dampnorum et iniuriarum post obitum condam domini Mathie regis illatarum ut in brevibus iudicentur.

Item ex quo in decreto maiori articulo sedecimo id statutum esse dinoscitur, qualiter et per quem modum dampna et iniurie temporibus disturbiorum novissime post obitum condam domini Mathie regis regnicolis illate in octavis reacquiri possint,^{viii} sed quia octavarum celebratio sepius protelatur, idcirco statutum est, quod huiusmodi iniurie et dampna tempore celebrationis brevium iudiciorum modo in eodem decreto expressato, ordine iuris acquiri possint in omnibus causis iam propterea motis vel movendis. Ita, quod si iam de facto alique exinde evocationes contra quempiam facte fuissent, non obstante tali evocatione ipsi actores partem adversam teneantur ad comprehendendum in ipsis brevibus iudiciis legitime ammonere.^{ix} Si autem ipse actor talibus evocationibus in ipsis octavis uti vellet, habeat nichilominus facultatem causam suam in eisdem prosequendi.

X. Articulus decimus. De occupacionibus castrorum et aliorum iurium possessionariorum, ut usque festum beati Michaelis archangeli remittantur et evocationes desuper facte in brevibus terminentur.

Item, quod occupaciones castrorum, castellorum, possessionum et iurium possessionariorum, que sub nomine maiestatis sue aut Mathie regis, aut post mortem eiusdem per nonnullos facte sunt, usque ad festum beati Michaelis proxime affuturum omnino remittantur sub nota perpetue infidelitatis. Si vero racione talis occupacionis iam alique evocationes facte fuissent, quod ille evocationes in brevibus iudiciis terminentur. Ita tamen, quod non obstante priori evocatione, nichilominus tales occupatores racione talium occupacionum ad comparendum in ipsis brevibus iudiciis legitime amoneantur. Et hoc, si octave magne non celebrarentur.

XI. Articulus undecimus. De conventu Zenshiog.

Item de conventu Zenshiog, ut omnino sigillum eiusdem conventus restituatur, ex quo non pro aliqua culpa, sed iuxta contenta generalis decreti inter minores conventus sigillum ab eodem conventu fuit ablatum. Supplicant igitur domini regnicole maiestati regie, ex quo eciam maiestas sua in registro suo ad omnes comitatus pridem misso hunc articulum promisit^x observare, ut dignetur ex illo conventu heremitas, quos in illum conventum imposuit, remove et abbatem regularem illius ordinis idoneum in illum conventum instituere, quia domini regnicole sigillo illius conventus carere non possunt.

XII. Articulus duodecimus. De capitulo Boznensi.

^{viii} A possent

^{ix} B monere

^x B commisit

Item de capitulo Boznensi, quod ex quo^{xi} totaliter destructi esse dinoscuntur, pro reformatione ecclesie illius, que in honorem sancti Petri constructa est, habeant facultatem ubique per totum regnum pro testimonio capitulari ambulare ad instar capituli Budensis.

XIII. Articulus tredecimus. De conventu de Saag.

Item quoniam comitatus Gewmeriensis et ceteri regnicole illarum parcium pro utilitate publica sigillo conventus ecclesie de Saag carere non possunt, pro eo statutum est, ut possint in dicto comitatu Goumeriensi in omnibus executionibus procedere.

XIV. Articulus decimus quartus. De falsariis literas falsas obsignantibus.

Item de falsariis, qui in capitulis vel conventibus literas falsas obsignant, ut stigma sigilli igniti in frontibus et utraque facie omium capitularium seu conventualium, qui tempore falsificacionis de conventibus vel capitulis talia agentes intererunt, inuratur et insuper beneficia talium amittantur eo facto.

XV. Articulus decimus quintus. De dominis archiepiscopis, episcopis et ceteris viris ecclesiasticis banderiatibus et non banderiatibus.

Item, ex quo domini archiepiscopi, episcopi, capitula, prepositi, abbates et Carthusienses de Leweld, necnon prior Aurane infrascripti iuxta huius regni laudabilem consuetudinem antiquam pro defensione huius regni tam ratione proventuum decimalium, quam ratione possessionum ecclesiarum suarum banderia sua secundum exigenciam proventuum et numerum jobagionum suorum levare tenentur, ob hoc ipsi domini archiepiscopi, episcopi, capitula, prepositi, abbates et Cartusienses, necnon prior Aurane eorum gentes pro defensione regni iuxta limitationem infrascriptam tenere et conservare teneantur. Cetera autem capitula, conventus, necnon abbates et prepositi ceterique viri ecclesiastici, tam religiosi, quam seculares decimas habentes secundum exigenciam proventuum suorum decimalium et numerum jobagionum suorum, illi vero, qui decimas non haberent, instar aliorum regnicolarum banderia non habencium de singulis triginta sex portis singulum unum equidem armis bene dispositum dare et tenere debeant. Si autem aliqui prelatorum et virorum ecclesiasticorum secularia iura possiderent, ea, que ab antiquo banderiata sunt, nunc quoque banderia sua habeant, et ratione illorum ultra cetera bona ecclesiarum, super quibus fundata sunt, consimiliter exercituare sint obligati. Ut autem difficultatibus illis, que de proventibus eorum banderia non habencium decimalibus et numero jobagionum suorum possent exoriri, via precludatur, conclusum est, quod in singulis comitatibus tot probi et fidedigni homines pociores per communitatem nobilium eorundem comitatum eligantur, quod in eisdem comitatibus iudices nobilium habentur, qui unacum eisdem iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus, in quo connumeratio fieri debet, prestitis iuramentis per eosdem tam de proventibus eorundem decimalibus, quam numero jobagionum suorum diligenter perquirant et in registro fideliter annotent, atque ad locum sedis iudicarie importent, et ibi per universitatem nobilium iuxta conscienciosam eorum limitationem numerus exercituancium in singulis comitatibus describatur et secundum hoc ipsi viri ecclesiastici non banderiatibus exercituare teneantur.

^{xi} desideratur: eius canonici

XVI. Articulus decimus sextus. De equitibus armatis per regnicolas disponendis.

Item ad vigesimum articulum maioris decreti hoc additum est, quod iam non de viginti portis, sicut in decreto continetur, sed de triginta sex portis seu sessionibus jobagonalibus unus eques bene armatus detur, demptis certis comitatibus parcium inferiorum, videlicet Posega, Walko, Sirimiensis, Bach, Chongrad, Chanad, Zarand, Thorontal, Onod, Themesvar et Bekes, qui de singulis viginti quatuor portis unum huzaronem scutum seu clipeum, necnon lanceam, loricam et cassidem sive galeam habentem, similiter nobiles unius sessionis de triginta sex portis unum equitem armatum, dare teneantur. Item hoc quoque additum est, quod sub banderiis dominorum prelatorum et baronum pro huzaronibus, qui sub medio banderio pro dimidia parte hactenus dabantur, equites armati disponantur, demptis semper comitatibus parcium inferiorum prenotatis.

XVII. Articulus decimus septimus. De officialibus regiis et stipendiariis regnicolarum extra metas regni exercituare debentibus.

Ad decimum octavum articulum in maiori decreto expressum, ubi continetur regnicolas, si quando iussu regio exercitualmente insurgunt, non debere capi, ut limites et metas regni exeant exercitualmente, hoc additum est, quod ex quo domini regnicole pro defensione regni stipendiarios de eorum jobagionibus necessario tenere habebunt, ob hoc, quociens necesse pro defensione huius regni fuerit, officiales necnon stipendiarii, tam regales, quam dominorum prelatorum et baronum, necnon ceterorum regnicolarum limites et metas regni secundum temporis et rerum necessitatem egredi exercitualmente debeant et illis nulle mete prefiniantur. Si autem cogente necessitate ultra illos stipendiatos universitatem insuper regnicolarum insurgere contingeret, tum isto casu ipsa universitas ultra limites et metas regni exercituare non teneatur.

XVIII. Articulus decimus octavus. De tempore ipsos stipendiarios disponendi et de facultate per regiam maiestatem eosdem levandi.

Ut autem regnum hoc ab insultibus infidelium et ceterorum emulorum tucius defendatur, placuit universis regnicolis quod in omni comitatu per totum regnum Hungarie gentes ipse iuxta limitationem prescriptam pro defensione regni sub nota perpetue infidelitatis usque festum beati Martini proximne affuturum ubique sine defectu disponantur et deinceps semper parate teneantur. Ita tamen, quod tales gentes sine speciali consensu ac voluntate regie maiestatis nullo pacto levari possint. Si autem infra predictum festum sancti Martini aliqua necessitas huic regno emerit, propter quam regia maiestas gentibus carere non poset, extunc maiestas sua primum officiales suos, necnon dominos prelatos virosque ecclesiasticos banderiatos et gentes tenere debentes, dominosque barones, tandem vero, si necesse fuerit, universitatem insuper regnicolarum pro defensione huius regni levare valeat atque possit. Qualiter autem et per quem modum predictae gentes levari debeant, de hoc in decreto maiori laciis continetur.

XIX. Articulus decimus nonus. De pena capitanei regii exercitum regni falsis rumoribus levandis.

Item si capitaneus regius, qui exercitum regni levaret falsis rumoribus et ex industria animoque malignandi studiose id faceret, per hocque regiam maiestatem et regnum hoc defatigaret sine necessitate racionabili, in tali casu nota infidelitati incurrat.

XX. Articulus vigesimus. De limitacione gencium per viros ecclesiasticos banderiatos levandarum.

Sunt autem isti viri ecclesiastici, qui banderia eorum ordine infrascripto semper levare et cum eisdem exercituare tenebuntur.

Archiepiscopus Strigoniensis banderia duo.

Archiepiscopus Colocensis banderium unum.

Episcopus Agriensis banderia duo.

Episcopus Waradiensis banderium unum.

Episcopus Quinqueecclesiensis banderium unum.

Episcopus Transsilvanensis banderium unum.

Episcopus Zagrabiensis banderium unum.

Episcopus Jauriensis equites ducentos.

Episcopus Wesprimiensis equites ducentos.

Episcopus Waciensis equites ducentos.

Episcopus Chanadiensis equites centum.

Episcopus Sirimiensis equites quinquaginta.

Episcopus Nitriensis equites quinquaginta.

Abbas Pechwaradiensis equites ducentos.

Abbas Waradini Petri equites ducentos.

Abbas Saxardiensis equites centum.

Abbas Sancti Martini equites ducentos.

Cartusienses de Leweld equites ducentos.

Prior Aurane banderium unum.

Abbas de Zobor equites quinquaginta.

Capitulum Strigoniense equites ducentos.

Capitulum Agriense equites ducentos.

Capitulum Waradiense equites ducentos.

Capitulum Transsilvanense equites ducentos.

Capitulum Quinqueecclesiense equites ducentos.

Capitulum Bachiense equites quinquaginta.

Prepositus Albensis maior cum capitulo suo et preposito minori eiusdem loci equites centum.

Prepositus Demesiensis equites quinquaginta.

Prepositus Tituliensis equites quinquaginta.

XXI. Articulus vigesimus primus. De banderiis regalibus et officialium suorum.

Quia autem regia maiestas ultra banderium suum regale, sub quo mille equites armati teneri consueverunt, necnon conservacionem castrorum finitimorum ac suis proventibus regalibus quosdam insuper officiales banderiatos necessario tenere habet, placuit igitur ea omnia hic seriatim annotari:

Banderium regale equites mille.

Wayvoda Transsilvanensis banderium unum.

Comes Siculorum banderium unum.

Banus Croacie banderium unum. Comes Themesiensis banderium unum.

XXII. Articulus vigesimus secundus de dominis baronibus, qui cum viris ecclesiasticis banderiatibus exercituare tenebuntur.

Sunt preterea domini barones in hoc regno, videlicet Laurencius dux de Wylak, necnon comites perpetui et liberi, spectabiles et magnifici domini: Stephanus de Zapolya comes perpetuus terre Scepusiensis, regni que Hungarie palatinus et iudex Comanorum. Item comites de Bozin et de Sancto Georgio ac comites de Frangapanibus et de Corbavia. Item dominus comes Petrus Gereb de Wyngarth iudex curie regie maiestatis, ceterique domini barones qui unacum prefatis dominis prelatibus ex officialibus banderia habentibus secundum munus officiorum suorum exercituare tenebuntur.

Despotus autem equites mille dare tenebitur.

Dux Laurencius,

dominus comes Scepusiensis, dominus comes Petrus Gereb,

Bartholomeus Dragffy de Belthewk wayvoda Transsilvanus,

Josa de Som, comes Themesiensis,

Nicolaus Banffy de Alsolyndwa,

Georgius de Bathor,

Johannes Ernusth de Chaaktornya,

Mathias Pangaracz de Dengeleg,

Emericus de Peren,

Gabriel de Peren,

Johannes Bebek de Pelseucz,

Stephanus de Rozgon,

Anthonius de Palocz,

Johannes de Homonna,

Ladislaus de Kanysa,

Johannes de eadem, Georgius

de eadem Kanysa,

Thomas Groff comes de Bozyn,

Petrus similiter Groff de eadem,

Franciscus similiter Groff,

Nicolaus de Zeech,

Georgius Pankyrha de Zalanok,

Johannes Ellerboh de Monyorokerek,

Sigismundus Orzag de Gwth,

Sigismundus Kompolth de Nana, Sigismundus de Losoncz,
Sigismundus de Lewa,
Blasius de Raska,
Andreas Both de Bayna,
Johannes Ongor^{xii} de Nadasd,
Johannes Banffy de Bolondoch,
Franciscus de Hedrehwara,^{xiii}
Stephanus Taxyth de Naghlak, Franciscus Berizlo de Grabarya,
Johannes Berizlo de eadem,
Albertus de Zokol.

Despotus autem cum hwzaronibus mille,
Belmosawyth cum omnibus hwzaronibus suis.

XXIII. Articulus vigesimus tercius. De inscripcionibus sex civitatum et Lusacie.

Item quod inscripciones super sex civitatibus et Lusacia maiestas regia, prout in decreto maiori est expressum, eliberabit et omni diligencia laborabit huiusmodi literas ab illis exigere.

XXIV. Articulus vigesimus quartus. De iuramento feudi a Moravis et Slesitis, necnon Lusacia exacto.

Item quod maiestas regia dabit huic regno literas testimoniales super iuramento feudi, nuper maiestati sue a Moravis et Slesitis, necnon Lusacia facto, quod huiusmodi iuramentum fidelitatis non accepit ab eisdem tamquam rex Bohemie, sed tamquam rex Hungarie, nec tamquam subditis regni Bohemie, sed tamquam a feudatariis huius regni et ex inscripcione huic regno Hungarie legitime obligatis.

XXV. Articulus vigesimus quintus. De conservacione sacre corone.

Item quod sacram coronam huius regni domini prelati non teneant, sed solummodo domini barones et seculares.

XXVI. Articulus vigesimus sextus. De facultate regie maiestatis ultra centum jobagiones disponendi.

Item licet in decreto maiori ita prius ordinatum fuerit et conclusum, quod maiestas regia proprio motu et per se ipsam usque ad centum jobagiones conferre possit, quibuscumque voluerit, ultra vero ipsum numerum cum consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum,^{xiv} quod dominis regnicolis videtur inconueniens et illicitum, et idcirco nolunt constringere potestatem et auctoritatem maiestatis sue in aliquo, demptis dumtaxat forensibus et externis quibus nolunt in hoc regno collaciones fieri, neque beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum, neque eciam secularium possessionum.

^{xii} A Ungor

^{xiii} A Hederwara

^{xiv} A add. etc.

XXVII. Articulus vigesimus septimus. De salvo conductu infidelium.

Item quod quilibet infidelis vel maiestati regie accusatus salvum conductum a regia maiestate habeat infra quadraginta dies maiestatis sue presenciam et curiam adeundi, et interim compositis vel non compositis rebus sine omni impedimento iterato redeundi habeat facultatem.

XXVIII. Articulus vigesimus octavus. De rectificacione metarum finitimarum regni.

Item quod maiestas regia inter regna Hungarie et Polonie, necnon inter regna Hungarie et Moravie et similiter Austrie et Alemannie metas faciat rectificari et distingui, et hoc pro tollenda ulterioris dissensionis materia. Metas eciam ex parte Turcorum dignetur sua maiestas regno Hungarie reformare.

XXIX. Articulus vigesimus nonus. De tricesimis, ut in locis antiquis exigantur.

Item quia exactores tricesimarum regie maiestatis sepesepius regnicolas in hoc apprimere consueverunt, quod ipsi privato lucro eorum gaudentes non in antiquis et consuetis locis tricesimarum, neque de hiis tantummodo rebus, de quibus tricesime exigi deberent, sed eciam de minutissimis rebus, in novis per eosdem adinventis locis tricesimas non sine ipsorum regnicolarum dampno et incomodo in visceribus regni exigere consueverunt. Quare ut tales abusiones de medio tollerentur, placuit hic inferius omnia illa loca, in quibus tricesime deinceps semper exigi deberent, annotari, decernendo, ut preter ea loca subscripta tricesime nullibi locorum exigantur, sed alia omnia loca tricesimarum noviter adinventata, exceptis tantummodo tribus locis tricesimarum, videlicet Budensi, Albensi et Pathay penitus aboleantur. Postquam autem maiestas regia omnes illas tricesimas, que nunc apud manus prefati domini Stephani comitis et palatini pro pignore habentur, ab eodem redemerit, dignetur tandem maiestas sua et ipsa tria loca tricesimarum abolere. Solvantur autem tricesime de illis tantummodo^{xv} rebus, que extra regnum deferentur. Que vero extra metas non educerentur tricesime de illis nequaquam exigantur. De minutissimis eciam rebus, infra valorem unius floreni nulla tricesima solvatur, prout in maiori decreto continetur. Et quia frequenter accidit, quod ipsi negociatores cum tanta comitiva pecudes et pecora abigere consueverunt quod tricesimatoribus illis resistere non valentibus huiusmodi animalia absque solucione tricesimarum vel violenter, vel autem clandestine expellunt in diminucionem proventuum regalium, quare, ut huic malo debito remedia occurratur, sancitum est, quod quicumque de cetero in premissis culpabiles reperiri poterunt, et eorum animalia per tricesimatores auferri non poterunt, extunc tales nichilominus in estimacione huiusmodi animalium, ut premissum est, furtim vel violenter abactorum ordine iuris contra ipsum tricesimatorem convincantur.

XXX. Articulus tricesimus. Quod exactores vectigalium Hungari sint.

Item quod exactores vectigalium non fiant alii, nisi Hungari, et non forenses necque alieni.

^{xv} A solummodo

XXXI. Articulus tricesimus primus. Quod pecudes et pecora extra metas regni non educantur, nec equi aut equaces, et neque aurum et argentum conflatum, et de pena transgressorum.

Item, quod pecudes et pecora per regnicolas quoscumque extra metas et terminos regni non educantur, nisi usque loca tricesimarum infrascripta, in quibus permutaciones rerum fieri debebunt. Neque eciam forenses quispiam ultra ipsa loca tricesimarum vel alias ad emendum quecumque animalia cum rebus eorum venalibus ad hoc regnum audeant intrare, sed ad deputata loca veniant et in eisdem locis inter regnicolas et forenses permutaciones huiusmodi rerum et animalium fieri debeant. Equi autem de cetero non educantur, similiter et equaces. Nullus insuper hominum, cuiuscunque status et condicionis existat, aurum vel argentum conflatum, nisi in monetas redactum de hoc regno quacunquē ex causa educere presummat, prout in decreto maiori lacius continetur. Quicunque autem contra premissa vel aliquod premissorum secus facere attemptaverint, et per aliquos deprehendi poterunt, habeant tales universum huiusmodi aurum et argentum, necnon pecudes et pecora et quaslibet res talis transgressoris auferendi et insuper aurum et argentum educere volentem captivandi omnimodam potestatem. Cuius quidem auri et argenti, necnon rerum et bonorum ablatorum duas partes regie maiestati presentare teneantur, terciam autem partem pro labore suo reservent.

XXXII. Articulus tricesimus secundus. Quod nullus audeat cum forensibus in educione equorum et in extrahendo auro et argento societatem inire sub nota infidelitatis.

Item quod nullus tricesimatorum seu alterius cuiusvis status et condicionis hominum cum forensibus quibuspiam tam in educione equorum et equarum, quam eciam in extrahendo auro et argento conflato aliquo quesito colore societatem inire seu contrahere presummat sub nota perpetue infidelitatis.

XXXIII. Articulus tricesimus tercius. De locis deposicionum.

Quia autem super locis deposicionum inter civitates regales quottidie plurime lites et differentie oriri consueverunt, huiusmodi autem contenciones nonnisi ex eorum privilegiis facile discerni possunt, idcirco maiestas regia visis iuribus parcium decernat sola de hoc id, quod melius erit faciendum.

XXXIV. Articulus tricesimus quartus. De locis antiquis tricesimarum.

Loca autem tricesimarum antiqua sunt ista:

Arva est capitalis tricesima.

Trinchinium est capitalis tricesima, Zakolcza, Lewa, Belws, Bezthercze, Solna, Wyhel, Thyrnavia, Warbo sunt filiales ad eandem.

Posonium est capitalis tricesima, Oroswar, Sarendorff, Newsidel, Zarand, Malaczka, Ichuczen, Geyren, Szanffa, Zemnycza sunt filiales ad eandem. Sopronium est capitalis tricesima Rwsse, Trassenndorff, ZenthMarthon sunt filiales ad eandem.

Cassovia est capitalis tricesima, Lewchowya, Barthwa, Kesmark, Lwblyo, Stropko, Homonna sunt filiales ad eandem.

Item in Sclavonia: Zagrabia, Nedewcze, Warasd, Murayzombath sunt capitales tricesime, Zombathel loco Kewzeg, Pynkwaffewlde, Radaffalva, Hydegkwth, Raczkanysa, Wynnitze, Crapyma, Stubycza, Stanysnak, Thopoczka, Koztanicza sunt filiales ad easdem.

Nandoralba est capitalis tricesima, Kelpen, Sabacz, Arky, Berych, Zenthdemether, Racha, Pothos, Aprayocz, Wywar sunt filiales ad eandem.

Themeswar est capitalis tricesima, Karansebes est filialis ad eandem.

XXXV. Articulus tricesimus quintus. Quod nobiles de questu ipsorum, tributa solvere non teneantur.

Item quod nullus tricesimatorum ac tributariorum ac ipsorum vicesgerentes de rebus et bonis per nobiles presbiteros ac monachos ipsorumque homines ad necessaria domorum eorundem emendis aliquam tricesimam aut tributum (prout hactenus consueverunt) contra eorundem libertates exigere valeat. Si vero quispiam id faceret, nobilis aut presbiter vel monachus taliter spoliatus vel in libertate lesus domino illius tributi, si in propinquo inveniri potest, alioquin comiti parochiali illius comitatus, in quo huiusmodi tributum exigitur, querelas deponere debeat; et ille scita pius superinde mera veritate, dupplicem satisfaccionem, hoc est recepti tributi dupplum reddere querulanti teneatur sub pena duarum marcarum inter comitem et querulantem equaliter dividendarum. Tricesimator vero, si contra id excesserit, hunc huiusmodi querela contra eundem regie maiestati porrigatur. Etsi maiestas sua ex literis inquisitoriis comitis vel vicecomitis et iudicum nobilium illius comitatus, in quo talis tricesima exigitur, per ipsum tricesimatorem iniustam tricesimam exactam fuisse compererit, extunc ultra dupplum recepte tricesima, necnon expensas querulantis ipse tricesimator per maiestatem regiam acriter puniatur. Si autem ipse querulans iniustas querimonias deposuisse comperitus fuerit, modo simili contra partem adversam in duabus marcis vincatur. Quoniam autem plurime civitates et possessiones regales in hoc regno de singulis rebus eorum venalibus et mercibus per totum regnum a solutione tributi exempti et supportati esse dinoscuntur, ob hoc multo magis nobiles istius regni, quorum predecessores regnum hoc cum effusione sanguinis ipsorum acquisierunt et defensarunt, et ipsi quoque ac eorum posterii necessario defensare et protegere habent, tam scilicet pociores, quam minores, si questum aliquem facerent cum rebus venalibus, de tali questu tributum solvere non teneantur. Ita tamen, quod si aliquis nobilium quempiam rusticorum seu civium, talem videlicet, qui tributum solvere teneretur, sibi in socium assummeret et illum penes se absque solutione tributi abducere vellet, ex de hoc tributarius posset certificari, tales res venales seu mercimoniales ipse tributarius auferendi ab utroque plenam atque omnimodam habeat potestatis facultatem.

XXXVI. Articulus tricesimus sextus. Quod nemo audeat vias falsas stare et custodire in terris aliorum.

Item quamvis in decreto maiori id ordinatum fuerit et stabilitum, quod nemo in terris aliorum vias falsas stare et custodire valeret, sed quia contra transgressores huiusmodi decreti nulla ibidem pena determinata fuisse reperitur, pro eo statutum est, quod nemo tributariorum in terris seu territoriis aliorum vias falsas custodiendi et standi, in eademque via falsa itinerantibus obsistendi habeat facultatem sub pena amissionis eiusdem tributi; sed unusquisque tributa habens aliqua huiusmodi vias falsas in propria terra et per consequens illius possessionis, in qua videlicet tributum exigitur, custodiri faciat, prout continetur in decreto.

XXXVII. Articulus tricesimus septimus. De salibus regalibus in antiquis cameris deponendis.

Item quod sales regales in cameris antiquis et non in locis noviter adinventis deponantur. Huiusmodi autem loca noviter exquisita penitus aboleantur.

XXXVIII. Articulus tricesimus octavus. De iudiciis inter nobiles et liberas civitates regales diffiniendis.

Item, quod libere civitates, videlicet Buda, Pesth, Cassovia, Poson, Sopron, Barthwa, Eperyes, Thyrnavia, necnon Lewchovia, Monsgrece et omnes alie libere civitates earundemque incole nobilibus et possessionatis hominibus iniurias aliquas seu dampna inferentes, si talis civitas seu incola et civis iniuriam et dampna inferens habuerit possessiones et iura possessionaria in aliquo comitatu, et ex illis bonis nobilem leserit seu dampnificaverit, si videlicet tales lesiones seu dampnificaciones factum minoris potencie tangere dinoscuntur, teneatur propterea in illo comitatu, ubi illa bona habet, coram comite iuri stare. Si vero talis civitas seu civis nulla iura possessionaria in aliquo comitatu habuerit, et nobilis vel aliquis homo possessionatus contra privatam personam vel certis tantummodo et non cum tota communitate seu civitate causam seu lites habuerit, extunc talis nobilis et possessionatus homo teneatur causam suam coram iudice illius civitatis agitare et prosequi. Si autem talis nobilis et possessionatus homo contra totam civitatem vel e contra civitas ipsa contra nobiles et alios possessionatos homines causam aliquam ratione actuum potenciariorum maiorum vel iuris possessionarii movere pretenderet, extunc talis causa coram personali presencia regie maiestatis, habita superinde legitima evocacione moveatur et ordine iuris terminetur. Et si aliqua parcium in huiusmodi causa contra sese in processu iuris coram ipsa personali presencia quovismodo succubuerit, si talis causa factum iuris possessionarii tangere dinoscitur, extunc talis pars non in maiori onere, quam solummodo in ducentis florenis auri convincatur. Si autem huiusmodi causa factum invasionis domorum nobilium, necnon detencionis, verberacionis, vulneracionis ac interempcionis nobilium concernere cognita fuerit, extunc potentiores huiusmodi actuum potenciariorum in sententia capitali ac amissione cunctorum bonorum suorum mobilium et immobilium condempnentur, prout hactenus fuit observatum. Casu autem, quo aliquis civis sub aliquo domino seu nobili in hoc regno vineas vel aliquas alias hereditates habuerit, et quidpiam in territorio huiusmodi deliquerit aut aliquem dampnificaverit, in tali casu idem civis teneatur coram domino illo terrestri, sub quo hereditates habet iuri stare.

XXXIX. Articulus tricesimus nonus. De abolicione libertatis civitatis Wysegradiensis.

Item quod libertas civitatis Wysegradiensis et pertinenciarum eiusdem, necnon similiter pertinenciarum castris Damas, ex quo libertati regni preiudicat, simpliciter aboleatur.

XL. Articulus quadragesimus. Quod libere civitates in suis libertatibus conserventur.

Item quod maiestas regia universas liberas civitates et alias personas bene meritas in antiquis eorum libertatibus conservare dignetur. Imo supplicat domini regnicole maiestati sue, ut quemadmodum maiestas sua iam privilegia eorum super libertatibus ipsorum confirmavit, ita in eisdem conservare dignetur.

XLII. Articulus quadragesimus primus. De solucionibus nonarum.

Item quod cives Budenses, Albenses et de Zalonkemen et alie quelibet civitates tam regales, quam aliorum quorumcunque in terris aliorum vineas habentes seu araturas facientes dominis terrestribus nonas solvere teneantur, prout continetur in decreto.

XLIII. Articulus quadragesimus secundus. De officialibus amittentibus castra finitima.

Item quoniam sunt nonnulli officiales, qui ex eorum negligencia et indebita conservacione nonnulla castra finitima amiserunt, et post amissiones tam notabiles et huic regno dampnosas non solum impunitate gaudent, sed insuper alia castra pro sallario eorum retinent, quare statutum est, ut regia maiestas absque consensu regnicolarum hiis, qui aliqua castra finitima propter ipsorum negligenciam et incautam conservacionem amississent, vel amitterent, in futurum gratiam non faciat, sed illos iuxta ipsorum demerita castiget et puniat iuxta contenta generalis decreti. Sunt autem hii, qui huic regno in amissionibus castrorum notabilia dampna intulerunt, nam condam Ladislaus de Egerwara castra Thersacz et Nerethwa, Franciscus Harazthy castrum Zozorowar, Georgius vero Popowyth consimiliter castrum Komothyn tempore maiestatis regie amiserunt.

XLIV. Articulus quadragesimus tertius. De conspicientibus castra finitima.

Item, quod singulis annis duo iudices regni, videlicet domini palatinus et iudex curie regie homines suos penes hominem regium super iuramento de Rakos de dicenda veritate et fideliter sine personarum favore ad regiam maiestatem referenda iuratos deputare debeant, qui castrorum finitimorum condiciones et status ac edificaciones vel custodias et conservaciones, necnon machinas ac ingenia et victualia atque stipendiarios iuxta disposicionem teneri debentes aliosque apifices seu artifices bis in anno revideant et maiestati regie fideliter referant: Ita quod tales conspicientes castra finitima vadant diverso tempore et non simul et ita quod homo regie maiestatis noscat, quando alii homines dominorum palatini et iudicis curie vadunt, et illi similiter ignorent, quando iste ibit, ne muneribus corrumpantur et ut eo fidelius illa valeant referre et facilius eciam cognosci possit, si falsitatem et mendacium dixerint. Si vero illi, vel alter eorum aliquas in castris finitimis negligencias et defectus, vel eciam personarum ibi constitutarum exorbitancias subticuerint et fideliter pro favore aliquorum officialium non retulerint, penam capituli subeant eo facto, et bona ipsorum universa ad collacionem regiam devolvantur. Expensas autem talibus maiestas regia dare debeat.

XLV. Articulus quadragesimus quartus. De comite Themesiensi.

Item quod comes Themesiensis ultra honorem unius comitatus, in quo castrum Themesiense situm est,^{xvi} tenere nequeat, nec aliquis comitatum a ceteris regni comitatibus amplius sequestretur. Et unusquisque comitatus suum proprium comitem de comitatu eodem aliquem ex pocioribus habeat demptis comitatibus Pesthiensis et Pilisiensis, qui comites habere non consueverunt antiqua eorum libertate requirente.

XLVI. Articulus quadragesimus quintus. Quod decedente rege Hungarie sine heredibus oratores principum non mittantur ad dietam.

^{xvi} Desideratur: alium

Item statutum est, quod decedente rege Hungarie sine heredibus, si quando regnum hoc regia dignitate vacare contigerit, quocienscunque universitatem regnicolarum pro eligendo novo rege convenire continget, nullus oratorum forensium, qui sepe numero plures a regibus et principibus ad seducendum dominos et universitatem advenire solent, ad ipsam convencionem admittatur, ut eo comodius de novo rege provideatur. Ipsi enim regnicole providebunt, ut ille, quem elegerint, cum honore inducatur.

XLVI. Articulus quadragesimus sextus. De officialibus infidelium.

Item si quispiam nobilium et regnicolarum castra seu fortalicia quecunque a dominis ipsorum pro officiolatu tenuerint et durante tali officiolatu domini illorum propter aliquos excessus notam infidelitatis incurrerent, cuius occasione regia maiestas aut regnum hoc huiusmodi castra sive fortalicia per vim aut aliter ab ipso officiali rehabere niteretur, illaque honori et humanitati sue, militariaque officio satisfacere cupiens regie maiestati aut regnicolis^{xvii} se et castra seu fortalicia domini sui viriliter et fideliter defensando adventus regiam maiestatem aut eciam totum regnum se opposuerit, dampnaque et nocumenta exinde ipsis regnicolis intulerit, nichilominus talis officialis notam infidelitatis non incurrat, verum de dampnis quibuscunque illatis teneatur omnibus plenariam satisfacionem impendere. Ubi vero ipse officialis, posteaquam dominus suus tali nota infidelitatis fuisset offuscatus, se in servicium illius adiunxisset et sic honorem alicuius castri vel fortalicii ab eo adeptus fuisset, tunc isto casu is articulus sibi minime videatur suffragari, sed eadem nota infidelitatis condempnetur.

XLVII. Articulus quadragesimus septimus. De Comanis, Philisteis et Ruthenis.

Item, quia Comani, Philistei et Rutheni in hoc regno commorantes in abduccionibus jobagionum et in licenciis capiendis contra libertates nobilium et statuta regni plurimas quotidie iniurias et preiudicia, indicibilesque et inauditas exacciones in educendis ipsis jobagionibus ipsis nobilibus inferunt, neque officiales maiestatis regie et eorum vicesgerentes eosdem a talibus insolenciis compescunt, quare, ut huiusmodi dissensionis materia eradiceatur, statutum est, quod ex quo ex Comanis et Philisteis ac Ruthenis ad bona nobilium nullus abire permittitur, sic neque de cetero jobagiones nobilium per officiales maiestatis regie vel dictos servilis condicionis homines in medium ipsorum causa commorandi abducantur. Si autem ipsi officiales aut predicti Philistei, Comani et Rutheni in medium ipsorum aliquos jobagiones contra presentem statucionem abduxerint, super hoc ipsi coram palatino regni legitime requirantur.

XLVIII. Articulus quadragesimus octavus. De differentiis inter nobiles ac Comanos et Philisteos exortis revidendis.

Item quoniam autem maiestas regia superioribus annis obtulerat illas dissensiones, que ratione metarum et aliarum occupacionum inter nobiles ac Comanos et Philisteos exorte sunt, velle facere rectificari, ob hoc supplicant maiestati sue domini regnicole, ut pro rectificandis ipsis metis et differentiis dignetur aliquos magistros prothonotarios deputare.

XLIX. Articulus quadragesimus nonus. De decimis.

^{xvii} regie maiestati aut regnicolis videtur esse superfluum

Item quod decime non argento aut pecuniis, sed sicut terra protulerit fruges et vina, iuxta contenta decreti condam domini Andree regis imperpetuum exigantur.

L. Articulus quinquagesimus. De quartis decimarum.

Item quod archiepiscopi et ecclesiarum prelati, capitula, conventus atque abbates plebanis ecclesiarum, hiis scilicet, quibus tenentur secundum consuetudinem hactenus observatam, de proventibus eorum decimalibus quartas solvant, et quibus non tenentur, non solvant. Si quipiam autem plebanorum circa illos quartas aliquod ius habere pretenderent, ordine iuris requirere teneantur.

LI. Articulus quinquagesimus primus. De modo recolligendi decimas et de quibus rebus decime persolvantur.

Item, quod adveniente tempore decimacionis iudex cuiuslibet ville, de qua decime recolligi debebunt, teneatur illi vicearchidiacono, ad quem spectat, significare tempus decimacionis, ut ille ammoneat decimatorem et significet eidem, quatenus veniat infra duodecim dierum spacia ad decimandum. Qui si advenerit, tandem diebus ad id necessariis decimacionem iusto modo perficiat, et unusquisque colonorum teneatur decimas ex se provenientes ad illum locum, quem decimator in facie eiusdem possessionis disposuerit, importare, et pro labore decimam partem accipiat. Si autem infra illos duodecim dies decimator non venerit, villicus seu iudex eius loci decimacionem nichilominus in campo teneatur perficere et decimas ipsas in campo ad sortem decimatoris relinquere. Si autem postea decimator advenerit, tunc iudex seu villicus ipsius ville modo antedicto pro decima parte cum colonis singulis eiusdem possessionis teneatur decimas ipsas facere importari. Ita tamen, quod si ipse decimator in importandis huiusmodi decimis facilius posset concordare cum aliquo, quod habeat super hoc facultatem, quos voluerit, disponendi. Quodsi decimator ipse de iniusta decimacione eo absente facta ipsi iudici credere nollet, iuramentum super hoc ab eo exigere valeat, et sic verbis illius acquiescat. Compositorem autem acervi solus decimator disponat et in expensis suis vivat, iudex autem ville teneatur illi decimasolvere. Quoniam autem iam sepius contenciones exorte sunt, de quibus rebus terre nascentibus decime exigi debeant, ad tollendum igitur omnes huiusmodi altercaciones placuit, ut tantummodo de hiis rebus, videlicet frugibus, vinis, siligine, ordeo, avena et spelta vulgo tenkel^{xviii} et non aliis decime per totum regnum Hungarie exigantur.

LII. Articulus quinquagesimus secundus. De pecuniis Christianitatis et messorialibus.

Item de pecuniis Christianitatis et messorialibus, que hactenus valde abusive exigebantur, taliter determinatum est, quod ex quo ipsi domini prelati et viri ecclesiastici ratione proventuum eorum decimalium gentes eorum de cetero pro defensione huius regni necessario tenere habebunt, sunt autem quamplurimi rusticorum, qui nec vineas habentes, neque eciam araturas facientes, de quibus eisdem dominis prelati decime provenire deberent, absque solucione ullarum decimarum in plerisque locis commorantur, seque Christianos esse predictis prelati ecclesiarum, sub quarum diocesibus degunt, minime recognoscunt; quare, ut de cetero, inter ipsos prelatos ecclesiarum et christicolos debitus ordo observetur, statutum est, quod amodo imposterum omnes et singuli rustici seu jobagiones quorumcunque, qui sive de vinis, sive de frugibus et bladis ipsorum in diocesi quorumcunque dominorum prelatorum et virorum ecclesiasticorum decimas solverint, tales nec pecunias Cristianitatis, neque eciam messoriales solvere debeant. Messores autem de porcionibus sibi pro labore eorum, ab hiis tantummodo, qui decimas huiusque solvere consueverunt, et non nobilibus, provenire debentibus decimas solvant. Pecunias autem Cristianitatis aut messoriales non solvant, nec interim porciones eorum de campo abducere seu excipere audeant, donec eorum porciones unacum rebus decimalibus colonorum decimabuntur. Illi autem, qui nec ex viris, nec frumentis seu bladis decimas solverint, pro pecuniis Cristianitatis sex tantummodo denarios solvere teneantur.

^{xviii} B mendose thewkel

LIII. Articulus quinquagesimus tercius. De proventibus kathedraticis archidiaconorum. Item quia archidiaconi ecclesiarum proventus eorum kathedraticos a plebanis ecclesiarum valde abusive exigere consueverunt, quare, ut huiusmodi prava abusio extinguatur, statutum est, quod amodo de singulis ecclesiis, que integre vacantur, non plus, quam unus florenus, que vero medie, medius florenus et sic consequenter pecunie kathedrales ab ipsis plebanis exigantur.

LIV. Articulus quinquagesimus quartus. De decimis agnellorum et apum.

Item quia hactenus ex decem agnellis unus pro decimis ablati est, et insuper pro reliquis novem pro singulis scilicet duo denarii solvebantur, statutum est, quod amodo deinceps non amplius, quam solummodo pro singulis agnellis unus denarius persolvatur, et similiter pro apibus. Ita, quod postquam hec decimata fuerint, decimator ille infra spacium unius mensis abducere teneatur.

LV. Articulus quinquagesimus quintus. De possessionibus secularibus per viros ecclesiasticos minime impetrandis aut emendis, nec titulo pignoris retinendis et idem de bonis ecclesiarum per seculares non usurpandis.

Item quod episcopi et ecclesiarum prelati vel eorum alter pro persona sua et ecclesie sue possessiones et iura possessionaria secularia nec a regia maiestate quoquomodo impetrare, neque pecuniis eorum iure perpetuo emere et comparare aut titulo pignoris habere possint et valeant. Et e converso domini barones et seculares bona ecclesiarum pro se non usurpent, neque se de illis aliquo pacto intromittant.

LVI. Articulus quinquagesimus sextus. De viris ecclesiasticis, qui duo beneficia tenere non possunt.

Item, quod nemo ex dominis episcopis et ecclesiarum prelatis aliisque personis ecclesiasticis duas dignitates aut alia beneficia ecclesiastica eciam minutissima tenere, gubernare et uti valeat, dempto solummodo episcopo Boznensi pro tempore constituto, qui duo tantummodo beneficia ecclesiastica et non plura tenere valeat, ex quo deficit in proventibus et castra quedam finitima necessario tenere habet. Ab illis autem, qui iam de facto duo beneficia ecclesiastica vel plura haberent preter illud, quod ipsi beneficiati ex illis pro se retinere maluerint, usque festum beati Jacobi apostoli proxime venturum per maiestatem regiam auferantur et personis idoneis conferantur. Similiter eciam illa persona, que aliqua beneficia ecclesiastica, sive magna, sive parva quibuscunque personis ad curiam Romanam obligassent, infra unius integri anni spacium a data presencium constitutionum computando teneantur ea liberare, alioquin per maiestatem regiam occupentur et personis idoneis, regnicolis scilicet et non forensibus conferantur.

LVII. Articulus quinquagesimus septimus. Ut viri ecclesiastici honores comitatum tenere non possint.

Item quod maiestas regia nemini ex ipsis dominis episcopis et prelati aliisque viris ecclesiasticis honorem vel officiolatum comitatus eciam pro tempore dare et conferre valeat, sed persone seculari benemerite et ex nobili prosapia orto ac in ipso comitatu personalem residenciam agenti honor huiuscemodi per regiam maiestatem detur et conferetur, demptis duobus comitatibus Pesthiensi et Pilisiensi, qui ex antiqua eorum libertatis prerogativa comites habere non consueverunt, quod illi in eadem libertate permaneant. Ab illis vero, quibus perpetuo aut alio quocunque iure honor alicuius comitatus hactenus collatus ex datus fuisset, per ipsam regiam maiestatem auferatur et modo premissso conferetur, nisi per sanctos reges superinde aliquas collaciones sive privilegia habuerint, quas producant, si qui habent, infra congregacionem presentem, alioquin invigoroze relinquuntur; et similiter tales honores personis secularibus conferantur.

LVIII. Articulus quinquagesimus octavus. De clericis preposituras et abbas regulares tenentibus.

Item quia sunt plures clerici preposituras et abbas regulares habentes, qui in habitu laicali vel seculari per plures annos proventus huiusmodi ecclesiarum exhauriunt, et tandem locupletes effecti in blasphemiam illius ordinis vel matrimonia contrahunt vel autem seculares presbiteri efficiuntur et sic bona ecclesiarum consumunt, quare statutum est, quod huiusmodi preposituras et abbas regulares clerici vittati vel alii seculares clerici vel presbiteri sine habitu regulari tenere non possunt, sed infra anni spacium habitum illius ordinis sub pena amissionis illius beneficii induere et assummere teneantur.

LIX. Articulus quinquagesimus nonus. Quod clerici in habitu laicali beneficia ecclesiastica tenere non possunt.

Item quod nullus clericorum secularium et laicalem habitum deferencium aliqua beneficia ecclesiastica eciam ad parvum temporis spacium in habitu tamen seculari perseverare volens tenere et gubernare valeat.

LX. Articulus sexagesimus. Quod in causis prophanis nullus citetur ad iudicium spirituale.

Item in causis seculare forum tangentibus neminem regnicolarum presbiteri vel alii quicunque citare presumant ad iudicium spirituale, sed si ignobiles sint citandi, in presencia domini terrestris, si vero nobiles, in presencia comitis vel vicecomitis et iudicum nobilium illius comitatus, in quo tales citandi commorantur, legitime requirantur.

LXI. Articulus sexagesimus primus. Quod nemo compellatur per iudices spirituales ad respondendum coram se in causis prophanis.

Item quod iudices spirituales neminem compellant ad respondendum coram se in causis prophanis sub pena excommunicacionis vel aliter. Alioquin dato, quod quispiam hominum errore vel ignorancia ductus vel metu sentencie respondeat, nullius sint momenti, et propter excommunicacionem homagium excommunicati solvat,^{xix} quia regnicole per ipsos iudices spirituales per tales coacciones et illicitas excommunicaciones plurimum aggravantur.

LXII. Articulus sexagesimus secundus. Quod iudices spirituales factum iuris possessionarii non iudicent.

Item si aliquis iudicum spiritualium quempiam regnicolarum ratione iuris possessionarii coram se citaverit et causam factum ipsius iuris possessionarii tangere agnoscens in huiusmodi causa ad ulteriora processerit, extunc in estimacione talis iuris possessionarii coram iudicibus regni ordinariis condempnetur.

LXIII. Articulus sexagesimus tercius. Quod portatores conquestuum captiventur.

Item quia ex concessione venerabilium episcoporum, presbiterorum et diaconorum sancte Romane ecclesie cardinalium olim in consilio Constanciensi constitutorum regnum hoc in eo privilegiatum esse constat, quod nullus extrahatur extra istud regnum ad iudicia auctoritate literarum apostolicarum, nisi cum cause alique per appellacionem legitime fuerint ad sedem apostolicam devolute, sunt autem plures, qui contra libertates huiusmodi complures regnicolas tam spirituales, quam seculares vigore conquestuum turbant et molestant, quare statutum est, prout eciam in decreto maiori continetur, quod nullus extra regnum istud, nisi per viam appellacionis extrahatur, portatores autem conquestuum, sive sint spirituales, sive seculares, sive religiosi, captiventur et manibus regie maiestatis presententur ad turrim mancam pro infligenda illis pena imponendi. Quia autem sunt nonnulli, qui exempcionis privilegio a sede apostolica gaudentes nequeunt coram iudicibus spiritualibus in hoc regno commorantibus attrahi in litem, ut contra tales huiusmodi conquestus sive rescripta apostolica libere apponentur, extra tamen hoc regnum vigore ipsius non aliter, nisi modo premissis per appellacionem extrahantur.

LXIV. Articulus sexagesimus quartus. De pecuniis sigillaribus ecclesie Jauriensis et abbacie sancti Martini Sacri Montis Pannonie.

Item quia ad ecclesiam Jauriensem ex abbaciam sancti Martini Sacri Montis Pannonie nove pecunie sigillares adinvente fuisse et pro unoquoque vasa vel eciam pro una tina duodecim denarii indebite et modo abusivo exigi dicuntur, et utrum episcopus vel abbas ipsarum ecclesiarum super talibus exaccionibus aliqua iura habeant vel non, evidenter non constat, quare ad tollendum omne dubium statutum est, quod tam episcopus, quam abbas dictarum ecclesiarum iura eorundem, si que habent, super exaccionibus prenotatis, ad octavas festi beati Michaelis archangeli proxime affuturi absque ulteriori dilacione producere teneantur, quibus visis, quod iustum fuerit, decernatur.

LXV. Articulus sexagesimus quintus. De annullacione contractuum inter seculares et spirituales initorum.

Item statutum est, quod si quis regnicolarum cum dominis archiepiscopis vel ecclesiarum prelatis aut eorum altero, ceteris eciam viris ecclesiasticis in hoc regno existentibus, ratione bonorum et iurium possessionariorum quorumcunque, et presertim ad maiestatem regiam devolvendorum aliquos contractus, vel etiam aliqua obligamina huiusque qualitercunque fecisset vel faceret in futurum, tales contractus atque huiusmodi obligamina nullius sint roboris et firmitatis, ymmo universe litere in quibuscunque locis credibilibus superinde emanare et confecte, inanes habeantur, etiamsi esset consensus regius super hoc impetratus. Hoc tamen excepto, si quispiam fortassis prelatorum ad eiuscemodi ^{xx}bona iam de facto aliquas pecunias dedisset et aperte de datis per eum pecuniis constaret, tali eiuscemodi pecunie restitui debent, quibus restitutis bona illa tandem sint libera.

^{xix} A persolvat

LXVI. Articulus sexagesimus sextus. De plebanis ecclesiarum quod invitis patronis non confirmentur.

Item quod prelati ecclesiarum invitis patronis ecclesiarum plebanos ad recipiendam investituram seu confirmationem astringere non presumant.

LXVII. Articulus sexagesimus septimus. De dominis prelati promoventibus iuvenes et inhabiles ad beneficia ecclesiastica.

Sunt preterea plerique dominorum prelatorum, et virorum ecclesiasticorum, qui in collacionibus beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum in ignominiam totius ordinis clericalis abutentes illa non personis idoneis et benemeritis, sed iuvenibus et indoctis ad eaque beneficia penitus incapacibus absque consensu regie maiestatis conferre illisque titulum huiusmodi beneficiorum ascribentes soli proventus eorundem exhaurire et in usus proprios convertere, sicque cultus divini propter tales abusiones quotidie in ecclesiis dei negligi consueverunt. Quia autem libertate antiqua huius regni requirente collaciones quorumcunque beneficiorum in omnibus ecclesiis regni, in quibus regia maiestas ius patronatus habere censeatur, ad maiestatem suam spectare dinoscuntur, quare statutum est, quod a modo de cetero ipsi Domini prelati et viri ecclesiastici in eorum ecclesiis, quibus ex provisione regie maiestatis presunt, absque annuencia et consensu regie maiestatis nulla beneficia ecclesiastica pro tempore vacantia conferre possunt. Ab illis autem personis iuvenibus atque idiotis et indoctis, quibus aliqua beneficia ecclesiastica absque consensu maiestatis regie collata fuissent, per regiam maiestatem auferantur et personis idoneis conferantur. Deinceps autem dignetur maiestas sua taliter providere, quod huiusmodi beneficia ecclesiastica, que animarum sunt sunt refocillamina, sicuti per maiestatem suam, ita etiam per viros ecclesiasticos, quibus ad hoc facultatem converterit, personis tantummodo adultis et benemeritis et non iuvenibus, neque idiotis conferantur, ut servicia divina in ecclesiis sacre corone huius regni subiectis eo fidelius peragantur.

LXVIII. Articulus sexagesimus octavus. De sinodo non redimenda.

Item quod prelati ecclesiarum sinodum, quam in eorum ecclesiis pro extirpandis viciis et plantandis moribus plebanorum in diocesibus suis constitutorum ex institutione canonica necessario celebrare habent, pro pecuniis, sicuti quidam ex eis hactenus facere consueverunt, relaxare aut plebanos eosdem propter relaxationem huiusmodi sinodi in aliquo taxare, neque etiam plebani quipiam se ipsos ab ipsa sinodo quovis modo redimere presumant.

^{xx} A huiuscemodi

LXIX. Articulus sexagesimus nonus. Quod plebani non taxentur et ecclesiasticum interdictum ad communitatem propter plebanos non imponatur

Item quoniam sunt nonnulli ecclesiarum prelati, qui iam ex quadam prava abusione plebanos ecclesiarum per impositiones taxarum pro suo libito plurimum apprimere consueverunt, illi vero plebani sub hoc onere gementes interdum calices et cetera bona ecclesiarum diripere cum illisque se ab huiusmodi taxis redimere, interdum vero egestate coacti ecclesias eorum deserere et alio aufugere coguntur, propter quod ipsi domini prelati crebro ad parochianos illorum interdictum ecclesiasticum imponere, sicque illos aggravare non verentur, quare statutum est, quod ipsi prelati ecclesiarum nunquam de cetero, nisi semel pro redemptione bullarum suarum, et hoc quidem cum moderacione debita a plebanis ecclesiarum suarum diocesum caritativum potius quam coartativum subsidium petere et^{xxi} exigere, vel eos quovismodo ad eorum libitum taxare, neque eciam propter ipsos plebanos parochianos eorundem per interdicta ecclesiastica turbare seu molestare debeant. Plebani eciam ecclesiarum taliter se gerant in eorum ecclesiis, quod bona ecclesiarum per eos non dissipentur.

LXX. Articulus septuagesimus. Quod nullus duos officiolatus tenere valeat preter palatinum, iudicem^{xxii} curie et banum Dalmacie.

Item quod nullus baronum aut nobilium regni secundum contenta decreti condam domini Andree regis duas dignitates seu officiolatus preter palatinum et iudicem curie ac banum regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie, et Sclavonie tenere possit et valeat. Hoc excepto, quod si aliquando necessitas ingrueret, propter quam merito deberent alicui persone due vel eciam tres dignitates vel officiolatus conferri, quod maiestas regia non faciet, nisi cum consensu et consilio dominorum prelatorum et baronum.

LXXI. Articulus septuagesimus primus. De causis absque literis preceptorii terminandis ac execucioni demandandis et in curiam regiam transmittendis.

Item quia sunt nonnulli vicecomites et iudices nobilium in plerisque comitatibus, qui in causis coram eisdem motis vel movendis absque speciali mandato regie maiestatis procedere vel autem vim suam tulissent sentenciam, eandem debite execucioni demandare aut interveniente appellacione in curiam regiam transmittere recusant, quare ut talium causancium parcatur laboribus et expensis, statutum est, quod comites, vicecomites et iudices nobilium universas causas sedem iudiciariam concernentes amodo de cetero absque speciali mandato regie maiestatis coram se acceptare atque causantibus ipsis observato iuris ordine ex parte quorumlibet debitam iusticiam facere, et si non fuerit appellatum ab eadem, sentenciam, quam tulerint, debite execucioni demandare, si autem appellacio intervenerit, in curiam regiam more solito transmittere teneantur sub pena amissionis officiolatum suorum.

LXXII. Articulus septuagesimus secundus. Quod nullus presummat, arma ac victualia vendere infidelibus.

^{xxi} A seu

^{xxii} mendose: comitem

Item quod officiales finitimi, necnon merciatores, ac alterius cuiusvis status et condicionis homines Turcis aut aliis quibuslibet infidelibus arma, victualia, cultellas seu quecunque ingenia sub nota perpetue infidelitatis vendere vel commutare non presumant.

LXXIII. Articulus septuagesimus tercius. Quod nullus audeat impedire eos, qui ex Turcia saliant ad hoc regnum.

Item, quod nullus officialium castra finitima tenencium, necnon alterius cuiusvis statii hominum illos, qui de dominio seu terris Turcorum ad limites huius regni vel eciam ad hoc regnum clandestine aufugerint, in personis vel rebus eorum quovis modo audeat de cetero impedire seu dampnificare sub nota perpetue infidelitatis.

LXXIV. Articulus septuagesimus quartus. De theloniis siccis quis modus observetur.

Item, quoniam in decreto serenissimi principis condam domini Lodovici regis olim eciam per condam dominum Mathiam regem tempore sue coronacionis confirmato id statutum^{xxiii} esse constat, quod tributa iniusta super terris siccis et fluvis ab infra descendantibus et supra euntibus non exigantur, nisi in pontibus et navigiis ab ultra transeuntibus persolvantur, qualiter autem et per quem modum, aut per quos et an iuste vel iniuste huiusmodi telonia in locis huiusmodi teloniorum exigantur, absque debita investigacione resciri non possunt, nec de hoc impresenciarum finalis determinacio fieri potest, pro eo conclusum est, quod in singulis comitatibus, in quibus eadem telonia exiguntur, certi pociores ex nobilibus eligantur, qui sub stricto iuramento de munero ac modo et qualitate exaccionis tributorum diligenter faciant inquisicionem et in registro fideliter conscribant, conscriptaque ad futuram congregacionem generalem proxime celebrandam coram regia maiestate, necnon dominis prelati et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis sub eorum sigillis presentare teneantur, ut hiis visis provideatur, quod pro utilitate publica melius erit faciendum.

Nos igitur, cuius interest, ex suscepti regiminis nostri officia tranquillo statui dicti regni nostri providere, supplicacionibus prefatorum baronum, procerumque et nobilium dicti regni nostri tanquam iustis et racionabilibus inclinati prescriptos articulos commune bonum ac quietum statum et utilitatem ipsius regni nostri in se continentes acceptantes, approbantes et ratificantes eosdemque articulos ac omnia in ipsis contenta immorantes perpetue valituros et duraturos confirmamus, nosque omnia et singula in ipsis specificata inviolabiliter observare et per alios observari facere promittimus et obligamus presentis scripti nostri patrocinio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes literas nostras privilegiales sub appensione secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, communitas duximus convertendas. Datum Bude, quartagesimo die congregacionis generalis antedictae, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo nonagesimo octavo, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. octavo, Bohemie vero vigesimo octavo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus dominis Thoma Strigoniensis et Petro Colocensis ecclesiarum archiepiscopis, necnon illustrissimo ac reverendissimo Ipolito Estensi de Aragonia, sancte Romane ecclesie diacono cardinali Agriensis, Osvaldo Zagrabiensis, Ladislao Gereb Transsilvanensis, Dominico Waradiensis, Sigismundo Quinqueelesiensis, Francisco Jauriensis, Johanne Wespremiensis, Nicolao de Bathor Waciensis, Luca Chanadiensis, Anthonio Nitriensis, ta per M. Adam.

^{xxiii} A constitutum

Sirimiensi sede vacante, Gabriele Boznensis, Briccio Thiniensis, Michaele Segniensis et Christoforo Modrusiensis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item spectabili et magnifico Stephano de Zapolya comite perpetuo terre Scepusiensis, regni nostri Hungarie palatino et iudice Comanorum, comite Petro Gereb de Wyngarth iudice curie nostre, Bartholomeo Dragffy de Belthawk wayvoda nostro Transsilvanensi et comite Siculorum nostrorum, Georgio de Kanysa regnorum nostrorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie, Petro Tharnok de Machkas et Jacobo Gerlysthye Zewriniensibus banis, Josa de Son comite Themesiensi et generali capitaneo parcium regni nostri inferiorum, officio magistri tavernicatus nostri vacante, Nicolao Banffy de Lyndva ianitorum, Emerico de Peren dapiferorum, Stephano de Kanysa pincernarum, Blasio de Baska cubiculariorum et Johanne Ernuth de Chaaktornya agazonum nostrorum regalium magistris, aliisque compluribus regni nostri officia tenentibus et honores.

Lec

2 JUNE 1498 (“DECRETUM MINUS”)

Wladislas by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, also duke of Silesia and Luxemburg, and margrave of Moravia and Lusatia,¹ salvation to all the faithful of Christ in the present and the future who will take cognizance of these presents, in Him who is the true salvation. [1] Most glorious God, whose will governs all that He has created both in the heavenly Jerusalem and in the wide ranges of this earth, has promoted us, albeit undeservedly, to the peak or summit of this royal dignity in order that, just as He has most generously granted us His gifts, we, recalling His favors, should soundly provide for the peace of our subjects over whom He has willed us to preside, so that we, who are equal to them in birth and death, should be of advantage to them rather than rule them purposelessly. [2] And God has given us two instruments to rule the people subject to us: arms and laws. Laws in order that we teach them the three precepts of nature: namely to live honestly, not to harm others, and grant to each his due. [3] Arms, in turn, in order that those whom fear of law’s punishment does not restrain from evil deeds, should be at least deterred from sinful acts by the severity of the avenging sword, so that their audacity is repressed, innocence made safe among the wicked, and the good can live in peace among the bad.² [4] Therefore we wish to notify all both present and future by these presents that after our joyous coronation, at the humble request and intercession of our faithful prelates, barons, and nobles of our realm we did issue twice, one after the other, various laws for the benefit and welfare of our renowned kingdom of Hungary (as the necessity of the times and the state of affairs demanded),³ then finally these same barons and all the nobles of our realm from all the counties of the same kingdom of ours appeared in front of us at this general assembly which we have called for the important and urgent necessities of the realm to the feast of St George the Martyr,⁴ recently passed, and sought to disclose to us, not without the bitterness of their heart, the following: [5] Although at our joyous coronation we promised to all the gentlemen of the realm, that is both to the magnates and major lords as well as to the lesser ones, that we would for their benefit restore, renew and confirm as well as observe as confirmed and cause to be observed, their liberties granted by the most serene prince, the late Lord Andrew,

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. By 1498 none of them were under Hungarian control, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János m. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalova ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Cf. Gratian D. 4.c.1, quoted also in Tripartitum Prol. 6, 9. The style of the proemium with its Classical and Roman legal quotes suggests that it was drafted by Stephen Werbőczy (1458?-1541), lawyer-politician, author of the Tripartitum.

³ See 1492 and 1495.

⁴ 23 April 1498.

our predecessor of blessed memory, and confirmed by the serene princes, the late Lords Louis and Matthias, our predecessors of blessed memory,⁵ several articles of which had been for many past years infringed upon, there are a good many who opposing our wholesome intention and their [the gentlemen of the realm's] desire, and seeking their own private advantage rather than the common good, on account of whose hindrances their wish could not yet be attained, [6] particularly, when we, at their most humble instance did recently call a general assembly for Martinmas of last year in order to accomplish all that they with great sighing sought from us, and held it with God's help in our city of Pest, these disturbers of the peace, sowing tares in the chosen wheat wrecked everything, so that our barons and gentlemen of the realm were forced to return home with quite some loss of expense, without having agreed anything good with us.⁶ [7] With these requests, the said barons and other nobles, major and lesser ones, produced and presented to our majesty certain articles about their liberties granted by the said late lord King Andrew and other holy kings of Hungary, with the contents as follows; [8] and the said barons and gentlemen of the realm humbly besought our majesty with devoted requests and urgency that, considering their oppressions, we should deign to have regard for the peace of our said country that is being threatened on all sides by the infidel Turks, persecutors of Christ's cross, and other enemies of the realm, and should renew and confirm, as well as observe as renewed and confirmed and cause others to observe, the liberties written up in those same articles. The content of these articles is as follows:

1. The holding of general assemblies henceforth⁷

Then, that in the four years now following a general assembly shall be annually held by His Majesty at the feast of St George the Martyr for all the gentlemen of the realm, that is the prelates as well as the barons and other nobles and men of property⁸ in the field of Rákos.⁹ [1] Such a general assembly shall be completed within fifteen days. [2] After those four years and in all future times such a general assembly shall be held every third year, in the same way.¹⁰ [3] Should,

⁵ Cf. 1222; 11; 1351; 6 April 1464. No actual confirmation of the Golden Bull by Wladislas II "at his coronation" has survived, but may have been included in the probably lost coronation decretum (on which, see Tibor Neumann, "II. Ulászló koronázása és első rendeletei; egy ismeretlen országgyűlésről és koronázási dekrétumról)" [The coronation and first ordinances of Wladislas II: on an unknown diet and coronation decree], Századok 142 (2008) 317--37). However, many of its stipulations were included in some form in the decree of 1492, and in the present one.

⁶ A diet was held 11 November 1497, but, after mutual recriminations between magnates and county nobles, ended without passing any decisions.

⁷ This decretum has, exceptionally, article numbers and rubrics in the original.

⁸ Homines possessionati, a term occasionally added to nobiles &c. is a puzzle, as men with property were in medieval Hungary by definition nobles.

⁹ The location near Pest became the regular meeting place of the diet since the late 15th C., see János M. Bak and András Vadas, "Diets and Synods in Buda and Its Environs," in: Balázs Nagy, Katalin Szende, András Vadas, eds. Medieval Buda in Context (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 322-44.

¹⁰ Cf., e.g. 1458:13; the date (April 23) was, however, not always observed and diets were held in the subsequent years at various times of the year.

however, any prelate, baron or other gentleman of the realm fail to appear on the first day and remain for fifteen days, then, if a prelate or baron, he shall be condemned to two hundred heavy marks equaling eight hundred gold florins and, if more substantial nobles or middling or lesser ones, one hundred marks equaling four hundred gold florins, which the royal majesty shall exact unremittingly, [4] exempting the office holders of the royal majesty, of the lord prelates and barons as well as of other gentlemen of the realm and others guarding the border castles or engaged abroad in important embassies of the king and country or of their lords;¹¹ [5] as well as the infirm, the blind, the lame and the very poor who are unable to come at all; [6] and those as well, who are by necessity occupied in travels abroad. [7] So that if two or more brothers live on a joint property or a father has one or more sons with whom he had not yet divided the property,¹² then it is enough to send one of them to the diet, [8] but if they have made mutual division, they must all come personally. [9] Nobles of one plot have to send one of every ten of them. [10]¹³ Should county ispáns or their deputies allow by some arrangement, lured by money or gifts, someone to stay at home, they too shall be condemned to one hundred marks.

2. The holding of octaves and short court sessions, election and salary of their assessors Then, that in this country two major and full octave courts must be held every year, namely one at St George the Martyr and another at Michaelmas; and similarly, two short ones (called short court sessions) at Epiphany and St James the Apostle. [1] The octave courts shall be held so that their first day is on the twentieth day of the said feasts and they should last forty days.¹⁴ [2] And if judgments are given after the forty days, they shall have no force or validity either in cases already opened or in those which are not. [3] The short court sessions shall begin on the twentieth day of the aforesaid feasts and these short court sessions shall only last and be concluded in twenty such

¹¹ This reference is one of the few in statute law (including the Tripartium.) acknowledging the fact that nobles might have “lords,” being retainers (familiares) of other noblemen. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. on this see Erik Fügedi, Erik. The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998); Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave), pp. 110–131. See also below Art. 46.

¹² Noble landed property, that was according to Hungarian custom held in common by the kindred or at least by the family was occasionally—but not always—divided among brothers or kinsmen. In the later Middle Ages it was usual that estates and villages were subdivided, forming so-called portiones possessionarie (partitioned estates). See Pál Engel, “Erbteilung und Familienbildung.” in ...The man of many Devices, Who Wandered Full many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, ed. Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebök (Budapest: CEU Press, 1999), pp. 411–421. Curiously, the principles of division and the respective rights of collateral branches are not addressed in any legislation.

¹³ This distinction among nobles who all were supposed to attend the diets, enjoying the selfsame liberty (1351), demonstrates the significant difference within the nobility.

¹⁴ This means that the regular sessions of royal courts, called octaves, would have opened on may 13; October 19; January 27, and August 14. They lasted usually 30-40 days, but in the 16th C. they tended to be longer and came almost continuous.

weekdays when court can be held, so that holidays do not count as days for court proceedings. [4] Summonses to these short court sessions must be made¹⁵ eight days before the aforementioned feasts or on the eighth day before the feast, just as to the major octaves. [5] And to all these courts, the greater and the short ones, besides the justices ordinary of the realm, [assessors] shall be chosen by his royal majesty and the country; from among the prelates two, from among the barons the same number, and from among the gentlemen of the realm, sixteen more substantial and more distinguished nobles, familiar with the law of this realm, such who excel in wisdom, from all four parts of the kingdom.¹⁶ They have to be present when judgments are decided, [6] in such a way that at the major octaves all sixteen nobles, at the shorter court sessions only eight of them (changing and changing about places with each other) have to be present. [7] For the sixteen elected nobles, who, as said above, shall be elected for the consideration of cases, the lords gentlemen of the realm will arrange suitable salaries; for the thus elected lord prelates and barons, the other lord prelates and barons have to provide the salaries. [8] In Transylvania and Slavonia similarly two major octaves should be held, namely at Epiphany and at St James the Apostle, and two shorter octaves on St George the Martyr and at Michaelmas.¹⁷ [9] These octaves should start on the fifteenth day preceding the said days and last fifteen days after their opening, major and short court sessions alike.¹⁸

3. Holding the octaves at the next Michaelmas

Then, at the next coming Michaelmas, an octave court has to be held whatever the circumstances.

4. The master protonotaries, the assessors, and their oaths

Then lest the master protonotaries be corrupted by gifts, they have to swear and promise under the strict oath of Rákos¹⁹ that they will give to each and all just, lawful and godly judgment; and thus it will be at the pleasure of every litigant, whether he wishes to give them gifts or not. [1] If,

¹⁵ There were different types of summonses. Simple summons were delivered to the respondent at his noble residence, giving notice of a protracted lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, a terminal summons would be issued. Short (or final) summons (citatio brevis): required the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione) issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might. The last was abolished several times, but kept being used. The Latin here does not indicate whether the summonses had to be issued or served at this term.

¹⁶ While unusual to divide the country in parts, the text may imply something like Upper (Northern), Lower (Southern) parts and divide the middle as east and west of the Danube.

¹⁷ The “similarly” is inappropriate as the dates of the sessions are the exact opposite of those in Hungary. This regulation was soon rescinded, for Transylvania all octaves but the one before Epiphany were abolished, and in Slavonia the traditional dates for court sessions restored. See 1500:9.

¹⁸ These court sessions would have been expected to open on 24 December, 10 July, 8 April, and 14 September, respectively. In 1500:2 [1] the shorter octaves were suspended.

¹⁹ See 1492:33.

however, any of the litigants can prove lawfully that any of the masters has given judgment to someone falsely and unjustly because of such gifts, then such a master should pay with his head and the loss of his goods. [2] The lord prelates and barons who have to be present in the court together with the assessors have similarly to vow in the form of the oath of Rákos, to render true justice to all without favor or spite. [3] And those born from peasant stock must not hold the office of master, and no protonotary of non-noble lineage should ever be elected.²⁰

5. Handing out of letters of fine

Then that the master protonotaries must insert either personally or through the assigned scribes the date of the letters of summons into the register when [letters of] fines or burdens are handed out.

[1] And earlier summons have to be opened before later ones. [2] And that one registration or handing out of [letters of] fines is to last until the conclusion of the lawsuit.²¹

6. Customs are to be written up

And since the master protonotaries always refer to the customs of the realm in passing judgments, [1] therefore, such ancient customs shall be written up; and if they seem to be reasonable and lawful to the royal majesty and the lord justices and not harmful or unreasonable, judgment shall be based on them. [2] Master Adam shall be chosen by His Majesty who shall write up these customs and the lord gentlemen of the realm shall provide for him and agree with him about this.²²

[3] They also petitioned that the royal majesty shall entrust [someone] to write these up and arrange for his provision.²³

7. The eight assessors have to be admitted to council

Then that the royal majesty should always admit eight of the aforesaid sixteen nobles²⁴ to his council in matters that generally seem to touch upon and concern the entire realm. [1] These nobles shall always swear by strict oath that they will do and discuss everything in the council faithfully and privily for the common good and welfare of this kingdom.

8. Some cases to be treated outside the octaves and short court sessions by the royal majesty

²⁰ On the basis of a thorough investigation of all the known protonotaries Bónis established the validity of this article, see György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a mohács előtti magyarországon. [Men learned in law in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1971), p. 379.

²¹ Cf. 1500:4.

²² Magister Adam: Adam Liszkai (later in life called Horváti, probably from an acquired estate) was a professional lawyer, whose career started under Matthias, finally becoming protonotary in the court of the personalis; see Bónis, A jogtudó, passim. This article is the beginning of the prehistory of the Tripartitum.

²³ Alicui is added to the later editions, however, it could refer to the same person as well.

²⁴ See 1498:2 [6].

Then, considering that it was usual hitherto to have all cases involving acts of might, both major and minor ones, concluded at the octaves or short court sessions, [1] yet, because the nobles of this realm, magnates and powerful men as well as those of lesser estate, are frequently molested both at home and while traveling or otherwise engaged and hence ever more various complaints reach the ears of the royal majesty, [2] His Majesty, as a dutiful prince, not wishing to transgress the limits of his own laws, used hitherto to prorogue such complaints either to the octaves or to the short court sessions. [3] Therefore it has been decided that henceforth all and every lawsuit moved on account and because of the invasion of noblemen's houses, as well as the detention, beating, wounding or killing of nobles without just cause may always be decided and concluded by the royal majesty, wherever His Majesty may be staying, outside the octaves or short court sessions.

[4] In such a way, namely that those against whom complaints are laid because of the aforesaid acts of might shall be summoned personally from wherever they may be found or from the homes where they live,²⁵ by letters of command of the royal majesty through letters of presentation written to a chapter or convent,²⁶ to a set date which the royal majesty will decide in his letter of command, according to the distance of the locations, to appear before the royal majesty without any delay, and be given notice by the testimony of that chapter or convent to render account. [5] If they appear personally and can exculpate themselves, well and good; otherwise, if they do not appear or cannot exculpate themselves, they shall be condemned to capital punishment and the loss of all their property rights, goods, and chattels whatsoever, always observing due process of law.

9. Cases regarding the damages and injuries caused after the death of the late lord King Matthias are to be judged in short sessions

Then, it is clear that it has been decreed in the sixteenth article of the decretum maius,²⁷ how and in what way satisfaction may be sought at the octaves for damages and injuries done to the gentlemen of the realm during the time of disturbances, most recently after the death of the late Lord King Matthias. [1] But because the holding of the octaves is frequently delayed, we have therefore decided that in all suits moved or to be moved in these matters satisfaction for such damages and injuries may be sought at short court sessions in the manner described in the same decree. [2] In a way that if earlier summonses have been actually issued against someone, the plaintiffs are obliged to give legal notice to the adversary party to appear at the short court session, notwithstanding those summonses. [3] If, however, the plaintiff wishes to apply these summonses to the octaves, he shall be free to prosecute his case at those.

10. The occupation of castles and other property rights: that they have to be returned before the next Michaelmas and summonses regarding them shall be completed at the short court sessions

²⁵ The rule of summoning a nobleman only from his residences (or personally if he is present in the county assembly) is detailed in the Tripartium II. 24.

²⁶ The sonantibus is clearly a Hungarianism (szóló meaning both sounding and addressing someone).

²⁷ 1495:16.

Then, that all castles, fortified residences, estates and property rights, which were occupied in the name of His Majesty King Matthias or after his death shall be returned in their entirety before the next Michaelmas, under penalty of the perpetual charge of infidelity.²⁸ [1] If summonses are issued on account of such an occupation, these summonses shall be concluded at short court sessions. [2] In such a way, however, that such occupiers shall because of such occupations be given legal notice to appear at the short court session, notwithstanding the previous summonses. This applies when major octaves are not held.

11. The convent of Săniob

Regarding the convent of Săniob, that the seal of that convent shall be completely restored,²⁹ [1] because the seal of this convent, together with the smaller convents, was taken away not because of some fault, but according to a general decree. [2] Considering that His Majesty has in his register³⁰ previously sent to all counties promised to observe this article, the gentlemen of the realm therefore request the royal majesty that he deign to remove the hermits whom he had settled there and install a suitable regular abbot of that order, because the gentlemen of the realm cannot be without the seal of that convent.

12. The chapter of Bosnia

Regarding the chapter of Bosnia it has been decided that, because its canons are known to be completely destitute, therefore, in order to repair its church—founded in honor of St Peter—they shall have the right to go out as chapters' witnesses throughout the entire country, like those of the chapter of Buda.³¹

13. The convent of Šáhý

²⁸ Charge of infidelity (nota infidelitatis) was a charge for specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. That implied the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

²⁹ See 1492:39.

³⁰ The reference is obviously to the text of the previous decree sent out to the counties.

³¹ The bishopric of Bosnia had since 1246 been in fact a titular see (suffragan of Kalocsa), located in Djakovo, in Slavonia, with no actual presence or income from Bosnia. The right to act as a place of authentication in the entire realm would have brought in some income from administrative fees. See also below, Art. 56.

Because County Gömör and many other gentlemen of these parts cannot in the interest of the common good be without the seal of the church of Šáhy,³² [1] it has therefore been decided that they shall have the right to act in all executions in county Gömör.

14. Forgers who seal forged charters

Regarding the forgers who seal forged letters in the chapters and convents: all those members of the chapter or convent who are present as accomplices at the time of forgery, shall be branded by a red-hot seal on their forehead and both cheeks. [1] Moreover they shall right away lose their benefices.

15. The lord archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastics with or without banderia

Because the below named³³ lord archbishops, bishops, chapters, priors, abbots, Carthusians of Lövöld³⁴ as well as the prior of Vrana³⁵ are, according to the laudable ancient custom of this realm, bound to raise banderia for the defense of the realm from their income from the tithe and ecclesiastical properties according to the size of their income and number of tenant peasants, [1] therefore, these lord archbishops, bishops, chapters, provosts, abbots, Carthusians as well as the prior of Vrana have to keep and supply their troops according to the regulation as follows. [2] The other chapters, convents, abbots and provosts as well as other ecclesiastical persons, both regulars and seculars, who enjoy tithe income, shall send and maintain [well-armed horsemen] according to their income and the number of their tenant peasants; while those, who have no tithe income, one well-armed horseman after every thirty-six plots, just as other gentlemen of the realm not having banderia. [3] If any prelate and ecclesiastical person owns secular properties from which banderia have of old been supplied, they should henceforth also keep banderia and perform military service by reason of these in addition to [the troops] based on their other ecclesiastical properties. [4] In order to obviate the difficulties arising for those without banderia regarding their tithe income and number of their tenant peasants, it has been decided: [5] that in every county, as many honest, reliable and substantial men should be elected by the community of the nobles of the county as there are noble magistrates in the county, [6] who, together with the noble magistrates of the county where the conscription is to be done, shall—having sworn an oath—explore exactly the income of the tithe and the number of tenant peasants and faithfully list these in a register. They shall take this to the place of the county court, where the community of the nobles shall, on the basis of their meticulous estimation, write down the number of soldiers in every county; and ecclesiastical persons without banderia have to serve accordingly.

³² Šáhy (Hung.: Ság, later: Ipolyság), in Co. Hont, was a Premonstratensian monastery, founded in 1235 and had acted as a place of authentication since 1255; this measure aimed at extending its jurisdiction to the neighboring county.

³³ See 1498:20.

³⁴ Lövöld (in Városlőd, Co. Veszprém) was a fourteenth-century royal foundation with a sizeable endowment, therefore—apparently—especially obligated to supply troops.

³⁵ On the prior of Vrana, Prior of the Hospitallers in the Kingdom of Hungary, see Tripartium II 54.

16. Armed horsemen to be supplied by the gentlemen of the realm

Then, to the twentieth article of the decretum maius it has been added that a well-armed horseman is no longer to be supplied, as contained in the decree, after every twenty, but after every thirty- six portae or tenant plots, except for some counties of the lower regions, such as counties Pozsega, Valkó, Szerém, Bács, Csongrád, Csanád, Zaránd, Torontál, Arad, Temes and Békés, which have to raise one hussar³⁶ with an oblong or round shield, lance, armor, and steel or leather helmet, after every twenty-four portae. Nobles of one plot have similarly to send one armed horseman after every thirty-six plots. [1] It has also been added that in the banderia of the lord prelates and barons, instead of the hussars who hitherto constituted a half of their banderia, armed horsemen should be employed, excepting always the aforementioned counties of the lower regions.

17. Royal officers and paid soldiers of the gentlemen of the realm have to serve beyond the borders of the realm

To the eighteenth article of the decretum maius, where it is written that whenever the gentlemen of the realm go to war on the king's command, they shall not be forced to proceed to war outside the borders and frontiers of the country,³⁷ this has been added: [1] that, because the gentlemen of the realm necessarily have to keep paid soldiers from their tenant peasants,³⁸ therefore, whenever it may be necessary for the defense of the country, the officers and paid soldiers of the king, the prelates and barons, as well as of the gentlemen of the realm shall, as time and conditions demand, campaign beyond the borders and frontiers of the country and no limits should be set for them. [2] If, however, necessity demands that, in addition to the paid soldiers, the community of the gentlemen of the realm has to rise, then they are not obliged in this event to campaign beyond the borders and frontiers of the kingdom.

18. The occasion of deployment of paid soldiers and the king's right to raise them

In order that the kingdom is better defended against the assaults of infidels and other foes, it pleased all the gentlemen of the realm that these troops be levied and henceforth always kept ready in every county of the entire kingdom of Hungary, according to the aforementioned ratio until the next coming Martinmas, under the penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity. [1] In such a way, however, that these troops shall on no account be deployed without the explicit approval and command of the royal majesty. [2] Should, however, some pressing need arise for this kingdom before the aforesaid Martinmas on account of which the royal majesty cannot do without these troops, then His Majesty shall be able and free to deploy for the defense of the country first of all his own officers, and the banderial prelates and ecclesiastical persons who have to keep troops as well as the lord barons and, finally, if necessary, the community of the gentlemen of the realm as well. [3]

³⁶ Hussars were light cavalrymen, equipped with sabers and only lightly armed; they played an increasing role in the Hungarian armies, mainly as a counterweight to the Ottoman spahi cavalry.. By the close of the middle Ages some hussars were fitted with armor (see 1518 Tolna:2).

³⁷ See 1492:18.

³⁸ See 1492:20.

How and in what way the said troops are to be levied is contained more broadly in the decretum maius.

19. The punishment of royal captains mobilizing the royal army by false rumors

Then, if a royal captain should with false rumors levy the army of the kingdom, deliberately and with evil intent, and thus exhaust the royal majesty and the country³⁹ without reasonable need, he shall in such a case incur the taint of infidelity.

20. The number of troops to be raised by the banderial ecclesiastical persons⁴⁰

These are the ecclesiastical persons who always have to raise their banderia and go to war with them according to the following order:⁴¹

- [1] The archbishop of Esztergom, two banderia
- [2] The archbishop of Kalocsa, one banderium
- [3] The bishop of Eger, two banderia
- [4] The bishop of Oradea, one banderium
- [5] The bishop of Pécs, one banderium
- [6] The bishop of Transylvania, one banderium
- [8] The bishop of Győr, two hundred cavalry
- [9] The bishop of Veszprém, two hundred cavalry
- [10] The bishop of Vác, two hundred cavalry
- [11] The bishop of Cenad, one hundred cavalry
- [12] The bishop of Srem, fifty cavalry
- [13] The bishop of Nitra, fifty cavalry
- [14] The abbot of Pécsvárad, two hundred cavalry
- [15] The abbot of Oradea, two hundred cavalry
- [16] The abbot of Szekszárd, one hundred cavalry
- [17] The abbot of St Martin's, two hundred cavalry
- [18] The Carthusian friars of Lövöld, fifty cavalry
- [19] The prior of Vrana, one banderium
- [20] The abbot of Zobor, fifty cavalry

³⁹ This is a case where regnum clearly means the estates (ország).

⁴⁰ Banderia (from the Italian bandiera, 'banner') were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates and by other major landowners in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field a banderium were referred to as banderial lords (domini banderiat).

⁴¹ Cf. the Sigismundian list of banderia: Propositiones 1432/33. This list obviously takes into account the losses in the south, such as Bosnia, Srem, and includes also the major abbeys and chapters.

- [21] The chapter of Esztergom, two hundred cavalry
- [22] The chapter of Eger, two hundred cavalry
- [23] The chapter of Transylvania, two hundred cavalry
- [24] The chapter of Pécs, two hundred cavalry
- [25] The chapter of Bács, fifty cavalry
- [26] The prior major of Székesfehérvár together with his chapter and the prior minor of the same place, one hundred cavalry
- [27] The collegiate church of Titel, fifty cavalry

21. The banderium of the king and his office-holders

Because the royal majesty has necessarily to keep from his royal income, besides the royal banderium which usually consist of a thousand armed cavalry and the maintenance of the border castles, a number of banderial lords, it is fit to list them here:

- [1] The royal banderium with a thousand cavalry
- [2] The voivode of Transylvania, one banderium
- [3] The ispán of the Székely, one banderium
- [4] The ban of Croatia, one banderium
- [5] The ispán of Temes, one banderium.

22. The lord barons who have to go to war with the banderial ecclesiastics⁴²

There are, moreover, lord barons in this kingdom, such as Duke Lawrence Újlaki, and the perpetual and free ispáns, the spectabiles and magnifici lords, Stephen Szapolyai, perpetual ispán of Spiš, palatine of the kingdom of Hungary and judge of the Cumans; [1] then the counts of Bazin and Szentgyörgy and the counts Frankapan and of Krbava; [2] further, Lord comes Peter Vingárti Geréb, judge of the royal majesty, and other lord barons who, together with the aforementioned banderial prelates and dignitaries, are obliged to go to war according to the number of their tenant peasants.

- [3] The despot⁴³ will be held to supply one thousand cavalry
- [4] Duke Lawrence
- [5] the ispán of Spiš
- [6] Lord comes Peter Geréb
- [7] Bartholomew Béltéki Drágfi, voivode of Transylvania
- [8] Józsa Somi, ispán of Temes
- [9] Nicholas Alsólindvai Bánfi

⁴² Those in the following list, who did not hold royal offices—for whom see the eschatcoll, with notes 115-43, below—are known only as “banderial lords” usually with no additional biographical data. Some (such as Bartholomew Béltéki Drágfi and others) are listed twice, in art. 21, above and art. 22, below.

⁴³ Branković, John (Jovan), despot of Serbia 1492-1502.

- [10] George Bátori
- [11] John Csáktornyai Ernuszt
- [12] Matthew Dengelegi Pongrác
- [13] Emeric Perényi
- [14] Gabriel Perényi
- [15] John Pelsőci Bebek
- [16] Stephen Rozgonyi
- [17] Anthony Pálóci
- [18] John Homonnai
- [19] Ladislav Kanizsai
- [20] John [Kanizsai]
- [21] George also Kanizsai
- [22] Count Thomas of Bazin
- [23] Count Peter, of the same
- [24] Francis, likewise count
- [25] Nicholas Szécsi
- [26] George Szalónaki Paumkircher
- [27] John Mogyorókeréki Ellerbach
- [28] Sigismund Návai Ország
- [29] Sigismund Gúti Kompolt
- [30] Sigismund Losonci
- [31] Sigismund Lévai
- [32] Blaise Ráskai
- [33] Andrew Bainai Bot
- [34] John Nádasdi Ongor
- [35] John Bolondóci Bánfi
- [36] Francis Hédervári
- [37] Stephen Nagylaki Jaksic
- [38] Francis Grabarjai Beriszló
- [39] John Grabarjai Beriszló
- [40] Albert Szokoli
- [41] And the despot with one thousand hussars⁴⁴

⁴⁴ Seems to be a repetition.

[42] Belmusavić with all his hussars⁴⁵

23. The pledge of Lusatia and the six cities

Then, that the royal majesty shall (as clearly stated in the decretum maius) discharge the pledge on the six cities and Lusatia and work with all diligence to extract the relevant letters from them.⁴⁶

24. The feudal oath to be received from the Moravians, the Silesians as well as Lusatia

Then, that the royal majesty shall give to this country a letter of testimony in respect of the oath of fealty sworn recently to him by the Moravians, Silesians and of Lusatia, that that oath of fealty was received by him not as king of Bohemia but as king of Hungary, and not from them as subjects of the kingdom of Bohemia but as feudatories of this kingdom, who by the force of the pledge are obligated to the kingdom of Hungary.⁴⁷

25. The keeping of the Holy Crown

Then that the Holy Crown of this kingdom shall not be kept by lord prelates but only by lord barons and laymen.⁴⁸

26. The right of the king to dispose of more than a hundred peasants

Then, although in the decretum maius it was previously ordered and concluded⁴⁹ that the royal majesty might on his own initiative grant by himself up to a hundred tenant peasants to whomever he may wish, but beyond that number only with the consent of the lord prelates and barons, and so on, this seems to the gentlemen of the realm inappropriate and unlawful. [1] They do not wish to constrain in any way the power and authority of His Majesty, except only in regard to foreigners and aliens, to whom they wish that neither ecclesiastical benefices nor secular properties be granted in this kingdom.

27. Safe conduct to unfaithful persons

Then that any unfaithful person or one accused before the royal majesty shall receive safe conduct from the royal majesty so that he is able to appear before the royal majesty and his court within ⁴⁵ Hussars (Hung. huszár) were light cavalrymen, equipped with sabers and only lightly armed, these played an increasing role in the Hungarian armies, mainly as a counterweight to the Ottoman spahi cavalry. By the close of the Middle Ages some hussars were fitted with armor Cf. 1518Tolna:2.

⁴⁶ For the pledged cities see 1492:4. The Latin of the present article is unclear, considering that it refers to the inclusion of these cities and territory in pledge and not their release. The issue seems not to have been settled for a while, as 1504:21 repeats this article with emphasis.

⁴⁷ Cf. 1492:4.

⁴⁸ Guarding the Holy Crown became an issue especially after its theft from Visegrád in 1440. Following its return in 1462, the guarding of it has been regulated in 1464. On the guards of the crown under the Jagellos, see 1492:3; this clause transferred the responsibility to the secular lords, who kept his office until the end of the monarchy.

⁴⁹ See 1492:9.

forty days and be free to return unimpeded, regardless of whether the matter has in the meantime been settled or not.

28. Adjustment of the frontiers of the kingdom

Then, that the royal majesty shall adjust and define the frontiers between the kingdoms of Hungary and Poland as well as between the kingdoms of Hungary and Moravia, and similarly Austria and Germany, in order to eliminate the cause of any further disagreement. [1] The royal majesty shall also deign to restore the borders siding the Turks.⁵⁰

29. Thirtieths be collected at the ancient places

Then, whereas the collectors of His Majesty's thirtieth⁵¹ are ever more accustomed to harass the gentlemen of the realm, by habitually exacting for their own profit thirtieths in the inner parts of the country, not in the ancient and usual places of thirtieths but in new places invented by them, and not on those goods from which thirtieths should be levied but on the most trifling objects, not without harm and detriment to the gentlemen of the realm, [1] therefore, in order to eliminate such abuses, it has pleased us to list below all those places where the thirtieth may always hereafter be levied.⁵² We decree that excepting the places listed below the thirtieth shall nowhere be exacted and all recently invented new locations of thirtieth collection be entirely abolished but for three locations of the thirtieth, that is in Buda, in Székesfehérvár and in Dunapataj; [2] Then, once the royal majesty has redeemed those thirtieth locations which are now in pledge to the aforesaid ispán and palatine Stephen,⁵³ the royal majesty may deign to abolish these three locations as well. [3] The thirtieth has to be paid only on things which are taken out of the country; on those which are not taken across the borders no thirtieth shall be levied at all. [4] On trifling things worth less than a florin, no thirtieth is to be levied, as is contained in the decretum maius. [5] Because it often happens that merchants drive cattle and herds either with such a large escort⁵⁴ that these animals

⁵⁰ Cf. above, Art. 23–24. “Reformare” the southern border with the expanding Ottoman Empire was, however, hardly a matter of legal procedure. By 1498 almost all territories south of the River Sava and parts of Crnoatia had been under Ottoman rule. See Ferenc Szakály, Phases of Turco-Hungarian Warfare Before the Battle of Mohács (1365-1526) (Budapest: A kaémiai K. 1979)

⁵¹ The thirtieth developed only gradually into a customs duty on exports and imports, and a few old thirtieth collecting points in the midsdt of the country survived; cf. Sándor Domanovszky, “A harminczadvám eredete” [Origins of the thirtieth toll], now in: Idem, Gazdaság és társadalom a középkorban, ed. Ferenc Glatz (Budapest: Goldoat, 1979), pp. 49–100; Zsigmond Pál Pach “A harmincadvám az Anjou-korban és a 14–15. század fordulóján” [The thirtieth toll in the Angevin age and at the turn of the 14th to 15th C.], in Történelmi Szemle 41 (3–4) 1999, 231–277. As far as can be ascertained, these were not abolished for at least another century. \

⁵² See below, Art, 34.

⁵³ Zapolya (a. k. a. Zápolya, Szapolyai), Imre of (d. 1487) chief treasurer 1459-64, governor of Bosnia, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1464-65, ispán of Szepes from 1465, count palatine 1486- 87.

⁵⁴ Well-armed cattle drovers (hajdú) were often referred to as an unruly group accompanying the cattle being exported to the West. For their participation in the 1514 uprising see 1514:60.

are violently exported without payment of the thirtieth, the thirtieth collectors being unable to resist them, or surreptitiously, to the detriment of the royal income, therefore, in order that this ill be remedied, it has been decided [6] that if henceforth anyone is found guilty of the aforesaid and the thirtieth collectors are unable to confiscate the animals, then they are nevertheless to be convicted by due process to the estimation of these (exported, as said, by stealth or violence) animals in favor of the thirtieth collectors.

30. That the toll collectors be Hungarians

Then, that the customs collectors shall be none other than Hungarians and not foreigners or aliens.

31. No herds and flocks shall be taken out of the kingdom, nor horses or studs, nor melted gold and silver, and the punishment for transgressors

Then, that herds and flocks shall not be driven by any person of this realm across the borders and frontiers of the kingdom, but only to the thirtieth places listed below, where the exchange of wares shall be done.⁵⁵ [1] Neither shall foreigners enter the country with their merchandise to buy animals beyond the thirtieth places or elsewhere, but shall come to the designated locations and the exchange of merchandise and animals between the inlanders and the foreigners shall be transacted at the same places. [2] Horses shall henceforth not be exported, nor studs. [3] Moreover, no person of whatever estate or condition shall dare for any reason to take out of this kingdom melted gold or silver unless it is minted in coins, as contained in the decretum maius.⁵⁶ [4] Should someone dare to act against the aforesaid or any part of the aforesaid and can be apprehended by anyone, then that person shall have full right to take away all the gold and silver as well as the cattle, flock or other belongings of the culprit and, moreover, to capture the one who wanted to take out the gold and silver. [5] He has to hand over two parts of the confiscated gold and silver and other goods and belongings to the royal majesty; one third he can retain for his efforts.

32. That no one shall dare to enter into partnership with foreigners for exporting horses or taking out gold or silver under penalty of the taint of infidelity.

Then, that no thirtieth collector nor any other person of whatever estate and condition shall dare to enter into partnership or to contract in any form with a foreigner to take steeds or mares abroad or to export melted gold or silver, under penalty of the eternal taint of infidelity.

33. Places of staple

⁵⁵ The repeated attempt of Hungarian kings to keep trading within the borders seems to have been in vain, as it is known that cattle was driven from the country as far as Alsace, Nuremberg, and Venice. In fact, cattle was the most important export commodity of the country in the later middle Ages and early modern times, practiced by the largest landholders and the king himself, see Ian Blanchard, "The Continental European Cattle Trades, 1400-1600", The Economic History Review, 39/3 (1986) 427-460, here 428-431; A. Fara, "An Outline of Livestock Production and Cattle Trade from Hungary to Western Europe in Late Middle Ages and Early Modern Period (XIVth-XVIth centuries)" Crisis 45 (2015), 87-95. see also Balázs Nagy, "Foreign Trade of Medieval Hungary" in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 473-90

⁵⁶ See 1492:32.

Because many lawsuits and disagreements are wont to arise between the royal cities regarding the right of staple, [1] and such conflict cannot easily be decided except on the basis of their letters of privilege, [2] therefore, the royal majesty shall alone decide, after having inspected the rights of the parties, what is best to do.

34. The places of ancient thirtieths

The old locations of thirtieth collection are the following:

Orava, a chief post,

Trenčín, similarly a chief post with branches in Skalica, Illava, Beluša, Považská Bystrica, Žilina, Nové Mesto nad Váhom, Trnava, Vrbové,

[1] Pozsony/Pressburg is a chief post with branches in Rusovce, Jahrndorf, Neusiedl, Zurndorf, Malacky, Šaštín, Gajary, Stupava and Senica.

[2] Sopron is a chief post with branches in Rust, Draßmarkt, and Sankt Martin.

[3] Košice is a chief post with branches in Levoča, Bardejov, Kežmarok, Lubovňa, Stropkov and Humenné.

[4] Then in Slavonia: Zagreb, Nedelišće, Varašdin, Murska Sobota are chief thirtieth posts;

[5] Szombathely instead of Kőszeg, Pinkafeld, Rudersdorf, Kaltenbrunn, Razkrižje, Dürnbach, Krapina, Stubica, Sjeničak, Topusko, Kostajnica are its branches.

[6] Belgrade is a chief post, Kupinovo, Šabac, Jarak, Barič, Sremska Mitrovica, Rača, Poltos, Opojevci, Újvár are its branches.

[7] Timișoara is a chief post and Caransebeș is its branch.⁵⁷

35 That nobles do not have to pay tolls for their own merchandise

Then, that no thirtieth collector or tax officer or their deputies has the right to levy (as they have habitually done) any thirtieth or tax on those things and goods which nobles, priests, monks and their people purchase for their own domestic needs, against their liberties. [1] Should, however, someone do so, then the nobleman, priest or monk thus despoiled and offended in his liberty has to lodge complaint with the lord of that toll if he can be found nearby, otherwise with the ispán of the county where this toll is being levied; and once the truth is established, double satisfaction is to be given, that is the complainant shall be repaid twice the toll collected, with the penalty of two marks divided equally between the ispán and the complainant. [2] If the thirtieth collector does to the contrary, any such complaint against him has to be submitted to the royal majesty. [3] If His Majesty is convinced by the letters of inquest of an ispán or alispán and the noble magistrates of that county where this thirtieth is levied that an unjust thirtieth was exacted by a thirtieth collector, then the thirtieth collector has in addition to the double of the toll taken and the expenses of the complainant to be severely punished by the royal majesty. [4] Should, however, the complainant

⁵⁷ This list, actually the only one in medieval Hungarian records, does not for some reason include the major thirtieth posts of Transylvania, such as Brașov and Sibiu (occasionally referred to as “twentieth” posts). From Slavonia Čakovec/Csáktornya seems to be missing, and the branches there are not listed. Poltos and Újvár were near the River Sava, cannot be identified with present-day settlements.

be found to have lodged unjustified complaints, then he shall similarly be convicted of two marks against the adversary party. [5] Since many royal cities and estates in this country are known to be exempt and free throughout the kingdom from the payment of tolls on wares and merchandise sold, how much more should the nobles of this kingdom, be they the more powerful or the lesser ones, whose ancestors won and defended this realm by the shedding of their blood and who and whose descendants still have to defend and protect it, when they engage in commerce with goods for sale, not be held to pay tolls from such a business. [6] In such a way, however, that should a nobleman go into partnership with a peasant or burgher, namely one who has to pay tolls and wish to take him with him without paying toll and the toll officer is able to ascertain this, then this toll officer shall have full and complete right to confiscate from both of them the wares and merchandise for sale.⁵⁸

36. That no one dare to block or guard illicit routes on the lands of others

Then, although it was decided and ordered in the decretum maius that no one is permitted to block and guard illicit routes on someone else's land,⁵⁹ no definite penalty is found there for those who trespass against this law. [1] Therefore, it has been established that no toll officer is allowed to guard and block illicit routes on someone else's land or territory, and hinder travelers on these illicit routes under pain of the loss of his toll. [2] But everybody having any toll has to keep guard on these illicit routes on his own land, that is, on the estate on which the toll is being collected, as defined in the decree.

37. Royal salt has to be deposited at the old chambers

That royal salt is to be deposited in the old chambers and not at places recently invented and these newly appointed places are to be entirely abolished.⁶⁰

38. Judgments to be made between nobles and free royal cities

That if free cities—that is Buda, Pest, Košice, Pressburg, Sopron, Bardejov, Prešov, Trnava, as well as Levoča and Zagreb, and all other free cities—or inhabitants of the same—cause any loss or damage to nobles and men of property, and if such a city or inhabitant and burgher that causes loss and damage has goods and property rights in any county and has from that property injured or caused loss to a noble, then they will be compelled to stand trial before the ispán in the county where they hold these goods, if such acts of loss or damage are considered to amount to a minor act of might. [1] But if such a city or burgher has no property rights in any county, and a noble or any other man of property has a suit or case against a private person, or against particular individuals only, and not the city or community as a whole, then such a noble and man of property will be required to pursue his claim before the judge of that city. If such a noble or man of property endeavors to initiate a suit against the whole city, or conversely the city against nobles and other men of property concerning a major act of might or a property right, such a case should follow lawful summons and be initiated and terminated by due process of law before the personal presence of the royal majesty. [2] And if either of the parties is defeated in the case against him in the course of the proceedings before the same personal presence, then if the case involves a property right, the party in question will be required to pay not the major fine, but only two hundred gold florins. [3] If, on the other hand, such a case is acknowledged to involve an act of invasion of noble houses or the arrest, beating, wounding, or slaying of a noble, the perpetrators of such acts of might shall be condemned to capital punishment and the loss of all their movable and immovable goods, as has been observed heretofore. [4] In a case where a burgher possesses vineyards or other [hereditary] properties belonging to any lord or noble in this kingdom, and he commits any offence in this territory or causes any damage to someone, in such a case the same burgher must stand trial before the lord from whom he holds the properties.

⁵⁸ The confirmation of the toll-free export of commodities from noble estates reflects the increased interest of landowners in entering the market with their dues in kind and the produce of the (gradually growing) home farms. This was probably connected to rising grain prices; see Zsigmond Pál Pach, “The Development of Feudal Rent in Hungary in the 15th Century”, Economic History Review, 2nd ser. XIX (1966) 1–14.

⁵⁹ See 1492:87.

⁶⁰ See András Kubinyi, “Die königlich-ungarischen Salzordnungen des mittelalters”, in Das Salz in der Rechts- und Handelsgeschichte. Internationaler Salzgeschichtskongreß 26. September bis 1. Oktober 1990, Hall in Tirol. Kongreßakten (Schwaz: Berenkamp, 1991). pp. 261–270. András Kubinyi, “Königliches Salzmonopol und die Städte des Königreichs Ungarn im mittelalter”, in Wilhelm Rausch (ed.), Stadt und Salz (Linz: Österreichischer Arbeitskreis für Stadtgeschichtsforschung, 1988). pp. 217–32. Now also: István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

39. Abolition of the privileges of the city of Visegrád

Then, that the liberty of the city of Visegrád and its appurtenances as well as of the appurtenances of Castle Damásd,⁶¹ are straightforwardly abolished as prejudicial to the liberty of the realm.⁶²

40. The free cities be retained in their liberties

Then, that the royal majesty shall deign to keep all the free cities and other well deserving persons in their ancient liberties. [1] Moreover the gentlemen of the realm humbly beseech His Majesty that inasmuch as His Majesty has confirmed the privileges of their liberties, so may he deign to keep them in those.

41. Payment of the ninth

Then, that the burghers of Buda, Székesfehérvár and Slankamen as well as any other cities of the king or anyone else who own vineyards or arable land on someone else's land shall be obliged to pay the ninth to the lords of the land, as contained in the decree.⁶³

42. Officers losing border castles

⁶¹ Ipolydamásd, a royal castle until 1523, was often governed together with the castellanship of Visegrád. The privilege mentioned here is unknown.

⁶² See 1492:102.

⁶³ See 1492:49.

Then, because there are many officers, who out of neglect or of insufficient maintenance lost several frontier forts and after such major losses, so harmful to this kingdom, they not only remain unpunished but even keep other castles for salary; [1] therefore, it has been decided that the royal majesty shall not pardon without the consent of the gentlemen of the realm those who on account of negligence or insufficient maintenance have lost or lose in the future frontier forts, but shall punish and chastise them according to the contents of the general decree.⁶⁴ [2] Those who have caused major damage to the kingdom by losing castles are these: in the time of the royal majesty, the late Ladislav Egervári, who lost Trzác and Neretva, Francis Haraszti who lost Vinac and George Popović, the castle of Komotin.⁶⁵

43. Inspection of border castles

Then, that every year the two justices royal, namely the lord palatine and the judge royal, shall send together with the royal bailiff their own men, who will swear according to the Rákos oath that they will tell the truth and report to the royal majesty without favor of persons, in order to inspect twice a year the condition and state of the border fortifications, the construction works, their guarding and upkeep, as well as the war machines, the siege engines and the victuals, and the paid soldiers who have to be deployed, the builders and craftsmen and they shall report faithfully to the royal majesty. [1] In such a manner that those who inspect the border fortifications shall make their visits at different times and not together and at the same time, but separately, so that the royal bailiff may not know when the men of the lords palatine and judge royal visit, neither should they know when he visits, so that they may not be corrupted by gifts and may report the more faithfully and at the same time it will be more easily detected if they cheat or lie. [2] If they or any one of them should keep quiet about some negligence or deficiencies in the border castles or the misdeeds of persons serving in them and, favoring some officers should not faithfully report them, they shall be convicted right away to capital punishment and all their properties shall devolve to the royal [right of] donation. [3] And the royal majesty shall pay their expenses.

44. The county of Temes

Then, that the ispán of Temes shall hold no other honor beyond the one county in which the castle of Timișoara is located. Nor should any other county of the kingdom be separated from the other counties of the realm. [1] And every county shall have its own ispán from the same county, someone from among the more substantial men. [2] Excepting the counties of Pest and Pilis, which usually have no ispán according to their ancient liberty.⁶⁶

⁶⁴ See 1495:33.

⁶⁵ Ladislav Egervári was an important magnate under King Matthias, then again ban of Croatia, Dalmatia and Slavonia 1489-1492, master of the treasury; Francis Haraszti (d. 1522) was ban of Severin 1480-90; Popović catellan of Komotin. All these castles were located in Bosnia, in the banate of Jajce and formed parts of the southern defense system of Hungary, which was gradually occupied by the Ottomans between 1492 and 1527. As far as one can judge, most of these accusations were connected with complicated inheritance issues and court intrigues.

⁶⁶ Cf. 1492:100.

45. After the heirless death of the king of Hungary no emissaries of princes shall be admitted to the diet

Then, it has been decided that if this kingdom should ever, because of the death without heir of the king of Hungary, happen to be without a royal dignity, then whenever it happens that the community of the gentlemen of the realm convene for the election of a new king, none of the foreign emissaries—who used often to turn up on behalf of kings and princes in order to seduce the lords and the community—shall be admitted to that assembly, so that appropriate care will be taken in respect of the new king. [1] The same gentlemen of the realm will take care that he whom they elect be honorably introduced.⁶⁷

46. Unfaithful officials

Then, should any nobleman and gentleman of the realm hold as an office from his lord some castles or fortifications⁶⁸ and his lord during his term of office incur for some crime the taint of infidelity, by reason of which the king or this country should seek by force or otherwise to recover these castles or fortifications, but he, wishing to fulfill his obligations to his honor, calling, and duty as a soldier, manfully and faithfully defending his lord's castles and fortifications, resists the king or the entire country and thus does harm and damage to the gentlemen of the realm, [1] then such an officer shall in no way incur the taint of infidelity, but shall be held to give full satisfaction to all for any damage done. [2] Should, however, such an officer join in service after his lord has been besmirched with the taint of infidelity and receive thus from him the honor of a castle or fortification, then, in this case, this article shall not in the least be regarded as exonerating him, but he shall be condemned to the same taint of infidelity.

47. Cumans, Jász, and Ruthenians

Then, because the Cumans, Jász, and Ruthenians living in this country by abducting the tenant peasants of nobles and extracting licenses, commit every day many injuries, damages, and unspeakable and unheard-of impositions against the liberty of the nobles and the laws of the kingdom through the abduction of these tenant peasants; and the officers of His Majesty and their deputies do not restrain them from these insolent deeds; [1] therefore, in order to completely eradicate the matter of such conflicts, it has been decided that just as none of the Cumans, Jász and Ruthenians are permitted to move to the estates of the nobles, so neither shall the tenant peasants of the nobles be abducted by the officers of His Majesty or the said persons of servile estate in order to settle in their midst. [2] Should, however, any of these officers or the said Cumans, Jász or Ruthenians take a tenant peasant into their midst in contravention of the present statute, they must respond at law before the palatine of the kingdom.⁶⁹

⁶⁷ The prohibition of foreign emissaries at election diets obviously refers to the situation in 1490, but their intermittent presence at diets is known for later as well.

⁶⁸ This one more place in a legislative documents, where the fact that many noblemen were retainers (familiares) of more powerful lords. See above, n. 11.

⁶⁹ The Cumans and Jász (Jazygi, in fact Alans) were settled in Hungary in the thirteenth century; see András Pálóczi Horváth, Pechenegs, Cumans, Iasians. Steppe Peoples in Medieval Hungary (Budapest: Corvina, 1989) and Nora Berend, At the Gates of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and 'Pagans' in medieval

48. Conflicts between nobles and Cumans, and Jász have to be reviewed

Then, considering that the royal majesty has expressed in years past his wish to put right the conflicts that have arisen between the nobles and the Cumans and Jász by reason of borders and other affairs, [1] the lords gentlemen of the realm therefore beseech His Majesty to deign to appoint some master protonotaries to put right those borders and conflicts.

49. Tithes

Then, that the tithe shall for ever more not be exacted in silver or money but in grain and wine as the land produces, according to the contents of the decree of the late Lord King Andrew.⁷⁰

50. The quarter of the tithes

Then, the archbishops, prelates of churches, chapters, convents, and abbots shall render to the parish priests (to those, namely, to whom it has pertained according to custom hitherto observed) the quarter of the tithe income and they shall not render it to those to whom it does not pertain. [1] And if any priest claims to have some right regarding the quarters, he shall pursue it at law.⁷¹

51. The manner of levying the tithe and of what things tithe is paid

When the time for tithing comes, the reeve of every village in which tithe should be collected, is obliged to report the time of tithing to the vice-archdeacon responsible, so that he may warn the tithe collector and indicate to him that he should come within twelve days for tithing. [1] Then, when he has arrived, he has to do the tithing justly within the days needed for it. [2] And every peasant is obliged to deliver the tithe due from him to the place designated in that village by the tithe collector. For his labor he may receive a tenth. [3] If, however, the tithe collector does not come within those twelve days, the reeve or judge of the place shall nonetheless do the tithing in the field and leave the tithe in the field at the tithe collector's risk. [4] If the tithe collector arrives later, then the judge or reeve of the place is obliged to have the tithe delivered by the individual peasants of the village in the aforesaid manner, in return for a tenth. [5] In such a way, however, that if the tithe collector can more easily agree with someone over the carriage of these tithes, then he shall be free to do so in this matter with whomsoever he wishes. [6] If the tithe collector, being absent, does not choose to believe the judge that he has tithed properly, he shall have the right to request an oath from him and thus be content with his words. [7] The tithe collector alone shall Hungary c. 1000-c. 1300 (Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 2001). The Ruthenians refer to settlers in the north-east of the country. These were semi-privileged groups analogous to Romanians, living under royally appointed headmen. They were obliged to furnish a set number of troops, and often abducted or enticed peasants to them to fulfill their military quotas.

⁷⁰ Cf. 1222: 20. The question of rendering the tithe in produce or money remained a contested issue throughout the middle Ages. See Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257, here 234–7.

⁷¹ A quarter of the tithe income was traditionally assigned to the parish priest, but this tended to decrease especially after the separation of the chapters from their bishop. Secular jurisdiction in matters of tithes had already become general in Hungary under Matthias. Cf. Ibid, p. 237.

select the haystacker and he shall live on his expenses.⁷² [8] The judge of the village, however, has to render the tithes to him.⁷³ [9] Because frequent discussions have emerged concerning which fruits of the earth are subject to tithes, in order thus to avoid such quarrels, it is agreed that tithes be collected throughout the whole kingdom of Hungary from these things: namely wheat, wine, rye, barley, oats and spelt, commonly called tönköly, and nothing else.⁷⁴

52. The Christians' and the harvesters' pence

Then, regarding the Christians' and the harvesters' pence⁷⁵ which were previously exacted quite unjustly, it has been decided: [1] because the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons should henceforth by reason of their tithes income maintain their troops needed for the defense of this realm, there are many peasants who, as they have neither vineyards nor such arable lands from which these lord prelates may receive the tithe, live in different places without any payment of tithes, and do not admit to the said prelates of the church that they are Christians, [2] therefore, in order to observe henceforth the proper arrangement between the prelates of churches and the faithful, it is decreed that from now on all peasants or tenant peasants of anyone whomsoever, who render tithe from either their wine or their wheat or grain in the diocese of whichever lord prelate and ecclesiastical person, have to pay neither the Christians' nor the harvesters' pence. [3] The harvesters, however, shall pay the tithe on that part that they receive for their labor, but only those who usually pay tithes of this sort, and not nobles.⁷⁶ [4] But they shall pay no Christians' or harvesters' pence; nor shall they dare to take away or remove their portions from the field until their portions are tithed together with the goods of the tenants subject to the tithe. [5] And those who pay no tithe from wine or grain, render as the Christians' pence only six pennies.

53. The cathedraticum income of the archdeacons

Then, because the archdeacons of churches usually exact the *cathedraticum*⁷⁷ from the parish priests in a thoroughly wrong way, [1] in order that such an evil abuse be abolished, it has been decided that henceforth no more than one florin should be exacted from these parish priests by ⁷² Cf. 1495:38. The reference is apparently to the helper of the tithe collector who overturned and examined the stooks.

⁷³ This changes the exemption from tithe of the village officers (cf. 1495:42).

⁷⁴ Cf. 1495: 37. Actually (as proven by Art. 54 below), animals were also tithed.

⁷⁵ Cf. 1495:43. This duty seems to have been exacted from landless peasants who did not pay the tithe. While it is rarely mentioned in the sources, in the late sixteenth century it was still collected, then at the rate of 6 pence per head. The tax is referred to in Kabos Kandra. Adatok az egri egyházmegye történelméhez. [Data for the history of the diocese of Eger] vol I. (Eger: Szolcsányi, 1885), pp. 392–3. What the “harvester’s pence”(identical with the former?) meant, is not known.

⁷⁶ The text is rather unclear, but it is possible that it refers to nobles who were engaged in wage labor.

⁷⁷ A certain sum of money to be contributed annually for the support of the bishop, as a mark of honor and in sign of subjection to the cathedral church.

way of the cathedraticum on churches which are called entire churches, and half a florin on every half church.

54. The tithe of lambs and bees

Then, because hitherto one lamb has been taken from every ten as tithe and for the other nine, two pennies each per head, it has been decided [1] that henceforth no more than one penny shall be paid for every lamb. And similarly for bees. [2] So that once this tithing is done, the tithe collector be held to take them away within the space of a month.

55. No secular property be obtained or bought by ecclesiastics, nor held in pledge and also that ecclesiastical goods be not usurped by laymen

Then, that no bishops and prelates of churches, nor any one of them, may or shall obtain in any way from the royal majesty lay properties or property rights for themselves and their churches, nor purchase or acquire [them] in perpetuity with their money or hold by title of pledge.[1] And in turn lord barons and laymen should not usurp church goods for themselves nor interfere with them in any way.

56. Ecclesiastics are not to hold two benefices

Then, that none of the lord bishops and prelates and other ecclesiastical persons shall hold, govern or enjoy two dignities or other ecclesiastical benefices, however small, [1] except only the presently appointed bishop of Bosnia,⁷⁸ who may hold two but no more ecclesiastical benefices because his income is low and he needs to keep certain border fortifications. [2] They shall be removed by his royal majesty from those who already in fact hold two or more benefices and granted to fitting persons before the next feast of St James,⁷⁹ except for the one they prefer to keep.

[3] Similarly, those who have assigned benefices, be they large or small, to people in the Roman curia, shall be held to release these within the course of a year from the time of these laws; otherwise they shall be seized by the royal majesty and granted to suitable persons, namely to persons of the realm and not to foreigners.

57. That ecclesiastics cannot hold the honors of counties

Then, that the royal majesty shall not give or grant, not even temporarily, the honor or office of a county to any bishop, prelate or other ecclesiastical person,⁸⁰ [1] but only to well deserving laymen, [2] descending from noble blood. [3] And an honor of this sort shall be granted and conferred by the royal majesty to those who have their personal residence in that county, [4] excepting the two counties, Pest and Pilis, which, by the privilege of their ancient liberties, customarily have no ispán, and they shall remain in this liberty. [5] The honor of any county previously given and granted in perpetuity or otherwise, shall be taken away by the royal majesty and conferred in the aforementioned way, [6] unless they have grants or privileges in this matter from the holy kings, the holders of which have to present them during the present assembly; otherwise they lose their force. [7] And these dignities have to be granted to laymen.

⁷⁸ Gabriel Polnár was bishop of Bosnia 1493–1501 and bishop of Srem in 1502.

⁷⁹ 25 July.

⁸⁰ Actually, the bishops of Veszprém and Esztergom already held the title of perpetual comes in Árpáadian times and some others were granted this title as well.

58. Clergy holding regular priories or abbacies

Then, because there are many clerks holding regular priories and abbacies who, wearing secular or lay habit, empty over many years the income of these churches; and then enriched, they get married, dishonoring their order, or become secular priests, and thus waste the goods of the churches, [1] therefore it has been decided that beribboned or other secular clergy or priests ought not to hold such regular priories and abbacies without monastic habit. [2] But they are held to, under the penalty of losing that benefice, take and wear within a year the habit of the given order.

59. Clerks in lay habit cannot hold ecclesiastical benefices

Then, no secular priest wearing lay habit and wishing to retain it shall be allowed to hold and govern church benefices, not even for a short time.⁸¹

60. That in lay matters no one shall be called to a court spiritual

Then, no priest or anyone else shall dare to cite anyone to a spiritual court in matters pertaining to secular courts.⁸² [1] But, if non-nobles are to be summoned, then they shall be lawfully pursued before the lord of the land, and, if nobles, then before the ispán or alispán and the noble magistrates of that county in which such summoned persons live.

61. That no one shall be forced to respond to judges spiritual in lay matters

Then, that judges spiritual should not force anyone under pain of excommunication or otherwise to respond before them in matters secular. [1] Otherwise, if someone, perchance by mistake, ignorance, or fear of punishment does respond, it shall have no validity. [2] And for the excommunication the man-price of the excommunicate is to be paid, because judges spiritual greatly burden the people of the realm by such impositions and wrongful excommunications of the church.

62. Judges spiritual cannot judge matters of property rights

Then, if any judge spiritual should cite any gentleman of the realm in cases of property rights, and, realizing that the case concerns property rights, proceeds further in the matter, [1] then he shall be convicted by the justices ordinary of the realm to the estimation of the given property right.

63. That presenters of complaints have to be captured

⁸¹ This article refers to non-consecrated priests, who often received benefices and even bishoprics, like such important persons as Ladislás Szalkai (bishop of Vác 1514–20, bishop of Eger 1520–24, archbishop of Esztergom 1524–26) see e.g. András Kubinyi “Szalkai László esztergomi érsek politikai szereplése” [Archbishop L. Sz.’s political career] in Idem, Főpapok, egyházi intézmények és vallásosság a középkori Magyarországon (Budapest: METEM, 1999), pp. 147–60.; or George Szatmári (bishop of Veszprém 1499–1501, bishop of Oradea 1501–1505, bishop of Pécs 1505–1521, archbishop of Esztergom 1522–1524, royal-secretary 1494–1499, secret chancellor 1499–1521, arch-chancellor 1521–1524.)

⁸² Cf. 15 April 1405:14, 1464:17, 1481:17, 1486:28.

Then, while it is well known that this kingdom has been privileged by grant of the venerable bishops, cardinal priests and deacons of the Holy Roman Church who were once present at the Council of Constance, [1] that no one may be taken to courts outside the country at the bidding of papal letters, unless some case came lawfully by appeal to the Apostolic See,⁸³ [2] yet there are many who in spite of these privileges vex and harass the people of the country, clerks as well as laymen, with complaints. [3] Therefore, it has been decided that, as contained in the decretum maius,⁸⁴ no one can be taken to court outside the country unless by way of appeal.[4] Those, however, who take their complaints abroad, be they priests, seculars or regulars, have to be arrested, handed over to His Majesty, and incarcerated in the Broken Tower⁸⁵ to suffer their punishment. [5] Because there are many who by privilege of the Apostolic See enjoy exemption from the judges spiritual in this country and thus cannot be sued here, complaints of this type or papal orders may therefore be brought against them. [6] Nevertheless, they cannot be sued abroad by force of these, except in the aforementioned way, by appeal.

64. The sealing fees of the church of Győr and the Abbey of Szentmártonhegy

Then, because it is said that in the church of Győr and in the Abbey of Szentmártonhegy⁸⁶ new sealing fees were devised and that they collected unjustly and wrongly twelve pennies for every pot or even cask of wine, but it is not clearly proven whether or not the bishop and the abbot of those churches have the right to these fees, [1] therefore, in order to remove any doubt it has been decided that both the bishop and the abbot of the said churches shall without any delay present at the next octave at Michaelmas the rights they have for these exactions, if they have any, after the inspection of which it will be decided what is just.

65. Contracts made between laymen and clergy are annulled⁸⁷

Then, it has been decided that should any gentleman of the realm have made or in the future make with the lord archbishops or prelates of churches, or any one of them, or other ecclesiastical person in this country any contract or other obligation of any sort regarding any goods or property rights whatsoever, and especially such that would escheat to the royal majesty, such contracts or obligations shall have no force or validity. [1] Moreover all letters issued and written in these matters at any place of authentication shall be invalid, even if royal consent had been obtained for them. [2] Excepting, however, that should perhaps any prelate have already given some money for ⁸³ See the 'Placetum regium', 6 April 1404; and, Elemér mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil und das königliche Patronatsrecht in Ungarn. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1959).

⁸⁴ Cf. 1492:45.

⁸⁵ An unfinished tower on the north-eastern part of the royal castle of Buda, built by King Sigismund after 1424, was called by the end of the fifteenth century the Broken Tower (Csonkatorony).

⁸⁶ Present-day Pannonhalma.

⁸⁷ In Tripartium. I:66 contractus is used exclusively for what is called fraternal adoption, and in all likelihood that is also meant here. The article may be aimed at Tamás Bakócz who had entered into many of these, gradually acquiring wealth through this route.

such goods, and it is well known that he gave money, then this money has to be returned, and, having been returned, these goods shall be free.

66. Parish priests shall not be confirmed against the will of their patrons

Then, that prelates of churches shall not dare to oblige parish priests to receive investiture or confirmation against the will of the patrons of the churches.

67. Lord prelates promoting youngsters and unsuitable persons to ecclesiastical benefices

There are furthermore many lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons, who, to the dishonor of the entire clerical estate, wastefully grant benefices not to suitable and well deserving persons but to young and ignorant ones, totally unsuited to these benefices, without the approval of the royal majesty; and granting title to them of benefices of this sort, they exhaust their income and use it for their own profit; and thus, because of these abuses, the divine service in the church of God is daily neglected. [1] Because, as the ancient liberty of this kingdom requires, the grant of any benefice in those churches of the country over which the royal majesty is deemed to have the right of patronage, pertains to His Majesty, [2] it has therefore been decided that henceforth the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons shall in those churches at the head of which they by the provision of the royal majesty stand, not grant any benefices that become vacant without the consent and agreement of the royal majesty. [3] The royal majesty shall withdraw those benefices that were granted without the royal majesty's approval to young, ignorant, and unlearned persons and grant them to suitable persons. [4] Henceforth, however, His Majesty shall deign to ensure that ecclesiastical benefices of this type (which are refreshing to souls) be granted as much as by his royal majesty as by ecclesiastical persons to whom he has given this right only to adult and deserving and not to young and ignorant persons, so that the divine service be performed the more assiduously in the churches subject to the Holy Crown of this realm.

68. Synods cannot be redeemed

Then, that the prelates of churches dare not, as some hitherto have done, avoid holding synods (which they are obliged to hold according to canonical prescription for the extirpation of sins in their churches and the moral development of the parish priests stationed in their dioceses) for money, or tax in any way the priests for not holding such synods; and none of the priests shall dare to buy themselves off from these synods in any way whatsoever.

69. That parish priests be not taxed and no ecclesiastical interdict be imposed on the community because of the priest

Then, because there are several prelates of churches who are frequently wont out of evil abuse to oppress the parish priests by the arbitrary imposition of taxes,

[1] the priests, then, moaning under this burden, are sometimes forced to plunder the chalices and other goods of their churches in order to redeem themselves by this from the burden of such taxes; meanwhile, compelled by poverty they are forced to desert their churches and escape elsewhere, and the lord prelates do not shrink from imposing an interdict of the church on the parishioners and thus to oppress them;⁸⁸ [2] it has therefore been decreed that the prelates of churches must henceforth never request or demand aid from the parish priests of their diocese, save once, for the redemption of their [papal] bulls, but that, too, in measure, more as a charitable than as a forced payment. Nor are they allowed to tax them in any way or to burden and harass their parishioners by interdict of the church. [3] And the parish priests shall so behave in their churches that the goods of the churches are not wasted by them.

70. That no one shall hold two offices save the palatine, the judge royal, and the ban of Dalmatia

Then, no baron or noble of the realm shall hold two honors or offices with the exception of the palatine, the judge royal, and the ban of the kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia according to the decree of the late Lord King Andrew.⁸⁹ [1] Except that, should at any time some necessity arise on account of which it is appropriate to grant two or even three honors or offices to one person, then His Majesty shall do so in no other way but with the counsel and consent of the lord prelates and barons.

71. Cases to be closed, sent to execution, and transmitted to the royal court without letters of command

Then, because there are many alispáns and noble magistrates in several counties who refuse to act in lawsuits opened or to be opened before them without a special mandate of His Majesty or, if they have passed a judgment, to ask for its proper execution or in the case of appeal to send it up to the royal court, [1] therefore, in order to spare expenses and labor for such litigants, it has been decided that henceforth ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates are held as in all else to render due justice in all cases concerning the county court to these litigants and to whatever party (observing the rule of law) without a special royal mandate; and, if there be no appeal, to ask for due execution or, if appeal be launched, to refer in the usual way to the royal court, [2] under pain of loss of office.

72. That no one dare to sell arms and victuals to the infidel

Then, that no frontier officers, merchants and traders, or any person of whatever estate and condition dare to sell or exchange arms, victuals, knives or any equipment whatsoever to the Turks or other infidels under the penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity.

⁸⁸ It had been a recurrent problem from the mid-fifteenth century that the higher clergy overburdened the parish priests by demanding ever increasing amount of dues such as the cathedraticum which gradually became a fixed sum that was raised without regard for the actual income of the parish or the duty to provide hospitality at times of visitations. See Elemér mályusz: Egyházi társadalom a középkori magyarországon. [Clerical society in medieval Hungary]. (Budapest : Akadémiai, 1971), p. 119.

⁸⁹ Cf. 1222:30. For the defense of the southern frontier several counties and other offices had been combined in one hand.

73. That no one dare to hinder those who flee from Turkey to this kingdom⁹⁰

Then, that henceforth none of the officers in charge of frontier castles nor any other person of whatever estate shall dare to impede or damage in any way in their persons or goods those who secretly escape from the rule or territory of the Turks to the borders of this kingdom, [1] under [pain of] perpetual taint of infidelity.

74. How dry tolls are to be treated

Then, because it is known to be ordered in the decree of the most serene prince, the late Lord King Louis, later confirmed by the late Lord King Matthias at his coronation,⁹¹ [1] that no unjust tolls should be collected from those who travel on dry land or sail up and down rivers, but only from those who cross by bridges and boats.[2] Since it cannot be ascertained without due investigation how and in what way tolls are raised at these tolling stations and by whom, and whether justly or unjustly, no final decision could be made in this matter. [3] Therefore, it has been decided that in those individual counties in which these tolls are collected, a few among the more respected nobles shall be elected who, under strict oath, shall make careful inquiry about the quantity of the tolls and the ways and means of their collection, and they shall prepare a true list of these and present under their own seals what is listed in it at the next general assembly before the royal majesty, the lord prelates and barons, and the other gentlemen of the realm. [4] Having inspected these, what is best done for the common good shall be arranged.

We, therefore, to whom it behooves by the office of government we have assumed to watch over the peaceful state of our said kingdom, being favorably disposed to the supplications of the said barons, lords, and nobles of our said kingdom as they are just and reasonable, do confirm as valid and lasting in perpetuity the aforementioned articles that concern the common weal, peaceful state and welfare of this kingdom of ours, accepting, approving, and ratifying the same articles and all that is contained within them. [1] We promise and commit ourselves to observe and cause others to observe inviolate all and every item specified in them, by the force of these presents [2] To the memory and lasting endurance of which we have directed that these present letters of privilege be issued, under our privy seal which we use as king of Hungary. [3] Given at Buda, on the fortieth day of the aforementioned diet in the one thousand four hundred and ninety-eighth year of the Lord, in the eighth year [of our reign] of the kingdoms of Hungary etc., and the twenty-eighth in Bohemia. [4] At the time when the venerable fathers in Christ, the lord archbishops Thomas of

⁹⁰ See Ferenc Szakály: “The Hungarian-Croatian Border Defense System and its Collapse.” in: János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982), pp. 159–178; Géza Pálffy, “The Origins and Development of the Border Defence System Against the Ottoman Empire in Hungary (Up to the Eighteenth Century),” in Géza Dávid and Pál Fodor, eds. Ottomans, Hungarians and Habsburgs in Central Europe: The Military Confines in the Era of Ottoman Conquest. (Boston: Brill, 2000), pp. 3–70.

⁹¹ See 1351:8, and 1464: 15.

Esztergom⁹² and Peter of Kalocsa⁹³; as well as the illustrious and most venerable bishops Ippolito d'Este of Aragonia, cardinal deacon of the Roman Church of the title of Santa Lucia in Silice, bishop of Eger⁹⁴; Oswald of Zagreb;⁹⁵ Ladislas Geréb of Transylvania⁹⁶; Dominic of Oradea;⁹⁷ Sigismund of Pécs⁹⁸; Francis of Győr;⁹⁹ John of Veszprém;¹⁰⁰ Lucas of Cenad;¹⁰¹ Nicholas Bátori of Vác¹⁰²; Anthony of Nitra;¹⁰³ Srem sede vacante; Gabriel of Bosnia;¹⁰⁴ Briccio of Knin;¹⁰⁵ Cristopher of Modrus;¹⁰⁶ and Michael of Senj¹⁰⁷. felicitously governed the churches of God. [5] Then the spectabilis and magnificus Stephen Szapolyai was palatine of the said kingdom of ours and perpetual ispán of Spiš¹⁰⁸; comes Peter Vingárti Geréb, our judge royal¹⁰⁹; Bartholomew Bélteki Drágfi, our voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely;¹¹⁰ George Kanizsai¹¹¹ ban of our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia; Peter Macskási Tárnok¹¹² and James Gerlistye¹¹³, bans of Severin;;Józsa Somi, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts

⁹² Bakócz, Thomas, bp. of Győr 1486–1493, bp. elect of Eger 1493–1497, abp. of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere.

⁹³ Váradi, Peter (d. 1501) archbishop of Kalocsa 1480-1501, secret chancellor 1479-84.

⁹⁴ d' Este of Aragon, Ippolito, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, archbishop. of Esztergom 486–1497, bishop of Eger 1497–1520.

⁹⁵ Tuz (of Lak), Oswald (b. 1436, d. 1499) bishoop of Zagreb 1466-99.

⁹⁶ Geréb (of Vingárd), Ladislas (d. 1502) bishop of Transylvania 1476-1501, archbishop of Kalocsa 1501-2, papal legate.

⁹⁷ Dominic (Kálmáncsehi), bishop of Oradea 1495–1501.

⁹⁸ Ernuszt (of Csáktornya), Sigismund (d. 1504) bishop of Pécs 147?-1504, chief treasurer.

⁹⁹ Szatmári, Francis, bishop of Győr 1495–1508.

¹⁰⁰ John Vitéz (Jr.) bishop of Veszprém 1489-99.

¹⁰¹ Szegedi Baratin, Lucas, bishop of Bosnia 1491–93, of Cenad 1493–1500, of Zagreb 1500-1510.

¹⁰² Bátori, Nicholas (d. 1506) bishop of Srem 1468-74, of Vác 1474-1506.

¹⁰³ Sánkfalvai, Anthony, bishop of Nitra 1492–1500.

¹⁰⁴ Gabriel (Polnar) bishop of Bosnia 1493–1501, bishop of Srem 1502.

¹⁰⁵ Briccio (Brizio) Brizio bishop iof Knin 1492 -5, later Bishop of Chersonissos (1483--89?)

¹⁰⁶ Christopher (of Ragusa), bishop of Modrus 1480–1500.

¹⁰⁷ Michael Natalicius, bishop of Senj 1495–1501.

¹⁰⁸ For Zapolya (a. k. a. Zápolya, Szapolyai), Imre see n. 76, above.

¹⁰⁹ Vingárti Geréb, Peter, judge royal 1495–1500, master of the doorkeepers 1491–95.

¹¹⁰ Bélteki Drágfi, Bartholomew, voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely 1494–98.

¹¹¹ Kanizsai George, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1497–98, 1508–10

¹¹² Macskási Tárnok, Peter, ban of Severin 1495-1501.

¹¹³ Gerlistye, James, ban of Severin 1495–1508.

of our kingdom;¹¹⁴ the master of the treasury's office being vacant; Nicholas Lindvai Bánfi, master of the doorkeepers;¹¹⁵; Emeric Perényi, master of the cellarers¹¹⁶; George Kanizsai¹¹⁷ master of the cellarers; Blaise Ráskai, master of the chamberlains¹¹⁸ John Csáktornyai Ernuszt, master of the horse;¹¹⁹ and many others held honors and offices of the realm.¹²⁰

Read by Master Adam.¹²¹

¹¹⁴ Somi, Józsa, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary 1494–1508.

¹¹⁵ Lindvai Bánfi, Nicholas, master of the cellarers 1464–67, ispán of Pozsony 1467–1478, master of the doorkeepers 1490–1500.

¹¹⁶ Perényi, Emeric, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewardss, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13.

¹¹⁷ Kanizsai, Stephen, master of the cellarers 1498–1505

¹¹⁸ Ráskai, Blaise, chief chamberlain, master of the treasury 1498–1518.

¹¹⁹ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, John, master of the horse 1493–1503, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1507–1510.

¹²⁰ The list of ecclesiastical and secular dignitaries was usually attached to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant to be witnesses, rather a kind of authentication of the date and the royal approval.

¹²¹ See n. 22.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF MAY 8, 1500

April 14—May 8: diet at Rákos Decree with 43 articles passed.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: Original 11-page parchment booklet with seal pendant, MNL OL DI 22534; a similarly sealed parchment booklet of 12 pages in the archives of the City of Prešov; a booklet without seal, in the public archives of the city of Košice No.801. A fragmentary one is also preserved in Košice.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 641-71 (Decretum quartum)

LIT: András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagiellonenzeit” in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 323-66; Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiełło Hungary” Central Europe 3 (2005), pp. 3–18; Idem, “Jagello Hungary,” in: DRMH IV, xi–xlvi.

Considering that several articles merely repeat previous legislation at great length, we have omitted the text of those and summarized their contents, if necessary, referring to the location of the full text in notes.

DECRETUM WLADISLAI II. QUARTUM DE ANNO 1500

Commissio propria domini regis.

Nos Wladislaus, dei gracia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex, necnon Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux ac Moravie et Lusacie marchio memorie commendamus tenore presencium significantes, quibus expedit universis, quod cum superioribus his diebus nobis hoc inclitum regnum Hungarie dei benignitate adipiscentibus illudque domi forisque ab omni hostilitate et inimica invasione tutum et tranquillum undique reddentibus, domini prelati et barones, ceterique proceres ac nobiles et universi regnicole nobis supplicassent, ut pro ulteriori quiete, commodo et utilitate huius regni regiminisque et status nostri felici incremento certas eciam constitutiones et decreta sanctire atque convulsam et dilaceratam, multumque diminutam illam veterem eorum libertatem eisdem innovare, restituere et graciose confirmare dignaremur, nos qui omni eo tempore, quo divina dispositione et auspicio regnum consecuti sumus, et in omnibus nostris actionibus cogitationibusque nullam magis precipuam curam gessimus gerimusque vel impresenciarum, quam quod hoc ipsum regnum et eiusdem incolas, subditos videlicet nostros fideles in tranquilla pace, sub bonis legibus, et unumquemque ordinem ac statum in antiqua sempiternaque libertate conservare possemus, eiuscemodi ipsorum petitionibus moti per hoc triennium in assecucionem huius rei pro singulo festo beati Georgii martiris singulam unam dietam et generalem omnium regnicolarum conventum in campo Rakws celebravimus, atque ad suplicationem tandem ipsorum dominorumⁱ baronum et procerum ac ceterorum nobilium certos eciam articulos, quos unanimiter concluderant, in formam cuiusdam decreti generalis redegimus. Verum quia nonnulli articuli propter temporis brevitatem et negociorum pluralitatem impedimenta in ipsis predictis dietis finiri et determinari et ad ipsum dec-retum inscribi non poterant, sed sic imperfecti et indecisi ad hanc dietam reiecti fu-erant, eam ob causam iidem articuli in presenti dieta festi beati Georgii martiris in pre-dicto campo Rakws in hunc, qui sequitur, modum conclusi et determinati extitere.

I. Imprimis quod articulus primus minoris decreti de congregacione regnicolarum intelligatur semel eciam in octavis vel brevibus iudiciis quomodolibet celebrandis.

Add.: Illis quoque, qui in gymnasiis et studio literalis sciencie preoccupati fuerint, clausula predicta modo simili semel et non pluries suffragari debebit.

II. Item super articulo secundo minoris decreti de celebracione octavarum et brevium iudiciorum limitatum et conclusum est: Quod singulis annis due octave magne et integre, beatorum scilicet Georgii martiris et Michaelis archangeli quadraginta diebus durantes iuxta contenta eiusdem decreti celebrentur. Brevia vero iudicia pro festivitibus beati Jacobi apostoli et Epiphaniarum domini hactenus celebrari solita de cetero cessent. Et illa eadem breviam iudicia super universis actibus potenciariis post obitum serenissimi principis condam domini Mathie regis etc. felicitis reminiscencie per quoscunque et quomodocunque illatis patratisque et commissis ac in futurum

ⁱ prelatorum desidertatur

quomodolibet committendis amodo imposterum successivis semper temporibus ad tricesimum secundum diem diei evocationis exhinc fiende computandum semper et continuo celebrari debeant iuxta consuetudinem alias in iudiciis observatam. Cause autem et evocationes ad preterita brevia iudicia festivitatum beati Jacobi apostoli et Epiphaniarum domini predictarum mote et de facto intentate in eisdem brevibus iudiciis, quorum celebratio vigesimo die festi beati Jacobi apostoli proxime venturi inchoabitur et deinde semper continuabitur, ante alias causas amodo deinceps movendas leventurⁱⁱ atque iudicentur.

III. Item quintus articulus de iudicialium distribucione, de qua hactenus non modica inter causantes contencio suborta fuerat, sic intelligendus est: Quod evocationes priores secundum formam eiusdem decreti posterioribus semper prius leventurⁱⁱⁱ atque iudicentur; ita videlicet, ut postquam cause aliquae levate exindeque communes inquisitiones vel literarum et literalium instrumentorum exhibiciones, ceterique huiusmodi causarum processus de iure subsecuti fuerint, extunc tales cause levate aut de facto adiudicate in octavis tunc proxime et immediate sequentibus ac affuturis terminoque brevium iudiciorum, ad quem scilicet reportatio seriei talismodi processus vel executionis fieri debet, rursus et iterum ante alias causas leventur et finaliter terminentur; quibus finitis et determinatis residue cause nondum levate secundum seriem registri tandem iudicentur.

IV. Item si quempiam regnicolarum literas evocatorias secundum data sua aliis priores habere, sed aliquibus negociis suis prepedientibus in prima aut secunda, sive tertia distribucionibus in octavis vel brevibus iudiciis fiendis non interesse contigerit, extunc magistri prothonotarii non obstantibus huiusmodi distribucionibus factis easdem causas vel literas evocatorias secundum data earundem in suo loco, priori scilicet aut medio, ubi decebit, semper locare et conscribi facere teneantur; et quod registrum in primis octavis aut termino brevium iudiciorum conscriptum usque ad exitum suum durare debeat. Nichilominus, si quis causancium in sequentibus octavis vel termino brevium iudiciorum signaturas aut literas iudiciales de novo facere voluerit, ut scilicet alteram partem per non venienciam aggravare, aut causam in superstitibus alicuius causantis medio tempore decedentis condescendi facere possit, liberam faciendi habet facultatem. Causa tamen ipsa loco alias in prioribus octavis aut brevibus iudiciis, in serie scilicet registri superinde conscripti denotato semper levare et adiudicari debet.

V. Item, quod copiam registri iurati assessores iudicio interesse debentes semper habeant et unicuique causanti registrum ipsum conspiceri volenti tam iidem assessores iurati, quam magistri prothonotarii ostendere teneantur.

VI. Item quod cause nobilium regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie partiumque Transsilvanensium in curiam regiam per viam appellacionis transmissae et deductae coram iudice eorum ordinario, domino scilicet comite^{iv} vel^v iudice curie regie maiestatis sic determinentur, ut

ⁱⁱ mendose: leventur

ⁱⁱⁱ mendose: elevantur

^{iv} desideratur: palatino

^v E, K: et

quolibet die octavarum vel brevium iudiciorum extra omnem seriem et ordinem registri una causa alternatim discuciat.

VII. Item si aliquae cause per iudices ordinarios regni magistrisque prothonotarios et ceteros sedis iudicarie assessores adiudicate ad interessenciam aut presenciam regie maiestatis per partem in causa succumbentem et convictam deducte prorogate fuerint, tunc tempore revisionis et discussionis huiusmodi causarum prefati iudices ordinarii, magistri prothonotarii et ceteri sedis iudicarie coassessores interesse poterunt, attamen ad ulteriorem et evidenciosem earundem causarum discussionem verba facere non valebunt.

VIII. Item quod quilibet dominorum prelatorum, baronum, iudicum ordinariorum regni, magistrorum prothonotariorum ceterorumque sedis iudicarie coassessorum, cuius scilicet causa levabitur, tempore discussionis eiuscemodi cause personaliter et ultra, si fuerit iudex ordinarius, cum magistro prothonotario vicegerenteque suis, reliqua eciam familia ceteri vero cum eorum comitiva et similiter familia de sede iudicaria exire teneantur. Et quod quilibet magistrorum prothonotariorum preter unum scribam iuratum in sedem iudicariam secum importare et cum eo in sedem locare^{vi} possit. Nichilominus et alios scribas in domum sedis iudicarie valeat introducere, sed non in medium ceterorum coassessorum computare, qui silencio per omni illic astare debebunt.

IX. In Transsylvania solummodo octave festi Epiphaniarum domini, in regno Sclavonie octave iuxta antiquam consuetudinem eorum celebrentur.

X. Item pro clariori explanacione articulorum secundi sextique et septimi minoris decreti sanctitum est, quod ultra illos sedecim iuratos assessores iudicio interesse debentes ex dominis prelatis quatuor et de dominis baronibus totidem iurisperiti et prudencia ceteris prepollentes per regiam maiestatem eligantur, qui in octavis magnis et integris omnes interesse debeant, in brevibus vero iudiciis peramplius continue celebrandis solummodo duodecim ex eisdem mutuatis et alternatis inter sese vicibus assedere teneantur. Illi itaque duodecim electi per integrum medium annum et residui similiter duodecim per alium medium annum in consilium regie maiestatis semper admitti et interesse debebunt. Qui stricta fide regie maiestati et universis dominis ac regnicolis iurare super eo tenebuntur, ut ipsi in eodem consilio omnia illa, que ad fidelitatem et incrementum regie maiestatis ac libertatem et commune bonum tocius regni cedere videbuntur, fideliter tractabunt. Et illi iidem iurati electi semper et continue Bude, alternatis modo pretacto vicibus interesse ac consuetudines et iura regni, que in iudiciis allegari consueverunt, explanare et conscribi facere, ad futurasque^{vii} convenciones regnicolarum generales iuxta seriem decreti celebrandas semper coram regia maiestate ac dominis prelatis et baronibus universitateque regnicolarum exhibere et presentare teneantur. Ubi si que earundem regie maiestati ac dominis prelatis et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis racionabiles et iusta videbuntur, acceptentur et approbentur. Si que autem irrationabiles et modo abusivo confecte et conscripta dinoscuntur, per regiam maiestatem ac dominos prelatos et barones universitatemque regnicolarum in melius reformatur. Quibus tandem per omnia explanatis conscriptisque et approbatis secundum easdem et eadem iudicentur.^{viii} De salariis autem eorundem iuratorum, de medio scilicet regnicolarum electorum iidem regnicole, de dominorum autem prelatorum et baronum similiter salariis ceteri domini prelati et barones providere tenebuntur. Illi vero sedecim iurati ex quatuor partibus regni per regiam maiestatem et universum regnum eligantur. Qui singulo tercio anno, in congregacionibus scilicet regnicolarum deinceps celebrandis alterari et mutari, officiaque^{ix} sua deponere debebunt; ita tamen ut si qui illorum regie maiestati ac dominis prelati et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis ad id idonei aptique et acceptabiles videbuntur, illi rursus eligi valeant. Quicumque autem eorum ultra ipsum triennium officium tale deponere voluerit, liberam deponendi habeat potestatis facultatem. Hoc declarato, quod si tempore medio aliquis eorum nutu divino ab hac luce decesserit, extunc regia maiestas cum ceteris electis et iuratis loco illius alium, qui videbitur, eligere valeat, non exspectata congregacione generali regnicolarum prenotata. Hoc quoque non pretermisso, quod si quempiam prescriptorum viginti quatuor electorum medio tempore, dum scilicet non sua series verteretur, ad octavas vel brevia iudicia, aut in curiam regiam advenire contigerit, semper in sedem iudiciariam et consilium regie maiestatis, in medium scilicet ceterorum suorum coassessorum et coniuratorum admitti et se locare valebit. Ceteri insuper domini prelati et barones alias in consilio regie maiestatis presidentes more alias consueto in consilium sue maiestatis prenotatum semper admittantur.

^{vi} A: locare – recte: alium non possit

^{vii} A, E: future quoque

^{viii} recte: iudicetur

XI. Item conclusum est, quod magistri prothonotarii universas literas adiudicatorias factum iurium possessionariorum, aliorum eciam notabilium negociorum tangentes post earum edicionem et conscripcionem in sedem iudiciariam importare, et ibi coram ceteris magistris prothonotariis et assessoribus perlegere, non intelligentibus autem vulgari sermone interpretare debeant, ne litere ipse aliter, quam sententia prolata fuisset, emanentur. Si vero in confeccione ipsarum literarum adiudicatoriarum adeo grandis labor inesset et occurreret, ut infra celebracionem octavarum litere ipse confici conscribique et expediri non possent, extunc magistri prothonotarii expiratis eisdem octavis expeditisque huiusmodi literis adiudicatoriis, coram predictis iuratis coassessoribus in consilio regie maiestatis iudiciisque interesse debentibus, magistris eciam prothonotariis, si qui intererunt, perlegere modoque pretacto interpretare teneantur; et si iuxta latam in ea sententiam scripte et emanate, ac per eosdem iuratos assessores admissae et approbate fuerint, ibidem in presencia eorundem iuratorum assessorum magistri prothonotarii sese subscribere scriptaque manuum suarum ad easdem literas apponere teneantur.

XII. Item quoniam per complecionem terminorum nonnulli regnicolarum, potissimum ex negligencia et inadvertencia procuratorum suorum crebro dampnificari solent et aggravari, pro eo statutum est, quod amodo imposterum magistri prothonotarii tempore distribucionis literarum iudicialium semper extradata earundem sic subscribere debent: Extradata, si tertia non est. Et ultra hec, si ex processibus seriebusque literarum huiusmodi causalium complecionem terminorum emanari debere compertum fuerit, extunc iidem magistri prothonotarii tales compleciones per fenestram alta et intelligibili voce publicare ac pronunciare, et si easdem nemo prohibuerit, tandem extradare teneantur. Prohibiciones vero facientes statim respondere debebunt.

XIII. Item articulus octavus de causis extra terminos octavarum et brevium iudiciorum per regiam maiestatem discutiendis sic limitatus et conclusus est, quod iam ammoniciones ipse super illis quinque casibus, puta verberacione, vulneracione, interempcione, indebita detencione et invasione domorum seu curie nobilium per literas regie maiestatis preceptorias iuxta contenta huius articuli fiende non iuxta loci distanciam, secundum scilicet magis et minus, sicut consueverant, sed semper ad tricesimum secundum diem diei ammonicionis exhinc per literas regie maiestatis preceptorias mediantibus literis exhibitoriis ad capitulum vel conventum sonantibus fiende computandum^x de cetero fieri debeant. Amodoque imposterum non personaliter, prout hactenus solitum erat, sed per procuratorem suum, si voluerit, quisque compareat; nichilominus tamen in premissis quinque casibus, si personaliter non venerit, procuratorem suum nunquam revocare valeat.

^{ix} A, E,: officia quoque

XIV. Preterea quod uxores quorumlibet nobilium viventibus earundem dominis et maritis ratione quorumcunque actuum potenciariorum, tam premissorum quinque casuum, quam aliorum quorumlibet nec in curiam regiam evocari, nec autem in presenciam regie maiestatis per literas suas preceptorias ammoneri possint; sed domini et mariti earundem super universis actibus potenciaris legitime requirantur, nisi bona illa et iura possessionaria, de quibus eiuscemodi actus potenciaris committuntur, aut de facto commissi sunt, uxores et non maritos concernant. Nam hoc casu tam uxores, quam mariti talium, si eciam ignobiles et impossessionati forent, et in curiam regiam evocari, et in presenciam regie maiestatis semper admoneri possint. Nichilominus mulieres ipse per procuratorem solito more, ipsum scilicet, si necessarium erit, revocando, respondere debebunt. Idem eciam est intelligendum de mulieribus viduatis, que defunctis ipsarum dominis et maritis heredes et superstites habere, sed illis in tenera etate constitutis bona aliqua vel iura possessionaria ipsorum heredum possidere dinoscuntur, de quibus tandem actus potenciaris committuntur. Tales quoque infra illud temporis spacium, quo heredes et superstites earundem in adultam pervenerint etatem, semper et ammoneri et evocari possunt; tamen, ut^{xii} prefertur, per procuratorem ipsarum more alias consueto respondere tenebuntur. Et quod articulus iste^{xiii} tantummodo de actibus potenciaris post edicionem decreti minoris commissis vel committendis intelligatur.

XV. Item super articulo quinquagesimo primo maioris^{xiii} decreti super revocacione procuratorum conclusum est, quod articulus ille solummodo de longis causis, in quibus processus iuridici subsequi solent, intelligatur, super quibus quidem causis per omnia eciam observetur. In causis autem brevibus, prout in insinuacionibus et huiusmodi, in quibus videlicet processus causarum nondum intervenerunt, quilibet causancium eciam post latam et pronunciatam sentenciam procuratorem suum revocare poterit. Ita quod ipsa die, qua sentenciam pronunciabitur, absque quolibet onere causam suam inhibere et procuratorem revocare, postea vero infra octavarum celebracionem, dempta dumtaxat extrema die ipsarum octavarum, et hoc quoque, si calumpniose vel fraudulenter agere pretenderet, semper cum minori onere, sex scilicet florenorum auri, demum autem octavis eisdem expiratis cum quinquaginta marcis gravis ponderis ducentos florenos auri facientibus procuratorem suum quilibet revocare possit. Propterea quoque deliberatum est, ut iudicarie deliberaciones, que in terminis brevium iudiciorum proxime preteritis celebratorum sub

^x A , E: computando

^{xi} mendose: ut tamen

^{xii} E, Ka: ipse

^{xiii} mendose: minoris

colore huius articuli contra plerosque causantes pronunciate fuerunt, viribus destitute habeantur, proindeque huiusmodi causantes procuratorem eorum revocandi causamque suam prosequendi^{xiv} habeant potestatis facultatem. Hoc tamen interiecto, quod si quipiam causancium cum adversa parte iam de facto concordassent, eiusmodi concordie iuxta tenorem literarum superinde emanatarum in suis vigoribus relinquuntur.

XVI. Item quod universe cause in facto dotaliciorum et rerum paraffernalium amodo deinceps quomodolibet movende in octavis vel brevibus iudiciis post ammonicionem et evocacionem exhinc factam primitus celebrandis et occurrentibus extra omnem seriem et registrum levare adiudicarique possint.

XVII. Quod universe litere impignoraticie vel inscripcionales tempore regum Sigismundi et Mathie emanate viribus destitute habeantur.

XVIII. Item quoniam plurimi regnicolarum tam in Hungarie, quam Croacie et Sclavonie regnis partibusque Transsilvanensibus bona et iura possessionaria possident, in quibus octave in uno et eodem termino sepe numero celebrari consueverunt, quapropter statutum est, quod si in huiusmodi octavis cuiuspiam talium regnicolarum adversus causantes iuramenta in uno ac eodem termino et hic et illic prestanda adiudicarentur, extunc, si quod illorum in termino ad id prefixo deponere non poterit, in onere et gravamine ex hinc subsecutis non convincantur, sed deposito uno eorundem valeat postea in alio termino iuxta loci distanciam deponere et reliquum. Et hoc eo modo, quod postquam iuramentum unum quis deposuerit, subito teneatur accedere iudicem suum ordinarium, qui pro depositione secundi iuramenti terminum competentem mediantibus literis exinde emanatis eidem prefigat, in quo etiam termino eiusmodi iuramentum deponat, altera parte superinde prius avizata.

XIX. Item ex quo in repulsionibus, utrum cum gentibus aut per^{xv} solam ostensionem gladii fieri debeant, varie contenciones et incomoditates emergi consueverunt, ad tollendum igitur omne dubium et evitandum causancium periculum sanctitum est, quod repulsiones ipse amodo de cetero non cum gentibus et manibus violentis, sed per nudatum solum ensem vel ostensionem evaginati gladii semel tantum et non pluries iuxta contenta maioris^{xvi} decreti sub pena ibidem denotata fieri valeant. Ita videlicet, quod si actor sive pars triumphans contra huiusmodi formam repulsionis violenter in iuribus possessionariis reobtentis se locaverit, extunc in amissione cause, hoc est illorum iurium possessionariorum reobtentorum convincatur et convici debeat eo facto. E converso vero, si pars in causa succumbens et convicta cum gentibus aut violenter contra partem triumphantem se opposuerit, et ipsam ab ingressu talium iurium possessionariorum reobtentorum repulerit, eadem pena condempnetur, salva insuper serie maioris^{xvii} decreti superinde stabiliti^{xviii} remanente. Hoc adiecto, quod pars convicta et repulsionem faciens a die reobtencionis huiusmodi

^{xiv} A: revocare causamque suam prosequi

^{xv} recte: et alie

^{xvi} A minoris

^{xvii} A minoris

^{xviii} rectius: stabilita

iurium possessionariorum nullam penitus taxam extraordinariam super eisdem iuribus possessionariis exigere valeat; sed iustis dumtaxat proventibus eorundem infra finalem cause decisionem sit contenta, ne perinde iura ipsa possessionaria desolentur; et quod in literis repulsoriis nomina vicinorum et commetaneorum, qui eiuscemodi repulsioni intererunt, amodo deinceps semper conscribantur, ne in ipsa repulsione fraus aliqua subsequatur.

XX. De occupationibus castrorum tempore Mathiæ regis.

XXI. Item super articulo sedecimo de equitibus armatis per regnicolas disponendis sana deliberacione regie maiestatis dominorumque prelatorum et baronum, ceterorum eciam regnicolarum prehabita conclusum est et determinatum, quod universi regnicole tam ecclesiastici, quam seculares, qui in serie minoris decreti inter dominos prelatos et barones ceterosque banderiatos ad exercituandum non fuere computati, demptis dumtaxat egregiis Johanne Bornemyza de Berzencze thesaurario, Petro Pogan de Cheeb, Johanne Podmanyczky de Podmanyn, Georgio More de Chwla, Marco Horwath de Kamychacz, Emerico et Martino Czobor de Czobor-Zenth-Myhal, Francisco Balassa de Gyarmath, Laurencio Bradach de Lodomercz, Francisco de Harazth et Osvaldo de Korlathkew, aulicis regie maiestatis, qui de bonis et possessionibus eorum gentes pro regni defensione per se modo infrascripto conservare debebunt, universa eorum bona possessionesque et iura possessionaria in medium nobilium non banderiatorum consequenterque illorum comitatum, in quibus eiuscemodi bona et possessiones habentur, connumerare computareque et pecunias in medium eorundem ad exercituandum de illis dare teneantur, nec quisquam illorum se de cetero e medio eorundem quovis quesito colore abstrahere et excipere presumat. Universa eciam bona et quelibet iura possessionaria quorumcunque dominorum banderiatorum erga manus nobilium banderia non habencium titulo pignoris existencia et habita inter bona eorundem nobilium ad sortem conservacionis gencium modo prenarrato computentur. Si qui autem regnicolarum reluctare et in contrarium premissorum quitquam facere attemptarent, extunc per comitem vel vicecomitem parochialem illius comitatus, ubi huiusmodi contrarium committeretur, tales reluctantes per omnia opportuna remedia et presertim birsagiacionem bonorum et iurium possessionariorum eorundem ad presentem constitucionem observandam artius compellantur. Casu autem, quo comes ipse ad hoc ipsum exequendum negligens fore vel forte contrarium eiuscemodi per semet ipsum inferre dinosceretur, tunc per universitatem et gentes nobilium eiusdem comitatus idem comes puniatur. Si vero talismodi reluctantes vel de facto dampnificati aliquem superinde in causam convenirent, ex tunc contra in causam attractum in facto calumpnie convincantur. Hoc non pretermisso, quod aulici regie maiestatis modo premissis^{xix} nominatim exempti gentes eorum sic conservabunt, ut dum et quandocunque bona et possessiones ceterorum regnicolarum pro ipsarum gencium conservacione dicabuntur, eotunc eciam bona et possessiones huiusmodi exemptorum per dicatores nobilium et comitatum dicentur et pecunie dicte exigantur, exacteque tandem manibus illorum tradantur, ne coloni regnicolarum ad bona illorum racione non exaccionis pecuniarum moraturi confluant; maxime autem, ut numerus gencium subticeri celarique et diminui non possit. Quiquidem exempti gentes eorum, dum in serviciis et legacionibus regie maiestatis extra regnum hoc preoccupati non fuerint, semper circa gentes nobilium et comitatum dare et cum eisdem, quo necessarium erit, mittere teneantur. Dum autem regia maiestas in persona propria se movebit, extunc non cum gentibus nobilium, sed cum sua maiestate gentes ipsas dare mittereque debebunt. Hoc eciam declarato, quod postquam tales exempti servicio regie maiestatis renunciaverint, et in curia sue maiestatis versari neglexerint, vel forte post decessum eorum heredes et posteritates talium ad ipsarum gencium conservacionem inepti et inhabiles videbuntur, exempcio prenotata illis suffragari minime possit. Et quod coci regie maiestatis in possessionibus Zakachy et Wyd vocatis commorantes modo simili exempti sint. Attamen nemo nobilium ad bona et iura possessionaria ipsorum cocorum aliquos jobagiones de cetero transmittere debet, neque ipsi coci ceteris nobilibus per contrarium aliquos ex eorum jobagionibus peramplius mittere tenebuntur.

^{xix} A pretacto

XXII. Conservacio gencium per dominos banderiatos pro fienda observetur secundum registrum condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis.

XXIII. Item, quod ad conservacionem sacre corone regni, dum necessarium opportunumque fuerit, semper de dominis secularibus duo fideles et non plures per regiam maiestatem et universos dominos prelatos et barones ceterosque regnicolas eligantur.

XXIV. Civitatibus liberis libertates serventur.

XXV. Equi de regno non educentur

XXVI. Item circa articulum vigesimum nonum super exaccione tricesimarum est additum, quod si qui tricesimatorum amodo in futurum aliquas tricesimas in locis ad tricesimarum exaccionem in decreto minori non specificatis exigere et extorquere quoquo modo attemptaverint, extunc si quid impedimenti tales tricesimatores in rebus vel personis eorum per quempiam incurrerint, vigore presentis statuti per omnia sufferre tolerareque debebunt. Vias nichilominus falsas tricesimatores more solito pro locis antiquis tricesimarum in decreto specificatis^{xx} stare custodireque possunt.

XXVII. Nona ab omnibus colonis exignatur

XXVIII. A comitatibus ville abstracte redeant

XXIX. Item articulus quadragesimus nonus de decimis, prout in decreto minori positus est, observandus relinquatur. Sed quia super connumeracione et solucione earundem decimarum plurime differencie inter spirituales et seculares personas hactenus habite fuerunt, propterea universis differenciis partes inter easdem exinde sedatis conclusum est, quod amodo in futurum temporibus semper successivis decime dominorum prelatorum et personarum ecclesiasticarum hoc modo solvantur: Quod primum domini terrestres tam de segetibus decimari solitis, quam eciam de vinis nonas eorum solitas exigant et quitquid a nonis residuum fuerit, de illis solummodo domini prelati et ecclesiastice persone decimas colligant, et quod decime vinorum non circa festum beati Martini episcopi et confessoris, prout hactenus plerisque in locis solebant, sed tempore vindemii^{xxi} colligantur, modo et ordine in decimacionibus segetum iuxta contenta eiusdem minoris decreti fieri solito per omnia semper observato. Hoc quoque adiuncto, quod illi, qui hactenus a solucionibus decimarum semper exempti fuerunt, prout sunt nobiles unius sessionis in eorum terris propriis et prediales certarum ecclesiarum, salvis tamen iuribus ipsarum ecclesiarum, Rutheni

^{xx} mendose: specificatorum

^{xxi} recte: vindemiae

quoque regie maiestatis in Nagh-Oroszfalu residentes, eciam de cetero ad solucionem decimarum non compellantur. Hoc tamen declarato, quod si ipsi Rutheni regie maiestatis aliqua predia^{xxii} pecuniaria solutione aut alio quovis quesito colore pro se usurpassent, de quibus videlicet per prius decime solute fuissent, ipsi quoque de illis decimas solvere teneantur.

XXX. Decimatores a colonis pullus ne exigant.

XXXI. Georgius electus Veszpriminsis duas dignitates tenere potest.

XXXII. Abbatiae secularibus non conferentur.

XXXIII. Cives in causis profanis ad iudicium spirituale non citentur

XXXIV. Fiscales ecclesiarum aboleantur.

XXXV. Vicarii Hungari sint.

XXXVI. Plebani in rebus secularibus non occupentur.

XXXVII. Litere ecclesie Jauriensis et abbacie Sancti Martini Sacri Montis Pannonie in sede iudiciaria regie producantur.

XXXVIII. Kathedratica in possessionibus et ecclesiis desolatis non exigantur.

XXXIX. Item quod redemptiones literarum adiudicatoriarum donacionaliumque et confirmacionalium fiant iuxta contenta decreti condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis. XL. De teloniis et eorum sublacione vel moderatione.

XLI. A theloniorum solutione exemptionem prætendentes privilegia producant, &c.

XLII. Item quod universi nobiles, de quorum nobilitate tributariis non constaret evidenter, a vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium illorum comitatum, in quibus resident,^{xxiii} literas super eorum vera nobilitate impetrent, et dum per tributarios contra formam illarum literarum tales nobiles ratione questuum^{xxiv} rerum suarum seu ceterorum quorumcunque negotiorum prepediti, vel per eosdem tributa fuerint exacta, extunc dominus tributi illius ad requisicionem talis nobilis tributarium, qui hoc ipsum attemptaverit, manibus comitis vel vicecomitis, ubi id contigerit, captum tradat et assignet de illatis satisfacturum. Si autem dominus ipse tributi id^{xxv} facere nollet aut non posset quovis modo, extunc idem dominus in centum florenis auri partim iudici et partim nobili leso persolvendis ordine iuris observato semper convincatur et convinci debeat eo facto.

XLIII. Item quod ceteri et reliqui omnes articuli in minori decreto specificati modo et ordine in eodem expressatis per omnia semper observentur.

Nos igitur prescriptos articulos de verbo ad verbum sine variacione mutacioneque^{xxvi} aliquali presentibus insertos, quia perfeccionem et complecionem premissarum aliarum constitucionum et decretorum nostrorum tangere dinoscebantur, acceptavimus, approbavimus, et ratificavimus,

^{xxii} A, E: add aut

^{xxiii} E: residerent

^{xxiv} Ka add aut

^{xxv} A hoc

^{xxvi} A immutacioneque

nosque eosdem et omnia in eisdem specificata inviolabiliter observare ac cum aliis observari facere promittimus et obligamus presentis scripti nostri patrocinio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes literas nostras privilegiales appensione secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, communitas duximus concedendas. Datum in campo Rakos prenarrato, quinto decimo die diei congregacionis nostre generalis prenotate, anno domini millesimo quingentesimo, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. decimo,^{xxvii} Bohemie vero tricesimo. Reverendissimis venerabilibusque in Christo patribus Thoma Strigoniensis, legato nato, summo et secretario cancellario nostro et Petro Colocensis ecclesiarum archiepiscopis, illustrissimo reverendissimoque Ippolito Esthensi de Aragonia, sancte Romane ecclesie diacono cardinali Agriensis, Luca Zagrabiensis, Ladislao Gereb Albensis Transsilvane, Dominico Waradiensis, Sigismundo Quinqueecclesiensis, Georgio electo Wesprimiensi, Francisco Jauriensi, Nicolao de Bathor Waciensi, altero Nicolao de Chaak electo Chanadiensi, Anthonio Nitriensi, Nicolao de Bochka electo Sirimiensi, Gabriele Boznensis et Briccio Thininiensi ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item spectabili et magnificis Petro Gereb de Wyngarth predicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino et iudice Comanorum, honore iudicatus curie nostre vacante, Petro comite de Bozyn et de Sancto Georgio wayvoda nostro Transsilvano et comite Siculorum, Joanne Corvino Oppavie et Lyphovie duce, necnon regnorum nostrorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie bano,^{xxviii} Petro Tharnok de Machkas et Jacobo de Gerlysthye Zewriniensibus banis, Josa de Som comite Themesiensi et generali capitaneo parcium regni nostri inferiorum, Blasio de Raska thavernicorum, Nicolao Banffy de Lyndwa ianitorum, Emerico de Peren dapiferorum, Stephano de Kanysa pincernarum et Johanne Ernusth de Chaakthornya agazonum nostrorum regalium magistris, Petro Pogan de Cheeb comite Psoniensi, aliisque quampluribus, comitatus regni nostri tenentibus et honores.

^{xxvii} Ka Hungarie anno decimo

^{xxviii} A, E: om

DECREE OF 8 MAY, 1500

On the personal order of the lord King.

We, Wladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria as well as duke of Silesia and Luxemburg and margrave of Moravia and Lusatia¹ commend to memory by these presents announcing to all to whom it may concern [1] that when in these past days, after having by divine mercy obtained this renowned kingdom of Hungary and having completely restored it to safety and peace at home and from all enemies and hostile attacks from abroad, the lord prelates, barons, other notables, and nobles as well as all other gentlemen of the realm² humbly requested us that we also deign, for the further peace, comfort, and welfare of that kingdom as well as for the happy increase of our reign and status, to sanction certain constitutions and decrees as well as renew, restore, and graciously confirm their shattered, torn, and very much reduced ancient liberty. [2] We, who all the time since placed by divine will and command at the royal summit had and have presently in all our deeds and thoughts no greater concern than to be able to keep this same kingdom and its inhabitants, our faithful subjects, in tranquil peace under good laws, in their ancient and perpetual liberty, each according to his estate, [3] moved by these humble requests of theirs, held, for achieving this matter, in three years at every feast of St George the Martyr a diet and general assembly of all gentlemen of the realm in the field of Rákos.³ Upon the humble request of the same lord prelates, barons, notables, and other nobles we issued certain articles that they unanimously composed in the form of a general decree. [4] However, because of the shortage of time, the great number of subject matters, and other obstacles it was not possible to complete and define some articles and have them included in that decree, but they have been transferred incomplete and undecided to this diet; for this reason these very articles were concluded and defined in the present diet on the feast of St George the Martyr in the said field of Rákos in the following way.

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. By 1490 none of them were under Hungarian control, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Notables (proceres) are frequently listed in laws, probably referring to great men not holding baronial offices. When legal documents refer to regnicolae (verbatim: inhabitants of the kingdom) the enfranchised nobles are meant. Our translation of “gentlemen of the realm” attempts to reflect that.

³ 23 April. The “Rákos field,” near to Pest (eastern part of today’s Budapest) became the regular meeting place of the numerous noble delegates to the diet; see János M. Bak and András Vadas, “Diets and Synods in Buda and Its Environs,” in: Balázs Nagy, Katalin Szende, András Vadas, eds. Medieval Buda in Context (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 322–44.

1. *That the rules of absence from diets*⁴ are to be also applied to the octave courts⁵

Adding: [2] The preceding clause shall also apply on one occasion and not more in respect of those who are engaged in schools and in the study of letters.

2. Then, on the second article of the decretum minus on the holding of octaves and short court sessions it has been defined and decreed that every year two major and full octave courts be held, at St George the Martyr and at Michaelmas, lasting forty days, according to that decree. [1] Short court sessions usually held at the feast of St James the Apostle and at the Lord's Epiphany shall cease henceforth.⁶ [2] And in respect of all acts of might⁷ done, committed, and perpetrated by whomever against whomsoever after the death of the most serene prince the late Lord King Matthias of blessed memory as well as those that may be committed in whatever way in the future, these same short court sessions shall be held continuously according to the custom heretofore observed in the courts henceforth and from now on always on the thirty-second day counted from the summons.⁸ [3] However, cases and summons moved and in fact intended for the former short court sessions of St James the Apostle and the Lord's Epiphany have to be raised and adjudicated before other cases opened later at the same short court sessions which will commence on the twentieth day of the coming St James, and which will continue always hereafter.

3. Then, the fifth article on the division of letters of fine, about which no little contention emerged among the parties, shall be understood thus: [1] That earlier summonses always have to be taken up and adjudicated before the later ones, according to the decree [2] in this way: once the case has been taken up and thereafter common inquests or the presentation of letters or written instruments and other such steps of procedure are lawfully completed, then such taken up or in fact adjudicated

⁴ See 1498:1.

⁵ See 1498:7.

⁶ St. George's is 23 April, St. James 25 July, Michaelmas 29 September and Epiphany 6 January.

⁷ "Act of might" (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, "criminal cases" falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between "major" and "minor" acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one.

⁸ Summons were of different kinds. Personal summons: when a nobleman was summoned on the spot for having disrupted the meeting of the diet or a trial; simple summons: delivered to the respondent at his noble residence, giving notice of a protracted lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, a terminal summons, issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party (used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might) would be issued. Here short (or final) summons (citatio brevis) are meant; a summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summon. Although the short summons was summarily abolished by Matthias, 25 January 1486:2, it apparently continued to be used.

lawsuits shall be taken up again and anew and finally decided before other cases at the next octaves immediately following and coming up and in the term of the short court sessions in which such lawsuits or executions shall be announced. [3] When these are completed and decided, the rest of the cases, not yet taken up, shall be judged according to the sequence of the register.

4. Then, if it happens that any of the gentlemen of the realm has letters of summons which are earlier than those of others by date, but, hindered because of his other affairs, he cannot be present at the octaves or the short court sessions at the first, second or third division, [1] then the master protonotaries⁹, regardless of such divisions, are held always to put and list these cases or letters of summons according to their dates in their place, namely in the front or in the middle, wherever it is appropriate. [2] And that the register written up in the first octave or short court session has to be valid until the end of the session. [3] Nevertheless, if any of the litigants wishes at a subsequent octave or short court session to have the entries [in the register] or letters of fine issued anew in order to be able to burden the other party because of non-appearance or have the case fail against the survivor of a party deceased in the meantime, then he shall have full right to do so. [4] Such a case, however, has always to be taken up and adjudicated in the place where it had been earlier listed at the previous octaves or short court sessions, namely in the sequence of the register that relates to it.

5. Then, that a copy of the register has to be always given to the sworn assessors attending the court. [1] And these sworn assessors as well as the master protonotaries have to show these registers to any litigant who so wishes.¹⁰

6. Then, that the lawsuits of nobles from Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia as well as from Transylvania transferred and moved to the royal court by way of appeal,¹¹ have to be settled before their justice ordinary, that is the lord judge royal, in such a way that on each day of every octave or short court session one case respectively has to be treated outside the sequence and order of the register.

7. Then, if a case adjudicated by the justices ordinary of the realm, the master protonotaries, and other assessors of the court is taken and moved by the defeated and convicted party to the royal presence [1] then the said judges, protonotaries, and assessors can be present. [2] However, they are not permitted to speak at the further and more detailed treatment of the suit.

8. Then, lord prelates, barons, justices ordinary of the realm, master protonotaries, and other assessors of the court of law, if one of their cases is taken up, are obliged at the time of its discussion to leave the court personally or, if a justice ordinary, with their master protonotary, their deputies and others of their retinue and others belonging to their retainers and household. [1] And no master protonotary can bring more than one sworn notary with him to the court of law and have him sit with him on the bench. [2] Nevertheless, he can bring with him other notaries into the building of the court but they cannot be counted among the other assessors [3] and they have to attend in silence all the time.

⁹ Protonotaries (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, "master in sentencing") were lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases. See: György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1971), also briefly Idem, "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary," East Central Europe/l'Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191.

¹⁰ Few of these registered survived and have not yet been studied in detail. However, the above articles are the most detailed descriptions of legal procedure in late medieval Hungary.

¹¹ On these see the Tripartitum III.1:3.

9. Changing 1498:2 on the holding of octaves: in Transylvania only the octave court of Epiphany is to be held and in Slavonia previous custom is to be reinstated.

10. Then, for a clearer explanation of the articles two, six, and seven of the decretum minus, it has been decided [1] that beyond those sixteen sworn assessors who have to be present at judgments, the royal majesty shall choose four of the lord prelates and the same number of the lord barons, experienced at law and excelling others in wisdom, who have to be present at the great and full octaves. [2] In the short court sessions, however, henceforth to be held continuously only twelve of them have to assist, changing and changing about among themselves. [3] These elected twelve have to be always admitted and present in the council of the royal majesty through the entire half year, and the other twelve during the other half of the year. [4] And they have to swear by strict oath to the royal majesty, all lords and the gentlemen of the realm, that they will treat faithfully in the council all that is thought to pertain to the loyalty to and enhancement of the royal majesty as well as the liberty and common weal of the entire kingdom. [5] And these same elected sworn men have always and continuously to be in Buda, alternating in the aforementioned way, and they have to explain and write up the customs and laws of the realm which are commonly alleged in court, and to show and present them at the future general convention of the gentlemen of the realm to be held according to the contents of the decree, always before the royal majesty, the lord prelates, barons and the community of the gentlemen of the realm.¹² [6] Then, when these appear to be reasonable and just to the royal majesty, the lord prelates, and barons as well as the other gentlemen of the realm, they shall be accepted and approved. But if any of them is recognized as being irrational or conceived and written down wrongly, then the royal majesty, the lord prelates, and barons, and the community of the gentlemen of the realm shall improve them for the better. [7] When finally all are explained, described, and approved, judgments shall be given according to them. [8] For the salaries of the sworn men chosen from among the gentlemen of the realm the same gentlemen of the realm have to provide; for [the salaries] of the lord prelates and barons, the other lord prelates and barons. [9] The sixteen sworn men shall be chosen by the royal majesty and the community of the realm from the four parts of the kingdom.¹³ [10] Every third year in the general congregation of the gentlemen of the realm held henceforth, they have to change, alter and resign from their offices; in such a way however, that those who appear suitable, capable, and pleasing to the royal majesty, the lord prelates and barons, and other gentlemen of the realm, may be reelected. [11] Whoever among them wishes to resign from his office after three years, shall have the right to resign. [12] Declaring this: if any of them in the meantime should by divine will leave this world, then the royal majesty with the other chosen and sworn men shall be able to choose in his place anyone who seems [suitable], not waiting for the aforesaid general assembly of the gentlemen of the realm. [13] Not bypassing also that should anyone of the said twenty-four elected men happen at a time when it is not his turn to come to octaves, short terms or the royal court, he may be admitted and seated at the bench of the royal council among his other co-assessors or sworn fellows. [14] Furthermore, other lord prelates and barons otherwise sitting in the council of the royal majesty are always to be admitted to the said council of the royal majesty, as is usual.

¹² Cf. 1498:6, these plans lead finally to the the Triparitum.

¹³ Though unusual, obviously the upper (northern), lower (southern) parts of the country and the central parts separated by the Danube are meant.

11. It has been decided that the master protonotaries should convey to the court all letters of judgments pertaining to property rights and also other notable affairs to the court of justice, once they have been issued and written out, and then read them out before the other master protonotaries and assessors; they shall explain them in the vernacular to those who do not understand, lest the letters are given out differently from the sentence passed. [1] Should, however, so much work be needed and necessary for the composition of these letters of judgment that they cannot be completed, written, and issued within the holding of the octaves, then the master protonotaries shall read them out and explain in the aforementioned way after the end of these octaves when the letters of judgment are completed before the said sworn assessors who have to be continuously present in the council and court of the royal majesty and the master protonotaries, if they are there.

[2] And then, when the judgment is passed, written, and issued as well as accepted and approved by the same sworn assessors, then the master protonotaries shall subscribe and append the writing of their hands to these same letters in the presence of the same sworn assessors.

12. Then, because many people frequently suffer harm and are burdened by the completion of the terms because of the negligence or inattention of their attorneys, [1] it has therefore been decided that from now on and in future the master protonotaries when handing out the letters of judgment, have to record the handing out with these words: “handed out provided there is no third party.”¹⁴

[2] And moreover: if it appears from the procedures and the text of such letters of judgment, that the completion of the term has to be decided then these master protonotaries have to announce and proclaim the completion through the window by loud and clear voice and if nobody opposes them, then hand them out. [3] Those objecting have to respond right away.

13. Then, the eighth article upon certain cases to be treated by the royal majesty outside the octaves and short court sessions was defined and concluded thus: [1] That already notices in those five cases, namely the beating, wounding, killing, illegal detention, and the invasion of houses or courts of nobles, [given] through royal letters of command and issued according to the contents of that article shall henceforth not be done according to the distance of the place (that is longer or shorter distance, as was usual) but always on the thirty-second day counting from the day the notice was issued, by royal letters of command through letters of exhibition addressed to a chapter or convent.¹⁵ [2] Henceforth and in the future anyone can appear not personally, as was usual hitherto, but, if he wishes, through his attorney. [3] Nevertheless, in the aforesaid five cases, if he does not appear personally, he can never recall his attorney.

¹⁴ The meaning is unclear. Since there is no known description of the details of court sessions, the procedures described here and above are too fragmentary to reconstruct.

¹⁵ The Latin twice has the needless word fiendae, which seems to be a Hungarism.

14. Furthermore, that wives of noblemen while their lords and husbands are alive cannot be summoned for any kind of act of might, be they the said five cases or any other ones, to the royal court or called to the presence of the royal majesty by his letters of command. Rather, their lords and husbands have to be sought out for any acts of might, unless the goods and property rights whence such an act of might was committed or *de facto*¹⁶ committed pertains to the wives and not the husbands. [1] For in that case, both the wives and their husbands (even if they are non-nobles and men without property) can always be summoned to the royal court and cited to the presence of the royal majesty. [2] Nevertheless, the women have to respond through attorneys, as usual, and if necessary recall them. [3] This should also be understood in respect of widowed women, who, after the demise of their lords and husbands, are known to have heirs and offspring, but of tender age, whose goods and property rights they hold, and from which these acts of might are committed; [4] these can be always warned and cited within the period before which their heirs and offspring reach adult age, but, as said, they are held to respond through attorneys, as otherwise. [5] This article is to be understood [as valid] for any act of might committed after the issue of the decretum minus or committed in the future.

15. Then, on the fifty-first article of the decretum maius regarding the recall of attorney it has been decided [1] that that article is to be understood only for protracted suits in which legal procedures are followed; in these suits it has to be always observed. [2] In the short lawsuits, just as in those with terminal summons, those namely where legal procedures were not introduced, either party can recall his attorney's statement, even after sentence is passed and announced. [3] So, that on the very day when the sentence is pronounced, he can halt his case and recall his attorney without any burden; if at a later date, providing it is within the octaves, except for the last day of the same octaves, and also should he allege that [the attorney] has acted frivolously or fraudulently, anyone can recall his attorney, and always with the minor fine, namely six gold florins; finally, however, once these same octaves are over, with fifty heavy marks equaling two hundred gold florins. [4] Therefore, it has also been decided, that judicial decisions which would have been pronounced in the short court sessions just passed on the basis of that article against several litigants be entirely without force. Henceforth all such litigants shall have full right to recall their attorney and prosecute their case. [5] Adding this: that should any litigant have in fact come to an agreement with his opponent, then such an agreement shall remain in force according to the letter issued about it.¹⁷

16. Then, that all cases concerning dower and paraphernalia moved from now on and henceforth have to be taken up and adjudicated regardless of the listing and order [of the cases] at the first held and due octave and short court session once notice and summons regarding it have been issued.

¹⁶ De facto may refer here to acts of might committed personally as opposed to those committed through retainers.

¹⁷ The preceding articles hint at the many ways in which court cases came to be interminable see Martyn Rady, "Justice Delayed? Litigation and Dispute Settlement in Fifteenth-Century Hungary," Central Europe 2 (2004), 3-14.

17. That letters of pledge issued by King Sigismund and Matthias to foreigners are considered invalid, unless their claim can otherwise be proven.

18. Then, because many gentlemen of the realm own goods and property rights in Hungary as well as in the kingdoms of Croatia and Slavonia or in Transylvania, where octaves are frequently held at the very same time, [1] it has therefore been decreed that if in such octaves any gentleman of the realm is judged to take an oath against his opponent at the same time here and there, and thus he cannot swear it at the fixed time, he shall not be burdened by any encumbrance or burden emerging from this. [2] But after having sworn one of them, he can swear later the other one as well at another term, according to the distance of the place. [3] And this in such a way that once someone has sworn one oath, he is bound to appear in front of his justice ordinary, who will assign a suitable term for taking the second oath through letters issued upon it; and he shall take the oath at that term after notifying the other party of it.

19. Then, because in the question of repulsio several disagreements and inconveniences have emerged,¹⁸ whether it has to be done with a crowd or by displaying a sword, [1] in order to remove any doubt and to avoid danger to the litigants, it has therefore been decided that such repulsiones henceforth and from now on may not be done with troops and a violent hand, but only by the display of a weapon or a brandished sword, and only once and not several times, according to the contents of the decretum maius under the penalty prescribed there;¹⁹ [2] in such a way that if the plaintiff or the winning party placed himself violently [in possession of] the recovered property rights disregarding such a kind of repulsio, then he shall be convicted and condemned right away to the loss of his case, that is the loss of the recovered property rights. [3] Conversely, if the losing and convicted party opposed the winning party with troops or violence, and stopped him from entering the recovered property rights, he shall suffer the same punishment, keeping, however, the sanctions contained in the decretum maius on this matter.²⁰ [4] Adding this: that the convicted party making repulsio cannot exact any special dues whatsoever from the property rights beginning from the day of the [his adversary's] recovery²¹ of the said property rights. [5] But he should be satisfied with the just income of these until the final decision of the case lest these property rights are wasted. [6] And, to avoid any fraud in such a repulsio, in the letters of repulsio the names of the neighbors and abutters shall be listed and henceforth always written up.

20. *Confirms 1498:10, on the occupation of castles and other property rights during the reign of King Matthias.*²²

¹⁸ Repulsio was an action by a party in physical possession of a property, which had been adjudged in court to another, by which he might impede the institution with ritual violence (with a drawn sword or similar weapon). This had the consequence of forcing the matter back into court for a retrial. Repulsio could only be performed once. Cf. also 1486:16 and the detailed explanation in the Tripartitum II 74, quoting, inter alia, this article.

¹⁹ Cf. 1492:57.

²⁰ See 1492: 57 § 1.

²¹ Recte: the loss of these rights!

²² See 1498:10.

21. Then, on article sixty regarding the armed cavalry to be supplied by the gentlemen of the realm, after sober deliberation by the royal majesty, the lord prelates and barons as well as the other gentlemen of the realm, it has been concluded and decided: [1] that all gentlemen of the realm, both ecclesiastical and lay, who in the text of the same decretum minus were not counted among the lord prelates, barons, and other banderial [lords] (except however the distinguished John Berzencei Bornemissza, treasurer,²³ Péter Csebi Pogány,²⁴ John Podmanini Podmaniczky, George Csulai Móré²⁵, Mark Kamicsáci Horváth²⁶, Emeric and Martin Czoborszentmihályi Czobor, Francis Gyarmati Balassa,²⁷ Lawrence Lodomerzi Bradács, Francis Haraszti²⁸ and Oswald Korlátkövi courtiers of the royal majesty,²⁹ who have to keep troops from their goods and property rights for the defense of the country in the way described below) have to have their goods, properties and property rights enumerated and calculated in the way of non-banderial [lords], namely in those counties where they have these goods and properties, and from these they are held in company with the same [the non-banderial lords] to give money for going to war. Nor should any one of them dare to remove or excuse themselves from them [the non-banderial lords] under any color. [2] Also, all goods and whatever property rights of any of the banderial lords, kept and held in the hands of non-banderial nobles by title of pledge have to be counted among the goods of the same nobles for the sake of keeping troops in the aforesaid way. [3] Should however any gentlemen of the realm attempt to oppose this and act contrary to the aforesaid, then they have to be strictly compelled by the county ispán or alispán of that county where such contrariness is committed by all possible means and particularly by fines on their goods and property rights to observe the present constitution. [4] In the event that the ispán be negligent doing this or perchance commit the contrariness himself, then he shall be punished by the community and the troops of the nobles of the same county. [5] Should, however, one of the resisting persons or, indeed, persons already punished go to court, then they shall be convicted of frivolous prosecution against the defendant. [6] This not to be left aside: that the courtiers of the royal majesty, exempted by name above, have to keep their troops so that when and whenever taxes are assessed on the goods and property rights of the other gentlemen of the realm for the keeping of their troops, then also the goods and property rights of the exempt persons be assessed by the assessors of the nobles and the counties and the assessed moneys are to be raised and those paid finally given into their hands, [7] lest tenant peasants flock to stay on their goods because of the non-payment of money, but, above

²³ Berzencei Bornemissza, John, treasurer 1500, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1514–26.

²⁴ Csebi Pogány, Péter, ispán of Pozsony 1495–1500, master of the doorkeepers 1500–1501.

²⁵ Csulai Móré, George, ban of Severin 1495–1501.

²⁶ Kamizácsi Horváth, Mark, magnate, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1506–08.

²⁷ Gyarmati Balassa, Francis, ban of Severin 1492, ban of Croatia 1504–05.

²⁸ Haraszti, Francis (d. 1522) ban of Severin 1480-90.

²⁹ Most of these persons—referred to as decempersone—were originally delegates of the lesser nobility into the royal council, but managed to rise into the group of barons and “banderial lords.” See András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagellonenzeit,” in: König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) p. 327-8.

all, lest the number of troops be concealed, hidden, and reduced. [8] Those who are exempt, have to set out their troops always—unless they are engaged in the service or embassy of the royal majesty outside the country—to the troops of the nobles and counties and send them, together with those, wherever they are needed. [9] When, however, the royal majesty personally goes to war, then they have to set out and send their troops not with the troops of the nobles but with His Majesty. [10] Adding also this: once these exempt persons have renounced service to the royal majesty and do not attend His Majesty’s court or, perchance, after their demise their heirs and descendants be inept or unable to keep these troops, then the aforesaid exemption shall in no ways favor them. [11] And that the cooks of the royal majesty living in the villages called Nagyszakácsi and Nemesvid,³⁰ are similarly exempted. [12] Nevertheless, none of the nobles ought henceforth to send any tenant peasant to their goods and property rights, nor, vice-versa, are these cooks henceforth allowed to send any of their tenant peasants to the nobles.

22. *That the prelates and lords keeping banderia have to serve according to the law of King Sigismund.*³¹

23. Then, for the keeping of the holy crown of the realm, whenever it is necessary and opportune, two, and not more, faithful men always from among the lay lords have to be chosen by the royal majesty and all the lord prelates, barons, and other gentlemen of the realm.³²

24. Confirms 1492:103 and 1498:33 on the privileges of free cities.

25. Confirms 1498:31 [2] prohibiting the export of horses.

26. Then, to the twenty-ninth article³³ on the exaction of the thirtieth it has been added [1] that henceforth and from now on, should any customs collector attempt to exact and demand the thirtieth in any way at places not listed in the decretum minus then these customs collectors must by the force of this statute suffer and tolerate any obstruction in their person or belongings done by anyone.[2] However, the customs collectors can block and guard illicit routes in the usual way in favor of the ancient places of thirtieth listed in the decree.

27. Extends the collection of the ninth of wine to all tenant peasants according to the article 1498:41.

28. *Adds to 1498:44 that properties transferred from one county to another be returned unless valid privileges on this can be presented before 25 July 1501.*³⁴

³⁰ The name of the village Szakácsi refers to the inhabitants’ function: szakács means ‘cook’ in Hungarian.

³¹ See: Propositions of c. 1432/33 and 1498: 15.

³² Cf. 1498:25.

³³ Cf. 1498:29.

³⁴ A diet was held in 1501, but no decree survived, see Norbert C. Tóth, “Az 1501. évi tolnai országgyűlés. Adatok a királyi adminisztráció működéséhez” [The diet of 1501 at Tolna: Data to the working of royal administration], Századok 143 (2009)

29. The forty-ninth article on the tithe is to be implemented as written in the decretum minus.³⁵ [1] However, because there were many disagreements between ecclesiastical and lay persons regarding the calculation and rendering of the tithe, it has been decided in order to allay all differences [2] that henceforth and from now on, for all time coming the tithe of the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons shall be rendered in the following way: first, lords of the land shall exact the usual ninth from the grains usually tithed as well as the vine and the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons shall collect the tithe only from what remains after the ninth.³⁶ [3] The tithe of the vine shall be collected not around Martinmas, as was usual in most places, but at the time of the grape harvest, in manner and order always observing the tithing of grain according to the contents of the same decretum minus. [4] Adding that those who were hitherto exempt from rendering the tithe (such as the nobles of one plot on their own land and the *prediales*³⁷ of certain churches—keeping the rights of these churches—as well as the Ruthenians of the royal majesty living in Rușii Munți)³⁸ are not to be forced to render the tithe in the future either. [5] Stating, however, that should these Ruthenians of the royal majesty usurp for themselves any deserted village either by purchase or on any sought pretext, from which the tithe was previously paid, they too have to render the tithe as well.

30. Adding to 1498:54, prohibiting tithe-collectors from demanding one chicken from every porta.

31. That George bishop elect of Veszprém,³⁹ secretary of the king, should be exceptionally permitted to hold two benefices for his faithful services.

32. Repeats and confirms 1498:58 on abbey to be taken away from secular priests.

33. The prohibition on courts spiritual treating matters secular (1498:60) is extended to the burghers of free cities.

34. Abolishes the office of fiscales ecclesiarum.⁴⁰

35. 1498:61 is augmented by a prohibition on employing foreigners as vicars in courts spiritual³⁵¹

36 That parish priests shall not be forced to perform secular duties such as tithe collection.

37. The term for the presentation of instruments by the bishop of Győr and the abbey of Szentmártonhegy is extended.⁴¹

³⁵ 1498: 49.

³⁶ Cf. 1495:44.

³⁷ Prædiales were conditional nobles who held land (prædium) under certain express terms from a lord, usually ecclesiastical ones (but also from lay lords in Slavonia). See Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 79-84.

³⁸ See 1498:47. The placename (in Hungarian Nagyoroszfalu) suggest their ethnicity.

³⁹ George Szatmári, bishop of Veszprém 1499–1501.

⁴⁰ Apparently a short-term innovation of church administration against which, together with other issues, Stephen Werbőczy penned a protest; quoted and reproduced in Vilmos Fraknói, Werbőczy István 1458–1541 (Budapest: Franklin, 1899), n. 50.

⁴¹ Cf. 1498:64.

38. *That no cathedraticum be collected from churches where the community was desolated by fire or plague, or its income diminished.*⁴²

39. That letters of judgment, donation and confirmation shall be taxed according to the decree of the late Lord Emperor and King Sigismund.⁴³

40. *That tolls should be investigated everywhere by selected and sworn men, who should inspect relevant privileges and report to the king and the royal council at the coming Michaelmas.*⁴⁴

41. That privileges of exemption from tolls and customs (except for the eight royal cities) have to be verified by the same selected men.

42. Then, that all nobles whose nobility is not obvious to the toll collectors have to obtain from the alispán and noble magistrates⁴⁵ of the county of their residence a letter on their nobility. [1] And if toll collectors hinder these noblemen in contravention of the content of such letters in their trade, belongings or any other matter or exacted tolls from them, then the owner of the toll has to arrest the toll collector who attempts such a thing, on the complaint of the nobleman, and hand him over to the ispán or alispán of the place where it happened, so that he may render satisfaction for what he has done. [2] And should the owner of the toll not want or be unable to do so, then this owner has to be convicted right away to a hundred golden florins, always observing legal procedure, to be paid in part to the judge and in part to the noble who has been harmed.

43. Then, that all remaining and other articles included in the decretum minus shall always be observed in the way and order specified there.

We therefore accept, approve, and ratify the articles above included in these presents word for word without any change or alteration because they are recognized as completing and perfecting our said other previous constitutions and decrees. [1] And we promise and oblige ourselves to inviolably observe and cause others to observe these and everything specified in them by the force of these presents. [2] To the memory and perpetual firmity of which we decided to issue these present letters of privilege, confirming them by appending our privy seal that we use as king of Hungary. [3] Given at the said field of Rákos on the fifteenth day of our said general assembly in the Year of the Lord 1500, the tenth year of our reign in Hungary and the thirteenth in Bohemia.

[4] At the time when the venerable fathers in Christ, the lord archbishops Thomas of Esztergom [papal] legate ex officio and our chief and privy secretary⁴⁶, Peter of Kalocsa⁴⁷, as well as the ⁴² Cf. 1498:53, on the measure of the cathedraticum.

⁴³ 8 March 1435:10–11, repeated several times thereafter.

⁴⁴ Cf. 1498:74.

⁴⁵ The noble magistrates (szolgabíró) were noblemen elected to assist the alispán—the actual administrator of the county—and also to represent their fellows. There were usually four in every county. The “letter of nobility” is not a known form of document.

⁴⁶ Bakócz, Thomas, bishop of Győr 1486–1493, bishop elect of Eger 1493–1497, archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere.

⁴⁷ Váradi, Peter (d. 1501) archbishop of Kalocsa 1480–1501, secret chancellor 1479–84.

illustrious and most venerable bishops Ippolito d'Este of Aragon cardinal deacon of the Church of Rome, of Eger;⁴⁸ Lucas of Zagreb;⁴⁹ Ladislav Geréb of Alba in Transylvania;⁵⁰ Dominic of Oradea;⁵¹ Sigismund of Pécs;⁵² George elect of Veszprém;⁵³ Francis of Győr;⁵⁴ Nicholas Bátori of Vác;⁵⁵ Nicholas Csáki elect of Cenad;⁵⁶ Nicholas Bocskai elect of Srem;⁵⁷ Gabriel of Bosnia⁵⁸; and Briccio of Knin⁵⁹ felicitously governed the churches of God. [5] Further, when the spectabiles and magnifici Peter Vingárti Geréb, palatine of our said kingdom of Hungary and judge of the Cumans;⁶⁰ the office of the judge royal being vacant; Peter Count of Bazin and Szentgyörgy, our voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely;⁶¹ Prince John Corvin, duke of Opava and Liptov, as well as ban of our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia;⁶² Peter Macskási Tárnok⁶³ and James Gerlistye⁶⁴, bans of Severin; Józsa Somi, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of our country;⁶⁵ Blaise Ráskai, master of the treasury⁶⁶ Nicholas Lindvai Bánfi, master of ⁴⁸ d' Este of Aragon, Ippolito, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, archbishop of Esztergom 486–1497, bishop of Eger 1497–1520.

⁴⁹ Szegedi Baratin, Lucas, bishop of Bosnia 1491–93, of Cenad 1493–1500, of Zagreb 1500-1510.

⁵⁰ Geréb (of Vingárd), Ladislav (d. 1502) bishop of Transylvania 1476-1501, archbishop of Kalocsa 1501-2, papal legate

⁵¹ Dominic (Kálmáncsehi), bishop of Oradea 1495–1501.

⁵² Csáktornyai Ernuszt, Sigismund, bishop of Pécs 1473–1505.

⁵³ Szatmári, George, Bishop of Veszprém, 1499—1502.

⁵⁴ Szatmári, Francis, bishop of Győr 1495–1508.

⁵⁵ Bátori, Nicholas (d. 1506) bishop of Srem 1468-74, of Vác 1474-1506.

⁵⁶ Csáki, Nicholas, bishop of Cenad 1500-1514.

⁵⁷ Bocskai, Nicholas, bishop elect of Srem 1500.

⁵⁸ Gabriel (Polnar) bishop of Bosnia 1493–1501, bishop of Srem 1502.

⁵⁹ Egervári, Briccio, bishop of Knin 1492–1523.

⁶⁰ Vingárti Geréb, Peter, master of the doorkeepers 1491–95, 1499-1503 count palatine.

⁶¹ Szengyörgyi and Bazini, Peter, voivode of Transylvania 1498–1510, judge royal 1502–17.

⁶² Corvin, John, natural son of King Matthias I (Corvinus), prince, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1494–97, 1499–1504

⁶³ Macskási Tárnok, Peter, ban of Severin 1495—1501.

⁶⁴ Gerlistye, James, ban of Severin 1495–1508.

⁶⁵ Somi, Józsa, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary 1494–1508

⁶⁶ Ráskai, Blaise, chief chamberlain, master of the treasury 1498–1518.

the doorkeepers;⁶⁷ Imre Perényi, master of the stewards;⁶⁸ Stephen Kanizsai, master of the cellarers⁶⁹ John Csáktornyai Ernuszt, master of the horse;⁷⁰ Peter Csebi Pogány, ispán of Pozsony,⁷¹ and many others held honors and offices of the realm.⁷²

⁶⁷ Lindvai Bánfi, Nicholas, master of the cellarers 1464–67, ispán of Pozsony 1467–1478, master of the doorkeepers 1490–1500

⁶⁸ Perényi, Emeric, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewardss, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13

⁶⁹ Kanizsai, Stephen, master of the cellarers 1498–1505

⁷⁰ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, John, master of the horse 1493–1503, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1507–1510.

⁷¹ Csebi Pogány, Péter, ispán of Pozsony 1495–1500, master of the doorkeepers 1500–1501

⁷² The list of spiritual and secular lords was appended to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant as witnesses, merely indicating the time of the issue by reference to the persons in office.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF MAY 8, 1504

April 24 (St George's)—May 8: diet at Rákos.

MSS: A parchment charter in booklet form of three leaves with seal pendant in the Hungarian National Archives (MNL OL DI 24781); a similar charter of three and a half leaves, its seal pendant lost, at the same depository, with the same shelf mark; a copy of four leaves, bound into the Codex Festeticus (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4355, ff. 251r–254v).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 671-91 (Decretum quintum,)

LIT: András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagiellonenzeit” in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 323-66; Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiello Hungary” Central Europe 3 (2005), pp. 3–18; Idem, “Jagello Hungary,” in: DRMH IV, xi–xlvi.

This decretum, as several others of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted all of them. For the omitted articles, we added, for information's sake, a kind of rubric (not in the original).

DECRETUM WLADISLAI II. REGIS QUINTUM DE ANNO 1504.

Nos Wladislaus, dei gracia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, necnon Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux, marchioque Moravie et Lusacie etc. memorie commendantes tenore presencium significamus, quibus expedit universis, quod cum nos post assumptionem ad huius regni et regie dignitatis culmen felicemque coronacionem nostram divina benignitate et dispositione factam inclitum hoc regnum nostrum Hungarie domi forisque ab omni hostilitate tutum tranquillumque reddidissemus, ac tandem ad humillimam fidelium nostrorum dominorum prelatorum et baronum ceterorumque regnicolarum nostrorum supplicacionem variis vicibus varias eciam constituciones et statuta pro felici statu et quiete ac libertate eiusdem regni nostri pro temporum necessitate et rerum condicione unacum eisdem edidissemus, quia nonnulli articuli ad complecionem et perfeccionem premissarum aliarum constitucionum nostrarum summe necessarie propter temporis brevitatem et negociorum pluralitatem hactenus finiri terminarique nequiverant, ad eorundem igitur explanacionem, ceterorum eciam dicti regni nostri Hungarie negociorum expedicionem, dum dietam seu convencionem generalem universis dominis prelatis et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis nostris pro hoc festo beati Georgii martiris proxime transacto ad campum Rakos vigore generalis decreti nostri indixissemus et ad eandem omnes convenissent, atque pro felici statu dicti regni nostri plurima ibidem nobiscum una tractassent, iidem domini barones, proceres et nobiles ceterique regnicole nostri inter ceteros eorum tractatus et conclusiones quosdam articulos de novo formatos et conceptos maiestati nostre obtulerunt, supplicantes humiliter, ut eosdem articulos ratos, gratos et acceptos habere ac pro communi bono et tranquillitate ipsius regni nostri regia nostra auctoritate approbare, ratificare et confirmare, confirmatosque observare et observari facere dignaremur. Quorum quidem articulorum series sequitur hoc modo:

I. Quoniam sepe numero fieri solet, quod regnicole de dietis et convencionibus eorum generalibus confuso fine discedunt, qui postquam ad propria remeabunt et sese separantur, alter alterius intencionem et propositum non perpendentes plerique dominorum et comitatum proprio motu aut aliorum suggestu, interdum eciam privato pro lucro contribucionem aliquam seu subsidium regie maiestati eorum de medio offerunt, quo considerato ceteri comitatus in se divisi huiusmodi oblacioni alii consenciant, alii vero contradicunt, et sic sedicione tumultuque ac dissensione inter eos suborta unus in alium diffamatorie tanquam libertatis regni turbatorem invehitur, quo fit, ut pax et concordia amorisque dileccio inter eos nusquam habetur, regia maiestas eciam tam multociens in eorum medium mittere solet, ut sepe lucrum seu fructum, quem exinde speraret, solis in expensis nuncii vel dicatores consumpant. Preterea bona et iura possessionaria illorum, qui regie maiestati ita faciendum consulunt, semper relaxantur, sicque non comodum et fructus maiestati sue, sed expensarum dumtaxat superflua posicio et regnicolis aperta manifesta que sedicio exinde reportatur. Ad extinguendum igitur et evellendum huiusmodi periculum conclusum imprimis est, quod si temporum in processu adeo gravis necessitas et periculum regno huic immineret, ut secus fieri non posset, nisi dieta generalis per regiam maiestatem ad campum Rakos, locum scilicet consuetum indiceretur, extunc si quid subsidii seu contribucionis ad evitandum et propellendum huiusmodi regni periculum regie maiestati illic offerretur aut prestaretur, communi omnium dominorum prelatorum, baronum ac ceterorum regni nobilium consensu offeratur et prestetur, nemoque post-ea se a solutione huiusmodi subsidii vel contributionis retrahere et precavere possit. Si quispiam vero comitatum motu proprio et non de consensu et voluntate totius regni, extra scilicet convenciones regnicolarum generales contributionem aliquam seu quodcunque subsidium preter solitum lucrum camere, contra scilicet antiquam regni libertatem regie maiestati quovis modo et quovis colore exquisito offeret aut prestaret, extunc universitas nobilium huiusmodi comitatus universaliter in pena fidefragii seu periurii amissioneque honoris et humanitatis convicta et condempnata, et a consorcio ceterorum nobilium regni relegata et segregata haberetur eo facto. Qui quidem nobiles sic condempnati in convencionibus regnicolarum iuxta eorum voluntatem tanquam periuriⁱ honoreque et humanitate privati ac a consorcio ipsorum segregati, tamⁱⁱ rebus et bonis, quam personis eorum puniriⁱⁱⁱ castigarique et condempnari^{iv} valeant atque possint, nisi forsitan aliqui ex nobilibus talis comitatus condempnati sese innocentes et immunes facto aut negotio in huiusmodi exitisse esseque testimonio credibili et documento evidenti ibidem comprobare et expurgare possint.

II. Item quod honores comitatum iuxta contenta decreti minoris fiant, hoc addito, quod quilibet comes principalis iuramentum iuxta formam decreti coram regia maiestate et assessoribus sedis iudicarie eiusdem, qui tunc aderunt, prestare teneatur. Si quispiam vero illorum iuramentum huiusmodi prestare quovis modo recusaverit, talis honore ipso destituatur. Et quod vicecomitem quilibet comes parochialis de numero et cetu verorum nobilium illius comitatus, cuius honore fungitur, eligat, quem^v absque consensu et voluntate nobilium ipsius comitatus eligere nusquam valeat neque possit. Hoc quoque declarato, quod nemo exterarum nacionum et aliorum quorumcunque extra hoc regnum agencium seu residencium honores comitatum de cetero tenere et gubernare possit; ab eisdem autem, qui haberent, regia maiestas auferendi et cui maluerit, conferendi habeat vigore presentis constitutionis facultatem.

III. Honores comitatum in perpetuum non conferantur.

IV. Item in quocunque negotio et qualibet iudiciaria deliberacione repulsio iuxta contenta decreti semel fieri possit. Secundario tamen quicunque repulsionem fecerit, in nota perpetue infidelitatis convincatur, directeque et equales due partes cunctorum bonorum et iurium possessionariorum talis convicti regie maiestati, et tertia pars actori vigore huiusmodi note infidelitatis simulcum proprietate in perpetuum hereditatem cedant, regiaque maiestas quoad porcionem actoris talibus condempnatis non aliter, nisi habita cum adversa parte superinde concordia gratiam facere possit.

ⁱ A1, A2 periurii

ⁱⁱ in desideratur

ⁱⁱⁱ A1 privari

^{iv} A2, F dampnari

^v tamen desideratur

V. Item turbatores communis inquisitionis et oculate revisionis in facto maioris potencie de cetero semper convincantur; ita tamen, si hostiliter vel aliquo evidenti alio modo turbaretur, ut communis inquisicio seu oculata ipsa revisio celebrari non posset.

VI. Occupaciones novæ in brevibus iusdiciis adjudicentur.

VII. Item quod universe cause in facto iurium possessionariorum impignoratorum deinceps movende eciam in sede iudiciaria quorumcunque comitatum usque ad numerum centum florenorum, sed non ultra libere adiudicari possint, sine tamen penis et gravaminibus in decreto superinde specificatis, que in curia solummodo regia imponi et adiudicari valebunt. Hoc quoque adiecto, quod si pars adversa causam suam per viam appellacionis in curiam regiam deducere voluerit, liberam deducendi habeat facultatem.

VIII. Preterea nove quoque occupaciones terrarum arabilium et pratorum ac silvarum usque ad numerum decem iugerum se extendencium et non magis, post obitum prefati condam domini Mathie regis quomodolibet et per quempiam facte vel fiende in dicta sede iudiciaria comitatum requiri et adiudicari similiter possint cum addicione seu condicione prenotata.

IX. Item si quicumque comitum vel vicecomitum in factis et causis quorumcunque nobilium amodo deinceps coram eisdem motis et adiudicatis, aut in presenciam eorundem per literas iudicum ordinariorum regni remissis execucionem aliquam officio eorundem^{vi} incumbentem legitime requisiti iuxta contenta decreti facere neglexerint, extunc tales comites vel vicecomites ad tricesimum secundum diem diei evocacionis exhinc fiende computandum in curiam regiam, in presenciam scilicet iudicum ordinariorum regni legitime evocari valeant, ibique extra omnem seriem registri causa huiusmodi levare et adiudicari possit. Ubi si iidem comites vel vicecomites negotio in ipso culpabiles comperti fuerint, in centum florenis auri, partim iudici et partim actori ac insuper in expensis et dampnis in prosecutione huiusmodi factis et perceptis eidem actori dumtaxat persolvendis convincantur et convicti habeantur eo facto.

X. Regia maiestas iuxta suam voluntatem de cunctis iuribus possessionariis ad ipsam devolvendis libere disponere possit.

XI. Item quicumque regnicolarum in quocunque negotio novum iudicium impetraverit, ac partem alteram^{vii} ab execucione literarum adiudicatoriarum qualitercunque prohibuerit,^{viii} et super execucione huiusmodi novi iudicii habita prohibicione infra terminum reportacionis seriei ipsius novi iudicii literas relatorias extrahere neglexerit, sicque partem alteram in execucione talismodi literarum adiudicatoriarum perturbaverit, talis in facto calumpnie condempnetur, actorque causam suam obtentam habeat et accione sua pociatur eo facto.

XII. Quoniam sunt nonnulli ecclesiarum prelati, qui plebanos ecclesiarum diocesibus eorum subiectarum nomine charitativi subsidii taxare solent, adeo, ut interdum et calices et alia ecclesiarum bona per eosdem plebanos necessitate adurgente diripiuntur; nonnulle eciam ipsarum ecclesiarum rectore longa per tempora vacant; propterea ordinatum est, quod amodo deinceps

^{vi} A1 eorum

^{vii} mendose exteram

^{viii} A1 inhibuerit

nullus omnino dominorum prelatorum infra quatuor integrorum annorum a die electionis et confirmationis sue computandorum spacia plebanos ecclesiarum suarum quovis modo taxare possit. Transacto vero ipsorum quatuor annorum spacio semel et nunquam amplius charitativum potius, quam coartativum subsidium, iuxta videlicet proventuum plebanorum exigendum ad redemptionem bulle sue ab eisdem plebanis pro se habere et exigere valeat atque possit. Si vero infra terminum dictorum quatuor annorum talis prelatus alio beneficio vel prelatura potietur, sequens prelatus itidem facere debet.

XIII. Quod in differentia inter universitatem nobilium Albensis, Simigiensis et Zaladiensis comitatum ab una, ac capitulum ecclesie Wesprimiensis ab alia partibus pretextu solutionis quartarum plebanorum iamdudum intentata in octavis post presentem dietam primitus celebrandis coram regia maiestate iudicibusque regni ordinariis iudicium ac iusticia ac finalis conclusio celebretur et administretur.

XIV. Item quod litere prorogatorie, quorumcunque regnicolarum, qui causa studii aut servicii seu peregrinationis extra regnum hoc occupabuntur, infra illud temporis spacium, quo abinde redibunt, si fassionem et constitutionem procuratoriam ita fecerint, vigore habeantur et in iudiciis locus eis detur.

XV. Item quoniam exhibicione quarundam literarum adjudicatoriarum contra vetustam huius regni consuetudinem quedam abusio introducta esse visa et comperta extitit, ut scilicet aliquis propriam responsionem suam in iudicio factam revocare posset et valeret, ob hoc deliberatum est, ut talis abusio de cetero cesset et nunquam admittatur; omnia quoque iudicia sub colore huius abusionis qualitercunque et in quibuscunque negociis facta nullius sint vigoris atque firmitatis.

XVI. Item ex quo articuli in maiori decreto super jobagionum abduccionibus et detencionibus conscripti inter se aperte contrariari videntur, aliasque plurima et indicibilia scandala in huiusmodi abduccionibus et detencionibus jobagionum ob exiguitatem pene in decreto superinde expressate per totum fere regnum Hungarie dietim emergunt, ad extinguendum igitur tale incomodum ordinatum est, quod amodo in posterum nemo jobagionem alterius, nisi per iudicem^{ix} nobilium illius comitatus, ubi jobagio ipse residet, licenciare valeat. Et quicumque huiusmodi jobagionem in aliquo excessu vel debito reum esse asserit, extunc infra quindecim dies accepte licencie coram eodem iudice nobilium per dominum terrestrem aut officialem seu iudicem illius possessionis, ubi jobagio talis residet, iudicium et iusticia administretur. Et si facta huiusmodi iudicii et iusticie administracione se idem colonus vel jobagio de excessu aut debito sibi obiecto expurgare seu exonerare poterit, extunc ibidem in presencia dicti iudicis nobilium ad locum, quem maluerit, libere dimittetur. Quicumque autem contra formam presentis articuli jobagionem aliquem abduxerit vel indebite retinuerit, in viginti quinque marcis gravis ponderis centum florenos auri facientibus, inter actorem ab una et comitem parochialem ac iudicem nobilium illius comitatus ab alia partibus equaliter dividendis convincatur eo facto; iidemque^x comes vel vicecomes et iudex nobilium de eisdem centum florenis sibi et parti adverse de bonis mobilibus talis violenti abductoris vel^{xi}

^{ix} F iudices

^x A1 idemque

^{xi} F et

retentoris, si reperiri poterint^{xii}, sin autem de iuribus possessionariis eiusdem, accepta tamen primum a iudice nobilium superinde mera rei veritate, statim satisfaciendi habeat potestatis facultatem. Turbatores vero talis iudicis nobilium tempore huiusmodi licenciacionis vel iudicii et iusticie impensionis, si qui fierent, eadem pena condempnentur, qua turbatores hominum regionum et testimoniorum capitularium seu conventualium in execucione, procedencium vigore decreti condempnari solent.

XVII. Item quod per totum regnum Hungarie una et eadem mensura ad emendum et vendendum^{xiii} fruges et blada atque vina formetur, cum qua ubique in regno Hungarie emptores et venditores utantur: precium tamen iuxta locorum habundanciam et caristiam rerum emendarum et vendendarum fiat.

XVIII. Ex quo plurimi colonorum et incolarum quorumcunque dominorum prelatorum et baronum ceterorumque regnicolarum derelictis et postpositis cunctis ferme vinearum et agrorum culturis soli venacioni et aucupio insistunt, adeo ut non modo feriatii, verum eciam dominicis et aliorum^{xiv} sanctorum festivitatum^{xv}, immo et ipsa sacratissima natalis dominice diebus venaciones exercent, per quam in deum precepti sui non observacione peccare et dominos eorum terrestres proventuum ipsorum sublacione defraudare non verentur; quin potius et soli ipsi hoc infructuoso labore capti mendicitati plerumque subiciuntur; nonnulli vero victu et amictu deficientes ad extremum furtum et rapinas committendas coguntur, sicque suspendio aut aliorum pravorum supplicio crebro intereunt^{xvi}; ut igitur huic incomoditati remedio debito occurratur, statutum est, quod amodo in posterum nemo colonorum et rusticorum huius regni venaciones cervorum, damularum, fasianorum et cesareorum vulgo chazarmadara nuncupatorum quovis modo et quavis arte exercere presumat, sed unusquisque illorum culture agrorum pratorumque et vinearum ac ceteris manualibus artificiis, unde et sibi ipsis et eorum dominis terrestribus fructum et comodum reportare possit, insudare ac intendere debeat sub pena solucionis trium florenorum per dominum terrestrem talis coloni, qui venacionem et aucupia exercet, aut per eum, in cuius territorio talis colonus deprehenderetur, irremissibiliter exigendorum. Si vero uterque illorum in exigenda huiusmodi pena negligens foret, seu favore illius coloni ductus penam ipsam exigere nollet, tunc per vicecomitem et iudicem nobilium talis comitatus, ubi id fieri contingit, eadem pena solucionis trium florenorum^{xvii} a nobili seu domino terrestri, qui scilicet colono venanti vel aucupanti pepercit, vigore presentis statuti irremissibiliter exigatur.

XIX. Nobiles vina educentes a civibus Cassoviensibus et Soproniensibus non molestantur.

XX. De literis inscripcionis super sex civitatibus et Lusacia.

XXI. De iuramento feudi a Moravis et Slesitis, necnon Lusaciae.

^{xii} A2, F poterunt

^{xiii} A1 add. per regiam maiestatem

^{xiv} A2, E aliis

^{xv} E festivitatus

^{xvi} mendose interibunf

^{xvii} A2, F om. trium florenorum

XXII. Civitates Sopron et Barthfa inscripta &c. redimantur.

XXIII. Quoniam propter indebitas decimas necnon excommunicationes et interdictorum impositiones per dominos prelatos et viros ecclesiasticos ac factores eorundem, crebro eciam per eos, quibus decimas ipsorum^{xviii} arendare solent, fiendas regnicole et eorundem coloni sepenumero gravantur, que ut de cetero fieri nequeant, statutum est, quod dum et quandocunque quispiam regnicolarum vel colonorum ipsorum pretexto huiusmodi indebitarum decimarum, excommunicationum et interdictorum gravatus fuerit, extunc ipsi domino prelato cuius diocesi subesse dinoscitur, vel alie persone ecclesiastice, cui videlicet decime solvi debent, si in domo sua aut alias in propinquo reperiri poterunt, sin autem factori eorundem seu in personis ipsorum constituto primum significare teneatur. Et si satisfacionem ac recompensam per eosdem de illatis habuerit, bene quidem, alioquin ad tricesimum secundum diem diei evocationis exhinc fiende computandum tales regie maiestatis, ubicunque constituta fuerit, per literas suas preceptorias et exhibitorias, regia maiestate vero absente, locumtenentis eiusdem evocentur in presenciam, ex parte quorum indilate iudicium et iusticia ibidem administretur. Ubi si nobilis vel colonus privata in persona indebite decimatus, excommunicatus vel interdicto molestatus extitisse compertus fuerit, in homagio talis nobilis seu coloni, si vero tota possessio seu coloni eodem modo gravati fuisse comperirentur, in centum florenis auri, partim iudici et partim actori persolvendis iidem domini prelati et eorundem factores atque dispensatores convincantur.

XXIV. Prælati banderiatu exercituare tenentur.

XXV. Quod citationes in foro ecclesiastico nonnisi cum expositione amodo in posterum decernantur. Et si ex huiusmodi expositione causa ipsa profana esse aut alias forum ecclesiasticum non concernere agnita fuerit, vicarii causam ipsam eorum presenciam nullatenus acceptent sub pena in minori decreto expressata.^{xix}

XXVI. Solent nonnulli dominorum prelatorum universos plebanos diocesibus ecclesiarum ipsorum subiectos ad id coartare, ut postquam ad plebaniam eliguntur, statim episcopo eorum se presentare ipsisque iuramentum prestare ac ab eis literas superinde habere et excipere teneantur, quod in manifestam perniciem nobilium vergit, cum a tempore sancti regis Stephani liberam semper pro se plebanos eligendi habuerunt facultatem. Ideo ordinatum est, ut de cetero nemo plebanorum ad hoc^{xx} teneatur, nec quisquam illorum invitis patronis confirmetur, nam aliter coloni illius possessionis, ubi id contingit, decimas prelato eorum reddere nullatenus presumant, sed in conservacionem castrorum finitimorum decime ipse convertantur.

XXVII. Preposituræ et abbaciæ religiosis conferantur.

XXVIII. Boves, equi et alia pecora gregatim aut aliter extra regnum per neminem quovis modo educantur.

XXIX. Teloniatore nobiles in teloniis molestantes in curiam regiam evocentur.

^{xviii} A1 eorum

^{xix} A1 specificata

^{xx} A1 hoc

XXX. Pro transimissionibus regnorum Dalmaciæ, Croaciæ, Sclavoniæ et Transsilvaniæ quatuor dies addantur.

XXXI. Postremo, quod regia maiestas omnia decreta sua et statuta in diversas partes hactenus posita in unam formam decreti iam redigi faciat.

Nos igitur, qui regnum nostrum prenotatum in tranquilla pace sempiternaque libertate semper tenere et gubernare cupimus, prescriptos articulos de verbo ad verbum sine variacione immutacioneque aliquali presentibus insertos, quia complecionem et perfeccionem aliarum, ut prefertur, constitutionum nostrarum, aliasque commune bonum dicti regni nostri tangere et concernere dinoscebantur, acceptavimus, approbavimus et ratificavimus, immo acceptamus, approbamus et ratificamus, nosque omnia in eisdem articulis specificata inviolabiliter observare et cum aliis observari facere promittimus et obligamus presentis scripti patrocinio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes literas nostras privilegiales appensione sigilli nostri secreti, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, communitas duximus concedendas. Datum in campo Rakos prenotato,^{xxi} quindecimo die diei generalis nostre congregacionis prenotate, anno domini millesimo quingentesimo quarto, regnorum nostrorum Hungarie etc, anno decimo quarto, Bohemie vero tricesimo quarto. Reverendissimis reverendisque in Christo patribus dominis Thoma tituli sancti Martini in montibus sancte Romane ecclesie presbitero cardinali Strigoniensis, summo et secretario cancellario nostro ac Gregorio de Frangapanibus Colocensis et Bachiensis ecclesiarum canonicè unitarum archiepiscopis, illustrissimo reverendissimoque domino Ipolito Estensi de Aragonia cardinali Agriensis, Luca Zagrabienis, Nicolao de Bachka Transsilvanensis, Georgio Waradiensis cancellario nostro, Sigismundo Quinqueecclesiensis, reverendissimo domino Petro tituli sancti Ciriaci in Thermis, dicte Romane ecclesie similiter presbitero cardinali Wesprimiensis, Francisci Jauriensis, Nicolao de Bathor Waciensis, altero Nicolao de Chak Chanadiensis, Sigismundo Thurzo Nitriensis, Stephano Sirimiensis et in iudiciis personalis presencie nostre locumtenente, Nicolao Keserew Boznensis et Briccio Tininiensis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias dei feliciter gubernantibus. Item spectabilibus et magnificis Emerico de Peren comite perpetuo comitatus Abawywariensis, regni nostri Hungarie predicti palatino et iudice Comanorum, comite Petro comite de Sancto Georgio et de Bozyn iudice curie nostre wayvodaque nostro Transsilvano et Siculorum comite, Johanne Corvino Liptovie duce, necnon^{xxii} regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie, Barnaba Belay et Jacobo Gerlysthe Zewreniensibus banis, Josa de Som comite Themesiensi et generali parcium regni nostri inferiorum capitaneo, Blasio de Raska tavernicorum, Moyse Bwzlay de Gergellaka ianitorum, Michaele de Palocz, pincernarum, Emerico Desy dapiferorum, Johanne Ernuth de Chaktornya agazonum, Gabriele de Peren et Johanne Podmaniczky cubiculariorum nostrorum regalium magistris, aliisque compluribus^{xxiii}, regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

^{xxi} A1, F prenarrate

^{xxii} A2, F ac

^{xxiii} recte: quampluribus.

DECREE OF 8 MAY 1504

We, Wladislas by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria as well as duke of Silesia and Luxemburg, margrave of Moravia and Lusatia¹, commend to memory by these presents announcing to all whom it may concern [1] that when we, after our introduction into this kingdom and to the peak of royal dignity and our felicitous coronation made by divine benevolence and disposition, restored this renowned Hungarian kingdom of ours to safety and peace from enemies at home and abroad, we did finally at the humble request of our lord prelates, barons and other gentlemen of the realm issue together with them in several turns a number of constitutions and statutes for the happy state and peace as well as liberty of that same kingdom of ours according to the needs of the time and the state of affairs; [2] as many articles could not be finalized before and the highly necessary improvement of the said other constitutions be carried to completion, because of the short time and the great weight of business, for their explanation, therefore, as also in order to expedite other affairs of our said kingdom of Hungary, we called a diet or general convention of all the lord prelates, barons and other gentlemen of our realm for the coming feast of St. George the Martyr² to the field of Rákos³ by the force of our general decree; at that all assembled and discussed there many things together with us concerning the happy state of our said kingdom, [and] the same lord barons, notables, nobles and other gentlemen of the realm⁴ brought before our majesty, among other of their discussions and conclusions, certain articles newly conceived and formulated, [3] humbly beseeching us to have these articles confirmed, granted and accepted and, for the common welfare and peace of this same kingdom of ours, to deign to approve, ratify, and confirm by our authority and, once confirmed, to observe them and have them observed The text of these articles follows thus:

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. By 1504 none of them were under Hungarian control, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² 24 April 1504.

³ On the location of “Rákos,” a field near Pest, see János M. Bak and András Vadas, “Diets and Synods in Buda and Its Environs,” in: Balázs Nagy, Katalin Szende, András Vadas, eds. Medieval Buda in Context (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 322-44.

⁴ The list of the members of political nation usually contains proceres, probably referring to the great men of the realm, not holding baronial offices and subsumes the wide stratum of nobles as regnicolae (verbatim: inhabitants of the realm). We translate the latter term as “gentlemen of the realm.”

1 Because it often happens that the gentlemen of the realm leave the diets and general assemblies of theirs with the outcome unclear, go back home and split up, with the one not considering the wish and opinion of the other, and a good many lords and counties, by their own decision or at the instigation of others, sometimes even for private gain, offer some tax or subsidy to the royal majesty by themselves, [1] in consideration of which other counties agree or disagree off their own back, and so in strife, confusion, and dispute the one inveighs against the other as a slanderer and disturber of the liberty of the realm, [2] hence, there is never peace, harmony, and friendly feeling among them, and the royal majesty has to send to them so often that the profit and income that might be hoped from them is used up entirely on the expenses of the emissaries or tax collectors.

[3] Moreover, the goods and property rights of those who counsel the royal majesty to act in this way are always made exempt, thus no benefit and income accrues to His Majesty but merely a needless waste of expenses and an open and manifest rupture within the gentlemen of the realm.

[4] In order to extinguish and root out this kind of danger, it has been first of all concluded that if in the course of time the country is threatened by sufficiently hard need and danger that cannot be averted except that a general diet is called by His Majesty at the field of Rákos, the usual location, then, when a subsidy or contribution is there granted and offered to the royal majesty, so as to avoid and cast aside such a danger to the realm, it has to be granted and offered by the common consent of the lord prelates, barons, and the other nobles of the realm; and no one afterwards shall be able to prevaricate about or keep back the payment of such a subsidy or contribution. [5] Should any county independently offer or grant the royal majesty any contribution or subsidy whatsoever (besides the usual chamber's profit⁵), without the consent and will of the entire country, that is outside the general assemblies of the gentlemen of the realm to the detriment, that is, of the ancient liberty of the realm, in whatever way and under whatever guise, then the community of the nobles of such a county shall be right away convicted and condemned collectively to the penalty of infidelity⁶ and perjury, the loss of honor and respect and they shall be regarded as excluded and expelled from the company of all the other nobles of the realm. [6] Nobles thus condemned may and can be freely punished, chastised and condemned in their belongings and goods as much as their persons in the assemblies of the gentlemen of the realm as perjurers, deprived of honor and standing and expelled from their midst, [7] unless by chance any one of the nobles of such a condemned county is able to prove by trustworthy testimony or authentic document and swear that he was and is innocent and not guilty in this business and matter.

⁵ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; by the late thirteenth century, it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages.

⁶ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

2. Then, that the honors of counties be handled according to the decretum minus,⁷ [1] adding this: that all the principal ispáns have to swear the oath in the form of the decree before the royal majesty and the assessors of his law court then present. [2] Should, however, any of them refuse in any way to swear the oath, he shall be deprived of his honor. [3] And that all county ispáns shall choose the alispán from the number and company of the nobles of that county the honor of which they hold [4] and must and shall never choose him without the consent and will of the nobility of the same county.⁸ [5] Declaring also that henceforth no one of a foreign nation or anyone busying or residing outside this kingdom be allowed to hold and administer the honors of counties. [6] The royal majesty shall have the right by the force of the present decree to take them away from those who now hold them and grant them to whomsoever he wishes.

3. *That no comital office be granted in perpetuity.*⁹

4. That a repulsio in any matter or legal decision whatsoever can be done, according to the contents of the decree, only once.¹⁰ [1] Whoever does repulsio a second time shall be straightway convicted of the taint of perpetual infidelity, and two equal portions of all the goods and property rights of such a convicted person shall go to the royal majesty and one part, as everlasting property, to the plaintiff on the grounds of this taint of infidelity. [2] And the royal majesty must not grant pardon regarding the portion of the condemned party unless an agreement has been made with the opposing party.

5. Then, those disturbing common inquests or views in matters of major acts of might [1] in such a way that the common inquest or view cannot be held because it is disturbed in a belligerent or similarly evident fashion, must henceforth always be convicted.

6. *Seizures subsequent to the death of King Matthias have to be judged at short judicial terms.*¹¹

⁷ See 1495:44.

⁸ The vicecomes (alispán) was in most cases the actual administrator of the county, his superior, the comes/ispán frequently holding several offices in court or in counties. He was usually a retainer (familiaris) of the ispán, but ever more often also “elected” by the county’s nobles.

⁹ The prohibition on granting counties in perpetuity goes back as far as the Golden Bull (1222:16). Nevertheless, some prelates were granted this title and office already in Árpádian times and secular lords ever more frequently in the later Middle Ages.

¹⁰ Repulsio was an action by a party in physical possession of a property, which had been adjudged in court to another, by which he might impede the institution with ritual violence (with a drawn sword or similar weapon). This had the consequence of forcing the matter back into court for a retrial..See 1492:57 and 1500:19 and Tripartitum II, 73.

¹¹ In contrast to simple summons that could be repeated twice, short (or final) summons (citatio brevis) was a summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term, q.v.), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione) issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might. See 1498:10.

7. That henceforth all cases to be moved in matters of pledged property rights up to the value of one hundred florins, but not more, can also be judged in the county courts, without, however, the penalties and fines specified in the decree,¹² which can only be imposed and assigned in the royal courts. Adding this: that if the adversary party wishes to take his case to the royal court by appeal, he shall have the right to do so.

8. Moreover, recent seizures of arable lands, meadows and woodlands up to ten plows and not more done by anyone since the demise of the late Lord King Matthias or hereafter, can similarly be brought to and adjudicated in the county courts under the aforementioned terms and conditions.

9. Should any of the ispáns or alispáns in the cases and suits of any noblemen moved and adjudicated before them or sent back to them by the judges ordinary of the realm, fail to perform any execution pertaining to their office upon lawful request according to the contents of the decree, [1] then, such ispáns or alispáns shall be summoned to the royal court to the presence of the judges ordinary of the realm to the thirty-second day, counted from the day of the issue of the summons in this matter; and this case shall be taken up and adjudicated there outside the sequence of the listing.¹³ [2] Should these ispáns or alispáns be found guilty in the matter, they shall be convicted and treated as convicted right away of a hundred florins, a part to the judge, a part to the plaintiff, as well as of the expenses caused and damages done to the plaintiff.

10. *Confirms the king's unlimited right of donation to Hungarians.*¹⁴

11. Then, if any gentleman of the realm has obtained a new trial in any matter and has prohibited the opposing party from executing any letter of judgment, but then, after that prohibition fails to take out the letters of report in respect of the execution of the new trial within the time for report of the procedure of a new trial and so obstructs the other party in the execution of the letters of judgment, such a person shall be condemned of frivolous prosecution and the plaintiff shall win his case and have possession of his claim right away.¹⁵

12. Because there are many prelates of churches who keep taxing the parish priests of their diocese under the title of charitable relief to the extent that these parish priests are forced by urgent need to pillage the chalices and other church goods, several churches remaining for long times empty without leaders, [1] it has therefore been decided that henceforth and from now on no lord prelate shall have the right to tax the parish priests of his churches in any way for four full years from the day of his election and confirmation. [2] After those four years, he shall have the right to have and

¹² See 1492:65.

¹³ The article seems to refer to treating cases preferentially, but nothing is known about the "listing."

¹⁴ Cf. 1492:9, 1495:2, 30, and 1498:26.

¹⁵ A new trial (novum iudicium) or retrial, was usually following a petition to the king, a repulsio (see n. 10 above), or a prohibition (protest against a legal action such as alienation, acquisition, donation of some property, paying of filial quartaer and dower, etc.), before, during or after its execution, made always by a third party or a the collapse of the first trial. Failure of the case can happen on a variety of grounds: following the recall of an attorney; the inability of the defendant to attend the trial on grounds which were subsequently found to excuse his absence; misjoining a suit; and having the summons improperly cast or delivered.

collect once and no more a charitable rather than forced relief from these parish priests for the redemption of his bull according to the extent of the income of the parish priests. [3] Should a prelate during the said four years obtain another benefice or prelacy, his successor has to do the same.¹⁶

13. That in the long lasting dispute between the community of the nobles of counties Fejér, Somogy and Zemplén on the one side and the chapter of the bishopric of Veszprém on the other, regarding the quarter to be paid to the parish priests,¹⁷ justice and judgment with final conclusion shall be made and rendered at the next octave before the royal majesty and the justices ordinary of the realm.

14. Then that letters of attorney¹⁸ of those gentlemen of the realm who are engaged outside the country in study, service or travel shall remain valid and be admitted in court until they return home, providing they have made a recognizance and duly appointed an attorney.

15. Because it has been seen and discovered that, against the ancient custom of this realm, a certain abuse has been introduced in the issuing of certain letters of judgment, namely that anyone was able and allowed to revoke his own response made in court,¹⁹ [1] it has therefore been decided that such an abuse has to stop henceforth and never be allowed; [2] all those judgments that were passed in whatever way and whatever case under color of this abuse shall lose their force and validity.

16. Then, because the articles of the decretum maius on the abduction and holding back of tenant peasants seem to plainly contradict themselves, and due to the small penalty expressed in that decree, many unspeakable scandals occur daily in almost all of Hungary in respect of the abduction and holding back of tenant peasants,²⁰ [1] in order to eliminate this problem, it has been ordered that henceforth and from now on no one shall have the right to give leave to someone else's tenant

¹⁶ Cf. 1498:69.

¹⁷ Cf. 1498:50. In this case the county nobles seem to have acted on behalf of the priests of their county. Lower clergy did not attend the diets in the kingdom of Hungary, where there was no "clerical estate" as in many other countries. However, churchmen—archbishops and bishops—were present in the royal council, referred to as prelati et barones.

¹⁸ A letter of attorney or of advocacy (littere procuratorie) was issued by a place of authentication (chapters or convents acting in a notarial manner), listing one or more persons as legal representatives or attorneys (usually practical lawyers, training in the court, not at universities) of someone, empowering them to act in all stages of litigation. Prelates and barons had the right to issue such letters under their own seal.

¹⁹ The article aims at prohibiting litigants from retracting their own statements, although the revocation of an attorney's statements was apparently still allowed. See Tripartitum II 79.

²⁰ The right of tenant peasants (jobagiones) to free movement from one lord to another was in many cases rather the "right" of more powerful landowners to transfer labour force from the less fortunate noblemen, frequently able to offer them better conditions. On this see briefly, János M. Bak, "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005). Such diatal decisions were passed in the interest of the lesser nobility. See also 1492:94.

peasant, except through the noble magistrate²¹ of that county in which the tenant peasant lives. [2] And if anyone asserts that such a tenant peasant is guilty of some trespass or debt, then the lord or his officer has to administer justice and judgment within fifteen days after that tenant peasant receives his leave, before the noble magistrate of that county where the tenant peasant lives.[3] And if, with justice and judgment done, the countryman or peasant can clear and exonerate himself of the alleged trespass or debt, then he shall be freely sent to the place which he prefers in the presence of the said noble magistrate. [4] He, however, who in contravention of the contents of the present article abducts or unwarrantedly holds back a tenant peasant, shall be right away convicted of twenty-five heavy marks,²² making one hundred gold florins, to be equally divided between the plaintiff on the one hand and the ispán and the noble magistrate of the county on the other; [5] that ispán or alispán and the noble magistrates shall have the right to obtain satisfaction regarding the hundred florins for themselves and the opposing party from the chattels of the one who violently abducted or held back [a tenant], if they can be found, otherwise from his property rights, but only if the noble magistrate has been first satisfied as to the full truth of the matter. [6] Should there be such persons who disturb the noble magistrate at the time when such leave is granted or in the administration of justice and judgment, they shall be convicted by the force of the decree to the same penalty as those who interfere with royal bailiffs or the witnesses of chapters and convents in their executions.²³

17. Then, that one and the same measure shall be established for the sale and purchase of wheat and grain as well as wine throughout the kingdom of Hungary and sellers and buyers shall use these everywhere in Hungary;²⁴ [1] prices should, however, be set according to the local abundance or scarcity of the bought or sold goods.

18. Because many of the peasants and other people of the lord prelates, barons and other gentlemen of the realm pursue only hunting and fowling thereby almost completely abandoning and disregarding the cultivation of fields and vineyards, so much so that they hunt not only on weekdays but also on Sundays and other saints' days, even the most holy Christmas Day, not fearing to sin by not observing God in His commands and to cheat their lords by reducing their income; moreover, they—captured by this fruitless effort—become entirely reduced to begging, indeed some of them, lacking food and clothing, are eventually forced to theft and robbery, for which they often die on the gallows or are executed otherwise; [1] in order thus to stop this nuisance by proper remedy, it has been established that from now on and in the future no tenant or other peasant of this kingdom shall dare in any way or art to hunt deer, doe, pheasant or hazel

²¹ Noble magistrates (judices servientium, szolgabírák) were—usually four—nobles elected by the county community as helpers of the ispán or alispán, in a way also representing the assembly of noblemen.

²² The mark was a measure of silver (and sometimes of gold), often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century the Buda mark (~245.54 gr.), belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary.

²³ Cf. above art. 5.

²⁴ Attempts at unifying measures were typical and usually unsuccessful throughout the Middle Ages. See István Bogdán, Magyarországi hossz- és földmértékek a XVI. század végéig [Measures of length and land in Hungary until the end of the sixteenth century] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978), pp. 52–60.

grouse (commonly called császármadár), [2] but all of them must sweat and work in the cultivation of arable lands, meadows and vineyards and other handicrafts, whence both they themselves and their lords can gain income and profit, under the penalty of three florins, which shall be unremittingly collected by the lord from that peasant who pursues hunting or fowling or by him on whose land such a peasant is caught.²⁵ [3] Should either of them be lax in exacting this penalty or, favoring the peasant, be unwilling to exact it, then the same fine of three florins shall be unremittingly exacted by the alispán and the noble magistrate of that county where it happens from the nobleman or lord who allowed the peasant to hunt or fowl, by force of the present statute.

19. *The burghers of Košice and Sopron shall cease interfering with the wine transports of noblemen*²⁶

20. *The royal majesty shall inform his faithful about the matter of the pledge of the five cities and Lusatia*²⁷

21. *The royal majesty shall inform the estates of the matter of the oath of fidelity of Moravia, Silesia and Lusatia*²⁸

22. *The royal majesty shall redeem the city of Sopron with its county and Bardejov pledged to foreigners as well as lands allegedly occupied by Moravians in the border regions*²⁹

23. Because the gentlemen of the realm and their peasants are frequently burdened with undue tithes as well as excommunications and interdicts by the lord prelates and churchmen or their agents and often also by those to whom they farm out their tithes, [1] in order that this no longer happen, it has been decided that whenever any of the gentlemen of the realm or of their peasants is burdened under the pretext of undue tithes, excommunications or interdicts of this type, then he shall notify that prelate of whose diocese he is known to be subject or another churchman, namely the one to whom the tithes are paid, at his residence or elsewhere if he can be found nearby, and if not, then his agent or his personal representative. [2] If satisfaction and recompense is made for what they have done, then very well; otherwise they shall be summoned by letters of command and presentation³⁰ to the royal majesty (wherever he may be), or in the absence of the royal majesty

²⁵ The prohibition of peasants from hunting indicates the tendency towards restricting the freedom of commoners in Hungary. See e.g. István Szabó, Tanulmányok a magyar parasztság történetéből [Studies on the history of Hungarian peasantry] (Budapest: Teleki Tudományos Intézet, 1948), pp. 31–63. Such prohibitions were also widespread in medieval Europe.

²⁶ The increased commercial activity of the nobility in the late 15th century led to conflicts with the free cities that formed alliances to protect their interests, see István H. Németh, “Szabad királyi városok és nagybirtokosok konkurenciája” [Competition of free royal cities and great landowners], Sic itur ad Astra, 8. (1994) 1–2:5–37; Jenő Szűcs, “Das Städtewesen in Ungarn im 15–17. Jahrhundert,” in La Renaissance et la reformation en Pologne et en Hongrie [Studia Historica, 53] (Budapest, 1963), pp. 97–101.

²⁷ See 1498:23.

²⁸ See 1492:4.

²⁹ Cf. 1498: 24.

³⁰ While littere preceptorie (mandates issued in a great variety of matters of administration or law) were a well known type of instrument, the term littere exhibitorie seems to have been another name for

to that of his deputy to the thirty-second day counted from the day of the summons in this matter, and justice and judgment shall be done on their behalf without delay. [3] When it is found that an individual nobleman³¹ or peasant was unduly tithed, excommunicated or troubled by an interdict, then these prelates or their bailiffs shall be condemned to the man-price of the nobleman or the peasant, and if indeed it is found that an entire village or all the peasants were in such a way imposed upon, then the lord prelates, their agents and bursars shall be convicted of one hundred gold florins, to be paid in part to the judge, in part to the plaintiff.

24. *On the military duty of ecclesiastics with banderia and on those without but collecting tithes.*³²

25. That summonses to courts spiritual shall henceforth be issued only with an explanation.³³ [1] And if it is recognized from this explanation that the case is of a secular nature or does not otherwise concern the court spiritual, the vicars in jurisdiction shall in no way take it before them under the penalty laid down in the decretum minus.³⁴

26. Many of the lord prelates are accustomed to oblige all the parish priests of their dioceses to immediately appear before their bishop after being elected to their parish and swear an oath on which they must receive and get a letter, which clearly causes damage to the nobles, as they have always had the full right ever since the time of the holy King Stephen to choose for themselves parish priests.³⁵ Therefore, it has been decided that henceforth none of the parish priests be held to do this, nor shall any of them be confirmed against the will of his patron. Otherwise, the tenants of that village where such happens shall not dare at all to render the tithe to their prelate but those tithes shall be applied to the maintenance of the border castles.

them. Letters of presentation were sent to chapters as places of authentication obliging them to issue and send letters of command to litigants. The chapter frequently included the text of the letter of presentation in the letter of command, as a consequence of which this article combines the two terms.

³¹ The exemption of nobles from paying the tithe was contained in a now lost edict of Sigismund of 23 June 1405, referred to in a charter of 1 August 1421, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445, Budapest: Akademiai, 1978 [=DRH], pp. 216–17. In 1415, Pope John XXIII confirmed this exemption based on the service of the nobles “in the defense of the faith,” see Josephus Nicolaus Kovachich, Monumenta veteris legislationis Hungaricae (Claudiopolis: Collegium, 1815). 2:8–9.

³² See 1498: 15 sqq.

³³ At issue here is the division of cases between courts spiritual and secular. Although citations had to be explicit (see e.g., Sebastianus Vantius [d.1570], Tractatus de nullitatibus processuum [Venice, 1567] tit. Ex defectu citationis, no. 30), citations were frequently formulated in such general terms that matters pertaining to secular courts could be disguised as ‘spiritual.’ This abuse was widespread and had been denounced e.g., in England by William Lyndwood (d. 1446), Provinciale (seu Constitutiones Angliae) (Oxford, 1679), p. 315.

³⁴ Cf. 1498:60 and 63.

³⁵ The right of patronage grew out of the original proprietary church (Eigenkirche), which went back to the early foundations, though hardly to the time of St. Stephen. In the later Middle Ages the right of patrons was everywhere reduced to the right of presentation.

27. Repeats 1498:58 on the reservation of abbacies for regulars, excepting the Abbey of Petrovaradin.

28. Repeats 1495:27–28, 1498:31 and 1500:25 prohibiting the export of oxen and horses after the coming feast of St John the Baptist.

29. Toll collectors harassing nobles, against 1500: 41, are to be cited to the thirty-second day to the royal court.

30. The greater octaves are to be extended by four days for treating cases transferred from Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia and Transylvania.³⁶

31. Finally, that the royal majesty shall have all of his decrees and statutes which are hitherto scattered in different places now redacted in the form of one decretum.³⁷

We, therefore, who wish always to keep and govern our aforementioned kingdom in quiet peace and everlasting liberty, have accepted, approved and ratify, nay do accept, approve and ratify the above written articles, having written them word for word without any change and alteration into these presents, because we deemed them, as mentioned above, to complete and perfect other statutes of ours and to concern and serve the common weal of our said kingdom. [1] And we promise and oblige ourselves by the force of these presents to observe inviolably and make others observe all that is written in these articles, [2] to the memory and lasting endurance of which we have directed that these present letters of privilege be granted and conceded, under our privy seal which we use as king of Hungary. [3] Given at the aforementioned field of Rákos, on the fifteenth day of the aforementioned diet in the one thousand five hundred and fourth year of the Lord, in the fourteenth year of our reigns in the kingdom of Hungary and the thirty-fourth in Bohemia. [4] At the time when the venerable fathers in Christ, the lord archbishops Thomas, cardinal priest of the holy Roman church with the title of St Martin in Montibus, of Esztergom, chief and privy chancellor of ours;³⁸ and Gregory Frankapan of the canonically united churches of Kalocsa and Bács³⁹; as well as the illustrious and most venerable bishops Cardinal Ippolito d'Este of Aragon

³⁶ Cf. 1500: 6.

³⁷ Cf. 1498:6, 1500:10. Even though decreed several times later—1514:63, 1525:23—this was not done until the later sixteenth century, and even then “unofficially.” See Andor Csizmadia, “Previous Editions of the Laws of Hungary”, in Decreta regni mediaevalis Hungariae. The Laws of the medieval kingdom of Hungary, vol. 1, János M. Bak, György Bónis, James Ross Sweeny, eds. and trans. ed. 2 (Schlacks: Idyllwild, 1999) pp. xx–xxi. In fact, the Triparitum, a “privat collection” of customary law, served as the legal Bible for centuries.

³⁸ Bakócz, Thomas, bishop of Győr 1486–93, bishop elect of Eger 1493–97, archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere.

³⁹ Frankapan, Gregory, archbishop of Kalocsa 1504–20.

of Eger;⁴⁰ Lucas of Zagreb⁴¹; Nicholas Bácskai of Transylvania;⁴² George of Oradea,⁴³ our chancellor; Sigismund of Pécs;⁴⁴ the Reverend Lord Peter, cardinal priest of the said Roman church with the title of St Cyriacus in Thermis, of Veszprém;⁴⁵ Francis of Győr;⁴⁶ Nicholas Bátori of Vác;⁴⁷ the other Nicholas Csáki of Cenad;⁴⁸ Sigismund Thurzó of Nitra;⁴⁹ Stephen of Srem, representing our personal presence in court;⁵⁰ Nicholas Keserű of Bosnia;⁵¹ and Briccio of Knin⁵² felicitously governed the churches of God. [5] Then, when the spectabiles and magnifici Emeric Perényi was perpetual ispán of Abaújvár, palatine of our said kingdom of Hungary and judge of the Cumans;⁵³ comes Peter count of Szentgyörgy and Bazin, judge royal and voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely;⁵⁴ John Corvin, duke of Liptov and ban of our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia;⁵⁵ George Kanizsai, ban of our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia;⁵⁶ Barnabas Bélai⁵⁷ and James Gerlistye,⁵⁸ bans of Severin; Józsa Somi, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of our kingdom⁵⁹; Blaise Ráskai, master of the

⁴⁰ d' Este of Aragon, Ippolito, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, archbishop of Esztergom 1486–97, bishop of Eger 1497–1520

⁴¹ Szegedi Baratin, Lucas, bishop of Bosnia 1491–3, of Cenad 1493–1500, of Zagreb 1500-10.

⁴² Bácskai, Nicholas, bishop of Trnasyvania 1503-4.

⁴³ Szatmári, George, bishop of Oradea 1501-5.

⁴⁴ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, Sigismund, bishop of Pécs 1473–1505.

⁴⁵ Peter (Isvalies), bishop of Veszprém 1503-11.

⁴⁶ Szatmári, Francis, bishop of Győr 1495–1508.

⁴⁷ Bátori, Nicholas (d. 1506) bishop of Srem 1468-74, of Vác 1474-1506.

⁴⁸ Csáki, Nicholas, bishop of Cenad 1500-14.

⁴⁹ Thurzó, Sigismund, bishop of Nitra 1503-4.

⁵⁰ Bajoni, Stephen, bishop of Srem 1502–14.

⁵¹ Recte: Michael, Keserű, bishop of Bosnia from 1502.

⁵² Egervári, Briccio, bishop of Knin 1492–1523.

⁵³ Perényi, Emeric, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewardss, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13

⁵⁴ Szengyörgyi and Bazini, Peter, voivode of Transylvania 1498–1510, judge royal 1502–17.

⁵⁵ Corvin, John, natural son of King Matthias I (Corvinus), prince, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1494–97, 1499–1504

⁵⁶ Kanizsai George, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1497–98, 1508–10.

⁵⁷ Bélai, Barnabas, ban of Severin 1508–15.

⁵⁸ Gerlistye, James, ban of Severin 1495–1508.

⁵⁹ Somi, Józsa, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary 1494–1508.

treasury;⁶⁰ Moses Gergelylaki Buzlai, master of the doorkeepers;⁶¹ Michael Pálóci, master of the cellarers;⁶² Emeric Décsi, master of the stewards;⁶³ John Csáktornyai Ernuszt, master of the horse;⁶⁴ Blaise Gabriel Perényi⁶⁵ and John Podmaniczky⁶⁶, masters of our royal chamberlains; and many others holding counties and honors of the realm.⁶⁷

⁶⁰ Ráskai, Blaise, chief chamberlain, master of the treasury 1498–1518.

⁶¹ Gergelylaki Buzlai, Moses, master of the doorkeepers, 1500–19:

⁶² Pálóci, Michael, master of the cellarers 1505–08, master of the chamberlains, 1514–16.

⁶³ Décsi, Imre, master of the stewards

⁶⁴ Csáktornyai Ernuszt, John, master of the horse 1493–1503, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1507–1510.

⁶⁵ Perényi, Gabriel, master of the chamberlains 1505–26.

⁶⁶ Podmanini Podmanicki, John, banderial lord 1498.

⁶⁷ The list of spiritual and secular lords was appended to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant as witnesses, merely indicating the time of the issue by reference to the persons in office.

DIETAL DECISION UNDER KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516) OF 1507

This set of articles was compiled by the estates at a diet of 13 April 1507.

There is no evidence that the king would have approved these decisions and none of the manuscripts refers to it as decretum, nevertheless it has been included into the Corpus Iuris. Therefore, Ferenc Döry decided not to regard it a decretum, but merely as a political program of the assembled nobility similar to the several dietal decisions of the 1520s. Most of its measures repeat earlier, approved matters or proposed additions. For this reason, we decided to publish it only in Latin, without translation and annotations. Recently, Gábor Mikó found a document from the archives of Košice (Supplementum H: Acta diaetalia regni; now also in MNL OL DF 271 714) containing comments or “responses” on the propositions of 1507, suggesting that this dietal decision had been circulated in the country and was planned to be presented for approval in its presently known or changed version.

The diet of 1505 left only a decision about the election of a “national king” if Wladislas had no male heir (see János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14–16. Jahrhundert [Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973] pp. 158–9). Of the diet in 1508 whence the nobility sent a delegation to Tata, where the king and the lords had gathered and then dissolved the meeting, no formal decree survived. .

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL and DF (microfilms).

Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @

<http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: Codex Nádasdy (Eötvös Loránd University Library Budapest, Ms G 39) foll. 339r-341v [N]; another codex ibid. (Ms G 40) [G40]; Codex Kollár pp. 405-12 [K]; the “major Esterházy codex” foll. 500r-503v [EM]; the “minor Esterházy codex”, foll. 116v-118 v [Em]; Codex Rep. 71, no. 13 in the Hg. Esterházy Archives, pp. 21-26 [E]; Codex Festetich (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4355) pp. 528-35 [F]; and Codex Ilosvay (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4023) foll. 5v-8v [I].

ED: Magyar Törvénytár. Corpus Iuris Hungarici, eds. (Budapest: Franklin, 1986) pp. 693-703, as Decretum sextum Wladislai regis [C].

LIT: Gábor Mikó, “Ismeretlen országgyűlési emlék a Jagelló-korból. Adatok az 1507 és 1514 közötti országgyűlések történetéhez, valamint Werbőczy Hármaskönyvének elkészültéhez” [An unknown dietal document from the Jagello Age. Data to the history of diets between 1507 and 1514 and the writing of Werbőczy’s Tripartitum] Történelmi Szemle 56 (2014) 3:455–480. See also: Kubinyi, A. “Az 1505. évi rákosi országgyűlés és a szittya ideológia” [The diet of 1505 and Scythian ideology] Századok 140 (2006): 261-374. Lakatos, Bálint. “A tatái országgyűlés és diplomáciai háttere” (1508–1510) [The diet in Tata and its diplomatic background]. in: János László, ed. A diplomácia választóján. 500 éve volt Tatán országgyűlés (Annales Tataiensis VI.). Tata 2010, p. 59.

ARTICULI IN CAMPO RAKOS IN DIETA FESTI GEORGII MARTIRIS ANNO DOMINI 1507. REFORMATIⁱ

I. Item primo, ut iudicia et iudiciarie deliberaciones frustra de cetero ne fiant, sed actor obtento iam iure suo, quod acquisivit et causam exinde suscitatum ad finem usque perduxit, irremissibiliterⁱⁱ pociatur, statutum est, prout eciam in dieta festi beati Michaelis archangeli in anno Domini 1505ⁱⁱⁱ evoluto conclusum et per regiam maiestatem approbatum erat, quod amodo de cetero, dum et quandocumque in aliqua causa finalis executio fieri et ulterior processus in prosecutionem^{iv} ipsius cause requiri non debet, sed usque ad notam infidelitatis causa eadem deducta fuerit, et regia maiestas superinde requisita bona et iura possessionaria vel pecunias aut alias^v res in iudicio reobtentas per arma gladioque^{vi} et regia potencia, per que iudicio non parentes coerceri solent, actori reddi et restitui,^{vii} ac ipsum in dominium eorundem bonorum reobtentorum introduci et collocari facere statuerit,^{viii} extunc iudex ordinarius illius cause, coram quo causa huiusmodi ad finem deducta est, vel eciam maiestas sua, si ita voluerit, literas adjudicatorias more solito conficiet et literis in eisdem dominos palatinum aut^{ix} iudicem curie regie seu supremum et generalem capitaneum tocius regni pro tempore constitutos loco regie maiestatis requirat, qui personaliter penes huiusmodi literas adjudicatorias sub pena perpetue amissionis^x dignitatum et officiorum suorum statim gentes aut^{xi} stipendiarios eorum proprios ac dominorum et nobilium illius comitatus, ubi taliter convictus moram trahit, ac bona iudicialiter reobtentia^{xii} adiacere dinoscuntur, si sufficiunt, aliter autem vigore presentis statuti aliorum quoque^{xiii} dominorum et vicinorum comitatum, et si opus fuerit, eciam tocius regni^{xiv} levare et eiuscemodi bona seu^{xv} iura ⁱ Em. F. N. Articuli in campo Rakos 1507 pro festo beati Georgii martiris editi. C. om. titulum.

ⁱⁱ C. infallibiter.

ⁱⁱⁱ Em. F. G40. N. 1500; E. I. K. 1507.

^{iv} C. G40. prosecutione.

^v Exc. C. EM om.

^{vi} F. gladiosque.

^{vii} Exc. C. G40. restaurari.

^{viii} Exc. C. mendose: negligeret.

^{ix} EM. et; Exc. C. om.

^x Exc. G40. sub perpetua amissione.

^{xi} G40. et.

^{xii} N. obtentia.

^{xiii} Em. F. I. N. aliorumque.

^{xiv} C. add. Hungarie.

^{xv} G40. I. et.

reobtentata expugnare et occupare,^{xvi} atque secundum formam et tenorem literarum adiudicatoriarum actori cum his, quibus congruit, etiam super eo iure, quod ratione dicta note infidelitatis sibi provenire debet, omnimodam et indilatam satisfaccionem impendere debeant^{xvii} et teneantur.^{xviii} Si qui^{xix} vero forent, qui fortassis huic convicto et temerario auxilium prestarent, tunc et ipsi in nota perpetue infidelitatis convicti habeantur, quorum bona consimiliter^{xx} idem^{xxi} palatinus vel iudex curie regie aut supremus et generalis regni capitaneus, cuius officio spectabilis et magnificus dominus Johannes de Zapolya, comes perpetuus terre Scepusiensis unacum domino palatino in presenciarum fungitur, mox et de facto occupandi et ratione suarum expensarum pro se perpetuo retinendi habeant^{xxii} facultatem. Quicumque autem dominorum aut comitatuum ad requisicionem ipsius domini palatini aut iudicis curie regie vel capitanei generalis gentes eorum, visis huiusmodi literis adiudicatoriis pro execucione earundem eo^{xxiii} mittere recusarent, tales consueta pena note infidelitatis condemnentur. Hoc per expressum declarato, quod prelibati domini palatinus aut iudex curie regie vel supremus capitaneus gentes aliorum dominorum et comitatuum in aliis casibus vel ratione aliorum negociorum preter scitum et consensum regie maiestatis levare nequaquam possint; hoc etiam addito, quod si comites vel vicecomites, gentesque et universitas^{xxiv} nobilium alicuius comitatus ad recuperacionem talium iurium seu rerum obtentaram sufficiunt,^{xxv} et iudex cause^{xxvi} ad requisicionem actoris literas suas ad eosdem exinde ita dederit, extunc iidem in execucione premissa liberam procedendi actorique^{xxvii} satisfaciendi habeant facultatem. Si quispiam vero prescriptorum trium dominorum huiusmodi rebellionem forte per se faceret et iuri parere nollet, extunc alter eorum vel duo ex illis talem rebellantem iurique non cedentem modo preallegato puniant; et hoc idem de civitatensibus et quibuslibet personis, si^{xxviii} iudicio facto non parebunt, est intelligendum et faciendum; et quod domini wayvoda Transsilvanus et comes Siculorum ac regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie banus in eorundem officiolatibus simili perfruantur facultate.

^{xvi} G40. reoccupare.

^{xvii} EM. debebunt.

^{xviii} EM. tenebuntur.

^{xix} Exc. C. EM. om.

^{xx} G40. I. K. similiter.

^{xxi} Em. F. K. N. idem.

^{xxii} G40. I. habeat.

^{xxiii} Exc. C. G40. I. illo.

^{xxiv} G40. I. universitates.

^{xxv} EM. sufficient.

^{xxvi} Exc. C. om.

^{xxvii} C. om. procedendi actorique.

^{xxviii} EM. qui.

II. Item quicumque amodo deinceps repulsionem ordinariam non fecerit, sed actorem in dominium iurium reobtentorum immiserit, verum post statucionem vel restatucionem iterum pro^{xxxix} se eadem iura reoccupaverit, extunc per modum oculate revisionis, acceptis regio vel capituli seu conventus hominibus, mediantibus literis iudicis illius, coram quo causa ipsa^{xxx} terminata fuit,^{xxxi} actor de huiusmodi nova occupacione veritatem statim inquirat,^{xxxii} qua rescita reus ipse et sic fraudulenter agens notam de facto infidelitatis^{xxxiii} incurrat, et non expectato ampliori^{xxxiv} processu execucio contra eum^{xxxv} modo predeclarato fiat, et per ipsos dominum palatinum aut iudicem curie regie vel capitaneum generalem instar aliorum iuri non parencium puniatur, si per comites vel vicecomites agentes et universitatem nobilium comitatum puniri modo premissis non valebit.

III. Item in sublevacionem^{xxxvi} oppressorum articuli minoris decreti de iudiciorum super actibus potenciariis continua celebracione et iuratorum assessorum in consilio regie maiestatis atque iudiciis interesse debencium eleccione dudum conscripti per omnia observentur. Hoc addito, quod assessores illi in octavis maioribus sive compareant omnes, sive non, octave nihilominus ille celebrentur; verum eciam^{xxxvii} assessor ille, qui non advenerit, et octavis in eisdem interesse recusaverit, nisi iusta, gravi et notabili detineatur egritudine, in amissione honoris^{xxxviii} seu dignitatis et beneficii sui et insuper amissione officii sui assessoratus de facto convincatur et eo officio amplius nunquam utatur, et regia maiestas unacum ceteris assessoribus et consiliariis suis alium, qui videbitur, loco illius^{xxxix} statim eligat; ita tamen, ut^{xl} eisdem quoque assessoribus de eorum expensis satisfaccio impendatur. In quarum quidem expensarum sortem dominis prelati et baronibus septingenti, nobilibus vero assessoribus de medio scilicet regnicolarum electis trecenti floreni auri^{xli} ad unum integrum annum solvantur, et ad huiusmodi solucionem de singulis portis seu sessionibus jobagonalibus singuli tres denarii per totum regnum, de universis scilicet bonis et iuribus possessionariis atque civitatibus tam regie et regionalis maiestatum, quam universorum dominorum prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium, imo eciam nobilibus unius sessionis per vicecomites et iudices nobilium comitatum de singulis curiis modo et ordine ac sub penis et

^{xxxix} K. per.

^{xxx} I. illius; G40. illa.

^{xxxi} Exc. C. EM. fuert.

^{xxxii} C. requirat.

^{xxxiii} Exc. C. add premissis.

^{xxxiv} I. G40. ulteriori.

^{xxxv} G40. eundem.

^{xxxvi} C. sublevamine. E. EM. G40. sublevacione.

^{xxxvii} C. verumtamen.

^{xxxviii} C. honorum suorum.

^{xxxix} G40. I. ipsius.

^{xl} I. K. G40. quod.

^{xli} Exc. C. EM. K. aurei.

gravaminibus^{xlii} super exactione pecuniarum pro gencium conservacione in decreto minori expressatis atque declaratis irremissibiliter et sine defectu exigantur, pecunieque huiusmodi^{xliii} exacte manibus duorum hominum per prefatos electos assessores eligendorum, unius scilicet baronis et alterius mediocris nobilis fideliter assignentur; quas tandem iidem duo homines assessoribus ipsis distribuere et in ventura^{xliv} dieta rationem dominis et regnicolis superinde reddere teneantur. Et nemo colonorum, qui vera nobilium regni libertate non utitur, in hac pecuniarum exactione relinquatur.^{xlv}

IV. Item quicumque dominorum aut nobilium regni huius in assessorem electus officium ipsum in se levare suscipereque nollet, si fuerit prelatus, in prelature sue, si vero baro vel^{xlvi} nobilis, in bonorum suorum amissione condemnetur. Et^{xlvii} ut iudicia ipsa commodius efficaciusque celebrari^{xlviii} et malefactores iurique inobedientes eciam per arma et gladium^{xlix} puniri possint, conclusum est, quod amodo deinceps sigillum iuridicum regie maiestatis, sub quo universe sentencie capitales alieque litere super punicionibus¹ penisque malefactorum et capite plectendorum emanari solent, persona secularis benemerita, iurisque^{li} et literarum perita teneat atque regia maiestas cum^{lii} consilio prefatorum dominorum assessorum et consiliariorum suorum ad conservandum illi conferat.

V. Item, quod regia maiestas omnia ea, que negocia huius regni concernunt, cum consilio prefatorum dominorum assessorum et aliorum suorum consiliariorum de cetero faciat, et si que preter eorum scitum faceret, nullius sint vigoris atque firmitatis. Preterea universa officia finitima, wayvodatum scilicet Transsylvaniensem, comitatum Siculorum, banatum regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie etc., comitatum^{liii} Themesiensem ac aliorum castrorum finitimorum^{liv} capitaneatum personis benemeritis cum consilio eorundem dominorum assessorum et aliorum^{lv} consiliariorum

^{xlii} E. G40. I. gravacionibus.

^{xliii} EM. K. eiusmodi; C. eiuscemodi.

^{xliv} C. EM. add. postea.

^{xlv} C. exactione aliqua libertate gaudeat.

^{xlvi} Em. F. N. et.

^{xlvii} EM. item.

^{xlviii} EM. G40. celebrentur.

^{xlix} EM. gladio.

¹ Exc. C. litere punicionis; EM. litere punicionales.

^{li} C. iuriumque.

^{lii} Em. F. N. de; E. EM. G40. I. K. in.

^{liii} Exc. C. G40. om. scilicet ... comitatum.

^{liv} Exc. C. add. similiter banatum vel.

^{lv} C. ceterorum.

suorum conferat. Ita tamen, ut^{lvi} hec castra finitima, videlicet Jaycza, Zewreniense, Nandoralbense, Sabacz et Zrebernik^{lvii} regia maiestas duabus semper personis pro officiolatu donet, quorum unus sub nota perpetue infidelitatis semper in castro permanere atque gentes suas, quas ibi iuxta consuetudinem hactenus observatam tenere debuerunt,^{lviii} paratas semper habere teneatur. Quibus scilicet et domino Rascie despoto, qui castrum finitimum et insigne banderium pro regni tutela tenere debet, dominus thesaurarius sub amissione bonorum suorum solutionem de eorum^{lix} salariis plenariam^{lx} semper facere teneatur.

VI. Item regia maiestas ex vetusta huius regni consuetudine vigoreque generalis decreti equites mille pro regni defensione conservare debet, quos omnes Hungaros de cetero habeat; et eorum quadringentos in curia sua regia secum teneat, sexingentos vero ad regni confinia loca scilicet magis necessaria et Thurcorum faucibus obiecta atque viciniora collocet; et quod revisiones castrorum finitimorum per palatinalem et iudicis curie homines, prout in decreto positum est, singulis annis de cetero fiant.

VII. Item, si quis dominorum aut^{lxi} regnicolarum in consilio regie maiestatis contra libertatem et commune bonum atque statuta huius regni palam publiceque et temerarie agere attemptaret, talem teneantur prescripti domini assessores in generali dieta proxime semper ventura universis dominis prelati et baronibus ac ceteris regnicolis ex nomine manifestare, quem ibidem tanquam rei publice libertatisque regni proditorem et turbatorem in rebus et persona iuxta demerita iidem puniendi habeant facultatem.

VIII. Item quicumque contra statuta decretaque regni palam et aperte egerit^{lxii} decretaque huiusmodi temerario ausu violare de cetero presumpserit,^{lxiii} prout hactenus per plures potentes fieri solitum erat, talis, si fuerit prelati aut altera persona ecclesiastica, in amissione prelature vel alterius dignitatis et beneficii, si vero baro vel nobilis, in amissione universorum bonorum et iurium suorum possessionariorum vincatur eo facto, et perpetuus regie maiestatis et regni^{lxiv} infidelis et exul habeatur; et talium prelaturas, beneficia seu dignitates vel iura possessionaria regia maiestas, cui maluerit,^{lxv} liberam donandi et conferendi habeat facultatem. Quos si^{lxvi} maiestas sua hoc modo punire, prelaturasque seu beneficia, aut dignitates vel iura possessionaria auferre et alteri ^{lvi} I. quod.

^{lvii} Exc. K. Zebernyk.

^{lviii} C. deberet.

^{lix} Exc. C. cetero. ^{lx}

Exc. C. plenarie.

^{lxi} G40. I. et.

^{lxii} Exc. C. egerint; F. N. egerunt

^{lxiii} Exc. C. E. presumpserint.

^{lxiv} Exc. C. om. et regni.

^{lxv} I. voluerit.

^{lxvi} EM. I. G40. Quodsi.

conferre donareque recusaret, extunc si mediocris persona spiritualis aut secularis id facere temptaverit,^{lxvii} per comites vel vicecomites ac^{lxviii} gentes et universitatem nobilium eiusdem comitatus, ubi talis residenciam habet,^{lxix} iuxta eorum libitum puniatur, universaque bona et res eiusdem in publicam predam convertantur. Si vero potens quisquam^{lxx} fuerit, ad huius proterviam^{lxxi} rebellionemque domandam, necnon bonorum et iurium possessionariorum, dignitatumque et beneficiorum ablacionem prefati dominus^{lxxii} palatinus ac iudex curie regie vel supremus capitaneus per universitatem nobilium illius comitatus, ubi talis aperta decreti violacio facta fuerit, requisitus, levatis premissis modo suis ac aliorum dominorum et comitatum gentibus insurgere ac sub premissa dignitatum et officiorum suorum amissione advenire teneantur.

IX. Item ad clausulam illam minoris decreti: exceptis illis, qui in peregrinationibus extra regnum occupantur etc. appositum est, ut sive in^{lxxiii} peregrinationibus, sive in serviciis, sive^{lxxiv} castris finitimis prorogacionem qui^{lxxv} semel habuerit, in eadem causa nullam de cetero habere valeat.

X. Item quod boves et equi, pecudesque^{lxxvi} et pecora de cetero gregatim^{lxxvii} aut alias nulla penitus racione educantur, sed ubicunque reperiri poterint,^{lxxviii} semper auferantur, prout eciam in decreto^{lxxix} mencio superinde facta fuit.

XI. Item quod monete extere^{lxxx} in hoc regnum et confinia eiusdem non inducantur, nec illis utantur.^{lxxxi} Contrarium facientes tam pecunias, quam alias res suas universas amittant eo facto.

XII. Item quod durantibus generalibus dietis universa iudicia in curia regia aut sedibus spiritualibus vel^{lxxxii} comitatibus cessent, ut unusquisque rebus tocius regni eo facilius intendere valeat.^{lxxxiii}

^{lxvii} E. attentaverit.

^{lxviii} EM. aut.

^{lxix} EM. habuerit. C. tales residenciam habent.

^{lxx} C. quispam.

^{lxxi} EM. pertinenciam. Em. F. N. potenciam.

^{lxxii} E. EM. domini.

^{lxxiii} C. add. legacionibus sive.

^{lxxiv} EM. add. in.

^{lxxv} C. quis.

^{lxxvi} C. pecudes.

^{lxxvii} E. G40. I. congregatim.

^{lxxviii} C. EM. G40. I. poterunt.

^{lxxix} Exc. EM. G40. I. decretis.

^{lxxx} C. G40. externe.

^{lxxxi} Recte: utatur.

^{lxxxii} C. et.

^{lxxxiii} E. G40. I. possit.

Preterea, si quis forte aliquem in ipsa dieta verberaret, vulneraret et libertatem diete turbaret, que nota infidelitatis est, talis personaliter citari semper poterit, ibidemque iudicium de eo^{lxxxiv} fieri valebit.

XIII. Item quod maiestas sua^{lxxxv} universa beneficia ecclesiastica, maiora scilicet et minora, ab illis, qui plura possident, auferat et unum duntaxat apud eum, quod scilicet^{lxxxvi} eligendum pro se duxerit, relinquat. Et quod universe abbacie, prepositure^{lxxxvii} et alia monasteria religiosorum (demptis duabus illis abbaciis, Saxardiensi et Pechwarardiensi, que per reverendissimum^{lxxxviii} dominum Petrum cardinalem a curia Romana liberate existunt, quasque^{lxxxix} idem vita sua durante vel infra eum terminum, quo dei munere in pontificem forte assumeretur,^{xc} possidebit) per regiam maiestatem^{xcii} viris religiosis et consequenter fratribus illius ordinis, cui ecclesia ipsa dedicata fuit, si eorum^{xciii} possessores habitum regularem eiusdem^{xciii} ordinis induere et infra festum nativitatis beati Johannis Baptiste proxime venturum assumere recusaverint, de facto conferantur.^{xciv}

XIV. Item quod inhibiciones eciam per novum iudicium illis, de cetero ne^{xcv} suffragentur, qui in octavis vel brevibus iudiciis comparuerint^{xcvi} vel comparuisse visi fuerint, aut literas procuratorias in aliqua alia causa produxerint; sed qui nec per se, neque per procuratorem comparuerint,^{xcvii} illi bene utantur inhibicione per modum novi iudicii^{xcviii} consueti.

XV. Item quod decime isto modo de cetero semper reddantur, ita ut de decem capeciis una dominis prelati pro decimis, altera vero dominis terrestribus pro nonis exigatur, octo vero colono seminanti remanebunt.

XVI. Item quod regia maiestas universas possessiones, predia, terras, sylvas, prata, fluvios, piscaturas post felicem maiestatis sue in hoc regnum ingressum per Cumanos, Philisteos, ^{lxxxiv} Exc. C. om. de eo.

^{lxxxv} EM. G40. I. regia.

^{lxxxvi} C. videlicet.

^{lxxxvii} C. universas abbas, preposituras.

^{lxxxviii} K. reverendum.

^{lxxxix} Exc. C. quas.

^{xc} C. E. EM. K. assumetur.

^{xcii} C. om. per regiam maiestatem.

^{xciii} Exc. Em. F. N. earum.

^{xciii} I. G40. illius.

^{xciv} C. conferat.

^{xcv} E. G40. I. non.

^{xcvi} Exc. C. G40. comparent.

^{xcvii} C. EM. comparuerunt.

^{xcviii} C. Em. F. N. add. alias.

Zege dienses aliosque regios^{xcix} et regionalis maiestatis^c colonos preter viam iuris occupata^{ci} per suum regium et palatinalem prothonotarios, visis iuribus querulancium ac iuxta attestacionem nobilium illius comitatus, ubi occupacio huiusmodi facta fuisset, priusquam brevia iudicia prenotata^{cii} incipiant, revidere, complanare^{ciii} atque eis, a quorum manibus occupata fuerunt,^{civ} reddi et remitti facere dignetur graciose.

XVII. Item quod universa iudicia post expirationem octavarum festi beati Michaelis archangeli proxime preteriti in causis et factis brevium et transmissionalium, quia regnicole ad propria maxima in parte^{cv} discesserunt, quovis modo facta contra eos,^{cvi} qui per non venienciam convicti fuerunt,^{cvii} nullius sint vigoris atque firmitatis; qui vero comparuerunt,^{cviii} factum inter partes iudicium in vigore permaneat.

XVIII. Item quod iudicia octave festi beati Georgii martiris penitus differantur simul cum brevibus brevium, et omnia brevia iudicia in proximo festo beati Jacobi apostoli presentibus assessoribus incipiantur.

XIX. Item quod metas regni ex parte Moravie, Polonie et Lusacie maiestas regia, prout in decreto continetur, rectificari faciat et maxime his temporibus maiestatis sue occupatas.

XX. Item quod maiestas regia universa statuta et decreta sua et regni sui in diversas partes hactenus posita in unam formam decreti iam redigi gratiat.

^{xcix} EM. regie.

^c EM. G40. maiestatum.

^{ci} C. G40. I. K. occupatas.

^{cii} F. N. om.

^{ciii} C. revideri, complanari.

^{civ} C. fuerint; E. fuerant.

^{cv} Em. F. I. K. maxime.

^{cvi} Exc. C. om. contra eos.

^{cvii} C. fuerint; E. fuerant.

^{cviii} G40. comparuerint.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

OF 1514

The law of 1514 had quite an adventurous prehistory. In March, Archbishop Bakócz returned from Rome, where his papal ambitions were frustrated, with a bull for calling a crusade against the Ottomans. We know now, that in late March a diet was held about the pros and cons of preaching a crusade and starting a war (see C. Tóth). Finally, on April 9, a Székly border captain, George Székely Dózsa was selected and Pest (as usual) designed for the assembly point of the crusaders. The crusade turned soon into a country-wide uprising of peasants, small-town dwellers and drovers (hajdú). The revolt had several centers, mainly in the middle and the east of the country, including Transylvania. The crusading armies managed to take several major castles and were defeated only with the help of the voivode of Transylvania, under the walls of Temesvár/Timișoara on 15 July. The leaders were executed in the most horrible fashion.

In response to the rebellion, a decree was drafted at the diet of October 18–November 19 in Buda. This decretum was not approved by the king—as far as can be ascertained—until spring 1515. In the meantime, Wladislas negotiated the famous inheritance agreement with the Habsburgs and the dietal text also underwent changes. The “original” decree is known from several manuscripts and was traditionally seen as a draft preceding the diet (and was published as such by Érszegi et al. Monumenta parallel to the decretum). Recently, Gábor Mikó has convincingly demonstrated that it was the version accepted by the diet (and as such known in the country) and changed in the subsequent half year. The final, approved and sealed decree dropped the plan of entrusting a captain-general with its implementation, reduced the burdens on the peasants but otherwise followed the dietal decision. The changes may have had much to do with the position of voivode John Zápolya, first celebrated as the rescuer of the country (and obviously expected to become captain-general), but having lost his prestige by a defeat suffered from the Ottomans and also due to little-known intrigues at court.

The central issue was restitution of damages and a very harsh decision to rescind the right of tenant peasants to free movement (ad glebam adsticti) that used to be referred to as “second serfdom.” In fact, while the condition of the tenants did deteriorate, that kind of serfdom that characterized the large estates of Eastern Europe remained restricted to a few latifundia in Hungary. The Ottoman advance even annulled the disarming of commoners for the last unsuccessful efforts to stop the Turkish advance (see 1526).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: For the several surviving Mss of both the dietal version and the final decretum, see Géza Érszegi–Viktor Kenéz–László Solymosi, eds. Monumenta rusticorum in Hungaria rebellium anno MDXIV (Budapest: Magyar Országos Levéltár, 1979). pp. 247–8.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 704-41, superseded by: Géza Érszegi–Viktor Kenéz–László Solymosi, eds. Monumenta rusticorum in Hungaria rebellium anno MDXIV (Budapest: Magyar Országos Levéltár, 1979) 248-83 [We print the Monumenta version.]

LIT: Pál Engel, The Realm of St. Stephen... 362-4; Martyn Rady, "Jagello Hungary," in DRMH IV (Idyllwild-Budapest: Schlacks-CEU Med. St., 2012) pp. xxxii-xxxiv; Norman Housley, "Crusading and social revolt," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 49 (1998) 1-29; G. S. Pellathy, "The Dózsa revolt: prelude and aftermath," East European Quarterly 21 (1987) 275-95; János M. Bak, "Delinquent lords and forsaken serfs: thoughts on war and society during the crisis of feudalism," in: Society in Change: Studies in Honor of Béla K. Király (New York, 1983) pp. 291-304; Gábor Barta, Antal Fekete Nagy, Parasztháború 1514-ben [Peasant war in 1514] (Budapest: Gondolat, 1973); Jenő Szűcs, "Die Ideologie des ungarischen Bauernkrieges," in: Gusztáv Heckenast, ed. Aus der Geschichte der ostmitteleuropäischen Bauernbewegungen (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1977), pp. 157-87; Norbert C. Tóth "Vita a keresztes hadjárat kihirdetéséről. Országgyűlés 1514 márciusában" [Debate about announcing the crusade: diet in March 1514], Erdélyi Múzeum 77 (2015) pp. 14-6.; "Az 1514. márciusi országgyűlés," in Keresztesekből lázadók: Tanulmányok 1514 Magyarországról, Norbert C. Tóth, Tibor Neumann, eds.. (Budapest: MTA BTK Történettudományi Intézet, 2015), pp. 31-79; Gábor Mikó, "Az 1514. évi Lukács-napi országgyűlés törvénykönyvének megszületése. A dekrétum eredeti változata" [The birth of the law of the diet at St Luke's day in 1514: The original version of the decree] Ibid., pp. 271-318.

Execution of George Székely-Dózsa 1514. (Contemporary woodcut)

19 NOVEMBRIS 1514

Nos Wladislaus Dei gracia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmacie, Croacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex necnon Slesie et Lucemburgensis dux ac Moravie et Lusacie marchio memorie commendamus tenore presencium significantes, quibus expedit, universis, quod cum nos in animo nostro sepe revolvissemus considerassemusque pericula omnia, que hucusque huic Hungarie regno nostro ab infidelibus hostibus illata sunt, ruinas quoque et desolaciones castrorum finitimorum atque eciam tumultum illum nefandissimum, quem plebs rustica superiori estate intra ipsius regni nostri viscera contra optimates et omnem nobilitatem cum summa et plane inaudita crudelitate concitaverat, multorum insignium virorum cede ac multi sanguinis effusione memorabilem, omnes preterea perturbaciones alias, in quibus status eiusdem regni nostri non sine magno incommodo hucusque fluctuavit, ex ea potissimum causa manasse, quod ordo, sine quo nulla unquam res publica bene gubernata esse legitur, ab omnibus et rebus et officiis sublatus esset et per arreptam hoc pacto licenciam omnia cum maxima tocus regni oppressione prepostere et quasi confuso quodam turbine agerentur. Propterea miserati tam graves calamitates tamque acerbas clades predicti regni nostri generalem dietam et conventum universis dominis prelati et baronibus ceterisque regnicolis nostris pro festo beati Luce evangeliste proxime preterito indiximus atque celebravimus. Ad quem congregatis omnibus cum huius modi conventus causas ipsis explicassemus et cum hys nonnulla, que nobis salutem eiusdem regni nostri concernere videbantur, proposuissemus, hortati eos fuimus, ut ipsi quoque super hys omnibus consultarent et quicquid Deo imprimis optimo gratum predictique regni publico bono proficuum ac salutare foret, concluderent. Prefati itaque domini prelati et barones ac ceteri regnicole nostri accepta mente nostra cum diu multumque super hys rebus consultassent, tandem collatis sentenciis et re conclusa quosdam nobis articulos communi voto et consensu parili—demptis articulis facta criminalia et honestatem clericalem concernentibus, ad quos ipsi domini prelati consentire non potuerunt—formatos atque compositos nostre obtulerunt maiestati. Supplicantes debita cum instancia, ut eos nos quoque acceptare et approbare et litteris nostris inseri facientes confirmare eciam dignaremur. Asserentes eos tales fore, per quos rite tamen observatos et ordo rebus omnibus reduci et status tocus regni in suo splendore servari pericula quoque omnia ingruencia propelli ac adempta per hec tempora quies et securitas omnibus restitui posset. Qui quidem articuli hoc modo sequuntur et sunt tales:

I. Item quanta incommoda et sepe numero pericula in factis regie maiestatis et tocus regni sui ex inscripcione et ad tempus alienacione verorum et iustorum sacre regni corone proventuum diversis hominibus hactenus facta, subsequuta et illata fuerint, omnibus plane constat. Ut igitur illa removeri et curia negociaque maiestatis regie in statum debitum redeant et redigantur, statutum imprimis est, ut universi proventus regie maiestatis tricesime videlicet ac vigesime, fodine et omnes camere salium, fodine auri et argenti civitatesque regie de facto remittantur et computata racione, si cui sua maiestas adhuc aliqua summa tenebitur, illam cum tempore ex eisdem proventibus refundat ita, ut medietas proventuum regie maiestati cedat et reliqua medietas illi, apud quem in arenda vel pignore fuit. De tricesimis autem et civitatibus regiis apud dominum

Iohannem waywodam habitis aliter est provisum. Ex quo regie maiestati et regno multa et preclara impendit servicia et inter alia castrum Themesiense per Georgium Zekel valida obsidione cinctum eliberavit, Laurencium presbiterum debellavit et rusticanam breviter colluviem exterminavit. Proinde ut tam regia maiestas proventus suos et civitates quam eciam dominus waywoda pecunias suas rehabeat, ex pecuniis exercitualibus seu ad rationem conservacionis gencium binis post se se vicibus per annum exigendis semper decem denarii—qui in toto viginti denarios faciunt—ad manus ipsius domini waywode assignentur. Et huius modi viginti denarii de omnium dominorum et nobilium regie eciam et reginalis maiestatum atque propriis ipsius domini waywode bonis exigantur. Et mox rehabita pecunia sua capitali tam tricesimas quam eciam civitates regales dominus ipse waywoda remittere teneatur.

II. De cetero vero regia maiestas proventus suos regios sine consensu et deliberacione sui consilii ordinati nemini inscribat qualicunque necessitate adurgente. Nam si quis dominorum aut nobilium huius modi proventus regios pro se inscribi fecerit, summa illa de facto amittatur. Et insuper in estimacione talis proventus vel civitatis regie fenerator ille convincatur.

III. Ne autem super bonis et proventibus ac iuribus possessionariis regalibus dubium suboriri possit, ea hic annotare placuit.

Sunt igitur octo imprimis civitates libere videlicet Buda, Pest, Cassovia, Posonium, Tirnavia, Barthfa, Eperyes et Sopronium, preterea Vetus Buda, Strigonium, Alba Regalis, Lewchovia, Zakolcza, Cibinium et Zegeginum, item Comani et Philistei omnes necnon Wyssegrad cum duabus insulis Chepel scilicet et altera Ros appellata infra Wyssegrad usque Megyer adiacentibus, insuper Cremnicia, Sebnicia, Bistricia, Zolyom cum ceteris civitatibus montanarum ac

Rivulum Dominarum et castrum Hwzth cum quinque civitatibus et fodinis salium, omnes preterea tricesime regnorum Hungarie et Sclavonie ac omnes camere salium in eisdem habite necnon castra Munkach, Dyosgyewr, item in Transsilvania Saxones regii, omnes fodine et camere salium et loca earundem fodinarum cum civitate Kolosvariensi ac omnes vigesime et cementum ac quinquagesime partibus in eisdem Transsilvaniensibus exigi consuete, deinde castra Gewrgen, Therch et Dewa ibidem adiacencia atque sita.

IV. Quantum autem ad damnorum per malefactores tam rusticos quam eciam nobiles partem rusticorum tenentes dominis et nobilibus illatorum refusionem et recuperacionem attinet, quia publice et magna cum multitudine illa patrata et irrogata existunt, ideo in singulis comitatibus penes vicecomites ac quatuor iudices nobilium, duodecim nobiles bone fame et honeste vite atque condicionis per universitatem nobilium firmissimo sub iuramento obligantur, qui ad facies cunctarum domorum et curiarum nobilium accedant ibique universa damna tam in edificiis et structuris quam etiam utensilibus et supellectilibus domorum atque abduccionibus equorum, boum aliorumque pecorum et pecudum—in quantum visu considerare et etiam testimonio condigno intelligere poterunt—secundum Deum et eius iusticiam bene ponderare estimareque et limitare et dehinc universitati nobilium sub eodem iuramento referre debeant. Et tandem rustici seu coloni illarum civitatum, oppidorum, possessionum ac villarum, que damna prenotata intulisse et irrogasse dinoscuntur, in termino per universitatem nobilium ad id prefigendo domino vel nobili leso et damnum passo refundere restituereque teneantur. Illis tamen dominis, quorum castra hoc disturbii tempore propter malam conservacionem per rusticos sunt intercepta—quia non violenter, sed per dedicionem sunt occupata—restitutio damnorum in hac parte fieri non intelligatur, sed huius modi damna tolerare cogantur.

V. Si quis vero nobilium diceret res suas aureas et argenteas seu paratas pecunias, que scilicet in luce et in publico vel ad noticiam hominum non fuerunt per rusticos ablatas esse, si superinde evidens testimonium vel probabile documentum produci et afferri non poterit, iuramento mediante ab illis rusticis, qui domum suam invaserunt, eas recuperare debebit.

VI. Iuramentum autem huius modi coram ipsis vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium ac duodecim electis iuxta eorundem deliberacionem tempore premissis exequucionis prestare vel si eo tunc nobilis ipse prestare non posset, extunc in sede iudiciaria coram comitibus vel eisdem vicecomitibus ac universitate nobilium deponere tenebitur ita, ut unus nobilis ad decem florenos in hac parte iurandi habeat facultatem.

VII. Ubi autem rustici satisfaccionem de damnis prenotatis in termino ipsis prefigendo nobilibus impendere nollent, extunc comes vel vicecomes ac universitas nobilium eos ad satisfaccionem per omnia remedia opportuna—etiam per direpcionem et ablacionem omnium bonorum ipsorum—compellat. Si vero comes vel vicecomes cum universitate nobilium insufficiens esset, quia aut dominus colonorum resisteret aut rustici in oppido vel civitate munita rebellarent, extunc regia maiestas ad requisicionem et supplicationem comitum vel vicecomitum et iudicum ac universitatis nobilium talis comitatus amonita et requisita cum gentibus suis ac aliorum circumiacencium comitatuum et dominorum huius modi civitates et oppida villasque et rusticos ad premissam satisfaccionem compellere faciat. Et propter rebellionem illorum etiam regie maiestati tantum solvant—si habebunt—quantum nobili leso et damnificato solvere tenebuntur, primo tamen nobili fiat satisfaccio.

VIII. Item super homagiis quoque nobilium interemptorum idem est sciendum atque faciendum, ut scilicet oppida, civitates seu ville, que tempore occisionis interfuerunt et consenserunt, homagia omnium nobilium hoc tempore disturbii necatorum persolvere teneantur. Si vero rustici de alio comitatu damna huius modi vel homicidia intulisse reperientur, extunc comes, vicecomes ac universitas nobilium alterius comitatus per litteras horum comitis, vicecomitis ac iudicum nobilium requisitus teneatur ex parte illorum rusticorum lesis satisfaccionem impendere modo predeclarato.

IX. Quoniam autem nonnulli super eiusce modi damnorum rectificacione contententes etiam innocentes et innoxios ad damnorum solucionem compellere moliebantur asserentes et allegantes duos aut tres, quinque vel sex personas non potuisse de una villa seu oppido mala patrare, si reliqua multitudo aut communitas illis non consensisset, ideo facientes et consencientes pari pena debeant puniri. Hoc licet verum sit consensu deliberato et malicioso, quia tamen rusticus unus alterius potestati non subest, ut alterum aut compellere ad male agendum aut retrahere pravis ab operibus possit et alias equitatis ratio dictat, ut rei et culpabiles puniantur, innocentes autem salvi maneant. Propterea declaratum et statutum est, quod solummodo culpabiles et rei—non autem innocentes—condemnentur sic videlicet, ut si de una villa aut oppido quatuor vel quinque aut plures comperti fuerint esse in culpa et malorum patratores, solum illi aut capitali sententia aut damnorum solutione puniantur, ceteri vero salvi maneant et illesi.

X. Ubi autem coloni et rustici inter se discordes fierent, ut duo aut quatuor, quinque vel sex etc. communitati et e converso communitas illis dumtaxat personis culpam impingeret, extunc dominus terrestris—si in propinquo est—aut officialis eius mox et sine omni dilacione iudicium et iusticiam inter tales faciat et partem illam, quam in culpa esse cognoverit aut scilicet seorsum aut coniunctim ad damnorum solutionem compellat et adstringat.

XI. Quodsi dominus ipse vel officialis facere nollet, extunc ad requisicionem et supplicacionem comitis vel vicecomitis aut universitatis nobilium talis comitatus regia maiestas bona illa et iura possessionaria talis domini vel nobilis occupari faciat usque ad iustam et debitam satisfaccionem.

XII. Ceterum ubi aliquis dominorum terrestrium bona mobilia et res dominorum aut nobilium apud manus rusticorum reperta abstulisse vel eciam proprias res rusticorum suorum hoc pretextu, ne damna illata reddere possent, diripuisse conpertus fuerit, vice versa reddere teneatur, ne damnificati domini vel nobiles in damno permittantur. Quodsi dominus ipse terrestris facere recusaret, extunc bona et iura possessionaria talis per regiam maiestatem modo prenotato occupentur et tamdiu teneantur, donec damnificatis satisfactum fuerit effective.

XIII. Et quod sub hoc colore publici malefactores non evadant, sed—prout limitatum et conclusum est—ubique puniantur, sed providendum semper est, ne innocentes condemnentur.

XIV. Item quamquam omnes rustici, qui adversus dominos eorum naturales insurrexerunt, tanquam proditores capitali pena sint plectendi, ne tamen tot sanguinis effusio adhuc sequatur et omnis rusticitas, sine qua nobilitas parum valet, deleatur, statutum est, quod universi capitanei et centuriones et decuriones concitatoresque aliorum rusticorum ac manifesti homicide nobilium, preterea violatores virginum ac mulierum omni gracia semota occidantur et ubilibet extirpentur. Ceteri autem rustici refusis et persolutis damnis ac homagiis prenotatis in personis eorum salvi maneant. Attamen ut huius modi prodicionis eorum memoria atque temporalis pena eciam ad posteros ipsorum diffundatur et transeat et quam enorme facinus sit in dominos insurgere, omne seculum agnoscat, amodo deinceps universi rustici in hoc regno ubilibet residentes demptis civitatibus liberis et muratis, que maiestati regie fideles fuerunt, et illis quoque exceptis, qui penes dominos eorum et sacram coronam regni huius in vera fidelitate perstiterunt cum aliisque sceleratis rusticis in hac sedicione non participaverunt, per hanc infidelitatis ipsorum notam amissa libertate eorum, qua de loco in locum recedendi habebant facultatem, dominis ipsorum terrestribus mera et perpetua rusticitate sint subiecti neque de cetero contra voluntatem et consensum dominorum suorum de loco in locum recedendi et se se moraturos conferendi habeant facultatem.

XV. Preterea singuli rustici uxorati—sive sessionati seu domos habitantes sive autem inquilini sint—per singulos annos dominis eorum terrestribus singulos centum denarios unum florenum auri facientes quinquaginta scilicet ad Georgii et residuos quinquaginta denarios ad Michaelis archangeli beatorum festa ubilibet solvere teneantur. Et si alicubi locorum plures quam centum denarios hactenus solvere consuevissent, talis census per hanc constitutionem diminutus esse non intelligatur.

XVI. Item qualibet hebdomada singulo uno die dominis ipsorum servire teneantur.

XVII. Item singulis mensibus singulum unum pullum dominis eorum dare sint obligati.

XVIII. Item de omnibus terre nascenciis sive metantur sive falcentur, preterea de vinis dominis ipsorum nonas seu nonam partem ultra decimas prelati eorum debitas solvere teneantur ita, ut ex decem capeciis segetum seu decem cubulis vinorum rustico octo manebunt. Quantum tamen ad decimas attinet, solummodo de illia segetibus, quibus hactenus consueverunt, decimas dare solvereque debebunt.

XIX. Item singulis annis duos anseres unum videlicet tenerum ad penthecostes et alterum antiquum ad beati Martini episcopi et confessoris festa dominis ipsorum solvant.

XX. Item de qualibet villa usque decem sessiones iobagionales continente vel eciam minus ad festum natalis Domini unum porcum saginatum, ubi vero ultra decem fuerint, de singulis decem sessionibus singulum unum porcum similiter saginatum dare teneantur ceteris eciam proventibus dominorum et nobilium ultra hec hactenus dari et percipi consuetis salvis permanentibus.

XXI. Et quod mulieres vidue—que vices iobagionum gerunt—eciam alteri nubentes preter dominorum suorum permissionem recedere nequeant. Puelle tamen et alie mulieres vidue, que apud alios habitant vel aliter vices iobagionum non gerunt, nuptui libere tradantur et recedant, filios tamen si nobiles habuerint, secum abducere non possint, immo si propter teneram etatem mater filium secum abduceret, nichilominus tamen filius ipse perfecta seu nubili etate adveniente ad habitacula sua pristina redire teneatur.

XXII. Item quod universi inquilini infra triennium ab omni solucione censuum exempti et supportati sint et interea domos pro se construere in seriemque et numerum ceterorum iobagionum se se collocare et computare teneantur. Nam aliter—si domos edificare nollent—eciam apud alios residentes censum floreni unius dominis eorum terrestribus solvere teneantur. Si autem aliqui eorum domos proprias modo quoque inhabitarent et res ultra valorem trium florenorum exceptis hereditatibus haberent, tales eciam de presenti ad solucionem censuum instar aliorum colonorum et rusticorum huius iobagionum compellantur.

XXIII. Et quod Philistei et Comani ac ceteri iobagiones regie maiestatis ubilibet residentes—demptis civitatibus liberis et muratis—tam ad censuum et munerum nonarumque solucionem quam eciam serviciorum exhibicionem instar aliorum colonorum et rusticorum huius regni de cetero teneantur et sint obligati.

XXIV. Item quod nemo de rustica progenie natus de cetero in episcopum vel archiepiscopum ob perpetuam premisse rusticane prodicionis memoriam per regiam maiestatem promoveatur et si quispiam promoveretur, nemo illi decimas dare teneatur.

XXV. Item hoc expresse nichilominus declarato, quod articulus de iobagionum ulteriori non recessu vel commigracione prescriptus et predeclaratus, quia plurime maximeque incommoditates et quotidiana fere iurgia pretextu abductionis et retencionis iobagionum hactenus suboriebantur, eque ad omnia loca ac universos iobagonalis et plebeie condicionis homines ubilibet intra limites regni huius et parcium sibi subiectarum residentes referatur et intelligatur ita, ut de cetero iobagionum amissio vel abduccio per omnia cesset perpetuoque aboleatur et extincta maneat semper. Verum de civitatibus liberis regie maiestatia et dominorum in alias civitates similiter liberis eorundem commigracio iobagionum prenotata inter se se per hanc constitutionem interdicta non intelligatur.

XXVI. Item ordinatum est, quod si quis potentum aut alterius cuiusvis status et condicionis hominum iobagiones quorumpiam manu violenta aut aliter contra dominorum suorum voluntatem abduceret, extunc ille, cuius iobagio abduceretur, acceptis penes se uno ex iudicibus nobilium ac aliis quatuor nobilibus illius comitatus, ubi iobagio abductus reperietur, qui omnes sub pena solucionis singulorum centum florenorum per comites vel vicecomites ac ceteros iudices nobilium immediate et irremissibiliter partim pro se, partim vero actori exigendorum requisiti venire tenebuntur, nisi gravi detineantur egritudine vel inevitabili prepediantur necessitate, postquam hoc et id, quod scilicet violenter et contra voluntatem suam fuisset iobagio suus abductus, sufficienter verificari et eundem iobagionem in facie talis oppidi vel talis ville constitutum nobilibus ipsis presente dicto iudice nobilium demonstrare poterit, extunc dominus ille vel nobilis amoneatur ad reddendum una cum rebus suis, qui si reddiderit nichilominus pro violencia—sufficienter tamen prius comprobata—solvat centum florenos partim comitibus vel vicecomitibus ac iudicibus nobilium, partim autem ipsi actori. Quibus solutis—si postea eundem iobagionem apud se temere retinebit—amittat locum illum, in quem iobagio ipse abductus est sive sit civitas sive oppidum sive villa sive porcio. Cuius tertia pars cedat illi, cui violencia illata est, due partes relique maneant regie maiestati.

XXVII. Si vero officialis inscio et ignorante domino suo huius modi violenciam commiserit et id verificari poterit neque dominus in ea re partes officialis sui tutatus fuerit, teneatur officialis violenciam solvere et dominus requisitus iobagionem abductum ad sua bona restituere sub pena premissa. Si autem dominus ipse in remotis ageret et officialis suus ipso inscio patraret violenciam et in retinendo illo contra amonicionem perseveraret dominusque suus ob absenciam requiri non posset, talis officialis pro violencia solvat centum florenos et pro retinendi temeritate amittat bona sua, si que habet nobilitaria. Si vero rusticus est ipse officialis, tradatur per dominum suum ad manus eius, cuius iobagio fuit per illum abductus, qui si non traderetur, amittatur locus ille, quo iobagio fuit abductus. Ubi vero diceret dominus eiusdem officialis eum ad manus tradere non posse, quia aufugisset, iuramento coram comitibus, vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium talis comitatus se expurget, quod postquam sibi violencia ista innotuit, detinere eum non potuit et si non iurabit, homagium illius persolvat. Domini vero prelati, si violenciam huius modi fecerint aut facere procuraverint, pro violencia solvant similiter centum florenos et si perseveraverint in retinendo iobagione abducto, quia bona ecclesie amittere non possunt, in estimacione loci illius, in quem abduxerunt, convincantur. Hoc tamen addito, quod illi vel fratribus illius, qui iobagionem alterius violenter abduci fecerat, regia maiestas ipsas duas partes bonorum suorum donare non possit, ne per hoc abduccio prenotata inulta pretereat et impunita maneat.

XXVIII. Si autem rusticus quispiam salto vel furtim discederet, ille—in cuius bonis reperietur— ad amonicionem et requisicionem domini sui per unum vel duos ex iudicibus nobilium fiendam restituere teneatur. Nam si reddere recusaverit, cum posset et hoc—modo antelato—verificari poterit, extunc penam de violenter abductis prenotatam subibit. Ubi autem abinde quoque iobagio ille furtim vel aliter discederet, super hoc—quod post amonicionem factam illum detinere non potuit—si dominus illius possessionis in propinquo erit, per se, si vero absens fuerit vel in longinquo agit, officialis suus iuramentum prestare tenebitur et si prestare noluerit, homagium illius actori persolvat et comites ac vicecomites satisfaccionem superinde modo prenotato impendant.

XXIX. Si vero civitates libere vel munitae sive Comani sive Philistei aut alii iobagiones regii in medium eorum iobagiones cuiuspiam violenter abducerent aut furtim illuc ipsi iobagiones confugerent et per iudices nobilium cum aliis quatuor nobilibus prenotatis modo antelato requisiti huius modi iobagiones abductos vel fugitivos reddere nollent, extunc iudex et iurati cives talis civitatis et ville, quia bona regia per hoc alienari non possunt, pro quolibet iobagione in ducentis florenis adversus nobilem vel alium actorem et insuper in homagiis talium iobagionum adversus comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium ipsius comitatus, ubi id fieri contingit, convincantur et iidem comites vel vicecomites cum iudicibus nobilium ex parte illorum satisfaccionem impendere et iobagionem reducere teneantur. Si autem etiam hac pena persoluta iobagionem reddere nollent, extunc etiam secundo et tertio ad restituendum amoneantur et quociens reddere recusarent, totiens penam prenotatam incurrant et persolvere teneantur. Si vero iobagio aufugeret, quod post amonicionem detinere illum non potuerunt, iudex et iurati cives coram ipsis comitibus, vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium iuramentum prestent et si non prestiterint, homagium persolvere debebunt modo predeclarato.

Super oppidis etiam et bonis ecclesiarum, quantum ad iobagiones fugitivos, idem est sciendum atque faciendum et si temerarie retinuerint, tandem in estimacione illius loci convincantur.

XXX. Et si rusticus fugitivus aut violenter abductus per dominum suum in campo vel alibi detineri poterit, libere detineatur et ad pristina sua habitacula cum omnibus rebus suis, que in manus domini sui incidere possunt, reducatur.

XXXI. Ubi autem comites vel vicecomites cum iudicibus nobilium et universitate nobilium ad restitutionem huius modi pene insufficientea fierent, extunc in loco communi penes litteras eorundem comitum vel vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium quilibet colonorum et inhabitatorum talis civitatis aut oppidi vel ville cum rebus suis arrestari et ad satisfaccionem compelli possit. Contra ipsos vero comites et vicecomites, si per se ipsos prestarent occasionem premissarum violenciarum, universitas nobilium modo predeclarato procedat et si ad ipsam exequucionem seu processum insufficientis videbitur, tunc maiestas regia superinde requisita illam peragere et peragi facere dignabitur.

XXXII. Et quod persone quoque seculares contra ecclesiasticas civitatesque liberas et iobagiones regios solummodo in pena prenotata et non in amissione possessionis aut ville convincantur.

XXXIII. Item quia nemini dubium, quod preterita affliccio rusticana peccatis nostris exigentibus permittente Deo illata est, peccata autem ex eo creverunt, quod semper impunita manserunt. Inde latrocinia, furta, homicidia, adulteria, falsarum monetarum cusiones, incendia aliaque malorum genera multiplicata fuerunt. Propterea statutum est, quod in omnibus et singulis comitatibus huius regni prenotati vicecomites, iudices nobilium ac duodecim electi iurati, qui ad revisionem et recuperacionem damnorum fuerint deputati, firmissimo sub iuramento universos eiusce modi malefactores tam scilicet nobiles quam eciam ignobiles exquirere de illorumque nominibus experiri et in registrum conscribere et eos tandem iuxta ipsorum demerita punire debeant. Preterea de nobilibus quoque illis, qui rusticis in ipsorum premissa tumultuaria insurreccione adhererunt et partem illorum tenuerunt cum eisque participaverunt, veritatem pariter inquirant et eos omnes, qui culpabiles inventi fuerint, in registrum similiter conscribant atque sub eorum sigillis regie maiestati mittant, ut tandem iuxta seriem huius modi registri illi tanquam proscripti omnibus eorum bonis et iuribus possessionariis destituantur et ad occupacionem eiusce modi bonorum vigore donacionis regie exinde iam facte vel fiende processus amplior non sit necessarius neque requiratur, sed quilibet iuste talia bona impetrans eisdem de facto pociatur. Ne malefactores impuniti maneant et ne innocentes condemnentur! Multi enim nobilium in manus rusticorum incidentes, ne per eos occiderentur, illis adhererunt et se se subdiderunt, postquam tamen potuerunt, mox illos reliquerunt et ab eis aufugerunt et tales condemnari non debent.

XXXIV. Et quia omnes fere nobiles comitatus Maramarosiensis partem rusticorum tenuisse et cunctis eorum pravis perniciosisque actibus participasse dicuntur, ideo super illis in comitatibus de Wgocha et de Bereg fiat veritatis inquisicio prenotata.

XXXV. Et quod regia maiestas bona talium sceleratorum nobilium dominis et magnatibus—qui eciam alioquin satis habent—non conferat et si iam contulisset, huius modi collacio nullius sit firmitatis, sed illis donet, quorum fratres aut patres per rusticos occisi sunt; item illis, qui maiestati sue et regno in campis et exercitibus armata manu vel castris fideliter servierunt; preterea illis, qui ex rusticis parentibus nati sunt, sed penes ipsorum dominos et nobiles fideliter et probe servierunt eisque in ipsorum periculis astiterunt, ut eciam reliqui rustici fideliores hoc exemplo reddantur et dominis eorum de cetero fervencius obsequantur. Et si quis bene impetrata bona illis, quorum fuerunt, favore remitteret vel gratis tanquam particeps sceleris, eadem pena condemnentur.

XXXVI. Et quod gracia regia tam rusticis malefactoribus, quantum ad personas eorum, quam eciam nobilibus eisdem rusticis adherentibus et partem eorum modo antelato tenentibus, quantum ad bonorum ipsorum recuperacionem, iam forsitan facta vel fienda suffragari non possit, sed omnino iuxta eorum demerita puniantur, ut de cetero eciam alii per hoc exemplati a vera fidelitate non discedant. De reliquis quoque malefactoribus in ipsis iudiciis seu exequucionibus comitatum proscibendis idem est intelligendum, ut omnes semota gracia puniantur ceterique in posterum terreantur et ad similia perpetranda facinora se se non apponant.

XXXVII. Ubi vero eiusce modi malefactores rustici existentes de bonis aliquorum ad manus comitum, vicecomitum ac iudicum nobilium ad infligendam illis penam a iure statutam non assignarentur, dum requirerentur, extunc in homagiis eorundem convincantur serveturque modus et ordo in amonicione et requisicione huius modi, qui super capitaneorum centurionumque et decurionum etc. rusticorum punicione conscriptus est. Et preterea ubicunque et per quemcunque tales malefactores sive nobiles sive rustici existant, comprehendi poterunt, penes litteras comitum ac vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium superinde confectas omni gracia semota occidantur necarique valeant atque possint.

XXXVIII. Item quia plures nobilium per rusticos etsi non interempti, tamen capti et diversis eciam cruciatibus ac verberibus affecti fuere, ideo iidem rustici, qui vel de quibus locis hec patrarunt, homagia talium nobilium viva hoc est centum florenos auri restituere teneantur limitatione pretactorum vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium et aliorum duodecim electorum hominum mediante.

XXXIX. Et ante omnia prenominati capitanei, centuriones, decuriones concitatoresque et seductores rusticorum necnon manifesti homicide nobilium stupratoresque puellarum et violatores mulierum tempore, quo super damnis illatis exequucio fiet, per antefatos vicecomites et iudices nobilium ac duodecim electos in singulis comitatibus resciantur et consignentur atque per eos, in quorum bonis modo latitant vel si in remotis illi agerent, per officialem et si officialis quoque abesset, per iudicem et iuratos cives et si idem iudex et iurati cives essent tales malefactores, per universitatem colonorum ad intimacionem et requisicionem ipsorum vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium ac duodecim electorum ad locum sedia iudicarie comitatum ad primam scilicet sedem importentur ibique capite condemnentur.

XL. Verumtamen super capitaneis mera rei veritas inquiretur, si quispiam illorum sponte vel proprio motu capitaneatum suscepit vel autem compulsive et metu alios rusticos precessit. Nam si coactus precessit penam capitalem non meretur.

XLI. Si qui autem contrarium facere presumerent sive domini seculares ac nobiles aive autem civitates libere vel munite sive Philistei vel Comani aut alii iobagiones regii sive officiales aut oppida vel ville ecclesiarum pro quolibet tali malefactore in singulis quadringentis florenia convincantur. Et tocians, quociens requisiti ad infligendam penam dare et importare illos noluerint, in ipsa pena solucionis quadringentorum florenorum partim hys, contra quos excesserunt, partim vero comitibus, vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium condemnentur. Fiatque exequucio per omnia, sicuti de iobagionibus de cetero violenter abducendis et aufugiendis haberetur superius expressata.

XLII. Ubi vero quispiam talem malefactorem aufugisse et post amonicionem non potuisse comprehendere allegaret, ille iuramento decimo se, si nobilis fuerit, si ignobilis quadragesimo se iuxta scilicet homagium expurget et si non iurabit, homagium eius persolvat.

XLIII. Si qui vero comitatum cupiunt et a regia maiestate postulabunt super exquirendis et extirpandis prenarratis omnibus malefactoribus tam scilicet nobilibus quam ignobilibus, sed et illis nobilibus, qui rusticis adhererunt et partem illorum tenuerunt, iudicium generale seu palatinale per maiestatem suam celebrandum concedatur, prout habetur in decreto.

XLIV. Item quod omnes rustici, qui hoc disturbii tempore preter dominorum vel dominarum ipsorum voluntatem discesserunt, per comites ad pristina eorum habitacula simul cum rebus eorum reducantur et in huius modi reduccione servetur modus et ordo, qui in nova abductione iobagionum observabitur. De ceteris vero abductionibus iobagionum ante disturbium indebite factis, si qui lites iam habent superinde motas, servetur modus et ordo prius iuxta decretum observatus.

XLV. Ubi autem comites vel vicecomites per se ipsos essent in causa, tunc iudices nobilium cum universitate nobilium exequucionem premissam peragendi habeant auctoritatem. Et si universitas ipsa cum iudicibus nobilium ad eandem exequucionem non sufficeret, regia maiestas illam peragat peragereque faciat semper.

XLVI. Item quod waywode et beslie in partibus inferioribus constituti cessent et deleantur et si in quorum bonis infra proximum festum beatorum innocentum martirum non deponerentur, tales pro quolibet waywoda singulos quadringentos florenos persolvant et si persolutis illis adhuc tenere eos comperti fuerint, amittant loca illa seu bona, in quibus reperientur. De besliis autem comites vel vicecomites faciant proclamare, ut beslie cessent et supersedeant a rapinis atque furtis. Qui si cessaverint, bene quidem, alioquin autem per eosdem comites vel vicecomites suspendantur. Et si domini eorum contradicerent, loca ipsa, ubi habitant, pariter amittant et ea regia maiestas, cui donare voluerit, libere conferre possit.

XLVII. Et ne de cetero quispiam rusticorum sediciones in populo concitare et presertim puellas et mulieres nobiles violare presumat, sed omnem successivam posteritatem illata propterea pena terreat utque omne seculum agnoscat pariter et reminiscatur, quam detestabile, quam enorme quamve turpe vicium sit post Deum apud Hungaros virginum defloracio ac mulierum violacio, universi tales presumptuosi Deoque et hominibus detestandi latrones horrenda nece pereant et eorum quoque posteritates filii videlicet et filie ac fratres carnales ita puniantur, ut nunquam de cetero de illorum progenie iudex aut iuratus civis vel villicus in medio aliorum rusticorum aliquis eligatur nemoque in curia principis vel dominorum ac nobilium ex eis famulari unquam possit et nullus eorum ad aliquem honorem promoveatur, sed tanquam maledicte generacionis iugo perpetue servitutis et rusticitatis subiecti reatus ipsorum penam lugeant sine fine. Si vero non uxorati talia patrasse deprehendantur, eorum nichilominus patres et tota progenies premissa infamia condemnentur.

XLVIII. Domini vero prelati per eorum visitatores huiusce sceleris participes presbiteros exquiri statim et perpetuis carceribus mancipari faciant. Immo si per quospiam nobiles vel eorum famulos comprehendi poterunt, libere detineantur et ad manus prelati sui vel factoris eiusdem tradantur penam prenotatam luituri.

XLIX. Item quod universa bona et quelibet iura possessionaria quorumcunque nobilium aut per notam infidelitatis aut defectum seminis hys disturbiorum temporibus impetrata et per plerosque potentes occupata statim et de facto remittantur et eciam proventus eorum hactenus qualitercunque percepti restituantur. Et si non remitterentur proventusque non restituerentur per comites nichilominus ac vicecomites restituantur. Et insuper propter violenciam tanquam contra violentos et potencialiter detentores iudicium atque sententia decernatur habita statim superinde evocatione ita tamen, ut post remissionem bonorum donacio maneat in vigore et prosequatur regni de lege, si quispiam impetratorum inquisitionem super flagiciosis et partem rusticorum tenentibus nobilibus predeclaratam expectare noluerit.

L. Et si soli comites vel vicecomites fuerint bonorum ipsorum detentores, tunc per iudices et universitatem nobilium restitucio nichilominus peragatur. Et preterea sententia modo preallegato facta evocatione contra eos feratur.

LI. Res eciam nobilium universe—demptis illis, que in prelio sunt consequute vel recepte—sub pena minoris facti potencie ac estimacionis et valoris rerum ipsarum restituantur. Et si non redderentur, prehabita amonicione per iudices nobilium in facto ipso minoris potencie et preterea in estimacione rerum ipsarum—ut prefertur—detentores earundem convincantur et comites ac vicecomites et iudices nobilium leso satisfaccionem superinde impendant. Secundo autem si requisiti reddere nollent, in duplo condemnentur et sic consequenter convincantur. Ubi vero comites etc. vicecomites et iudices nobilium ad exequucionem insufficientes erunt regia maiestas et supplicacionem comitum exequucionem ipsam peragat. Et si qui nobilium equos aut arma vel alias res amiserunt in bello contra rusticos, teneantur illos quoque et illa modo et sub pena premissis reddere, si reperientur. Et insuper per universos dominos prelatos et ecclesiarum rectores cunctis presbiteris diocesibus eorum subiectis, immo eciam fratribus cuiuslibet ordinis sub excommunicacionis pena committatur, ut neminem absolvant, nisi primum bona nobilium—preterquam in prelio adepta et consequuta—reddant, immo tales, qui habent, ubique publice excommunicatos denuncient.

LII. Preterea plures perhibentur ease in regno, qui aliorum bona propter damna forsitan ipsis illata vel eciam damnabilis lucri causa notabilibus pecuniarum summis taxarunt et plerosque aliorum rusticos de eorum domibus extrahentes vel aliter extra prelia captivantes pactarunt. Ne igitur coloni ipsi et rustici duplici solucione graventur, tempore revisionis et limitacionis pretactorum damnorum omnium dominorum et nobilium eciam super huius modi taxacione et pactacione per predictos vicecomites et quatuor iudices nobilium ac duodecim iuratos electos veritas inquiretur et si quid extorsisse aliqui reperientur, refundere et ad sortem damnorum omnium dominorum ac nobilium—prout limitatum ibi fuerit—deponere teneantur. Qui si reluctarentur vel iuridice forsitan aliter amoniti, restituere recusarent, tanquam contra potentes sententia maior decernatur. Et iudices ordinarii vel comites ac vicecomites cum iudicibus nobilium exequucionem contra eos peragant et si per se ipsos forsitan essent reluctantes, universitas nobilium in exequucionem procedat. Ubi vero comites vel vicecomites cum iudicibus nobilium aut ipsa universitas ad exequendum non sufficerent, regia maiestas curare dignabitur fieri omnimodam exequucionem in premissis.

LIII. Item quia multorum nobilium littere ac litteralia instrumenta hoc tempore disturbii perierunt et per rusticos incinerata vel in partes dilacerata sunt, ideo regia maiestas omnibus illis nobilibus iura eorum possessionaria nove donacionis sue titulo cum declaracione huius perniciet donare dignetur. Et quia iidem nobiles rebus eorum despoliati sunt, ideo dominus cancellarius sine redempcione litteras huius modi donacionales restituat et restitui facere velit.

LIV. Deindeque cunctorum talium bonorum metas vernali statim tempore adveniente regia maiestas per magistros prothonotarios reambulari et rectificari faciat. Et non solum huius modi bonorum, verum eciam ex parte ipsorum Comanorum et Philisteorum ac Zegediensium necnon ex parte Moravie, Austrie, Stirie, Carinthie et generaliter omnes metas regni iuxta contenta decreti pariter rectificari faciat.

LV. Item quod regia maiestas sigillum suum iuridicum seu iudiciale persone seculari bene merite iurisque et litterarum perite conferat, que semper Bude maneat et cunctas causas transmissionales atque breves brevium iudicet et littere racione brevis brevium sub sigillis omnium iudicum ordinariorum regni emanari possint. Verum evocacio seu amonicio in presenciam regiam modo hactenus observato fiat. Et cause huiusce modi per ipsam personalem presenciam iudicentur, nisi forsitan ex transmissione eiusdem fuerint in presenciam aliorum iudicum deducte.

LVI. Item de honoribus comitatum per regiam maiestatem exnunc providendum est, quia negligencia aliquando et vicio, interdum vero potencia et insolencia comitum multa incommoda sequuntur. Et quod honor comitatus Hewesiensis iuxta contenta decreti persone seculari conferatur, quia episcopus Agriensis extra regnum moratur, qui si ad residenciam venerit vel autem ecclesia ipsa prelatum alium residentem habuerit, honor eiusce modi comitatus iterum ad ecclesiam redeat.

LVII. Item quod quilibet nobilium turres et fortalicia pro defensione persone et rerum suarum cum propugnaculis et fossatis erigere, preterea in singulis comitatibus unum castrum pro communitate nobilium cum scitu regie maiestatis construi possit.

LVIII. Item quod nonas omnes civitatenses in terris aliorum vineas habentes vel araturas facientes dominis terrestribus iuxta contenta decreti dare solveque teneantur.

LIX. Item quod preter unum beneficium nemo spiritualium et ecclesiasticarum personarum secundum decreti formam de cetero tenere vel gubernare possit et ea statim regia maiestas bene meritis conferat, aliter autem illa ad conservacionem castrorum finitimorum convertantur.

LX. Item quod presbyteri non beneficiati et scholares scholas inhabitantes arma vel pixides de cetero gerere non audeant. Nam si presbyter aut scholaris nisi extra regnum transiturus arma vel pixides de cetero tulerit eciam per rusticanam manum ablatis suis armis aut pixidibus comprehendi possit ac ad manus prelati vel archidiaconi sui, si in propinquo erit, aliter autem vicearchidiaconi vinctus assignari debebit, qui illum manibus domini prelati sui vel factoris eiusdem tradere teneatur carceribus mancipandum et gravi pena puniendum, quod si ipse vicearchidiaconus facere recusaret, extunc solus ipse per comitem vel vicecomitem captivetur et ad manus ipsius domini prelati vel eius factoris tradatur pena prenotata puniendus. Preterea quod bubulci vulgari sermone haydones nuncupati cuspides et alia arma pariter non deferant et neque rustici pixides gerere presumant, nam aliter si haydo arma gesserit, per quemcunque et ubicunque deprehendi poterit, primo castretur, secundo, si iterum arma tulerit, decoletur vel alia morte mulctetur. Rusticus vero si pixidem habuerit, dextra manu truncetur.

LXI. Item statutum est, quod pro pecudum aut pecorum conservacione in terris aliorum nemo rusticorum eciam liberarum vel aliarum civitatum regiarum domos seu casas de cetero campestrales sive tuguria communi vocabulo zallas nuncupata tenere aut conservare possit, ut per hoc malicia haydonum cesset et depereat. Nobiles autem si huius modi domos in eorum terris propriis tenuerint, custodes nichilominus uxoratos et tales quidem, qui bone fame et honeste condicionis sint, ibidem tenere debeant, ne de illorum pravis actibus mala cuiquam inferantur. Ipsi eciam cives et alii rustici in eorum terris et territoriis similiter facere teneantur. Nam aliter pecudes et pecora talium omnium et nobilium et civium ac rusticorum inibi reperienda talium comitatum, in quibus ea fieri contingeret, auferantur et insuper cuncta tuguria civium ac rusticorum in terris et territoriis dominorum ac nobilium preter eorum consensum erecta, que tempore revisionis et refusionis premissorum damnorum per rusticos nuper illatorum reperientur, per eosdem comites ac vicecomites et universitatem nobilium illorum comitatum distrahantur et si iterum erigentur, pecudes et pecora tandem auferantur. Ubi autem comites ac vicecomites cum ipsa universitate nobilium ad hanc exequucionem peragendam impotentes erunt, regia maiestas et supplicacionem amonita exequucionem huius modi peragere faciat semper.

LXII. Item quod maiestas regia illa bona, que per defectum seminis aliquorum nobilium per rusticos interemptorum ad collacionem maiestatis sue legitime devoluta esse dinoscuntur, nemini simpliciter conferat et si contulisset, donacio ipsa nullius sit firmitatis, sed si nobilis interemptus filias habuerit, eisdem filiabus maiestas sua perpetuo donet. Si vero filiabus quoque caruerit, extunc relicte eius maiestas sua in perpetuum conferat, ita tamen ne relicta ipsa vel filia rustico nubat, nam sic—cuicumque maiestas sua voluerit—libere donet. Puella eciam nobilis, si rustico eciam patre vel fratribus consencientibus de cetero nupserit, sola quarta puellari contentetur. Et huius modi donaciones regie filiabus vel uxoribus interemptorum nobilium modo prehabito fiende fratribus condivisionalibus occisorum vel eis, ad quos de iure bona ipsa sunt devoluta, preiudicari non intelligantur, sed que ad collacionem maiestatis regie dinoscuntur rite et legittime redacta extitisse, filiabus ipsis et uxoribus illa dumtaxat erunt conferenda.

LXIII. Item quod universa decreta iam rectificentur et in unum comportentur iuraque regni scripta regia maiestas statim perlegi facere et perlecta confirmare confirmataque et sigillata ad singulos regni comitatus remittere dignetur.

LXIV. Ceterum quia plerique decimatorum tempore decimacionis vinorum omnes indifferenter nobiles et ignobiles quantumcunque exiguo et vili pro debito vel alio negotio arestare consuevisse perhibentur, arestacio autem iuxta generalis decreti formam preter unum casum ibidem declaratum fieri non potest et alias decimatoribus ipsis non iudicandi quemquam, sed decimandi dumtaxat data est facultas, propterea iidem decimatores se de cetero in negotium aresti preter factum decimarum ingerere vel immittere nullatenus presumant. Nam si non cessaverint eciam coloni talium locorum ad decimarum solucionem non compellantur, sed decime ipse per dominos terrestres in hac parte exigantur et ad castrorum finitimum reformationem convertantur.

LXV. Item quoniam plurirni beneficiariorum ecclesiasticorum aut privatis eorum pro rebus aut ceterorum consociariorum negociis expediendis in urbem proficiscuntur ibique sepe numero moriuntur et sic eorum beneficia per summum pontificem exteris nacionibus et advenis contra regni huius libertatem crebro conferuntur, ideo deliberatum est, ut amodo deinceps quilibet dominorum prelatorum ac aliorum virorum ecclesiasticorum beneficiariorum urbem petiturus, antequam itineri se submittat, teneatur de patrimonio suo in proventibus tantum maiestati regie et sacre corone sue obligare et inscribere, quantum proventus beneficii sui annualis valere dinoscitur. Si vero tantum patrimonii non haberet, teneatur—priusquam ingrediatur—litteras a summo pontifice assecutorias impetrare, quodsi eciam in urbe casu decederet, beneficium nichilominus suum in hoc regno salvum permaneat et illesum.

LXVI. Item quod monete extere in regnum non inducantur et inducte non recipiantur, sed ubicunque et apud quoscunque reperiri poterunt, auferantur. Et ut facilius et cicius huius modi pecunie eradiceantur et iterum non inducantur, boves et equi atque oves—prout in tribus iam decretis conclusum habetur—de regno non educantur, sed usque Pest dumtaxat et Albam Regalem abigantur, in quibus quidem locis vel eciam alias—ubi poterunt et maluerint—in medio regni naciones extere boves, oves et equos pecuniis Hungaricalibus emant et comparent, nam non extere naciones, sed Hungari huius modi animalia exteris in regnis vendentes pecunias alienas inducere solent. Si qui vero contrarium facerent, tam boves et equi quam eciam oves iuxta decreti formam semper auferantur.

LXVII. Item quod regia maiestas tam ad Iayczam quam Croaciam banos exnunc et de facto constituat ac debitam provisionem et ordinationem faciat, ne periculo subiciantur.

LXVIII. Et quod ad omnia castra finitima per maiestatem regiam provisores deputentur, qui ad ingenia victualiaque provideant et invigilare teneantur semper. Item quod thesaurarius regius pro tempore constitutus solo eo officio thesaurarius fungatur et penes maiestatem regiam semper maneat, ut eo commodius res et negocia sue maiestatis et regni sui dirigere et illis superintendere queat omniaque in factis publicis regie maiestatis et regni cum sue maiestatis et consilii sui deliberacione faciat.

LXIX. Item conclusum est, quod universi actus potenciarum noveque occupaciones per dominos et nobiles in alterutrum hys disturbiorum temporibus a festo scilicet beati Georgii martiris proxime preterito usque modo festum scilicet beate Elizabet vidue quomodocunque et quocienscunque illati et patrati—habita primum legitima superinde evocacione—in termino celebracionis brevium iudiciorum amodo deinceps celebrandorum ante omnes alias causas discuciantur et adiudicentur. Que quidem cause, si in eodem termino finiri non poterunt, in sequenti et tercio termino similiter de illis fiat, quod videlicet ante omnes alias causas extraque omnem seriem leventur et terminentur. Relique deinde cause iuxta decreti contenta iudicentur.

LXX. Quia vero plurimi rusticorum in confinibus regni residencium ob gravamina et servicia ipsis ob eorum demerita de presenti imposita ad extera regna videlicet Poloniam, Moldaviam Moraviamque et Austriam secedere creduntur moraturi; quod fieri ne possit, sacra maiestas regia ad eadem regna sic scribere dignetur, ut coloni et rustici illuc transeuntes moraturi semper reddantur et ad pristina eorum habitacula reducantur, immo potius nec illuc immittantur.

LXXI. Postremo quod loca, que in transacto disturbio per dominos et nobiles ad rusticorum rabiem domandam combusta et incinerata sunt, in ea parte, ubi combustio facta est, a contribucione regia atque exercituali hoc venturo triennio relaxentur.

Nos itaque premissis supplicacionibus prefatorum dominorum prelatorum ac baronum et regni nostri nobilium modo et ordine superius expressato nostre factis maiestati tanquam iustis et rationabilibus inclinati prescriptos articulos commune bonum ac quietum statum et utilitatem ipsius regni nostri in se continentes acceptavimus, approbavimus et ratificavimus, immo acceptamus et sub eisdem condicionibus, quibus editi et superius conscripti existunt, approbamus et ratificamus. Nos quoque eosdem et omnia in eisdem contenta atque specificata inviolabiliter observare et per alios eciam observari facere promittimus et obligamus presentis scripti nostri patrocinio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes litteras nostras privilegiales appensione secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, communitas duximus concedendas. Datum Bude in festo beate Elizabet vidue tricesimo scilicet tercio die diete et convencionis generalis prenotate anno Domini millesimo quingentesimo decimo quarto regnorum nostrorum Hungarie etc. anno vigesimo quinto, Bohemie vero quadagesimo quinto.

Reverendissimis reverendisque in Christo patribus dominis Thoma tituli sancti Martini in Montibus sancte Romane ecclesie presbitero cardinali ac patriarcha Constantinopolitano et apostolice sedis de latere legato Strigoniensis, Gregorio de Frangepanibus Colocensis ac Bachiensis ecclesiarum canonice unitarum archiepiscopis necnon illustrissimo ac reverendissimo Ippolito Estensi de Aragonia sancte similiter ecclesie Romane diacono cardinali Agriensis, Iohanne de Erdewd electo Zagradiensis, Francisco de Warda Transsilvanensis, Francisco de Peren electo Waradiensis, Georgio Quinque Ecclesiensis, secretario cancellario nostro, Petro Beryzlo Wesprimiensis, summo thesaurario nostro ac regnorum nostrorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie bano, Iohanne Gozthon Iauriensis, Ladislao Zalkano Vaciensis, Francisco de Chahol Chanadiensis, Stephano de Podmanyn Nitriensis, Iohanne Orzagh de Gwth Sirimiensis, Michaele Kesserew de Gybarth Boznensis electis et Briccio de Egerwara Tininiensis ecclesiarum episcopis ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus.

Item spectabilibus et magnificis Emerico de Peren prenotata comite perpetuo comitatus Abawywariensis, predicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino et iudice Comanorum nostrorum, comite Petro Comite de Sancto Georgio et de Bozyn iudice curie nostre, Iohanne de Zapolya comite perpetuo terre Scepusiensis, waywoda nostro Transsilvanensi et comite Siculorum nostrorum ac generali capitaneo nostro, eodem Iohanne de Zapolya et Barnaba de Bela Zewriniensibus banis, Stephano de Bathor comite Themesiensi ac parcium regni nostri inferiorum capitaneo generali, Blasio de Raska thavernicorum. Moyse Bwzlav de Gergellaka ianitorum, Iohanne Dragffy de Belthewk dapiferorum, Iohanne Banffy de Lyndwa pincernarum, Michaele de Palocz cubiculariorum, Georgio de Bathor predicta agazonum nostrorum regalium magistris et Iohanne Bornemyzza de Berzencze comite Psoniensi aliisque complurimis comitatus regni nostri tenentibus et honores.

19 NOVEMBER 1514

We, Wladislas, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia and Lodomeria, duke of Silesia and Luxemburg, and margrave of Moravia and Lusatia¹ command to memory by these presents to all whom it concerns: [1] That when we often reflected in our mind and considered all the dangers caused to this kingdom of Hungary of ours by the infidel enemy, the ruination and destruction of the border castles and also that most abominable rebellion that the peasant folk stirred up last year in the very heart of this our realm against the magnates and the entire nobility, with enormous and completely unheard-of cruelty, murdering many excellent persons and shedding much blood;² furthermore, that all the disturbances that have afflicted the state of this same kingdom not without grave disadvantage to it originated mainly from the cause that order, without which, as we read, no commonwealth can be well governed, was removed from all affairs and tasks, and in consequence, with restraint set aside, everything was set on its head, as if by a whirlwind, to the very great harm of the entire country. [2] Therefore, lamenting both the severe injuries and the painful losses of our said kingdom of Hungary, we called and held a general diet and meeting of all lords prelates, barons and other gentlemen of our realm to the recently passed feast of St Luke the Evangelist,³ [3] to which, when all were assembled, we explained the reasons for this gathering and in company with them proposed certain matters which seemed to us to be for the welfare of this country of ours and encouraged them that they deliberate on these and establish what would be most pleasing to God and what would be of profit and benefit to the public good of the said kingdom. [4] The said lords prelates, barons and the other gentlemen of the realm, understanding our intent, accordingly discussed these matters much and at length; then, once they had finished, gathering their opinions, they presented to our majesty a number of articles constructed and composed with the common consent and general agreement (excepting the articles on criminal matters and those regarding the integrity of the clergy to which the lords prelates could not agree),⁴ [5] requesting with due insistence that we deign to accept and approve them and confirm them by inserting them into our letters, [6] asserting that these are such by which, providing they are properly observed, the state of the whole country can be preserved in its full

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² On the peasant uprising that erupted in the spring of 1514 and was defeated in July, usually referred to as that of György Dózsa (Székely), see the studies listed in the Preface, above. See also Paul Freedman, Images of the Medieval Peasant (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1999), pp. 272–81.

³ 18 October 1514.

⁴ We were not able to establish anything about these issues.

splendor, all dangers repelled, and the peace and security lost during these times be restored for all. These articles follow accordingly and are such:

1. Then, it is known to all what great and frequent dangers attended and arose in the affairs of the royal majesty and the whole country by the pledging and temporary alienation of the real and just revenues of the Holy Crown of the kingdom to diverse persons, as was done hitherto. [1] In order to eliminate these and to restore and mend the court and affairs of the royal majesty, it was first decided that all revenues of the royal majesty, that is the thirtieth and twentieth, the mines and chambers of salt, the gold and silver mines and the royal cities have to be really returned. After making accounts, if the royal majesty owes any sum to anyone, that shall be repaid from these revenues over time, [2] so that one half of the revenues go to the royal majesty and the other half to him who held them in farm or pledge. [3] In respect of the thirtieths and royal cities in the hands of Voivode John,⁵ the arrangement is different, because he performed many great services to the royal majesty and the kingdom and, among much else, relieved the castle of Timișoara that was strongly besieged by George Székely,⁶ defeated the priest Lawrence,⁷ and swiftly destroyed the peasant rabble. [3] Therefore, in order that both the royal majesty receive his revenues and cities and the lord voivode his money, on the next two occasions over the year, whenever these are, ten pennies (which make twenty pennies in all) shall be assigned to the hand of the lord voivode from the war taxes, that is from the upkeep of troops. [5] And these twenty pennies have to be levied on the goods of all lords and nobles, of the majesties of the king and the queen, and from the goods of the same voivode as well. [6] And once the lord voivode has recovered his capital, he has to return both the thirtieths and the royal cities.

2. Henceforth the royal majesty shall not pledge to anyone his royal revenues without the counsel and consent of his appointed council under any necessity whatsoever. [1] For should any of the lords or nobles have these revenues pledged to himself, he shall lose this sum right away. [2] Moreover, such a usurer shall be convicted to the estimation of that revenue or royal city.⁸

3. In order to avoid doubt as to the royal revenues and property rights, it pleased us to list them here: [1] They are, first, the eight free cities, namely Buda, Pest, Košice, Pressburg, Trnava, Bardejov, Prešov and Sopron; [2] Then Ó-Buda, Esztergom, Székesfehérvár, Levoča, Skalica, Sibiu and Szeged.⁹

⁵ John Szapolyai. or Zápolya, 1490/1-1540, was voivod of Transylvania and eternal ispán of Szepes 1510-26, king of Hungary 1526-40, leader of the noble opposition in the 1500s.

⁶ The peasant army besieged Timișoara for almost a month before Szapolyai's troops defeated them. They capitulated on July 15 and their leaders were cruelly executed.

⁷ The priest Lawrence was commander of a peasant troop in eastern Hungary that was defeated by the nobles at the end of July and its leader burnt at the stake in Cluj.

⁸ Cf. 1439: 16

⁹ On the free royal cities of different types, see Pál Engel, The Realm of St Stephen, (London: Tauris, 2001) pp. 253–54.

[3] Further, all the Cumans and Jász.

[4] Also: Visegrád with the two islands, that is Csepel and the one below Visegrád, all the way to Megyer, called Ros;¹⁰

[5] Moreover Kremnica, Banská Štiavnica, Banská Bistrica, Zvolen with the other mining towns

[6] and Baia Mare, the castle of Khust with the five cities and the salt mines.

[7] Beyond this, all the thirtieths in Hungary and Slavonia, as well as the chambers of salt there;

[8] and also the castles of Mukacheve and Diósgyőr.

[9] Then in Transylvania, the royal Saxons, all mines and chambers of salt and the mineheads along with the city of Cluj,

[10] and all the twentieths, the arbitrage of gold exchange,¹¹ and the fiftieth that is usually exacted in Transylvania;

[11] finally the castles of Gurghiu, Bran and Deva, located there.¹²

4. Regarding recompense and reimbursement for damages caused to the lords and nobles by evildoers, both peasants and nobles who took the side of the peasants; as they were caused and openly done by a great mob, [1] so in every county the community of nobles shall elect under strict oath twelve nobles of good repute and honest life and rank, in addition to the alispáns and the four noble magistrates. They should go to the place of every noble house and residence and be held to well consider, estimate and survey according to God and His justice all damage to buildings and constructions as well as to the equipment and furniture of homes, and those caused by the driving off of horses, oxen and other cattle and animals, as far as they can ascertain by sight and reliable testimony. These they then shall report under the same oath to the community of nobles. [2] Then the tenants or peasants of those cities, towns, estates, and villages which are known to have caused and done the aforementioned damages¹³ have to recompense and reimburse the lords and nobles so harmed at a term to be set by the community of nobles. [3] Recompense for damages is not granted to those lords whose castles were at the time of the disturbances taken by the peasants because of poor upkeep (as they were not seized violently but were given up),¹⁴ but they are made to bear these losses.

¹⁰ The great Danube island Csepel and the one presently called Szentendre Island were in fact the last remains of the formerly sizeable royal estates.

¹¹ Cementum meant the office of the chamber responsible for the mandatory exchange of gold (and consequently the income resulting from the exchange). The master of the cementum decided the purity of gold and consequently its price. See Márton Gyöngyössy, “Magyar pénztörténet (1000–1526)” [Hungarian monetary history (1000–1526)], in Márton Gyöngyössy (ed.), Magyar középkori gazdaság- és pénztörténet. Jegyzet és forrásgyűjtemény (Budapest: Bölcsész Konzorcium, 2006), p. 259.

¹² These three castles originally belonged to the honor of the ispán of the Székely, and were the last remaining royal castles in Transylvania.

¹³ On the details of this kind of collective responsibility, see below Art. 9.

¹⁴ The castles of Lipova, Şoimoş, Şimand and Gyula are known to have been given up by their commanders without a fight; see Antal Fekete Nagy and Gábor Barta, Parasztháború 1514-ben [Peasant war in 1514] (Budapest: Gondolat, 1973), p. 131.

5. Should, however, a noblemen maintain that peasants took his gold or silver objects or ready cash which were not clearly known about or of which people had no knowledge, [1] if no evident testimony or credible document can be produced, then he should recover these things under oath from the peasants who invaded his house.

6. This oath is to be sworn before the alispáns, the noble magistrates and the twelve elected men according to their decision at the time of the aforementioned examination, [1] or, if this nobleman is unable to swear it at this time, then he has to take the oath at the judicial seat before the ispáns or alispáns and the community of nobles, [2] in such a way that one nobleman can swear in this matter up to ten florins.¹⁵

7. Should, however, the peasants refuse to restore the said damages to the nobles at the term set for them, [1] then the ispán or alispán and the community of nobles shall force them to render satisfaction by every suitable means—including the confiscation and seizure of all their goods. [2] Should, however, the ispán or alispán with the noble community be unable to do this, either because the lord of the tenant peasants resists or because the peasants in a town or walled city rebel,¹⁶ then the royal majesty shall force cities, towns, villages or peasants of this type —at the request and urging of the ispán or alispán, the noble magistrates and the community of nobles— with his troops and those of nearby counties and lords to render the aforementioned due.[3] And because of their resistance, they have to pay to the royal majesty the same amount—if they have it—as to the harmed and injured nobleman; nevertheless, the nobleman shall be satisfied first.

8. Then regarding the man-price of murdered noblemen the same has to be observed and done, [1] namely that those towns, cities or villages that participated and conspired at the time of the slaughter have to pay the man-price of all the nobles who were killed at this time of trouble. [2] If, in turn, peasants of another county are found to have committed such damages and murders, then the ispán, alispán and noble community of that other county shall make the peasants render satisfaction when so requested by letters of the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates.

9. There are some who demand satisfaction for damages of this type and attempt to force the innocent and blameless to pay for the damages, arguing and maintaining that two or three, or five and six persons from a village or town could not have committed wrongs except with the agreement of the rest of the people or the community, so perpetrators and abettors should be punished equally. [1] While this may be true where there is deliberate and malicious consent, nevertheless, since one peasant is not subject to another in such a way that the other can either force him to evil or prevent him from doing bad deeds, and as equity anyhow demands that the guilty be punished and the innocent remain unscathed; [2] it has, therefore, been decided and decreed that only the culprits and the criminals be condemned, and not the innocents, so that if it is established that from a village or town four, five or more are guilty and evildoers, only they should suffer capital punishment or pay damages, and the others shall remain unpunished and unharmed.

¹⁵ Cf. Tripartitum II, 32: 11, where however, a noble's oath is said to be worth only 4 florins.

¹⁶ 'Peasants of walled cities' is a peculiar expression, considering that such cities usually enjoyed burgher rights, and thus rusticus is probably here intended to mean all non-nobles.

10. Should, however, the tenants and peasants disagree among themselves whether the two or four or six or more persons may pass blame onto the community, or, vice-versa, the community pass blame onto those persons, [1] then the lord of the land—if he is nearby—or his official shall there and then administer justice and judgment among them without delay [2] and the party that he finds guilty, be they individuals or a group, shall be compelled and forced to pay for the damages.

11. Should the lord himself or the official refuse to do so, then the royal majesty shall upon the request and plea of the ispán or alispán or the noble community of that county seize the goods and property rights of such a lord or noble until just and due satisfaction is rendered.

12. Furthermore, where it is discovered that a lord of the land took away the movable chattels and belongings of lords or nobles that were found in the hands of peasants, or seized the belongings of his own peasants, lest they be unable to recompense damages caused, then he has to return them in turn so that the injured lords and nobles suffer no loss. [1] Should this lord of the land refuse, then the royal majesty shall seize his goods and property rights in the aforementioned way until the injured parties receive effective satisfaction.

13. That public criminals should not with this excuse evade punishment, but—as laid down and decided— be everywhere punished; [1] but care is to be taken lest the innocent be condemned.

14. Then, although all peasants who rose against their natural lords should be punished as traitors with capital punishment, nevertheless, since such a great bloodshed would follow and the whole peasantry, without which the nobility is worth little, be extinguished, [1] it has been decided that all the commanders, centurions and decurions,¹⁷ the inciters of the peasants, the manifest killers of nobles, and those who raped virgins and matrons are to be killed without mercy and everywhere wiped out. [2] The other peasants shall, however, once they have paid for the aforesaid damages and man-prices, remain unharmed in their persons. [3] Nonetheless, in memory of this betrayal of theirs and in order that their present punishment should extend and be transmitted to their descendants and that it be known for all time what an enormous sin it is to rebel against the lords, all peasants living anywhere in this country (excepting the free and walled cities which remained true to the royal majesty, and those who kept their true faith to their lords and to the Holy Crown of this kingdom and did not take part in this rebellion with the other sinful peasants) shall henceforth because of this taint of infidelity of theirs lose their liberty that allowed them to move from one place to another, and they shall be subject to the lords of the land in full and perpetual servitude, [3] nor in future may they have the right to move from one place to another to settle there without the will and agreement of their lords.¹⁸

¹⁷ It is unclear what kind of officers are meant by these terms as they had not been used in Hungary since the early Middle Ages.

¹⁸ These two paragraphs constituted the basic principles subjecting the largely free tenant peasants (jobbágys) to “eternal servitude.” In fact, this “feudalization” (or “second serfdom” in Marxist discourse) was in Hungary only partial as many estates were not transformed into commercial latifundia, or were converted from arable to pasture. The article was expressly abrogated by the diet in 1530, although this provision never acquired sanction in custom; on this, see Vera Zimányi, Economy and society in sixteenth and seventeenth century Hungary, 1526–1650 (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1987) also János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern

15. Furthermore, all married peasants, whether they own a plot or a house, or are even landless peasants,¹⁹ have to render their lords of the land everywhere and every year a hundred pennies making one gold florin, sc. fifty pennies at St George's and then another fifty at Michaelmas. [1] And if more than a hundred pennies used to be anywhere paid hitherto, such a due shall not be understood as being hereby reduced.

16. Then, they have to serve every week a day to their lords.²⁰

17. Then, they are held to give their lords a chicken every month.

18. Then, they have to render from the yield of all fields, be they arable or hay fields, and their wine, besides the tithe due to their prelates, a ninth, that is the ninth part [1] so that from every ten sheaves or every ten *köböl*²¹ of wine eight remain to the peasant. [2] Regarding the tithe, they have to render the tithe only of those crops as they have been hitherto accustomed.

19. Then they should give their lords two geese annually, sc. a young one at Pentecost and another older one at Martinmas.

20. Then, from every village containing ten tenant peasant plots or less, a fattened pig is to be given at Christmas; and where their number is higher than ten, then one likewise fattened pig after every ten plots, [1] while the other revenues of lords and nobles should hereafter remain as previously paid and collected.

21. That widows, who take the place of tenant peasants, cannot move without the permission of their lords, even if they remarry. [1] Girls, however, and other widows who live with someone else and do not replace tenant peasants can marry and move freely, [2] but if they have sons of marriageable age, they cannot take these with them, [3] and even if the mother takes a son of tender age with her, that son has nevertheless to return to his original place of residence once he has reached full and marriageable age.

22. Then, that all landless peasants shall be exempt and free from all payment of dues for three years, during which time they are held to build their own houses and join and be counted among the company and number of the other tenant peasants. [2] For otherwise, if they refuse to build their houses, and even if they live with someone else, they have to pay the due of one florin to the lords. [3] If any of them live in their own houses and have belongings worth more than three and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols 2005).

¹⁹ Inquilini [Hung.: zsellér] were landless peasants and probably wage labourers but the term later acquired a more general legal meaning: persons without at least a quarter of a porta (telek), often regardless of their economic status.

²⁰ This increase in boonwork on the lord's dominical land was quite widely enforced in response to rising grain prices. The Hungarian economy was surprisingly buoyant for much of the sixteenth century.

²¹ Köböl is a measure of volume, originally for measuring wheat (appr. 32 kgs), but it was also used for wine, in which case it meant one seventh of the original köböl. István Bogdán, Magyarországi hossz- és földmértékek a XVI. század végéig (Budapest: Akadémiai 1978), pp. 201–11.

florins, excepting those that are inherited, they have to be forced right away to payment of dues like other tenant peasants.

23. That the Cumans and Jász and the other peasants of the royal majesty, wherever they live, except for the walled free cities, are henceforth to be held and obliged to render the rent, gifts and the ninth as well as the due service, just as other tenants and peasants.²²

24. Then, that nobody born of peasant stock be henceforth promoted by the royal majesty to bishop or archbishop, in permanent memory of the aforesaid peasant rebellion,²³ and should anyone be so promoted, no one is held to pay him the tithe.

25. Then this is no less expressly declared that, because hitherto many great troubles and almost daily quarrels have arisen on the pretext that tenant peasants have been abducted and retained, the article written and enacted above on the flight or movement of tenant peasants,²⁴ shall be applied to all tenant peasants and persons of plebeian estate wherever they live in this kingdom and the parts subject to it. [1] So that henceforth both the release and abduction of tenant peasants should forever be stopped and be for all time abolished.²⁵ [2] However, the movement of tenant peasants from or into the free cities of the royal majesty and of lords should not be understood as being prohibited by this decree.

²² The reduction of the formerly free nomads—on whom, see Nora Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and ‘Pagans’ in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000-c.1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001)—to jobbágy status had already begun in the thirteenth century and proceeded up until the fifteenth century. See György Györffy. “A kunok feudalizációja” [Feudalization of the Cumans] in György Székely ed. Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez Magyarországon a XIV. században (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1953), pp. 248–275

²³ This clause was motivated by the fact that Thomas Bakócz, archbishop of Esztergom, who was blamed for the peasant rebellion (as he had called the crusade that turned into it) was of non-noble stock. The advance of men of low-standing to high ecclesiastical office was uncommon before the second half of the fifteenth century, members of the higher clergy usually coming from the ranks of the aristocracy. This situation clearly changed under King Matthias, when besides Bakócz several men of peasant or burgher origin became bishops: George Szatmári, Ladislas Szalkai and Peter Beriszló, all of whom also played important political roles in this period. Elemér Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon [Clerical society in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Műszaki, 1971), pp. 183–87.

²⁴ See above Art. 14.

²⁵ Moving of tenant peasants often derived not so much from the peasants’ own initiative but rather from the need of landowners to expand their labor force; peasants were many times lured (by lower burdens) or even forcibly removed from one estate to another. See also Bak, “Servitude” (as n. 18 above). See also: Gábor Mikó, A parasztság költözési jogának szabályozása II. Ulászló király 1514. évi törvénykönyvében. Hamis értelmezések nyomában [The regulation of the right of peasant’s movement in the 1514 law of King Wladislas II: Following up some erroneous interpretations] in Keresztesekből lázadók 319–31.

26. Then it was ordered that if any powerful or other man of whatever estate or condition violently or in any other way abduct the tenant peasants of anyone against the will of their lords, [1] then he, whose tenant was abducted, should take with him one of the noble magistrates and four nobles of that county in which the tenant peasant is found to have been taken, and all of these have to come when requested unless hindered by serious illness or pressing need, under the penalty of a hundred florins each, to be collected on the spot and without remission by the ispáns or alispáns and noble magistrates, a part for themselves and a part for the plaintiff, after which if it can be sufficiently proved that his tenant peasant was abducted violently and against his will and he is able to show the nobles and the noble magistrate that the said tenant peasant is present in the town or village, then that lord or noble has to be given notice to return him together with his belongings.

[2] Even if he returns him, he has to pay for the act of might—if this can be sufficiently proven—a hundred florins, a part to the ispáns or alispáns and the noble magistrates, a part to the plaintiff himself. [3] If, after having paid this, he dares to keep that tenant peasant, he should lose that place whither the tenant was taken, be it a city, a town, a village or a part of it. [4] One third of it should go to the one against whom the violence was done and two thirds remain in the hands of the royal majesty.²⁶

27. Should, however, an official commit violence of this sort without the knowledge and notion of his lord and this can be proven, and the lord did not shelter his official in this matter, then the official is held to pay for the act of might and the lord has, upon request, to return the abducted tenant peasant and his goods under the aforesaid penalty. [1] If, however, the lord is far away and the official commits the act of might without his knowledge and retains the tenant despite the warning, and the lord, because of his absence, cannot be so required, then the official has to pay a hundred florins for the violence and, for the rashness of keeping hold [of the peasant], lose his noble property, if he has any. [2] If that official is a peasant, he is to be given over by his lord into the hands of him whose tenant peasant was abducted by him, and if he does not hand him over, the place from which the tenant was taken should be lost. [3] When, however, the lord of that official maintains that he cannot hand him over because he has fled, then he has to swear by oath before the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates of that county that, when he heard of the act of might, he was unable to arrest him; and if he does not swear the oath, he shall pay his man-price.[4] Should the lord prelates commit such an act of might or cause it to be committed, they shall likewise pay for the violence a hundred florins, and if they persevere in keeping hold of the tenant peasant, they are to be convicted to the estimation of that place whither they abducted him, since ecclesiastical goods cannot be forfeit. [5] Adding to this that the royal majesty cannot donate these two parts of his goods to the person or kinsmen of him who violently tried to abduct the peasant of another, lest the said abduction be passed over unavenged and left unpunished.

28. Should, however, a peasant leave by flight or in secret, then he, in whose goods he is found, has to return him once his lord has been given notice and so requested by one or two noble magistrates. [1] For if he refuses to return him when he was so able and this can be proven in the aforesaid way, he is to be subjected to the above-mentioned penalty for violent abduction. [2] If the tenant peasant should leave from there in secret or otherwise, then the lord of that property, if he is near-by, has to swear the oath personally, or if absent and far away, then his official, that he was unable to keep hold of him after notice was made. [3] Should [either of them] refuse to swear, he shall pay the man-price to the plaintiff, and the ispáns and alispáns render satisfaction in the aforementioned manner.

²⁶ Cf. 1351: 16; 8 March 1435, 7, repeated in 1492: 94.

29. Should, however, free or walled cities or Cumans or Jász or other royal tenant peasants violently take to themselves someone's tenant peasants, or tenant peasants secretly flee there, and having been requested by the noble magistrates and the four nobles in the aforesaid manner, they do not release abducted or escaped tenant peasants of this type together with their belongings, then [1], since royal property cannot be alienated, the judge and the sworn jurors of such a city or village are to be convicted to two hundred florins for every tenant peasant in favor of the noble or other plaintiff, and, moreover, to the man-price of such tenant peasants in favor of the ispáns or alispáns and noble magistrates of that county where this has happened; and the ispáns and alispáns and noble magistrates are held to render satisfaction on their part and to bring back the tenant peasant.

[2] If, however, after paying the penalty they refuse to return the tenant peasant, they have to be given notice a second and a third time to restore him, and every time they refuse, so often do they incur the said penalty and they have to pay it. [3] Should, however, the tenant peasant escape, then the judge and the sworn citizens have to swear an oath in front of the ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates that they could not arrest him after the notice; if they do not swear the oath, they have to pay the price in the aforementioned way. [4] In respect of tenant peasants that have escaped, the same is to be understood and done in regard to towns and church properties; and if they rashly keep hold of them, they shall be convicted to the estimation of that place.

30. And if a tenant peasant that has escaped or been violently abducted can be arrested by his lord in the fields or anywhere else, he can be freely detained and brought back to his previous abode with all those belongings of his which his lord can get hold of.

31. If the ispáns, alispáns, noble magistrates, and the noble community are incapable of effecting a restitution of this type, then it is allowed, by letters of the same ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates, to arrest any tenant peasant or townsman of such a city, town or village in a public place with his belongings, and force him to render satisfaction. [1] Against the ispáns and alispáns, should they be responsible for the said acts of might, the noble community shall proceed in the above mentioned manner, [2] and if they seem to be incapable of the execution or procedure, then the royal majesty shall upon their request deign to act and have it done.

32. That against ecclesiastical persons and free cities or royal tenant peasants, laymen should also be punished with the aforesaid penalty and not with the loss of estates or villages.

33. Then, no one can doubt that the recent troubles in the countryside were brought upon us by God's will in the measure of our sins, [1] and that the sins increased because they remained unpunished.²⁷ Thus robberies, thefts, killings, and acts of adultery, of the counterfeiting of money, of arson and other evil deeds were multiplied. [2] Therefore, it is decreed that in each and every county of this realm the said alispáns, noble magistrates, and the elected twelve jurors who have been named for the review and restoration of damages should under most strict oath seek out all these evildoers, both nobles and non-nobles, find out their names, and write them down in a register so that they can be punished according to their deserts. [3] Moreover, they should also find out the truth about those nobles who participated, sided with, and joined in the aforementioned seditious uprising,²⁸ and write down in a similar register all those who are found guilty and submit it under their seals to the royal majesty, [4] so that they according to the listings of this register, be deprived as outlaws of all their goods and property rights; and in respect of the occupation of such goods on the strength of a royal donation granted or yet to be granted, no further procedure is necessary nor needed, but whoever has obtained such goods justly can right away enjoy them. Lest evildoers remain unpunished and the innocent condemned! [5] Many nobles, however, who fell into the hands of the peasants joined them and became their subjects to avoid being killed, but as soon as they could, they left them and escaped; and these should not be condemned.

²⁷ The idea that the peasant revolt was divine punishment reflects in a way the mendicant preaching that partially inspired the uprising itself; see Jenő Szűcs, "Die Ideologie des ungarischen Bauernkrieges," in Gusztáv Heckenast, ed. Aus der Geschichte der ostmitteleuropäischen Bauernbewegungen im 16.-17. Jh. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1977), pp. 157–87.

34. And because almost all the nobles of Máramaros county are said to have held to the peasants' side²⁹ and to have participated in all of their evil and foul deeds, [1] the same said inquest into the truth is to be held about them in counties Ugocsa and Bereg.

35. And that the royal majesty should not grant the goods of such evil nobles to the lords and magnates—who have enough anyhow³⁰—or if he has already granted them, then such a donation should have no force, but he shall give to those whose kinsmen or fathers were killed by the peasants, [1] nextly, to those who faithfully served His Majesty and the country with a mailed fist on the battlefield and the army or in the castles, [2] and moreover to those, who although born of peasant parents, served their lords and nobles faithfully and honestly and assisted them in their dangers, [3] so that by this example other peasants may render themselves more faithfully and thereafter obey their lords more fervently. [4] And if someone having obtained goods gives these over for favor or gratis to those whose they had been, he shall be punished with the same penalty as a participant in the uprising.

36. And that the royal pardon whether already granted or granted in future, should be of no use, as much for peasant wrongdoers insofar as it affects their persons as for nobles who joined these peasants and took their part in the way described, insofar as it affects the recovery of their goods; but they should be punished entirely according to their deserts so that by this example others will not henceforth deviate from true faithfulness. [1] The same is to be understood of other wrongdoers proscribed in courts of law or in the proceedings of the counties, that they all be punished without pardon, so that others tremble hereafter and do not dare to commit similar crimes.

²⁸ There is evidence of the participation of lesser nobles on the peasants' side, with, of course, George Dózsa, probably a free Székely warrior himself, at its helm. See Housley, "Crusading and Social Revolt", pp. 6–7. See also below Art. 34.

²⁹ See Fekete Nagy-Bartha, Parasztháború, pp. 174–76.

³⁰ Note the critical rhetoric of the lesser nobility in this interjection!

37. When, however, criminals who are peasants are not, when so requested, handed over from somebody's goods to the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates in order that the legally prescribed punishment be meted out, [1] then [their lords] are to be convicted in their man-price; and in the procedure of giving notice and requesting the same ways and means are to be applied as are described for the punishment of the commanders, captains and subalterns etc. of the peasants.[2] Besides, wherever such criminals, be they nobles or peasants, can be apprehended by anyone, they can, according to the letters of the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates, be killed without pardon and they should and can be slain.

38. Then, because many nobles, even though not killed, were captured and injured with different torments and beatings, [1] therefore these peasants or the places from which they came to do this have to pay the living man-price of these nobles, that is a hundred florins, according to the determination of the aforementioned alispáns, noble magistrates and the twelve elected men.

39. And before all else, the aforesaid commanders, captains and subalterns, the instigators and seducers of the peasants, as well as the manifest murderers of nobles, the violators of virgins and rapists of matrons, shall be hunted out and listed in every county by the said alispáns, noble magistrates and twelve elected men at the time when the proceedings regarding these damages are made. And those on whose goods they now hide, or, in their absence, their officials, or if they are not present either, the judge and the sworn citizens,³¹ or if the judge or the sworn citizens themselves were criminals of this type, then the community of the tenant peasants has to take them—upon the relation and request of the said alispáns, noble magistrates and twelve elected men—to the first session of the county court where they should be condemned to death.

40. Nevertheless, the full truth has to be established regarding the captains, whether they accepted command voluntarily or of their own will, or were forced by fear to lead the peasants. [1] Because, if they did so by coercion, they do not deserve capital punishment.

41. Should, however, anyone dare to act contrariwise,³² be they lay lords or nobles, or free and walled cities, Cumans and Jász or other royal tenant peasants, or officials, or the towns or villages of churches, they shall be convicted for every such criminal to four hundred florins. [1] And every time they refuse, after being requested, to hand them over for punishment, they shall be convicted of four hundred florins, a part to the benefit of those against whom they committed their excesses, a part for the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates. [2] And execution shall be done in every respect in the manner described above regarding tenant peasants who are violently abducted or have escaped.

42. When, however, someone claims that such a criminal has escaped and that he was unable arrest him after having been given notice, then he has to swear an oath; if a noble, with nine, if a peasant, withy thirty-nine oath helpers,³³ according to their man-price.³⁴ [1] If he does not swear, he has to pay his [the criminal's] man-price.

³¹ While poorly documented, there existed in many peasant villages a kind of self-government; see István Szabó, "A parasztfalu önkormányzatának válsága az újkorban" [The crisis of village self-government in modern times], in Tanulmányok a magyar parasztság történetéből, (Budapest: Teleki Pál Int. 1948), pp. 265–272.

³² I. e. to the measures defined in the previous articles (1514:37 sqq.)

43. Should, however, any of the counties wish and ask of the royal majesty that all the aforesaid wrongdoers, namely both nobles and non-nobles, including those nobles who joined the peasants and took their side, be sought out and eradicated, then the holding of a general or palatinal court shall be granted by His Majesty, as contained in the decretum.³⁵

44. Then, that all peasants who left their lords or ladies without their permission during these disturbances shall be brought back by the ispáns to their former abodes with all their belongings,[1] And in returning them, the same order and manner of proceeding shall be applied as is laid down for newly abducted tenant peasants. [2] Regarding tenant peasants abducted before these disturbances, if a suit has been opened in this case, the earlier order and manner of proceeding shall be observed in the sense of the decree.

45. When, however, the case involves the ispáns or alispáns then the noble magistrates with the community of nobles have authority to carry out the said procedure. And if that community with the noble magistrates is incapable of proceeding, the royal majesty shall always act and have it done.

46. That the voivodes and *besliks*³⁶ existing in the lower parts [of the country] should cease and be removed. [1] And if those in whose properties they are do not get rid of them before the next feast of the Innocents,³⁷ they shall pay for every voivode four hundred florins each; and if, after having paid, they still retain them, they should lose those places or goods where they are found. [2] On the besliks, the ispáns or alispáns shall announce that they must cease and desist from plunder and theft. [3] If they cease, then all is well; otherwise they shall be hanged by the same ispáns or alispáns. [4] And should their lords resist, they shall similarly lose those places where they live, and the royal majesty have the right to freely grant them to whomever he wishes.

47. And so that no peasant dare in future to incite insurrection among the people and especially to violate noble girls and matrons, and that the punishment duly meted out deter all posterity so that all ages will equally know and recall how detestable, how enormous and how foul a sin it is before God and among the Hungarians to deflower virgins and violate matrons, [1] all those rash brigands, loathsome to God and men, shall die a terrible death, and their offspring, namely their sons,

³³ The awkward numbers come from the fact that in Latin (and Hungarian) there is an expression meaning “ten including himself”(or “forty including himself”), but none in English.

³⁴ The man-price (homagium) of nobles was 50 marks (200 florins); that of peasants 40 florins; cf. Triparium I 2:2, III. 26: 6).

³⁵ This reference to a decree is unclear, since this court was abolished (referring back to King Matthias' decree) in 1492:35.

³⁶ Besliks were Turkish freelancers. Their name comes from the Turkish word bes meaning five (most probably after the amount they originally received for their service), and voivodes were their leaders. They were often employed on both sides of the border.

³⁷ December 28.

daughters, and brothers, be punished so that none of their kindred be ever elected a judge or sworn citizen or reeve among the other peasants, and none of them may ever serve in the court of the prince or of the lords and nobles, and none of them be promoted to any position, but should, as members of a cursed kindred lament their penalty for ever, being subject to the yoke of perpetual servitude and the peasants' lot. [2] And if unmarried men are found to have done such deeds, their forbears and their entire family should be no less consigned to the same ignominy.³⁸

48. The lord prelates, moreover, shall straightway seek out through their visitors the priests who participated in such crimes and incarcerate them for ever.³⁹ [1] Moreover, if nobles or their servants can apprehend them, they have the right to arrest and hand them over to the hands of the prelate or his steward in order to suffer the said punishment.

49. Then all goods and property rights of any nobleman, obtained by title of taint of infidelity or default of issue during these times of disturbances and occupied by some great men, shall be in fact returned right away, and the revenues of them hitherto collected in any way shall be refunded.

[1] And should they not release them nor refund the revenues, the ispáns and alispáns shall nonetheless restore them. [2] Moreover, judgment and sentence are to be rendered for the act of violence as against violent and mighty occupiers, following summons to be immediately issued in this matter, [3] in such a way however that once the goods are returned, the donation remains valid, and if someone who has obtained goods does not wish to wait for the inquest on infamous nobles who took the side of the peasants, he should proceed according to the law of the realm.⁴⁰

50. And if ispáns or alispáns themselves are holding these goods, restoration should nonetheless be carried out by the noble magistrates and community. [2] Following summons, sentence is moreover to be passed against them in the aforesaid manner.

51. All belongings of the nobles, except those acquired or received in battle, are to be returned under the penalty of a lesser act of might and estimation of their value. [1] And if they are not returned, then those keeping them should, after notice is given, be convicted by the noble magistrates of a lesser act of might and, moreover, to the estimated value of the belongings; and the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates shall render satisfaction to the damaged party. [2] If they refuse to return them after the second request, they are to be convicted to the double and condemned accordingly. [3] Should, however, the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates prove to be incapable of proceeding, the royal majesty shall perform the procedure upon the entreaty of the ispáns. [4] And if nobles have lost their horses, arms or other belongings in the war against the peasants, these, should they be found, shall be returned in the same way and under the same penalty. [5] Furthermore, all the lord prelates and rectors of churches should charge the priests of their dioceses, even the friars of any order, under pain of excommunication that they should not absolve anyone unless they have first returned the goods of nobles (except those acquired or obtained in battle); and indeed they should publicly proclaim those who keep them as excommunicate.

³⁸ The article sounds more a rhetorical amplification of Art. 14 (above) than an enforceable measure.

³⁹ On the inquiries especially among the mendicant orders following the uprising, see Szűcs, "Die Ideologie des ungarischen Bauernkrieges" pp. 166–7.

⁴⁰ The last clause of this article is unclear but it seems to refer to donations based on cases still sub judice.

52. Moreover, there are reputed to be many in the kingdom, who perhaps because of the damages done to them or just for the sake of filthy lucre, exacted exorbitant sums of money on the goods of others and, having first dragged them from their homes or otherwise held them hostage outside of battle, forced compacts upon a great number of other people's peasants. [1] Therefore, lest these peasants and tenants are burdened with paying twice, the said alispáns and four noble magistrates and the twelve sworn jurors should, while reviewing and establishing the damages of the aforementioned lords and nobles, also inquire about such exactions and compacts. Those, who are found to have extorted from someone more than his damages, shall refund it, according to the way in which the damages done to all lords and nobles are determined. [2] Those who resist or after judicial notice fail to refund, shall be convicted as if of a major act of might. [3] The justices ordinary or ispáns and alispáns shall proceed against them and, should perchance they be reluctant to do so, then the noble community shall proceed. [4] Should the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates or even the noble community prove incapable of proceeding, the royal majesty shall deign to take care of the entire proceedings in these matters.

53. Then, because in this time of troubles the letters and written instruments of many nobles were lost or burned or torn up by the peasants, [1] the royal majesty shall therefore deign to grant all these nobles their property rights by title of his new donation with reference to their destruction. [2] And since these nobles were robbed of their belongings, the Lord Chancellor shall renew and make renewed letters of donation of this type without fee.

54. As soon as spring weather arrives, the royal majesty shall have the borders of all such goods perambulated and adjusted by the master protonotaries. [1] And he should not only adjust these goods, but also those of the Cumans, Jász and of Szeged as well as toward Moravia, Austria, Styria, Carinthia and all the borders of the realm in general, according to the contents of the decree.⁴¹

55. Then, that the royal majesty shall entrust his juridical or judicial seal to a well deserving lay person, learned in letters and the law, [1] who ought always to stay in Buda and judge all cases that have been referred and short court cases. [2] And letters for short court cases can be issued under the seal of all justices ordinary. [3] But summons or notice to the royal presence should be done as hitherto. [4] And such cases shall be judged by the judge of the personal presence, unless they end up in the court of other judges having been referred by him.⁴²

⁴¹ Cf. 1498:48; the disagreement over the borders of Szeged and the Cumans concerned pastures around Szeged that had been used by the Cumans since the thirteenth century, until the privilege of King Matthias in 1471, which allowed the burghers of Szeged to use the pastures together with the Cumans. Later the burghers tried to expropriate for themselves the right to pasture, and the disagreement lasted for almost half a century. See László Blazovich, Szeged rövid története [Short history of Szeged] (Szeged: Csongrád Megyei Levéltár, 2005), p. 29.

⁴² This article aimed at passing the office of the judge of the personal presence to a legal practitioner, which also served to strengthen the minor chancellor. The measure took effect a year later with the appointment of Stephen Werbőczy to this position. György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Intellectual learned in the laws in Hungary before (the battle of) Mohács] (Budapest:

56. Then, the royal majesty shall from now on take care of the honors of county ispáns, [1] because many troubles stem from the negligence and sometimes from the fault and occasionally even from the mightiness and arrogance of the ispáns. [2] And that according to the contents of the decree⁴³ the honor of ispán in county Heves be granted to a layman because the bishop of Eger is staying abroad;⁴⁴ should he return to his see or should the church have another prelate in residence, then this office shall return once more to the church.

57. That any noble shall be able to build towers or fortifications with walls and a moat for the defense of his person and belongings; moreover, one castle may with the knowledge of the royal majesty be built in every county for the community of the nobles.⁴⁵

58. Then, that every burgher having vineyards or arable lands on the lands of others shall pay and render the ninth to the lord of the land according to the contents of the decretum.⁴⁶

59. Then henceforth no ecclesiastic or spiritual person shall hold or govern more than one benefice according to the contents of the decretum.⁴⁷ The royal majesty shall right away confer these [additional] benefices to well deserving persons, otherwise they shall be spent on the maintenance of border castles.

60. Then, that non-beneficed clergy and students in schools shall not henceforth venture to bear arms or muskets.⁴⁸ [1] For should a priest or student henceforth bear arms or muskets unless about to travel abroad, he can be arrested and his arms or muskets confiscated even by peasants, and, having been tied up, he shall be assigned to the hand of his prelate or archdeacon, if he is nearby, otherwise of the sub-archdeacon, who is obliged to hand him over to the hands of the lord prelate or his steward to be jailed and severely punished. Should the sub-archdeacon refuse to do so, then he alone shall be arrested by the ispán or alispán and handed to the same lord prelate or his steward for the said punishment. [2] Equally, moreover, neither the drovers, commonly called *hajdúk*⁴⁹

Akadémiai, 1971), pp. 337–39 and 405; briefly also: György Bónis, “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary,” East Central Europe/l’Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191.

⁴³ Cf. 1498:57.

⁴⁴ Ippolito d’Este—who, as bishop of Eger, held the “perpetual ispán” title for the county—had left Hungary in 1496, remaining in Italy until his death in 1520.

⁴⁵ Previously royal permission was—at least de jure—required for building fortifications. Castles for “the community of nobles” were obviously meant as protection against further uprisings. It is not known whether any such castles were built.

⁴⁶ Cf. 1492:49.

⁴⁷ Cf. 1498:56.

⁴⁸ It is thought that many primitive muskets were in circulation in Hungary. Surviving examples suggest that these were tubes of brass or wrought iron.

⁴⁹ The hajdú (from Hungarian hajtó, ‘drover’) drove cattle—in the late Middle Ages a main export commodity of the country—to far away markets and were frequently armed. Supposedly, a good number of the hajdúk joined the troops of Dózsa, although their exact number is unknown. As they were experienced in fighting—a few decades later they became semi-professional soldiers—they most probably played an important role in the events. This is illustrated by the fact that at the execution of George Dózsa several of may carry lances or other arms, nor peasants venture to bear muskets. [3] Otherwise, should a hajdú bear arms, anyone can arrest him anywhere; on the first occasion, he shall be castrated; on the second, if he again bears arms, be beheaded or otherwise punished with death. [4] Should indeed a peasant have a musket, his right hand shall be lopped off.⁵⁰

61. Then it was decided that henceforth no peasant or person of the free and other royal cities may keep or maintain on someone else's land houses, encampments or hovels, commonly called szállás, for the guarding of sheep or cattle, so that by this the wickedness of the hajdúk may cease and come to an end. [1] Should, however, nobles keep houses of this type on their own fields, they shall keep there guards who are nevertheless married, of good repute and honest character, so that no one may suffer harm from their evil deeds. [2] Townsmen and other peasants have to act accordingly on their own fields and lands. [3] Otherwise, the flocks and herds of such noblemen, townsmen, or peasants that are found there shall be confiscated by the ispáns or alispáns of that county wherever this happens to be; and furthermore all the hovels of townsmen and peasants that have been built on the lands of lords and nobles without their consent, which are discovered at the time when the aforesaid damages done by the peasants are investigated and refunded, shall be demolished by the same ispáns or alispáns and the noble community of that county; and, if they are again set up by them, their flocks and herds shall be confiscated. [4] Should, however, the ispáns and alispáns together with the noble community be incapable of performing this procedure, the royal majesty shall upon request always have it done.

62. Then, that the royal majesty shall not without good reason grant to anyone those goods that are known to have devolved lawfully to his right of donation because of the default of issue of any nobles who were killed by the peasants, and if he has granted them, that donation shall have no force; [1] but, if the slain nobleman had daughters, His Majesty shall make donation in perpetuity to these daughters; [2] and if he had no daughters, then His Majesty shall grant in perpetuity to his widow, [3] in such a way, however, that the widow or girl may not marry a peasant, in which case His Majesty may freely grant it to whomever he likes. [4] The daughter of a nobleman, who— even with the consent of her father or brothers—marries a peasant, shall be content with only the filial quarter.⁵¹ [5] And royal donations of this type that are made in the aforesaid way to the daughters or wives of murdered nobles should not be understood as prejudicing the co-inheriting kinsmen of the victim nor those to whom these goods devolve, but only those goods are to be granted to the daughters and wives that rightly and lawfully pertain to the royal majesty's [right of] bestowal.

his hajdúk were forced to eat from his burned body. See István Szabó, "A hajdúk 1514-ben" [The hajdúk in 1514], Századok 84 (1950), 178–198.

⁵⁰ As a matter of fact peasants were not disarmed for long and they continued to bear arms up to the 18th century. Fekete Nagy-Bartha, Parasztháború, pp. 294–95.

⁵¹ Cf. 1492:63.

63. Then that all decreta shall finally be corrected and gathered into one, and the royal majesty deign to have the written laws of the realm read out, and having been read out, confirmed, and, once confirmed and sealed, sent out to every county of the realm.⁵²

64. Additionally, as it is said that tithe-collectors have been accustomed at the tithing of wine to indiscriminately arrest all nobles and non-nobles on account of some minor and petty debt or other business, but as arrest is not permitted according to the general decree⁵³ except in one specific instance, and, anyhow, the tithe collectors have no right to judge anyone, only to collect tithes, [1] henceforth, therefore, tithe-collectors shall not dare to interfere or involve themselves in the business of arresting but only in the matter of tithing. [2] And if they do not cease, then the tenant peasants of that place shall not be forced to render tithes, but the lords should collect the tithes and employ them for the upkeep of the border castles.

65. Then, because very many beneficed churchmen travel to the City to expedite either their private affairs or the business of their other colleagues, and quite often die there, so that their benefices are granted by the pope to foreigners and outsiders, against the liberties of this realm, [1] it has therefore been decided that from now on whosoever of the prelates and other beneficed clergy is going to the City shall, before he sets off on the journey, hand over and pledge to the royal majesty and holy crown out of the revenues of his patrimony as much as the annual income of his benefice is considered to be worth. [2] If, however, he has insufficient patrimony, he has to obtain before leaving letters of assurance from the pope that, should he happen to die in the City, his benefice in this kingdom shall nonetheless remain safe and intact.

66. Then, that no foreign money shall be introduced into the country and, if it is introduced, not be accepted; but wherever and with whomsoever it is found, it shall be confiscated. [1] And in order that these moneys can be more easily and quickly removed and not be introduced again, the oxen and horses as well as the sheep shall not be taken out of the kingdom (as has already been decided in three decrees),⁵⁴ but driven only to Pest and Székesfehérvár. [2] Foreigners shall buy and purchase oxen, sheep and horses in these places, or even others where they can and prefer in the interior of the kingdom, with Hungarian money, because not foreigners, but Hungarians who sell animals in foreign countries who bring in alien money. [3] Should anyone act contrariwise, the oxen and horses as well as sheep shall always be taken away from him, according to the content of the decree.

67. Then that the royal majesty shall right away and really appoint bans for Croatia and Jajce and make due provision and arrangement so that they do not incur danger.⁵⁵

⁵² Cf. 1504:31,.

⁵³ Cf. 1492: 91–2.

⁵⁴ ; 1495:27, 1498: 31, 1500:25.

⁵⁵ Actually, there was an appointed ban of Croatia and Jajce at this time, namely Peter Beriszló bishop of Veszprém, who was appointed in May 1513 in place of Imre Perényi, because Perényi—being palatine in the same time—could not personally fulfill his duty as ban. However, until the end of 1513 Beriszló was named only prefectus of the banates. He was at the same time appointed as royal treasurer (cf. n. 442 below), and this article (and also the next one) probably aimed at his removal from the office of ban, which took

68. And that provisioners be appointed by the royal majesty to the border castles, who shall take care of equipment and victuals and be always alert.⁵⁶ [1] Then, that the royal treasurer presently appointed should act only in the office of treasurer and stay always with the royal majesty, so that the business and affairs of His Majesty and his kingdom be better administered and supervised, [2] and he should act in all public affairs of the royal majesty and the kingdom according to the decision of His Majesty and his council.⁵⁷

69. Then, it was decided that all acts of might and new seizures done by lords and nobles against anyone, wherever and howsoever committed and perpetrated during any of these times of troubles, that is between the past feast of St George the Martyr until now, sc. the day of St Elizabeth the Widow,⁵⁸ shall be discussed and adjudicated at the next coming short court session, before any other case, after relevant lawful summons has first been issued. [1] And if these cases cannot be concluded in that term, the same shall be done at the next and third term, namely, that they be opened and concluded out of sequence, before all other cases. [2] Other cases have to be adjudicated according to the decretum.

70. Because it is believed that many peasants from the border areas of the country, because of the burdens and services newly imposed upon them according to their deserts, moved into neighboring countries, that is Poland, Moldavia, Moravia, and Austria, in order to settle there, [1] so as to stop this happening, the holy royal majesty⁵⁹ shall deign to write to these countries that all tenants and peasants attempting to settle there be always given up and returned to their original residence, rather than being admitted there.⁶⁰

71. Finally, that those places that in the past troubles were burned down and reduced to ashes by lords and nobles in order to dampen the rage of the peasants, should in respect of those parts where the blaze was made be exempt from royal and war taxes for the next three years.

We, therefore, inclined towards the aforementioned humble entreaties of the said lord prelates, barons and nobles of our realm, submitted in the aforesaid way and manner, accept, approve and confirm the above written articles as just and reasonable, containing in themselves what is for the place only after the death of Wladislas II in 1516. See András Kubinyi, “Beriszló Péter és budai működése” [P. B. and his activity in Buda], in idem, Főpapok, egyházi intézmények és vallásosság, Asztrik Várhegyi, István Zombosi, eds. (Budapest: METEM, 1999) pp. 171–185, esp. pp. 173–79.

⁵⁶ The first sentence of this article logically belongs to the previous one; the numbering of the CJH is misleading here.

⁵⁷ Peter Beriszló, the royal treasurer between 1513–16, stayed most of the time in Croatia, in his office as ban (cf. n. 55 above), and usually his deputies acted on his behalf, see Kubinyi, “Beriszló Péter”, p. 174.

⁵⁸ 19 November 1514. St Elizabeth the Widow is St Elizabeth of Hungary (1207–31), canonized in 1235.

⁵⁹ The sacra maiestas title is somewhat unusual, as the adjective sacra was not used for Hungarian kings; it must be a scribal error.

⁶⁰ We have not found any reference to such a request, and from a practical point of view, the measure itself seems somewhat naïve, although the reason behind it is manifest.

common good, peace and advantage of the same kingdom of ours, do accordingly approve and ratify them in the same terms as they were written up above. [1] We also promise and obligate ourselves by these presents to inviolably observe and have others observe all what is written and specified therein, by the means of these presents. [2] To the memory and perpetual firmity of which we decided to issue these present letters of privilege, confirming them by appending our privy seal which we use as king of Hungary. [3] Given at Buda, on the day of St Elizabeth the Widow, that is on the thirtieth day of the aforesaid diet and general assembly, in the thousand five hundred and fourteenth year of the Lord, in the fifteenth year of our reign in Hungary &c., and the forty-fifth in Bohemia. [4] With the most reverend and revered fathers in Christ, Thomas cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere, archbishop of Esztergom;⁶¹ Gregory Frankapan of the canonically united sees of Kalocsa and Bács;⁶² as well as the excellent and most reverend bishops Ippolito d' Este of Aragon of Eger, similarly cardinal priest of the holy Roman church;⁶³ John Erdódi, elect of Zagreb;⁶⁴ Francis Várdai of Oradea;⁶⁵ George of Pécs, our privy chancellor;⁶⁶ Peter Beriszló of Veszprém, our chief treasurer, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia;⁶⁷ John Gosztonyi of Győr;⁶⁸ Ladislás Szalkai of Vác; ⁶⁹Francis Csaholi of Cenad;⁷⁰ Stephen Podmanini of Nitra;⁷¹ John Guthi Ország of Srem;⁷² Michael Gibárti Keserű elect of Bosnia;⁷³ and Briccio Egervári of Knin,⁷⁴ governing felicitously the churches of God. [5] Further,

⁶¹ Bakócz, Thomas, bishop of Győr 1486–1493, bishop elect of Eger 1493–1497, archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere.

⁶² Frankapan, Gregory, archbishop of Kalocsa 1504–20.

⁶³ d' Este of Aragon, Ippolito, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, archbishop of Esztergom 1486–1497, bishop of Eger 1497–1520.

⁶⁴ Erdódi, John, bishop of Zagreb 1511–18

⁶⁵ Kisvárdai Várdai, Francis, bishop of Vác 1509–13, bishop of Transylvania 1513–24, secret chancellor.

⁶⁶ Szatmári, George bishop of Veszprém 1499–1501, b. of Oradea 1501–1505, b. of Pécs 1505–1521, archbishop of Esztergom 1522–1524, royal-secretary 1494–1499, secret chancellor 1499–1521, arch-chancellor 1521–1524:

⁶⁷ Beriszló, Peter, bishop of Veszprém 1512–20, chief treasurer 1513–20, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1513–16.

⁶⁸ Gosztonyi, John, son of Nicholas, bishop of Győr 1509–24, vice-chancellor 1508, chancellor of the queen 1521–6.

⁶⁹ Szalkai, Ladislás, bishop of Vác 1514–20, bishop of Eger 1520–24, archbishop of Esztergom 1524–26.

⁷⁰ Csaholi, Francis. bishop of Cenad 1514–1526.

⁷¹ Podmanini Podmanicki, Stephen, bishop of Nitra, 1505–30.

⁷² Gúti Ország, John bishop of Srem 1514–20.

⁷³ Gibárti Keserű, Michael bishop of Bosnia 1502–24.

⁷⁴ Egervári, Briccio, bishop of Knin 1492–1523.

the spectabiles and magnifici Emeric Perényi, perpetual ispán of the said county Abaujvár, palatine of our said kingdom of Hungary, judge of our Cumans;⁷⁵ ispán Peter Count of Szengyörgy and Bazin, our Judge Royal;⁷⁶ John Szapolyai, perpetual ispán of the land of Spiš, our voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely as also our captain general;⁷⁷ the same John Szapolyai and Barnabas Béla, bans of Severin;⁷⁸ Stephen Bátori, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of the realm;⁷⁹ Blaise Ráskai, master of the treasury;⁸⁰ Moses Gergelylaki Buzlai, master of the doorkeepers;⁸¹ John Bélteki Drágfi, master of the stewards;⁸² John Lindvai Bánfi master of the butlers;⁸³ Michael Pálóci master of the chamberlains;⁸⁴ George Bátori, master of the horse;⁸⁵ and John Berzencei Bornemissza, ispán of Pozsony,⁸⁶ as well as many others holding counties and other honors of our kingdom.⁸⁷

⁷⁵ Perényi, Emeric, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewardss, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13.

⁷⁶ Szengyörgyi and Bazini, Peter, voivode of Transylvania 1498–1510, judge royal 1502–17.

⁷⁷ See above, n. 5.

⁷⁸ Béla, Barnabas, ban of Severin 1508–15.

⁷⁹ Bátori, Stephen, ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary 1509–23, count palatine 1519–23, Sept. 1524–July 1525, Apr. 1526–1530.

⁸⁰ Ráskai, Blaise, chief chamberlain, master of the treasury 1498–1518.

⁸¹ Gergelylaki Buzlai, Moses, master of the doorkeepers, 1500–19.

⁸² Bélteki Drágfi, John, master of the stewardss 1510–15.

⁸³ Lindvai Bánfi, John, master of the cellarers 1516–27, count palatine of Hungary 1530–34.

⁸⁴ Pálóci, Michael master of the cellarers 1505–08, master of the chamberlains, 1514–16

⁸⁵ Bátori, George, master of the horse 1505–31.

⁸⁶ Berzencei Bornemissza, John, treasurer 1500, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1514–26

⁸⁷ Such lists of dignitaries were added to royal charters ever since the late thirteenth century, not as witnesses but as indication of date.

Dietal decisions, 1518 after April 24

On St. George's Day in 1518, a diet opened at Rákos, but the lesser nobility left and called an armed diet for July 20 to Tolna. The aristocracy—according to the list of witnesses, some 50 prelates, barons and other magnates--stayed with the king in Buda and formulated twenty-two articles on taxes, matters of defense, judicial procedure, and the royal council, mostly already contained in earlier decreta. However, the king did not approve them. Thus, as they did not become law, we publish them from Ferenc Döry's transcript without translation and annotations, for the sake of completeness.

MSS. A contemporary copy in the Hungarian National Archives, MNL OL DI 31015.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio Antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801) 2: 398–418, based on a contemporary copy from the archives of Bardejov (now not found).

LIT: Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 18–24, 229 to 232.

Constitutiones dietae festi beati Georgii anni 1518.

Articuli per dominos prelatos et barones ac proceres regni Hungarie in dieta festi beati Georgii martiris anni millesimi quingentesimi decimi octavi pro bono publico confecti etc.

Quum in dieta festi beati Georgii martiris proxime preteriti domini prelati et barones proceresque regni cum dominis regnicolis super hiis, que eisdem nomine regie maiestatis de statu eiusdem ac de necessitatibus et periculis huius regni, castrorumque finitimorum proposita fuerant, tractare cepissent, et cum ad ferendum subsidium pro evitandis huiusmodi necessitatibus et periculis ventum fuisset, dominique regnicole allegantes colonorum suorum paupertatem et oppressionem non plus, quam subsidium medii floreni se daturos obtulissent, et in hac opinione ac voluntate ex ipso conventu discessissent, post eorum discessum iidem domini prelati et barones ac proceres circumspectis rebus omnibus, postquam cognovissent necessitates et pericula regni castrorumque finitimorum tam magna et tam undique aucta esse, ut hoc dominorum regnicolarum subsidio medii floreni vitari nullomodo posse videretur, licet ipsi quoque domini sicuti et regnicole rusticos suos non libenter gravaverint satis alioquin undique gravatos, maluerunt tamen et se et suos colonos pro bono publico et pro salute tocius regni onerare, quam pati, ut et ipsi et regnicole omnes et totum regnum una per incuriam in manifestum periculum prolaberentur. Ad provisionem itaque et conservacionem ac reparacionem castrorum finitimorum, necnon ad banderii regalis erectionem, ut scilicet maiestas quoque sua regia illo instaurato ipsorum confiniorum defensionem commodius intendere possit, ad predictum subsidium medii floreni per regnicolas oblatum alium quoque medium florenum regie maiestati pro subsidio addiderunt, ordinaveruntque et obtulerunt per istum unum annum modis et condicionibus infrascriptis exolvendum, sperantes quoque ipsos regnicolas hanc ordinacionem oblacionemque dominorum pro evitando communi periculo per eosdem factam et utilem omnibus et pernecessariam non gravatim acceptaturos.

I. Ordinatum autem est, ut medietas huiusmodi subsidii regii unius floreni ad festum nativitatis beati Johannis Baptiste proxime futurum dicetur, altera vero medietas ad festum beati Martini episcopi anni presentis, ita videlicet, ut tam domini, quam comitatus pro exercitualibus et pro conservacione gencium suarum cum subsidio regio dicent pro se ipsis similiter unum florenum, medietatem eiusdem ad predictum festum nativitatis Beati Johannis Baptiste, alteram vero medietatem ad festum Martini.

II. Ut autem in dicacione et exaccione huiusmodi subsidii omnis dissipacio vitetur et expense quoque ille ac salaria, que alias in similibus subsidiis dicatoribus, vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium dari consueverunt, nunc in presenti subsidio ad utilitatem confiniorum convertantur, visum est dominis, et in hoc omnes concordaverunt atque compromiserunt, ut unusquisque dominorum in bonis suis in Hungaria habitis hoc subsidium per homines vel officiales suos probos et fidedignos fideliter dicari et exigere faciat, et tandem exactum ad manus tezaurarii regie maiestatis presentari.

III. Quod illi rustici omnes, a quibus pecunie exercitiales exiguntur, hoc subsidium regie maiestati solvere debeant. Illi vero, qui non solvunt pecunias exercitiales, neque subsidium hoc regium solvere teneantur.

IV. Quod hoc subsidium tam de bonis regalibus, quam reginalibus apud quoscumque habitis exigatur, ad provisionemque castrorum finitimorum exponatur.

V. Quod domini utriusque ordinis de bonis ecclesiarum atque monasteriorum, quorum patroni sunt, hoc subsidium exigi et per homines suos unacum pecuniis bonorum suorum ad manus thesaurarii regii deferri faciant.

VI. Quod capitula ecclesiarum, abbates, prepositi, moniales, omnesque alii ecclesiastici possessionati cuiuscunque ordinis ac religionis sunt, hoc subsidium de bonis suis et ecclesiarum, quibus president, exolvere debeant.

VII. Quod medietatem huiusmodi subsidii regii quilibet dominorum et aliorum omnium prescriptorum quo citius fieri poterit, de bonis suis exigi faciat et ad quintumdecimum diem festi nativitatis beati Johannis Baptiste proxime futuri ad manus thesaurarii regii mittere debeat, cum ulteriorem moram, necessitates et pericula castrorum finitimorum non paciantur.

VIII. Quod nullus dominorum quidquam sibi ex hoc subsidio retineat, nullus quidquam sibi impetret, sed totum quilibet probe ac fideliter ad manus thesaurarii ad confiniorum provisionem exponendum deferri faciat.

IX. Quod thesaurarius regie maiestatis de pecuniis huiusmodi subsidii ad manus suas perferendis absque scitu et deliberacione consiliariorum regie maiestatis nemini quidquam nec deputare, nec dare audeat, sed huiusmodi pecunias pro consilio eorundem consiliariorum ad castrorum finitimorum provisionem et ad banderii regalis erectionem et conservacionem secundum vim iuramenti, quod superinde iam prestitit, fideliter dispenset. Si quid autem vel pro avertendis diffidacionibus, que contra hoc regnum fieri ceperunt, vel ad alias regni necessitates inevitabiles ex hoc ipso subsidio dandum imperciendumve foret, id nonnisi ex consilio et decreto consiliariorum thesaurarius det et imperciatur.

X. Quoniam autem domini sperant eciam ipsos dominos regnicolas ad hanc toti regno utilem et pernecessariam ordinationem oblacionemque accedere et ab eisdem in rebus publicam salutem concernentibus non separari, propterea visum est dominis, ut postquam ipsi quoque domini regnicole ad exolvendum hoc subsidium regum de bonis suis instar dominorum consencient, eligatur in singulis comitatibus unus nobilis, probus et fidedignus, qui adiuncto homine thesaurarii, si ipsis videbitur, sin minus, solus ipse nobilis electus bona nobilium fideliter modo prenotato connumeret, pecuniasque exigit, et ad manus thesaurarii in expensis regiis, moderatis tamen et non superfluis perferat.

XI. Ceterum ordinatum est, ut regia maiestas banderium suum regale pro regni defensione erigat; domini quoque, prelati et barones ac comitatus gentes copiasque suas preparare et levare beneque et armis et militibus instructas in pleno numero ad festum Visitacionis beatissime virginis Marie proxime venturum ad loca prius deputata sub pena decreti mittere debeant; ita ut qui armigeros secundum formam decreti tenere debent, hwarones pro armigeris non mittant; interim vero gentes dominorum et comitatum illorum, qui in presenciarum in confinibus existunt, ibidem pro eorundem defensione movere debeant.

XII. Item, ut quieti et paci oppressorum nobilium consulatur et omnis violencia compescatur, ordinatum est, ut octave et iudicia brevia suis semper temporibus celebrentur. Quinque vero casus et alii omnes actus novi potenciarii transmissionesque causarum incipiant iudicari pro festo nativitatis beati Johannis Baptiste nunc venturo, et hoc genus iudicii sine intermissione continuetur. Quidquid autem iudicatum fuerit, execuioni demandetur.

XIII. Ut autem et status regie maiestatis pro eius dignitate et pro tocius regni honore ac decore bene dirigatur, et quecumque ordinata sunt impresenciarum, queque imposterum pro bono regie maiestatis et regni ordinabuntur, execuioni demandentur, visum statutumque est, ut ultra cancellarium, thesaurarium, magistrum curie et ultra alios consiliarios, quorum quilibet suum locum habet in consilio regie maiestatis, eligantur octo consilarii, quatuor scilicet ex prelati et quatuor ex baronibus, quorum quatuor per medium annum maneant semper ad latus regie maiestatis et nunquam illinc discedant; elapso medio anno alii quatuor succedant. Quorum officium erit, ut maiestati sue in omnibus consulant fideliter et non paciantur animum maiestatis sue adhuc tenerum per quoscumque huc illucque vanis aut inutilibus suasionibus distrahi vel seduci, prospiciant honori sue maiestatis bonoque statui et decori curie eiusdem, prospiciant denique diligentissime, ut pro bono publico proque tocius regni quiete, pace, securitate ac defensione recte omnia fiantⁱ et administrentur.

XIV. Curent eciam prefati consilarii adhibita omni opera et studio, ut proventus maiestatis sue rectificentur et fideliter administrentur, ac preter omnem dissipacionem, quo necessarium visum fuerit, exponantur. Reforment iidem consilarii, que reformanda videbuntur, suppleant defectus, resecent superflua et ea faciant, quecumque ad bonum regie maiestatis et publicam utilitatem salva semper dignitate et auctoritate regia, pertinere cognoverint, provideantque, ut maiestas sua superfluum familiam non teneat, sed eam solum, que necessaria est, et cui solucio fieri possit; et illi, qui ad servicia maiestatis sue ascripti mancipatique fuerint, pro utilitate maiestatis sue et regni huius illic serviant, ubi consilariis visum fuerit, et eo tempore, quo necessitas postulabit; et si quando maiestas sua aliquem vel aliquos ad sua servicia acceptare voluerit, cum consilio dominorum consiliariorum acceptet.

XV. Erit eciam officium consiliariorum, ut ipsi expensas et soluciones, quas thesaurarius tam ad castra finitima, quam ad alias maiestatis sue et huius regni necessitates posthac facturus est, videant, limitent et moderent, et proventus maiestatis sue, undecunque fieri poterit, curent sollicite ampliare, et non paciantur illos ad usus non necessarios inutiliter profundi.

XVI. Item ordinatum est hoc quoque, ut regia maiestas bona ad se devolvenda usque ad numerum ducentorum jobagionum et infra sine consilio suorum consiliariorum cuicumque voluerit, conferre posit, ultra numerum vero ducentorum ex consilio suorum consiliariorum conferat, castra vero ac civitates aut oppida bonaque alicuius magne importancie, si que ad collacionem maiestatis sue ⁱ mendose: faciant.

devoluta fuerint, ea maiestas sua pro se retineat, et usque ad futuram generalem congregacionem nemini conferat. Quo tempore maiestas sua, si visum sibi fuerit, et rebus suis expediet, poterit illa vel pro serviciis servitorum suorum conferre, vel debita sua ex illis dissolvere, si vero videbitur utilius, poterit sibipso reservare.

XVII. Item, quod maiestas sua archiepiscopatus, episcopatus, si qui vacabunt, de consilio dominorum consiliariorum conferat personis idoneis et benemeritis, qui scilicet ad servicia maiestatis sue et ad curas ac onera regni subeunda apti videbuntur; alia vero minora beneficia etiam consiliariis irrequisitis et inconsultis per se conferre possit.

XVIII. Item, quod oratores et nuncios quoscumque maiestas sua vel ad externos principes, vel ad regna dominaque sua externa, vel etiam ad quoscumque in hoc regno suo et partibus eiusdem in quibuscumque negociis et legacionibus mittere voluerit, de consilio dominorum consiliariorum mittat et expediat; rursus oratores et nuncios externorum principum et aliorum quorumcunque, quicumque ad maiestatem suam venerint, maiestas sua nonnisi presentibus ipsis dominis consiliariis audiat, et consilio eorundem illis relacionem faciat.

XIX. Item banatus et alia quevis castrorum finitimorum confiniorumque officia maiestas regia cum consilio dominorum consiliariorum conferat.

XX. Ne autem vel per aliquem errorem, vel per varias secretariorum et aliorum referendariorum relaciones ad supplicationes regie maiestati porrigendas in preiudicium iurium quorumcunque literas sibi invicem contrarias, ut hucusque sepe factum est, emanari contingat, visum est et decretum, ut deinceps omnes supplicationes et litere, quecumque venient ad regiam maiestatem vel per dominum cancellarium, vel secretarios sue maiestatis iuratos, suis temporibus coram regia maiestate presentibus consiliariis perlegantur, et non privatim, ut hucusque, sed illis in medium consulentibus expediantur, et per eosdem consiliarios quicquid de una quaque supplicatione et literis huiusmodi fieri debet, ibidem in consilio decernatur.

XXI. Ut autem ordinarius quociensque premissa omnia peragantur, visum est et statutum, ut singulis septimanis domini consilarii ter conveniant ad regiam maiestatem de rebus omnibus, que ad eorum officium pertinent, consulturi, feria scilicet secunda, quarta et sexta. Reliquos dies, nisi regni necessitates aliud suaserint, poterunt ducere feriatos.

XXII. Item, quod hec presens ordinatio dominorum non amplius, quam usque festum beati Georgii martiris proxime venturum, tempus scilicet future congregacionis generalis durare debeat; quo tempore, si ex rerum progressu ac ex eventu bona utilisque visa fuerit, poterit continuari, sin minus, poterit vel an melius reformari vel mutari.

Et hec sunt nomina dominorum prelatorum et baronum procerumque, qui prenotatos articulos composuerunt et ad eorundem observacionem compromiserunt: Thomas cardinalis Strigoniensis legatus etc. Hippolitus Esthensis cardinalis Agriensis, Georgius Quinqueecclesiensis, Franciscus de Warda Transsilvanensis, Simon Zagrabiensis, Petrus Beryzlo Wesprimiensis, banus, Johannes Gozthon Jauriensis, Ladislaus Waciensis, cancellarius, Stephanus Podmanyczky Nitriensis, Michael Kesserew Boznensis ecclesiarum episcopi, necnon Paulus prepositus sancti Sigismundi thesaurarius, Laurencius prepositus Albensis, Blasius Paxy prepositus Budensis, item Emericus de Peren comes et palatinus etc. Georgius marchio Brandenburgensis, Johannes de Zapolya comes et wayvoda Transsilvanus, Laurentius dux de Wylak, Stephanus de Bathor, comes Themesiensis, Johannes Dragffy de Belthewk, Andreas de Bathor, Anthonius de Palocz, Stephanus de Rozgon, Franciscus et Emericus Orzag, Johannes Banffy de Lyndwa, Gabriel de Peren, Ladislaus de Kanysa, Stephanus de Peren, Franciscus de Hederwara, Wolfgangus comes de Sancto Georgio, Moyses Bozlay, Petrus de Korlathkew et Johannes Pethew, magistri curie, Johannes Bornemyza comes Poseniensis, Emericus Therek banus Nandoralbensis, Ambrosius Sarkan, Gaspar de Raska, Gabriel de Chaak, Johannes de Zokol, Benedictus de Batthyan, Gaspar de Som, Michael Podmanyczky, Franciscus Balassa, Georgius de Mekche,ⁱⁱ Ladislaus More et Franciscus de Harazth.

ⁱⁱ Recte: Nekche.

1518 Tolna

The diet opened at Tolna on July 25: [ended in early August]. Called by the nobility, it was apparently attended at first only by the county nobility (42 county delegates), but later the king and his council joined them and finally, with the approval of the royal council, sanctioned its decisions. An armed diet, in preparation for a campaign (that did never materialize) was called for Michaelmas.

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survived in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (Marino Sanuto from Venice, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225-8.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archive (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer

@ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: A contemporary fragment MNL OL DI 36365 especially valuable as it contains an additional article (# 16) missing in all other texts; Copies: Codex Nádasdy (Budapest University Library Cod. G 39.) foll. 342r-344r [N]; Budapest University Library Cod. G40 [G40]; Esterházy Archives Codex Rep. 71 no. 13 pp. 253–61 [E]; the minor Esterházy codex, foll. 118v-120r [Em]; Codex Ilosvay (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4023) foll. 232r-234v [I]; Codex Festetich (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4355) pp. 536–40 [F].

EDD: Martinus Georgius. Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 466–74; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 744-50

LIT: Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában, pp. 25-8.

This dietal decision, as several decretal and other decisions of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted them here. For the omitted articles, we added, for information's sake, either the later rubrics of the Corpus Iuris, or a summary of the content.

Constitutiones dietae Tolnensis festi sancti Jacobi apostoli, anni 1518

Articuli in oppido Tholnensi per universitatem nobilium in convencione eorum particulari pro festo beati Jacobi apostoli anno Domini 1518. celebrata formati.ⁱⁱⁱ

I. Quoniam omne regnum duobus instrumentis regitur et conservatur,^{iv} scilicet armis et legibus, quorum in hoc regno nostro Hungarie neutrum habetur, unde secutum est, ut preter infinitas virgines, viduas, ^vhonestas matronas et alios utriusque sexus homines per Turcos,^{vi} Christi crucis hostes in captivitate perpetuam abductos plurima castra finitima, regno et confiniis eiusdem admodum nociva, presertim Bochacz^{vii} et Jezero in manus ipsorum Turcorum devenerunt, Jaycza solum cum Banyalwka omni presidio destitutum remansit, quod nisi mature et gentibus et victualibus reficiatur atque muniatur,^{viii} manibus eorundem Turcorum propediem venturum est; ubi vero Jaycza hostiles^{ix} in manus, quod Deus gloriosus avertat, inciderit, mox de regno Sclavonie Posegaque et Walko actum erit, quibus periclitatis eciam corpus regni internum^x simili calamitati miserieque subiacebit, insuper Carinthia, Austria et magna pars Germanie ac Dalmacie in faucibus hostium erit, et eorum prede exponetur. Ne igitur residuum quoque castrorum^{xi} finitimorum et signanter Jaycza pereat, quin pocius et Bochacz^{xii} et Jezero nobis recuperentur,^{xiii} deliberatum est, quod gentes tam dominorum prelatorum et baronum, quam eciam regni huius comitatum in pleno numero^{xiv} sub pena in decreto exinde denotata statim et sine omni mora ad ea, que^{xv} iam deputata sunt, loca mittantur. Per quarum illam partem, que Sclavoniam versus deputata est, regia maiestas auxilio eiusdem regni Sclavonie et domini bani et illustris domini Laurencii ducis victualia, quam primum fieri poterit, ad Jaycza imponi faciat. Pedites eciam per reverendissimum dominum cardinalem ac dominum palatinum nuper abductos maiestas sua regia in subsidium eiuscemodi impositionis victualium illuc transmitti et tandem ducentos ex eis in ⁱⁱⁱ Em ,F, N: Articuli Tholnenses in profesto beati Jacobi apostolic celebrati. Anno 1518

^{iv} E, G40, I observatur

^v N om.

^{vi} E, I Turcas; Em, G40 Thurcos

^{vii} E, G40 Bogach

^{viii} E, Em, F , N immuniatur

^{ix} E, G40, I hostibus

^x rectius: internum

^{xi} F add. ipsorum

^{xii} E, G40 Bogach; I Bogaz

^{xiii} Em, F, N recuperetur ^{xiv}

E, G40, Imodo

^{xv} G 40 quo

Jayczam pro conservacione eiusdem infra illius temporis spacium, quo in expedicione generali proxime instauranda effective de eius conservacione providebitur, relinqui faciat, et post victualium impositionem tam dominorum, quam eciam regnicolarum gentes iuxta contenta decreti conservari debentes in confiniis^{xvi} regni in locis necessariis pro custodia eiusdem regni maneant, et quod omnes domini ac nobiles preter comitatus inferiorum parcium in decreto specificatos armigeras gentes mittere teneantur.

II. Item ad proximum festum beati^{xvii} Michaelis archangeli universi domini prelati et barones ac nobiles et proceres huius regni eciam unius sessionis per singula capita bellico cum apparatu Bachiam descendere, domini videlicet iuxta status eorum exigenciam pro fide et fidelitate sacre corone huius regni consequenterque maiestati regie debita meliori, quo poterunt,^{xviii} apparatu et modo, nobiles vero de singulis viginti sessionibus eorum jobagionalibus singulum unum equitem ad minus lanceam et clypeum habentem secum ducere, soli autem nobiles quinquaginta vel centum et plures jobagiones possidentes loricam galeamque vel^{xix} aliud genus armorum more hwzaronum habere debeant et teneantur.

III. Capitula^{xx} vero et^{xxi} conventus prepositique et abbates ultra gentes eorum, quas ratione decimarum conservare tenentur, alie eciam persone ecclesiastice religiose et non religiose, decimas non habentes similiter de viginti sessionibus ipsorum jobagionalibus singulum unum equitem modo premissis mittere sint obligati.^{xxii}

IV. Domine quoque sanctimoniales et alie mulieres vidue jobagiones habentes modo simili exercituari facere teneantur.

V. Item illi, qui in serviciis vel^{xxiii} stipendiis dominorum suorum fuerint preoccupati, loco eorum alios substituere, et similiter aliorum nobilium instar gentes suas mittere debebunt.

VI. Hoc declarato, quod comitatus parcium superiorum, videlicet Trinchiniensis, Arwa, Nitra, Thwroc, Lypho, Zolyom^{xxiv} et Scepusiensis pro vigesima prenotata pedites pixidarios secum ducere teneantur.

VII. Maiestas regia raytharones et diffidatores in Moravia exterminari et debellari faciat.

^{xvi} Em, I confinibus

^{xvii} C, G40, I sancti

^{xviii} G40 poterint

^{xix} C, G40, I et

^{xx} E Item capitula

^{xxi} E om. vero et

^{xxii} E mittere debebunt

^{xxiii} G 40 et

VIII. Gentes in eundo ad expeditionem nocumenta inferre non presumant.

IX. Maiestas sua regia banderium suum regale secum erigere et Bachiam in persona sua propria descendere queat et de singulis portis singuli quinquaginta denarii exigantur.

X. Primo quidem, ut dominus thesaurarius coram regia maiestate presentibus nunciis nostris iuramentum prestare teneatur, ut ad dicam et connumeracionem ipsius contribucionis quinquaginta denariorum neminem deputabit, neque mittet, qui aliqua pecuniarum^{xxv} summa debitoribus obligaretur, neque pro exolucione debitorum suorum illam dissipabit, sed confinia tenentibus, presertim dominis wayvode Transsilvano et comiti Themesiensi et bano Croacie, qui ex eorum officio in campis contra hostes exercituare et ad presentem quoque generalem expeditionem sese^{xxvi} precingere appromptuareque tenentur, eam iuxta quantitatem sallariorum suorum presentis anni distribuere, et deinde aliis eciam finitima castra gubernantibus de illa providere et demum banderium, ut prefertur, regium secum erigere faciat.

XI. Penes hominem thesaurarii in singulis comitatibus per universitatem nobilium unus iuratus nobilis eligatur.

XII. Item quintodecimo^{xxvii} die post ipsam^{xxviii} connumeracionem ipsius contribucionis eadem ubique exigatur et exolvatur, et quod iuratus ipse nobilis teneatur copiam registri^{xxix} apud se retinere et in expeditione ac convencione generali coram regnicolis producere, ut tandem super eadem contribucione recta ratio verusque calculus et computus ab ipso domino thesaurario acceptari possit.

XIII. Super prioribus contribucionibus et universis proventibus regie maiestatis ratio detur et acceptetur.

XIV. Item maiestas regia penes literas huiusmodi^{xxx} contribucionis ad universos dominos et quoslibet comitatus scribere dignetur, ut ad terminum prefixum, festum scilicet^{xxxi} beati Michaelis archangeli Bachiam modo prehabito exercituancium more convenire et literas ipsas dicatorum secum adducere teneantur, nam aliter ipsa contribucio maiestati sue non exolvetur. Et ne presens contribucio per homines et dicatores thesaurarii racione sallariorum et expensarum ipsorum dissipetur, prout hactenus magna in parte dissipari consuevit, quilibet dicatorum quarto dumtaxat se equitibus ad dicandum proficiscatur et preter pecunias mensuales ad ipsos quatuor equites racione expensarum et insuper in magnis comitatibus triginta duos, in mediocribus viginti quinque, ^{xxv} E, G4-0, I om.

^{xxvi} N se

^{xxvii} N quinto

^{xxviii} A om.

^{xxix} E, Em, N, I registi

^{xxx} A huius

in minoribus vero viginti florenos pro sallario eorum nullum penitus denarium accipere audeat. Super quibus iuratus ipse nobilis rationem seu^{xxxii} computum servare teneatur, nam eiusmodi^{xxxiii} superfluis expensis et sallariis unus officialium regni^{xxxiv} confinia tenencium facile^{xxxv} contentari poterit.

XV. Item vicecomites quoque, si eciam duo vel plures fuerint in uno comitatu, preter sex, et iudices^{xxxvi} nobilium tres florenos pro eorum sallariis ex ipsa contribucione pro se^{xxxvii} tollere non presumant.

XVI. Comites aut vicecomites negligentes ab officio eorum perpetuo removeantur.

XVII. Item hoc quoque expresse declarato, quod universa bona dominorum prelatorum et baronum, si que eciam per dominos eorum dicata iam fuissent, modo antelato ubilibet dicentur et connumerentur, et si qua solucio de illis iam vere et non fecte facta ac ea summa soluta ad castra finitima et confinia tenentibus distributa fuisse testimonio evidenti et iuramento domini thesaurarii comprobari poterit, illa eadem summa defalcetur et secundo non exigatur. Nihilominus si restancia aliqua comperta fuerit, manibus thesaurarii assignetur. Verum si tota quoque summa restituta, sed non ad castra finitima et officialibus finitimis distributa fuisset, non curata huiusmodi restitutione tocius summe, iterato exigatur et ad necessitates superius declaratas exponatur; et illi, qui solucionem fecit, regia maiestas solucionem ipsam aliunde cum tempore refundere faciat.

XVIII. De cetero miseri et oppressi rustici ab ulteriori taxatione et continua dicacione preservarentur.

XIX. Item istis posthabitis^{xxxviii} recurrendum est ad iudiciorum celebracionem, sine quibus arma parum valent; que licet contra potentes continue celebrari debeant, hoc tempore tamen, tum propter assessorum carenciam, tum vero expedicionis huius generalis apparatus parumper postponi et pretermitti debent. Ne nichilominus licencia male agendi cuipiam per huiusmodi iudiciorum suspensionem^{xxxix} concessa videatur utque ipsa^{xl} expedicio quocius^{xli} et securius instaurari et peragi possit, universi actus potenciarum a die presentis constitucionis per quoslibet et contra quoslibet inferendi et committendi per regiam maiestatem, ubilibet et ubicunque constituta fuerit,

^{xxxii} A et

^{xxxiii} E, I huiusmodi; G40 huismi

^{xxxiv} mendose regnorum

^{xxxv} G40, I om.

^{xxxvi} E, I iudex

^{xxxvii} A sese

^{xxxviii} Em, E, N prehabitis

^{xxxix} E, G40, I suppressionem

^{xl} N ista

^{xli} E eo melius

infra exitum et descensionem ipsius^{xlii} generalis exercitus more et instar brevis brevium iudiciorum, non tamen ad tricesimum secundum diem, sed iuxta duntaxat loci distanciam, ubi evocandus residet, semper adiudicentur. Alia vero iudicia generaliter tam ecclesiastica, quam etiam secularia interim cessent et suspensa habeantur.

XX. Jobagiones etiam contra decretum abducti ubique per regiam maiestatem restituantur et reddi committantur. Iudicialiter quoque^{xliii} deliberaciones iam facte per suam^{xliv} maiestatem ubilibet executioni demandentur.

XXI. Postremo, quod ad summum pontificem ac serenissimos principes, cesaream maiestatem et dominum Polonie regem oratores exnunc mittantur.

^{xlii} E, G40 eius

^{xliii} C, G40 iudicialiterque

^{xliv} A add. regiam

[25 July] 1518 at Tolna

Articles formulated by the community of the nobles in their partial assembly in the town of Tolna on the feast of St James the Apostle in the year 1518.

1. Because every kingdom is ruled and preserved by two instruments, arms and law, neither of which presently exists in this our kingdom of Hungary, as a result of which—besides the countless maidens, widows, worthy matrons, and other people of both sexes taken into everlasting servitude by the Turks, those foes of Christ's cross—several most imperiled border castles of this country and its frontiers, especially Bočac and Jezero, have fallen into the hands of the Turks,⁴⁵ [while] Jajce with Banja Luka remain entirely unprotected and will fall into the hands of those Turks unless they are soon refortified and supplied with men and victuals; should Jajce fall into the hands of the enemy—which the glorious Lord may avert—then the same will happen to Vukovar and Požega in the realm of Slavonia, upon which perils the internal body of the kingdom will also be exposed to similar danger and suffering; moreover, Carinthia, Austria, and a great part of Germany and Dalmatia will be in the jaws of the enemies and become their prey. Lest the rest of the border castles, especially Jajce, should fall, or even so that Bočac and Jezero be recovered for us, it was decided that the troops of the lord prelates and barons as well as of the counties of this realm be sent forthwith and with no delay under the penalty prescribed for this in the decree⁴⁶ to the locations that have been already designated. For that part of them which is sent to Slavonia, the royal majesty shall send victuals, as soon as possible, to be deposited in Jajce, with the help of the lord ban and the illustrious Lord Duke Lawrence.⁴⁷ The royal majesty shall transfer there those foot soldiers that the most reverend lord cardinal and the lord palatine⁴⁸ recently took with them

⁴⁵ These smaller castles were parts of the Bosnian line of border castles, close to Jajce. Bočac was occupied by the Ottomans before 1516; Jezero fell in 1518. In general, see Ferenc Szakály: "The Hungarian-Croatian Border Defense System and its Collapse." in: János M. Bak, and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in medieval and Early modern Hungary (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science monographs, 1982) pp. 159–178.

⁴⁶ Cf. 1498:18.

⁴⁷ Újlaki, Lawrence, duke (d. 1524) son of King Nicholas, ban of Mačva 1477-92, judge royal 1518–24.

⁴⁸ Thomas Bakócz, bishop. of Győr 1486–1493, bishop elect of Eger 1493–1497, archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere, and Emeric Perényi, perpetual ispán of Co. Abaújvár, the master of the stewards, 1492–1504, count palatine 1504–19, ban of Croatia and Dalmatia 1512–13.

to help deliver victuals, and two hundred of them shall remain in Jajce for its defense for the time being until, by the general levy to be soon proclaimed, effective arrangements are made for its defense; and once the victuals are delivered, the troops of the lords and the gentlemen of the realm shall keep their troops at the necessary locations in the border castles, as decreed, and all the lords and nobles must send soldiers, except for the counties of the lower parts, defined in the decree.

2. Then, all the lord prelates, barons, nobles and notables⁴⁹ of this kingdom, including those owning one plot, have each and all to muster armed for war at the coming Michaelmas at Bács:⁵⁰ the lords—as suitable to their estate [and] for their larger faith and faithfulness to the holy crown of this realm and consequently to the royal majesty—with the best possible equipment and means; the nobles should bring with them for every twenty tenant plots one such horseman who is equipped with at least a lance and shield; [1] only those nobles who own fifty, a hundred or even more tenants⁵¹ shall and must have armor and helmet or other arms like hussars.⁵²

3. Chapters and convents as well as priors and abbots are obliged, together with those ecclesiastics, regulars and seculars, who do not have tithes, to send to camp one mounted soldier after every twenty of their tenant peasants, beyond the troops they have to supply on the basis of the tithes.

4. Religious ladies and other widows having tenant peasants have to send men to war in a similar way.

5. Then those, who are in the service or pay of their lords,⁵³ have to send someone in their place and similarly send their troops, as other nobles do.

⁴⁹ The term proceres may have referred to great men of the realm not holding baronial offices.

⁵⁰ The location of that diet—and also the present one held at Tolna beside the Danube—was sometimes the gathering point of armies against the Ottomans. In this sense, meetings there resembled those early Polish and Czech diets that grew out of the general levy. However, no campaigns may be connected to the diets of 1518.

⁵¹ Tenant peasant (jobagiones, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruïn, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

⁵² Hussars were, as a rule, light cavalymen without metal armor, but there seem to have been some “heavier” (if not technically “heavy”) cavalry among them who had adopted plate armor.

⁵³ This is one of the relatively rare cases when laws refer to nobles in the service of others. Noble retainer (familiars): were lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron (q.v.) or major landowner. They kept their noble privilege and were subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which they received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The laws refer to it very rarely, as in principle all noblemen were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European

6. Adding that the counties of the upper parts of the country, that is Trencsén, Árva, Nyitra, Turóc, Liptó, Zólyom and Szepes,⁵⁴ have to send for the said twenty plots foot soldiers with muskets.

7. That the king shall defeat the Moravian rebels.

8. *That the army should not cause damages when marching to war.*⁵⁵

9. *A special tax of 50 pennies is to be collected from every plot for the king's banderium*⁵⁶.

10. First, then, the lord treasurer has to swear an oath before the royal majesty in the presence of our delegates that he will not entrust or send out for the collection and registration of this tax of 50 pennies anyone who may be bound for any amount of money to debtors,⁵⁷ nor will he waste it on the payment of his own debts, but shall distribute it to those holding the borders, above all to the lord voivode of Transylvania, the ispán of Temes, and the ban of Croatia who have ex officio to fight in the field against the enemy and have to be ready and prepared for the present general levy, according to their present annual salary; then take care of the commanders of the other border castles, and finally raise the royal banderium.

11. That in every county a nobleman has to be elected to accompany the treasurer's agent in assessing this tax.

12. Then, on the fifteenth day following the assessment of this tax, it shall be everywhere collected and raised, and the elected nobleman shall keep a copy of the register with him and present it in the camp to the gentlemen of the realm, so that a full account and true calculation and computation of the same tax can be received by the lord treasurer.

13. That previous taxes and all royal revenues have to be accounted for as well.

14. Then, the royal majesty shall, in addition to letters concerning this taxation, deign to write to all the lords and counties that they should come together at the date set, namely the next Michaelmas, in Bács, in the aforementioned manner of going to war, and bring the letters of the tax collectors with them, for otherwise the subsidy would not be paid to His Majesty. And lest the vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), pp. 137–40, Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndsmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 110–31.

⁵⁴ That is today's Slovakia.

⁵⁵ Cf. 31 August 1405, and many times later.

⁵⁶ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, 'banner') were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field banderia were called banderial lords.

⁵⁷ Logically it should be creditors.

present tax is wasted by the men and tax assessors⁵⁸ of the treasurer on their salaries and expenses, as it has been up to now for the most part usually wasted, each of the receivers should strictly set off for the assessment with three other horsemen and they shall not dare, besides monthly payments for the expenses and so on of these four horsemen, to take a penny more than twenty-five florins in the larger and medium sized counties and twenty florins in the smaller ones. The sworn nobleman shall give account and computation of these, because from such excessive expenses and salaries one could easily pay one officer serving in the border castles.

15. Then that *alispáns*⁵⁹, if there are two or more in one county, shall not dare to take more than six and the noble magistrates more than three florins from this tax for their salaries.

16. Negligent ispáns and alispáns who fail to ensure collection of the tax are to be deprived of their offices and have to pay the missing sum.

17.⁶⁰ Then, this has been also expressly declared that all the goods of the lord prelates and barons, even if already assessed by their lords, have to be assessed and enumerated in the aforesaid way; and if the payment of these was really done and not made up and if it can be proved by plain testimony and the oath of the lord treasurers that the sum was paid and applied to the border castles and those serving on the frontier, then that amount shall be canceled and not levied a second time. Nevertheless, if some surplus is found, it shall be handed to the treasurer. If, however, the whole amount was rendered but not distributed to the border castles and to the officers of the frontier, then regardless of such a payment, the sum has to be exacted again and applied to the aforementioned needs; and he who made the payment shall be refunded by the royal majesty at some other time.

18. *That because undue burdens on the “poor and oppressed peasants,” future imposts shall be avoided.*⁶¹

19. Then, after all this, we return to the holding of courts of law (without which arms are worth but little); although these shall always be held against the over mighty, for the time being, partly because of the lack of jurors, partly because of the preparation for the present general levy, they should be postponed and suspended for a little while. [1] Nonetheless, lest this prorogation of court sessions should seem to give license to anyone to behave badly and in order that the campaign be conducted and completed more securely and safely, all acts of might,⁶² committed by anyone

⁵⁸ Here and many other places dicatores is used for both the assessors and the collectors of taxes.

⁵⁹ The vicecomes (alispán) was in most cases the actual administrator of the county, his superior, the comes/ispán frequently holding several offices in court or in counties. He was usually a retainer (familiaris) of the ispán, but ever more often also “elected” by the county’s nobles.

⁶⁰ This article is contained only in one—however, the only contemporary—copy (A).

⁶¹ 1514:1–3.

⁶² “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal against anyone after the day of this constitution, shall be adjudicated by the royal majesty whenever and wherever he may stay in the manner of short court sessions (however, not on the thirty-second day but according to the distance of the residence of the accused) before the end of the present campaign and the dismissal of the general levy. [2] However, other courts of law, both secular and spiritual, have to cease for the time being and be suspended.

20. Tenant peasants anywhere abducted against the decree shall be returned and obliged by the royal majesty to be returned.⁶³ Judicial decisions already made shall everywhere be instructed for execution by the royal majesty.

21. Finally, ambassadors are henceforth to be sent to the pope and the most serene princes, the imperial majesty and the king of Poland.⁶⁴ cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (sc. rape).

⁶³ 1514: 25–6, 30, 44.

⁶⁴ Exnunc in the Latin is inappropriate here. These ambassadors were intended to ask for financial and/or military support.

1518 Bács

Based on the decisions of the diet at Tolna, an armed diet meets September 29 (Michaelmas) to ca. October 29: a field near Bács. Its decisions, though not approved by the king, remained a point of reference for the following years. The planned campaign is cancelled and an Ottoman proposal for a 3-year peace considered (approved April-May 1519).

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survived in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (Marino Sanuto from Venice, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225-8.

MSS: Copies in six codices: Codex Nádasdy (Budapest University Library Cod. G 39.) foll. 345r-351r [N]; Budapest University Library Cod. G40 [G40]; Esterházy Archives Codex Rep. 71 no. 13 pp. 287-305 [E]; the minor Esterházy codex, foll. 118v-120r [Em]; the major Esterhazy codex [EM], and the Codex Festetich (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4355) pp. 549-63 [F].

The constitutions were slightly reworked in an, apparently expanded, council meeting in 1519 (in the CJH/MTvt erroneously listed as decisions of a diet in 1519, here below as Appendix 1518): the variants of that text are marked here with X.

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790, pp. 475–500 from the since then missing Codex Ráday; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 750-73 [=CJH/MTvt], Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története, pp. 237-45 [part.]

LIT: Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története, pp. 29-35.

This dietal decision as several other legal enactments of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted all of them here.

Moreover, we omitted not only those that are verbatim identical of earlier texts (marked as =), but also those that are repeated with minor, stylistic, changes (marked as ≈). For the omitted articles, we added, for information's sake, the rubrics of the Corpus Iuris, even though they are later additions, or our own summary.

Constitutiones dietae Bachiensis anno 1518.

Tractatus et articuli in dieta et convencione generali pro festo beati Michaelis archangeli in anno Domini millesimo quingentesimo decimo octavo Bachie celebrata formati.

I. Quamquam hactenus quoque multa et multociens bona utiliaque statuta salutem et quietum statum totius regni et imprimis quidem incrementum regiminis maiestatis regie concernencia ordinata fuerint, et conclusa, quia tamen observacio et executio earum constitutionum subsecuta nunquam fuit, ideo omnia in irritum transierunt, castra finitima plurima perierunt, menia reliquorum corruerunt, innumerabiles per hec temporaⁱ tam mutua cede, tum vero hostis abductione interierunt, subsidia pecuniarum sepe numero maiestati regie prestita parum profuerunt, et breviter confuso preposteroque ordine cuncta regni et reipublice facta tam in eius defensionis expedicione, quam eciam iudiciorum celebracione processerunt. Quapropter, ut omnia et perprie et nunc quoque conclusa firma maneant et stabilia, debitumque et perfectum finem sorciantur et consequantur, communi omnium sententia deliberatum et conclusum est, quod ad executioem et finalem perfeccionem omnium negociorum regie maiestatis et regni sui duo probi et fideles de medio nobilium eligantur, unus ab ista et alter ab altera parte Danubii thesaurarii, et preterea in quolibet comitatuⁱⁱ unus pariter eligatur iuratus nobilis, qui strictissimo sub iuramento universa bona et quelibet iura possessionaria tam dominorum, quam eciam nobilium in ipso comitatu adiacencia,ⁱⁱⁱ dominorum quidem ex eo, ut rescatur numerus jobagionum, iuxta quem gentes conservare tenentur, ne in gencium eorum conservacione fraus et defectus subsequatur, nobilium vero, ut pecunie alias ad conservacionem stipendiariorum et gencium exigi consuete iuxta verum et iustum computum atque numerum primo ad manus ipsius iurati nobilis et deinde per eum manibus prefatorum dominorum thesaurariorum regnicolarum dentur et assignentur. Qui secundum ipsum verum numerum gentes iuxta formam generalis decreti pro regni defensione et confiniorum conservacione rerum bellicarum peritos conducere, domini eciam barones banderiatii et officiales quoque regii finitima tenentes iuxta numerum jobagionum suorum gentes eorum paratas habere et illas in confiniis regnorum in pleno numero conservare teneantur. Insuper domini prelati tam racione decimarum, quam eciam jobagionum ipsorum semper medietatem gencium eorum similiter in confiniis conservare et tempore manifeste necessitatis eciam alteram medietatem ad literas dominorum capitaneorum regie maiestatis, quibus subsunt, illuc mittere, officiales quoque^{iv} finitima ipsa tenentes gentes suas racione officiorum suorum conservare debentes secum et in ibi modo simili paratas tenere semper sint obligati, ne gentes, ex quibus parum utilitatis hactenus habuisse dinoscitur, de cetero frustra et infructuose teneri et conservari

ⁱ E, EM add. persone

ⁱⁱ E, EM add. regni

ⁱⁱⁱ desideratur connumerare teneatur

^{iv} EM officialesque

videantur. Ceteri autem domini non banderiatum omnes secundum formam generalis decreti, demptis decem personis, que vigore eiusdem decreti excipi possunt, et que per regiam maiestatem statim nominentur, in medium nobilium computentur.

II. Ecclesiasticorum personarum querimonia de intertentione militum.

III. Predicti duo thesaurarii auxilio circumiacencium comitatum, et si opus fuerit, auxilio totius regni executionem remissionis et administracionis peragere teneantur.

IV. Preterea, quantum ad iudiciorum et literarum aduicatoriarum executionem attinet, si causa coram regia maiestate vel personali presencia eiusdem mota et tractata ac finalem conclusionem sortita fuerit, ita ut executio armis et non iuridicis processibus fieri debeat, actor vel pars triumphans cum assessoribus pariter regiam maiestatem requirere, sibi que, ut executionem ipsam peragere faciat, supplicare teneatur, quod maiestas sua regia ex suscepti regiminis sui officio facere debet.

V. Thesaurarii executionem faciant si rex et palatinus eam facere nequierint.

VI. Domini iudices curie regie in Hungaria, bani regnorum Dalmacie, Croacie et Sclavonie ac wayvoda Transsilvano executiones iudicialiarum deliberacionum finali processu et exitu sunt perficiende.

VII. Ad reformationem negociorum et recuperacionem bonorum proventuumque regie maiestatis imprimis recurrendum est.

VIII. Domine Anne relicte quondam domini Andree Both, bani Croacie debitum suum reddendum est.

IX. Camere item salium tam in Hungaria, quam Transsilvania maiestati regie exnunc similiter remittantur, et de cetero nemini preter officiales finitimos et illis quoque moderate ac iusta limitacione consiliariorum et assessorum sales dentur, sed pecunie parate cuilibet solvantur; nemoque sales preter camerarios regios ad hoc deputatos vendicioni exponere audeat; et omnes sales externi de hoc regno et partibus sibi subiectis eiiciantur ubilibet, et infra proximum festum beati Georgii martyris extirpentur; ita quod si postea sales externi apud dominum vel nobilem pro usu vel vendicione reperti fuerint, talis dominus vel nobilis in amissione cunctorum bonorum per regiam maiestatem aut pro se retinendorum aut alteri conferendorum convincatur eo facto.

X. Rusticus vero tam maiestatis regie, quam eciam quorumcunque dominorum et nobilium in amissione pariter cunctorum bonorum suorum mobilium et immobilium condemnetur, cuius hereditas domino terrestri cedat, res vero mobiles per camerarium auferantur et regio fisco applicentur. Si vero camerarius per se ipsum ac ad se pertinentes ad auferendas eiuscemodi res non sufficerent, comes vel vicecomes comitatus advocetur, qui sub perpetua amissione officii sui advenire camerarioque assistere et auxilio adesse tenatur. Et hoc modo tertia pars comiti vel vicecomiti, due vero partes camerario consequenterque regio fisco rerum illarum mobilium cedant. Ubi autem isti quoque non sufficerent extunc duo thesaurarii executionem huiuscemodi ad scitum et literas regie maiestatis et consiliariorum et assessorum suorum peragere teneatur.

XI. Item de cameris^v fodinisque auri et argenti statutum est, quod cultores montanarum et civitates earundem in antiquis ipsorum libertatibus conserventur. Ita videlicet, ut montaniste et inhabitatores civitatum earundem de rebus quibuscunque ad necessitatem eorum ad ipsa montana deferendis nullum tributum solvere teneantur. Ab illis vero^{vi} extraneis, qui montana non inhabitant, sed victualia et alias res necessarias ad culturam montanarum undecunque deferunt, exigatur quidem tributum, sed ita moderetur, ut ab eis quoque non superfluum, sed iustum et honestum theloneum exigi videatur. Ne autem inter exemptos et tributa habentes contencio maneat, statuto per dominos consiliarios et assessores uno brevi termino, literas ipsorum exempcionales et tributales coram maiestate regia producere teneantur; et que illarum antiquiores et utiliores reperientur, ille observentur; que si non producentur, viribus in perpetuum destitute habeantur, et de cetero virtute illarum nemo utatur. Limitacio eciam iusta et honesta exaccionis tributorum eodem termino per ipsos dominos consiliarios^{vii} omnino peragatur atque finiatur.

XII. In singulis huius regni Hungarie comitatibus octo probi nobiles viri eligantur, qui tributorum siccorum et in aquis exigi solitorum, pontes eciam et repleturas habencium loca peragrare ac oculata revisione fide conspiciere debeant.

XIII. Aurum et argentum de regno non educantur.

XIV. Item quod castrum Hwzt cum cameris salium Maramarusiensium et Transsilvanensium ac tricesimis, vigesimis, quinquagesimis, cementis camerisque et fodinis auri et argenti, necnon civitatibus liberis, Saxonibusque regiis manibus thesaurarii regii pro tempore constituti, castra vero Munkach, Tata et Komaron cum curia Wysegradiensis,^{viii} Veteri Buda ac insulis Ros et Chepel appellatis, necnon oppidis Sambok, Salmar et Kezy cunctisque eorundem pertinentiis, Cumanisque et Philisteis pro sustentacione et conservacione coquine regie maiestatis ad manus provisoris Budensis assignentur. Ad quam lardis et vino de proventibus castri Munkach, usonibus vero et aliis piscibus de Komaron et Tata providere et insuper decimas Budenses et alias eciam in Syrimio provisor ipse regie maiestati pro mensa et curia sua comparare debet. Defectum autem si quis erit, iuxta limitacionem dominorum consiliariorum et assessorum thesaurarius regius supplebit.

XV. Item, ut curia maiestatis regie honeste et servitorum multitudine sit referta et decorata, universa iura patronatus omnium ecclesiarum et beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum, tam per maiestatem regiam, quam eciam serenissimum quondam dominum Wladislaum regem, genitorem sue maiestatis charissimum pie memorie cuicunque collata revocata habeantur;^{ix} et cetero cuncta

^v C campis

^{vi} X tributum vero ad ipsas

^{vii} C add. et assessores termino assignato

^{viii} E curia castri Wissegradiensis

^{ix} X add. maiestas sua regia de cetero cuncta beneficia ecclesiastica, demptis canonicatibus et rectoratibus altarium, quibusconque sola voluerit, iuxta decretum pro festo beati Luce editum conferat.

beneficia ecclesiastica ab illis, qui ultra unum habent, per regiam maiestatem pariter auferantur et iuxta contenta generalis decreti dividantur, ut eo plures deo graciosi servire, plures etiam gentes pro defensione regni conservare possint.

XVI. Universe prepositure, abbacie et alie ecclesie per unionem aliis ecclesiis annexe ab unione dissolvantur et per maiestatem regiam, quibus decet, conferantur.

XVII. Honores comitatum maiestas regia a dominis secularibus, qui preter unum plures habent, auferat et personis benemeritis distribuatur.

XVIII. Verum quia ad solutionem et restitutionem tot tantorumque debitorum, quibus maiestatem regiam teneri intelligimus, et eliberacionem proventuum bonorumque sue maiestatis ac reedificacionem^x castrorum finitimorum proventus ipsi regii etiam rectificati^{xi} sufficere non videntur, ideo deliberatum est, ut universi prepositi et archidiaconi, qui ratione huiusmodi beneficiorum suorum separatim a capitulo vel conventu, ubi resident, nullum onus pro regni defensione supportare dinoscuntur, preterea cunctarum civitatum, oppidorum et villarum plebani parochiales ac rectores altarium et sacellorum seu capellarum, tam in Hungaria, quam etiam Slavonia et Transsilvania constituti, quorum plerique sexaginta, quadraginta et sic consequenter vasa vinorum annuatim habere sed regni pro tutela nec unicum quidem denarium solvere solent, per regiam maiestatem ubicunque iuxta proventuum ipsorum exigenciam pro decima parte eorundem proventuum taxentur, ita ut de singulis decem florenis unus florenus maiestati regie per eos contribuatur. Ad quorum connumeracionem iuratus ille nobilis in singulis comitatibus ad exaccionem pecuniarum pro conservacione gencium dicandarum electus per regiam maiestatem deputetur atque mittatur. Prius tamen idem nobilis super ista quoque contribucione et iusta fidelique exaccione iuramentum coram homine thesaurarii regii et universitate nobilium prestare teneatur et deinde secundum iusticiam et conscienciosam limitacionem eiusdem ac parochiani iudicis et iuratorum civium contribucio ipsa decimalis indilate exigatur. Ubi vero aliqui rebellionem ducti contribucionem eandem reddere recusarent, extunc dominus prelatus, archiepiscopus scilicet vel episcopus loci eiusdem, per literas ipsius iurati hominis requisitus, reddi facere teneatur, nam aliter ex decimis suis vinorum vel frumentorum in comitatu illo, ubi rebellis ipse residet, pro regia maiestate tantum reservetur, quantum contribucio prepositi, archidiaconi vel plebani rebellis faceret. Que quidem contribucio ad reformationem castrorum finitimorum et bonorum proventuumque regionum redempcionem iuxta limitacionem dominorum consiliariorum et assessorum convertatur. Ad Slavoniam et Transsilvaniam unus de medio ipsorum assessorum adiuncto homine thesaurarii regii ad eiuscemodi contribucionem peragendam et exigendam deputetur atque mittatur. Qui quidem iuratus nobilis una cum homine thesaurarii regii pecunias ex huiusmodi contribucione collectas regie maiestati adducere et ibidem dominis consiliariis et assessoribus regnicolarum rectam racionem exinde dare teneatur.

^x Em, F, G40 rectificacionem; X add. et reformationem

^{xi} X si etiam rectificentur

XIX. Item quod penes thesaurarium ipsum regum de medio assessorum regnicolarum unus eligatur, absque cuius scitu thesaurarius nec introitum nec exitum proventuum regionum administret et dispenset. Ille vero assessor electus computum et rationem de omnibus teneat, ne fraus et dissipatio in proventibus regiis fiat. Et thesaurarius super eo, quod non aliter procedet, iuramentum coram regia maiestate ac dominis consiliariis et assessoribus prestet; qui si postea contrarium fecisse repertus fuerit, extunc persona ecclesiastica existens in beneficiorum ac eciam patrimoniorum iurium, secularis vero persona in bonorum pariter cunctorum suorum amissione convincatur et convictus habeatur eo facto; que maiestas regia quibuscunque voluerit, libere conferre poterit.

XX. Item quod omnium proventuum regie maiestatis introitus et exitus fideliter et sub iuramento per dominos consiliarios et assessores e thesaurario exnunc intelligatur, ut sciant postea, quantum pro exitu necessitatis superaddere debeant; et quod singulis annis thesaurarius regis et provisor Budensis super cunctis proventibus regiis dominis eisdem consiliariis et assessoribus festo Epiphaniarum domini ac diebus immediate sequentibus ad id sufficientibus rationem dare teneatur.

XXI. Item quod bani castrorum finitimorum semper in eisdem castris finitimis maneant, et unus eorum sub nota perpetue infidelitatis nunquam de castro egredi audeat; et quod ad omnia castra ipsa finitima provisos per regiam maiestatem constituentur, qui tam ad ingenia, quam eciam victualia et alia eorum necessaria modo tempore quondam domini Mathie regis observato providere teneantur.

XXII. Damna per cruciferos nobilibus illata refundantur et modo ordineque in decreto exinde edito expresso damnificatis restituantur.

XXIII. Castra quondam domini comitis Petri per dominos Franciscum et Wolfgangum Groff manibus domine relicte eiusdem quondam comitis Petri statim remittantur.

XXIV. Bona desolata nobilium in comitatu Themesiensi adiacencia per dominum comitem Themesiensem remittantur.

XXV. Abbacia Thapolcza fratri Petro, pre cuius manibus erat, de facto et immediate remittatur.

XXVI. Nobiles prediales ecclesie Saxardiensis in antiquis eorum libertatibus et iuribus conserventur.

XXVII. Cives civitatum in terris aliorum vineas habentes nonasolvere teneantur.

XXVIII. Item quia plerique dominorum ac nobilium spreto et contempto regio mandato ad hanc dietam venire neglexerunt, quorum bona et iura hereditaria, licet fisco regio applicanda forent, ex quo tamen sub pena in decreto expressa vocati sunt, ideo penam ibidem declaratam incurrisse dinoscuntur. Quam ne illusive preterisse gloriantur, maiestas regia penam dominorum, hoc est singulos octingentos florenos pro se tollere, nobilium vero, singulos scilicet quadringentos florenos, si pro se exigere noluerit, nobilibus egenis et miseris, qui mandato sue maiestatis obtemperantes advenerunt, per vicecomites et iudices nobilium cum consilio et iuxta limitationem universitatis nobilium singulorum comitatum distribuendos donare et conferre dignetur. Si qui comitum aut vicecomitum aliquos nobiles precio domi reliquissent, in amissione officiorum et preterea pro singulis nobilibus in quadringentis florenis regie maiestati solvendis convincantur, quos maiestas regia ab illis indilate exigere faciat. Et si per quospiam premissorum contrarium committeretur, unde punicio nobilium predeclarata non permitti videretur, extunc antefati thesaurarii regnicolarum iuxta informationem per assessores eisdem superinde dandam in executione huiusmodi punicionis procedere teneantur.

XXIX. Item plerique solent dominorum et nobilium, quibus iuramenta prestanda adiudicantur, novum iudicium a regia maiestate diversis sub coloribus impetrare, et partem alteram expensis duntaxat gravare, et postea non posse in iudicio se ab ipsa iuramentali depositione preservare. Ne itaque fraus et dolus alicui patrocinari videatur, statutum est, prout eciam ex antiqua regni consuetudine per iudices regni ordinarios observatum fuisse dinoscitur, ut novum iudicium impetrans, si iustam et rationabilem causam impetracionis sue assignare et se ab ipsa iuramentali depositione, quam facere debebat, in iudicio preservare non poterit, extunc in amissione sui iuramenti, consequenterque pena exinde subsequenda de facto convincatur.

XXX. Qui propter amissionem castrorum proscripti sunt, de novo proscripti habeantur.

XXXI. De metis inter Cumanos Philisteosque et Zegedienses.

XXXII. Districtus Monostor, Sagya et Morsina &c. ad comitatum Themesiensem remittantur.

XXXIII. Oves, boves et equi de hoc regno de cetero non educantur.

Add.: Et de singulis bobus et equis singuli decem denarii ab emptore, qui scilicet illos e regno hoc educere voluerit, ultra tricesimam solitam in fiscum cameramque regiam exigantur, et ab una quoque ove vel ariete denarius unus pariter solvatur.

XXXIV. Prelati, barones et nobiles atque comitatus gentes eorum in confinibus conservare teneantur.

XXXV. Item quia fures et alii malefactores adeo multiplicati sunt, ut nec domi, nec foris nobiles ac ignobiles tuti esse possint, si qui igitur comitatum voluerint, et comites ad extirpacionem eorum negligentes fuerint, unus ex assessoribus per maiestatem regiam ad requisicionem nobilium illuc^{xii} mittatur, per quem extirpacio furum et aliorum malefactorum iuxta formam generalis decreti exequatur et effectum sociatur.

XXXVI. Item quia nobiles unius sessionis per singula capita, dum regni necessitas extrema ingrueret, insurgere tenentur, ideo racione conservacionis gencium de cetero non taxentur.

XXXVII. Ex parte nobilium Campi Zagrabiensis iudicium indilate administrari debet.

XXXVIII. Episcopus Waciensis, alias thesaurarius racionem dare teneatur.

^{xii} E illius comitatus

XXXIX. Due archiepiscopi, due episcopi, palatinus regni, iudex curie regie, wayvoda Transsilvanus et comes Themesiensis, sedecemque nominati nobiles apud maiestatem regiam iurati maneant, et in consilio regio ac iudiciis decernendis sibi assistant.

XL. Primo et ante omnia castrorum finitimorum provisioni per thesaurarium regium reddi facere teneantur.

XLI. Item quod brevia iudicia ac breves brevium causeque transmissionales ad vigesimum diem festi Epiphaniarum domini proxime venturi inchoentur; et deinde cause presertim transmissionales et breves brevium continue et sine intermissione celebrentur, et execucionem, prout iam declaratum est, finalem absque omni favore et formidine semper sorciantur. Cause vero virtute articuli Tolnensis mote et movende exnunc et de facto adiudicentur^{xiii} et unicuique iusticia administretur; et de cetero secundum iura regni scripta ad universos regni comitatus iam destinata semper adiudicentur causeque discuciantur.

XLII. Item quod ad premissa omnia firmiter observanda contemplacione boni status regie maiestatis et tocius regni sui universi nobiles, qui diete huic non interfuerunt, in sedibus iudiciariis comitatum post nobilium hinc ad propria regressum primitus celebrandis iuramentum prestare teneantur. Si^{xiv} qui autem rebellione forsitan ducti iurare rennuerent, universe talium res mobiles per alios nobiles iuratos prede exponantur, et inter sese dividantur, et insuper, si comprehendi poterunt, capite quoque plectantur atque puniantur.

XLIII. Et quod universi nobiles dominos eorum, cuiuscunque dignitatis aut condicionis existant, quos premissis constitutionibus ac remittendis et resignandis bonis et proventibus regie maiestatis palam contravenire et reluctari agnoverint, postquam hinc ad propria eos secuti fuerint, et huiusmodi reluctacio nobilibus ipsis per assessores et thesaurarios regnicolarum innotuerit, mox deserere relinquereque et eorum serviciis renunciare sub pena immediate prenarrata debeant et teneantur.

XLIV. Et predeclarata statuta usque ad dietam pro festo beati Georgii martyris in tercia revolucionem annuali venturo celebrandam durent et observentur.

XLV. Interim autem pro gencium regnicolarum conservacione per spacium duorum annorum integrorum duo floreni per universum hoc regnum fideliter et plenarie cum numero dicentur et exigantur. Regie maiestati vero in eisdem duobus annis centum et viginti denarii incluso lucro camere sue maiestatis per eosdem annos dari consueto pariter solvantur; quorum viginti ad redempcionem civitatum et tricesimarum sue maiestatis pre manibus domini wayvode Transsilvanensis in presenciarum titulo pignoris habitaram, viginti autem ad solucionem debitorum et expensarum assessorum, reliqui octuaginta denarii ad curie familieque regie maiestatis conservacionem cedant. In qua quidem dicatura et contribucione, quia ad tocius regni huius publica notoriaque negocia exponendum^{xv} et dispensandum est, nonnisi factores et servitores dominorum ac nobilium manifesti et nimis pauperes relaxentur, ne gencium numerus regni pro defensione minuatur et decrescat, et ne redempcione bonorum ac proventuum regie maiestatis apud dominum wayvodam, ut prefertur, habitorum ulterior mora fiat atque committatur.

^{xiii} X mote die crastinal post meridiem hora secunda adiudicentur

^{xiv} X add. et quod vicepalatinus ac viceiudex curie regie et magistri prothonotarii ex eorum officio consilio region interesse debeant

^{xv} recte: exponende et dispensande sunt

Dietal decision [ca. October 28] 1518 at Bács

Agreement and articles formulated at the diet and general assembly held at the feast of the Archangel Michael, in the year of the Lord one thousand five hundred and eighteen at Bács.

1. Although hitherto many good and useful statutes have many a time been ordered and concluded concerning both the safety and tranquility of the entire kingdom and in particular the improvement of the governance of the royal majesty, the observance and enforcement of these constitutions never, however, followed and thus everything went awry: most of the border castles were lost; the walls of the rest collapsed; innumerable men perished in these times, as much in mutual slaughter as by being carried off by the enemy¹; the financial subsidies frequently granted to the royal majesty helped little; and, in brief, the affairs of the realm and the commonwealth were handled in a muddled and topsy-turvy manner both in regard to arrangements of defense and the holding of courts of law. [1] Therefore, in order that both previous and present decisions remain firm and stable and serve their due and entire purpose, it was resolved and concluded by common consent [2] that for the enforcement and final completion of the affairs of the royal majesty and his realm, two honest and faithful treasurers are to be elected from among the nobility, one from this and one from the other side of the Danube,² and that, moreover, in every county a sworn nobleman is to be elected, who shall survey under the strictest oath the goods and whatever property rights the lords and nobles hold in that county: in respect of the lords so that the number of the tenant peasants according to which they are held to field troops be established lest any fraud or mistake be committed in maintaining their troops; [3] in respect of the nobles so that the money otherwise customarily spent on the maintenance of paid soldiers or troops be given and assigned, according to just and true accounting, first to the hands of the sworn nobleman and through them to the aforementioned lords treasurers of the gentlemen of the realm.³[4] They [the lord treasurers] shall hire troops, experienced in military matters, in numbers according to the general decree, for the defense of the realm and preservation of the borders; the lord barons keeping banderia ⁴ and the

¹ In general, see: András Kubinyi, “Hungary’s Power Factions and the Turkish Threat in the Jagiellonian Period (1490 - 1526),” in István Zombori, ed. Fight against the Turk in Central-Europe in the First Half of the 16th Century (Budapest: METEM, 2004), pp. 115–145.

² On this arrangement, see György Bónis “Ständisches Finanzwesen in Ungarn im frühen 16. Jahrhundert,” in: Novelles Études Historiques (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1965), pp. 83–103. Having studied the results of this short-term attempt at controlling the revenues by the estates, Bónis established that it did not work any better than the previous (and subsequent) royal system.

³ “Gentlemen of the realm” is our translation for regnicolae (verbatim: inhabitants of the kingdom), the term in legal texts referring to the wide social stratum of lesser nobility, enfranchised and expected to attend the diets.

⁴ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’) were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably officeholders assigned to the frontiers of the kingdom shall keep their troops ready, according to the number of their tenant peasants, and deploy their full complement on the borders of the country.

[5] Moreover, the lord prelates shall by reason of their tithes and tenant peasants⁵ always keep half of their troops similarly at the borders, and at time of clear necessity, on the letters of the captains of the royal majesty under whose command they are, also send the other half there; office-holders of the frontiers are also always obliged to keep ready with them the troops which they have to hold ex officio, [6] lest the troops, which hitherto are known to have had little value, appear to be kept and supplied fruitlessly and for nothing. [7] The other lords, without banderia, are, according to the general decree to be counted among the nobles, excepting those ten persons who can be exempted according to the same decree and whom the royal majesty shall name right away.⁶

2. That a survey similar to that undertaken in respect of the secular lords (as Art. 1) be held on the military obligations of the lords spiritual; in the meantime their obligations should follow the arrangements of King Sigismund.⁷

3. That the noble treasurers be charged with the recovery of royal revenues and properties, if necessary using the armed forces of the counties.

4. Moreover as far as the execution of judgments and letters of judgment is concerned, [1] if the case was moved, treated, and concluded before the royal majesty or the court of personal presence,⁸ and execution is possible [only] by arms and not by judicial procedure, then the plaintiff or the winning party has together with the assessors to request and humbly beseech the royal majesty to introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field banderia were called banderial lords.

⁵ Jobagio (Latinized form of Hungarian jobbágy) designed the legal status of the majority of peasants in medieval and early modern Hungary ever since the late thirteenth century. They were personally free, obliged to render rents in kind, money and labor to the landlords on whose land they lived, but were free to move (or moved) to other lords when all their debts was paid. See: János M. Bak, "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005).

⁶ See 1492:20 and 1498:20–22; that they should be now "named" implies that the identity of the ten courtiers had changed.

⁷ Cf. Propositiones 1432–33.

⁸ The court of royal personal presence emerged as early as the thirteenth century. In the first third of the fourteenth century it was augmented with the court of the special personal presence. The court of the personal presence functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and it was led by the chancellor. After 1464, when it was united with the court of the special personal presence, it became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary, the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff. See György Bónis, "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary," East Central Europe/l'Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191.

carry out the execution. [2] The royal majesty has to do so, by virtue of the office of government he bears.

5. That the noble treasurers have to perform executions⁹ if the king or the palatine refuses to do so.

6. That the same applies to the judge royal as well as to the ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia and to the voivode of Transylvania, and the plaintiff should along with his own troops take part in the execution if necessary.

7. Reiterates and urges the completion of the recovery of the royal revenues, according to 1514:1

8. The debt owed to Lady Anna, widow of ban Andrew Bot, is to be paid.¹⁰

9. The chambers of salt in Hungary as well as in Transylvania have similarly to be returned straightaway to the royal majesty, and henceforth salt should not be given to anyone save the officeholders of the frontier and even to them according to the modest and just appraisal of the counselors and assessors; everyone else is to be paid in cash.¹¹ And no one shall dare to put salt up for sale except the royal chamberers assigned to this. All foreign salt has to be removed from the kingdom and parts subject to it and eradicated by the next coming feast of St George the Martyr. Should thereafter salt be found with any of the lords or nobles for use or sale, such a lord or noble is to be convicted to the loss of all his goods by the royal majesty, to be retained by him or granted to anyone else.¹²

⁹ Executions here means, of course, all kinds of legal acts, not only sentence of death.

¹⁰ The crown was indebted to the widow of ban Andrew Bot for some 20.000 florins which the ban had originally loaned to Wladislas II and had in his last will of 1513 left to his wife. The king was tardy in repaying this sum, and so the widow held in exchange the castle of Diósgyőr in pledge. See Tamás Pálosfalvi, “Bajnai Both András és a szlavón bánóság. Szlavónia, Európa és a törökök, 1504–1513” [Andrew Bajnai Both and the banate of Slavonia, Slavonia, Europe and the Ottomans, 1504–13] in Ferenc Glatz, ed. Honoris causa: Tanulmányok Engel Pál tiszteletére (Budapest: MTA Történettudományi Intézet, 2009). pp. 251–300, esp. 288–290.

¹¹ Frontier troops were regularly paid in cubes of salt.

¹² This and the following article reiterates and stiffens the penalties in matters of the royal salt monopoly. Cf. the 1492 Slavonian Articles. See. András Kubinyi, “Die königlich-ungarischen Salzordnungen des Mittelalters,” in: Das Salz in der Rechts- und Handelsgeschichte. Kongreßakten des Internationalen Salzgeschichtekongresses, 26. September bis 1. Oktober 1990, Hall in Tirol, Jean-Claude Hocquet, Rudolf Palme, eds. (Hall: Schwaz, 1991) pp. 261-70, here p. 268. Now see also: István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages,” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

10. Peasants of the royal majesty as well as of any lords and nobles are similarly to be convicted to the loss of their movable and immovable goods [for hiding salt]. Their property¹³ should fall to the lord of the land, the chattels be taken by the chamberer and passed on to the royal fisc. Should the chamberer and the means he has be insufficient to perform this confiscation, then the ispán or alispán of the county¹⁴ shall be called upon, who must go and help the chamberer on pain of permanent loss of office; in this case, one third of these movable goods shall be given to the ispán or alispán, two thirds to the chamberer and hence to the royal fisc. And, should even these be still insufficient, then such an execution shall be done by the two treasurers with the knowledge and letters of the royal majesty, his counselors and assessors.

11. Then, regarding the chambers and mines of gold and silver, it has been decided [1] that the miners and the mining cities be retained in their ancient liberties, in such a way that the miners and the inhabitants of the mining cities shall not render any dues for things brought to the mines for their own necessities. [2] From those, however, who do not live in the mining towns but supply victuals and other necessities for mining from anywhere, tolls may be collected, but limited so that the toll taken from them does not appear excessive but just and honest. [3] In order to avoid any argument arising between the exempt and the toll owners, letters of exemption and toll shall be presented to the royal majesty within a short time to be set by the lord counselors and assessors; those found older and more apposite shall be observed; [4] those which they cannot produce, shall be forever regarded as invalid, and nobody shall apply them. [5] At the same time, the same lord counselors shall appraise and decide the just and honest amount of tolls.

12. Eight noblemen shall examine the dry tolls, fords and bridges, and establish the amount they should charge.

≈8 March. 1435 20–21.

13. *Repeats the prohibition on the export of precious metals, and charges the counselors and assessors to report on ways to improve mining at Kremnica and Baia Mare*¹⁵

14. The castle of Khust with the chambers of salt of Maramureş and Transylvania; the thirtieths, twentieths and fiftieths;¹⁶ arbitrage of gold exchange, and chambers and shafts of gold and silver;

¹³ The word hereditas is clearly not used here in the sense of hereditary property as the sentence suggests. Nonetheless, tenant peasants held their tenancy de facto for several generations even after the decree of 1514. See Bak, “Servitude,” pp. 394–400.

¹⁴ The vicecomes (alispán) was in most cases the actual administrator of the county, his superior, the comes/ispán frequently holding several offices in court or in counties. He was usually a retainer (familiaris) of the ispán, but ever more often also “elected” by the county’s nobles.

¹⁵ Cf. 1492:32 and 1498:31.

¹⁶ The thirtieth (tricesima) was a customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. The fiftieth (quinquagesima) was a royal tax collected mainly from Romanians. Originally levied in kind on transhumance shepherds (based upon the number of sheep) in as well as the free royal cities and the Saxons, are to be handed to the presently-appointed lord royal treasurer; [1] the castles of Mukačeve, Tata and Komárom, with the house at Visegrád, Óbuda and the islands called Ros and Csepel, as well as the towns of Zsámbék, Solymár and Budakeszi with all their appurtenances, and with the Cumans and Jász shall be assigned to the lord steward of Buda¹⁷ for the upkeep and supply of the kitchen of the royal majesty. [2] In respect of this, the steward of the royal majesty has to provide bacon and wine from the income of the castle of Mukačeve; sturgeon and other fish from Komárom and Tata; and moreover he is obliged to collect the tithes of Buda and those of Srem for the royal table and court.¹⁸ [3] Should there be any shortfall, the royal treasurer will cover it according to the decision of the counselors and assessors.

15. In order that the court of the royal majesty be properly replete and adorned with ample services, all rights of patronage regarding all churches and ecclesiastical benefices, given to anyone by the royal majesty or the late lord King Wladislas of blessed memory, most cherished father of His Majesty, shall be considered revoked; [1] and all church benefices shall be removed by his royal majesty from those who hold more than one, and distributed, in the sense of the general decree, so that more people may serve God suitably and more troops be sustained for the defense of the realm.¹⁹

16. {17}²⁰ *That friaries, abbeys and other churches united after the death of King Matthias shall be separated, and before being granted to anyone, the debts of the king have to be paid off.*²¹

Wallachia but later raised from those settled in villages as well. Gradually it was transformed to a tax levied in cash. The twentieth was also a tax on export and import, collected at the Transylvanian borders.

¹⁷ The office of the steward of Buda (provisor castris Budensis) had been established by King Matthias, with the duty of administering the private estates of the king and providing for the needs of the royal court. See András Kubinyi. "A budai vár udvarbírói hivatala (1458–1541). Kísérlet az országos és a királyi magánjövedelmek szétválasztására" [The office of the steward of Buda 1458–1541. An attempt at separating the 'official' and 'private' royal incomes] Levéltári Közlemények 35 (1964) 67–69.

¹⁸ The separation of revenues specified for the royal court was an innovation. In neighboring Poland this was done in 1504—see Zdzisław Kaczmarczyk, Bogusław Leśnodorski, Historia państwa i prawa Polski od połowy XV w. do r. 1795 [History of the Polish state and law from the mid-fifteenth century to 1795] (Warsaw: Państw. wyd. Naukowe, 1957) 1: 145 (quoted in Bónis, "Ständisches", p. 84, n. 12)— and may have been the model for Hungary.

¹⁹ Cf. 1498:56.

²⁰ Article 16 is missing from the CJH and article 21 is doubled, thus there is a discrepancy between the numbering of the original text and the CJH. We indicate the numbering of the CJH in braces.

²¹ This article is also aimed against the pluralism of church benefices which had already become widespread during the reign of King Matthias, and often manifested itself in the unification of churches and abbeys. There were also other movements against this practice, the most successful of which was the reform undertaken by Matthew of Tolna at the beginning of the sixteenth century in respect of the kingdom's Benedictine abbeys. Elemér Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon [Clerical society in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Műszaki, 1971), pp. 205-18.

17. {18} *That should any royal counselor hold more than more than one ispán's office, the excess shall be taken away and granted to deserving persons.*²²

18. {19} Because the royal revenues, even after they have been put in order, do not seem sufficient for the payment and discharge of the many enormous debts that the royal majesty is understood to owe, for the redemption of the revenues and properties of His Majesty, and for the rebuilding of the border castles, [1] it is therefore decided that all priors and archdeacons who, as is known, bear no burden for the defense of the realm by virtue of their benefices which are separate from the chapter or convent where they reside, along with the parish priests of all cities, towns and villages, and the rectors of altars,²³ chantries and chapels, in Hungary as well as in Slavonia and Transylvania, most of whom have sixty, forty or so barrels of wine a year, but render not a penny for the defense of the country, shall be everywhere taxed by the royal majesty according to their income at a tenth of their income, so that from every ten florins one florin shall be given by them to the royal majesty. [2] In respect of the assessment of this, the royal majesty shall assign and send out that sworn nobleman who was elected in every county for the exaction of the funds for the upkeep of troops. [3] First, however, this nobleman has to swear an oath in front of the man of the treasurer and the noble community regarding this taxation and its just and faithful collection and, afterwards, the contribution of the tenth shall be exacted without delay according to the judgment and scrupulous reckoning of the same and of the local judge and sworn men. [4] If, moved by some kind of refractoriness, they should refuse to render this contribution, then the lord prelate, that is the archbishop or bishop of that same place, shall be held to make them pay when requested by the letters of the sworn nobleman; otherwise as much of the wine- and grain-tithe of his in that county, where this rebel lives, shall be retained for the royal majesty as the tax of the rebellious prior, archdeacon or priest amounts to. And this tax is to be spent on the restoration of border castles and the redemption of the royal properties and revenues, according to the decision of the lord counselors and assessors. One of these assessors shall be deputed and sent to Slavonia and Transylvania, to accompany the man of the treasurer for the performance and collection of this tax. And this sworn nobleman together with the royal treasurer shall bring the moneys collected in this same taxation to the royal majesty and give true account of it to the counselors and the assessors of the gentlemen of the realm.

19. {20} Then, in respect of the royal treasurer, that from among the assessors of the gentlemen of the realm one has to be chosen, without whose knowledge the treasurer may administer or manage neither the income nor the payment of royal revenues. This elected assessor has to keep count and account of everything, lest there be fraud or waste in the royal income. And the treasurer has to swear an oath before the royal majesty, the counselors, and assessors that he will not proceed otherwise; if he is found to have acted contrariwise, then, if an ecclesiastical person, he shall be convicted and outright regarded as convicted to the forfeiture of his benefices and even private properties; if a laymen, then similarly to the loss of all his goods; and the royal majesty shall have the right to donate these to whomever he wishes.

²² The practice of magnates and royal officers holding several counties as honores had been generally pursued since Angevin times; see Pál Engel, "Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom." Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

²³ Rectors of altars were usually priests (often canons) who were in charge of the service and the income of one of the altars in major churches.

20. {21} Then, that the income and expenditure of all the revenues of His Majesty shall from now on be apprehended faithfully and under oath by the lord counselors and assessors from the treasurer, so that they may henceforth know how much has to be added to cover expenditure on necessities; and the royal treasurer and the lord steward of Buda²⁴ shall every year render accounts on all royal income to the lord counselors and assessors on the feast of the Epiphany of the Lord and the appropriate days immediately following it.

21. That the bans²⁵ of border fortresses shall always stay in their castles, [1] and one of them shall never leave the castle under penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity²⁶, [2] and stewards shall be appointed in all the border castles, who shall take care of war machines, victuals, and other needs (as was done in the times of the late Lord King Matthias).²⁷

22. {23} The decree recompensing damages done during the peasant war has to be implemented²⁸ and, if necessary, poor nobles should be recompensed by the king.

23. {24} That the castles of Mosonmagyaróvár, Devín, Plavecký Hrad and other castles of the widow of Count Peter²⁹ have to be returned to her.

24. That the ispán of Temes shall return the goods of nobles harmed in the rebellion in the county.

²⁴ The office of the steward of Buda (provisor castris Budensis) had been established by King Matthias, with the duty of administering the private estates of the king and providing for the needs of the royal court. See András Kubinyi. "A budai vár udvarbírói hivatala (1458–1541). Kísérlet az országos és a királyi magánjövedelmek szétválasztására" [The office of the steward of Buda 1458–1541. An attempt at separating the 'official' and 'private' royal incomes] Levéltári Közlemények 35 (1964) 67–69.

²⁵ The term 'ban' here designates not the major officeholders (Cf. 1492:8), although some castles were under the command of the bans (of Slavonia, Croatia, etc.); by this time the two commanders usually assigned to every border fortification were also often called bans. Cf. 1495:36.

²⁶ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against noble persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis):

²⁷ In contrast to the last decade of the fifteenth century, when the reign of Matthias Corvinus was regularly denounced as oppressive, his times now began to be regarded in a positive light.

²⁸ Cf. 1514:4–12.

²⁹ Szengyörgyi and Bazini, Peter, voivode of Transylvania 1498–1510, judge royal 1502–17.

25. *That the abbey of Tapolca be returned to Peter,*³⁰ since the bishop of Eger cannot hold more than one benefice.

26. That the nobles of the church of Szekszárd be returned to their traditional liberty.

27. *That burghers have to render the ninth from vineyards in the land of others.*³¹

28. Because many of the lords and nobles, scorning and disregarding the royal command, neglected to appear at this diet, their goods and hereditary rights ought to escheat to the royal fisc, but as they were called under the penalty contained in the decree³² they shall incur the penalty defined there. [1] Lest they boast mockingly that they have got away with it, the royal majesty shall deign to collect for himself the penalty, namely from the lords eight hundred florins; from the nobles four hundred florins. However, if he does not wish to collect it for himself, he shall give and grant it to those poor and indigent nobles, who appeared on the command of His Majesty, to be distributed by the alispáns and noble magistrates, according to the counsel and reckoning of the noble community of every county. [2] Should any ispán or alispán allow a noble to stay at home in return for a gift, he shall lose his office and also be convicted for every nobleman of four hundred florins, which the royal majesty shall exact immediately. [3] And if anyone should act contrary to the above, on account of which it seems that the said punishment of the nobles is not performed, the aforementioned treasurers of the gentlemen of the realm shall proceed to execution of the same punishment, according to the information given them in this matter by the assessors.

29. Many lords and nobles who have been judged to swear an oath often obtain a new trial from the royal majesty under various pretexts and thus only burden the other party with expenses, but then are unable to avoid swearing the oath in court. [1] Lest fraud and deceit seem to assist someone, it has been decided (as it is known to have been observed by the justices ordinary of the realm, following ancient custom) that if anyone who obtains a new trial cannot give a just and reasonable cause for his request and for avoiding giving the oath in court that he should, then he shall be outright convicted of the failure of his oath and the punishment following therefrom.

30. Those guilty of having lost border fortresses shall be punished and proscribed again.

31. On the borders between the city of Szeged and the Cumans and Jász.

≈ 1514:54

32. Concerning territorial adjustments in County Temes and Csongrád.

33. Prohibition on the export of herds of cattle and horses.

≈1495:27 and 1500:25, 1504:28.

³⁰ The person of Peter is not known and in 1518, the abbey of Tapolca was administeed by Bonaventura de Silviis Silvius OP, canon of Ferrara. The bishop of Eger was Ippolito d'Este, by that time out of the country.

³¹ Cf. 1492:49.

³² 1498:1.

adding: In order to gain more income for the kingdom from those of foreign nations, for every ox and horse ten pennies have to be collected for the royal fisc and chamber from the buyer who wishes to take them out of the country, and one penny shall be paid for every lamb or ram, in addition to the customary thirtieth.

34. General obligation of sending troops to the frontier.

35. Because the number of robbers and other criminals has so much increased that nobles and non-nobles are not safe within or without their homes, [1] therefore, should any of the counties wish to root them out but the ispáns neglect to do so, then one of the assessors shall be sent there by the royal majesty, upon the request of the nobles, by whom the eradication of robbers and other criminals should be done and effected according to the general decree.

36. Because the nobles of a single plot are held to join the general levy in person when necessity of the realm so demands, [1] they are henceforth not to be taxed for the upkeep of troops.³³

37. That the king shall administer justice to the margrave³⁴ against the nobles of Turopolje.

38. That the former royal treasurer, now chancellor, the bishop of Vác,³⁵ shall render accounts on taxes collected.

39. To implement all this, the two archbishops, two bishops, the palatine and his deputy, the judge royal and his deputy, and sixteen specified noblemen as well as the master protonotaries shall attend the royal council.³⁶

40. Their first task is to supply the frontier castles and half of them shall always attend the council.

41. Then that short court sessions, short lawsuits,³⁷ and cases of referral shall be opened on the twentieth day of the coming Epiphany of the Lord. [1] And then these cases, particularly the ³³ While according to 1492:20 every ten poor nobles had to send one soldier, and according to 1498:2 every ten one soldier and every 36 one equestrian, here their personal participation is again implied.

³⁴ Margrave George of Brandenburg and Ansbach (1484–1543), nephew of King Wladislas, was an influential counsellor at the Hungarian court from 1506 onward.

³⁵ Ladislas Szalkai (1475–1526) was bishop of Vác 1514–20, of Eger 1520–24, finally archbishop of Esztergom 1524–26.

³⁶ The composition of the royal council constantly changed in these years according to the actual standing of the struggle between the different factions. This article raised the number of noble assessors to sixteen in contrast to the previous twelve, which meant greater influence for the common nobility. It had special importance as the king was a minor and thus the council held power on his behalf. Cf. 1498. 2 and 7. In general, see See András Kubinyi, “Beisitzer im königlichen Rat aus dem mittleren Adel in der Jagellonenzeit”, in: Idem, Stände und Ständestaat im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn, transl. T. Schäfer (Herne: Schäfer, 2011) pp. 233-52

³⁷ Breves brevium were lawsuits opened with short term summons and held between octave courts, largely treating upon cases of acts of might.

referrals and the short suits shall be treated continuously without a break. [2] They should always be executed (as declared before) without favor or fear. [3] Cases moved or to be moved according to the decree of Tolna shall from now on be actually adjudicated [4] and justice be administered to everyone; [5] and in future all lawsuits shall be treated and adjudicated according to the written law of the realm, sent already to every county of the kingdom.³⁸

42. Then, all nobles who did not attend the present diet shall swear an oath at the first county court [meeting] held after the return of the nobles from here to their homes on the strict observance of all the aforesaid in consideration of the welfare of the royal majesty and his kingdom. Should anyone perchance moved by refractoriness refuse to swear the oath, then all his chattels may be looted by all the other nobles who swore the oath and beyond that, if he can be caught, he shall be subject to and punished by loss of the head.

43. And that all nobles, as soon as they return home from here, shall and are obliged under pain of the immediately aforesaid penalty to immediately leave, abandon and quit the service of those lords of whatever dignity or status about whom they understand from the assessors and treasurers of the gentlemen of the realm openly oppose the above-mentioned constitutions and refuse to return and resign the goods and revenues of the royal majesty.³⁹

44. That the decreed articles shall be valid until the next diet at St George's in three years' time.

45. In the meantime, for two years, two florins have to be faithfully and fully levied and collected in full number throughout this realm for the upkeep of the troops of the gentlemen of the realm. And for the royal majesty in the same two years, one hundred and twenty pennies are to be paid in the same way during these years, including His Majesty's chamber's profit;⁴⁰ out of which twenty shall go to the redemption of the cities and of the thirtieth of His Majesty, presently in the hands of the lord voivode of Transylvania, under title of pledge⁴¹; twenty to the payment of the debts and expenses of the assessors; and the remaining eighty pennies to the upkeep of the court and family of the royal majesty. In respect of this levy and tax, because it is to be given and spent on the common and signal business of this whole realm, no one is exempt except for the staff and

³⁸ The reference to written law is rather puzzling, for the well-known lawbook, the Tripartitum, was not formally approved by the king and thus not distributed to the counties, but reached wide circles by its having been printed in Vienna in 1517; see Stephen Werbőczy, The Customary Law of the Renowned Kingdom of Hungary &c. Peter Banyó, Martyn Rady eds. (Budapest-Idyllwild: Dept. of Med. St. CEU-Schlacks 2006= DRMH 5), pp. xxxix–xli.

³⁹ This article suggests the widespread presence of familiaritas—noble retainership—and that the lesser nobility expected results from a collective diffidatio of sorts.

⁴⁰ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; by the late thirteenth century, it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages.

⁴¹ John Zápolya (aka Szapolyai) (1490/1-1540), magnate, voivode of Transylvania from 1510, king of Hungary as John I 1526-40.

servitors⁴² of lords and nobles, and also those who are plainly very poor, lest the number of troops for the defense of the country be diminished and decline, and further delay be caused and suffered in the redemption of the goods and revenues of the royal majesty which are—as mentioned—in the hands of the lord voivode.

⁴² In the sixteenth century, noble retainers (familiares) were ever more frequently called servitores, which may have implied a certain loss in their status; see Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndsmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000). p. 110.

1518 Appendix

Altera redactio constitutionum dietae Bachiensis de anno 1518

I. [vide articulum VII. ut supra]

II. [vide articulum VIII. ut supra]

III. [vide articulum IX. ut supra]

IV. [vide articulum X. ut supra]

V. [vide articulum XI. ut supra]

VI. Item quod tributa sicca et arida ac in aquis ab infra et supra euntibus exigi consueta cessent et aboleantur. Ab exteris tamen nacionibus in aquis tributum iustum et honestum exigi possit.

VII. Item quod camerarius Cremniciensis ac eciam in Rivulo Dominarum constituti fodinas auri vel argenti per se et pro se colere nullatenus possint, preter illas, quas soli ipsi de novo propriis eorum impensis colere inceperunt, ita ut societatem in fodinis aliorum impensis inceptis et incipiendis habere non possint.

VIII. Item, quod iidem camerarii contra iura et libertates civitatum montanarum macella conservare, vina vel cereviasias educillare non possint. Valeant tamen, si volunt, propriis eorum famulis domesticis de proprio cellario vina cereviasiasque dare et alia victualia ministrare.

IX. Item, quod aurum et argentum secundum puritatem et precium iuxta morem et consuetudinem tempore regis Mathie observatam ad cameram regiam cambiatur et acceptetur, et tam ex parte camerariorum, quam eciam montanistarum intelligatur. Quibus premissis observatis cultores montanarum, qui aufugerant, revertentur multiplicabunturque, et decies plus de auro et argento regia maiestas atque regnum istud habebit.

X. [vide articulum XIII. ut supra.]

XI. [vide articulum XIV. ut supra.]

XII. [vide articulum XV. ut supra.]

XIII. [vide articulum XVI. ut supra.]

XIV. [vide articulum XVII. ut supra.]

XV. [vide articulum XVIII. ut supra.]

XVI. [vide articulum XIX. ut supra.]

XVII. [vide articulum XX. ut supra.]

XVIII. [vide articulum XXI. ut supra.]

XIX. [vide articulum XXII. ut supra.]

XX. [vide articulum XXIII. ut supra.]

XXI. [vide articulum XXIV. ut supra.]

XXII. Item quod execucio in causis et iudiciariis deliberacionibus eciam in Sclavonia et Transsilvania sub eisdem condicionibus et penis, quibus in Hungaria semper fieri debeat, que iam regie maiestati ac dominis et universe nobilitati declarata sunt.

XXIII. [vide articulum XXV. ut supra.]

XXIV. [vide articulum XXVI. ut supra.]

XXV. [vide articulum XXVII. ut supra.]

XXVI. [vide articulum XXVIII. ut supra.]

XXVII. [vide articulum XXIX. ut supra.]

XXVIII. [vide articulum XLI. ut supra.]

XXIX. [vide articulum XXIX. ut supra.]

XXX. [vide articulum XXX. ut supra.]

XXXI. [vide articulum XXXI. ut supra.]

XXXII. [vide articulum XXXII. ut supra.]

XXXIII. [vide articulum XXXIII. ut supra.]

XXXIV. [vide articulum XXXIV. ut supra.]

XXXV. [vide articulum XXXV. ut supra.]

XXXVI. Item de subsidio maiestatis regie et solucione domini wayvode ac debitorum expensisque assessorum verbotenus declaracio dabitur.

XXXVII. Item quod domini consilarii et assessores de victualium ad Jaycza impositione oratorumque ad summum pontificem, cesaream maiestatem ac dominum Polonie regem missione, oratorum eorundem facienda relacione et expedicione ista particulari exnunc fienda tractare concludereque debeant et teneantur.

XXXVIII. [vide articulum XXXVI. ut supra.]

XXXIX. [vide articulum XXXVII. ut supra.]

XL. [vide articulum XXXVIII. ut supra.] XLI.

[vide articulum XLII. ut supra.]

XLII. [vide articulum XLIV. ut supra.]

XLIII. Postremo, quod omnes confederaciones et obligamina cunctorum dominorum inter sese stabilita atque facta dissolvantur, ut unusquisque liberius et sincerius rebus maiestatis regie et tocius regni sui superintendere providereque possit.

Dietal decisions 1521

November 19 (St. Elisabeth's Day): diet opens in Buda. Decision with 40 articles passed. After the loss of Sabač, Zemun and, on 28 August, of Belgrade, without the royal troops unable to move for their recovery, higher war taxes are raised from a wide stratum of the society and goods, and formerly exempt poor nobles are to be taxed and a mercenary army planned. The captains of Belgrade are to be prosecuted.

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survived in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (Marino Sanuto from Venice, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225–8.

MSS: Codex No. 3828 in the archives of the city of Bardejov; a contemporary copy in the archives of the city of Košice [K]. Codex Nádasdy (Budapest University Library Cod. G 39.) foll. 352r–358r [N]; Budapest University Library Cod. G40 [G40]; Esterházy Archives Codex Rep. 71 no. 13 pp. 262–85 [E]; the minor Esterházy codex, foll. 125r–30r [Em]; Codex Ilosvay (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4023) foll. 232r–234v [I]; Codex Festetich (OSZK Fol. Lat. 4355) pp. 573–87 [F].

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790) ,pp. 513–47; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, [=MTvT/CJH]; Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 788–807 (dated 1522, Buda); Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története, pp. 246–53 [part.]

LIT: Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története pp. 47–57.

This dietal decision, as several others of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted all of them. For the omitted articles, we added, for information's sake, the rubrics of the Corpus Iuris, even though they are later additions.

Articuli diete generalis Budensis anni 1521. pro festo beate Elizabeth

Articuli inⁱⁱⁱ dieta et convencione generali universorum dominorum prelatorum ac baronum et regni nobilium pro festo beate Elizabeth vidue anno gracia millesimo quingentesimo vigesimo primo,^{iv} Bude, de mandato regio celebrata unanimiter editi et confecti ac per regiam maiestatem roborati.

I. Quoniam ad magni hostis magnas vires propulsandas magna pecuniarum, que nervi belli appellantur, summa conquirenda pariter et congerenda est, licet igitur rusticis et ruralibus aliisque plebee condicionis hominibus post plurimas eorum calamitates et miserias iam tandem parcendum foret, extrema tamen necessitas et imminens regni periculum cogit eos pro hac vice eciam preter solitum subsidium prestare et modo subscripto contribuere. Quapropter universi et singuli rurales et ignobiles plebeeque condicionis homines eciam in civitatibus et oppidis liberis regiis ac reginalibus ubilibet in hoc regno Hungarie partibusque sibi subiectis residentes et commorantes, insuper eciam inquilini tam in domibus propriis eorum, quam eciam apud alios habitantes, uxorati tamen et usus proprios seorsum habentes, si eciam in domibus et curiis nobilium residerent, demptis dumtaxat illis inquilinis et mercenariis, qui proprio victu et amictu dominorum suorum terrestrium utuntur, fumatim singillatimque solvant florenum unum. Insuper de quolibet vase vini integro, quod aut ex propriis vineis crevit, aut eciam precio et pecuniis quis eorum emit, quinquaginta denarios de mediocribus vero vasis vinorum, prout in partibus superioribus Cassoviam versus habentur, singulos viginti quinque denarios; de vasis autem nimis magnis, prout sunt fwadar ^vPosonium versus florenum unum; de vasis paulo minoribus, sicuti drayling, denarios septuaginta quinque solvant. Hoc declarato, quod illis in locis, quibus vina fuerunt procreata, si eciam per colonos iam vendita extitissent, contribucio prenotata iuxta iudicis et iuratorum civium ipsorum locorum fidelem conscienciosamque recognicionem et attestacionem effective reddatur atque persolvatur. Item braxatores cerevisie de magistratu eorum singillatim solvant florenum unum. Item de singulis vasis integris cerevisiarum denarios decem, de mediocribus vero vasis seu vasculis denarios quinque. Item de singulis bobus, vaccis ac aliis iumentis et equis, tam aratra currusque vehentibus, quam eciam in campis existentibus et pascentibus singillatim denarios quinque. Item de ovibus, capris, apibus et porcis singillatim denarios duos, de vitulis vero ac poledris, agnellisque et porcellis unius anni nihil contribuatur. Ceterum universi artifices

ⁱⁱⁱ Em, F, N Articuli diete generalis Budensis anni (Em anno) 1521 profesto beate Elisabeth

^{iv} E, G40 add. tempore Ludovici regis

^v K fudar, G40, N fwadari

mechanici, puta sartores, gemmifissores, aurifabri, carpentarii, lapicide, fabri, pictores, mensatores, plumbifiguli, rasores, textores, caupones, funifices, cuprifabri, barberii, macellarii, pellifices, corrigiatores, sutores, sellipari, lanifices, seripari, calcarii, curripari et cerdoneceterique mechanici artifices in civitatibus et oppidis dumtaxat residentes de singulis tabulis et officinis eorum ultra prenotatum unius floreni subsidium fumatim,^{vi} ut prefertur, exigendum solvere teneantur florenum unum. Item universi mercatores, institores, apothecarii, pannicide, boltharii et alii feneratores in liberis ac aliis civitatibus muratis residentes vigesimam partem rerum eorum mercimonialium fideliter consciencioseque contribuere teneantur. Item universi molendinatores omnium molendinorum, quocunque nomine censeantur, eciam hamor et hwtha dictorum, de singulis lapidibus molaribus seu rotis solvant singillatim florenum unum. Item universi piscatores de integro reti magno gyalom appellato solvant singillatim florenum unum. Preterea mercatores et pannicide extra liberas et muratas civitates habitantes de singulis eorum equis currikeris solvant singulos denarios quinquaginta. Item ecclesiarum parochialium plebani ac altariste et alie persone ecclesiastice, que gentes non conservant et pecudibus pecoribusque carent, decimam partem rerum eorum aurearum et argentearum ac pecuniarum paratarum contribuant. Item, quod Judei ubicunque et in quorumcunque bonis residentes et constituti per singula capita seu de singulis capitibus, hoc est viri et mulieres ac iuvenes, pueri et puelle solvant florenum unum, iuxta tamen rerum suarum exigenciam, ut pauperes a dicioribus in huiusmodi contribucione adiuventur. Et quod premissae omnes contribuciones pro hac vice solummodo intelligantur.

II. Quantum vero ad proventus regie maiestatis attinet, ubi sua maiestas offert omnes illos ad regni defensionem, demptis eis, que pro persona sua, pro coquina, pro curia et pro solvendis curialibus suis ac pro aliis necessitatibus suis expediendis necessarii sunt, dummodo illi liberentur ab inscriptionibus, non videtur maiestas sua regia in hac parte impedienda. Habeat in dei nomine omnes proventus suos regios pro se integros et illesos, modo conservet ex eis bandera sua regalia more predecessorum suorum Hungarie regum, ac officiales et castra finitima, que adhuc restant, provideatque sua maiestas et disponat reliquas necessitates ad futuram expeditionem generalem attinentes^{vii} una cum subsidio sue maiestati modo inferius declarato ad eandem expeditionem pariter oblato.

III. Item super rectificacione et eliberacione proventuum regie maiestatis faciat exnunc sua

^{vi} K summatim

^{vii} E, G40 add. ad suam maiestatem

maiestas rationem ponere et revideri facere, qui et quomodo proventus sue maiestatis possident, et qui iuste illos habere comperti fuerint, eis sua maiestas dignetur solutionem facere; qui autem sinistre et indebite illos possidere et presertim contra statuta regni se in eos ante festum beati Georgii martyris proxime transactum intromisisse dinoscuntur, illis nihil solvatur, sed simpliciter et de facto ab eis auferantur. Qui vero post dietam et conventionem dicti festi beati Georgii martyris eos in arendam accepissent, ex quo in ipsa dieta determinatum fuit huiusmodi proventus sue maiestatis in arendam posse locari, talibus quoque pecunie eorum restituantur; ita tamen, si constiterit evidenter summam huiusmodi arende ad facta propria sue maiestatis extitisse levatam, et non pro antiquis debitis arendacionem ipsam sibi fuisse factam.

IV. Item ad tricesimarum regie maiestatis introitum pro subsidio nunc sue maiestati oblato adiectum est, quod de singulis bobus ac vaccis et aliis iumentis ac equabus seu equis fetosis solvantur singuli denarii quinquaginta, durante tamen hac solummodo expeditione contra Thurcum instauranda,^{viii} post exitum vero ipsius belli solvantur, prout prius solitum erat, denarii viginti. Loca tamen commutationis per regiam maiestatem deputentur ad empcionem et vendicionem eorum animalium, que de regno educuntur, Nedewcze, Sopronium, Owar, Posonium, Tyrnavia, Vetuszolium et Cassovia. Ultra autem hec loca in visceribus regni tricesime de animalibus non exigantur; et quod equi masculi stante hac expeditione gregatim vel aliter vendicionis causa sub pena amissionis et ablacionis eorundem de hoc regno non educantur.

V. Item, quod maiestas regia cameras salium suorum Transsilvanensium reformari faciat in melius, ex quibus adhibita provisione et diligencia bona centum circiter millia florenorum annuatim habere poterit. Provideat tamen maiestas sua, ne sales externi in hoc regnum inducantur.

VI. Item maiestas regia monetas novissime cudi ceptas cudi faciat, ex qua proventibus suis regiis magnam summam pecuniarum adiicere valebit; ita tamen, ut sua maiestas, quemadmodum pollicita est, elaboret et efficiat, quamprimum poterit, quod huiusmodi pecunie et nove monete in Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Bohemia, Polonie, Moravia et Slesia (!) libere currant et accipiantur. Quod si effici non posset, maiestas sua faciat cudere tales, que ubique recipiantur, et nihilominus maiestas sua bonas quoque monetas, prout temporibus serenissimorum principum dominorum Mathie et Wladislai felicis memorie regum Hungarie erat, cudi facere non omittat, ne regnum istud bonis pecuniis totaliter defecisse videatur. Et quod extranee eciam pecunie, videlicet cruciferi ac grossi Bohemicales et Germanici seu Alemanicales, preterea babka, haller et bech ubilibet in hoc regno currant et accipiantur; et si maiestas sua regia voluerit, huiusmodi quoque pecunias extraneas cudi faciat, sub iusto tamen et solito apud illos argenti pondere. Ne autem proventus ex cusione huiusmodi novarum monetarum provenientes, qui si bene recolligantur, notabilem magnamque pecuniarum summam faciunt, dissipentur et non in regios, sed aliorum usus, prout hactenus, convertantur, et ne bone monete similiter cudende suo iusto pondere argenti fraudentur, faciat sua maiestas regia fidelem domini magistri tavernicorum hominem Bude cursoribus ipsarum monetarum semper assistere, Cremnicieque pisetarium archiepiscopi ecclesie Strigoniensis de veteri consuetudine et more alias solito pariter admittere, qui cusioni illarum superintendere et proventibus quoque sue maiestatis exinde fiendis fideliter invigilare teneantur, ne fraus et dissipatio in eis committatur.

^{viii} B, Em instaurata

VII. De contribucione unius floreni fumatim sine fraude et dissipatione.

VIII. De exaccione et recollectione contribucionum unius floreni.

IX. Ceterum, quia creverunt pericula, creverunt et necessitates; ex dicatura itaque et taxatione ruralium plebee (!) condicionis hominum prenarrata licet satis difficili magna moles ista belli, que nobis imminet, expediri commodeque absolvi non poterit. Cum itaque periculum, quod deus ipse misericors procul avertat, commune sit, communi eciam provisione ac subsidio propelli et averti debet. Unde visum et unanimiter conclusum est, quod universi domini prelati ac alii viri ecclesiastici seculares et religiosi pariter, baronesque et nobiles ac ceteri possessionati homines, non obstante libertatis eorum prerogativa, directam medietatem seu equalem mediam partem universorum proventuum suorum annualium^{ix} pecunialium, sive a cibionibus, sive ex piscinis morothwa dictis, sive fodinis auri, argenti, cupri, ferri, calibis aliorum metallorum, sive ex silvis glandiferis, vel undecunque aliter proveniant, ad ipsam expeditionem prenotatam pro hac una vice contribuant. Preterea de vinis quoque, tam in propriis vineis eorum procreatis, quam eciam nonalibus vel aliter precio comparatis, que adhuc festant et reperiri poterunt, de pecoribusque et pecudibus ipsorum contribucionem de rusticis superius preallegatam et expresse declaratam pari modo persolvant. Quia vero sunt plerique nobilium, qui jobagiones in certo numero possident, tamen nec promontoria, nec piscinas magnas, nec silvas glandiferas habent, et jobagiones quoque modicum nimis aut nihil ipsis nobilibus contribuant, sed eisdem arant dumtaxat et metunt, fenaque falcant, et in horrea eorum cumulant, ex quibus ipsi nobiles non modicam pecuniam annuatim hauriunt, ne igitur tales absque omni penitus solucione exempti, sed aliquid subsidii ipsi quoque prestasse videantur, similiter medietatem pecuniarum, quas ex huiusmodi colonorum suorum serviciis et agricultura per annum habere consueverunt, iuxta ipsorum propriam conscienciam animosam ut quilibet equaliter onus suum supportare disnoscat (!), contribuant.

^{ix} E, G40, K, N animalium Em annalium

X. De nobilibus unius sessionis super vinis ac pecoribus et pecudibus eorum idem est iudicium, et insuper, si qui illorum nullos proventus annuales^x paratis in pecuniis habent, tales de personis eorum solvant singillatim florenum unum. Et quod prediales ecclesiarum, qui nobilium vices gerunt, seu pro nobilibus reputantur, instar nobilium unius sessionis contribuciones prenotatas facere teneantur.

XI. Item domini prelati racione decimarum suarum nihil teneantur contribuere, quia illarum pretextu banderia sua conservabunt. Verumtamen sunt plures persone ecclesiastice, que decimas quidem habent, gentes tamen illarum racione non conservant, et tales medietatem huiusmodi decimarum contribuere teneantur.

XII. Item officiales regie maiestatis racione officiorum suorum gentes et banderia eorum conservare debebunt.

XIII. Item quod ad dicaturam connumeracionemque et recolleccionem premissarum omnium contribucionum ac subsidii unius floreni eligantur in singulis comitatibus duo probi et fideles nobiles, qui huiusmodi subsidium ac reliquas contribuciones prenotatas, tam in bonis regie et reginalis maiestatum, quam eciam omnium dominorum ecclesiasticorum et secularium atque aliorum nobilium et cunctorum possessionatorum hominum eciam religiosorum iuxta modum et seriem ac limitacionem superius exinde factam fideliter et conscienciose connumerent, peragant et exequantur; ita tamen, quod nec comites, nec vicecomites, neque iudices nobilium pro salario eorum quicquam exinde recipiant, sed in expensis ipsorum dicatorum electorum cum eis pariter procedant; et ipsi quoque dicatores pro eorum salario non plures, quam in comitatibus maioribus ambo quinquaginta florenos, in mediocribus triginta duos, et in minoribus seu parvis vigintiquinque florenos accipiant. Et hoc ideo, quia pro communi bono et republica agitur, et quilibet pro salute quieteque propria labores subire tenetur. Expensas eciam quanto pauciores de illis contribucionibus facere possunt, tanto minores faciant, ne defectus magnus in eisdem contribucionis committatur. Et quod huiusmodi contribucionem dicatores ipsi non per aliquos eorum famulos, sed in persona ipsorum totaliter peragant. Et quod iudices civitatum, oppidorum villarumque et possessionum solummodo in solucione subsidii unius floreni relaxentur, et in parvis villis illius quoque subsidii medietatem persolvant; reliquas autem omnes contribuciones instar aliorum colonorum reddant.^{xi} Item thesaurarii, comites, vicecomites ac iudices nobilium de vinis et pecoribus ac pecudibus proventusque eorum pecunialibus censum prenotatum iuxta limitacionem et ordinacionem prenarratam restituere teneantur. Qui quidem dicatores, antequam ad huiusmodi connumeracionem et dicaturam exmittentur et egredientur, coram universitate nobilium firmissimum prestent iuramentum, quod in eodem negocio fideliter procedent et nemini timore vel amore favebunt aut parcent, neminemque odio et invidia preter debitum vexabunt, et quod expensas superfluas in processu eorum non facient, subsidiumque et contribuciones ipsas nemini relaxabunt, nec quavis via aut occasione et colore illud et illas pro se vel aliis preter salarium deputatum retinebunt aut aliter dissipabunt, sed fideliter et probe dicabunt et connumerabunt, et verum ac iustum registrum et computum superinde servabunt. Habita deinde huiusmodi dicacione et connumeracione quilibet dominorum et nobilium per se vel suum hominem totam summam tam ratione proventus persone sue proprie, ac occasione vinorum pecorumque et pecudum suorum in eo comitatu, ubi connumeracio ipsa fuit, existencium, quam eciam jobagionum suorum in eodem comitatu residencium iuxta seriem registri dicatorum ad brevem unum terminum per universitatem nobilium ad id prefigendum in presenciam comitum ac vicecomitum et iudicum universitatisque nobilium absque defectu adducere et presentare, quam tandem comitatus ipse cum comitibus ac vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium thesaurariis regni modo subscripto eligendis et constituendis fideliter rescribere et eisdem per dicatores ipsos, auxilio tamen eiusdem comitatus transmittere, et illi quoque thesaurarii super rehabicione ac ad manus eorum assignacione literas recognicionales et expeditorias dare debeant et teneantur, ne fraus ac dolus ex aliqua parte subsequi possit. Verumtamen domini ac nobiles cuiuscunque gradus, dignitatis et condicionis existant, qui in diversis comitatibus bona et iura possessionaria habent, solucione edietatis proventuu suoru pecunaliu iuxta aniosam consciencia in eo dutaxat coitatu facere debent, ubi residenciam specialem habent.

^x K annales; F animales

XIV. Item pro conservacione et dispensacione thesauri ex premissis subsidio et contribucionibus congesti seu congerendi exnunc eligantur duo barones et totidem nobiles ex utraque parte Danubii modo equali; et illi hoc modo electi ad fidelitatem regie maiestati et regno observandam, neque ad alias res ac necessitates velle hunc thesaurum convertere, preterquam presentis expeditionis facta et necessitates, et quod thesaurum ipsum nec pro se, nec fratribus vel dominis aut amicis, nec famulis eorum preter salarium eis deputatum accipient aut aliter dissipabunt, sed pecunias illas ad negocia regni prenotata convertent atque dispensabunt, firmissimum prestant iuramentum; in quo hoc modo erit procedendum, quod hic thesaurus congregetur ad unum locum, et thesaurarii iurent ad invicem, quod duo ex ipsis in castro interim manebunt, donec alii duo redibunt, gentesque pari modo conservent in castro, et nullus maiori comitiva altero intret ad castrum, ad cuius custodiam magna in parte nobiles servabunt, et illos quoque, quos intellexerint fidelissimos. Locus autem deputetur idoneus in medio regni Hungarie, castrum scilicet munitum et huic rei competens atque tutum.

^{xi} mendose: reddere eciam ipsi dicatores

XV. Quoniam omnibus constat premissas contribuciones et census insolitos ad vires hostiles reprimendas et arces nuper amissas recuperandas esse constitutos, constat eciam easdem contribuciones et census de cunctorum dominorum prelatorum ac baronum et regni nobilium, aliorumque possessionatorum hominum, eciam religiosorum et religiosarum^{xii} modo et ordine iam predeclarato in unum locum et ad manus ipsorum thesaurariorum regni comportandas et collocandas fore, quapropter nemo dominorum, nemo nobilium, nemo eciam aliorum possessionatorum hominum, exceptis dominis prelatis banderiatibus, qui ratione decimarum suarum gentes eorum paratas habere, demptis eciam officialibus finitimis regie maiestatis, qui ratione huiusmodi officiorum suorum gentes ipsorum paratas pariter habere et conservare semper tenentur, in hac futura expeditione personaliter interesse vel aliter exercituare prima fronte tenebitur, sed gentes de communi et publico erario, quia de salute communi agitur, ad expeditionem ipsam conduci debebunt. Ne tamen domini barones et ille quoque decem persone, qui et que iuxta contenta generalis decreti gentes per se tenere solebant, gentibus suis aut destituti, aut exercitium belli pretermisisse videantur, de publico ipso et communi erario seu thesauro non solum ad gentes suas teneri consuetas, verum eciam plures ex novo conducendas, si exercituare voluerint, per thesaurarios pecunie distribuantur.

XVI. Verum quia expeditionis ipsius moles ac progressus absque rectore, absque ductore et capitaneo absolvi ad effectumque perduci non poterit, presens eciam constitutio in fumum

^{xii} desideratur: bonis

convertetur et in nihilum redigetur, quod deus avertat, si executorem non habebit, certum est autem regiam maiestatem solam esse principem, regem, ducem, rectoremque et capitaneum nostrum ac executorem omnium rerum et constitutionum nostrarum, que pluribus intenta, veluti tantorum regnorum rex et dominus ad singula semper invigilare superintendereque non potest. Quapropter maiestas sua regia exnunc constituat auctoritate sua regia unum vel duos capitaneos generales, qui expeditioni prenotate sue maiestatis vice preesse gentesque tam internas, quam externas nomine maiestatis sue conducere et expeditionis huius ad processum generaliter providere, executionem eciam earum rerum, que necessarie erunt, et presertim constitutionem presentem concernere videbuntur, de mandato sue maiestatis peragere debeant et teneantur; habeantque et externis et internis de regnis ac nacionibus adductos et conductos secum in expeditione ipsa semper subcapitaneos in rebus bellicis et militaribus exercitatos et expertos, si reperient, pariter Hungaros, quorum consilio et opera procedant utanturque, et que rei illi conducibilia videbuntur, faciant. Interim tamen de externis regnis preter magistros rotarum ac capitaneos bonos et expertissimos gentes non conducant, quousque Hungaros reperient rei bellice sufficientes et aptos. Qui quidem capitanei regie maiestati super observanda fidelitate, et quod in rebus fide et executioni eorum commissis nemini parcent, sed fideliter procedent, et cum gentibus secum existentibus preter hostes regni et turbatores presentis constitutionis ac status rei publice, maiestatis regie et regni sui subversores neminem impedient, demptis in bello et expeditione ipsa delinquentibus, qui iuxta eorum demerita iuste puniendi sunt; et quod per gentes damna pro posse eorum inferri non permittent; si tamen illata fuerint, requisiti lesis et damnificatis iuxta evidencia testimonia et rei veritate comperta statim et absque subterfugio satisfaccionem impendere et reum secundum sui excessus qualitatem punire non omittent, firmissimum prestare teneantur iuramentum. Et quia capitaneorum officium erit gentes nomine, ut prefertur, regie maiestatis conducere et cum illis fideliter, ac quo minori poterunt, stipendio et salario concordare, exploratos tenere et de illis aliisque ad negocium tante expeditionis pertinentibus providere, gentes eciam conducendas modo antelato a damnorum illacione pro eorum posse custodire et preservare; propterea necessarium est de salario competenti et condigno ipsis providere, quo factis et rebus eorum officium concernentibus satisfacere valeant, ne defectum exinde sequi contingat. Hoc declarato, quod si gentes per eos conducende aut eciam proprie vel aliter capitaneatui ^{xiii} ipsorum deputate damna in eorum processu quibuspiam intulerint, mox postquam per lesos et damnificatos requisiti fuerint vel alter eorum fuerit, de illatis damnis satisfacionem ut per se ipsos, aut gentes, que damna intulerint, comperta, ut premissum est, mera rei superinde veritate impendere teneantur effective. Et quod violatores ecclesiarum ac puellarum et mulierum capitali pena puniri faciant, et gentes in domos nobilium ac presbiterorum contra eorum voluntatem descendere non permittant.

^{xiii} C alterius capitaneatui, quam

XVII. Ceterum capitanei ipsi mutuam habeant cum thesaurariis regni super summa manibus eorum consignata intelligenciam, cuius respectu gentes secundum magis et minus conducere sciant. Thesaurariorum eciam ipsorum unus aut duo gentes conductas personaliter revidere et tam numerum, quam eciam apparatus earum bene considerare teneantur, ne talibus, qui non merentur, pecunie distribuantur. Et quod aliqui thesaurariorum vel homines ipsorum speciales semper et continue penes capitaneos cum certa pecuniarum summa assistere teneantur, ut per eos gentibus conducendis fiat semper solucio sine defectu, quarum eciam gencium numerum et ipsi sciant, et capitanei quoque solucionis summam pariter intelligant.

XVIII. Item, quod regna Sclavonie et Transsilvanie singulas illas soluciones, que superius declarate sunt, eque ac in Hungaria pro hac unice vice subire facereque debeant, et superinde maiestas regia quam primum oratores suos ad ipsa regna transmittere dignetur.

XIX-XX. Regia maiestas de premissis ita disponat, ut in omnibus rebus constitutionem bene provideri possit.

XXI. Ceterum maiestas regia certificet et assecurat singulos regni sui comitatus per literas suas nolle de cetero et peramplius regnum istud et eius nobilitatem simili contribucione et taxa molestare, impedire atque gravare.

XXII. Item, si quis dominorum aut nobilium vel eciam rusticorum res aliquas celaverit et abscondi fecerit, de quibus contribucio censusque solvi deberet, tales res, si reperiri poterunt, per dicatores comitatuum auferantur et ex eisdem primum contribuciones reddantur; residua vero pars partim vicecomitibus ac iudicibus nobilium, partim autem dicatoribus cedat et in usum convertatur.

XXIII. Item, quod ab illis, qui arma vel victualia ad hoc regnum deferunt, tricesime et tributa nullibi exigantur, et hoc proclametur.

XXIV. Item maiestas regia mittat suos oratores ad principes Christianos, idoneos et Hungaros, nam alia nacio de rebus regni non tantum intelligit; qui quidem oratores inter alia habeant informacionem eciam ad electores imperii ac civitates parcium superiorum pro subsidio navium, ingeniorum, armorum et pulverum ac aliarum necessitatum impetrando.

XXV. Capitanei conducant aliquot milia gencium.

XXVI. Ecclesie maiores vacantes distribuentur, ut illi banderia sua erigere possint.

XXVII-XXVIII. De testamentis prelatorum.

XXIX. De taxa presbiterorum exquiratur certitudo.

XXX. Ad providendum de testamentis et taxa prenotata eligantur ad de medio dominorum prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium idonei personæ.

XXXI. Omnia premissa infra spacium duorum mensium suum effectum sorciantur debitum.

XXXII. Stipendia stipendariorum qui servitutis officio satisfacere non curarunt, restituendum sunt.

XXXIII. Bona nobilium, qui nec ad transactam expeditionem movere non curarunt per comites pro regia maiestate occupentur.

XXXIV. Potenciarum actus usque ad presentem dietam commissi brevis brevium evocationum absque omni prorogacione iudicentur. Iudicia comitatuum et vicariorum infra expeditionem suspensa maneant.

XXXV. Iura possessionaria post Wladislai regis obitum occupata sub pena facti potencie minoris statim remittantur.

XXXVI. Coloni durante transacta expeditione usque modo abducti statim remittantur atque reddantur.

XXXVII. Item quod regia maiestas provideat efficiatque apud vicinos principes, fratres scilicet et affines suos, ne jobagiones et rustici huius regni in confinibus signanter residentes metu premissæ contribucionis ad eorum regna principatusque et dominia transmigrare paciantur. Et si qui rusticorum illuc se contulerint moraturos, item reddantur, nam aliter confinia illa procul dubio desolabuntur. De Moravia et Slesia maiestas sua hoc idem facere dignetur.

XXXVIII. Restanciæ pecuniarum ad gencium conservacionem dicatarum restiuantur.

XXXIX. Metæ inter Comanos et dominos ac nobiles erecte erigantur.

XL. Item quod universa castra, castella, oppida, villas, possessiones ac cuncta iura possessionaria illorum, qui castra Nandoralbense et Sabacz nuper amiserunt, tanquam infidelium vigore generalis decreti condemnatorum regia maiestas ad manus suas regias de facto accipiat et illa nemini nunc distribuat, sed salvum conductum illis, si voluerint et postulaverint, concedat; et post factum inter eos superinde iudicium, postquam maiestas sua regia eciam hoc modo condemnatos agnoverit, et deinde in expedicione ipsa proxime affutura et aliis quoque in rebus ac factis maiestatis sue et regno quospiam bene, fideliter utiliterque servivisse cognoverit, illis tandem maiestas sua iuxta voluntatis sue beneplacitum, si pro se non reservaverit, illa conferat, ut spe collacionis bonorum servitores animati pro republica et communi bono sue maiestatis et regni sui fervencius incumbant et contra hostes ad mortem usque decertare non horrescant.

Verumtamen, si infideles ipsi, ut prefertur, voluerint et postulaverint, maiestas regia iuxta contenta generalis decreti salvum illis conductum ad spacia quadraginta dierum concedat, infra quorum terminum in curiam sue maiestatis accedere advenireque et innocenciam ac immunitatem eorum, si quam forsitan pro ipsorum defensione se habere confidunt, declarare poterunt. Et si maiestas sua regia illos vel eorum alterum in hac parte innoxios et innocentem merito de iureque repererit, illis vel illi eciam bona sua prenotata graciose remittat. Aliter autem, si se excusare et innocentes declarare non poterint, sua maiestas penam de infidelibus declaratam illis infligere non omittat.

19 November 1521

Articles unanimously composed and drawn up at the diet and general assembly of all lords prelates, barons and nobles of the realm held by royal mandate on the feast of the blessed Elizabeth the Widow, in the year of grace 1521 in Buda and confirmed by the royal majesty.

1 {1}¹⁴ Because for the repulsion of the great force of a great enemy a great amount of money, which is called the nerve of war,¹⁵ has to be collected and amassed, although peasants, rural folk and other men of plebeian condition should finally be spared after their many calamities and miseries, the extreme necessity and imminent danger of the country forces that this time again they render and contribute, besides the usual subsidy in the following manner. Therefore each and every peasant, non-noble and man of plebeian condition, including those living and dwelling in free cities and towns of the king and the queen, everywhere in this kingdom of Hungary and parts subject to it, moreover the landless peasants, both living in their own houses or with others, but only the married ones having separate households even if they live in the houses or residences of nobles, except however those landless peasants and paid soldiers, who get their fare and cloth from their lords of the land, shall severally pay one florin per hearth.¹⁶ {2} Moreover they shall render fifty pennies for each full vessel of wine, both what comes from their own vineyards and what they buy at a price and for money; twenty-five for the middle-sized vessels of wine like those used in the upper parts around Košice;¹⁷ one florin for the very large vessels like the Fuder around Pressburg; and seventy-five for the somewhat smaller ones, like the Dreiling.¹⁸ Stating that in those places where wine is produced, even if already sold by the tenant peasants, the aforementioned contributions shall be in fact rendered and paid according to the faithful and conscientious inquiry

¹⁴ The numbering in the CJH/MTvT refers to older editions of the CJH and had been retained by its editors, hence the mixed up sequence. We, of course, follow the text of Döry but give those article numbers for easy reference to earlier editions.

¹⁵ Commonplace, going back to Cicero (Philippica V. 5).

¹⁶ The expression fumatim (verbatim ‘per smoke’) was not previously used in Hungary in contrast to e.g. France where feux was the unit of taxation for centuries. Its introduction here is clearly connected with the fact that the traditional unit of the porta had by the beginning of the sixteenth century been divided into several households. There had already been an attempt of King Matthias to collect tax fumatim that had been cancelled. See 1474:4. In general, see, Árpád Nógrády, “Seigneurial Dues and Taxation Principles in Late Medieval Hungary,” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 265–78.

¹⁷ The cubulus of Košice was larger than that of Buda, which was estimated at 64–80 litres.

¹⁸ Dreiling and Fuder were commonly measurements of wine and beer of various sizes (Dreiling was usually equal to $\frac{3}{4}$ Fuder). The use of German measurements is not surprising considering the German population of Pressburg and of many other towns.

and assessment of the judge and sworn citizens of those places. {3} Then, brewers of beer shall severally pay one florin by virtue of their craft. Then, five pennies for every full vessel of beer and five for the middle-sized or small vessels. {4} Then five pennies severally for each of the oxen, cattle and other draft animal and horse, both those pulling plows or carts and those kept and pastured in the fields. {5} Then, two pennies severally for sheep, goats, bees, and swine, but nothing is to be paid for calves, foals, lambs and yearling piglets. Furthermore all craftsmen, namely tailors, jewelers, goldsmiths, carpenters, stone masons, smiths, painters, cabinet makers, lead smiths, shearers, weavers, harness makers, caupones,¹⁹ rope makers, coppersmiths, barbers, butchers, furriers, belt makers, cobblers, saddlers, wool workers, locksmiths, lime burners, carriage makers, tanners, and other craftsmen, but only those living in cities and towns, shall pay for every stall and shop one florin besides the aforesaid one florin subsidy to be paid per hearth as said above. {6} Then, all merchants, shop-keepers, apothecaries, cloth merchants, retailers²⁰ and other dealers residing in the free and walled cities are held to contribute faithfully and conscientiously one twentieth of their merchandise. {7} Then, all millers of all kinds of mills whatever they are called, also those called hámor and *huta*²¹ shall severally pay one florin for each millstone or wheel. {8} Then, all fishermen shall severally pay one florin for each large net called gyalom.²² Moreover, merchants and cloth merchants living outside the free and walled cities shall pay for each of their draft horses severally fifty pennies. {9} Then, parish priests and mass priests as well as other ecclesiastical persons who do not maintain troops and have no cattle or flocks shall contribute one tenth of their gold and silver belongings and ready cash. {10} Then, that Jews, living and residing anywhere and in the goods of anyone, shall pay one florin per head for each head, that is men, women, youngsters, boys and girls, but only according to their means, so that the richer help the poor in this contribution. And that all the aforesaid contributions are to be understood as for this time only.

2. {10 cont.} As far as the revenues of the royal majesty are concerned, as far as they may be freed from pledges, His Majesty offers these entirely for the defense of the realm, except for those that

¹⁹ We were unable to establish the meaning of this word, which was left out of later editions of the CJH, unless, innkeepers is meant, which, however, does not fit this list. Actually, this list is the most detailed one on urban crafts in medieval Hungary; see László Szende, “Crafts in medieval Hungary” in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Boston &c: Brill, 2018) pp. 369–93.

²⁰ Boltharii may be the Latinized form based on the Hungarian word bolt (shop).

²¹ Hámor: forging mill; and huta: foundry.

²² Dragnet.

are needed for his own person, kitchen, the court, the pay of the courtiers and the covering of his other necessities; His Majesty shall not appear to be impeded in this regard. He shall keep, in God's name, fully and entirely all his royal revenues, so that he may maintain from these his royal banderia,²³ in the manner of his predecessors, the kings of Hungary, the officers and the border castles which still stand; and His Majesty shall provide and take care of the other needs pertaining to the coming general campaign²⁴ together with the subsidy of His Majesty in the way declared below, offered likewise to the same campaign.

3. {11} Then, regarding the adjustment and release of the revenues of the royal majesty, His Majesty shall cause that accounts be rendered and inquiries made about who hold His Majesty's revenues and how; to those who are found to hold them legitimately, the royal majesty shall deign to make payments. To those, however, who keep them fraudulently and unjustly, especially those who are known to have seized them against the decrees of the realm²⁵ before the recently passed feast of St George, nothing shall be paid, but they shall be taken away from them simply and right away. Those who farmed them after the diet and assembly held on the said feast of St George the Martyr shall have their money returned, because in that diet²⁶ it was decided that revenues of that kind belonging to His Majesty could be farmed out, but only if it was clearly known that the amount of such a farm was received for His Majesty's own needs and was not done for old debts.

4. {12} Then, to the income of the thirtieth of His Majesty²⁷ there is now added as a subsidy granted to His Majesty that for each of the oxen, cows and other cattle as well as mares, that is pregnant horses fifty pennies (each) shall be paid, but only during the intended campaign against the Turk; after the end of this war, however, twenty pennies shall be paid, as was usual before. The royal majesty shall define as locations of trade for the sale and purchase of those animals that are ²³ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, 'banner') were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars).

²⁴ No general campaign was called for the subsequent years.

²⁵ Here the expression regnum (sometime meaning verbatim the kingdom) refers clearly to the political "country", i.e., the estates.

²⁶ The April 1518 diet is meant; see 1518 Buda

²⁷ The thirtieth (in Transylvania twentieth) was a custom's duty that developed from various market tolls. On its origins, see Zsigmond Pál Pach, A harmincadvám eredete [The origin of the thirtieth customs] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), and Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpáadian Age" in: Laszlovszky ed., The Economy, pp. 255–64.

exported from the country: Nedelišće, Sopron, Mosonmagyaróvár, Pressburg, Trnava, Zvolen and Košice. Besides these locations, no thirtieth shall be levied on animals in the interior of the country. Stallions shall not be exported for sale from this country during this campaign either in herds or otherwise, under the penalty of their loss and removal.²⁸

5. {13} Then, that the royal majesty shall cause his chambers of salt in Transylvania to be improved, from which he might with good care and diligence have annually some hundred thousand florins. The royal majesty shall take care that no foreign salt be imported to the country.²⁹

6. {14} Then the royal majesty shall cause to be minted the coins that have recently³⁰ begun to be minted, from which a great sum of money could be added to his royal revenues insofar as His Majesty shall exert himself and achieve as far as he is able—as it has been promised—that this kind of money and new coins shall circulate freely and be accepted in Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Bohemia, Poland, Moravia and Silesia. If this cannot be achieved, His Majesty shall cause to be minted such [coins] that are accepted everywhere; and nevertheless His Majesty shall not cease to cause good coins to be also minted, as in the times of the most serene princes, Lords Matthias and Wladislas, kings of Hungary of blessed memory, lest this country seems totally to lack good money. And that also foreign moneys, namely Czech and German, that is Alemannian Kreutzer and Groschen as well as babka, Heller and *beth*³¹ shall circulate and be accepted in this country; and, if the majesty so wishes, he shall also cause such foreign moneys to be minted, but with their correct and usual silver weight. {19} Lest the revenue coming from the minting of such new coins—which, if well collected should make a significant and large sum of money—be wasted and spent not for the king’s but for others’ purpose, as happened hitherto, [1] and lest the good money minted similarly be deprived of its just silver weight, his royal majesty shall cause a faithful

²⁸ Previous (and later) decrees tried to prohibit or reduce the export of animals (cf. 1495:27–28, 1498:31, 1500:25, 1504:28, 1514:66, 1518:Bács:33; and 1523:53), while cattle and horses were in fact the major export goods of medieval Hungary, see Ian Blanchard, “The Continental European Cattle Trades, 1400–1600,” Economic History Review, Second Series, 39 (1986), 427–60. This time the military needs seem to have prevailed.

²⁹ The inefficiency of the salt production was an issue as early as in Sigismund’s reign; see János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter” in R. Schneider, ed. Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347–87, here pp. 360–6. See now: István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages” in: Laszlovszky ed. The Economy pp. 205–18.

³⁰ Nova moneta: from 1 Mark silver of 250‰ fineness 500 were minted mixed with copper, in an attempt to increase the royal income by devaluing the currency. It led to economic chaos and was to be abolished by 1525, but was rescinded only in 1526; see 1526: 39.

³¹ Babka was originally a Czech coin, worth 1/3 of a Kreutzer. In Hungarian it became batka and acquired a proverbial meaning of ‘very low value’ (“not worth even a wooden batka”).

man of the Master of the Treasury always to assist the minters of this coin in Buda, [2] and in Kremnica that the pisetarius of the archbishop of the church of Esztergom³² be admitted by ancient custom and in the usual manner, who shall supervise their minting and faithfully watch over the revenues due to His Majesty from this, so that no fraud and waste occur.

7. {15} That all the aforementioned subsidies and levies be systematically collected and spent for the needs of the planned campaign.

8. {16} On the manner of collecting the aforesaid levies.

9. {17} Moreover, when danger grows, so do the needs, thus this great burden of war that threatens us cannot be eliminated and easily removed through the aforementioned taxation and levy on peasants and men of plebeian condition, however heavy it is. Since the danger—which the merciful God keep far off—is common to all, so it has to be driven off and averted with the common aid and contribution of all. Therefore, it has been seen good and unanimously decided that all lord prelates and other ecclesiastical persons, secular as well as regular, barons, nobles, and other men of property, notwithstanding the privilege of their liberty, shall contribute this one time for the aforesaid campaign, the straight half that is the equal half part of all their annual pecuniary income, coming either from cibrio,³³ or fishponds called morotva, or mines of gold, silver, copper, iron or other metallic ore, or of acorn-bearing woods or anywhere else. Furthermore they shall render their contribution in the same way as it was defined and clearly described above concerning the peasants for the wine, both produced in their own vineyards and those received as ninths or otherwise purchased for a price, as far as still ready and available, as well as for their cattle and flocks. {18} Because there are many nobles who have a number of tenant peasants but neither vineyards nor large fishponds, nor acorn-bearing woods, and the tenant peasants pay very little or nothing to these nobles but only plow, harvest, collect hay, and deliver into their barn, from which these nobles draw considerable annual income; so that they do not seem to be totally exempt from all payments, but should also render some subsidy, they shall contribute similarly the half of their income that they annually obtain from these services and fieldwork of their tenants, according to their own noble conscience, so that everyone shall carry his burden equally.³⁴

³² The pisetarius of the archbishop represented the prelate, who ever since the reign of Bela IV (1235–70) had the right to one forty-eighth of a mark from every mark minted.

³³ Cibrium—bucket tax, Latinized from the Hungarian word ‘csöbör’ = bucket.

³⁴ “Noble conscience” did not seem to suffice to guarantee the subsidy planned at the diet. Reportedly merely 1/10 of it could be collected in the course of the year.

10. {19} The decision is the same regarding the nobles of one plot as to their wine and cattle, and moreover, those who have no annual income in ready cash, shall pay severally for their person one florin. And that the *prediales*³⁵ of the churches, who fill the place of nobles, that is who are regarded like nobles, have to make the same aforesaid contribution as the nobles of one plot.

11. {20} Then, the lord prelates have nothing to pay by reason of their tithes, as they maintain their banderia for that. But there are several ecclesiastical persons who receive tithes, but do not keep troops for those; they have to render the half of these tithes.

12. {21} Then, the office-holders of the royal majesty have to maintain troops and banderia by reason of their office.

13. {21 cont.} Then, that in each county two honest and faithful nobleman shall be elected for the assessment, appraisal and collection of all the aforesaid contributions and subsidy of one florin, who shall faithfully and conscientiously appraise, complete and exact this subsidy and the other aforementioned contributions on the goods of the majesty of the king and the queen as well as of all lords spiritual and secular and other nobles and all men of property, including the religious, according to the way and manner and order described above on this matter, in such a way that neither ispáns nor alispáns nor noble magistrates shall receive any salary whatsoever for this, but shall proceed together with the elected tax collectors on their expenses. These tax collectors together shall receive no more for salary than fifty florins in the larger counties, thirty-two in the middle-sized ones and in the minor and small ones twenty-five. And this is so because the common good and the common weal are concerned and everyone must endure hardship for his own peace and quiet. They shall incur as small expenses from these contributions as they can, lest the contributions suffer major losses. The tax collectors shall complete [the collection of] these contributions entirely in their own person, not through their men. The judges of cities, towns, villages and estates are relieved from the payment only of the one-florin subsidy and in small villages they shall pay a half of this subsidy; they shall render all the other contributions like other tenants. {22} Then, the treasurers, ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates shall render for their wine, cattle and flocks as well as their pecuniary income, the said tax according to the aforesaid order and regulation. Before being sent out and proceeding with this appraisal and levying, the tax collectors shall swear a binding oath in front of the community of nobles that they will proceed faithfully in this matter and will not favor or spare anyone out of fear or love, nor will they harass anyone more than necessary out of hate or envy. Nor will they incur needless expenses while proceeding or release anyone from the subsidy and contributions. Nor will they retain anything from these for themselves or others under any pretext or color beyond the assigned salary, or be prodigal in any way, but will faithfully and honestly appraise and assess and will keep a true and just register and account of these. After this assessment and appraisal, every lord and noble shall and must bring and present without fail personally or through his man the entire amount on account of his own personal income and of his wine, cattle and flock in that county where the appraisal was done, as well as of his tenant peasants who live in the same county according to the list in the register of the tax assessors at one short term decided for that by the community of the nobles, in the presence of the ispán, alispán, noble magistrates, and the community of the nobles. Finally the county with the ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates shall faithfully report to the treasurers of the realm, to be elected and established in the way below, and send them the money through the tax assessors with the assistance of the same county. The treasurers shall issue letters of receipt and quittance that it was handed to them and received, so that no fraud or deceit may follow on either side. Nevertheless, lords and nobles of any estate, dignity or condition who have goods and property rights in several counties shall pay half of their pecuniary income according to their noble conscience only in that county where they have their special residence.

³⁵ On the prediales, nobles in ecclesiastic service, see Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndsmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 82–85.

14. {23} Then, for keeping and managing the treasure to be amassed and brought together from the said subsidy and contributions, two barons and the same number of nobles shall now be elected equally from both sides of the Danube. They, thus elected, shall swear a binding oath that they will observe good faith to the royal majesty and the country, would wish to apply this treasure to no other purpose or need than the matters and necessities of the present campaign; nor will they retain or squander otherwise this treasure on themselves or on their kinsmen, lords or friends or their servants besides the salary assigned to them, but apply and spend these moneys for the aforesaid affairs of the realm. They shall proceed so in this matter that this treasure be assembled at one place and the treasurers shall swear to each other that two of them will remain in the castle until the two others return and they will keep troops in the same way in the castle and none of them shall enter the castle—that shall be guarded mainly by such nobles and those whom they believe to be most faithful—with a larger retinue than the other. A suitable place shall be assigned in the center of the kingdom of Hungary, a well fortified castle, fitting for this and safe.

15. {23 cont.} Because it is known to all that the aforesaid unaccustomed contributions and taxes were ordained for the repulsion of hostile forces and the recovery of the recently lost fortifications and it is also known that these contributions and taxes from [the properties] of all the lords prelates, barons, nobles of the realm, and other men of property including the monks and nuns, will be brought to and gathered in the aforesaid way and manner in one place in the hands of these treasurers of the realm, therefore, none of the lords, none of the nobles and none of the other men of property have to personally participate or in other way fight in the front line in this coming campaign, excepting the banderial lord prelates who by reason of their tithes have to keep troops ready and the officers of His Majesty at the frontiers, who also, by reason of their office always have to keep ready and maintain their troops. They have to lead the troops [hired from] the common and public treasury to that campaign, because the common safety is concerned. That it may not appear that the lord barons and those ten persons who according to the general decree³⁶ keep their own troops be deprived of their men or be left out of the military events, the treasurers shall dispense money from this public and common treasury not only for keeping their usual troops but also to hire more new soldiers who wish to fight.

16. {23 cont.} Because in fact it is impossible to overcome the difficulties and lead the progress of this campaign to success without a leader, commander and captain and the present decree would go up in smoke³⁷ and turn into nothing—which may God avert—if it does not have an executant, it is clear that the royal majesty is alone our prince, king, leader, rector and captain as well as the executant of all of our affairs and decrees, and he, who attends to many things as king and lord of so many kingdoms, cannot always watch over and oversee everything. Therefore, His Royal Majesty shall now appoint one or two captains general by his royal authority, who must and should by mandate of His Majesty head the said campaign in place of His Majesty, lead the domestic as well as foreign troops in the name of His Majesty, and generally provide for the progress of this campaign, and execute those matters that will be necessary, particularly those concerning the present decree. They shall always have and take with them to this campaign vice-captains coming from the domestic and foreign countries and nations, experts in matters military with experience in war and also Hungarians, if they can be found; they shall use and follow their counsel and help, and do whatever appears more expedient for that business. However, as long as they can find Hungarians adequate and able for war, they shall not hire troops from other countries, save quartermasters and good and experienced captains. {34} These captains of the royal majesty shall swear a binding oath that they will be faithful and not spare anyone in matters of trust and in the pursuit of matters in their care, but will proceed faithfully, and will not by their troops hurt anyone except enemies of the realm, disturbers of the present decree and the state of the common weal, as well as destroyers of the royal majesty and his kingdom, and, moreover, those delinquent in this war and campaign who should be justly punished according to their misdeeds. [They should also swear] that they shall not allow, as best they can, their troops to cause harm and if such be caused they will not fail upon request, immediately and without demur, to give satisfaction for the injuries and damages, according to the evidence of witnesses and the truth as it is established, and to punish the guilty as the quality of their trespass demands. {35} Because it will be the duty of the captains to hire troops in the name, as said, of the royal majesty and to agree with them faithfully on as low a salary and stipend as possible, to keep scouts and take care of them and others who are engaged in affairs of this campaign, to guard and prevent to their best the troops hired in the above way from causing damages, it is, therefore, necessary to provide them with appropriate and suitable payment by which they can fulfill their tasks and business pertaining to their duties, lest any fault follow from this. Stating this, that should the troops hired by them, or their own men, or those otherwise belonging to their captainship cause damages to anyone in the course of their march, they themselves or the men who caused the damages shall give effective satisfaction for the damages caused as soon as they or one of them is requested by those injured or damaged, once the truth—as mentioned above—has been established. {36} They shall punish by capital punishment those robbing churches and raping girls and women; and they shall not allow troops to billet in the houses of nobles or priests against their will.

³⁶ Cf. 1492:2, 1498:22.

³⁷ Clearly a Hungarism: a plan can 'füstbe menni' (go up in smoke), that is come to nothing.

17. {26} Moreover, the captains and the treasurers of the realm shall be in mutual contact regarding the sums entrusted to them, so that they are able to³⁸ hire troops according to whether the amount be greater or smaller. One or both of the treasurers shall personally inspect the troops hired and examine thoroughly both their number and equipment so that no moneys are paid to those who are undeserving. And that one of the treasurers or their appointed confidants shall always and all the time attend to the captains with a certain sum of money so that they can always pay the hired troops without fail, the number of which they should know and likewise the captains in turn understand how much they cost.

³⁸ Another Hungarism: scire here comes from the Magyar ‘tudni’ that means both to know and be able to.

18. {27} Then, that the kingdoms of Slavonia and Transylvania³⁹ shall also for this one time be obliged to make all the payments that are declared above in equal measure to Hungary, and the royal majesty shall deign to send his emissaries to these kingdoms as soon as possible.

19–20. {28} That the decree be observed and penalty declared for non-observance.

21. {29} Further, the royal majesty shall certify and assure by his letters every county of the kingdom, that henceforth he does not wish to hassle, impede and burden this kingdom and its nobility with similar contribution and taxes.

22. {30} Then, should any one of the lords or nobles or even peasants hide or conceal things, from which contribution and tax has to be paid, the tax collectors of the counties shall take away these things, if they can be found, and first the contribution shall be paid from these, and the remaining portion shall be given in part to the alispán and the noble magistrates, in part to the tax collectors for their own use.

23. {44} Then, from those who bring into this kingdom weapons or victuals, no thirtieth or customs duties shall be levied anywhere and this shall be announced.

24. {32} That the royal majesty shall send ambassadors of his to the Christian princes, suitable Hungarians,⁴⁰ for other nationals do not understand so well the affairs of the kingdom; these ambassadors shall also provide intelligence to the imperial electors and the cities of the upper parts [of Hungary]⁴¹ in order to obtain subsidy of ships, engines, arms, and gunpowder as well as other needs.

25. {33} That the captains shall hire several thousand troops for the defense of the frontier.

26. {34} That vacant episcopal sees be filled so that they can raise banderia.

³⁹ In fact, neither of these territories were legally kingdoms; the expression is appropriate only for Croatia as part of the joint “archiregnum”

⁴⁰ There were several embassies sent to the German Reichstag to ask for military assistance—with limited success. The best known one included Stephen Werbőczy, who had a disputation with Martin Luther at the famous Worms diet of 1521. The emissaries were in fact always Hungarian prelates and politicians. Other embassies went to Rome and Poland.

⁴¹ It is unclear why the cities “of the upper parts” (usually referring to the cities presently in Slovakia) are included here. In later editions of the CJH the text is different but still not comprehensible.

27–28. {35–36} That the last wills of recently deceased prelates,⁴² which promise income to the royal treasury, be attended to.

29. {37} That the taxes paid recently by priests shall be accounted for.

30. {38} That a commission of barons and nobles shall inquire about these wills, and the pledged goods of the archbishop of Esztergom be redeemed by the king.

31. {39} That all the provisions of the decree be completed in two months.

32. {52} That the pay of mercenaries of counties who did not fulfill their duties be refunded.

33. {54} That the goods of those absent without excuse from the campaign be confiscated.

34. {56} County and spiritual court sessions are to be suspended during the coming campaign.

35. {57} That properties seized since the death of King Wladislas [II] have to be returned.

36. {58} That tenant peasants removed or escaped since 1514 shall be returned⁴³

37. {45} Then the royal majesty shall arrange and achieve with the neighboring princes, his kinsmen and relatives, that they shall not allow peasants and tenants of this country, particularly those living near the frontiers, to escape—for fear of the aforementioned levy—to their kingdoms, principalities or estates. They shall return those tenant peasants who moved there for good, lest those border regions become doubtless desolate. His majesty shall deign to do the same in regard to Moravia and Silesia.⁴⁴

38. {46} That the residue of previous hundred-penny taxes not applied to the defense of the realm be handed over to the newly-appointed treasurers.

39. {47} That the border markers set up between the estates of nobles and Cumans, but later destroyed by the latter, be restored and the boundaries inspected.⁴⁵

40. {60} The royal majesty shall in fact take into his hands all the castles, fortified houses, towns, villages, estates, and property rights of those who recently lost the fortresses of Belgrade and

⁴² The confiscation of the personal property of deceased prelates, especially that of Thomas Bakócz, archbishop of Esztergom (died in 1521) was a considerable income for the royal treasury. The personal wealth of Bakócz was estimated to be almost equal to the yearly income of the king; he had more than 40.000 florins alone in cash, which was promptly impounded after the archbishop's death.

⁴³ Cf. 1514: 25–6, 30, 44.

⁴⁴ Cf. 1514:70.

⁴⁵ Cf. 1498:48 and 1514:54.

Šabac,⁴⁶ as unfaithful, to be condemned by the force of the general decree.⁴⁷ [1] He shall not donate these for the time being. The persons, however, shall receive safe conduct if they so wish. [2] Then, once the royal majesty has acknowledged them as condemned in this matter, he shall grant these [properties]—unless he retains them for himself—to those whom he may recognize as having done in the coming campaign or in other affairs faithful and useful services to His Majesty and the realm, [3] so that those who serve, motivated by the hope of [receiving] donations of goods, may attend more fervently to the affairs of the common weal and the common good of His Majesty and not shy back from fighting until death against the enemy.

If, however,⁴⁸ these aforesaid unfaithful men, wish and request, the royal majesty shall, according to the general decree, grant them safe conduct for forty days, during which time they can come to the court of His Majesty and present their innocence and blamelessness, should perchance they believe that they have something for their defense. Should the royal majesty find them or any one of them rightly and lawfully blameless and innocent, he shall graciously return them or him the aforesaid properties; otherwise, if they cannot excuse themselves and present their innocence, His Majesty shall not fail to punish them with the penalty due to the faithless.

⁴⁶ Francis Hédervári, castellan of Belgrade and Valentine Enyingi Török, commander of Sabač. They were indeed condemned for losing the castles in 1523. Hédervári's properties were confiscated but Enyingi Török finally received royal pardon. See Gusztáv Wenzel, "A Hédervári Ferenc jószágai fölötti per és ítélet 1523-ban. Adalékul Magyarország azonkori köz- és jogtörténetéhez" [The trial and sentence in the lawsuit regarding the goods of F. H. in 1523. An addition to the legal history of those times]. in Magyar Történelmi Tár 6. (1859) 3–82. The diet of 1525 Hatvan demanded that Hédervári be also pardoned, but his properties were confiscated and granted to others in 1526.

⁴⁷ Cf. 1462:2, 1495: 4, and Tripartitum II 12.

⁴⁸ This last paragraph is not included in the CJH.

Dietal decision 1523

May 4 [called for April 24 (St George's)] diet in Buda [ends before. May 19]: Decree with 59 articles passed mainly aimed at the implementation of previous measures on taxes and military service.

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survived in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (Marino Sanuto from Venice, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225-8.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio Antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: Codex Festetich (OSZK: Fol. Lat. 4355, pp. 589–596) [F] and a contemporary copy kept in the Hungarian National Archives (MNL OL DI 36 369). Szabó mentions a contemporary copy in the Vienna Haus- Hof- und Staatsarchiv with the title “Domino Ferdinando.”

For unknown reasons, Ferenc Döry did not include this decision into his copies. The editors printed it on the basis of the Codex Festetich and the incomplete MNL OL copy.

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801) Vol 2, pp. 515–54 based on an original kept in Bardejov; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), pp. 809-25; (59 articles printed with different numbering); Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története pp. 254-9 (partial).

LIT: Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története, pp. 60-6; András Kubinyi, “Országgyűlési küzdelmek Magyarországon 1523–1525-ben” [Struggles in the diet in Hungary 1523–25], in Tibor Neumann and György Rácz, eds, Honoris Causa. Tanulmányok Engel Pál tiszteletére, pp. 125–48 (Budapest and Piliscsaba: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia Történettudományi intézet – PPKE Bölcsészettudományi Kar, 2009).

This dietal decision, as several others of the Jagellonian decades, contains so many repetitions of earlier legislation, that we have not reprinted them here. For the omitted articles, we added, for information's sake, the rubrics of the Corpus Iuris, even though they are later additions.

Articuli in diaeta festi beati Georgii Martyris Millesimi quingentesimi vigesimi tercii Budae celebrata pro regni tutela & quiete formati.¹

I. Quod primo et ante omnia omnes proventus regiae majestatis recte revideantur et intelligantur, quantam summam faciant, et quid aut quantum sua majestas ex eis disponere et expedire possit

II. Exigantur rationes de subsidio 100 denariorum.

III. Ita etiam ab iis, qui ex indultu regis monetam cuderunt. Qui vero id sine indultu fecerunt, poena notae infidelitatis plectantur.

IV. Exmittatur ad singulum comitatum deputatus, qui investiget, quanta summa illic repartita? quanta exacta fuerit?

V. Inquirat etiam an dicatores datam sibi instructionem observaverint.

VI. Omnes hi poena duplici mulctentur.

VII. Comites vero et vicecomites, qui jam incassatas pecunias detinent vel in usus proprios converterunt, insuper officio priventur.

VIII. Restantiae exigantur et in salaria capitaneorum, sumptus legatorum et munitionem Petrovaradini convertantur.

IX. Comites et vicecomites, qui aliquos nobiles a praesenti diaeta erga pactatam mercedem dispensarunt, officio priventur et poenam 400 florenis persolvant.

X. Eadem poena statuitur in eos, qui aliquos a praeterita exercituatione dispensarunt.

XI. De his omnibus per circulatores comitatum inquiratur, uti et de creditoribus, qui pecunias regno mutuarunt.

XII. Eruat rex quantitatem promissorum a reliquis principibus subsidiorum.

XIII. Gentes regiae et banderia statim ad confinium Temesiense descendant.

XIV. Officia Hungaris conferantur, et non exteris.

XV. Banderia, rex interteneat in confiniis.

XVI. Item quilibet dominorum, ac nobilium, et alterius conditionis possessionatorum hominum, de singulis decem sessionibus jobagonalibus, singulum unum equitem, ad minus hastam cum clypeo, vel arcum manualementem cum pharetra habentem disponat, et secum ad expeditionem ipsam generalem, penes majestatem regiam ducat. Comitatus² vero partium superiorum; Threnchiniensis, Zolyom, Thurocz, Arva, Liphtho, et Szepes, loco equitum, pedites pixidarios secum portare teneantur.

XVII. Nobiles unius sessionis, exercituantium more, equestres, vel pedestres, et not in kocsí ad expeditionem vadant.

XVIII. Exercitantes, ne tempore progressionis in bellum, damna incolis inferant, neve in domos nobilium, ac sacerdotum condescendant.

XIX. Item regia majestas jubeat, atque committat, ut omnes domini, qui aliqua obligamina inter se habent, de facto deponant et deinceps solummodo ad fidelitatem majestati suae observandam, ad quam etiam alioquin tenentur, sint astricti atque obligati. De nobilibus quoque idem est sentiendum, atque faciendum.

XX. Subsidium duorum florenorum offertur.

XXI. Coloni, vel inquilini, qui res et bona in valore trium florenorum non habent, et alii servitores nobilium, simul cum Woynicis relaxentur.

XXII. Et in hac contributione etiam bona regie et reginalis maiestatum, (demptis³ civitatibus eorum muratis, quae aliter solvi consueverunt), una cum illis colonis, qui in curiis nobilium domus distinctas habent, terrasque, et prata, ac vineas proprias tenent⁴ atque colunt et dominis eorum ex illis fructum solvent, pari modo dicentur, ut commune periculum communi omnium dominorum, ac nobilium, colonorumque, et rusticorum subsidio (dei adiutorio accedente) propelli possit. In villa vero, ubi decem fuerint coloni, unus, et ubi quinque medius iudex relaxetur, hoc expresso quod si in villa etiam plures fuerint iudices, unus solummodo relaxetur.

XXIII. Subsidium hoc etiam ad Transylvaniam et Sclavoniam extenditur.

XXIV. Illud non ad debita solvenda, sed usus bellicos impendatur.

XXV. Res montanistica de salibus regulatur.

XXVI. Quod regia majestas meliores monetas cudi faciet, sed novam monetam quilibet acceptare debeat.

XXVII. Novam monetam, omnes in restitutione censuum et dicarum accipere debeant.

XXVIII. Item, quod nemo audeat antiquas monetas pro se cambiare, nec argentum gratia lucri ad se redimere sub poena amissionis hujusmodi argenti atque monetae, per hoc tamen emptio argenti ad usum cujuspiam necessaria prohibita esse non intelligatur.

²F Comitatus

³F demptorum

XXIX. Una marca argenti redimatur et ematur sex florenis, quinquaginta denariis, sicut prius quoque fuit constitutum. Alioquin, tam venditor, quam emptor, argentum ipsum amittat atque perdat eo facto.

XXX. Argentum et antiquae monetae, non educantur.

XXXI. In redemptione antiquarum monetarum ad centum monetas antiquas supperaddantur de novis denarii decem.

XXXII. Merces, non pluris vendantur; quam prius venditae sint.

XXXIII. Obuli quoque cudantur.

XXXIV. Item ut aurum et argentum in copia habeantur; majestas regia committat fodinas minerarum auri, et argenti, ac cupri, et aliorum metallorum, libere omnibus colere. Et de externis quoque regnis, ad culturam eorum laborantes, et montanistas advocare, et publico edicto proclamare faciat. Tandem quod et illos et modernos, in eorum libertatibus antiquis conservare; et ab omnibus impetitoribus defensare dignetur.⁵

XXXV. Nemo pecunias aliquas, sub nota infidelitatis, cudere in regno praesumat.

XXXVI. Poena eorum, qui vocati ad generale bellum venire noluerint.

XXXVII. Item praepositi, abbates, capitula, conventus, moniales, bona, et jura possessionaria secularia possidentes; hoc idem facere de personis eorum teneantur. Et de jobagionibus nihilominus eorum, prout alii possessionarii nobiles exercituare sint obligati. Ita, ut tot mittantur equites, quot sunt in capitulo canonici, et insuper, decimas quoque jobagionales praenarratas, mittere teneantur. Praepositi tamen seculares, ac aliae personae ecclesiasticae, duplex beneficium habentes, seu in dignitate constitutae; juxta limitationem dominorum praelatorum suorum, personaliter advenire sint obligati.

XXXVIII. Item de illis quoque personis ecclesiasticis banderiatas, qui aut decimas, aut alios proventus copiose habent, majestas regia ita provideat ut sibi expeditionem ad praemissam et condignum subsidium praestent.

XXXIX. Capitanei in singulis comitatibus constituentur.

XL. De capitaneorum persona et officia. XLI.

Tricesime et loca exactionis earundem. XLII.

Saxones transylvani connumerentur.

XLIII. Actus potentiarii a 1521 commissi non obstante exercitiatione judicentur.

XLIV. Quae praeterea causae, non obstante exercitiatione possint decurrere.

XLV. Ceterum novae occupationes terrarum pratorum, aquarum, sylvarum, promontiorum. et aliorum omnium jurium possessionariorum post obitum serenissimi principis quondam domini Wladislai regis felicis memoriae iam facta, atque deinceps fiendae tam in his judiciis, quam etiam in sedibus judiciariis comitatum adjudicari possint; ita videlicet, ut more proclamatae congregationis per litteras regias in comitatibus fiat primum super occupatione per vicinos, et commetaneos, nobilesque conprovinciales more solito mera premissorum veritatis inquisitio, et si occupatio facta fuisse constabit, ibidem possessio, vel terrarum occupata contradictione occupatoris non obstante per comites ac vicecomites, et iudicium restituatur actoris, et insuper occupator ratione occupationis et violentiae ad decimum quintum diem propterea in curiam regiam per litteras vicecomitum, medio iudicium personaliter vel de domo ac curia sua nobilitari ammoneatur, et erocetur, vel si actor super facta sibi restitutione, et poena centum florenorum in sede comitatus decernenda contentus, causam huiusmodi amplius prosequi noluerit, in causam tamen attractus super iudicio sibi facto non contentus, eandem causam pro emendatione sui discussionem in curiam regiam voluerit deducere, ad decimum quintum diem causa illuc transmittatur, et si iudicium, ac iudicaria deliberatio comitum, vel vicecomitum benefactum fuisse probabitur, reus, seu in causam attractus in facto minoris potentiae, seu capitali sententia ibidem vincatur, et condemnatur.

XLVI. Metae inter Cumanos et vicinos nobiles per palatinum rectificentur.

XLVII. Fugitivi coloni restituantur.

XLVIII. Item quod omnes Lutherianos, et illorum fautores, ac factioni ipsi adhaerentes, tanquam publicos haereticos, hostesque sacratissime virginis Mariae poena capitis, et ablatione omnium bonorum suorum, majestas regia, veluti catholicus princeps, punire dignetur.

XLIX. Item quod Magistri prothonotarii, sese in officium vicegerentium iudicum ordinariorum regni, videlicet; vicepalatini, et viceiudicis curiae regiae, sub amissione officiorum suorum, ingerere, et immittere, proventusque eorum tollere, nullatenus praesumant. Hoc idem est de caeteris quoque officialibus regiae majestatis intelligendum, atque faciendum, ne confusione officiorum, curia majestatis suae regiae inordinate disponatur.

L. Redemptiones literarum juxta formam generalis decreti regni accipiantur.

LI. Litterae sententiales, facti minoris potentiae, ad florenos sex taxentur.

LII. Item quod ad celebrationem communium inquisitionum, homines regii, vel palatinales, de curia regia contra voluntatem partium litigantium non transmittantur. Dempto casu, qui notabilem et insignem videbitur importare partibus ambiguitatem, simul et damnorum occasionem: in quo de curia regia homines libere transmitti possunt.

LIII. Greges bovum et ovium tantum usque limites regni depelli possint.

LIV. Sequestrata proditorum Belgradi et Szabachii bona cum illi se hactenus non purgaverint pro caducis declarantur.

1523

Articles composed at the diet held in Buda on the feast of St George the Martyr in 1523, for the safety and peace of the realm.

1. That first and foremost all revenues of the royal majesty shall be correctly reviewed and established: how much they make, and what and how much His Majesty can dispose and expend of these.
2. That accounts be rendered of the subsidy of 100 pennies, of which 25 were to go to the royal majesty and 75 to the maintenance of troops.
3. *That accounts be rendered by the minters of the 'new money'.*⁶
4. That the amount of taxes that have been levied and collected shall be established for every county.
5. That the conduct of the tax collectors shall also be investigated.
6. That tax evaders and cheating tax collectors shall have to pay double.
7. That ispáns and alispáns⁷ embezzling taxes be deprived of office.
8. *The remainder of the taxes be applied to the pay of captains, and the expenses of the emissaries to the Reichstag as well as for the repairs of Petrovaradin.*⁸
9. That ispáns and alispáns releasing nobles from attending the diet in return for a bribe shall be deprived of their office and pay a fine of 400 florins.
10. That the same punishment shall be applied to ispáns and alispáns releasing nobles from military service.
11. That the inquiry decreed in 1521⁹ shall be completed and the income used for paying off the debts of His Majesty and for the repairs of Petrovaradin. The number of nobles and tenant peasants¹⁰ in each county shall be established.

⁶ Cf. 1521:6.

⁷ The vicecomes (alispán) was in most cases the actual administrator of the county, his superior, the comes/ispán frequently holding several offices in court and/or in several counties. He was usually a retainer (familiaris) of the ispán, but ever more often also "elected" by the county's nobles.

⁸ The castle of Petrovaradin had key importance for the southern defense line after the loss of Belgrade. After its fall in 1526, the kingdom of Hungary was left largely unprotected from Ottoman attacks, thus leading directly to the defeat at Mohács.

⁹ See 1521:38.

¹⁰ Tenant peasant (jobagiones, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de

12. *That His Majesty shall ascertain the number of soldiers and cannon, and quantity of ammunition to be received from each lord.*¹¹

13. *That the royal and other banderia*¹² shall be right away deployed on the frontiers, above all in the region of Temes.

14. {17}¹³ *That the king and the queen shall keep only Hungarian officials, and send always two captains to border fortresses.*¹⁴

15. {18} That the king shall keep his banderia and troops on the frontiers.

16. {19} Any lord, noble or other man of property shall provide one horseman at least with spear and shield or a handbow and arrows for every ten tenant peasant plots,¹⁵ and lead them with him to general campaign with the royal majesty. [1] The counties in the upper parts, that is Trencsén, Zólyom, Túróc, Árva, Liptó, and Szepes, shall lead with them, instead of horsemen, musketeers.¹⁶

17. {20} That the nobles of one plot shall go to war either as horsemen or foot soldiers but not in carriages, as often happens.

facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

¹¹ It seems that this is the first time that reference to artillery is included into a legal document. On the development of firearms, see A Millennium of Hungarian Military History. Béla Király and László Veszprémy, eds. (Boulder, CO: Social Science Monographs, 2002) and László Veszprémy, “The State and Military Affairs in East-Central Europe, 1380-c. 1520s” in: Frank Tallett, D J B Trim, eds. European Warfare, 1350-1750 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010). pp. 96-109.

¹² Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’) were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field banderia were called banderial lords.

¹³ The numbering of the articles differs in the CJH/MTvT from that of the first printed edition by Kovachich, and is somewhat mixed up, while the manuscripts have no indication of articles at all. As usual, we print the numbering of the CJH/MTvT in braces for easy reference to previous literature.

¹⁴ Cf. 1495:36 and 1518 (Bács):21.

¹⁵ The quota for the militia portalis (on which, see e.g., András Borosy, “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in eds. János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary. East European Monographs, 104, (Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80) was by this provision effectively doubled or even trebled. See 1492: 20, and 1498: 16.

¹⁶ Cf. 1518 (Tolna):6.

18. {21} *That the troops shall cause no damages; those accused shall be judged by the captains.*¹⁷
19. {22} Then, the royal majesty shall order and command that all lords who have any obligations between them shall indeed set these aside and henceforth shall be bound and held only to the fidelity owed to the royal majesty, to which they are committed anyhow. The same applies and refers to nobles.¹⁸
20. {23} *A tax of two florins is decreed.*¹⁹
21. {24} That tenants and landless peasants²⁰ having less than 3 florins' wealth, as well as household servants, the victims of Ottoman raids, and vojniks²¹ are exempted.
22. {25} This contribution shall be similarly levied on the goods of the king and the queen, except their walled cities which pay otherwise; also on tenant peasants who own their own houses on noble properties and cultivate their own lands, fields, and vineyards rendering the fruit thereof to their lord, so that the common danger be removed—God permitting—by the common subsidy of all lords, nobles, tenants and peasants. In villages where there are ten tenants, one judge may be relieved; in villages with five, half a judge, adding that if there are several judges in a village, only one of them shall be exempt.
23. {26} The same tax applies to Slavonia and Transylvania.
24. {27} That the two-florin tax shall be applied only for defense.
25. {28} That the income from salt and other mines shall not be defrauded and no precious metals exported.

¹⁷ Cf. 1521:17.

¹⁸ The article is aimed against those confederations that were concluded by several barons and prelates in the 1520s, occasionally including the queen, in order to represent their interest at the diets especially in appointment to the high offices of the realm, see Szabó, Magyar országgyűlések, passim.

¹⁹ In fact, the usual half florin tax was not raised to its quadruple; the 2 Fl were to paid over two years and included the so-called lucrum camerae (a direct tax established in the thirteenth century); see Szabó, Magyar országgyűlések, p. 64; see also: Árpád Nógrády, Seigneurial Dues and Taxation Principles in Late Medieval Hungary, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 265–78.

²⁰ Due to the partible inheritance and other motives, the number of landless peasants (inquilini) increased in the later Middle Ages; many of them lived on tenant peasants' plots and supplied the wage labor in times of seasonal employment. See István Szabó, "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén" [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], in Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. pp. 167-200 (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1976)

²¹ Vojniks were South Slavic peasant soldiers who escaped to Hungary from the Ottomans and mainly constituted the foot soldiers employed on the southern defense line.

26. {29} That the king shall cause better money to be minted but the current ‘new money’ shall be accepted everywhere under the penalty of confiscation of goods.

27. {30} That the ‘new money’ shall be accepted for the payment of taxes.

28. {31} Then that no one dare to change the old money or buy up silver for profit under the penalty of losing that silver and money; buying silver for one’s own use shall not be understood as prohibited.

29. {33} One mark of silver shall be exchanged and bought for six florins and fifty pennies, as was also decreed earlier.²² [1] Otherwise both buyers and vendors shall lose and be deprived of the silver right away.

30. {34} Prohibition on the export of silver and old money.

31. {35} That the old money shall be exchanged at the royal chamber with a ten percent charge.

32. {36} *That the price of merchandise in ‘new money’ shall not be increased from that in old money.*²³

33. {38} That fillérs²⁴ shall also be minted and be worth half a penny.

34. {39} In order that gold and silver be in abundance, the royal majesty shall grant the [right of] mining of gold and silver as well as copper and other metal ores freely to anyone. [1] And he shall cause workers and miners to be invited from foreign countries and this shall be publicly announced. [2] He shall deign to keep both old and new ones in the liberties and defend them from all those who would infringe them.

35. {40} Prohibition on the minting of money by anyone, under the penalty of taint of infidelity.

36. {41} That this punishment applies to those failing to come to war.

37. {42} Priors, abbots, chapters, convents, and monks who own secular goods and property rights shall do the same in respect of their persons [who do not go to war]. [1] And they are obliged to send to war like other nobles with property according to [the number of] their tenant peasants, [2] so that they shall send as many horsemen as there are canons in the chapter, moreover [one] for every ten tenant peasants as mentioned above. [3] Secular priors and other ecclesiastics who hold double benefices or dignities are obliged to appear in person according to the determination of their lord prelates.

²² There is no previous surviving decree on the exchange rate of silver. On the monetary reform of the 1520s see Zsolt Simon, “A zágrábi pénzverde 1525 évi számadása” [The accounts of the mint of Zagreb from 1525] Századok 144 (2010) 433–64.

²³ On the moneta nova and the dire consequences of minting this devalued money, see Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in Laszlovszky, ed. The Economy, pp. 295–308.

²⁴ A fillér was the smallest money of exchange; its original silver content was ca. 0.3 gr.

38. {42} Then the royal majesty shall arrange that those banderial prelates who have abundant income from tithes or otherwise, contribute appropriate and suitable subsidy for his aforesaid campaign.

39. {44} That captains be appointed in every county.

40. {45} About the person and duties of the captains.

41. {46} *That the thirtieth be levied at the decreed locations.*²⁵

42. {47} That a census of the Transylvanian Saxons be made.

43. {48} *That acts of might*²⁶ *committed after 1521 shall be adjudicated without interruption, notwithstanding the campaign.*²⁷

44. {49} That cases pertaining to properties shall also be continuously adjudicated.

45. {50} Furthermore, recent seizures of lands, fields, woods, waters, vineyards, and any other property right—done after the demise of the most serene prince the late Lord King Wladislas of blessed memory or henceforth—may be adjudicated both in these court sessions and in the county courts. In the following manner: first an inquest, as usual, shall be held and the truth [learned] in the counties on these seizures in the way of an extraordinary county assembly [called] by royal letters with the neighbors, abutters and nobles of the same county;²⁸ and if the seizure is proven, the seized property or land shall be returned to the plaintiff by the ispán or alispán or the noble

²⁵ Cf. 1498:34.

²⁶ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, and the killing or assaulting of one (incl. rape).

²⁷ Cf. 1521:34. In 1523 a successful campaign was organized against the pasha of Rumelia and the bey of Belgrade, led by the newly commissioned commander Pál Tomori, with a decisive battle on August 6–7.

²⁸ On the procedure of inquest and extraordinary county assembly, see Erik Fügedi, “Verba volant ... Oral culture and literacy among the medieval Hungarian nobility” in: Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary, J. M. Bak, ed. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986) ch. VI.

magistrates,²⁹ notwithstanding a contradiction by the occupier. Moreover, the occupier shall be given notice and summoned personally or from his noble house or residence through letters of the alispán by the noble magistrate to the royal court to the fifteenth day for his seizure and violence. If the plaintiff, satisfied with the restitution and the fine of one hundred florins, to be imposed by the county court, does not wish to pursue the case any further, but the respondent, not satisfied with the judgment against him, wishes to take his case to the royal court for further treatment and adjustment, then it shall be transferred there in fifteen days. If then the judgment and judicial decision of the ispán or alispán is approved of as correct, the guilty party, that is the respondent, shall be convicted and condemned of a major act of might, that is to capital sentence.

46. {51} *That the borders between the Cumans and the nobles be adjusted by the count palatine.*³⁰

47. {52} *That fugitive or abducted peasants shall be restored.*³¹

48. {54} Then, the royal majesty, as a Catholic prince, shall deign to punish all Lutherans and their partisans as well as the adherents of their sect as public heretics and enemies of the most holy Virgin Mary by capital punishment and the forfeiture of all their goods.³²

49. {55} Then, the master protonotaries³³ shall in no way dare to interfere with or inveigle themselves into the office of the deputies of the justices ordinary of the realm, namely the vice-palatine and the vice-judge royal, and to appropriate their income under the penalty of losing their office. [1] And the same shall be applied and done in respect of the other officials of the royal majesty, lest the court of His Royal Majesty suffer disorder due to the confusion of offices.

50. {56} *That chancellery fees be collected according to the general decree.*³⁴

²⁹ Judlium was the standard medieval abbreviation for judex nobilium. However, this seems to be the only occurrence of it in a medieval decretum. The noble magistrates (usually four in every county) were helpers of the alispán and at the same time representatives of the noble community of the county.

³⁰ Cf. 1498:48, 1514:54, 1521:39.

³¹ Cf. 1504:16, 1514:25–29, 1518 (Tolna):20.

³² This is the first instance of persecution of Lutherans, indicating the impact of the Reformation in Hungary. Because of their German connections, the queen and the most influential man at court, Margrave George of Brandenburg were suspected of sympathies for the Lutherans. See: Markus Hein, “Maria von Habsburg, der ungarische Hof und die Reformation in Ungarn,” in: Martina Fuchs and Orsolya Réthelyi, eds. Maria von Ungarn (1505-1558): Eine Renaissancefürstin (Münster: Aschendorf, 2007) pp. 261–72. See also Zoklán Csepregi, “Reformation in Hungary: historiography, research problems, methodology” in: Temp tidskrift for historie 15 (2007) 135–58 with ample bibliography.

³³ Protonotaries (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, “master in sentencing” were lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases. See György Bónis, “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary,” East Central Europe/l’Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191.

³⁴ Cf. 1492:95.

51. {57} That the fee for letters of judgment in cases of minor acts of might be six florins.

52. {58} Then, that royal or palatinal bailiffs³⁵ shall not be sent out from the royal court to common inquests against the will of the parties, [1] except for cases which seem to involve major and significant disagreement among the parties as well as payment for damages. In this case bailiffs can be freely sent out from the royal court.

53. {58} *Herds of oxen and sheep shall not be exported, nor of horses and calves.*³⁶

54. {59} *That the goods of those who had lost Šabac and Belgrade be confiscated unless they can excuse themselves.*³⁷

³⁵ The homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment. It was prescribed that the bailiff be accompanied by a witness of a place of authentication recording the action. It seems that in lawsuits bailiffs were selected by the litigants from among the nobles of their counties. Royal clerks were also commissioned as specially delegated royal bailiffs with powers more extensive than regular royal bailiffs. That seems to have been resented by the nobility.

³⁶ Cf. 1495:27–28, 1498:31, 1500:25, 1504:28, 1514:66, 1518 (Bács):33, 1521:4.

³⁷ Cf. 1521:40. On 15 September 1523, the properties of Francis Hédervári, former capt ain of Belgrade, were confiscated. The diets of 1514/5 and 1526 request that he be pardoned but finally, in 1526, granted to the Bakics family. The property remained disputed for generations. See: See Gusztáv Wenzel, “A Hédervári Ferenc jószágai fölötti per és ítélet 1523-ban. Adalékul Magyarország azonkori köz- és jogtörténetéhez” [The trial and sentence in the lawsuit regarding the goods of F. H. in 1523. An addition to the legal history of those times]. in Magyar Történelmi Tár 6. (1859) 3–82.

Dietal decision 1525 in Hatvan

Once the king refused to approve the decisions of the Rákos diet of 1524, the nobility called an armed general assembly to the city of Hatvan (some 50 km northeast of Buda). The king first explicitly prohibited the counties to attend “as no good can come about by a new assembly,” but finally, when a delegation of lesser nobility, assembled in Hatvan around 24 June, invited him, he went to the meeting on July 3. The rather tumultuous diet again deposed the count palatine Báthori and elected the leader of the nobility, Stephen Werbőczy, as palatine. The decisions contained not much else than what had been agreed to the preceding year, but the king did not approve them this time either. The text is not included in most of the law collections, nor in the Corpus Juris Hungarici, but the political importance of the diet suggested its inclusion here. Annotations are kept to a minimum, considering the repetitive nature of most of the articles.

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survive in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, but most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (the Venetian Marino Sanuto, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225-8.

MSS: Codex Nádasdy (Budapest University Library Cod. G 39.) foll. 342r–344r [N]; Codex Festetich (OSZK: Fol. Lat. 4355, pp. 589–596) [F]

EDD: Ignatius Batthany, Leges ecclesiasticae regni Hungariae... (I–III. Albae Carolinae – Claudiopoli, 1785-1827)1, 595–9 [Ba] (based on a Vatican MS), Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum, 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 3: 23–50; Szabó, Magyar országgyűlések, pp. 265–6 (part.)

LIT: András Kubinyi, “Historische Skizze Ungarns in der Jagiellonenzeit” in Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer, 1998) pp. 323–66; Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiełło Hungary” Central Europe 3 (2005), 3–18; Idem, “Jagello Hungary,” in: DRMH IV, xi–xlvii; Szabó, Magyar országgyűlések, pp. 84–96. For the issues of defence, see András Kubinyi, “Hungary’s Power Factions and the Turkish Threat in the Jagiellonian Period (1490 - 1526),” in István Zombori, ed. Fight against the Turk in Central-Europe in the First Half of the 16th Century (Budapest: METEM, 2004), pp. 115–145; Géza Pálffy, “The Origins and Development of the Border Defence System Against the Ottoman Empire in Hungary (Up to the Eighteenth Century),” in Géza Dávid and Pál Fodor, eds. Ottomans, Hungarians and Habsburgs in Central Europe: The Military Confines in the Era of Ottoman Conquest. (Boston: Brill, 2000), pp. 3–70.

Articuli in congregacione generali in oppido Hathwan pro festo nativitatis beati Joannis Baptiste celebrata confecti pro anno Domini 1525.^{xlix}

I. Primo, ut omnes constitutiones iam facte et modo quoque formande atque concludende effectum sorciantur et execucioni demandentur, consilium regium, quod magna in parte per exteris nationes hactenus gubernatum est, reformetur, et ut omnia in consilio regio maturo tractatu maturaque deliberacione fiant et ad effectum perducantur; nec alter consiliariorum alteri super dissidio et non concordi sententia, prout plerumque contingere solet, culpam impingere possit, et exinde debita execucio negociorum regni pretermittatur, maiestas regia de medio^l dominorum prelatorum ac baronum primarios officiales et consiliarios suos, preterea de medio quoque nobilitatis huius regni octo personas electas iuxta generalis decreti contenta in curia sua regia apud se teneat, cum quibus sua maiestas infra venturam generalem dietam pro festo beati Georgii martyris proxime venturo celebrandam omnia in consilio suo regio tractanda, aliis dominis prelatis et baronibus forsitan dissidentibus et non concordantibus decernere concludereque et execucioni demandare, officia eciam tam finitima, quam eciam interna et alia omnia mutare, distribuere, bone et utili ac maiestati sue et huic regno conducibili proficueque dispensacioni, proventuum suorum regionum superintendere atque providere, et generaliter omnia perficere dignetur. Ceteri eciam domini prelati et barones, eorum dignitate exigente, in consilio ipso regio interesse, tractare et sententias suas declarare more hactenus consueto libere valeant atque possint. Nihilominus tamen quidquid per maiestatem regiam cum prescriptis consiliariis suis, ceteri eciamsi discordes fuerint, conclusum fuerit, ratum maneat atque firmum. Nationes tamen externe in consilium regium de cetero non admittantur. Universa eciam officia tam regie, quam regionalis maiestatum, videlicet magistratus curie, cubiculariatus, tavernicatus, pincernatus, dapiferatus et agazonatus et portarii quoque maiestatum suarum, preterea castellanatus^{li} omnium castrorum, camereque salium ac auri et argenti, necnon tricesime et vigesime, cementum ac quinquagesime et honores comitatuum suarum maiestatum Hungarice dumtaxat nacionis hominibus, nobili de prosapia propagatis, et non forensibus per suas maiestates conferantur, prout eciam in decreto continetur. Ab illis tamen externe nacionis hominibus, qui pro nunc eiusmodi officia tenent, mox et immediate de factoque auferantur. Et de beneficiis quoque ecclesiasticis hoc idem est intelligendum, quod scilicet non advenis, sed Hungaris^{lii} per utramque maiestatem de cetero conferantur. Et quod^{liiii} maiestas sua sigillum suum anulare, reginalis vero maiestas similiter sigillum suum, si apud sese tenere non voluerit, Hungaris pariter et non forensibus conferre dignetur.

^{xlix} F. Articuli diete in oppido Hathwan celebrate anni 1525, per regiam tamen maiestatem non confirmati, N. Articuli diete oppidi Hathwan, anni 1525.

^l Ba. loco: de medio ... cum quibus sua maiestas add. dominos palatinum regni ac cancellarium, iudicem curie et thesaurarium sue maiestatis tamquam supremos suos consiliarios penes se accipiat. Preterea de medio quoque nobilitatis huius regni octo personas electas, iuxta generalis decreti contenta, in consilium suum regium pariter admittat, qui post maiestatem suam regiam plenariam auctoritatem habeant.

^{li} Ba. add. ac provisoratus.

II. Ceterum, quod Fukarii et omnes naciones externe, qui thezauros regni palam exhauriunt et educunt, de hoc regno statim ablegentur et exmittantur, in eorumque locum Hungari constituentur. Naciones tamen externe, cuiuscunque linguagii existant, si maiestatibus suis et huic regno servire voluerint, ad stipendia consueta libere veniant et conducantur, attamen in confinibus regni Hungarorum more servire militareque teneantur. Lutheriani eciam omnes de hoc regno extirpentur, et ubicunque reperti fuerint, non solum per ecclesiasticas, verum eciam per seculares personas libere comburantur et bona eorum fisco regio dominisque terrestribus, ubi reperti punitique fuerint, applicentur.

III. Item, quod stipendia seu salaria Burgoni et aliis externis nacionibus deputata de cetero non reddantur.^{liv} Universi eciam proventus regii sublatis omnibus obligaminibus qualitercunque factis, manibus dumtaxat domini thesaurarii regii statim et de facto assignentur.

IV. Item, quod maiestas regia metas per dominum Stephanum Bator pridem palatinum superiori anno erectas et per Comanos ac Philisteos iterum distractas per unum ex magistris prothonotariis secundum contenta literarum suarum palatinalium exinde confectarum absque ulteriori mora rursus erigere et reintegrare, ac nondum erectas ex novo reambulare et erigi facere dignetur.

V. Item, quod occupaciones per dominum marchionem et alios potentes noviter facte eciam invitatis occupatoribus per regiam maiestatem rectificentur absque mora, sic videlicet, ut regia maiestas ad singulos regni comitatus ad quattuor partes eiusdem regni quattuor magistris prothonotarios una cum personalis presencie regie maiestatis locumtenente ac vicepalatino et viceiudice curie sue maiestatis exnunc transmitters dignetur et penes eosdem locumtenentem ac vicepalatinum et viceiudicem curie magistrisque prothonotarios universitas nobilium duas personas nobiles, quas voluerit, iurisperitas et benemeritas eligat, qui universas terras, sylvas, prata, fenilia, piscinas, piscaturasque et villas ac porciones villarum post obitum serenissimi principis quondam domini Mathie regis minus iuste et indebite ac preter iuris equitatem de manibus aliquorum occupatas et occupata, comperta superinde mera rei veritate et observata iuris equitate rectificare et quos de iure concernere agnoverint, eisdem mox et immediate reddere, alios eciam cunctos actus potenciarios pariter revidere complanareque teneantur.

VI. Et quod tam regia et reginalis maiestates, quam eciam domini prelati et barones ac nobiles universos jobagiones post insurreccionem et sedicionem rusticanam ad bona ipsorum vel abductos, vel saltim furtimque locatos iuxta formam et contenta decreti generalis exinde conscripti^{lv} per prefatos locumtenentem ac vicepalatinum et viceiudicem curie regie, magistrisque prothonotarios et duos electos in singulis comitatibus de facto immediateque reddi faciant.

^{lii} Ba. quod scilicet advenis et externis auferantur, Hungarisque.

^{liiii} Ba. loco Et quod ... dignetur add. Et quod sigillum quoque regie maiestatis anulare secretarius Hungarus donante maiestate sua teneat. Pari racione reginalis maiestas sigillum suum Hungarice nationis homini domino scilicet cancellario sue maiestatis benemerito conferre dignatur.

^{liv} Ba. add. Obligamina eciam et litere quelibet super regis proventibus cuiquam per egiam maiestatem vel dominum thesaurarium nullius sint firmitatis.

VII. Et metas quoque regia maiestas tam ex parte Moravie, quam etiam Austrie et Styrie preter ulteriorem moram rectificari facere dignetur.

VIII. Item, quod pecudes et pecora, hoc est boves, oves, vacce et equi gregatim vel alio sub colore et coria eorundem animalium de hoc regno per hunc annum propter extirpacionem presentis monete nove et propter instantem futuramque expeditionem sub pena in maiori decreto exinde specificata non educantur neque exmittantur; et si educerentur, ubicunque reperti fuerint, modo et ordine, quo in eodem decreto continetur, auferantur, non obstantibus literis regie maiestatis superinde forsitan conficiendis, si tamen extra regnum et non ad nundinas liberas seu fora hebdomadalia in hoc regno celebranda abigantur.

IX. Item, quod tricesime, que in Nandoralba et Zalonkemen exigi consueverant, de cetero in Waradino Petri exigantur, ne arma, sales, pixides et cultelli in Thurciam deferantur.

X. Item quantus in conservacione gencium defectus tam per dominos prelatos et barones ac alios quoque comitatum nobiles hactenus fuerit commissus, omnibus constat. Ne igitur de cetero vel defectus vel negligencia in gentibus conservandis committatur, nec etiam damna per eos in transitu ac processu ipsorum nobilibus ac ignobilibus inferantur, statutum est, quod universi domini prelati et omnes viri ecclesiastici ac barones et nobiles, qui ratione bonorum suorum vel de bonis suis propriis quinquaginta equites, sive armigeros sive levis armature seu hwzarones tenere non possunt, pecunias exercitiales de bonis eorum in medium nobilium illorum comitatum, ubi eiusmodi bona adiacent, administrare teneantur. Et in quolibet comitatu unus capitaneus per universitatem nobilium eligatur, qui tam bona omnium dominorum et nobilium in illo comitatu adiacencia sub iuramento firmissimo per eum prestando dicare, quam etiam gentes militaris exercicii peritas conducere et iuxta limitationem regie maiestatis ac prescriptorum consiliariorum regionum, secundum necessitatis exigenciam illas semper in confinibus tenere et copiam registri super dicatura post rectificacionem in sede iudiciaria fienda manibus vicecomitis assignare, tempora etiam et dies conduccionis gencium atque demissionis earum ad confinia semper conscribere et nobilibus notificare debeat et teneatur, ne fraus in gentibus conservandis solucionibusque in eisdem fiendis committatur. Nobiles etiam in literis ipsorum generali capitaneo regio in partibus illis, quo gentes deputabuntur, constituto numerum gencium mittendarum rescribere, numerum etiam sessionum jobagonalium illorum dominorum, qui iuxta limitationem prescriptam per semet ipsos cogentur gentes conservare, ipsi capitaneo similiter significare teneantur, ut capitaneus ipse gentes prenotatas revidere et perlustrare sciat, ne defectus in gentibus ipsis utcunque reperiat; damna vero, si que per illas in transitu cuipiam irrogarentur, per capitaneum earum semper rectificentur atque rependantur. Quod si capitaneus ipse facere nollet, propterea iuri convenienter puniatur. Preterea idem capitaneus cum suo capitaneatu experiatur, in quantum poterit, de magnis proventibus dominorum ac nobilium ipsius comitatus, ut dum extrema necessitas coegerit, et omnibus dominis ac nobilibus contra hostes regni personaliter insurgere necessarium erit, sciat capitaneus ipse, quot et quantas gentes de illo comitatu secum habere poterit. Intelligat eciam universitas nobilium, quantis gentibus unumquemque eorum iuxta exigenciam facultatis et possibilitatis ipsorum secundum limitationem eiusdem universitatis nobilium insurgere et ad bellum procedere teneatur, ut communis hostis communi omnium provisione arceatur atque dei adiuditorio propellatur. Et quod gentes universorum dominorum prelatorum ac baronum et regni comitatum, si que nondum sunt misse, sub pena in generali decreto exinde expressa exnunc ad confinia, loca scilicet eis deputata mittantur atque ibidem servantur.

^{lv} Ba. loco iuxta ... conscripti add. sub pena in decreto generali exinde conscripta.

XI. Quia per dominos prelatos ac viros ecclesiasticos decimas habentes super magno et superfluo onere conservacionis gencium querimonia sepe defertur, ut videlicet ultra exigenciam et quantitatem proventuum ipsorum gentes pro regni defensione conservare cogentur, que ut e medio tollatur, iuxta formam et continenciam dicti generalis decreti in singulis regni comitatibus tot probi et fidedigni nobiles per universitatem nobilium eorundem comitatum eligantur, quot in eisdem comitatibus iudices nobilium habentur. Qui una cum eisdem iudicibus nobilium, prestitis per ipsos iuramentis, tam de proventibus eorundem dominorum prelatorum et virorum ecclesiasticorum decimas habencium, quam eciam numero jobagionum suorum, a quibus decens et opportunum fuerit, diligenter experiri et eorum computum atque numerum sub ipsorum sigillis infra proximum festum beati Martini episcopi et confessoris regie maiestati ac dominis consiliariis et assessoribus transmittere teneantur. Et ut in dieta et convencione generali a modo primitus celebranda iuxta exigenciam, facultatem et proventum^{lvi} numerumque jobagionum ipsorum gencium per eos conservacio iuste et honeste limitetur; interea vero gentes suas modo, quo hactenus soliti sunt, iuxta formam ipsius generalis decreti et registrum excellentissimi principis quondam domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis pro defensione regni conservare teneantur.

XII. Item, quod patroni ecclesiarum et tutores pupillorum bona ecclesiarum et ipsorum pupillorum pro se non computent, sed in medium nobilium numerentur, et quod bona ac iura possessionaria liberarum civitatum noviter empta in medium comitatum pro gencium conservacione connumerentur.

XIII. Item regia eciam et reginalis maiestates racione dignitatis et pariter bonorum suorum banderia sua parata semper habere dignentur. Officiales quoque finitimi tam racione bonorum suorum, quam eciam officiorum ipsorum gentes suas integre pariter conservare teneantur, prout in decreto conscriptum habetur.

XIV. Item loca per Thurcos combusta et desolata non dicentur. Libertini tamen nonnisi illi, qui victu et amictu dominorum suorum utuntur, in hac parte conservacionis gencium relaxentur. Inquilini eciam in propriis domibus habitantes ac aratra vel vineas proprias habentes dicentur, ne regni defensio in gencium conservacione et earum numero minuatur atque deficiat.

XV. Item, quod per regiam maiestatem ac dominos consiliarios regios limitentur et constituentur statim loca super proventibus regiis, ubi et de quibus officiales finitimi salaria sua rehabeant, et ad illos proventus nemo se de cetero ingerere audeat, ne officiales ipsi Bude cogantur mendicare et per hoc officia eorum vacua relinquere, reliquos eciam proventus regios et curiales servitores sue maiestatis ita moderari, ne tot dissipaciones, quot hactenus fuerunt, in proventibus regiis de cetero committantur. Et quod singulis annis thesaurarius regius et provisor Budensis de cunctis proventibus regiis sue maiestati ac dominis eiusdem consiliariis et assessoribus in festo Epiphaniarum domini ac diebus immediate sequentibus ad id sufficientibus rationem et computum dare teneantur.

^{lvi} Ba. G41. facultatum et proventuum.

XVI. Item, quod cusio presentis monete de cetero cesset et regia maiestas bonas monetas, prout in principio regiminis maiestatis sue cudebatur,^{lvii} cudi facere dignetur. Verumtamen infra festum beati Laurentii martyris proxime venturum monete iam cuse more hactenus solito pro uno denario veteri, post predictum vero festum due ex eisdem novis^{lviii} pro una bona et antiqua moneta currant et accipiantur. Attamen in rebus vendibilibus maiestas regia ordinationem pridem factam atque publicatam observari faciat. Et si venditores contrarium facerent, res eorum vendibiles ac mercimonia per iudices^{lix} locorum auferantur, quorum due partes regie maiestati in civitatibus et bonis suis, in aliorum vero bonis domino terrestri cedant, et tertia pars iudicibus et iuratis civibus relinquatur. Verum, quia omnis hec penuria ac caristia rerum vendibilium et mercimoniorum, que modo regnum istud oppressit, ex cusione presentis nove monete^{lx} provenit atque crevit, plures sunt autem, qui monetas presentes cudi fecerunt, alii ex permissione regie maiestatis, alii vero propria eorum temeritate, veritas itaque est de premissis per regiam maiestatem exquirenda et recta ratio capienda ac exigenda. Qui igitur de voluntate regia monetas in vero pondere seu liga quattuor lothonum cudi fecerunt, si iustam rationem de illis dare poterunt, absoluti habeantur. Illi tamen, qui monetas ipsas adulteraverunt, et in liga trium lothonum vel aliter infra quattuor cudi fecisse comperti fuerint, non solum ad rectam rationem dandam sint obligati, verum eciam totum lucrum, quod ex huiusmodi adulteracionis fraude perceperunt, regie maiestati reddere refundereque teneantur. Qui vero propria eorum temeritate cudi fecerunt, prout in decreto quoque continetur, nota perpetue infidelitatis condemnentur. Ceterum, si qui extraneorum hominum monetas extra regnum istud cusas et fabricatas in hoc regnum de cetero importaverint, et comprehendi poterint, mox et de facto comburantur et incinerentur, pecunieque cuse ab eis auferantur. Hospites quoque et dispensatores eorum, in hoc regno, si de cetero reperti fuerint, pari pena puniantur. Ne autem fraus et dolus^{lxi} in rebus vendendis et emendis committatur, ubique per totum hoc regnum pro frumentorum ac bladorum vendicione et empicione, atque vinorum educillacione una et eadem mensura, cubulus scilicet et quartale ac pintha Budensis formetur. Verumtamen hec mensura in priorem et pristinum statum et formam, que nuper diminuta fuit, redigatur et per singulos regni comitatus omnesque civitates liberas per regiam maiestatem distribuatur. Precium tamen non equaliter, sed iuxta locorum exigenciam, prout scilicet carius vel uberius res vendibiles

^{lvii} Ba. loco sue cudebatur add. domini nostri clementissimi fuerat.

^{lviii} Ba. loco due ... ex eisdem novis add. interea, quo moneta nova et bona multiplicabitur, duo ex eisdem cupreis.

^{lix} Ba. loco per iudices ... relinquatur add. ubique locorum in predam publicam convertantur.

^{lx} Ba. presentis cupree monete.

^{lxi} Ba. add. prout hactenus.

crescunt aut deferuntur, taxetur et limitetur.

XVII. Item, quod regia maiestas testamentum reverendissimi quondam domini Georgii archiepiscopi Strigoniensis execucioni demandare et servitoribus suis solucionem facere, pecunias et res alias pro missa perpetua capitulo Strigoniensi per eum datas et relictas reddere dignetur gracie.

XVIII. Item, quod pecunie testamentarie alieque res reverendissimorum quondam dominorum Thome et dicti Georgii Strigoniensis ac Gregorii Colocensis ecclesiarum archiepiscoporum et Francisci de Warda episcopi Transsilvaniensis exnunc exquirantur et ad regni necessitates per regiam maiestatem convertantur.

XIX. Item,^{lxii} quod aurum et argentum iuxta contenta minoris decreti et sub pena ibidem denotata de hoc regno nullatenus educantur.

XX. Item, quod nobiles parcium inferiorum et signanter duodecim comitatus a Zewrinio usque ad Posegam in eorum libertatibus iuxta contenta decreti conserventur et proventus eorum de desertis restituantur.

XXI. Item, quod de cetero cause in curia regia cum processu solito regni hactenus tractari consuete in causam honoris non convertantur.^{lxiii}

XXII. Item, quod iudicia brevia statuto uno per regiam maiestatem termino more hactenus consueto celebrentur, verumtamen dolus et fraus illa, que in inhibicionibus et peregrinacionibus hactenus inter causantes et litigantes abusivo modo fieri consueverat, de cetero cesset. Ita quod inhibiciones iuste et recte fieri quidem possint, prout in decreto quoque continetur, verumtamen illis, qui vel presentes fuerint in loco iudiciorum, vel in aliis causis contra alios egerint, aut ad accionem illorum responderint, inhibicio non detur neque observetur. Peregrinacionis vero prorogacio, quia peregrinacio salutis et non fraudis causa fieri debet, penitus et in toto tollatur atque cesset.

XXIII. Item, quod omnia decreta regni per dominos consiliarios regios et assessores iuratos sedis iudicarie regie magistrisque prothonotarios infra venturam generalem dietam in unum corpus decreti redigantur, et leges quoque ac iura regni scripta interim perlegantur, et ex novo revideantur, atque revisa in eadem dieta per regiam maiestatem privilegio confirmentur.

XXIV. Item,^{lxiv} quod regia maiestas pro auctoritate sua regia comitatum honores personis idoneis ac benemeritis, et quidem talibus, qui eciam nobilibus grate videbuntur et accepte, ad supplicacionem universitatis nobilium comitatum conferre dignetur, ne nobiles ipsi per eos comites, qui eisdem contrarii sunt, et displicent, oppressionem et defectum in ipsorum iuribus paciantur.

XXV. Item, quamquam tributa sicca et arida atque super aquis et fluviis ab infra descendentibus et supra euntibus exigi consueta contra deum eiusque iusticiam exigi videantur et exinde in decreto quoque serenissimi principis quondam domini Ludovici regis per invictissimum principem quondam dominum Mathiam regem tempore felicis coronacionis sue confirmato constitucio quedam et abolicio eorum facta habeatur, absque debita tamen revisione, quod scilicet illorum siccum et aridum existat, et quod eorum pontem vel repleturam habeat, ac iusta racionabilique de causa exigatur, conclusio perfecta fieri non potest. Quapropter statutum est, quod in singulis regni huius Hungarie et parcium sibi subiectarum comitatibus octo probi et nobiles viri eligantur, qui strictissimo sub iuramento cuncta tributorum siccorum et in aquis quoque exigi solitorum, pontes eciam at repleturas habencium loca peragrarare perlustrareque et oculata fide conspicerere, deinde a vicinis et commetaneis eorundem theloniorum nobilibus ac ignobilibus pariter super quantitate exaccionis eiuscemodi tributorum, quantum videlicet de uno curru ac equite et pedite accipi et exigi consueverunt, et que eorum pontes et repleturas habeant, et que simpliciter sicca aridaque existant, certo cercius edoceri informarique, ac ad proximum festum beati Martini episcopi et confessoris sub eorum ac vicecomitum et iudicum nobilium sigillis regie maiestati ac consiliariis et assessoribus suis regiis fideliter conscribere; et regia maiestas ac ipsi domini consiliarii et assessores super cuiuslibet tributi tam abolicione et distraccione, quam eciam exaccione veram iustamque et honestam limitacionem et taxacionem facere et iuxta eandem limitacionem et taxacionem postea cuncti tributarii procedere theloniaque et deponere et exigere debeant atque teneantur, sub amissionis pena tributorum ipsorum.

^{lxii} Ba. Quod aurum et argentum de hoc regno non educantur, et si reperitur educens, ubique libere auferantur.

^{lxiii} Ba. add articulum: Et quod litere adiudicatorie per regiam maiestatem contra libertatem et consuetudinem sedis sue iudicarie et regni sui absoluta sua auctoritate extradari commissa et extradate nullius sint firmitatis, et adversa parti litere legitime ac iuridice contra predictas violentas literas pariter reddantur, non obstantibusque huiusmodi literis de facto et absolute emanatis execucioni demandentur.

^{lxiv} Ba. loco articuli add. Item quod honores comitatum regia maiestas ad supplicacionem universitatis nobilium cuiuslibet comitatus talibus personis conferre dignetur, que ipsis nobilibus placite et acceptabiles videbuntur, ne oppressionem et defectum in iure ipsorum per eosdem comites, qui eisdem displicent et contrarii sunt, quovis modo paciantur.

XXVI. Item, quia omnis occasio impedimenti, qua solucio decimarum dominorum prelatorum et aliorum virorum ecclesiasticorum infra presentem dietam nuper suspensa fuerat, deo glorioso duce iam sublata est, ideo universe decime eorundem dominorum prelatorum ac aliorum virorum ecclesiasticorum more hactenus consueto ubique libere et pacifice reddantur atque persolvantur.

XXVII. Item, quamvis tricesime et civitates regie pre manibus dominorum Johannis wayvode Transsilvaniensis et Georgii fratris sui carnalis, comitum scilicet Scepusiensium in certa pecuniarum summa titulo inscripcionis habite, tam secundum contenta decreti pro festo beati Luce evangeliste in anno Domini millesimo quingentesimo decimo quarto, quam iuxta formam articulorum Bachie in anno salutis millesimo quingentesimo decimo octavo conscriptorum restituta ea capitali summa pecuniarum, pro qua apud manus ipsorum existunt, ex racionibus et causis ibidem declaratis regie maiestati reddi et remitti debeant, ne tamen ulterius maiestas regia eiuscemodi proventibus et civitatibus suis destituta maneat, sed universi proventus sui regii ad manus suas in tempore et exnunc veniant atque resignentur; ne eciam ipsi domini comites Scepusienses pecuniis eorum privari videantur,^{lxv} maiestas sua regia universa castra, castella, oppida, villas, possessiones porcionesque et quelibet iura possessionaria illustrissimi quondam Laurencii ducis ubilibet habita et adiacencia prefatis comitibus Scepusiensibus, quos eciam alioquin eadem iura possessionaria vigore cuiusdam fraternalis contractus et regii consensus exinde adhibiti concernere et eisdem adiudicata quoque extitisse perhibentur, et que maiestas sua apud se et manus suas, tanquam communes conservare, atque illis, quos de iure concernere dinoscerentur, reddere pollicita fuerat, eliberare remittereque et resignare facere dignetur, cunctis suis literis donacionalibus, inscripcionalibus et impignoraticiis ac eciam statutoriis super eisdem bonis et iuribus possessionariis pro parte quorumcunque et qualitercunque hactenus confectis et emanatis^{lxvi} per omnia cassatis et annihilatis,^{lxvii} iure dumtaxat feminei vel eciam virilis sexus, si qui supersunt hominum, in eisdem bonis et iuribus possessionariis virtute tituloque sanguinis habito salvo remanente. Ideo ipsi quoque comites Scepusienses universas tricesimas ac civitates regias pre manibus eorum hactenus, ut prefertur, titulo inscripcionis pro grandi florenorum summa habitas et existentes maiestati sue regie viceversa et in recompensam premissorum quiete et absque pecuniarum solucione resignare teneantur.

^{lxv} Ba. add. propterea conclusum est quod.

XXVIII. Item, quod ad proximum festum beati Martini episcopi et confessoris per totum hoc regnum Hungarie in bonis tam regie et reginalis maiestatum, quam eciam universorum dominorum prelatorum ac baronum et regni nobilium singuli centum denarii veteres unum florenum facientes per dicatores regios connumerentur et modo ac ordine, quo in gencium conservacione fieri consuevit, incluso lucro camere maiestatis regie exigantur, quorum septuaginta quinque maiestati sue regie et residui viginti quinque denarii reginali maiestati pro subsidio et conservacione banderiorum maiestatum suarum cedant atque persolvantur. Ubi autem monete veteres et antique dari solvique non poterunt, due monete nove pro nunc currentes solvantur et accipiantur.

XXIX. Item, quod ad festum beati Georgii martyris proxime venturum una generalis dieta sub pena in generali decreto expressa in campo Rakos celebretur, in qua et decreta in unum corpus decreti modo prenarrato redigenda et leges regni conscripte revideantur, intelligantur atque confirmantur. In reliquis eciam regie maiestatis et regni sui rebus quidquid pro utilitate et comodo ac quieta conservacione eiusdem maiestatis sue et regni sui faciendum videbitur, unanimi voto decernatur atque concludatur.

XXX. Item, licet anno superiori universitas dominorum ac nobilium regie maiestati in eo supplicaverit, et exinde articulos quoque ediderit, ut maiestas sua regia illos, qui castra Nandoralbense et Sabacz amiserant, servatis in hac parte condicionibus in ipsis articulis declaratis, nota infidelitatis condemnare dignaretur, et ex eo maiestas sua regia magnificum Franciscum de Hederwara, alias banum dicti castri Nandoralbensis ipsa infidelitatis nota condemnaverit, bona eciam et iura sua possessionaria certis fidelibus suis perpetuo donaverit. Quia tamen sua maiestas alios omnes, qui^{lxviii} super amissione predictorum castrorum participes fuere et culpabiles,^{lxix} absolutos declaravit atque commisit, ideo prelibatum quoque Franciscum de Hederwara^{lxx} ad supplicacionem prefatorum dominorum et nobilium super predeclarata amissione seu^{lxxi} violenta expugnacione dicti castri Nandoralbensis absolutum reddere et inter

^{lxvi} Ba. add. vigore presentis constitutionis.

^{lxvii} Ba. add. viribusque destitutis et de facto relictis.

^{lxviii} Ba. loco alios omnes qui add. certis de causis egregios Valentinum Therek ac Stephanum et Blasium Sulyok.

^{lxix} Ba. add. dicebantur.

^{lxx} Ba. add. pari racione.

^{lxxi} Ba. add. pocius.

fideles suos connumerare, universaque bona sua dempto castello Podwarsa, quod idem Franciscus a se dudum vendidisse et alienasse perhibetur, sibi remittere et remitti facere dignetur.^{lxxii}

^{lxxii} Ba. post. art. XXV. add. Item, ut curia maiestatis regie honeste ac servitorum frequentia ac multitudine sit referta et decorata, universa iura patronatus omnium ecclesiarum et beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum, tam per maiestatem regiam, quam eciam serenissimum quondam dominum Wladislaum regem, genitorem sue maiestatis charissimum pie memorie cuicumque collata revocata habeantur. Et maiestas sua regia de cetero cuncta beneficia ecclesiastica demptis canonicalibus et simplicibus archidiaconatibus ac rectoratibus altarium, quibuscumque sola voluerit, iuxta preallegatum decretum pro festo beati Luce evangeliste editum conferat. Preterea cuncta beneficia ecclesiastica ab illis, qui ultra unum habent, per regiam maiestatem pariter auferantur et iuxta contenta generalis decreti personis benemeritis distribuantur, ut eo plures Deo glorioso servire, plures eciam gentes pro regni defensione conservare possint.

Ba. post articulum XXVI. add.

Item, quod officia cancellariatus, iudicatus curie, thesaurariatus ac magistratus curie regie maiestatis et provisoratus Budensis sua maiestas regia exnunc mutare et alios, qui in rebus et factis sue maiestatis et regni sui effective procedent et execucionem faciunt, in locum modernorum officialium prefigere dignetur.

Demum post art. XXX. add.

Item quoniam in discussione et examine cuiusdam cause alias inter dominam Euphemiam relictam quondam Joannis Bodo, ut actricem ab una, ac dominam Annam relictam quondam magnifici Moysis Buzlay veluti in causam attractam ab altera partibus racione certorum actuum potenciariorum dudum mote et ad quamdam attestacionem deducte prefata domina Anna quoddam adversus ipsam dominam Euphemiam ex iudiciaria deliberacione personalis presencie nostre contra vetustam legem et approbatam consuetudinem huius regni nostri, ut prefertur, facta prestitisse deposuisseque perhibetur iuramentum, ideo, ut vetusta lex et consuetudo ipsius regni nostri salva remaneat et inconcussa; ne eciam unus actus consuetudinem induxisse videatur, non obstante eiuscemodi iuramentali deposicione, veluti abusivo modo facta in termino iudiciorum brevium primitus celebrandorum partes inter prenotatas ex novo iudicium fiat atque celebretur; et quidquid iuxta veterem legem ac consuetudinem approbatam ipsius regni nostri secundumque Deum et eius iusticiam in hac parte faciendum videbitur, id ratum maneat atque firmum.

Articles drawn up at the general assembly held in the town of Hatvan on the feast day of the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist, in the year of the Lord 1525.

1 Firstly, so that all decrees, both those previously passed and those which are yet to be drawn up and enacted, may be put into effect and carried out, let a reform be undertaken of the royal council, which to date has been largely in the hands of foreign nations; and, so that all matters before the council shall be handled with due consideration and carried into proper effect, and so that one member of the council will not fall to blaming another when disagreement or lack of harmony arises, as regularly happens, and thus cause the proper handling of the affairs of the kingdom to be disregarded: let His Majesty the king choose his high office holders and counsellors from among the lord prelates and barons, and as well, eight persons from among the nobles of this kingdom, according to the text of the general decree,¹ whom he shall keep at his royal court; and with these persons may His Majesty, before the holding of the general diet on the coming feast day of St George the Martyr,² graciously agree to decide and settle and put into effect all those matters due to be discussed in the royal council, even where the other lords prelate and barons may be at odds and unable to come to agreement; and as well, may he deign to bestow or transfer offices both at home and abroad and all others, and to take charge of and oversee the proper dispensation of the royal incomes in a manner conducive to the good of both the king himself and the kingdom; and generally may he graciously agree to put all things in order. The other prelates and barons will be free to attend the royal council as they ever have been and to debate and put forward their views, in keeping with their position; nevertheless, anything decided by His Majesty together with the aforementioned counsellors will remain fixed and unalterable, even if the other lords dissent. As well, foreigners shall not be allowed into the royal council. Indeed, we ask that their Majesties bestow all offices pertaining to the king or to the queen, namely the masters of the court, of the chamberlains, of the cellarers, of the butlers, of the horse, and of the doorkeepers of their majesties as well as castellans of all castles, the counts of the salt, gold and silver, of the thirtieth, the twentieth, the cementum, and the fiftieth,³ and the office of ispán, only on Hungarians of noble birth and not on foreigners, as is specified in the decree.⁴ And let those foreigners who for the moment hold any of these

¹ Cf 1498: 2; See András Kubinyi, “Beisitzer im königlichen Rat aus dem mittleren Adel in der Jagellonenzeit”, in: Idem, Stände und Ständestaat im spätmittelalterlichenn Ungarn, transl. T. Schäfer (Herne: Schäfer, 2011) pp. 233-52, who established that these noble council members had little if any influence on decision making.

² The diet, the last before the fall of the independent kingdom, was indeed opened on April 24, 1526. See 1526.

³ The income from the royal monopoly on salt and precious metals was one of the main revenues of the kingdom, see e.g. István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18. The fiftieth was a royal tax collected mainly from Romanians. Originally levied in kind on transhumance shepherds (based upon the number of sheep) in Wallachia but later raised from those settled in villages as well. Gradually it was transformed to a tax levied in cash. The thirtieth, in Transylvania the twentieth, was a custom’s duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. The cementum was an income from minting. In general, see János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter” in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347-87.

⁴ The ispán (comes) was the royally appointed head of the counties. By this time, the ispáns were mostly great lords and the actual administration was in the hands of their deputy, the alispán (vicecomes), frequently a offices, be deprived of those offices forthwith and with immediate effect. The same holds true for ecclesiastical benefices: namely, let their Majesties henceforth confer them not on foreigners but on Hungarians. And if the king does not wish to keep the seal of his signet ring, or the queen her seal, let them likewise deign to pass it to Hungarians and not to foreigners.

2 Also, let Fuggers and all foreign nations be dismissed and banished who openly plunder the resources of the kingdom and send the monies abroad, and let Hungarians be appointed in their place.⁵ However, if foreign nations, of whatever language, do wish to serve their Majesties and the kingdom, let them freely come and enlist at the customary rates of pay. In addition, let all Lutherans be banished from the kingdom; and wherever they are found, not only ecclesiastic but also secular persons will be free to burn them, their goods being turned over to the royal fisc and to lords of the land, wherever they may be found and punished.⁶

3 Then, that the stipends or salaries of Burgio⁷ and other foreign emissaries shall not be paid henceforth. Also, let all royal revenues, without any sort of obligations attached, be turned over into the hands of the Lord Treasurer right away and in fact.

4 Then, may the Royal Majesty deign without any delay to make to be established and restored the borders erected last year by the lord Stephen Báthori former palatine⁸ and destroyed again by the Cumans and the Jász; let the task being entrusted to one of the protonotaries⁹ according to the palatine's charter, and let the borders not yet erected be perambulated and erected anew.¹⁰

5 Then, that the recent seizings by the lord margrave¹¹ and other magnates be rectified by the royal majesty without delay even against the will of the occupiers, in such wise that the royal majesty deign to send out right away to every county in the four parts of the realm four masters retainer of the lord, but often "elected" by the nobles. Art. 24 suggests that the nobles of the county were to be given more say in their selection. The reference is to 1492:7 that repeats the exclusion of "foreigners" decreed many times before, ever since 1222.

⁵ ≈ 1524/5: 2. On the Fuggers in Hungary, see Peter Kalus, Die Fugger in der Slowakei (Augsburg: Wissner, 1999) esp. 71–154; on foreign investors in general, Krisztina Arany, "Foreign Business Interests in Hungary in the Middle Ages" in Laszloszky, ed. The Economy, pp. 491–508. In fact, the expulsion of the Fuggers brought the country's economy near bankruptcy.

⁶ This is the most radical decision about Protestants. On its background, see Markus Hein, "Maria von Habsburg, der ungarische Hof und die Reformation in Ungarn," in: Martina Fuchs and Orsolya Réthelyi, eds. Maria von Ungarn (1505-1558): Eine Renaissancefürstin (Münster: Aschendorf, 2007) pp. 261–72. In general, see also Zoltán Csepregi, "Reformation in Hungary: historiography, research problems, methodology" in: Temp tidskrift for historie 15 (2007) 135–58 with ample bibliography.

⁷ Cf. 1424/5: 3. On him, see Burgio, Giovanni Antonio, in: Dizionario biografico degli Italiani 15 (Rome 1972) pp. 913–7. Actually, his reports about Hungarian politics and warfare in the first decades of the sixteenth century are one of the best sources for the period; see Augustinus Theiner, Vetera monumenta historiam Hungariae sacram illustrantia II 1352–1526 (Rome 1860) pp. 676–802.

⁸ Stephen Bátori was ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower parts of Hungary; 1509–23, count palatine 1519–25; deposed at the Hatvan diet, reinstated and served 1526–30.

⁹ Protonotaries were practically trained lawyers in the royal courts, ever more taking over the administration of justice, see György Bónis, "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary." East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est, 4 (1977), 181–91, summarizing his major monograph on the subject.

¹⁰ The Cumans and the Jász (As, in fact Alans, called by the Biblical name Philistines in medieval Hungary), originally nomadic people, settled in Hungary in the thirteenth century (see Nora Berend, At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and "Pagans" in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), were by this time mostly agriculturalists, in good part subject peasants. Conflicts between the two groups, whose judge was the palatine ex officio, were recurrent.

¹¹ George of Brandenburg-Ansbach (1484–1543), was the most influential member of the Hungarian court, leader of what used to be seen as the "German party". Cf. 1524/5: 4.

protonotaries in company with the representative of the king's presence, the vice-palatine and the vice-judge of the court; and let the body of nobles, in the presence of the same lieutenant and vice-palatine and vice-judge of the court and protonotaries, choose two noblemen skilled in the law and of meritorious service, whomever they wish. And let it be the responsibility of these to rectify all the lands, woods, meadows, hayfields, fishponds, fishing places, villages and parts of villages that were seized and occupied by certain persons after the death of the serene prince the late lord King Mathias unjustly and unduly and outside the law, once they shall have established the true facts and the rightful owners, and immediately and forthwith return them to those whom they know they legally belong to, and also review and settle all acts of might.¹²

6 And may the king and the queen as well as the lords prelate and barons and nobles cause to be returned, immediately and in fact, all those tenants who after the uprising and sedition of the peasants were abducted or secretly and stealthily moved to their estates, according to the form and content of the decree passed in regard to the matter and through the aforementioned lieutenant, vice-palatine, vice-judge, master protonotaries and the two elected [nobles] in every county.¹³

7 And may the Royal Majesty deign to rectify the borders towards Moravia as well as Austria and Styria without any further delay.¹⁴

8 ≈ 1498: 31 *Prohibition of export of cattle and horses.*¹⁵

9 Further, let the thirtieth, which by custom used to be levied in Belgrade and Slankamen, be collected in Petrovardin, lest arms, salt, small boxes (sic !) or knives be exported to Turkey.¹⁶

10 Furthermore, it is universally accepted how much has been found wanting to date on the part both of the lord prelates and barons and the county nobles in the maintenance of military levies. So, to prevent any future failure or negligence in the upkeep of troops, but also so that neither noble nor commoner should suffer loss from them when they cross their lands, it has been decided that all the lords prelate and all men of the church and the barons and nobles whose holdings or financial position does not suffice for them to maintain fifty cavalrymen, whether (fully) armed or lightly armed, or hussars, are obliged to contribute military tax from their

¹² "Act of might" (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, "criminal cases" falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (incl. rape).

¹³ See 1514: 25. The removal of peasants—based on their "right of free movement" de iure abolished in 1514—was a recurrent problem and usually a complaint of the lesser nobles whose tenants were often lured or abducted by greater landlords; see briefly János M. Bak "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary (A Sketchy Outline)" in Paul Freedman and Monique Bourin, eds. Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion (Turnholt: Brepols, 2005; Medieval Texts and Cultures of Northern Europe 9), pp. 387–400. Cf. 1524/5: 8.

¹⁴ It is not known that there would have been any problem with these borders; cf. 1524/5: 9.

¹⁵ The repeated attempt of Hungarian kings to keep trading within the borders seems to have been in vain, as it is known that cattle was driven from the country as far as Alsace, Nuremberg, and Venice. In fact, cattle was the most important export commodity of the country in the later middle Ages and early modern times, practiced by the largest landholders and the king himself, see Ian Blanchard, "The Continental European Cattle Trades, 1400-1600," The Economic History Review, 39/3 (1986) 427-460, here 428–31.

¹⁶ Repeats 1524/5:7.

resources to a common war chest of the nobles of the county where their possessions lie. And in every county one man shall be chosen as captain among the nobles. He will have the responsibility, under most strict and solemn oath, first of all, to assess the wealth of all the lords and nobles lying in the county, and then to levy forces skilled in military arts and to keep them permanently on the borders as circumstances require (bearing in mind the instructions of his Royal Majesty and of the said royal counsellors); and he will place in the hands of the alispán a copy of the register of the census after a review of it has been held at the judicial seat. He will also make known to the nobles in writing the time of the levies on to the borders and the days they will take place, to make sure no excuse for skulduggery occurs in the enlisting or payment of the same. The nobles, for their part, will be required to state in their letters the precise number of men at arms that they intend to send to the royal captain-general responsible for those territories where the troops will be deployed, and likewise to inform the captain of the number of tenant plots of those lords who will be obliged under the aforementioned ordinance to maintain troops from their own resources so that the captain will then be in a position to inspect and review the said troops and make sure there are no shortcomings in them. And if they occasion any damages against any person in their passage, these will be compensated for and made good by the captain in all cases. And if the captain fails to do so [personally], he will be held to account and punished in keeping with the law. Furthermore, the captain and his officers will do their best to determine the greatest resources of the lords and nobles of the province, so that if the worst comes to worst and all the lords and nobles have to take to the field personally against the enemies of the realm, the captain will know how great the forces of the county are and how many troops he can call upon. The nobility too should be aware, each and every one, with what forces they are under obligation to take to the field and how many they must lead to war, in accordance with their resources, what the emergency demands, according to the determination of the same noble community, so that a common front is presented against the common foe and he is repelled with the aid of God. So in general, if there are any troops which the lords prelates and barons, and the royal counties owe, which they have still not sent, let them be sent to the border, the places assigned to them, and let them serve there, under pain of the punishment laid down in the general decree.¹⁷

11 Because frequently complaints are made by the lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons receiving tithes about the excessive burden of keeping troops, namely that they are forced to maintain troops beyond their obligation and beyond the size of their income for the defence of the realm, in order to eliminate these, in every county of the realm let so many honest and trustworthy nobles be elected by the community of nobles as there are county magistrates,¹⁸ according to the form and content of the decree of the said diet. They, together with the magistrates, after having sworn an oath, shall thoroughly assess the income of the same lord prelates and ecclesiastical persons receiving tithes and the number of their tenant peasants where it is right and proper and submit their calculations and numbers to the Royal Majesty and the lord councillors and assessors under their seals before the next feast of the blessed Martin bishop and confessor.¹⁹ Then, in the diet and general assembly held in the said way, the

¹⁷ Reference here and several times to the “general decree” are too vague to identify the exact paragraph every time. Most of the issues raised here have been treated, for example, in the dietal decision of 1518 at Bács, but also in major decrees of King Wladislas II.

¹⁸ There were usually four noble magistrates in every county; some larger ones had more, smaller ones less.

¹⁹ That is, 11 November 1526. Alas, by that time there was no factually reigning king or council after the troops to be maintained by them are to be justly and honestly defined according to their need, ability, and income as well as the number of their tenant peasants.²⁰ Meanwhile they are required to keep their troops for the defence of the realm as they were hitherto accustomed according to the form of the decree of the same diet and the register of the excellent prince the late lord Emperor and King Sigismund.²¹

12 Then, the patrons of churches and the guardians of wards shall not include among the own possessions the property of the churches or that of the wards, but these shall be added to the number of nobles and the goods and property rights of the cities recently acquired be added to the [contingents of the] counties for the maintenance of troops.

13 Then, may their majesties the king and queen deign to keep their *banderia*²² always ready by the reason of their dignity and their properties. The officers of the frontiers are likewise obliged to keep all their troops for the sake of their properties as well their office, as contained in the decree.

14 Then, places burnt down and laid waste by the Turks shall not be tithed. Freedmen and those who are fed and clad by their lords shall be released in this matter of the upkeep of troops. Cottars living in their own houses and having their own ploughlands or vineyards shall be tithed, lest the defence of the realm be diminished and the number of troops be wanting.²³

15 Then, that the Royal Majesty and the lords royal counsellors should immediately establish and set up a place (?) about the royal income, where and whence the officials receive their set salaries and nobody should henceforth touch these revenues, so that the officials of the [steward of] Buda be not forced to beg²⁴ and thus leave their offices empty; the other royal revenues and the servants of the royal court be so controlled that that squandering which has hitherto been done with the royal income cease. And that the royal treasurer and the steward of Buda are to be held to render appropriate account and calculations annually to the Royal Majesty and his lords counselors and assessors at the Lord's Epiphany or immediately disaster at Mohács on 29 August.

²⁰ Since the late fourteenth century, the so-called portalis militia (from porta=peasant plot) was to be mobilized according to the number of tenant peasants. Unclear, whether armed peasants or paid soldiers were foreseen. The ratio changed over times. See: András Borosy, "The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526," in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary. [East European Monographs, 104], (Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80.

²¹ See Propositio 1442/3. It is remarkable that that register remained a point of reference for three-quarters of a century. Closer to the decree's time, see 1498: 20–22

²² Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, 'banner') were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars).

²³ Cf. 1524/5: 8. The decline of the wealth and status of poor peasants and the landless cottars (zsellér) was explored in detail by István Szabó "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén"[Decline of tenant peasantry in the late Middle Ages], "In: Idem. Jobbágyok, parasztok. Budapest: Akadémiai, 1976, pp. 167–200. In fact, the legal category of inquilinus came to be divorced from its original meaning and some "cottars" became quite well off.

²⁴ Several foreign observers (such as Marino Sanuto in his Diarii) mention that the king's servants frequently had to ask for victuals on—not always repaid—credit from Buda merchants for the king's table. Details are listed in Vilmos Fraknói II. Lajos király számadási könyve 1525. jan. 12—jul. 16 [Account books of King Louis II, 12 Jan.–16 July, 1525] (Budapest: Akadémia, 1877) and Johann Christian Engel, Fragmentum libri rationarii super erogationibus aulae Regis Hungariae Ludovici II. (Monumenta Ungariae, Vienna 1809), summarized in József Főgel, II. Lajos udvartartása 1516-1526 [The court of Louis II] (Budapest: Hornyánszky, 1917), esp. pp. 125–50.

thereafter.²⁵

16 Then, that that the minting of the present money by henceforth ceased and the Royal Majesty should deign to have good money, as those minted at the beginning of the reign of His Majesty, minted.²⁶ Still, until the coming next feast of St Lawrence the Martyr already minted coins be circulated and accepted in the usual way for one good and old penny, but after the said feast only two. Nevertheless, in matters of things sold the Royal Majesty should make the earlier passed and announced ordinances observed. And if traders would act contrariwise, their saleable goods and merchandizes be confiscated by the local judges of which two parts go to the Royal Majesty in cities and the royal properties, in other properties to the lords of the land, and the third part to the judges and sworn burghers. Indeed, since all these present shortages and *caristia*²⁷ of goods for sale and merchandizes which oppresses this country comes and originates from the present new money that is being minted by many who mint this money, some by royal permission and some by their own rashness, the truth of the aforesaid has to be inquired into by the Royal Majesty and accounts rendered. Then those, who made money mint by royal will in the right weight of four lots, if they can give true account of it, be absolved. Those, however, who be found to have counterfeited those moneys and in three lots or otherwise minted less than four are to be obliged not only to give true account, but also have to render and refund the Royal Majesty all the profit they made by this falsification. Those, who minted by their own rashness, be, as contained in the decretum, condemned to eternal infidelity.²⁸ Furthermore, those who would henceforth import moneys minted or made by foreigners outside of the country and can be caught, be right away and in fact burnt and burnt to ashes and the minted moneys confiscated. Foreigners²⁹ and their agents, if apprehended in this country, be punished in the same way. In order to avoid fraud and cheating in things sold and bought, everywhere in this kingdom the one and same measure be applied for sale and purchase of grain or wheat and the educillatio of wine namely a *cubulus*³⁰ and the quarter or pint of Buda. Moreover, this measure is to be restored to its prior and ancient sate and form that recently has been diminished and be distributed by His Majesty to all counties and free cities of this realm. Prices, though, are to be set and limited not equally but according to local needs, namely as goods increase or diminish becoming dearer or cheaper.

17 Then, may the Royal Majesty graciously deign to have the testament of lord George, archbishop of Esztergom executed, and to pay his retainers, and have the moneys and other things given and left by him transferred to the chapter of Esztergom (to pay) for eternal ²⁵ We admit not being able to exactly render this article in English.

²⁶ See: Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 295–308. Lot was a medieval and modern unit of mass (weight) from 12.5 to 15.5 gr

²⁷ The word means a family banquet celebrated in Antiquity for settling disputes. It is either a scribal error or an unusual use for something else.

²⁸ See, e.g. 1492: 41 and many times elsewhere.

²⁹ The Latin has the word otherwise used for settlers, residents of the country. Here it seems to mean foreigners.

³⁰ It was a recurrent attempt in all countries of medieval Europe to introduce uniform weights and measures, which did not work out before very modern times (for Hungary, see e. g. Sigismund’s urban decree, 15 April 1405/I:1). A cubulus Budensis [Hungarian köböl] was—according to Emma Lederer (“Régi magyar űrmértékek” [Old Hungarian measures of volume] Századok 57, 1923/24, 135–42)—ca. 80 litres. Others estimate it at 64 litres. Another, widely used cubulus “of Košice,” was larger.

masses.³¹

18 That the legacy of money and other things of the late most reverend Thomas,³² and the abovementioned George and Gregory,³³ archbishops of the churches of Esztergom and Kalocsa, as well as of Francis of Várda, bishop of Transylvania³⁴ be presently inquired into and transferred to the Royal Majesty for the needs of the realm.

19 Then, that gold and silver be in no ways taken out of the country, as laid down in the lesser decretum and under pain of the punishment noted there.³⁵

20 Then, that the nobles of the lower regions, especially of the twelve counties from Szerém to Pozsega, shall be maintained in their liberties according to the decretum and their income from the deserted places be restored.³⁶

21 Then, that henceforth cases treated in the royal court in the usual manner of the realm be not converted to cases of honor.³⁷

22 Then, that short court sessions be held within a time limit set by his majesty in the manner observed hitherto, however that the cheating and fraud that has become customary between the parties and litigants through inhibitions and peregrinations shall henceforth cease, so that just and correct inhibitions should be allowed, as it is also contained in the decree. Yet, those who were present in the court of justice or pursued [legally] others in other cases or responded to the others' action shall not be granted inhibition nor shall inhibition be allowed or taken into account. Prorogation on the grounds of peregrination, inasmuch as peregrination is undertaken for salvation and not for fraudulent causes, will be absolutely disqualified and totally denied.³⁸

23 Then, that all the decreta of the kingdom be edited into one volume of decrees by the royal councillors, the sworn assessors of the law courts, and the protonotaries before the next general diet; and in the meantime let the laws and rights of the realm be reread and revised afresh and once revised let them be confirmed by the royal majesty in priviledial form at that diet.³⁹

³¹ George Szatmári was bishop of Veszprém 1499–1501, of Oradea 1501–1505, of Pécs 1505–1521, archbishop of Esztergom 1522–1524, royal secretary 1494–1499, secret chancellor 1499–1521, and arch-chancellor 1521–1524.

³² Thomas Bakócz of Erdőd, was archbishop of Esztergom 1497–1521, cardinal priest of the title St Martin in Montibus, patriarch of Constantinople, legate a latere; his estates were regarded to be most valuable. At his death, 41 000 florins were given right away to the king, the rest of his silver and other treasures sold out in a hurry and reportedly for rather low prices.

³³ Gregory Frankapan was archbishop of Kalocsa 1504–20.

³⁴ Francis Kiszárdai of Várda, was bishop of Vác 1509–13, of Transylvania 1513–24, and secret chancellor.

³⁵ See 1498:31

³⁶ The reference may be to the Slavonian articles of 1492, but the aim of the article is unclear.

³⁷ Little is known of the chivalresque court of honor, apparently in existence ever since the fourteenth century, with very different procedure from the other royal courts of justice. See in general: <https://www.scribd.com/document/340202908/Kurcz-Agnes-Lovagi-Kultura-Magyarorszagon-a-13-14-Szazadban> [Chivalresque culture in Hungary in the 13th-14th C.] (by subscription, free trial).

³⁸ The entire paragraph is unclear, especially the last sentence that should state rather the opposite.

³⁹ Even though this demand was voiced many times before, it is strange here, as the great collection of customary law by Stephen Werbőczy, the Tripartitum, although not formally approved by the king, was published several years earlier, in 1517. A collection of statute law, the Corpus Iuris Hungarici was not completed for another century and a half, published first in 1584; see Andor Csizmadia, "Previous edition of the laws of Hungary," in Decreta regni mediaevalis Hungariae &c., eds. J. M. Bak, G. Bónis, and J. R. Sweeney vol. 1, ed. 2 (Schlacks: Idyllwild 1999) pp. xvii–xxxiii. See also below, among the Studies to medieval

24 Then, that the royal majesty may deign to confer by his royal authority the honors of ispán on suitable and deserving persons and on those who are well regarded and accepted by the nobles on the request of the community of nobles, lest those nobles suffer by being oppressed and deprived of their rights by those (ispáns) who are hostile and displeasing to them.⁴⁰

25 *Repeats in essence 1351: 8 and 15 and 1435: 21.*⁴¹

26 Then, since every occasion of impediment which had caused the suspension of the payment of their tithe to the lords prelate and other ecclesiastical persons before the present diet has now been removed thanks to the glorious guidance of God, therefore all tithes of the lords prelates and other ecclesiastical persons should be freely and peacefully rendered and paid in the previously usual way/in the same way as hitherto customary.⁴²

27 *The royal incomes confiscated from the Zápolya brothers, who had them under their control for long are to be recompensed from the escheated goods of Lawrence of Újlak/Ilok.*⁴³

28 Then, that on the coming feast of bishop Martin the Confessor a hundred pennies making one old florin be assessed by royal tax assessors and in the way and mode as it was usual for the upkeep of troops including the chamber's profit⁴⁴ of his majesty collected on the goods of the royal and the reginal majesties as well as all lords prelate, barons and nobles of the realm; of which seventy-five shall be given and paid to his royal majesty and the remaining twenty-five to the queen for the support and maintenance of the banderia of the royal majesties.⁴⁵ Where, however, old and ancient money cannot be paid, let two of the present moneys be paid and accepted.

29 Repeats Art. 23 in a more verbose form.

30 Last year all the lords and nobles beseeched the king and issued articles calling on His Majesty to condemn as traitors those who had allowed Belgrade and Sabač to fall, in accordance with the relevant prescriptions set out in those articles, and accordingly condemned for treason the lord Francis of Hédervár, erstwhile ban of the said castle of Belgrade, and grant his goods and rights of possession to other persons of trust in perpetuity.⁴⁶ Nevertheless as His Majesty has pardoned all those others who were culpable for their part in the loss of the said

Hungarian laws.

⁴⁰ The reference to the approval of the local nobility in the choice of the ispán was not been decreed ever before even though it came to be practice gradually.

⁴¹ See Magdolna Szilágyi "Mobility, Roads and Bridges in Medieval Hungary", in Laszloszky, ed. The Economy, pp. 64–80.

⁴² Due to conflicts between the clergy and the lay lords, the diet of 1524/5 suspended the payment of the tithe. The matter was settled at the diet of Hatvan.

⁴³ Repeats 1524/5: 33. John Zápolya/Szapolyai (c. 1490–1540) was voivode of Transylvania from 1510, king of Hungary from 1526; his brother, George was ispán in perpetuity of Co. Szepes and fell in the battle of Mohács as one of the army's commanders. Duke Lawrence of Újlak/Ilok (d. 1524) was the son of King Nicholas of Bosnia, ban of Mačva 1477–92, judge royal 1518–24.

⁴⁴ The "chamber's profit" was a direct tax, originally replacing royal income from the re-issue of money. On its origins, see Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpáadian Period" in: Laszlovszky, ed., The Economy, pp. 255–64. It became usual to include it in the more or less extraordinary taxes for defense.

⁴⁵ Another measure the realization of which was cut short by the defeat at Mohács.

⁴⁶ On this, see Gusztáv Wenzel, "A Hédervári Ferenc jószágai fölötti per és ítélet 1523-ban. Adalékul Magyarország azonkori köz- és jogtörténetéhez" [The trial and sentence in the lawsuit regarding the goods of F. H. in 1523. An addition to Hungary's legal history of those times]. Magyar Történelmi Tár 6 (1859), 3–82.

castles, may he, heeding the supplication of the said lords and nobles, deign to also pardon the aforesaid Francis of Hédervár for the loss [in] a violent siege of Belgrade and to number him among his friends, and to grant and have restored to him all his possessions, save the castle of Podvrško⁴⁷ the possession of which it is said the said Francis had sold and relinquished some time ago.

⁴⁷ Hung.: Podvarsa, was a country house rather than a castle in Co. Pozsega, now in Croatia.

1526

April 24 (St George's) armed diet—the last of the independent kingdom of Hungary—opened at Rákos field [ended around May 5]. The decisions and elections of the Hatvan diet (1525 Hatvan) were cancelled, Stephen Werbőczy and his father-in-law, Michael Somi charged with infidelity.

None of the laws and dietal decisions of the reign of Louis II survived in an original, some (e.g. 1516) not at all. The age of the existing copies in private collections is difficult to decide, most of them are from the late sixteenth century. Some (or parts of them) are also known from reports of ambassadors (Marino Sanuto from Venice, various emissaries from Poland). The reliability and date of the codices is discussed by Dezső Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története II. Lajos korában [History of Hungarian diets in the age of Louis II] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1909) pp. 225–8.

MSS: Seven manuscripts: a contemporary copy in the city archives of Košice, No. 19205 [Ko]; Copies in: Codex Nádasdy, Budapest University Library Cod. G. 39, foll. 374r–378r [N]; Budapest University Library Cod. G. 40 [G40]; Cod. Rep. 71, No. 13 of the Esterházy archives, pp. 339–48 [C]; the Major Esterházy codex foll. 195r–199r [EM]; the Minor Esterházy codex foll. 164v–166r [Em], and Codex Festetich (OSZK: Fol. Lat. 4355), pp. 625–31 [F].

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1 (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) [=MTvt/CJH], pp. 836–53; Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története pp. 266–9 [part.].

LIT: Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések története pp. 104–10.

Articuli in dieta sancti Georgii martyris per dominos prelatos et barones ac regnicolas anno Domini 1526. oblatis et per regiam maiestatem roborati et confirmati.ⁱ

I. Item, quod universi domini prelati et barones ac regnicole in presenti dieta generali festi beati Georgii martyris in campo Rakos celebrata unanimi consensu concluderunt et regie maiestati supplicarunt, ut maiestas sua dignaretur auctoritate et potestate sua, quam habet, uti omniaque ad gubernacionem regni pertinencia maturo consilio agere et administrare, tam illa, que ad proventus sue maiestatis bene requirendos at ampliandos ac recte dispensandos, quam omnia alia, que ad defensionem et libertatem et alias necessitates regni spectant.

II. Item,ⁱⁱ cum ultra electionem palatini, que per maiestatem regiam et dominos prelatos ac barones, necnon universos regnicolas iuxta formam decreti communiter fieri debet, electio omnium aliorum officialium suorum, quocunque nomine vocentur, ad maiestatem suam pertineat, poterit maiestas sua vel retinere officiales modernos, vel alios pro arbitrio suo, dum voluerit, constituere.

III. Item, quia vicio et incuria officialium sue maiestatis non parve dissipacionesⁱⁱⁱ evenire solent, que ut deinceps evitentur et cessent, statutum est, ut statim eligatur per regiam maiestatem unus probus et industrius, iustusque et constans thesaurarius, qui omnia montana, exceptis fodinis Bistriciensibus, cuius arenda per annum durabit, cameras salium et tricesimas, vigesimas, quinquagesimas, cementum, cusiones monetarum, generaliter vero omnes proventus regios teneat, gubernet et dirigat ad commodum sue maiestatis, quem regia maiestas, quo fiat securior in suo officio et constancior in proventuum administracione, assecurat usque ad dietam festi sancti Georgii martyris in tertia revolucionem annuali celebrandam, et eciam ulterius, si maiestati regie placuerit, et si ille bene servierit, ut in suo officio non turbabitur. Et huiusmodi thesaurarius regius super eo iuramentum prestare teneatur, quod universos regios proventus de manibus quorumcunque cum auxilio regie maiestatis sine favore extorquebit suisque manibus applicabit, riteque et commode dispensabit, neminique dissipacionem indulgebit, et si qui forent dissipatores, regie maiestati et consiliariis manifestabit, nihilque indignum cuiquam concedet, sed omnia, que perperam agentur, regie maiestati et consiliariis significare curabit.

IV. Item,^{iv} ut idem thesaurarius ante omnia provideat castris finitimis, et mox illa tenentibus solutionem impendere servientibusque confiniorum preter omnem moram et dilacionem ⁱ EM. add. in campo Rakos; Em. F. N. Ko. habent titulum: Articuli diete sancti Georgii in Rakos anni 1526.

ⁱⁱ Ko. habet articulum: Item, quod maiestas sua eligat tam thesaurarium, quam capitaneum generalem talem, qui maiestati sue placuerit et videbitur.

ⁱⁱⁱ E. Ko. N. dispensaciones; Ko. add. in proventibus sue maiestatis.

^{iv} Ko. habet textum: Insuper idem thesaurarius provideat castris finitimis, ad quorum provisionem, si alii proventus sue maiestatis non sufficerent, assignet subsidium per regnicolas maiestati sue oblatum.

satisfactionem dare debeat et teneatur. Ubi autem alii proventus sue maiestatis non sufficerent, assignet subsidium per regnicolas sue maiestati oblatum.

V. Item, quod thesaurarius provideat de his, cum quibus maiestas sua iuxta desiderium regnicolarum banderium suum levare et alia ad defensionem regni atque eciam ad necessitates curie sue pertinencia disponere possit.

VI. Item, quod de omnibus proventibus regiis et dissipacionibus in eisdem factis veritas inquiratur, et quicumque reus fuerit repertus, iuxta sua demerita sine ullo favore, iure tamen et iusticia mediante puniatur.

VII. Item, ut idem thesaurarius iuxta presentis temporis exigenciam, ubi cura expeditionis negligi non debet, eligat probos et fideles factores ad sua officia et presertim, qui apparatus expeditionis sollicitent et nazados et aliasque naves fabricare, reformationemque ingeniorum globorumque et plumborum accaliorum belli seriem tangencium provisionem continuare debeant.

VIII. Item, ut maiestas regia preparet se ad expeditionem, ita ut maiestas sua banderium suum erigat et non saltem gentes suas, quibus iuxta contenta decreti tenentur, sed quanto maiorem et ampliorem gencium numerum secundum sufficienciam et quantitatem proventuum suorum potest, in promptu habeat.

IX. Item prelati quoque et barones ultra numerum gencium suarum, quas iuxta contenta decreti debent conservare, imo eciam pociores nobilium pro conservacione patrie onus belli, quo maiori poterunt apparatu, curent in se assumere, ac insuper debeant una cum tota nobilitate viritim insurgere et cum regia maiestate pariter hosti tanto proxime occurrere.

X. Item, quod universi eciam rustici^v per singula capita parati esse debeant, et si extrema necessitas postulaverit, ac maiestas regia mandaverit, per singula capita, vel si maiestas sua voluerit, quinta eorum pars bene armata insurgere et ad loca per maiestatem suam deputanda convenire debeant et teneantur; per singula tamen capita rustici non leventur, nisi in extrema necessitate.

XI. Item limitandi sunt universi domini prelati, barones et nobiles in hac ultima necessitate, iuxta eorum facultates, non quidem more solito, sed urgente necessitate, in tenendis armigeris, huzaronibus, pixidariis atque ingeniis et illorum attinenciis, aliisque omnibus bellicis apparatus, ut quo maiore poterunt, ut premissum est, curent levari apparatu.

XII. Item, ut constituciones Transsylvanienses de modo exercituandi perlegantur, et ubi modus ille bonus fore videbitur, observetur. De dominis eciam Sclavonie idem est sciendum.

^v C. rustici universi.

XIII. Item, quod preterea maiestas regia eligat aliquos ex ordine militari rei bellice et militaris discipline peritos, cum quibus sua maiestas de omnibus ad expeditionem pertinentibus tractet et consultet.

XIV. Item sollicitandi sunt tam sanctissimus dominus noster, quam alii principes Christiani pro auxilio contra hostes mittendo.

XV. Item, quia amissores castrorum finitimorum impuniti remanserunt, unde etiam plurima castra finitima perierunt, propterea statutum est, ut amissores castrorum finitimorum iuxta contenta decreti puniantur, ut alii finitima tenentes exinde admoniti fidelius et fervencius castra ipsa finitima studeant custodire; et amissoribus castrorum finitimorum maiestas regia contra decreti contenta gratiam facere non possit, vel si fecisset, nullius sit vigoris, sed potius eosdem iuxta contenta decreti puniri faciat.

XVI. Item, quoniam autem propter continuam dietarum celebrationem pauperes nobiles adeo impensis exhausti sunt, ut eorum multi propter nimias expensas bona sua impignorantes^{vi} in perpetuum deveherint rusticitatem, ideo statutum est, ut amodo deinceps non nisi magna urgente necessitate extra solitum diete terminum ad conveniendum in unum cogantur.

XVII. Item, quia dieta Hatvaniensis contra mandata regie maiestatis et libertatem regni extitit celebrata, prout etiam sua maiestas per suas literas superinde ad omnes comitatus datas certificare nos dignata est, statuimus, ut nullius sit vigoris et firmitatis, imo si ex ipsa congregacione aliquis defectus in detrimentum auctoritatis sue maiestatis ac libertatis regni secutus fuisset, maiestas sua una cum consilio suo reformare dignetur.

XVIII. Item, ex quo generalis expedicio absque generali capitaneo fieri nequit, maiestas sua regia eligat unum vel duos generales capitaneos, qui ad huiusmodi expeditionem administrandam fiant idonei.

XIX. Item de illis, qui res Bohemorum nuperrime ante castrum sue maiestatis diripuerunt, veritas inquiratur et iuxta eorum demerita illi puniantur; et eisdem Bohemis de ablatis rebus satisfactio impendatur.

XX. Item, quod octave maiores et minores iuxta contenta decreti quondam Mathie regis bone memorie suo statuto termino^{vii} semper celebrentur et durent iuxta contenta decreti quondam Wladislai regis. Item breves brevium super quinque casibus et transmissionales vigesimo die festi beati Jacobi incipiantur et continuo celebrentur. Cause vero factum iurium possessionariorum impignoraticiorum concernentes in termino celebracionis brevium iudiciorum semper iudicentur.

^{vi} C. impignorando.

^{vii} F. G40. tempore.

XXI. Item, ut solum maiestas regia et nemo dominorum prelatorum preter simplicem canonicatum beneficium conferendi habeat facultatem, non tamen externis, sed Hungaris et corone Hungarie subiectis.

XXII. Item, ut palatinus modernus et eciam futurus in iudiciis et consilio et aliis eciam omnibus, que ad officium suum pertinent, tractare et execucionem facere valeat. Statutum est denique, ut amodo deinceps non per tumultum vel alia via, et racione simplici, sed iuridice officium palatinatus auferatur, et pro tali quidem crimine, ut non saltem officio, sed et capite privetur; alias duret semper ipsum palatinatus officium vita comite. Et superinde regia maiestas literas suas dare dignetur, quas penes sacram coronam conservandas locari faciat, ne quis in futurum tumultuose contra palatinum invehi audeat.^{viii}

XXIII. Item, quia solent nonnulli dominorum sub nomine iuris patronatus ecclesiarum bona abbatum et religiosorum, fratrum atque monialium, tempore connumeracionis pecuniarum exercitualium inter bona sua facere connumerari, unde stipendarii comitatum in plerisque comitatibus essent diminuti; igitur statutum est, ut omnia huiusmodi religiosorum bona amodo deinceps in medium comitatus connumerentur, ut exinde numerus stipendiariorum augeatur, et nullus dominorum pretextu iuris patronatus huiusmodi ecclesie bona pro se connumerari facere audeat, exceptis huiusmodi beneficiis, que de bonis et hereditatibus dominorum essent fundata et excerpta.

XXIV. Item, quod reginalis maiestas, prout eciam ex sua gracia regnicolis se facturam obtulit, officia sua, quocunque nomine censeantur, Hungaris et quidem personis benemeritis iuxta contenta decreti distribuere dignetur.

XXV. Item, ut dominus cancellarius curet universas literas regias ita extradare, ut unas contra alias, prout hactenus consuetum fuit, contra regni consuetudinem nemini dare debeat.

XXVI. Item, ut omnes litere obligatorie et que contra libertatem regni externis nacionibus date essent, nullius sint vigoris et firmitatis, et de cetero sua maiestas tales literas nemini concedere dignetur.

XXVII. Item, ut maiestas sua, sicut ore suo respondit suis fidelibus regnicolis, literas proscriptionales contra Stephanum Werbewczy et Michaelem Zoby, suos infideles iubeat extradari, et ipsos proscriptos iuxta eorum demerita puniri mandet.^{ix}

^{viii} Ko. add. Ad quem articulum licet maiestas regia consenserit, requisivit tamen tam dominos prelatos, quam barones, ne quid tale a se peterent, quod esset vel a libertate et ab antiquo ac comprobata consuetudine regni vel eciam a decreto eiusdem regni alienum.

^{ix} Ko. loco et ipsos ... mandet add. Iuxta eorum demerita puniri non negligantur.

XXVIII. Item, ut quilibet dominorum et nobilium non banderiatu, qui ad minus quinquaginta equites ratione bonorum suorum tenere non posset, pecunias exercitiales in medium nobilium illius comitatus, ubi bona sua habet, dare sit adstrictus.

XXIX. Item metas Hungarie cum Moravis et Austrialibus regia maiestas rectificare et castra illa impignorata, ad quorum redemptionem per quondam dominum Georgium archiepiscopum Strigoniensem notabilis quedam summa pecuniarum est legata, maiestas sua redimere dignetur.

XXX. Item, ut sua maiestas metas per dominum palatinum inter Cumanos et Philisteos superioribus annis erectas et tandem per officiales maiestatis sue distractas de novo erigere faciat et nihilominus in illis locis, in quibus adhuc non esset revisio facta, dignetur maiestas sua debitam fieri facere revisionem et metarum rectificationem.

XXXI. Item, ut statim universi domini et comitatus gentes suas in pleno numero iuxta contenta decreti conservare et iuxta mandatum regie maiestatis ad loca necessaria bono modo armatas expedire et absque mora destinare debeant, ut capitaneum sue maiestatis audiant illique obediant.^x

XXXII. Item, ut gentes dominorum baronum sine heredibus decedencium ratione bonorum eorundem illi, apud quos ipsa eadem bona habentur, iuxta contenta decreti conservare sint adstricti.

XXXIII. Item, quod cum maiestatis sue regie sint consiliarii domini prelati et barones, est in arbitrio maiestatis sue retinere apud se, quos maiestas sua voluerit, tamen maiestas sua eligat etiam octo ex nobilibus et regnicolis, qui consilio maiestatis sue intersint.

XXXIV. Item, quibus litere aliquae sub sigillo Stephani Werbewczy titulo palatinali sunt emanate, ex quo idem ipse Werbewczy contra auctoritatem sue maiestatis et antiquam libertatem ac consuetudinem regni per apertam factionem in ipso conventu Hathvaniensi contra mandatum regie maiestatis celebrato se in palatinum erexerat et ex eo pretextu aliis etiam demeritis suis ita exigentibus sit nota infidelitatis iure mediante iuxta contenta decreti condemnatus, ne tamen ex hoc iura aliquorum minui contingat, propterea statutum est, ut huiusmodi literas, in quantum eodem rite et legitime existunt emanate, dominus Stephanus de Bathor palatinus sine ulla solutione pecuniaria roborare expedireque et extradare faciat.

XXXV. Item, quia dicuntur aliqui dominorum tales prerogativas habere, ut coram comitibus parochialibus in causis contra eos motis vel movendis iuri adstare nollent, dignetur^{xi} regia maiestas huiusmodi literas sive prerogativas cassare et abolere.

^x Ko. add. articulum. Item maiestas sua presertim propter tempora periculosa voluit, quod aliqua pars dominorum consiliariorum de utraque ordine, tam prelatorum, quam baronum apud maiestatem suam remaneat, cum quibus de negociis occurrentibus et de periculis regno imminentibus propulsandis consultaret. Debet etiam facultatem (dare) regnicolis, ut si vellent, aliquos de medio ipsorum eligerent in consilium maiestatis sue admittendos, tales tamen, qui melius servicio essent addicti.

^{xi} Ko. loco dignetur ... abolere add. que iuxta sententiam dominorum aboleantur.

XXXVI. Item, ut maiestas sua regia in eodem pondere et liga bonas monetas cudi faciat, sicut illo tempore, quo cuprea moneta cudi incepta^{xii} est, cudebantur; et cupream istam monetam ad cameras per suum thesaurarium cambiri faciat, ita ut tribus cupreis monetis una bona moneta cambiatur. Et locus campsonis fiat Bude, et nemo alter preter thesaurarium, quicumque ille sit, cambire valeat, et thesaurarius regius super eo, ut monetas ipsas iuxta ordinationem regnicolarum et dominorum ab omnibus cambire non permittet, iuramentum prestare debet. In emendis et vendendis rebus quibuscunque usque ad festum beati Jacobi apostoli nunc venturum per duos quilibet accipere debeat; elapso autem ipso festo nemo hominum hac ipsa moneta amplius uti presumat, nihilominus tamen thesaurarius teneatur, quousque ipsa cuprea moneta duraverit, semper cambire. Ubi vero ad ipsam campsonem portarentur alique pecunie que extra veram, ligam cuse viderentur, campsor huiusmodi monetarum recognoscat, quis illas cudi fecerit, et talis per maiestatem regiam iuxta contenta decreti puniantur, nihilominus tamen a campso recipiantur.

XXXVII. Item,^{xiii} quoniam autem in Bohemia, Slesia et Moravia monete cupree libere cudebantur, ideo si qui de huiusmodi regnis externis cupreas monetas induxerint vel induxisse comperti fuerint, ablati prius ab eisdem universis ipsorum bonis, capite plectantur.

XXXVIII. Item simili pena puniantur et illi, qui extra cameram regiam cambire vel ex hoc regno huiusmodi cupreas monetas educere deprehensi fuerint.

XXXIX. Item babka, cruciferi alieque monete externe in hoc regno currant durante generali expeditione, et amplius nemo huiusmodi monetis externis uti presumat.

XL. Item propter necessitates instantes et pericula imminencia statutum est, ut cum subsidium unius floreni per regnicolas anno preterito maiestati sue oblatum nondum sit eciam pro media parte exactum, ideo de omnibus comitatibus et de omnium bonis, ex quibus illud nondum esset exactum, extunc sine mora exigatur et ad manus thesaurarii regii fideliter administretur. Et ultra hec, ut melius possit regiis ac regni necessitatibus et defensionem subveniri, obtulerunt iidem domini prelati et barones ac regnicole se de singulis jobagionum suorum portis^{xiv} singulos quingenta denarios bone monete incluso lucro camere, ad festum beati Martini^{xv} proxime venturum daturos.

^{xii} E. loco sicut ... incepta est add. in qua priores bone monete; Ko. loco quo cuprea ... incepta est add. genitoris sui pie memorie.

^{xiii} Ko. loco art. add. Item, quia regnicole multum instanter egerunt apud maiestatem regiam de fodinis Bistriciensibus de manibus Fucarorum auferendis, allegantes plurimas causas, quare id fieri deberet, ideo maiestas sua volens et subditis suis morem gerere et promissionem suam literis suis mediantibus factam non violare, decrevit fodinas ipsas infra unius anni integri revolutionem a Fucaris illis non auferre, verum contenta est ad preces regnicolarum suorum de fodinis ipsis post elapsum annum id facere, quod maiestati sue et huic regno erit utilius, et quod per eosdem regnicolas suos est petatum.

^{xiv} Ko. singulis eorum jobagionibus.

^{xv} F. add. episcopi et confessoris.

8 May 1526

Articles presented at the diet at St George's by the lord prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm¹ in 1526 and confirmed and approved by the royal majesty.

1. Then, all the lord prelates, barons and gentlemen of the realm decided by common consent and humbly submitted to the royal majesty at their present diet held on the field of Rákos² on the feast of St George the Martyr [1] that His Majesty shall deign to use the authority and power he has and do with mature deliberation all that concerns the governance of the realm, the proper collection, increase, and correct spending of His Majesty's revenues as well as everything else pertaining to the defense, liberty, and other needs of the realm.

2. Then, because, except for the election of the palatine—which, according to the decree has to be done jointly by the royal majesty, the lord prelates and barons and all the gentlemen of the realm³—the choice of all his other officeholders, by whatever name they are called, pertains to the royal majesty, [1] His Majesty can either retain his present officeholders or name any others at his pleasure.

3. Then, because the fault and carelessness of His Majesty's officials usually results in much waste, therefore, so that this be avoided and cease henceforth, it has been decided [1] that an honest, industrious, and just and steadfast treasurer shall be right away chosen by the royal majesty⁴ who shall hold, manage and administer for the benefit of the royal majesty all mines (except the mines of Banská Bistrica, the farm of which lasts for a year), chambers of salt, thirtieths, twentieths, fiftieths, arbitrage of gold exchange, mints, and in general all royal revenues⁵; [2] and in order that

¹ The term regnicola (verbatim: inhabitants of the kingdom) was used in medieval legal documents for the members of the enfranchised noble nation; we translate it as gentlemen of the realm.

² For the location "Rákos", see János M. Bak and András Vadas, "Synods and Diets in Buda and Its Environs," in: Balázs Nagy, Martyn Rady, Katalin Szende and András Vadas eds. Medieval Buda in Context (Leiden-Boston: Brill 2016) pp. 322-44.

³ The count palatine was by the later Middle Ages the highest officer of the realm, deputy of the king, judge and commander of the army. The claim of the assembled nobility to the right to "elect" him was raised as early as the fourteenth century but became accepted practice only in the sixteenth.

⁴ In 1518, the diet decided about a financial plan that would have given the power of finances to elected officials (see 1518 Bács:1) but this plan failed quite soon. See György Bónis, "Ständisches Finanzwesen in Ungarn im frühen 16. Jahrhundert." In: Nouvelles Études historiques. Budapest: Akadémiai, 1965, vol. 1, pp. 83–103. In 1526, Elek (Alexej) Thurzó (c. 1490–1543), one of the financial advisors of Louis II accused of having introduced the failed moneta nova, was given the office of treasurer.

⁵ The thirtieth was by that time a custom's duty on goods imported or exported; at the Transylvanian border it was the twentieth. The fiftieth was a tax rendered originally by Wlach/Romanian shepherds, probably in kind, by this time a direct tax on members of that minority. The income from the salt mines was one of the major revenues of the crown. See: János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter", in R. Schneider, ed., Das

he be more steadfast in his office and in the administration of the revenues, the royal majesty shall assure him that he will not be disturbed in his office until the diet to be held in three year's time at St George's, or, if it pleases His Majesty and he serves well, even further. [3] And this royal treasurer has to promise under oath that he will with the help of the royal majesty exact the royal revenues from the hands of all without favor, administer them properly and justly and permit no one any waste. Should there be any spendthrifts, he will report them to the royal majesty and the counselors, and he shall not allow anyone to do anything unworthy, but will take care to report to the royal majesty and the counselors anything incorrect.

4. Then, that before all else, this treasurer shall provide for the border castles, [1] and then shall and be obliged to pay the salaries of those holding them and give satisfaction to those serving on the border without delay and hesitation. [2] Where the other incomes of His Majesty do not suffice, he shall assign them the subsidy offered by the gentlemen of the realm to His Majesty.

5. Then, that the treasurer shall according to the wish of the gentlemen of the realm provide for those things that His Majesty needs for fielding his *banderium*⁶ and other things that are necessary for the defense of the country and the needs of his court.

6. Then, that the truth shall be found out about all the royal revenues and the wasting of these, [1] and whoever should be found guilty shall be punished according to his demerits, without any favor, but by way of law and justice.⁷

7. Then, that the treasurer shall, according to the needs of the time when the management of the campaign should not be neglected, choose honest and faithful agents for their offices, [1] especially such as will be busy about campaign equipment and who should build sloops and other boats, and maintain the repair of war machines and the provision of cannon balls and bullets pertaining to the course of war.

8. Then, that the royal majesty shall ready himself for the campaign, [1] so that he field his banderium and not only those troops that he is held to keep ready by the contents of the decree, but as many and more as he is able to according to the sufficiency and quantity of his revenues.

spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347- 87 and István Draskóczy, "Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages," in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

⁶ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, 'banner') were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons, and the prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Those obliged to field banderia were called banderial lords.

⁷ Charges against royal treasurers, such the converted Jew Imre Szerencsés or Elek Thurzó were raised and dropped by the nobility at various diets.

9. Then, the prelates as well as the barons shall maintain troops beyond those they are obliged to hold by the contents of the decree; moreover, the more substantial nobles shall, to preserve the fatherland, also shoulder the burden of the war with as many as they can; [1] and, furthermore, they must rise up personally together with the entire nobility and oppose such a great enemy with the royal majesty as fast as they can.

10. Then, that also all peasants must be ready one by one; [1] and if extreme necessity demands and the royal majesty so orders, one by one, or if His Majesty so wishes, the fifth part of them, shall rise well armed⁸ and assemble wherever His Majesty designates; [2] nevertheless, peasants shall not be mobilized one by one except in extreme danger.

11. Then, all the lord prelates, barons, and nobles are in this dire necessity to be assessed according to their resources—however, not in the usual way but according to urgent need—how many soldiers, hussars, musketeers, and engines and their equipment as well as other necessities of war they have to field—so that they may all the better (as said above) be ready to join the campaign prepared.

12. Then, that the Transylvanian constitutions on military service shall be examined; and if they seem good, followed.⁹ [1] The same is to be done regarding the lords from Slavonia.¹⁰

13. Then, that besides this His Majesty shall choose some men from the soldiering order, experts in matters of war and military science, with whom he shall discuss and take counsel about everything pertaining to the campaign.

14. Then, both our Holy Father and other Christian princes are to be lobbied to send help against the enemy.

15. Then, because those who lost border castles have remained unpunished, on account of which even more border castles have been lost, [1] we therefore decided that those who lost border castles shall be punished according to the contents of the decree, [2] so that those others guarding the borders, thus warned, may guard those border castles more faithfully and zealously; [3] and the royal majesty ought not, in contravention of the decree, pardon those who lost border castles; and if he should do so, it shall be invalid [4] and they shall be subject to the penalty according to the content of the decree.¹¹

⁸ Cf. the prohibition of peasants to bear arms in 1514:60. It was never clear, whether the militia portalis (referring to porta=tenant plot), instituted in 1397, prescribing the mobilization of soldiers according to the number of plots, referred to hired soldiers or to armed peasants. See: András Borosy, “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds., From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary. East European Monographs, 104, (Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80.

⁹ Transylvanian nobles and Saxons were to field a prescribed number of warriors ever since the thirteenth century; see Elemér Mályusz, “Hungarian Nobles in Medieval Transylvania,” History and Society in Central Europe 2 (1994) pp. 25–54.

¹⁰ Slavonian nobles seem to have served always in the same way as those from Hungary proper.

16. Then, because the poor nobles were so much exhausted by costs due to the continuous holding of diets that many of them, pledging their goods on account of the high expenses, came to be subject to eternal servitude, [1] it was, therefore, decreed that henceforth, unless great necessity threatens, they shall not be forced to come together, except at the usual terms of the diet.

17. Then, because the diet of Hatvan was held against the orders of the royal majesty and the liberties of the realm—as the royal majesty deigned to inform us by his letters sent to all counties¹²—we decreed that it be of no validity or force; [1] moreover, if any damage detrimental to the authority of the royal majesty or the liberty of the realm followed from that meeting, His Majesty may deign, together with his council, to repair it.

18. Then, since no general campaign can be led without a general commander, the royal majesty shall choose one or two captains general¹³ who shall be suitable to lead such a campaign.

19. Then, that the truth has to be established about those who robbed the property of the Czechs in front of His Majesty's castle and they are to be punished according to their deserts; [1] and satisfaction shall be given to the Czechs for their lost property.¹⁴

20. Then, that the major and minor octave courts shall according to the contents of the decree of the late King Matthias of blessed memory always be held and continue [1] according to the decree of the late King Wladislas.¹⁵ [2] Then short term lawsuits, the five cases [of acts of might],¹⁶ and referrals are to be started always on the twentieth day after St James's and continue uninterrupted.

¹¹ 1518 (Bács):30.

¹² The king explicitly forbade the lords and the counties to appear at the Hatvan diet, and announced that the meeting of the nobles did not have the right to make statutes. This mandate was actually sent out to the counties before the diet of Hatvan; see Szabó, A magyar országgyűlések, pp. 85–6.

¹³ Paul Tomori (b. c. 1475, archbishop of Kalocsa from 1523) and George Zápolya (a. k. a. Szapolyai) (b. c. 1487) perpetual ispán of Szepes were charged with the general command; both fell at Mohács.

¹⁴ The carriages of Adam von Neuhaus, the Bohemian chancellor of Louis II, were robbed in front of the gates by some townsmen of Buda.

¹⁵ 1486:3, 1492:40.

¹⁶ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might, the traditional “five cases” of acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of noble estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one.

[3] Lawsuits over the pledging of property rights shall always be treated during the short court sessions.

21. Then, that only the royal majesty and none of the lord prelates shall have the right to confer benefices, except simple canonries, [1] but not to foreigners, only to Hungarians and subjects of the crown of Hungary.¹⁷

22. Then, that the present palatine as well as any future one may treat and make executions in all matters pertaining to his office, in law courts, and in the council. [1] It was further decided that henceforth the palatine may not be removed from his office by riot or for some other trivial reason, but only by due process, [2] and for such a crime for which he would lose not only the office but also the head; [3] otherwise the office of palatine shall be for life.¹⁸ [4] And the royal majesty may deign to issue his charter on this which shall be placed next to the Holy Crown;¹⁹ [5] so that in the future nobody should dare to rise in riot against the palatine.

23. Then, because several lords had at the time of the conscription of military dues, the goods of abbots, friars, and nuns written into their own goods by title of the right of patronage of churches, and so the number of paid soldiers in several counties diminished, [1] therefore, it has been decreed that the goods of all these regular clergy shall be conscribed with those of the county, so that the number of paid soldiers be increased. And none of the lords shall dare to have ecclesiastical goods of this kind conscribed with his own under pretext of the right of patronage, [2] except those benefices that were founded and taken out of the goods and hereditary property of the lords.

24.²⁰ That the majesty of the queen shall deign—as she graciously promised to do to the gentlemen of the realm—to distribute her offices of whatever name to Hungarians and indeed to well deserving persons according to the contents of the decree.²¹

25. Then, that the lord chancellor has to take care that royal letters are issued so that he does not issue to anyone one letter against another, in opposition to the custom of the realm, as has been hitherto practiced.

¹⁷ It is worth noting that “Hungarians,” i. e. ethnic Magyars and other, non-Magyar subjects of the crown are differentiated, but treated alike.

¹⁸ This article is aimed at avoiding events such as that happened at the Hatvan diet, where Palatine Báthori was deposed and Werbőczy elected.

¹⁹ The actual jewel is here predicated as a guardian of the rights of the kingdom. Already Fritz Hartung, Die Krone als Symbol der monarchischen Herrschaft im ausgehenden Mittelalter (Abhandlungen der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Phil.hist. Klasse Nr.13, 1940) repr. in Manfred Hellmann, ed., Corona regni, (Darmstadt: Wiss. Buchges. 1961) pointed out this “literal” (in contrast to the usual metaphoric) use of the notion of “crown.”

²⁰ Art 40 in the MTvt/CJH I: 853.

²¹ See 1524/25:1.

26. Then, that all letters of obligation that were given to foreign nations against the liberties of the realm are to be null and void. [1] And henceforth the royal majesty shall not deign to grant such letters to anyone.

27. Then, that His Majesty shall, as he promised orally to his faithful gentlemen of the realm, issue letters of proscription against Stephen Werbőczy and Michael Szobi, men faithless to him²² [1] and order that these proscribed men be punished according to their deserts.

28. Then, that any of the lords and nobles not keeping banderia, who cannot keep at least fifty cavalry by reason of their goods, is obliged to give the military dues to the nobles of the county where he has his goods.

29. Then, the royal majesty shall deign to rectify the borders of Hungary with the Moravians and Austrians, and redeem those pledged castles, for the redemption of which the late Archbishop George of Esztergom²³ has bequeathed a significant amount of money.

30.²⁴ Then, that His Majesty will have built anew those borders that the lord palatine had built in the past years between the Cumans and Jász, but which were removed by officials of His Majesty, [1] and likewise in those places where the revision has not yet been done, the royal majesty shall deign to have a suitable revision and rectification of the borders carried out there.²⁵

31. Then, that all the lords and counties must immediately maintain their troops in full number according to the contents of the decree, and on the royal majesty's order send and deploy them well armed to the necessary locations without delay, [1] so that they may listen to and obey His Majesty's captain.

²² Stephen Werbőczy, (1458-1541) lawyer, politician, high court judge, author of the Tripartitum, and speaker for the lesser nobility, was elected count palatine at the Hatvan diet; he fled after his proscription and after 1526 supported King John I; he died as a Sultan-appointed judge in Buda. Michael Szobi (d. 1527) was his senior and supporter (also father-in-law), for a time delegate of the lesser nobles in the royal council. See András Kubinyi, "Stefan Werbőczy als Politiker in der Zeit vor Mohács (1526)", in: The Man of Many Devices Who Wandered Full Many Days ... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők, eds. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1999) pp. 558-82, here 571-4.

²³ George Szatmári was bishop of Veszprém 1499–1501, of Oradea 1501–1505, of Pécs 1505–1521, archbishop of Esztergom 1522–1524, royal-secretary 1494–1499, secret chancellor 1499–1521, and arch-chancellor 1521–1524.

²⁴ Art 41 in the MTvT/CJH I: 853.

²⁵ The Cumans and the Jász (As, in fact Alans, called by the Biblical name Philistines in medieval Hungary), originally nomadic people who settled in Hungary in the thirteenth century (see Nora Berend, At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and "Pagans" in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), were by this time mostly settled agriculturalists, in good part subject peasants (see György Györffy, "A kunok feudalizálódása" [The feudalization of the Cumans] in György Székely, ed. Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez a 14. században (Budapest: Akadémiai 1963) pp. 248-75. Conflicts between the two groups, whose judge was the palatine ex officio, were recurrent.

32. Then, that the troops of lord barons who die without heirs must be maintained by those who take over their goods by virtue of these same goods, according to the content of the decree.

33. Then, that since the prelates and barons are the counselors of His Majesty, it is in His Majesty's pleasure to keep with him whomsoever His Majesty wishes; [1] however, His Majesty shall also choose eight men from among the nobles and gentlemen of the realm who shall attend His Majesty's council.²⁶

34. Then, as there are letters issued under the seal of Stephen Werbőczy, titled palatine, and as Werbőczy raised himself to the palatinate at the Hatvan diet held against the command of the royal majesty through open rupture with the authority of His Majesty and the ancient liberty and custom of the realm, and therefore—other misdeeds of his also so demanding—was according to the contents of the decree lawfully condemned of the charge of infidelity,²⁷ [1] nevertheless, lest anyone's rights may be diminished because of this, it was decided that the lord palatine, Stephen Bátori,²⁸ shall confirm, have prepared and handed out such letters, inasmuch as they were issued properly and legitimately, without any payment of fees.

35. Then, because some lords say that they have such prerogatives that they refuse to stand trial before the county ispáns in cases moved or to be moved against them, the royal majesty shall deign to revoke and cancel such letters or privileges.

36. Then, that the royal majesty shall have such good coins minted, of the same weight and fineness as at the time when copper coins were first minted; [1] and he shall have that copper money changed by his treasurers in the chambers, [2] so that three copper coins are exchanged for one good coin. [3] And the place of exchange shall be in Buda, and no one other than the treasurer, whomsoever he may be, be allowed to do the exchange, [4] and the royal treasurer has to swear an

²⁶ The inclusion of lesser nobles into the royal council was decreed several times and may have been reality for short periods, but their influence was minimal, see András Kubinyi, "Beisitzer aus dem mittleren Adel" in Stände und Ständestaat im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn. (Herne: Schäfer, 2011) 233- 52.

²⁷ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

²⁸ Stephen Bátori was ispán of Temes and captain general of the lower (southern) parts of Hungary 1509–23, count palatine 1519–23, September 1524–July 1525, and April 1526–1530.

oath that he will not allow others to exchange the money, according to the order of the gentlemen of the realm and the lords. [5] Until the next feast of St James, anyone may accept two in selling and buying any goods, but after that feast nobody shall dare to use that coin. [6] Nevertheless, the treasurer shall exchange it for as long as that copper money lasts. [7] If, however, any coins that appear to have been minted not in the true fineness are presented for exchange, the money changer shall find out who minted them—and these have to be punished by the royal majesty according to the decree—but they should still be accepted by the money changer.²⁹

37. Then, because in Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia the minting of copper money was freely allowed, [1] therefore those, who import from these foreign countries copper coins, or who can be proved to have imported them, shall, after all their goods are confiscated, be beheaded.

38. Then, those who are caught exchanging these copper coins outside the chambers or taking them out of the country are to be subject to the same penalty.

39. Then, during the general levy, babka, *Kreutzers*³⁰ and other foreign coins may also circulate in this country; [1] thereafter nobody shall dare to use foreign coins.

40. Then, because of the present necessities and imminent dangers, it has been decreed [1] that, because not even a half of the subsidy of one florin, granted last year to His Majesty by the gentlemen of the realm, has been collected, therefore it shall be immediately collected from every county and from the goods of everyone from whom it has not yet been collected, and faithfully directed to the hands of the royal treasurer. And beyond this, in order to be able better to assist the royal needs and defense of the realm, [1]³¹ the lord prelates, barons and gentlemen of the realm have offered to give by the next coming Martinmas fifty pennies in good money for every plot of their tenant peasants, including the chamber's profit.³²

²⁹ This article aimed at liquidating the monetary “reform” of 1521, by which the silver pennies were replaced by the nova moneta. On the reform and its consequences, see Zsuzsanna Herrmann: “Államháztartás és a pénz értéke a Mohács előtti Magyarországon. Megjegyzések Thurzó Elek költségvetési előirányzatához”. [Budget and the value of money in pre-Mohács Hungary. Comments on the budget proposal of E. Th.] Századok 109 (1975) 301–336. See Márton Gyöngyössi, “Minting and Financial Administration (1387–1526),” in: Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy pp. 295–308.

³⁰ Babka was originally a Czech coin, worth 1/3 of a Kreuzer. In Hungarian it became batka and acquired a proverbial meaning of ‘very low value’ (“not worth even a wooden batka”). Kreuzer came from Southern Germany and were worth 1/60 of a gold florin.

³¹ In the MTvT/CJH, this is article 39.

³² By Martinmas of 1526, the medieval kingdom ceased to exist. After the defeat at Mohács on August 29 and the death of King Louis while trying to escape, some lords elected Ferdinand I, others supported John Zápolya, who was confirmed by the sultan. By 1541, Buda was taken by the Ottomans and the country divided in three parts that was to last for some 150 years. See Géza Perjés, The Fall of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: Mohacs 1526 - Buda 1541; trans. Mario Fenyő (Boulder, Social Science Monographs, 1989) online: <http://www.hungarianhistory.com/lib/warso/warso01.htm#Heading3>.

Stephen Werbőczy's Tripartitum opus iuris consuetudinarii inclyti regni Hungariae (1517)

The author, his work, and its historical context are discussed by Martyn Rady, “Stephen Werbőczy and the Tripartitum,” below. Its centuries long validity is discussed by László Péter, as “The Indestructible Authority of the Tripartitum,” in DRMH vol. 5, xiii–xxvi, reprinted below among the Studies to medieval Hungarian laws. The subjects of both essays have been further developed in Martyn Rady, Customary Law in Hungary: Courts, Texts and the Tripartitum (Oxford: OUP, 2015).

MSS: none known to have survived.

EDD: A comprehensive list of fifty-one editions is given by István Csekey, “A Tripartitum Bibliográfiája”, see Rady’s preface, n. 3.

LIT: the literature is too large to be listed here. Writings up to 1942 are in Csekey, as above. Significant new literature is cited in Martyn Rady, Customary Law in Hungary.

THE PRESENT EDITION: The Latin text reproduces as closely as is feasible the first edition of 1517, printed by Johann Singriener in Vienna. That edition contains a few peculiarities, not unique to sixteenth-century books, but disturbing for the modern day reader. The printer added—in no systematic way—slashes (vergulae suspensivae) (/) to the text, without these apparently meaning anything in terms of punctuation. We decided to omit them. Then, the ampersand (&) is frequently preceded by either a comma (,) or a colon (:), again without any grammatical or contextual significance. We eliminated these as well, occasionally inserting a comma, where we thought the meaning warranted it. While revising the Latin text, we realized that on some occasions punctuation was needed even though the printer omitted it, and in a few cases, we disregarded a period (followed by capital letter) when the grammar (especially the verbum regens at the end of the next sentence) clearly demanded a comma and the continuation of the sentence. Otherwise, we kept the (similarly rather haphazard) use of capital letters and the inconsistencies in titles (Tit. for Titulus and so on). Obvious typographical errors (often u for n and similar ones) were tacitly corrected as well. Common abbreviations were, of course, expanded, as far as we could, in the way the author/printer used them. No attempt was made to “normalize” the Latin—for example, in the use of æ or e caudata (ę)—even if the original is not consistent; only the accepted use of u and v has been normalized. The 1517 edition contains a page of ERRATA at the end of the text; these we have taken into account and made corrections accordingly. In a few cases that list itself is faulty; in these places we have inserted the right correction. However, we divided the chapters (Tituli) of the text (and the English translation) into paragraphs [§] that did not feature in the original. Since the older editions of the Tripartitum have from the eighteenth century onwards included these subdivisions and they are consistently referred to in academic literature, it seemed helpful to retain them. Finally, we added as an Appendix the three poems that were added to the legal text in the 1517 edition, even though they do not belong to the Tripartitum proper and were not reprinted in its later editions. Since this book was published in the lifetime of the author, we may presume that he suggested their inclusion, for both authors were close friends of Werbőczy and two of the epigrams are dedicated to him.

The TRANSLATION follows the principles of DRMH, attempting to give a well-readable English text, trying neither to simplify the often convoluted “Humanist” Latin of the author, nor to use artificial archaisms. The problems of rendering specific Hungarian institutions and other notions in English was discussed in the general Preface to DRMH; if necessary, annotations are added. The annotations were kept to a minimum: complete comments on the text would have amounted to a history of medieval Hungarian law; that could not have been attempted here.

Titles cited in abbreviation:

Accursius. Glossa Ordinaria ad Digestum Vetus. (Venice: Jenson, 1478)

Azo. Summa Aurea super Codice et Institutis. (Lyon: Fradin, 1557) [reprinted, Frankfurt/M: Minerva, 1968].

Bartolus, Commentaria. 3 vols. (Basle: Froben, 1562).

Digest: Justinian’s Digest as in Corpus Iuris Civilis. vol 1, Theodor Mommsen and Paul Krueger. eds. (Berlin, 1954). English translation by Alan Watson (2 vols, Philadelphia, 1985).

Gratian, D: The Decretum of Gratian as in Corpus Iuris Canonici. vol 1, () Emil Richter and Emil Friedrich, eds. (Leipzig, 1871).

Hostiensis, Summa Aurea. (Lyon: Marchant, 1548).

Institutes: Justinian’s Institutes as in Corpus Iuris Civilis. vol 1, Theodor Mommsen and Paul Krueger. eds. (Berlin, 1954). English translation and introduction by Peter Birks and Grant McLeod (London, 1987).PL: J. P. Migne, Patrologiae Cursus Completus, Series Latina, 221 vols. (Paris, 1844– 64).

SL: Die Summa Legum brevis, levis et utilis des sogenannten Doctor Raymundus von Wiener-Neustadt, Alexander Gál, ed., 2 vols (Weimar, Böhlau, 1926)

ST: The Summa Theologiae of St Thomas Aquinas. 5 vols, (Ottawa Institutus Studiorum Medievalis Ottaviensis,, 1941–5).

Martyn Rady

Stephen Werbőczy and his Tripartitum

Stephen Werbőczy's reputation rests on the Tripartitum, the code of customary law that he presented to the diet in 1514 and had published three years later in Vienna. Until the 1848 revolution, the Tripartitum retained a largely unimpaired authority in respect of Hungarian noble society and its legal relations. Its principles and provisions laid down the substantive law of noble landholding, the special privileges enjoyed by the Hungarian nobility, and the practices and procedures to be followed by the royal courts. Even after the formal abolition of noble status in 1848 and the accompanying destruction of the traditional forms of noble landownership, the Tripartitum continued to influence Hungarian public and private law. A part of its text was thus reinterpreted to buttress Hungarian claims to statehood within the Habsburg Monarchy.¹ Other portions remained intact as law until well into the twentieth century, and one fragment even found its way into the communist Civil Code of 1959.² In token of its centrality in Hungary's history, the Tripartitum has altogether gone through fifty-five separate editions, not including mnemonic, rhyming and other simplified versions.³ The present edition is thus the Tripartitum's fifty-sixth. [... and this online one the fifty-seventh – JMB]

Biographical Outline

Although principally remembered for his Tripartitum, Werbőczy was more than just a lawyer. Indeed, for four decades he stood as one of Hungary's leading politicians. It is a measure of his achievement that Werbőczy should in the course of his career have occupied some of the most important positions in the Hungarian kingdom. In 1502, he was appointed protonotary of the courts of the judge royal and voivode of Transylvania, a position which effectively handed over to him a large part of the administration of justice in the kingdom. In 1516, he was made judge of the personalis (személynök), in which capacity he gave out judgments in the royal name as Hungary's highest judicial officer. In 1525, he was elected palatine by the diet, making him the king's deputy, but after a royal coup mounted the next year Werbőczy was deprived of office and forced to flee to the countryside. This probably saved his life. A few months later, the royal host, over which as palatine he would surely have been a commander, was destroyed by the Ottoman army at the battle of Mohács (1526). In the wake of the defeat, Hungary was sundered by civil war. Werbőczy rallied behind the voivode of Transylvania, John Szapolyai, whom the diet elected king in 1526, and against Archduke (later Emperor) Ferdinand of Habsburg, who was crowned king the next year. Werbőczy remained in John's service until the king's death in 1540, occupying the position of chancellor. The first secular holder of this office, Werbőczy used his position to dominate both the judicial administration and much of the domestic business of government.⁴ Shortly after John's death, the Turks occupied the central portion of the kingdom, including the seat of government at Buda. Rather than retreating eastward into the fastnesses of Transylvania, Werbőczy remained in the capital. His last months were thus spent in the service of the pasha of Buda, in the curious role of judge of the Christians and, possibly also, of the local Ottoman garrison.⁵ During the course of his career, Werbőczy also took part in diplomatic missions to Venice, Rome, Worms, Nuremberg, Vienna and, on two occasions, to Constantinople. While attending the diet of Worms in 1521, he dined with Martin Luther, finding him 'foolish and ignorant'.⁶ Werbőczy's own brief foray into theology suggests the infirmity of his judgment.⁷

¹ László Péter, "The Holy Crown of Hungary, Visible and Invisible," Slavonic and East European Review 81 (2003, no 3): 421—510, pp. 467-486.

² The so-called "Millennium edition," edited by Dezső Márkus as part of the Corpus Juris Hungarici (Budapest: Franklin, 1897), thus places in large print those passages of the Tripartitum which the editor considered to be still in force at the time of publication. About a quarter of the text is so printed, although on largely arbitrary grounds. See also, István Szász, Werbőczy és a magyar magánjog, offprint of Acta Juridico-Politica (vol 2, Kolozsvár, 1942), p. 36. For the relevant part of the 1959 code, see Gyula Eörsi, "Richterrecht und Gesetzesrecht in Ungarn. Zum Problem der Originalität eines Zivilrechts," Radels Zeitschrift für ausländisches und internationales Privatrecht 30 (1966): 117—40, p. 137.

³ A comprehensive list of fifty-one editions is given by István Csekey, "A Tripartitum Bibliográfiája" [The Bibliography of the Tripartitum], in Elemér P. Balás et al., Werbőczy István, Acta Juridico-Politica 2 (Kolozsvár, 1942), 141—94. Since then, the Millennium edition has been twice republished with new introductions, and two facsimile reprints of the original 1517 text have been issued, although in identical editions (ed. and introduced by György Bónis, Mittelalterliche Gesetzbücher Europäischer Länder, hrsg. von Armin Wolf, vol 2: Frankfurt a/M: Sauer & Auvermann, 1969; Glashütten/Taunus: Detlev Auvermann, 1971).

Chancellery and Diet

The bald outline of Werbőczy's career hardly does justice to the man and to the measure of his influence. Although Werbőczy was a nobleman by birth, his family was of humble stock, dwelling in north-eastern Hungary on estates which now straddle Hungary's border with Ukraine. Where land was lacking, education and the law beckoned. Like several of his forebears, the young Stephen thus chose a career in the law, learning first to read Latin and then to enter minor orders as a lector and litteratus. But rather than seeking pupilage with an established attorney, Werbőczy entered royal service, being appointed in 1492 a notary in the chancellery.⁸ He was then probably about twenty years old.⁹ Until this point, his education had been slight. We know that shortly before he entered the chancellery he had spent several months at Cracow university, but Cracow had no reputation for legal studies and aspiring lawyers usually soon moved on to Vienna or northern

4 Gábor Barta, "Konszolidációs kísérlet Magyarországon a mohácsi csatavesztés után" [Attempt at a consolidation after the defeat at Mohács] Századok ill (1977): 635—80, pp. 653—5.

5 Miklós Istvánffy (1538—1615) records Werbőczy as holding in 1541 the rank of a kadi askar. See his A magyarok történetéből, trans. László Juhász (Budapest: Magyar Helikon, 1962), p. 176; for the office, see Encyclopedia of Islam, New Edition, vol 4, 1973—78 (Leiden: Brill), pp. 375—6.

6 Vilmos Fraknói, Werbőczy István életrajza [Biography of I. W.] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Társaság, 1899), p. 172.

7 See thus his Decem Divinorum Preceptorum Libellus, printed by Singrenius in Vienna in 1524. A facsimile edition was published in Budapest (MTA Irodalomtudományi Intézete) in 1988. I am grateful to Peter Sherwood for drawing my attention to this edition.

8 We do not consider it likely that Werbőczy is the "Mag Sth de W," recorded in 1483 as a conservator in the chancellery, as argued by Fraknói, Werbőczy István életrajza, pp. 14—17. The office of conservator was surely too elevated to be in the possession of a notary so early in his career. See György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei [Elements of our medieval law] (Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó, 1972), p. 160. At this point, moreover, Werbőczy evidently preferred the toponym of Kerepeczi.

9 The date of Werbőczy's birth is uncertain. In 1540, the papal nuncio put him in his eighties, but for a man who had just led an overland mission to Constantinople this is implausible. We consider it more likely that he was born in the early 1470s.

Italy, which Werbőczy evidently preferred not to do.¹⁰ Nevertheless, by choosing a career in chancellery service, Werbőczy was able to compensate for his lack of formal education. At this time, the chancellery was led by churchmen who had often completed their education in Italy, earning doctorates there in both civil and canon law. There, they had drunk deeply at the wells of humanist learning, maintaining even after their return to Hungary a correspondence with leading Renaissance scholars, and transforming the seat of the kingdom's administration into 'more an academy than a chancellery'.¹¹ As a contemporary noted, 'Plautus and Pliny were closer to their hearts than Bartolus and Baldus.'¹² Werbőczy's exposure to humanist scholarship in the chancellery may well account for the large number of classical allusions included in the prefaces to the Tripartitum. The ill-considered and forced manner in which these references are often rendered in the Tripartitum's text (most obviously in Werbőczy's tiresome account of literary style), suggest a classical education that was superficial and not systematically obtained. Nevertheless, the lack of interest shown by the leading men of the chancellery in legal scholasticism and the practice of the law had the advantage of putting much of its business into the hands of the notaries. It is a measure of the practical knowledge of the law which they obtained in their daily routines that the foremost notaries and 'office-managers', the protonotaries, should in the 1470s have taken over as the de facto judges (or magistri iudicantii, itélőmesterek) in the principal royal courts, acting on behalf and in the name of the king, palatine, judge royal and voivode.¹³ It was through this route that Stephen Werbőczy came himself in 1502 to the office of protonotary of the judge royal and voivode.

Experience and aptitude were, however, insufficient for a legal career. Hungarian noble society was shot through with bonds of dependence and preferment, by which a lesser man gave his service to one greater in return for rewards, favor, cash and even land. Despite the growing professionalism of the chancellery, these bonds of service or familiaritas were still vital for a lawyer. We do not know what personal connections put Werbőczy's foot on the first rung of the notarial ladder, although he may have been aided by a family link to the magnate Bátori family.¹⁴ Later, he appears to have tied his fortunes to Peter, Count of St George and Bazin, while also himself acting as patron and lord to lesser men.¹⁵ It was possible, however, to serve more than one master and, in this respect, Werbőczy's choice of a second patron was decisive. By no later than 1498, Werbőczy also stood in the service of Michael Szobi, in a relationship that was both intense and enduring. Indeed, it was in this year that Szobi made the first of several donations of land to Werbőczy, recording his services in both good and

10 András Kubinyi, "István Werbőczy als Politiker vor Mohács (1526)," in Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők (eds), ...The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandered Full Many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak (Budapest and New York: CEU Press, 1999), 558–82, p. 559.

11 Bohuslav z Lobkovic to Jan Slechta. Cited in Jenő Ábel, Egyetemeink a középkorban [Our universities in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: MTA, 1881), p. 43.

12 Philippus Beroaldus in 1496. Cited by György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Men learned in the laws in Hungary before Mohács] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1971), p. 310.

13 Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség, p. 261.

14 Kubinyi, "István Werbőczy als Politiker," p. 559

15 Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség, pp. 331, 366.

bad times, ‘and especially in the furtherance of his suits’.¹⁶ Szobi later adopted Werbőczy as his son and heir, although there is no evidence (as is sometimes claimed) that Werbőczy married into his family.¹⁷

Michael Szobi was descended from a wealthy Transylvanian family which had risen to prominence in the middle decades of the fifteenth century, mainly in the service of John Hunyadi (governor of Hungary, 1446-53) and of his son, King Matthias Corvinus (1458-90). Following Matthias’s death and the election of the Polish Władislas Jagiello as king, Szobi lost much of his influence and standing, and moved into the ‘opposition’, acting as an elected placeman of the common nobility at meetings of the royal council. Throughout the Jagiello period (i.e., the reigns of Władislas II, 1490-1516, and of his son, Louis II, 1516-26), Hungarian politics was deeply fractured. Political divisions were, however, sufficiently intertwined with short-lived factional alliances and intrigues as to defy explanation in terms of ‘court’ versus ‘country’ or ‘pro-German’ versus ‘pro-Hungarian’. Nevertheless, in the party-politics of the Jagiello monarchy, one constant factor may be discerned: the so-called ‘national’ program which, even though its leadership consisted of great landowners, principally drew on the support of the ‘common’ or ‘lesser’ nobility of the kingdom. The national program looked back to the glorious reigns of Matthias Corvinus and of the fourteenth-century Angevin king, Louis I (1342-82), discerning (however incorrectly) in their rule the promotion of policies that served kingdom rather than dynasty. Exponents of the national program accordingly argued that the vicissitudes experienced by the Hungarian kingdom, most notably the unabated Turkish menace, had their origin in the lack of commitment shown to Hungary by its foreign rulers. Their solution was equally straightforward: to secure the election of a national king who would put Hungary’s interests first or, failing that, to master the ruler by controlling appointments to the royal council and to the kingdom’s principal offices. The organ which they chose to effect these changes was the diet, which by degrees became very much their instrument.

Since the middle decades of the fifteenth century, the diet had assumed an increasing prominence in the kingdom’s public life.¹⁸ The need to recruit armies for wars against the Ottomans and Hungary’s other neighbours, the ever-increasing requirement for fresh taxes, and the political impasses of the 1440s and 1450s, when the kingdom found itself either without a king or with an absentee child filling the role, combined to give new power and influence to the kingdom’s diet. After all, since it was the nobility which had to bear the brunt of taxation and military recruitment and whose obedience to a new king was expected, it was expedient to have its delegates participate in the most important decisions. Even during the relative domestic peace which marked Matthias’s reign, the king still felt it prudent to associate the diet with his legislation, although this was usually drawn up in advance without its counsel. The political crisis which attended the death without heir of Matthias, the weakness of his successor (who was selected for the role of king precisely on account of his proven incompetence), the deterioration of the royal finances and thus the need for additional taxes, were all factors which served further to entrench the diet's power and authority. During the 1490s and the first decades of the sixteenth century, diets met on at least an annual basis. Altogether about thirty are known to have convened during Władislas's reign, often overturning legislation passed just a few months before. Increasingly, the diets were attended not only by elected delegates of the nobility but also by massed and armed groups of noblemen accompanied by their retainers. Altogether, 2000 such nobles are thought to have met at the Rákos diet of 1505 and as many as 10,000 at the 1525 Hatvan diet.

16 István Horvát, Verbötzi István emlékezete [Memory of I. W.], vol 2 (vol 1 never published) (Pest: Trattner, 1819), p. 124.

17 Horvat, Verbötzi István, p. 283; Kubinyi, “István Werbőczy als Politiker,” p. 561. Werbőczy acquired Szobi’s lands upon his death in 1527.

18 For this and much of what follows, see Martyn Rady, “Rethinking Jagiello Hungary,” Central Europe 3 (2005, no 1), 3-18, and J. M. Bak “Crown and Estates” In: The New Cambridge Medieval History vol. 7, ed. Christopher Allmand (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), pp. 707-26.

It was into this political arena, marked by tumults and conspiracy, that Stephen Werbőczy was drawn. The connection between diet and chancellery was an already close one, for it was usual for chancellery notaries to draft on behalf of the council the royal propositions put to the diet and to compose the decretum passed at the diet's close. In Werbőczy's case, however, his own lack of education made him particularly fitted to play a role in the diet's proceeding. Not having received a university training in the law, his experience was rooted in what were seen to be Hungary's own national customs and laws. In this respect, he embodied a quite different legal tradition to that of the humanists in the chancellery who had been educated at foreign universities.¹⁹ Their training in civil law inclined them both to magnify the role of the princeps in law-making and to look towards the inheritors of the Roman diadem, which in the form of the Habsburg dynasty constituted the most important ally of the Jagiello rulers.²⁰ By contrast, Werbőczy's more practical training impelled him towards an older Bartolist position whereby law was considered as emerging as custom out of the will of the community.

Although elected a delegate to the diet of 1500, Werbőczy only properly made his entry into public life at the Rákos diet of 1505. In circumstances which remain obscure, he addressed the rowdy crowd of nobles. He appealed to the fatherland and drew attention to its desolation and destruction, reeling off a largely make-believe list of the territories that had been lost to it. Explanation he found in the corruption of his countrymen's warlike and 'Scythian' qualities by foreigners who sought their own profit and ease. Making it only too clear to what 'foreigners' he referred, Werbőczy then listed the great Hungarian kings of yore, before appealing to the present Polish ruler to allow upon his death the election by the diet of a truly national king who was 'not of a foreign nation and language'. Was there any other people, Werbőczy asked, which did not choose a king and lord of its own nation and blood? Werbőczy's lapse of memory in regard to the current rulers of Bohemia, Spain and the duchy of Milan suggests that his oratory gave way too easily to demagoguery. Nevertheless, rather than being arrested for treason, Werbőczy was greeted 'with clapping and shouts of approval' and rewarded by the diet with a slice of tax revenue. Parts of his speech were included in the decretum published at the diet's close.²¹ The 1505 decretum subsequently served as the manifesto and rallying-point of the national program.

19 Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség, p. 334.

20 György Bónis, "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary," East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est 4/2 (1977): 181—91, p. 185.

The demand for a national, elected ruler to succeed the present incumbent only made sense while there was no heir to the throne. In 1505, King Władislas was still without a son and recovering from a stroke that had paralyzed his right side. But the next year, his wife, Anne of Foix, was unexpectedly delivered of a male heir, the future Louis II (1516—26). Accordingly, the interest of the diet and of its spokesmen shifted: towards securing control of the office of treasurer and towards maintaining a dominant influence within the royal council through the continued appointment of elected assessors. In the proceedings of the diets which followed in the decade after 1505, we can neither trace Werbőczy's influence nor, beyond several proposals for a reform of the royal finances, establish his role within the broader trends of Hungarian politics.²² We may, however, note that in 1510, with the appointment of John Szapolyai as voivode, he retained his position as the voivode's protonotary, which implies that he had entered into Szapolyai's circle and patronage. The Szapolyai family ever presented itself as heir to the national inheritance of the Hunyadis and of King Matthias, while John himself, notwithstanding his massive personal wealth, never ceased to promote himself as the common nobility's 'king-in-waiting'. Nevertheless, Werbőczy was shrewd enough to maintain good relations with the king, receiving from him many grants of land in token of his services.²³

Compiling the Tripartitum

By the last years of the fifteenth century, substantial concerns had arisen both in the royal court and diet over the proper sources of legal authority. On the one hand, there was no agreement as to what decreta retained a complete validity. Moreover, in respect of individual decreta, their surviving texts were frequently garbled or even contradictory in their extant versions.²⁴ On the other, it was recognized that the written law could not cover every legal eventuality and that, in many cases, the decision of the courts rested on principles either of their own making or on unwritten custom. In order to give clarity, King Władislas had in 1498 authorized that the customs of the realm, as they were referred to in court, should be collected by the protonotary Adam Liszkai and submitted to him and his judges for approval. Evidently, this instruction was not fulfilled, for further orders to the same effect had to be included in the decreta of 1500 and 1505. In similar fashion, the king commanded in 1504 that the decreta issued in his name be brought together in one volume. Three years later, he extended his instruction to include all decreta previously published in the kingdom.²⁵

21 Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungariae (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901), pp. 317—20; Istvánffy, A magyarok történetéből, p. 41.

22 On Werbőczy's proposals for financial reform, see Zsuzsanna Hermann, "Egy pénzügyi tervezettől a Hármaskönyvig" [From a financial project to the Tripartitum], Századok 115 (1981, no 1): 108—51.

23 Horvát, Verböczi István, pp. 159—64, 166—7, 169—72.

24 The point is made by Werbőczy in his address to the king.

25 József Illés. Bevezetés a magyar jog történetébe. A források története [Introduction into

We do not know when Werbőczy received his own commission to collect and publish the customary laws of the kingdom. Deferring to Werbőczy, historians have often averred that the Tripartitum was the product of ‘long and protracted labours’²⁶ and was thus most likely to have been begun around 1505, when the king mandated for a third time the collection of the realm’s customs. This may well be. Nevertheless, two points should be considered. First, the composition of the Tripartitum bears sufficient marks of haste as to suggest that it was not the product of extensive work. In places, the Latin text is jumbled even to the point of opacity; elsewhere, contradictions, non sequiturs and glaring omissions abound.²⁷ Secondly, the Tripartitum was always more than a collection of customary principles as expounded in the courts. Rather, it sought to fuse the written law, as rendered in the decreta, with the unwritten law as practiced by the courts. As Werbőczy saw it, custom and the written law were indissolubly linked. Not only might each cancel out the other, but custom also gave sanction to the enacted law. For only those decreta which had passed into use retained a fully legal character while, by the same token, decreta which had been superseded by practice lost their force: ‘for real and continuous use often invalidates a law’.²⁸ The Tripartitum was, thus, a quite different work to those envisaged in the royal instructions of 1498 to 1507. Instead of there being, as the king had intended, separate collections of customs and written laws, the Tripartitum sought ‘to join and meld together the statutes, decrees, laws and customs of the realm’ in a single compilation.²⁹

In composing the Tripartitum, Werbőczy relied upon several different types of material. The first of these were the decreta, published for the most part in Władislas’s own reign. In the so-called conclusio, which follows directly upon the third part, Werbőczy states that his work rested for the most part on the decreta published by Władislas and his predecessors. Although we may affirm that portions of the text, particularly in the second part, borrow directly from earlier decreta, Werbőczy was clearly exaggerating. For the lion’s share of the text may not be shown as so derived, being instead the product of Werbőczy’s own observations and research.³⁰ Nowhere, however, does Werbőczy explain how he has come to the conviction that what he has learnt truly amounted to the authentic custom and law of the realm.³¹ Unlike Beaumanoir, he does not therefore explain his epistemology, but instead insists that we take him on trust.³² This flaw would the history of Hungarian law: The history of the sources] (Budapest: Rényi, 1910), pp. 82—5.

26 Author’s salutation, see below..

27 Most obviously, Werbőczy fails to explain what constituted “minor acts of might.” See II 68.

28 II 2:9. See also the Prologue [12].

29 Address to the King as below. See also György Bónis, “Törvény és szokás a Hármaskönyvben,” in Elemér P. Balás et al., Werbőczy István, Acta Juridico-Politica 2 (Kolozsvár, 1942): 121—40, p. 4.

30 In several places he refers directly to personal experience: I 37:6; I 77; II 27:4—5; II 83:9.

31 David Ibbetson, “Custom in the Tripartitum,” in Martyn Rady (ed.), Custom and Law in Central Europe (Cambridge: University of Cambridge Faculty of Law, 2003): 13—23, p. 14.

32 The Coutumes de Beauvaisis of Philippe de Beaumanoir, trans. F.R.P. Akehurst (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992), p. 4 (Prologue, 6).

later lead to the allegation that Werbőczy had invented much of what he had written, and that he had borrowed regardlessly from civilian and other ‘non-Hungarian’ sources.³³

These allegations are largely unfair, for much of what Werbőczy wrote can be demonstrated as conforming to principles and procedures that may be independently established in surviving charters, formularies and other material. Moreover, we should not overlook Werbőczy’s own experience. By the time he presented the Tripartitum to the diet he had worked in the chancellery for more than two decades and had been a leading judge for twelve years. Finally, the writing of the Tripartitum seems most likely to have been preceded by the compilation of an extensive formulary. The work of several notaries, it brought together a mass of legal material copied mainly from instruments sent out of the chancellery, but also including documents relating directly to Werbőczy’s personal affairs as well as to Michael Szobi.³⁴ This, together with such other formularies as were commonly used by the chancellery notaries, as well as some other jottings on the principles of Hungarian law, most probably provided the raw material on which the Tripartitum was built. It should, however, be noted that in places Werbőczy introduced extraneous material in order to make sense of the law as he saw it. The Prologue is thus partly a pastiche of Gratian, Aquinas, current sermon literature and civilian texts, but as a largely theoretical exposition it was principally intended to prove the author’s cleverness and learning. Elsewhere, however, most notably in respect of the law of guardianship in the first part, Werbőczy borrowed his framework from the Summa Legum, a fourteenth-century Italian text that had been published in Cracow in 1506. In several places in the third part, his explanation relies on passages taken from Aquinas.³⁵

Even though the Tripartitum was largely founded on a specialist legal literature, it was not primarily intended for lawyerly consumption.³⁶ Certainly, in one place, Werbőczy introduces and solves a legal conundrum, which seems more intended for a academic debate than for a real situation.³⁷ Nevertheless, his intended audience was the nobility. In the first part, he thus addresses his readership directly in respect of the rights of the paterfamilias.³⁸ In the second, he 33 Joannes Kitonich, Directio Methodica Processus Judiciarii (Nagyszombat: Mollerus, 1619), p. 24; János Jony, Commentatio Historico-Juridica de Origine et Progressu Juris Hunno-Hungarici, (Lócse (no publisher given), 1727), pp. 38–40. The allegation was pressed by Joseph II’s spokesmen: see thus, József Izdenczy, Etwas von Werbőcz, (no place, c. 1790), pp. 20–21; László Kövesdy, Examen Verbőczyanum (Pest: Lettner, 1785), p. 84; anon., Irrthümer in den Begriffen der meisten Ungarn von der Staatsverfassung ihres Vaterlandes, und von den Rechten ihrer Königs, (Gedruckt im Römischen Reiche—no further details, 1790), p. 71.

34 Hungarian National Archive, Collectio antemohácsiana, MNL Df. 28145; see also, Ferenc Eckhart, “Formuláskönyv Werbőczy István hivatali működése köréből” [A formulary from the time of I.W. in office] Emlékkönyv dr. viski Illés József (Budapest: Stephanaeum, 1942), pp. 151–60.

35 Ádám Tóth, “A gyámság intézménye a római jogban és Werbőczy” [The institution of guardianship in Roman Law and W.], in Gábor Hamza (ed.), Tanulmányok Werbőczy Istvánról (Budapest: Professzorok Háza, 2001): 153–65, p. 161; III 8; III 22:5.

36 We do not agree with Alajos Degré who considers the work to be aimed at students of law: A négyeskönyv perjogi anyaga [The procedural law in the Quadripartitum] (Budapest: Sárík, 1935), p. 16.

37 I 50.

38 I 51.

dwells at length upon ‘out- of-court’ procedures, such as inquests and oath-taking, wherein nobles were more likely to be involved, while quite ignoring practices actually observed within the courtroom. The details of court praxis cannot therefore be discerned in Werbőczy’s account. The passage from the written submission of the plaint (libellus), to the summons, to the raising and calling of the case, through the phases of exceptiones and allegationes and interlocutory judgments, and onwards to the final judgment and execution, are thus only hinted at.³⁹ For all this was the business of lawyers, not of the noblemen who entrusted suits to their care. In this respect, it is telling that the most detailed account of procedure is given in respect of how to sack an attorney and force a case to a retrial on account of lawyerly ineptitude.⁴⁰ Nor, should it be remarked, does Werbőczy describe the various competences of the several royal courts before which noblemen might plead. Indeed, he preserves the fiction that the royal courts lay truly under the mastery of single judges, whereas in reality these were already collegiate bodies on which several dozen judges, assessors and other court officers sat.⁴¹ As Werbőczy saw it, the details of court composition were as irrelevant to his audience as the arcana of their praxis and seating-plans. For this information, we must instead rely upon later accounts.⁴²

Structure, Content and Purpose

As its name suggests, the Tripartitum is arranged in three parts, to which are added a prologue and several prefatory and conclusory items. Like much of this other additional material, the Prologue is intended to impress by a display of knowledge and learning. Its discussion of the relationship of written law to custom is thoroughly Bartolist and later contradicted in the earlier chapters of the second part.⁴³ It tells us little of specifically Hungarian legal institutions and is accordingly ignored in most later commentaries.⁴⁴ The three main parts of the Tripartitum were originally intended to follow the classical division of the law into persons, actions and things. Werbőczy partly keeps to this scheme, the first part being mainly concerned with substantive law and the second with procedural. The third part is, however, a hotchpotch, which goes off on tangents before concluding in abrupt fashion with the oath to be taken in court by Jews.

The first part of the Tripartitum is concerned with the principles of noble landholding and it adumbrates the twofold foundation of noble landownership. On the one hand, all land had its origin in the gift of the ruler. It was the king who first distributed property, making, by force of donation, nobles out of servitors and bondsmen. In default of heirs or in the event of infidelity, this land reverted to the ruler and so might be disposed of anew. On the other hand, property belonged to the kindred and to the extended family. Thus, when a nobleman died without sons, 39 See “Trial” in the Glossary below.

40 II.79-81.

41 The number of those sitting in judgment might on occasions exceed forty. See Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség, p. 345. The collegiate composition of the royal courts is alluded to in II 42:3.

42 See thus Kitionich, Directio Methodica, passim. The internal workings of the royal courts are discussed by Martyn Rady, “Hungarian Procedural Law and Part Two of the Tripartitum,” in Rady, Custom and Law, 47—70, pp. 55—69.

43 Ibbetson, “Custom in the Tripartitum,” ibid. pp. 20—2.

44 Rady, “Hungarian Procedural Law,” pp. 48—52.

his estate devolved to his collateral heirs: namely, to his cousins and nephews, even at several remove. But since these might be considered to have a legitimate expectation to his goods even if he had sons (for these might die or themselves have no heirs), their consent was necessary for any alienation of property. The principle of aviticitas, which encompassed the rights of kinsmen in respect of any property whose descent might be traced from a single avus or ancestor of theirs,⁴⁵ guided the law of inheritance throughout the Middle Ages and, indeed, into the nineteenth century. It should, however, be noted that individual noblemen often sought to evade the obligations of aviticitas, by leaving land to their daughters or selling up without their kinsmen's consent. A large part of the first part is thus also dedicated to determining how to detect and avoid such frauds, as well as to defining the rights of daughters, widows and minors. In keeping with his scheme, Werbőczy also discusses here 'the taint of infidelity', as a consequence of which a nobleman might forfeit his land to the king.

The second part, after a brief excursion into the sources of legal authority, is largely given over to explaining judicial procedures as they affected nobles of the realm, together with a lengthy discussion of legal remedies. Some parts of Hungarian procedural law will surely be unfamiliar to students of European legal history: most notably, the repulsio, by which a nobleman might with drawn sword lawfully obstruct a bailiff in the execution of a court judgment, and the reoccupatio, which allowed a noble that had been evicted from his property to seize it back by force within a year. In most other respects, however, the judicial procedures outlined in the second part together with the remedies available at law conform to those generally followed as part of Romano-canonical procedure. This is unsurprising. From no later than the thirteenth century, a large part of the business of the courts—composing letters of summons and notice, authenticating deeds, taking depositions and witnessing the activity of court bailiffs—had been performed by the representatives of chapters and convents, the so-called loca credibilia (hiteleshelyek).⁴⁶ In the course of their work, the canons and monks introduced into Hungarian law procedures and a vocabulary with which they were familiar, thus inclining Hungarian practices towards ecclesiastical norms. Formularies intended for the use of royal courts might also contain materials relating to cases that had been brought before church courts.⁴⁷ Accordingly, the interest of church courts to avoid giving a wrong verdict by permitting a raft of legal remedies—'an essential device to protect all concerned'⁴⁸—was also taken up in Hungarian court practice.

Beside the repulsio and reoccupatio, we may thus find as remedies the prohibitio, revocatio, condescensio, novum, and so on.⁴⁹ As Werbőczy himself explained, the unjust sentence was a two-edged sword, for it 'pierces the hearts of orphans and 45 Erik Fügedi, The Elefantly: The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred, ed. Damir Karbic (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), p. 20.

46 On the work of the loca credibilia, see now Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia" in Rady, Custom and Law, 25—35.

47 See M.G. Kovachich, Formulae Solennes Styli, (Pest: Trattner, 1799), pp. 399, 429.

48 Jane Sayers, Papal Judges Delegate in the Province of Canterbury, 1198-1254 (London: Oxford University Press, 1971), p. 99.

49 See below, Glossary; also Rady, "Hungarian Procedural Law," pp. 65–9.

widows and other persons deserving of pity [and] is the pain which wounds to the depths the souls of the oppressed'. But by encouraging others to abuse the law, it was also 'the snare which casts so many into the pit of eternal damnation'.⁵⁰ On both counts, therefore, the unjust sentence was to be avoided by scrupulous regard for process and by the revision and re-revision of court judgments.

The third part includes a clutter of material which might be thought to belong more properly elsewhere: the meaning and varieties of homagium, the 'blameless defence' (a notion taken from Aquinas), stolen horses and so on, as well as the terms and circumstances of the peasantry's recent enserfment. Nevertheless, there is a broad purpose to the third part. However much his account is marred by the inclusion of extraneous material, Werbőczy intended here to demonstrate the relationship that bound the parts of the kingdom and its lesser jurisdictions to the central royal courts. He explains this relationship in terms of the movement of cases from Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, Transylvania, the county courts and royal cities, to the central royal courts of the realm by way either of appeal, petition for retrial or transmission 'for more considered judgment'.⁵¹ It is certainly true that cases were regularly moved from these lesser jurisdictions to the courts of the royal presence, judge royal, master of the treasury and so on. Nevertheless, Werbőczy clearly erred in claiming that it was usual for all cases to be referred up from lesser courts to the royal courts for revision, for most of these were in fact settled at the lower instance and not transferred upon their conclusion to any higher authority. As protonotary of the Transylvanian voivode, Werbőczy must have known this. Plainly, what Werbőczy was attempting to do here was not to write the law as it stood and as he knew it, but instead to improve upon it, making refinements which fitted in with his understanding of how legal relationships ought to be.

We have already remarked that the passages on guardianship in Part One do not reflect Hungarian customs but are instead partly derivative of civilian literature. In other places as well, as for instance in his account of surety, Werbőczy clearly describes the law as he wished it to be rather than as it was.⁵² Nevertheless, Werbőczy's desire to impose his own scheme on the law involved more than just a few procedural details. It instead embraced a conception of the Hungarian nobility and of its relationship to the crown that was both radical and enduring.

Throughout the text, Werbőczy is at pains to stress the unmediated relationship between the ruler and his noble subjects. The nobleman, Werbőczy thus explains, is created by the king, for it is the ruler's gift of land that is the sign of true nobility. Accordingly, it is to the king that the land reverts if a noble line expires or if an individual nobleman is marked by the taint of infidelity. Conversely, however, the king himself is created by the nobility, for the right which belonged to the early 51 III 3:3; thus also III 6. There is almost no literature on the legal and jurisdictional relationship in the Middle Ages of the partes adnexae to the regnum, but see now Damir Karbic, "Hungarian and Croatian Customary Law: Some Contrasts and Comparisons," in Rady, Custom and Law, 37—45.

50 II 83:8.

52 See I 59:5. It was never a legal requirement that the names of all those whose obligations were assumed had to be individually listed in the recognizance.

Hungarians to elect their ruler, persisted. Accordingly, ‘the prince is elected only by the nobles, and nobles are created and adorned with the dignity of nobility only by the prince’.⁵³ The ‘reciprocal transfer and mutual bond’ between king and nobleman permitted no interposing institutions but presupposed an immediate link resting on the principles of fidelity, service, reward and liberty. The intensity, moreover, of the bond between king and nobleman was such that it allowed no differentiation in respect of proximity. Thus, all nobles enjoyed the same freedoms and were equal to one another. Or, as Werbőczy put it, irrespective of rank all noblemen had on account of their nobility and the estates given them by the ruler ‘one and the same prerogative of liberty, exemption and immunity; nor has any lord more nor any nobleman less liberty’.⁵⁴

Werbőczy account is ingenious, but flawed. The principle of royal election only historically applied when the king had no direct heir. Early sixteenth-century Hungary was emphatically not an elective monarchy. Moreover, as Werbőczy himself acknowledged in the same article where he affirmed the equality of all noblemen, there was a class of barons which enjoyed superior rights to the ordinary noblemen of the realm. His famous tag, una eademque libertás, was thus culled from a quite different context and misleadingly applied.⁵⁵ Furthermore, Werbőczy’s interest in demonstrating the unmediated bond between king and nobility compelled him to disregard the institution of familiaritas. For familiaritas might be seen to involve obligations which vitiated the personal connection between ruler and nobility. Similarly, Werbőczy omitted from his account the large class of ‘conditional’ nobles or prediales who mainly dwelled on church estates, holding land of an ecclesiastical lord in exchange for services.⁵⁶ And, since this would have further undermined his argumentation, Werbőczy felt it prudent not to mention the freemen who owned land but who did not qualify as noblemen.⁵⁷ Several centuries later, Werbőczy’s silence in regard to the stratum of freemen would contribute to its destruction.⁵⁸ By the same token, so we may assume, Werbőczy chose to include in the third part his largely fictional account of the transmission of cases from lesser jurisdictions to the royal courts in order to emphasize that all noblemen, irrespective of local circumstances, had equal access to the king’s judgment and grace.

For all its theoretical brilliance, Werbőczy’s construction served to restrict his intellectual vision. In order to explain the origins of Christian kingship and of land donation, Werbőczy included a description of how the early Hungarians had transferred from the community to the prince the right to distribute estates ‘together with the supreme power and government’.⁵⁹ Werbőczy’s version of the 53 I 3:7.

54 I 2:1. For the origins and context Werbőczy’s political ideas, see János Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14–16. Jahrhundert (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 74–9.

55 See below note 91.

56 Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Basingstoke and New York: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 79–95.

57 They are obliquely referred to in III 26:4.

58 Gusztáv Wenzel, Visszapillantás az előbbi magyar királyi curiának 1724–29 iki működésére [A retrospective on the operation of the older royal court in 1724–9] (Budapest: MTA Értekezések a társadalmi tudományok köréből, 1875), pp. 13–16.

59 I 3:6; II 3:2.

lex regia should, however, have presented him with difficulties when he came to discuss the origins of legislation. For if all government had been assigned to the prince, then the nobility surely had no right to share in the making of legislation. But Werbóczy chose to skirt the problem, proposing instead a dualist construction whereby the assent of both ruler and people was necessary for a law to be passed.⁶⁰ Possibly because of this hole in his argument, but possibly also because of political considerations, Werbóczy's account makes no mention of the diet and of the legislative authority that it had so recently gathered, partly indeed at his own instigation. Elsewhere, however, Werbóczy's account served to hem in the powers of the ruler, denying him the plenitudo potestatis to modify the law that had previously been recognized as a royal prerogative and right.⁶¹

The Tripartitum as Law

In 1514, Werbóczy presented the Tripartitum to the diet. In a manner reflecting the divided sovereignty of the late medieval polity, the compilation was sent for inspection to committees appointed respectively by the king and the estates. Reserving the final right of approval to the king, the decretum published at the diet's close authorized Władislas, as he saw fit, to seal and distribute the Tripartitum.⁶² We know that Władislas gave his approval to the text even before the diet's formal dissolution, but, contrary to expectation, the Tripartitum neither received the royal seal nor was it distributed by the chancellery. Werbóczy later explained these omissions by reference to the many cares which beset the king and the subsequent difficulties involved in any royal succession (after a long illness, Władislas died in March 1516).⁶³ This seems unlikely, but the alternative explanation sometimes offered by historians is equally implausible: that the barons moved the king to reject the Tripartitum on account of the una eademque clause.⁶⁴ It is more probable that the Tripartitum encountered general criticism, as is implied in both the Address to the King and one of the appended poems in the 1517 edition,⁶⁵ and that this coincided with a brief political check on Werbóczy's ambition which obliged him to relinquish his office of protonotary of the judge royal. By the summer of 1516, Werbóczy had evidently recovered politically, being appointed in August personalis judge of the young king, but the momentum had by this time been clearly lost.

After making a few revisions to his manuscript to take into account the decisions of the 1514 diet, Werbóczy had the Tripartitum published at his own expense by the printing house of Singriener (Singrenius) in Vienna. The bound volumes were then sent to the county-seats of the kingdom for public proclamation. By the standards of modern-day, computer-aided publication, the type-setting and printing of the Tripartitum was achieved in record time, a mere

60 II 3.

61 II 5; II 11:1. See thus Kathleen E. Garay, "Legislation under King Matthias I (Corvinus), 1458—1490," DRMH 3, pp. xix—xxxv (p. xxxiv).

62 1514: 63.

63 Author's Salutation, see below.

64 Thus Illés, Bevezetés, p. 133. But the Quadripartitum drawn up in the 1550s with the aim of superseding the Tripartitum retained the una eademque formula, which it would surely not have done had the clause been controversial.

65 See below, after the text of the Trip.

forty days, but is still unlikely to have cost the author more than a few hundred florins.⁶⁶

Even before its publication in Vienna, the Tripartitum had acquired a certain authority. A later source avers that it was feted as ‘the Decretum almost immediately upon its promulgation at the diet of 1514.’⁶⁷ Indeed, only shortly after its distribution, the diet confirmed its contents as law and instructed the courts of the realm to adjudicate according to its principles and procedures.⁶⁸ The opinion still to be found that the Tripartitum lacked any statutory authority is thus baseless. Nevertheless, and as Werbőczy knew, a decretum was itself insufficient to establish a fully valid legal institution, for authority rested on application and actual use.⁶⁹ Almost certainly, this was the case, for references were made at later meetings of the diet, including the riotous Hatvan diet of 1525 at which Werbőczy was elected palatine, to the need to improve upon parts of its text and to publish a revised version.⁷⁰ But no such revision was ever approved. In the absence of any competing collection, the Tripartitum was thus taken up by the courts, acquiring over time its own customary reputation. The steady sanction of use is reflected in the history of the *Tripartitum*s re-publication. Following the original 1517 printing, two further editions were issued by Singrenius in Vienna in 1545 and 1561.⁷¹ A Hungarian-language version under the title of the Magyar Decretum was next published in Debrecen in 1565, and a second Hungarian translation in Kolozsvár in 1571 for use in Transylvania. A Croatian edition (in at least three separate print-runs) followed in 1574, and a German in 1599.⁷² There was even a partial translation into Greek, probably for the benefit of visiting merchants.⁷³ Eventually, in 1628, the Tripartitum was included as the first of three volumes of the Corpus Juris Hungarici (CJH), which for the first time published those decreta which were recognized as holding force in the kingdom.⁷⁴ Even before this time, however, we know that the Tripartitum had gathered an authority which rendered it equivalent to any other published law. The earliest surviving Hungarian case file, dating from 1588, thus records an action based on no less authority than the Decreti Tripartiti partem secundum titulum quinquagesimum.⁷⁵

66 The rapidity of its production is noted on the final page of the 1517 edition, in the Corrigenda (omitted from the present edition). The cost of publication is based on Rudolf Hirsch, Printing, Selling and Reading, 1450–1550, 2nd edition (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1974), pp. 36–40.

67 Istvánffy, A magyarok történetéből, p. 45. In 1517, the personalis court issued a judgment which repeats a passage of the Tripartitum. See thus, Hungarian National Archive, Collectio Antemohácsiana, MNL Dl. 84630, cf I 45. The personalis judge was, of course at this time, Werbőczy himself, so the borrowing is not unexpected.

68 1518 (Bács): 41; Illés, Bevezetés, pp. 178–9.

69 II 2:9.

70 Illés, Bevezetés, pp. 180–1.

71 These later editions are listed and described in Csekey, A Tripartitum bibliográfiája.

72 For the Croatian edition, see Natasa Stefanec, “Pergosics Translation of the Tripartitum into Slavonian,” in Rady, Custom and Law, 71–85.

73 Tamás Vécsey, “Werbőczy görögül” [W in Greek], Századok 28 (1894): 485–9.

74 For the background and history of the CJH, see Andor Csizmadia, “Previous Editions of the Laws of Hungary,” DRMH 1, xvii–xxxiii; now see below among the Studies to medieval Hungarian law.

75 Hungarian National Archive, Section O, Class 01 (Processus octavales), Bundle 4, no 183, fol 6v.

After the Tripartitum

In the nine years between the publication of the Tripartitum and the battle of Mohács, Werbőczy remained in high office while continuing to play an active and increasingly dangerous role in politics. In 1518, he was along with Szobi instrumental in calling a diet, apparently without royal sanction, on which occasion he delivered a rousing speech to the assembled noblemen, recalling the glorious reign of Matthias, his international repute, and the terror he inspired in his foes. Under Matthias, Werbőczy declared, the boundaries of the kingdom had been extended and after his battles the severed heads of his enemies were piled in carts. By contrast, the kingdom today was on its knees, and had fallen into decline, oppression and ignominy, with its king being only a minor.⁷⁶ For his contribution to the decretum published at the diet's close, the assembled noblemen voted him a fresh cash payment. Three years later, the diet elected Werbőczy treasurer on behalf of the estates, with responsibility for raising taxation and buying mercenaries. Despite methodical planning on Werbőczy's part, the tax levy yielded only a fraction of that intended.⁷⁷ In the meantime, Belgrade fell to the Turks (1521), breaching the kingdom's fortress wall.

With the Turks pressing their military advantage, the kingdom's politics fell into chaos. In the Rákos diet of May 1525, fierce verbal attacks were made on the king's main advisers and on the German influence at court, which was supposed to have grown following the king's marriage to Mary of Habsburg. Werbőczy joined in the fray, accusing the deputy royal treasurer of embezzlement and denouncing the 'half-Jews' and 'vipers' in the kingdom. When the young King Louis arrived at the diet, Werbőczy turned on him, asking why the country's laws had not been put into effect. He then pushed home his own demands: that only Hungarians be allowed in court, that the royal council follow the laws enacted by the diet, and that only good coin be minted. The decretum composed by a committee of the diet incorporated Werbőczy's recommendations. The diet also agreed to reconvene in July, eventually obtaining the king's consent to its reassembly. Werbőczy was now convinced that a turning-point had come. He wrote to a friend, 'The time has arrived when troubles will have their end; a new dawn awaits his royal majesty and the country'.⁷⁸

The Hatvan diet of July 1525 was the high point in Werbőczy's political career. It opened with him delivering a two-hour speech and proceeded to adopt a radical program of reform devised largely by himself. Amidst much noise, the diet acclaimed Werbőczy palatine. Respecting the popular origin of his new office, Werbőczy took the unprecedented step of officially declaring himself 'palatine and servant of the kingdom of Hungary' (Regni Hungariae palatinus et servus). And yet, Werbőczy depended on John Szapolyai no less than on the diet. The voivode of Transylvania was a magnet for all those disaffected with royal policy, including some who had previously been close to the faction gathered around the king. Werbőczy had most probably stood earlier in Szapolyai's service as protonotary of his court and a personal connection evidently remained. As the papal envoy reported shortly after Werbőczy's election as palatine, 'So much is certain: that the voivode's power grows greater than the king's; the palatine is his creature... The voivode is king in fact, even though he has not yet proclaimed himself as such'. As if to hasten matters, supporters of the voivode plotted the death of the king with the aim of installing Szapolyai on the throne and having him marry Louis' widow.⁷⁹

76 Eötvös Loránd University of Budapest Library, MSS, Litterae et epistolae originales, no 15, pp. 181—3.

77 Kubinyi, "István Werbőczy als Politiker," p. 570.

78 Fraknói, Werbőczy István életrajza, p. 199.

At this critical juncture, Werbőczy made two mistakes. In 1524, the massive Újlaki inheritance passed to the crown on account of the death without heir of its last holder, Lawrence. John Szapolyai claimed the heritage on the grounds of a mutual inheritance pact concluded between his and Újlaki's family some thirty years before. Against this, it was alleged that on account of Lawrence having previously acquired the 'taint of infidelity', the pact had been voided and that the Újlaki estate thus belonged to the royal right. At the end of 1525, a further claimant appeared in the form of the new husband of Lawrence's widow, Ladislas Móré, who declared that the lion's share of the property belonged to his wife as it descended through the female line. The case which had originally been adjudicated in Szapolyai's favour was thus reopened in court, with Werbőczy presiding as palatine. Although it was expected that Werbőczy would find for Szapolyai, he instead judged in favour of Ladislas's plaint, earning thereby Szapolyai's displeasure. Secondly, Werbőczy began around this time his own persecution of the Lutherans in the northern mining towns, exaggerating their role in disturbances which had broken out there in the early months of 1526. He also impelled the Buda magistracy to arrest Lutherans in the city. Under torture, some of these named several members of the queen's entourage as their co-religionists. Louis' young queen, Mary of Habsburg, whose own beliefs were clearly heterodox, had thus to intervene, pardoning the Lutherans so accused.⁸⁰

In the space of just several months, Werbőczy had managed to alienate both Szapolyai and the pro-Habsburg faction which gathered around the queen. The reckoning was not long in coming and was indeed expected.⁸¹ In April 1526, the king summoned a diet that was packed with his own supporters. On the eve of its meeting, Werbőczy desperately sought to raise personal loans, possibly with the aim of mounting his own coup.⁸² The diet was not, however, to be prevented. Following the king's instructions, the gathered nobles denounced the Hatvan diet as illegal, dismissed Werbőczy as palatine, and demanded his trial for infidelity. A few days later, the personalis summoned Werbőczy and his patron Szobi to be tried by the diet. Both instead fled to their estates, where Werbőczy plotted the convocation of a new assembly. Found guilty by the diet of calling an illegal diet, of insurrection and of stealing the office of palatine, Werbőczy was spared arrest and the loss of all his estates only by the death of the king at Mohács on 29 August, 1526.

Within only a few months of Mohács, Werbőczy had returned to John 79 Ibid, pp. 199, 213.

80 Fraknói, Werbőczy István életrajza, pp. 224—6.

81 Kubinyi, "István Werbőczy als Politiker," p. 572.

82 Hungarian National Archive, Collectio antemohácsiana, MNL OL DI. 24281.

Szapolyai's favor. It was thus at Werbőczy's behest that Benedict Bekényi, otherwise Werbőczy's familiáris and author of two of the poems appended to the first edition of the Tripartitum, was sent to Pozsony (Bratislava) to negotiate Szapolyai's marriage to Queen Mary (she refused him outright).⁸³ Likewise, it was Werbőczy who at the diets of Tokaj and Székesfehérvár prepared the way for Szapolyai's election as king. On the occasion of the first of these, he publicly denounced his previous royal masters as being respectively 'an old woman' and 'blind', and announced that it was divine providence that had spared the voivode from the slaughter at Mohács. At the second, the acclamation of the new ruler was accompanied by a reading of the demand given in 1505 decretum for a 'national' king. The decretum was then pinned to a lance to serve as a rallying-point for Szapolyai's supporters. The next day, on 11 November, Szapolyai was crowned John I of Hungary in the cathedral of Székesfehérvár. But despite Werbőczy's efforts, many of those who had rallied to the 1505 decretum and acclaimed John as king still attended the coronation of Archduke Ferdinand held the next year, also in Székesfehérvár and presided over by the same bishop.

The national program hung with the fortunes of King John. Pursuing his own rights as king, however, Ferdinand sent his own armies into Hungary, forcing John to retreat to the very edge of the kingdom. As Werbőczy saw it, should Ferdinand triumph, a foreign ruler would occupy the throne, subordinating Hungarian interests to those of a much larger empire than that of the Jagiello kings. Accordingly, he accepted the inevitability of an alliance with the sultan. On 18 August 1529, Werbőczy thus stood beside John on the field of Mohács to welcome the sultan's army into the kingdom, before it moved on to eject Ferdinand's forces from Buda and to put Vienna under siege. With the weight of the Ottoman Empire now behind John, Ferdinand was readier to negotiate. During the 1530s, a number of schemes were put forward to end the conflict between John and Ferdinand. Although primarily involved over these years with restoring the kingdom's shattered government and with asserting the primacy of the chancellery in its workings, Werbőczy was also involved in a number of the embassies and meetings which sought to end the country's division. Nevertheless, the peace of Várád (1538) which Werbőczy helped negotiate, threatened the end of the national monarchy for which he had striven. By its terms, John would hold the office of ruler only during his lifetime, after which the crown would pass to Ferdinand and his heirs. As it turned out, however, upon John's death in 1540, the faction gathered around his queen, the Polish princess Isabella, repudiated the terms of the Várád peace and had John's baby son, John Sigismund, installed as his successor. In one of his last public acts on behalf of a king of Hungary, Werbőczy visited the sultan in Constantinople in order to enlist his support for the queen and royal infant. But Suleiman's support came at the price of the kingdom, the central portion of which he occupied the next year, only a few months before Werbőczy's own death in Ottoman service.

Werbőczy's reputation as a politician has always been an uneven one. Even in his own lifetime, he was vilified as self-seeking and as having sold his tongue and country.⁸⁴ The earliest historical verdict on his political career was equally harsh: ‘While he was alive he lamented with many tears and groans his country’s destruction and merciless servitude, which he may rightly and deservedly be accused of having brought about.’⁸⁵ Other historians have indicated his greed as evinced by the myriad of properties he acquired, and his responsibility for enshrining in law the subjugation of the peasantry.⁸⁶ In respect, however, of his career in the law, Werbőczy has always been less controversial and more valued. Although ‘a bad politician’, he was, in the words of a recent historian, ‘a good lawyer’.⁸⁷ Feted in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries when his work was instrumental in confronting Habsburg absolutism, he was, in the words of his first biographer, Hermogenes, Bracton and Tribonian rolled into one.⁸⁸ To these, his second biographer added the name of Ulpian.⁸⁹ On the whole, it has been only Josephinists, doctrinaire liberals and Marxists who have scorned his text. Indeed, in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, his work in ‘unifying’ the nation through the establishment of a body of ‘national law’ propelled Werbőczy into the crowded pantheon of Hungarian heroes. Even his portraiture changed. Whereas the earliest depictions had given him a chin-curtain beard and narrow moustache, later nineteenth-century versions gave him the fuller beard and features of Louis Kossuth.⁹⁰ In tribute to Werbőczy, Franz Joseph commissioned a marble statue which was completed in 1908 by the sculptor Gyula Donáth and erected in the centre of Pest beside the legal faculty of the university. The statue shows Werbőczy in vigorous pose while beneath him rests a copy of the Tripartitum. As the commission of Kossuth’s great adversary, it is only to be expected that the artist should have reverted to the chin-curtain beard.⁹¹

83 For this and much of what follows, see Fraknói, Werbőczy István életrajza, pp. 241—350.

Werbőczy’s statue was pulled down by a communist gang in 1945 and has not been restored. The fifty-sixth edition of the Tripartitum and its first English translation, must stand instead to his memory.⁹²

84 Kubinyi, “István Werbőczy als Politiker,” p. 571.

85 Istvánffy A magyarok történetéből, p. 179.

86 Pál Szende, Werbőczy (Budapest: Deutsch, 1907), p. 8; Bálint Hóman and Gyula Szekfű, Magyar történet, 3rd edition, vol 2, (Budapest: Királyi Magyar Egyetem, 1936), pp. 591—2

87 Bónis, “Men Learned in the Law,” p. 191

88 Paul Wallaszky (Valaszky), De Stephano Verbőczio icto celeberrimo dissertatio (Leipzig: Langenhemia, 1768), p. 15.

89 Imre Palugyay (ifj), Werbőczy István rövid életrajza [A short biography of I. W.] (Buda: Magyar Királyi Egyetem, 1842), p. 4.

90 See thus Katalin Gönczi, “Werbőczy’s Reception in Hungarian Legal Culture,” in Rady, Custom and Law, 87—99, pp. 96—7.

91 The statue and circumstances of its erection are described in Endre Liber, Budapest szobrai és emléktáblái [Statues and commemorative plaques in Budapest], (Budapest: Székesfőváros Háziny., 1934), pp. 293—7. (I am most grateful to László Péter for providing me with the relevant pages.)

92 For technical reasons a note had to be dropped -- JMB

Tripartitum opus iuris consuetudinarii
incltyti regni Hungariæ per magistrum Stephanum de Werbewcz personalis præsentie regiæ maiestatis locum tenentem
accuratissime editum

Magister Stephanus de Werbewcz personalis presentie regie maiestatis locum tenens:
lectoribus salutem

Cum serenissimus idemque clementissimus dominus Wladislaus Hungariæ & Bohemiæ &c. Rex superioribus annis tum sua sponte permotus, tum frequentibus uniuscuiusque ordinis subditorum suorum precibus exoratus eas leges easque consuetudines quibus a longa iam temporum serie res iudiciaria hoc in regno tot inter bellorum ac seditionum æstus utcunque firmissime stetit ad iuris scripti normam ac rationem revocare decrevisset. Cæteros inter qui maiestati suæ & fide & observantia erant addicti me ultro deligendum duxit qui id muneris explerem, ut tot disiecta ac divulsa municipalium huius regni Hungariæ consuetudinum & constitutionum membra in unum velut corpus coacta & scripturæ adminiculo illustrata in omnem posteritatem propagarentur. Hanc vero ipse provinciam licet meæ imbecilitatis conscius non tam virium fidutia quam obsequendi necessitate suscepi, & quoad suppetebat facultas pro ingenioli tenuitate longis diuturnisque laboribus ad calcem usque perduxi. Cum interim regio iussu reliqui quoque Prothonotarii mihi per id temporis collegæ iudicarii insuper iurati assessores sedis iudiciariæ regiæ & plerique alii tam in divino quam humano iure diu multumque versati ad hæc omnia discutienda, recensenda & ad amussim trutinanda fuerant adhibiti, quibus ex sententia peractis in publico demum ac generali dieta & conventu dominorum prælatorum ac baronum nobiliumque & procerum regni huius universorum anno salutis humanæ quarto & decimo supra millesimum quingentesimum, rusticana seditione quæ paulo ante irrepererat excisa & sublata, ad diem divo Lucæ Evangelistæ dicatam celebrato idem princeps omnium cum flagitatione ac plausu hoc domestici iuris compendium suo ductu atque auspiciis lucubratum conceptis verbis ac viva voce comprobavit. Et regio imperio regiæque authoritatis plenitudine roboratum irrevocabili sanctione firmavit. Pollicitus insuper id ipsum opus membranis conscriptum sese regionatim per universam Hungariam muneris loco transmissurum. Sed cum prolixioris esset negotii tam ingentem legum acervum in quinquaginta & amplius exemplaria transfundi; Tot enim & plures sunt districtus ac regiones (eas nostri comitatus appellant) quas huius muneris seorsum ac separatim particeps esse oportuit. Rex interim ipse ad conventus Posonii Wienneque indictos rebus regnorum suorum exigentibus concessit, Ubi publicis privatisque cum excellentissimis principibus Maximiliano Romanorum electo Cæsare semper Augusto, ac Sigismundo Poloniae rege fratre suo germano negotiis pertractandis toto vere ac maiore æstatis parte transacta ad regnum tandem regressus in ea licet stabili fixaque hæreret sententia ut ipsa municipalia regni sui iura, primo quoque tempore in lucem æderentur. Aliis tamen super aliis ingruentibus rebus inter eiusmodi moras divino nutu fatali vitæ perfunctus spacio ad cœlestem patriam commigravit. Sed ne hoc opus tanto studio tantisque vigiliis elaboratum ac firmissimo regiæ potestatis robore (dempta dumtaxat sigilli appensione) munitum & confirmatum in obscuro delitesceret, & paulatim oblitterata rerum memoria in nihilum redigeretur quo nihil huic quidem regno deterius nihilque perniciosius in causis præsertim discernendis iusticiaque ministranda fieri aut excogitari posset has easdem consuetudines & leges municipales nullo penitus sensu ordineque immutato sub ea qua prius formula atque contextu editæ fuerant in publicum ædendas, Utque id laciis pluribusque pateret Calcographorum industria excudendas curavi. Opto autem ut quiquis has meas lucubrationes in manus sumpserit æquus sit in me iudex bonique consulat. Nam licet quantum mediocritate valui summum in his quærendis atque explicandis studium adhibuerim qua tamen doctrina me quod exigua sermoneque haud satis perpolito esse profiteor tantum abest ut si quid in meis scriptis vel erratum quispiam emendaverit vel prætermisum adiecerit ut aut succenseam aut indigner ut eo etiam nomine sim illi (quisquis tandem is fuerit) cumulatissimas gratias habiturus. Quoniam errare sæpius ac falli proprium est hominis, & minus mirum est memoriam aliquarum rerum excidere quam omnium constare. Valete.

Wladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemiæ, Dalmatiæ, Croatiae, Ramæ, Serviæ, Galliciaë, Lodomeriæ, Comaniæ Bulgariæque rex, ac Slesię & Lucemburgensis dux, necnon Moraviæ & Lusatiæ marchio, ad perpetuam rei memoriam; cum supremus omnium rerum opifex ab ipso primordio rationalis creaturæ conditæ ac procreatæ eam in genere humano varietatem atque id discrimen esse voluerit ut pars hominum subesse, pars præesse, alii imperare, alii parere deberent. Alios quidem reges & principes qui cæteris æquo iure imperarent. Alios subditos qui illorum iussa imperia capescerent esse statuit, atque in hunc duplicem ordinem totum genus humanum sapientissime est partitus. Reges porro ipsos duabus potissimum artibus instructos atque ornatos esse voluit legibus & armis: ut armis quidem hostes propulsati procul a finibus arcerentur. Leges autem regnicolas civesque domi in officio continerent, & summos cum infimis ac mediocribus, opulentos ac potentiores cum egentioribus infirmioribusque æquo iure vivere cogerent. Hæc etenim duæ res tantopere sunt unicuique principi necessariæ ut his sublatis nihil firmum, nihil stabile, nihil inter homines concors & pacatum esse queat; adeo vero sibi invicem coherentes simulque firmissimis vinculis & indissolubilibus chatenis connexæ ut separari ac disiungi nequaquam possint. Quis enim ignorat, neque arma tunc foris quicquam prodesse cum domi plus improbi atque iniusti quam boni cives valeant & frustra iudicia ac leges implorari cum aures regnicolarum civiumque terror hostilis circumsonat. Nos itaque qui nutu ac providentia divina ad hoc sublime solium evecti, & tot terris, tot populis, tot denique potentissimis ac ferocissimis nationibus atque imperiis sumus præpositi semper ab initio principatus nostri omnes nostras curas, cogitationes, labores conatus omnia studia & consilia nostra eo direximus & contulimus ut his duabus artibus subditos nostros in pace & tranquillitate contineremus. Nam & armis (quoad per nos fieri potuit) tutos eos ab hoste præstitimus, & in iusticia administranda nihil a nobis prætermisum est quod a iusto & diligentissimo principe præstari debuerit. Et postquam huius inclyti regni Hungariæ sceptrum atque imperium benignitate dei adepti sumus & sacro eius diademate redimiti; Post belli studia, postquam regnum ipsum tam metu hostili quam seditionibus domesticis liberatum prima nobis ac precipua cura fuit ad regnum ipsum & subditos nostros pace etiam domestica & legibus firmitus & stabilius reddendum. Itaque & eo ipso tempore & postea non semel varias constitutiones & statuta partim sponte nostra propria, partim præcibus & supplicatione fidelium nostrorum dominorum prælatorum et baronum ceterorumque procerum & nobilium edidimus, saluti ac quieti libertatique ipsius regni nostri hoc pacto acuratissime consulentes; licet & antea non defuerint quædam iura regni quæ quia nulla scriptura continebantur consuetudines potius appellari poterant. Verum quia & ex huiusmodi constitutionum a nobis æditarum & illorum regni iurium diversa interpretatione magna plerumque oriebantur incommoda aliis alio prout cuique libitum erat sensum & interpretationem earum trahentibus. Et quibusdam in iudicando vel iudicio postulando regni consuetudinem aliis constitutionum formulam sequentibus atque allegantibus, ita ut non inter eos solum, quorum causa ageretur, sed inter ipsos etiam iudices ac iurium regni consultissimos & peritissimos magna interdum super huiusmodi legum, consuetudinum et constitutionum interpretatione contentio oriretur, ut quandoque hi qui plus viribus & potentia quam legibus & iusticia fiderent tribunal iudicum magno asseclarum agmine aggressi quod ratione & legibus nequirent clamore & multitudine obtinere contenderent, & qui iure inferiores essent superiores tamen esse & vincere non iure sed tumultu ac multitudine niterentur. Neque vero iudicum & magistrorum Prothonotariorum iura regni allegantium autoritas apud illos valebat. Cum enim iura ipsa nulla scripturae firmitate fulcirentur, quicquid legum vel consuetudinum in medium proferebatur, id illi vel in contrariam sententiam trahentes, vel aliter ab aliis iudicibus & in aliis iudiciis tractum atque intellectum asserentes omnes iudicandi rationes turpissime confundebant; ita frequenter contingebat, ut in qua causa quispiam antea victoria potitus esset in eadem vel simili alter succumberet & superaretur. Cum autem his & eius generis erroribus plena ac referta essent omnia, & ex huiusmodi constitutionum & regni consuetudinum tam varia ac multiplici interpretatione tam lata calumniatoribus via pateret animique tam iudicantium quam eorum de quorum causis agerent in tantis tenebris versarentur: nos quibus nihil prius antiquiusque est quam subitos nostros in omni pace & tranquillitate conservare excitati etiam praecibus & continuis querelis praedictorum fidelium nostrorum fideli nostro egregio magistro Stephano de Werbewcz iudicis curiae nostrae Prothonotario curam omnium ipsius regni nostri iurium, legum & consuetudinum constitutionumque receptarum atque approbatarum, earum videlicet quae in ipso regno nostro & praesertim in aula nostra regia iudicandis & decidendis causis ac sententiis ferendis sequi ac observari consuevissent, in unum colligendi atque in titulos (ut fit) & capita distinguendi ut ea postea nobis oblata ac per caeteros magistros Prothonotarios: & sedis nostrae iudiciariae iuratos coassessores revisa, discussa ac diligenter trutinata in unum volumen redigerentur. Ut iam gens etiam nostra Hungarica sicut aliae omnes fere nationes & provinciae bene & sapienter institutae in iudiciis decernendis & iusticiae administratione non sola consuetudine quae plerumque mutari & labilis esse solet sed iure scripto & fidissimis litterarum monumentis illustrato niteretur. Demum nobis in praesenti conventu & congregatione generali eorundem universorum prelatorum & baronum, regni huius nobilium quam eisdem certis & arduis de causis ad festum beati Lucae Evangelistae proxime praeteritum indixeramus constitutis iidem prelati & barones ac nobiles universi nostrum accedentes in conspectum quendam libellum gentilia municipaliaque iura ac leges & consuetudines eorum vetustas & receptas continentem nostro iussu a praefato magistro Stephano collectum & conscriptum nobis obtulerunt, supplicantes ut quia ipsi eum libellum in cunctis suis clausulis, articulis & capitulis pervenerabilem Paulum de Warda praepositum sancti Sigismundi proventuum nostrorum regalium administratorem, ac magnificentum Benedictum de Batthyan huius castris nostri Budensis castellanum, necnon egregios magistros Iohannem de Ellyewelgh Palatinalem, ac Albertum de Bellyen & Paulum de Bolyar personalis praesentiae nostrae Prothonotarios, Item Stephanum Kesserew de Gybarth regni huius nostri Hungariae Vicepalatinum, Georgium de Mekche secretarium nostrum, Michaelem de Zob, ac Paulum de Dombo iurato assessores dictae sedis nostrae iudiciariae, & Stephanum Henczelffy de Pettrowcz directorem causarum nostrarum regalium perlegi, revideri, discuti & examinari faciendo super eorum legibus & approbatis consuetudinibus recto ordine & debito modo conscriptum esse agnovissent; propterea ipsum libellum & omnia in eo contenta quoad omnes clausulas, sensus, capita & articulos in formam nostri privilegii redigi faciendo admittere & approbare eisdemque & eorum heredibus ac posteritatibus pro perpetuis legibus & consuetudinibus valiturum autoritate nostra regia & de regiaē nostrę potestatis plenitudine roborare & confirmare dignemur. Cuius quidem libelli tenor sequitur in hæc verba.

Serenissimo principi & domino, domino Wladislao dei gratia regi Hungarię & Bohemię, &c. domino suo clementissimo, Magister Stephanus de Werbewcz iudicis curię serenitatis vestrę Prothonotarius servitorum suorum humilimam commendationem. Quanquam domestica ac gentilia regni huius inclyti Hungarię iura certam in seriem formulamque & ordinem redigere, ac litterarum monumentis illustrare arduum & perdifficile ac humano prope modum ingenio maius esse videatur, Quippe cum apud nostrates eo in genere nihil hactenus extiterit, aut origine diuturnum, aut sanctione stabile, aut perenni usu ac observantia roboratum sed ex cuiusque fere principis ac regis nutu & arbitrio novę constitutiones novaque edicta per singulos nedum ætates, sed paucissimorum quoque annorum spatia emanaverint. Quę cum inter sese plerumque dissideant, & adversis quasi frontibus obluctentur in unum velut corpus convenire & coalescere haud facile possunt. Ad hoc accedit quod ea omnia quę vel forensibus in causis emergunt, vel ad iudiciorum rationem accomodantur memorię tenere supra hominis captum facultatemque videtur existere. Quę cum ita se habeant tamen maiestatis vestrę iussionibus quibus non usque quaque parere piaculum semper duxi morem gerere cupiens sarcinam meis humeris longe imparem subire non formidavi, qui proprię licet imbecillitatis conscius, Tantum enim abest ut mihi quippiam maioris industrię aut eruditionis attribuam ut meos etiam inter æquales ac eiusdem professionis studiosos me in postremis herere non inficiar. Vestrę tamen maiestatis secundissimo ductu vestrisque felicibus auspiciis rem his regionibus ad hunc usque diem inauditam, & per tot sæculorum lapsus magno dedecore sed maiori iactura neglectam aggrediar, statuta scilicet & decreta ac leges & consuetudines regni hactenus divulsa, mutila, confusa & male cohærentia in unum connectere ac conglutinare in scriptisque redacta vestrę maiestati ad communem usum provulganda, summa cum obsequendi propensitate offerre. Nec ulla est res quam vel vestra maiestas mihi maiori cum sua laude demandare, vel ego alacriori animo suscipere quivissem. Quid enim regio splendore dignius suorum subditorum quieti ac tranquillitati accomodacius prestare potuisset quam post bella & armorum strepitus quibus hostilis metus procul depellitur pacis curam gerere? quę nisi iuris moderatione contineatur stabilis firmaque esse non valet. Perspicuum est autem plus multo obesse intestinas discordias quam externa bella ac plures potentioresque republicas esse veneno domestico quam hostilibus armis subversas. Opere precium autem duxi pro maiestatis vestrę voto universas regni consuetudines ac leges & decreta dilucido, aperto ac unicuique facile exposito stilo perscribere, & in capita, titulos ac articulos redigere ut deinceps prima legum nostri regni rudimenta non ab antiquis illis fabulis quibus hactenus omne fere tempus aliis atque aliis edendis iuribus inaniter contrivimus sed ab ipso litterarum aditu ac sacrario ab ipsoque civilis disciplinę fonte depromantur in animisque cuiusque altius insideant tenatiusque radidentur. Quę quidem res (mea ut fertur sententia) eo gratior toti est futura prosperitati quo atavi progenitoresque nostri ab eiusmodi institutionibus videntur alieniores fuisse. Gens enim nostra a prima ipsa nascentis imperii origine rebus dumtaxat bellicis intenta cæteris disciplinis minus videtur incubuisse. Hungari namque a Scythicis populis progressi vel propagati relicto patrio regno in superiori quę citra ultraque Danubium diffunditur Pannonia consederunt, ac duce Atilla fines imperii longe lateque propagantes, Germanię, Italię ac Hispaniarum limites victricibus armis penetrarunt. Divo tandem rege Stephano authore velut iubare quodam cœlitus demisso superstitione ac gentilitate penitus eliminata fidei Catholicę dogma susceperet. Nec gens aliqua postmodum aut natio (absit invidia verbo) pro reipublicę Christianę tutela & propagatione acrius aut constantius ipsis Hungaris excubuit. Qui cum omni Machometricę fęditatis barbarię in variis ancipitibusque preliis diu ac multum cum ingenti sua laude versati & (ut vetustiora pręteream) annos circiter centum supra quadraginta nunc oppugnantes, nunc repugnantes cum immanibus Thurcis cruentissima bella gessere. Et per eorum sanguinem, cędes ac vulnera reliquam Christianitatem (ne hostilis rabies velut fractis obicibus remotius sese effunderet) tutam incolumnemque reddiderunt, ea fortitudine roboraque naturę ut plerumque in armis vitam degerent. Nullis questuariis aut vulgaribus artibus dediti sola militia nobilitatem definierunt. Quo factum est ut ad leges ipsas vel exactiori cura sanctiendas, vel maturiori examine promulgandas nec ocium, nec tempus satis idoneum superfuerit. Sed iam maiestatis vestrę singulari cura ac providentia propediem fore video ut ne in hac quoque laude cęteris nationibus inferiores esse videamur. Tu inquam optime ac Christianissime rex, ut solii sublimitate cęteris omnibus pręstas ita incredibili ac prope cęlesti virtute abundas quę religionis observantia ac dei veri cultu maxime illustratur. Ideo nullę non modo actiones, sed ne cogitatus quidem tui cęlesti numine vacant. Et id ratione quidem optima. Iusti enim sumus si pietatem qua religiose deum colimus, pręsentem semper coramque habuerimus. Humana enim iustitia nisi a divina manet (quę pietas est) eam esse iniustitiam summam reor. Me etenim Cipriani gloriosissimi martiris sententia delectat: Iusticia regis (inquit) pax est populorum, tutamen patrię, munimentum plebis, protectio gentis, cura languorum, gaudium hominum, temperies æris, serenitas maris, terrę fecunditas, solatium pauperum, hęreditas filiorum & sibimetipsis spes futurę beatitudinis. Ipsa autem iustitia non tam natura quam disciplina acquiritur, & ea quidem disciplina quam nobis legum ac iuris scientia subministrat. Quam ait Euripides Hespero ac Lucifero magis esse mirabilem. Hęc inquam una virtus sola est domina omnium & regina virtutum, fundamentum perpetuę commendationis & famę. Ideo Agisileus cum de fortitudine iusticiaque rogaretur utra esset melior, nihil (ait) fortitudine indigeremus si iusti omnes essemus. Rex enim humanarum omnium ea natura est ut constantiam nullam diucius servent, sed fluctuent semper ac nutent. Fortuna quippe ipsa quam levis, quam inconstans, quam fallax sit Assiriorum, Medorum, Persarum, Macedonum Romanorumque docent imperia. Sola ipsa iusticia est, quę sibipsi constat, quę nulli mutationi subicitur, sed eadem est semper & incredibilem secum affert firmitatem. Quam ob rem maiestati vestrę communi omnium vestrorum subditorum nomine ingentes atque immortales gratias & ago & habeo quod eo legum ac constitutionum robore huius inclyti vestri regni munimenta stabilire volueritis, quę nulla unquam sit neque fortunę malignitas, nec hominum iniuria concussura. Quis enim ignorat ad salutem vitamque hominum & quietam & beatam inventas esse leges? sine quibus nec domus ulla, nec civitas, nec gens, nec hominum universorum genus stare, nec rerum natura omnis, nec ipse mundus potest. Quarum quidem quis nam primus fuerit inventor non satis constat. Hebręi sane hunc Mosen fuisse volunt. Athenienses Cecropem, ac Solonem, Argivi Phoroneum, Cretenses Minoa ac Radamanthum, Lacedęmonii Licurgum, Ægyptii Trismegistum, Persę vero Zoroastem. Sed quisquis tandem ille fuerit tale humano generi attulit munus quo maius ac salubris vix a cęlesti numine optare fas est. Sunt enim leges totius humanę vitę duces ac moderatores. Totę sint in æquitate, in prudentia, in profundissima denique sapientia constitutę; totę ad genus humanum regendum, gubernandum, defendendum excogitatę; totę ad vitam bene beateque peragendam adinventę. Iccirco nullum imperium, nulla respublica sine legibus potest esse diuturna. Arma enim imperia parant, leges parta conservant. Sunt enim leges muri ac fundamenta civitatis. In his salus bonorum, in his pacis consilia continentur. Quod stamus, quod incedimus, quod dormimus, quod denique secure vitam agimus id totum est iuris ac legum defensionis tribuendum. Quibus sublatis bonis viris aut nullus est locus in civitate aut turpissimis semper afficerentur iniuriis. Remotanamque iusticia teste beato Augustino quid sunt regna nisimagna latrocinia?

Leges sunt quæ nos a periculis ignominiaque tuentur, quæ sicarios arcent & crassatores ac insidiarum pericula longe lateque repellunt. Quæ denique in summo nos ocio atque in summa tranquillitate custodiunt. Iccirco nihil hac quidem tempestate fieri potuit ineffabili preconio dignus, aut ad perennem gloriam consequendam efficacius. Sed nec vestris florentissimis regnis indissolubili concordie nexu stabiliendis aptius quam quod vestræ maiestatis ductu & autoritate leges ac huius regni sanctiones densissimis tenebris & caligine prius obrutæ scriptiois nitore illustratæ tanta cum vestra dignitate provulgentur. Quam quidem provinciam ubi primum mihi demandare vestra maiestas dignata est licet, ut ingenue fatear, omne studium, omnem industriam ac solertiam eo contulerim ut pro virili vestræ maiestati quam plenissime obtemperarem. SCIO tamen non defuturos qui invidiæ facibus excitati huic tanto tamque omnibus profuturo labori detrahere non desistant. Hæc est enim furentis invidiæ consuetudo utinea semperquam prestantiora accumulatio laude sunt digna viventis, ac rabidissimos morsus exacuat. Sed plane confido maiestatem vestram me facile ab teterrimis illius monstri faucibus erepturam, & ipse quoque vestro velut clipeo munitus quæcumque calumniatores vibraturi sunt iacula intrepide, vel retundam, vel sustinebo. Satis autem superque premii pro hac navata opera me arbitrabor consequutum si & patriæ cuius insita optimi cuiusque animo ingens est charitas hac in parte videbor consuluisse & maiestati vestræ cui me perpetuo dedidi ac devovi pro viribus obtemperasse, quam etiam atque etiam oro & obsecro ut has meas vigiliis vestro sacratissimo nomini dedicatas iterum atque iterum perlegere, discutere ac recensere non gravetur. Et cum ea sit operum humanorum conditio ut nihil fiat adeo politum adeove absolutum ut non in melius reformari possit pro exactissimo vestro iudicii acumine quæ vel resecanda, vel inmutanda, vel addenda duxeritis ea ita castigatissima vestræ censuræ linea corrigatis & emendetis ut æmulis ac malivolis nullus detrahendi locus relinquatur. Nemo autem id sibi persuadeat me tamen mihi autoritatis vendicasse ut novas aliquas leges afferre ac superaddere fuerim ausus, sed ea dumtaxat, quæ a maioribus meis accepi, quæque observari in pertractandis iudiciis causisque discutiendis vidi, audivi, didici, in unum quasi volumen contuli ac digessi, consilio tamen cum cæteris meis collegis & patrii iuris ac consuetudinum non ignaris prius communicato. Quod opus nunc maiestati vestræ offero & dedico eamque supplex deprecor dignetur has meas lucubrationes hilari fronte excipere & eis si digne videbuntur suam sacro sanctam autoritatem in partiri omnibusque suæ ditioni parentibus observandas proponere. Mentis autem potius effectum, quam rei quæ offertur exiguitatem maiestas vestra metiatur. Hęc enim quantulacumque oblatio ex obedientiæ sinceritatisque officina emanavit. In posterum vero quantum viribus consequi potero omni studio, cura, industria conabor ut mea obsequia maiestati vestræ usui esse re ipsa comprobentur. Voluntas certe fidesque nunquam aberit. Valeat vestra maiestas rex excellentissime diu multumque fœlix. LEges itaque et consuetudines approbatas inclyti regni Hungariæ descripturus quedam notabilia presentem materiam concernentia compendiose præmittere institui. Primo quidem de iusticia. Secundo vero de iure & divisione iuris. Tertio autem de lege & speciebus legis. Quarto quidem de consuetudine & conditionibus eius. Quinto nempe & ultimo de conditionibus boni iudicis & aliis rebus ad iudicium iustum spectantibus apposita quæstione, utrum iudex secundum allegata & probata, vel secundum conscientiam ut ipse novit iudicare teneatur? Quibus breviter prehabitis dei gloriosi adiutorio propositum aggrediar, atque municipales leges & approbatas consuetudines ipsius regni Hungariæ, quibus communiter in iudiciis utimur (prout memoria & ingenioli capacitate comprehendere potero) seriatim absolvam.

[Prologus]

De iusticia quid sit diffinitive et de eius divisione.

Iusticia igitur est constans & perpetua voluntas, ius suum unicuique tribuens, & hoc non quantum ad actum semper sed quantum ad affectum. Iusticia enim est animi dispositio & mentis affectus, qua quis dicitur iustus dum videlicet quis sine personarum acceptione & distinctione velit cuilibet quantum in se est ius suum tribuere. [§1] Item iusticia est habitus bonus tribuens cuique suam dignitatem: deo religionem, parentibus obedientiam, maioribus reverentiam, paribus concordiam, minoribus disciplinam, sibipsi castimoniam & pauperibus ac miseris compassionem operosam. [§2] Item aliter iusticia est habitus animi (communi utilitate servata) suam unicuique tribuens dignitatem, & sic est congrua dispositio animi singulis in rebus recte diudicans causas beato enim Gregorio teste in rebus humanis summum bonum est iusticiam colere & unicuique iura sua servare. Nam ubi est iusticia, ibi est omnium reliquarum virtutum concordia omnes enim virtutum species (ut inquit Hieronymus) uno iusticiæ nomine continentur cui astipulatur, versiculus ille Hesiodi Iusticia in sese virtutes continet omnes, quæ preclarissima virtutum eo splendore mortalium oculos perstringit ut affirmet Aristoteles neque hesperum, neque luciferum tantopere rutilare. [§3] DUPLEX est autem iusticia scilicet naturalis & legalis. Naturalis est constans & perpetua voluntas, ius suum (ut prenotatum est) unicuique tribuens, & sine illa nullus potest regnum dei possidere. Legalis vero dicitur lex quæ sæpe mutatur, sine qua nec gentes, nec regna diu poterunt permanere. Unde & iustum aliquid dupliciter intelligitur fieri uno modo ex ipsa natura rei quod dicitur ius naturale, alio modo ex quodam statuto inter homines quod dicitur ius positivum.

De iure, et divisionibus iuris.

Ius autem quantum ad nostrum propositum spectat tantum valet sicuti rectum, vel iustum, quod a iusticia derivatur. Et in proposito accipitur pro nostris consuetudinibus, sive scriptis, sive non scriptis. [§1] Unde ius nomen generale est & lex species iuris est. Omne enim ius legibus & moribus hoc est iure scripto & non scripto constat quod per Tullium sic diffinitur est ars sive scientia boni & æqui, secundum quam nos sacerdotes id est sacras leges & cuilibet iura sua ministrantes appellamur. [§2] Aliter autem ius dicitur collectio legitimorum preceptorum, quæ nos artant ad observandum bonum & æquum hoc est utilitatem & æquitatem sive veritatem iusticiam designantem. [§3] IUS itaque duplex est quoddam enim est ius publicum, quoddam vero privatum. Publicum est, quod principaliter ad imperium & regimen regnorum publicamque utilitatem spectat, & in sacris ac in sacerdotibus & in magistratibus consistit unde qui ledit sacerdotes, vel res sacras, vel magistratus, hoc est rectores populi ab omnibus tanquam pro crimine publico accusari poterit. Privatum vero est ius speciale quod ad singulorum hominum utilitatem pertinet. Et illud triplex est scilicet ius naturale, ius gentium & ius civile. [§4] Ius igitur naturale est commune omnium nationum eo quod ubique instinctu naturæ & non constitutione aliqua habetur quod natura omnia animalia docet & docuit. Et hoc non solum est humani generis proprium sed etiam omnium animalium. Inde descendit maris & fœminæ coniunctio, liberorum procreatio & educatio omnium una libertas acquisitio eorum quæ coelo terra marique capiuntur. Item depositæ rei vel comodatæ pecuniæ restitutio, violentiæ proximi per vim repulsio. Nam hoc, aut siquid huic simile est nunquam iniustum, sed naturale æquumque habetur. [§5] Item alio modo ius naturale intelligitur, Quod in lege Mosayca & Evangelio continetur, quo quis iubetur alteri facere quod sibi vult fieri, & prohibetur alteri inferre quod sibi fieri nolit unde versus Quod tibi vis fieri mihi fac quod non tibi noli, Sic potes in terris vivere iure poli. [§6] Ius itaque naturale dupliciter potest considerari: uno modo in quantum consideratur homo prout habet in se naturam rationalem in qua participat cum divinis, & sic ius naturale quod cadit in homine dicitur ius divinum. Alio modo ius naturale consideratur in homine quantum ad naturam sensualitatis, in qua participat cum cæteris animalibus ut sensu motu et instinctu. Et hoc modo ius cadens in homine dicitur esse ius naturale. [§7] IUS gentium duplex est scilicet primævum & secundarium. Ius gentium primævum est, quo omnes gentes ab initio usq̄ sunt naturali ratione inductum absque aliqua constitutione gentium, ut neminem ledere &c. Et hoc a iure naturali nihil discrepat nisi ratione diversorum respectuum. Nam ius naturale & gentium pariter dicitur sed diverso respectu naturale scilicet in quantum ratione naturali est inductum, gentium vero in quantum gentes a principio orbis sine ulla constitutione alia eo usq̄ sunt. Et hoc iure status servi est integer. Quia naturali ratione omnes liberi nascebantur. [§8] Ius gentium secundarium est ius a gentibus non ratione naturali sed ratione publici boni & ad communem usum introductum. Et hoc sæpenumero discrepat a iure naturali: quia iure naturali omnia erant communia, omnes erant liberi, de iure vero gentium facta est divisio dominiorum & rerum inventa separatio. Introducta sunt bella, captivitates, servitutes & alia huiusmodi, quæ iuri naturali sunt contraria. Ex hoc etiam gentium iure omnes pœne contractus inducti sunt ut emptio, venditio, conductio & his similia. [§9] IUS autem civile est, quod quisque populus vel quæque civitas sibi propter divinam humanamque causam constituit. Et vocatur ius civile quasi proprium ius civitatis, quod tripliciter potest accipi. Primo generaliter & est quod in unaquaque civitate generaliter observatur. Secundo specialiter & est quod quisque populus vel quæque civitas sibi proprium divina humanaque causa constituit. Tertio excellenter ad excellentiam videlicet iuris Romanorum, quod etiam ius imperiale nominatur. Dum enim non exprimitur nomine huius, vel illius civitatis tunc per excellentiam tantum ius Romanorum significatur, sicuti per poetam apud Græcos Homerus, apud Latinos Vergilius subauditur. Et per apostolum in sacro eloquio alterius nomine non expresso sanctus Paulus intelligitur.

Quomodo differunt ius naturale, ius gentium et ius civile.

Sciendum itaque quod ius naturale differt ab aliis iuribus tribus modis. Primo origine, nam incepit ab exordio naturalis creaturæ. Secundo dignitate, quia ius naturale apud omnes gentes equaliter servatur, a solo deo institutum, firmum & impermutabile manens, alia vero iura, quæ populus vel civitas sibi constituit, sæpe mutantur, vel contraria consuetudine vel alia meliori lege in contrarium postea lata & introducta. Tertio amplitudine, quia iure naturali omnia communia sunt, sed iure gentium vel civili hoc meum illud tuum est. [§1] Cæterum omnes populi, qui legibus aut moribus utuntur & reguntur, partim suo proprio, partim vero communi omnium hominum iure utuntur. Hi enim, qui suo tantummodo iure & non communi gaudent, & aliquod ius sibi proprium instituunt, ius civile nominatur. Quod vero apud omnes gentes communiter observatur, ius gentium appellatur.

De iure militari et iuris prudentia.

IUS militare est belli inferendi solemnitas sederis faciendi nexus, signo dato congressio in hostem. ITEM flagicii militaris disciplina (hoc est castigatio), si locus desaratur. Item stipendiorum modus, dignitatum gradus, præmiorum honor, veluti dum corona vel torques donantur. Item præde decisio & pro personarum qualitibus & laboribus iusta divisio ac principis portio. [§1] IURIS prudentia vero est divinarum humanarumque rerum notitia, iusti atque iniusti scientia. Iusti scilicet ad faciendum, iniusti autem ad evitandum, [§2] quia non sufficit scire, quod sit iustum vel iniustum, nisi & ipsarum rerum contrariarum vel corporalium habeat quis noticiam, secundum quam iuxta varias conditiones rerum emergentium, varia etiam iura sunt statuenda.

Differentia est inter iustitiam, ius et iuris prudentiam.

Differunt autem inter se iusticia, ius & iuris prudentia. [§1] Nam iusticia est virtus scilicet moralis. Ius est eius virtutis exequutivum. Iuris prudentia est scientia illius iuris. [§2] Item iusticia est inter virtutes summum bonum, ius medium, iuris prudentia infimum. [§3] Item iusticia tribuit unicuique quod suum est, ius vero coadiuvat, iuris prudentia autem docet, qualiter illud fiat.

De diffinitionibus legis et eius conditionibus.

QUIA dictum est superius, quod omne ius, aut legibus, aut moribus hoc est iure scripto vel non scripto constat. De iure igitur scripto, id est, humana lege, breviter sciendum, quod lex diversimode describitur. [§1] Primo namque est constitutio populi, qua maiores natu cum plebibus aliquid sanxerunt. Sed hæc diffinitio proposito nostro non quadrat, quam omnis potestas constitutionis & condendæ legis, quæ olim apud populum fuerat, in presentiarum ad principem nostrum spectat, ut infra clarius dicitur. [§2] Alio modo lex est sanctio facta iubens honesta & prohibens inhonesta atque contraria. [§3] Vel aliter: est recta ratio ab equitate tracta iubens honesta & vetans inhonesta. [§4] Item secundum Papinianum & Demosthenem Lex est inventio hominis, donum dei, dogma sapientum, correctio violentorum excessuum, civitatis compositio & criminis fuga. Ex qua quidem diffinitione colligitur quod lex inventio humana est. [§5] Postquam enim multiplicato genere humano & surrepentibus viciis, in tyrannidem regna conversa sunt, necessario opus fuit leges condere, quarum primi inventores, qui fuerint in prefatione superius declaratum habes. [§6] Dicitur deinde in diffinitione legem donum dei esse. Secundum enim Chrysostomum lex dei est una legalis via, quæ nec ad dexteram, nec ad sinistram declinat. Populus ergo sine lege, qui dei dicta & legum documenta contemnit, per diversas errorum vias laqueum perditionis incurrit. Omniumque legum inanis est censura, nisi divinæ legis imaginem gerat, quia humanæ leges eatenus valent solum, quatinus non discrepant a divinis, prout & sapiens testatur inquiens. Per me reges regnant & legum conditores iusta decernunt, [§7] ideo leges humanæ emanari debent a lege divina. Nam illa respublica sola est ordinata, quæ legibus regulatis lege divina gubernatur. Lex ergo contra legem divinam nec populi assensu, nec consuetudine diuturna est valida. [§8] Tertia conditio legis ex diffinitione prædeclarata est quod sit dogma sapientum. Ubi sciendum quod sicuti principes non debent punire innocentem, ita non debent absolvere reum & facinorosum a poena & disciplina, maxime quando quis peccat in rempublicam, qui enim iustificat impium & condemnat iustum uterque abhominabilis est apud deum. [§9] Quarta legis conditio quod sit violentorum excessuum correctio. Nam ideo factæ sunt leges, ut earum metu humana coerceatur audacia tutaque sit inter improbos innocentia. Non enim inducerentur homines ad legis observantiam, nisi esset timor poene legalis, per publicam inferenda personam. [§10] Quinta conditio legis, quod lex sit civitatis compositio. Civitas enim ab unitate civium nominatur. Ergo omnes leges etiam in hoc regno nostro ad commodum reipublicae iudices referre oportet. Nam ut ex medicina nihil debet sperari, nisi quod ad corporis utilitatem spectet quoniam eius causa instituta est, sic a legibus nil oportet colligi, nisi quod reipublicae totius communitatis conducatur, quia eius causae ad hoc sunt competae. [§11] Sexta conditio quod lex debet esse criminis fuga. Secundum enim beatum Thomam Aquinatem, leges humanae ad retrahendum homines a viciis & inducendum ad virtutes sunt factae. Nam homini inest naturaliter quidam appetitus ad virtutem, sed ipsa virtutis perfectio necesse est, ut adveniat homini per aliquam disciplinam, quae maxime per legis observantiam advenire solet. Ideo subinfert idem Thomas, quod lex est ordinatio rationis ad bonum commune, ab eo, qui curam habet communitatis promulgata estque regula vel mensura actuum agendorum vel omittendorum. [§12] Unde lex debet esse iusta, honesta, possibilis secundum naturam & secundum consuetudinem patriae, loco temporisque conveniens, necessaria & utilis; manifesta quoque, ne aliquid per obscuritatem incautum captione contineat (id est ne aliquis possit eam captiose interpretari. Si tamen ambiguum vel obscurum fuerit, eius est interpretari, qui condidit. Vel ne laqueus alicui pareatur per eam) nullo privato commodo, sed pro communi civium utilitate conscripta. [§13] Ideo autem ista consideranda sunt, quia cum leges institutae fuerint, non erit postea iudicare de ipsis, sed oportebit iudicare secundum ipsas.

Quare facte sunt leges, et de quadruplici officio legis.

QUoniam omnes leges aut divinae sunt, aut humanae. Divinae namque natura, humanae vero moribus & consuetudinibus constant ideoque haec discrepant, quoniam aliae aliis gentibus placent. [§1] Fas lex divina est, ius lex humana. Nam transire per agrum alienum fas est, quia domini est terra & plenitudo eius, ius vero non est, quia statuto aut consuetudine prohibetur. [§2] Unde quaeritur, quare factae sunt leges humanae? Et respondetur, quod ideo, ut earum metu humana coerceatur audacia tutaque sit inter improbos innocentia & in ipsis improbis formidato supplicio refrenetur audacia & nocendi facultas. [§3] QUadruplex est autem officium legis, quia omnis lex aut permittit, aut vetat, aut punit, aut imperat. Permittit aliquid, ut vir fortis & virtuosus petat premium. Vetat, ut sacrarum virginum nulli petere liceat connubium. Punit, ut qui caedem fecerit, capite plectatur. Quandoque autem imperat, ut diliges dominum deum tuum. [Unde] versus: Quatuor ex verbis virtutes collige legis Permittit, punit, imperat, atque vetat.

De statuto et municipali iure.

PRaehabita legis quidditate atque diversitate, iam de statuto dicendum occurrit. [§1] Est autem statutum, quod vulgo decretum appellamus, ius quoddam regni commune vim legis habens. Et dicitur statutum, quasi stabiliter & firmiter ordinatum, vel quasi statum publicum definiens, saepe vero appellatione quoque iuris civilis veniunt statuta. [§2] Ubi advertendum quod ius civile duplex reperitur. Quoddam commune & est illud, quod in libris iuris civilis habetur. Et istud non potest condere nisi imperator vel alius supremus princeps. Quoddam vero privatum, quod etiam ius Municipale vel statutarium dicitur. Et illud unaquaeque regio, vel provincia, vel aliquando civitas sibi constituere potest. [§3] Ius autem Municipale est ius positivum alicuius loci. Ita dictum, quod in illo dumtaxat municipio (id est oppido) ac loco servetur. Idem & ius statutarium (ut præactum est) appellatur.

Utrum valeat statutum contra ius canonicum, vel naturale, vel divinum.

SEd querendum videtur an valeat statutum contra ius canonicum, vel naturale, vel divinum: dic, quo ad ius canonicum, si statutum est, contra libertatem ecclesiarum diuturnam vel privilegia eis concessa non valet. Idem dicendum, si circa ea fiunt statuta quæ salutem animæ respiciunt. Circa causas vero prophanas statuta civilia derogant canonibus & eos tollunt.

[§1] Quantum autem ad ius naturale vel divinum, licet statuta non possunt illud ex toto tollere, possunt tamen distinguere, ut exempli gratia, lex divina dicit indistincte: Non occides, tamen lex humana & statutum concedit homicidium in multis casibus. Idem dicendum de decimis, quæ debentur de iure divino & tamen Papa multos privilegiat super decimis non solvendis.

[§2] Concludamus ergo quod per statutum ac legem vel rescriptum non potest ius naturale vel divinum in sui universo tolli. Nec enim summus pontifex vel alius quispiam posset statuere, ut non observaretur vetus vel novum testamentum, vel quod liberi non educarentur a parentibus, sed in aliquibus casibus particularibus potest fieri ex iusta causa contra ius divinum vel naturale, ut prædo possit occidi vel fur nocturnus.

Quid sit consuetudo et que sunt necessaria ad consuetudinem firmandam.

IAM autem de consuetudine disserendum est. Ubi sciendum quod consuetudo est ius quoddam moribus institutum, quod pro lege suscipitur cum deficit lex. Nec differt scriptura, an ratione consistat quandoquidem & legem ratio commendat. Porro si ratione lex constat, lex erit omne iam quod ratione constiterit, dumtaxat quod religioni congruat, quod disciplinæ conveniat, quod saluti proficiat. Vocatur autem consuetudo quasi communis suetudo & usus hominum, quia in communi est usu. [§1] Sed clarius consuetudo (prout nostrum propositum tangit) sic diffinienda videtur: est ius quoddam moribus illius introductum, qui autoritate publica legem condere potest. Ideo appellatione iuris venit etiam consuetudo & si princeps committit, ut iudicetur secundum iura, tunc iudex poterit ferre sententiam secundum consuetudinem & statuta loci, sicut etiam econtrario appellatione consuetudinis venit ius commune. Ideo siquis in actione sua faciat mentionem de consuetudine, etiam ius commune videtur intentatum esse. [§2] Quilibet autem populus potest consuetudinem inducere localem, sed ut valeat consuetudo ac roboretur quædam sunt necessaria. [§3] Primo ut sit rationabilis. Est autem rationabilis cum tendit & accedit ad finem iuris. Finis autem iuris Canonici & divini est felicitas anime. Finis vero iuris civilis est bonum publicum. Ideo si consuetudo tendit ad felicitatem animæ, est rationabilis secundum ius Canonicum & divinum, si autem repugnat fini æterno, est irrationabilis. De iure vero civili consuetudo est rationabilis si tendit ad bonum publicum. Et quia in hoc non sunt speciales regulæ, dic quod consuetudo, quæ non est contra ius naturale, gentium vel positivum præsumitur rationabilis. [§4] Sed cum ius sit fundatum super ratione, videtur quod nulla consuetudo contra ius possit esse rationabilis. Dicendum quod consideratis diversis rationibus potest esse consuetudo rationabilis contra legem etiam rationabilem. Unde duo contraria possunt simul esse vera, consideratis diversis finibus, ut nubere & non nubere. [§5] Secundo requiritur ut sit præscripta, idest habeat tempus debitum & per cursum illius temporis ad præscriptionem requisiti firmetur. Sed hoc est tantum de iure Canonico & neque de eo iure id requiritur nisi quando est contra ius positivum. De iure autem civili ad inducendam consuetudinem sufficit decennium, hoc est lapsus temporis decennalis, etiam in casu, qui est contra ius civile. Si autem esset consuetudo contra ius Canonicum, tunc requiritur spacium quadraginta annorum. Si tamen præter ius induceretur consuetudo etiam de iure Canonico decennium sufficere videtur. Hoc autem tempus decem annorum incipit currere a tempore primi actus celebrati a populo. [§6] Id vero quod dixi de iure civili indistincte sufficere spatium decem annorum, hoc limita nisi consuetudo induceretur in his, quæ sunt reservata principi in signum supremæ potestatis. Tunc enim non posset induci consuetudo nisi esset tantum tempus, cuius inicii memoria in contrarium non existeret. [§7] Tertio requiritur frequentia actuum, ut est communis doctorum sententia. Dic tamen quod actus frequens de se non est necessarius ad consuetudinem inducendam, sed quia per usum colligitur consensus populi, qui plerumque non potest ex uno solo actu colligi, igitur frequentia actuum est ut causa consuetudo vero ut causatum. Requiritur autem tot actus & ita notorii, ut verisimiliter transiverit in noticiam populi, non tamen actus sed tacitus consensus populi inducit consuetudinem. Unde ubicunque ex coniecturis habetur tacitus consensus populi, tunc non curatur de magna frequentia actuum. Immo aliquando ex uno actu si habuerit causam successivam & continuationem per tempus, infra quod consuetudo inducitur, ut si quis supra viam publicam pontem habuerit vel quid tale potest induci consuetudo.

Quomodo differt lex a consuetudine et de triplici virtute consuetudinis.

Differt autem lex a consuetudine tripliciter. Primo tanquam tacitum et expressum. [§1] Secundo tanquam scriptum & non scriptum, quamvis hæc non sit essentialis differentia. Nam licet lex a principe lata non esset scripta, non ideo desineret esse lex. Et si consuetudo redigeretur in scriptis, adhuc esset consuetudo ut consuetudines Feudorum, quæ redactæ sunt in scriptis. [§2] Tertio tanquam momentaneum & successivum, quia consuetudo non inducitur in instanti. Lentiori enim passu procedunt tacita, quam expressa. Nec enim sunt adeo certa, quæ ex coniecturis proveniunt, sicut ea, quæ sunt expressa, ideo consuetudo proprie non potest statim induci per populum sed successive. [§3] Consuetudo autem triplicem habet virtutem scilicet interpretativam. Est enim legum interpretis optima, ideo lege existente dubia debemus recurrere ad consuetudinem loci & si de ea apparet, non est recedendum ab illo intellectu, quem consuetudo tribuit. [§4] Secundo habet virtutem obrogatoriam, quia derogat legi quando est contra legem. [§5] Tertio habet virtutem imitativam, quia imitatur legem, ubi deficit lex.

De lege et statuto ac consuetudine contraria quid sit sentiendum.

SEd querendum occurrit ubi lex, vel constitutio & consuetudo inveniatur esse contraria, utrum nam sit servandum. Dic quod si lex præcedit & postea sequitur consuetudo contraria, tunc si consuetudo est generalis vincit legem generaliter & universaliter. Si autem consuetudo est particularis non vincit legem universaliter, sed solum in loco ubi consuetudo viget. Si vero consuetudo præcedit, lex autem subsequitur contraria, tunc consuetudo non vincit legem, immo potius tollitur per legem sequentem. [§1] Canonistæ tamen tenent oppositum asserentes quod lex Papæ non tollit consuetudinem certi loci contrariam, si de ea non fuerit facta mentio, quia Papa non præsumitur scire contrarias consuetudines. Ex quo infertur a contrario sensu quod si civitas vel aliqua communitas facit statutum contra suam consuetudinem, tunc tollitur consuetudo, licet de ipsa non faciat mentionem, quia civitas vel populus præsumitur scire suam consuetudinem. [§2] Pono igitur duas regulas. Prima est quando præcedit consuetudo & sequitur lex generalis contraria, tollit consuetudinem præcedentem. Secunda regula, quando lex præcedit, deinde sequitur consuetudo contraria legi, tollit legem præcedentem. Quod intellige (ut supra dixi) quando est consuetudo generalis inducta a populo, qui potest legem & consuetudinem generalem inducere. Nam si esset consuetudo specialis certi loci, tunc in illo dumtaxat loco vinceret legem. [§3] Ubi vero emergit casus nec decisus lege scripta, nec consuetudine & tamen est similis legi scriptæ pro una parte, & similis consuetudini pro alia parte, quidnam sit sequendum & quidnam simile præferendum a plerisque dubitatur. Dic igitur omnes casus amplectendo, quando reperitur solum simile consuetudini, illud debet attendi, quando vero solum simile legi, tunc illud erit attendendum. Si vero reperitur simile legi & simile consuetudini, tunc primum debet inspici, utrum sit magis simile, secundo utrum sit magis rationabile & æquum. Quod si in omnibus sit paritas, tunc si sumus in materia consuetudinaria, debet attendi simile consuetudinis. Si vero sumus in materia iuris scripti, tunc attendamus simile iuri scripto.

Quid sit iudex, quid iudicium, quid causa, quid actor et reus.

SEd quoniam moderandis legibus iudices præsumunt, qui recto iudicii examine ex iurisdictione eis competente singula discutunt, ideo non videtur absurdum de ipsis quoque aliquid explicare. [§1] Ubi sciendum quod iudex dicitur quasi ius dicens, vel quia iure disceptet, id est, iustitiam ministret populo. [§2] Ius autem est obiectum iusticiæ, ideo iudicium ex vi nominis importat iusti vel iuris determinationem in causa, quæ coram iudice agitur. [§3] Causa autem dicitur a casu, quo venit. Est enim materia & origo negotii nec dum discussionis examine patefacta, quæ dum proponitur causa est, dum discutitur iudicium, dum finitur iusticia censetur. Et hoc loco iusticia appellatur quæ dicta est lex. Lex autem iuris status dicitur, quia per sententiam ius de se non constituitur, sed status iuris declaratur. [§4] In omni vero negotio, quod ad iudicium venit discutiendum, he personæ requiruntur: iudex, actor & reus. In negotio autem non notorio testes quoque necessario requiruntur. [§5] Actor itaque quasi accusator, quia ad causam vocat; reus vero a re, quæ petitur nuncupatur, etiam si non sit sceleris conscius. [§6] Testes antiquitus superstites dicebantur, eo quod super statu causæ proferebantur. [§7] Unde homines (ut inquit Aristoteles) ad iudicem confugiunt, sicuti ad aliquam iusticiam animatam.

Quot requiruntur ad iudicium ut sit actus iusticie, et de iurisdictione officioque et conditionibus boni iudicis.

UT autem iudicium sit actus iusticiæ (auctore Thoma) tria requiruntur. Primo ut procedat ex iusticiæ inclinatione. Secundo ex præsentis autoritate atque iurisdictione. Tertio ut exeat proferaturque ex prudentiæ recta ratione. [§1] Si enim iudicium aut sit contra rectitudinem iusticiæ vel per eos qui non habent ad iudicandum autoritatem, vel sine prudentiæ examine tunc non rectum sed vitiosum & illicitum iudicium censetur. [§2] Iurisditio vero est potestas ex iure publico introducta diciturque a ditione id est potestate et iuris quasi iuris potestas. [§3] Officium autem iudicis est ius competens ipsi iudici ad ea, quæ sibi ut iudici facienda incumbunt peragenda præstitum. Differt autem officium iudicis a iurisditione sicut actio ab obligatione. Nam ut per actionem quis consequitur quod in obligatione venit, ita per officium iudicis ad effectum perducitur quo in iurisditione venit & eam deducit in actum. [§4] Ad iudicem autem præcipue spectat mature singula discutere, nec debet inferenda sententia præceps, aut subitus esse, alioquin voluntas eius præcipitata noverca iusticiæ dicitur. Nec plus uni, quam alteri parti debet favere, nec esse acceptor personarum alienamque necessitatem suam debet existimare. In primis autem passionibus animi carere, ut non moveatur præce, odio vel amore. Nam iudex etiamsi tulit sententiam iustam, tamen tenetur in foro conscientia, si id fecit potius odio, quam amore iusticiæ. [§5] Nec debet esse iudex nimis crudelis nec pius nimis, sed æquus in iudicando. In omni enim iudicio coniuncta sunt misericordia & virtus, id est iusticia, & in harum coniunctione consistit æquitas. Unde Gregorius: Omnis, qui iuste iudicat, stateram in manu sua gestat et in utroque penso iusticiam & misericordiam portat, sed per iusticiam reddit peccatis sententiam, per misericordiam peccati temperat poenam, ut iusto libramine quædam per æquitatem corrigat, quædam per misericordiam indulgeat, qui dei iudicium oculis suis semper timens & tremens in omni negotio formidat ne de iusticiæ tramite devians cadat. Ubi namque iusticia suum modum excedit, crudelitatis vitium gignit & nimia pietas dissolutionem disciplina parturit. [§6] Humanum autem iudicium quatuor modis solet perverti. Timore dum metu potestatis alicuius veritatem loqui pertimescimus. Cupiditate dum præmio animum alicuius corrumpimus. Odio dum contra quemlibet adversarium molimur. Amore dum amico vel propinquo aliquid præstare contendimus. Quæ omnia in iudice summopere sunt cavenda atque fugienda.

Utrum iudex secundum allegata et probata vel secundum conscientiam iudicare teneatur.

Nunc quæstio subiungenda est. An iudex secundum allegata & probata partium, vel secundum quod novit et ex conscientia debeat iudicare? Verbi gratia aliquis accusatur de capitali vel alio crimine, & iudex scit illum esse innocium ut quia vidit id crimen ab alio fuisse patratum, tamen testes contra eum testificantur, an condemnabit scienter innocentem? Dic quod iudicare pertinet ad iudicem secundum quod fungitur publica potestate, ideo instrui debet in iudicio non secundum quod ipse iudex novit tanquam persona privata, sed ut sibi innotescit tanquam personæ publicæ. [§1] Id autem potest sibi dupliciter innotescere vel in communi per leges scilicet publicas, divinas aut humanas, contra quas probatio non admittitur; vel in particulari per instrumenta & testes & alia legitima documenta, quæ magis sequi debet iudicando, quam illud quod ipse novit in persona privata. Ideo inquit Augustinus iudex bonus nihil ex arbitrio suo facit, sed secundum leges & iura pronunciat. [§2] In hoc tamen casu iudex debet esse valde sollicitus ut foveat partem illam, quam in conscientia sua scit esse veram, ne pereat propter defectum testium & advocatorum. [§3] Si vero eo ventum est, ut adeo validæ probationes in iudicio proferantur quæ nec repelli nec collidi valeant omni arte & studio est iudici enitendum, ut innocens convictus eripiatur. [§4] Si nulla eiusmodi via reperiri potest, quærat rationem si sine scandalo fieri potest, ut alteri causam committat, si id nequit tunc proferat sententiam secundum allegata & probata. Est enim iudicis officium magis laborare pro salute boni publici quam singularis cum & ipse in quantum iudex sit persona publica: & bonum commune sit nobilius particulari ut habetur primo Ethicorum. [§5] Nam si iudex ferit sententiam pro innocente in iudicio tamen convicto redundaret in perniciem publicum, populus enim scandalizaretur viaque aperiretur innocentes opprimendi & noxios absolvendi. Si enim iudex vellet innocentem punire diceret se conscientia sua scire eum esse reum. Pariter & si vellet sceleratum absolvere & sic iniquis iudiciis male iudicandi aditus pateret. Fateor esse qui aliter sentiant sed hæc videtur opinio communior & æquior fore.

De duplici conscientia iudicis: videlicet rei et dicti.

SEd quia constans est Theologorum sententia quemlibet qui contra conscientiam facit peccare. [§1] Sciendum igitur quod duplex est conscientia videlicet rei & dicti. Unde iudex licet faciat contra conscientiam rei idest negotii vel facti non tamen facit contra conscientiam dicti hoc est testimonii. Aliud est enim simpliciter scire & aliud est prout debet iudex scire. [§2] Iudex autem duplicem personam representat: unam privatam, aliam publicam. Fieri autem potest ut aliquid sciat tanquam persona privata & id nesciat tanquam persona publica, sicut dicitur aliquid scire ut deus & illud nescire ut homo prout est illud testimonium Evangelicum: De die autem illa & hora (scilicet extremi iudicii) nemo scit, neque angeli dei, neque filius nisi pater solus, quod intelligitur filium nescire ut hominem, scire tamen ut deum. Idem de sacerdote confessionem audiente, qui etiam interrogatus per viam testimonii posset dicere se nescire audita in confessione quia nescit ut testis. Sic etiam iudex debet informare conscientiam suam in his quæ ad propriam personam attinent secundum ea, quæ in publico iudicio sciri possunt. [§3] His duo adiungam unum quod si sit supremus iudex ut Papa & imperator vel alius qui non adstringitur legibus tunc debet sequi veritatem. Si vero est iudex inferior tenetur secundum allegata & probata etiam contra conscientiam iudicare, nec tunc peccat quia restringitur ad id faciendum iuris autoritate. [§4] Secundum est quod si iudex sedet pro tribunali, & continget aliquem ibi coram eo aliquod delictum facere, tunc potest illum statim punire ac si probaretur per testes. Melius est enim probare aliquid per ipsum factum, quam per testes. Si vero non sedet pro tribunali tunc secus. Nam si iudex ex fenestra prætorii vel domus suæ intueatur unum quempiam interficientem & quoniam hoc homicidium vel non defertur in iudicium, vel delatum non probatur, & iudex voluerit homicidam de se ipso subicere torturæ ut veritas per illius confessionem eliciatur, certe non potest. Sola enim iudicis scientia ad hoc non sufficit ut ad torturam reus deveniat, cum ipse illud nesciat ut iudex sed ut privata persona, nec ipsius testimonium in hac parte valeat cum in una & eadem causa nemo possit esse testis & iudex. Igitur aliunde est edocendus vel per testes vel alia documenta ut possit torquere criminosum. [§5] Dubium quoque est de ministris & exequutoribus, qui sciunt testes falso iurasse vel iudicem inique iudicasse tamen coguntur a iudice innocentem interimere vel aliter punire. Unde communis est Theologorum sententia eos non debere obtemperare si pro certo id sciunt, secus vero dubitent, quia tunc excusatur propter obedientiæ bonum ideo secundum sanctum Thomam si sententia intollerabilem errorem & iniuriam contineat non debent obedire, alioquin excusarentur carnifices qui martyres occiderunt. Si vero non adeo manifestam contineat iniusticiam tunc non peccant exequendo quia sententiam superioris non habent discutere nec ipsi innocentem interimunt sed iudex cui ministerium præbent.

[Prima Pars]

De tripartita divisione Jurium et consuetudinum inclyti Regni Hungarie in Generali.

Titulus primus.

EXpeditis opitulante deo, notabilibus quę ad introductionem huius opusculi pręmittenda videbantur, iam speciatim de consuetudinibus huius inclyti regni Hungarię tractandum superest. [§1] Quia igitur omnis consuetudo iuris qua utimur vel ad personas pertinet, vel ad res, vel ad actiones. Certum est autem quod omnia iura respectu personarum prodierunt ideo dignum videtur a personarum iure exordium ceptę materię sumere, deindeque de duabus reliquis consuetudinarii iuris partibus (non directe quidem semper prępostero tamen interdum ordine prout sequitur rerum in iudiciis emergentium series & condicio requirere dinoscitur) tractare & secundum hoc pręsens opusculum tripartiri dignum duxi. [§2] IN prima siquidem eius parte de his quę ad personarum rationem spectant, nobilitatis scilicet nostrę primordio libertate, bonorum iuriumque possessionariorum acquisitione, gubernatione, divisione, venditione, alienatione, concambiali permutatione, pręscriptione, pignoratione, metali reambulatione, iurium Quartaliciarum ac Dotaliciarum solutione, bonorumque mobilium & immobilium estimatione. [§3] IN secunda vero ipsius parte de rerum ac causarum prętextu pręmissorum bonorum & iurium possessionariorum aliorumque negotiorum movendarum & suscitandarum processibus, & executionibus ac sententiarum exinde ferendarum seriebus. [§4] IN tertio tandem & ultimo opusculi membro, de causarum & actionum iudicialiarum in curiam regiam per viam appellationis ex omnibus regni comitatibus, atque de Croatia, Sclavonia & Transsilvania sedibusque spiritualibus deducendarum ac transmittendarum ordinibus & modis. Item de liberarum civitatum legibus, ac causis criminalibus & earum decisionibus, cum correquisitis semper & necessariis circa pręmissa materiis & rebus sua serie tractabitur.

De prima parte iurium et consuetudinum regni in speciali; et primo quod tam persone spirituales quam seculares, una et eadem libertate utuntur. Tit. ii.

SCIendum in primis est quod personarum de quarum iuribus & consuetudinibus nunc agitur alię sunt spirituales sive ecclesiasticę, alię vero sæculares [§1] & quamvis personę spirituales medio quarum salutem humanam dominus & salvator noster administrari instituit personis sæcularibus digniores habeantur tamen omnes domini pręlati & ecclesiarum rectores ac barones & cęteri magnates atque nobiles & proceres regni huius [sic] Hungarię ratione nobilitatis & bonorum temporalium una eademque libertatis exemptionis & immunitatis pręrogativa gaudent; nec habet dominorum aliquis maius nec nobilis quispiam minus de libertate hinc etiam una eademque lege & consuetudine ac uno & eodem iuridico processu in iudiciis utuntur homagiorum dumtaxat quantitate variantur. [§2] Nam domini pręlati & barones centum nobiles vero quinquaginta marcas pro homagiis eorum consequuntur ut infra clarius dicetur. Et hoc quoque non ratione libertatis sed prętextu dignitatis & officii pręlati utputa occasione dignitatis sacerdotii. Barones vero respectu officii quo funguntur & a principe sublimantur [§3] unde & regi propinquiores in stando vel sedendo & primi in consilio voces emittendo atque priores in rempublicam augmentando & defensionem patrię peragendo cęteris nobilibus existunt, virtuteque dignitatis & officii merito pręferuntur.

De exordio nostre nobilitatis; et quomodo regimen in principem nostrum translatum est.
Tit. iii.

QUanquam non historiam texere, sed consuetudines & peculiare approbatasque huius regni leges ipse describere constituerim, quia tamen universos dominos prælatos & barones ac nobiles una & eadem exemptionis & libertatis prærogativa gaudere dixi & alioquin dubitari solet a plerisque unde nobilitas nostra de qua Baronatus & omnis tandem principatus progredi solet exordium sumat: quive sint & intelligantur veri nobiles regni, ideo paucis eius nobilitatis progressum & initium declarandum statui. [§1] Ubi sciendum quod licet secundum communem peritorum sententiam nobilis ille sit sua quem virtus nobilitat in quantum tamen propositum nostrum tangit nobilitas quæ etiam liberorum nomine plerumque intelligitur primum inter Hunnos sive Hungaros post ingressum eorum ex Scythia in Pannoniam quæ nunc mutato nomine ab Hungaris illam incolentibus Hungaria vocitatur orta fuisse perhibetur hoc modo. [§2] Cum enim egressi ex Scythia Hunni una cum uxoribus filiisque & filiabus ac cuncta eorum familia plures peragrarent pervagarenturque regiones capitaneis ordinatis & uno præterea Rectore ad lites dissidentium sopiendas, furesque & latrones ac alios malefactores castigandos unanimiter electo atque constituto communi omnium sententia decretoque edictum fuit ut dum aliquæ res communitatem æqua sorte tangentes occurrerent aut generalis expeditio exercitus incumberet tunc mucro vel ensis sanguinis aspergine tinctus media Hunnorum per habitacula castraque deferetur & vox præconica subsequeretur dicens. Vox dei & præceptum communitatis universæ, ut unusquisque in tali loco (eundem designando locum) armatus vel qualiter potest compareat communitatis consilium simul & præceptum auditurus. [§3] Hæc consuetudo inter Hungaros usque ad tempora Geysse ducis, patris scilicet gloriosi principis & apostoli nostri beatissimi Stephani primi regis Hungarorum inviolabiliter extitit observata, quæ multos Hunnorum perpetuam redegit in rusticitatem. [§4] Nam statutum & sancitum erat ut transgressores eiusmodi mandati nisi rationabilem assignarent excusationem cultro media per viscera scinderentur, aut communem & perpetuam in servitutem redigerentur. [§5] Hæc sanctio plurimos Hungarorum (ut præfertur) plebeæ perhibetur effecisse conditionis. Nam cum una & eadem de generatione a quodam scilicet Hunno & Magoro unanimiter processerint aliter fieri nequivisset ut hic dominus ille servus hic nobilis ille ignobilis & rusticus efficeretur. [§6] Postquam vero inspirante spiritus sancti gratia ad agnitionem veritatis chatholicæque fidei professionem opera ipsius sancti regis nostri Hungari venere, & eundem sponte in regem elegere pariter & coronare omnis nobilitationis & exconsequenti possessionariæ collationis qua nobiles decorantur, & ab ignobilibus segregantur facultas plenariæque potestas in iurisdictionem sacræ corone regni huius, & per consequens in principem ac regem nostrum a communitate & communitatis ab auctoritate, simul cum imperio & regimine translata est, a quo iam omnis nobilitatis origo per quandam translationem reciprocam reflexibilemque connexionem. Ita mutuo semper dependet ut seiungi segregarique nequeat, & alter sine altero fieri non possit. [§7] Neque enim princeps nisi per nobiles eligitur, neque nobilis nisi per principem creatur atque dignitate nobilitari decoratur.

Quod vera nobilitas per exercitia militaria et ceteras virtutes acquiritur ac possessionaria donatione roboratur. iiiii.

PROinde vera nobilitas usu disciplinaque militari ac cæteris animi corporisque dotibus & virtutibus acquiritur. Nam ubi princeps noster quempiam hominum cuiuscunque conditionis existat, ob præclara facinora ac servitia castro, vel oppido, sive villa, aut alio iure possessorio condonaverit, mox ille per huiusmodi donationem principis (statutione legitima subsequente) in verum nobilem creatur & ab omni rusticitatis iugo eripitur. [§1] Et ista tandem donativa libertas per nostrates nobilitas appellatur, unde talium nobilium filii merito hæredes & liberi nuncupantur, & huiusmodi nobiles per quandam participationem & connexionem immediate prædeclaratam, membra sacræ coronæ esse censentur, nulliusque præter principis legitime coronati subsunt potestati.

Quod quilibet de bonis per eum propriis serviciis conquisitis libere disponere potest. Tit. v.

Tale autem ius possessionarium per exercitia militaria conquisitum apud legistas peculium castrense quod vero litterali scientia vel doctrina cuiuspiam acquiritur, peculium quasi castrense nuncupatur & dicitur peculium quasi proprium vel privatum bonum ita quod licet filio de eo facere quidquid voluerit etiam præter voluntatem patris, & econtra [§1] & inde traxit originem ac fundamentum illa laudabilis & vetustissima ab olimque approbata consuetudo nostra quod scilicet quilibet dominorum, baronum ac magnatum & nobilium de & super universis rebus bonisque & iuribus possessionariis per eum propriis suis laboribus, servitiis & virtutibus qualitercunque acquisitis & inventis, ante divisionem cum patre vel fratribus factam, liberam (prout voluerit) disponendi semper habet potestatis facultatem, sicuti inferius in serie divisionum inter fratres fiendarum limpidius declarabitur.

Quod nobiles etiam absque possessionaria donatione creantur; quodque ad nobilitatem comprobendam insignia nobilitaria non sint in iudicio necessaria. Tit. vi.

Sciendum ulterius quod veri nobiles etiam alio modo & absque iurium possessionariorum donatione fiunt & creantur, dum videlicet princeps noster quoscunque plebeæ conditionis homines a rusticitatis & ignobilitatis servitute sequestrando & eximendo in cœtum ac collegium numerumque verorum regni nobilium aggregat & ascribit. Tales etiam sine possessionaria collatione veri nobiles reputantur, qui quidem nobiles utroque modo creati & eorundem cuncti hæredes per lineam virilis sexus legitime descendentes (si etiam arma seu insignia nobilitaria aut litteras super armorum figuris & collationibus æditas non habent) veri tamen semper nobiles censentur. [§1] Arma enim a principe cuiuspiam concessa non sunt de necessitate, sed solummodo de bene esse nobilitatis. Nam armorum collatio simpliciter facta non nobilitat quenquam. Cum etiam civium & plebeorum hominum multi habeant armorum insignia per principem donata, per hæc tamen in medium nobilium non computantur. [§2] Ad nobilitatem itaque comprobendam non petuntur in iudicio exhiberi insignia vel arma nobilitaria, sed solæ litteræ donationales vel statutoriæ cum declaratione possessionariæ collationis æditæ produci debent; immo illis non habitis, litteræ dumtaxat expeditoriæ super solutione Quartaliorum (dummodo tempus præscriptionis iurium regalium transcendisse dinoscantur) confectæ, ad probationem huiusmodi nobilitatis abunde sufficiunt. [§3] Nam Quartalicia non nisi de iuribus possessionariis acquisitiis solvuntur. [§4] De iuribus autem empticiis non Quartalicia sed portiones congruentes puellis & filiabus baronum ac magnatum atque nobilium dantur.

Quod ex nobili patre et ignobili matre generati veri nobiles censentur, sed non econverso. Titulus. vii.

Item illi, qui ex nobili dumtaxat matre & rustico patre sunt propagati, veri nobiles non dicuntur, nisi forsitan mulier ipsa fuisset per regem in verum hæredem iurium paternorum (sine tamen præiudicio legitimorum successorum) præfecta atque creata. [§1] Nam hoc modo filii sui etiam ex ignobili patre progeniti (quia præfectio naturam vimque donationis ac iurium possessionariorum collationis sapit atque representat) veri nobiles reputantur. [§2] Econtra vero ex nobili patre & ignobili matre filii procreati recti & veri nobiles censentur. [§3] Pater enim generat mater autem formam solum generandi dat & præstat. [§4] Qualiter autem præfectio prænotata fieri possit & debeat, inferius eam scriptam habebis.

Quod etiam per adoptionem nobiles fiunt et creantur. Tit. viii.

Item fiunt adhuc & alio modo nobiles, per adoptionem dum videlicet quis dominorum vel nobilium rusticum seu ignobilem quempiam in filium sibi adoptaverit & successorem hæredemque bonorum suorum substituerit, & huiusmodi adoptioni consensus regius accesserit: tandem & statutio legitima bonorum ipsorum subsequuta fuerit (quia adoptio æque sicuti præfectio cum consensu regio vim donationis tenet) ignobilis ille & filii sui veri nobiles reputantur.

De quatuor privilegiatis et precipuis nobilium libertatibus. Tit. ix.

Quamvis autem horum nobilium multæ sint libertates per privilegia & constitutiones principum explicatæ, quatuor tamen censentur esse præcipuæ, quas hic inserendas curavi. [§1] PRIMA igitur est quod ipsi nisi primum citati vel evocati ordineque iudicario condemnati fuerint in eorum personis, ad quorumvis instantiam vel clamores aut preces nusquam & per neminem detineri possunt. [§2] Violatur tamen hæc libertas in factis causisque criminalibus puta homicidio deliberato, villarum combustione, furtoque & rapina seu latrocinio atque etiam violenti adulterio, in quibus honorem titulumque & libertatem nobilitatis quilibet amittit. Et si poterit etiam per rusticanam manum in loco delicti & criminis commissi, libere semper talis detineri, & iuxta suos excessus condemnari puniri que merito valebit. [§3] Verum tamen si de loco delicti aufugerit & manus adversantium evaserit, postea non aliter nisi citatione vel evocatione mediante, processuque iuridico damnari & aggravari debebit. [§4] SECUNDA libertas quod nobiles totius regni, nullius præterquam principis legitime (ut præactum est) coronati subsunt potestati, & ipse quoque princeps noster ad simplicem querelam & sinistram suggestionem alicuius neminem eorum præter viam iuris & altera parte non audita in persona vel rebus suis ordinaria autoritate impedire potest. [§5] TERTIA est quod iustis eorum iuribus & omnibus proventibus intra terminos territoriorum suorum adiacentibus, liberam semper prout volunt fruendi habent potestatem ab omnique conditionaria servitute ac datiarum & collectarum tributorum vectigalium tricesimarumque solutione, per omnia immunes & exempti habentur militare dumtaxat pro regni defensione tenentur. [§6] QUARTA (ut reliquas præteream) & ultima est quod si quispiam regum & principum nostrorum libertatibus nobilium in generali decreto excellentissimi principis quondam domini secundi Andree regis cognomento Hierosolymitani (ad quod observandum quilibet regum Hungariæ priusquam suum sacro caput dyademate coronaretur sacramentum præstare solet) declaratis & expressis contravenire attemptaret, extunc sine nota alicuius infidelitatis liberam illi resistendi & contradicendi habent in perpetuum facultatem. [§7] PER nobiles autem hoc in loco generaliter universos dominos prælatos, barones cæterosque magnates & alios regni huius proceres intellige qui (sicuti prænarratum est) una eiusdemque libertatis prærogativa semper muniuntur.

Quod princeps noster cunctorum dominorum, baronum ac nobilium regni verus et legitimus successor est. Tit. x.

QUIA dictum est superius quod omnis nobilitatis & possessionarię collationis plenaria potestas in principem nostrum translata est, ideo advertendum quod princeps ipse noster universorum dominorum baronum & magnatum ac aliorum regni nobilium possessionatorumque hominum, in casu quo quis eorum sine hæredibus & posteris decesserit verus & legitimus successor est, [§1] omnia enim bona & iura eorum possessionaria ab ipsa sacra regni Hungarię corona, virtute translationis prænotatę originaliter dependent & ad eandem semper respiciunt devolvunturque eorum possessore legitimo deficiente. [§2] Unde inolevit ista consuetudo dudum approbata quod unica & singularis persona quis existens veroque & legitimo successore carens ac destituta super iuribus suis possessionariis sine consensu regio nil quicquam iure perennali disponere potest. Immo etiam pignoris titulo nullam de eisdem fassionem ultra communem estimationem eorundem faciendi habet facultatem prout infra latius suo loco super ea re tractabitur. [§3] Pręterea cunctorum quoque dominorum prælatorum & virorum ecclesiasticorum princeps ipse noster verus pariter & legitimus successor est, non quantum ad bonorum & iurium possessionariorum ab ecclesia ablationem & sequestrationem sed quantum alteri (vacantibus prælaturarum sedibus & ecclesiarum rectoratibus) ad gubernandum cum ecclesia collationem salvo iure confirmationis Archiepiscopatum et Episcopatum quę iurisdictioni sacro sanctę Romanę dumtaxat ecclesię subesse dinoscitur.

Quod papa in collationibus beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum in hoc regno nullam iurisdictionem retinuit preter confirmationis auctoritatem. Tit. xi.

SCIENDUM autem quod licet papa seu summus pontifex, utramque iurisdictionem temporalem scilicet & spiritualem habeat in collationibus tamen beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum pro tempore vacantium in hoc tamen regno summus ipse pontifex nullam iurisdictionem exequitur, præter confirmationis auctoritatem. Et hoc quadruplici ratione. [§1] PRIMO ratione foundationis ecclesiarum. Quia reges Hungarię cum soli fuerint omnium ecclesiarum & episcopatum abbatiarumque & præpositurarum in hoc regno fundatores, per eiusmodi foundationem omnem facultatem iuris patronatus nominationis, electionis ac collationis beneficiorum sibipsis acquisierunt & vendicarunt. Qua ex causa iuris videlicet patronatus ratione pertinet semper ad reges nostros hoc in regno beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum collatio. [§2] SECUNDO ratione susceptę christianitatis. Quia Hungari non per prædicationem apostolicam vel apostolorum quorum principis vicem & personam in terris papa gerit, sed per institutionem proprii regis eorum sanctissimi videlicet Stephani regis de quo & superius memini conversi sunt ad catholicam fidem qui primus omnium Episcopatus, Abbacias & præposituras hoc in regno fundavit & harum omnium ecclesiarum prælaturas ac beneficia solus ipse ex annuentia summi pontificis quibus maluit (idoneis tamen & virtutibus probitatum insignitis) contulit sicuti ecclesia de eo solenniter canit hic (videlicet sanctus Stephanus) ad instar Salomonis struit templa ditat donis ornat gemmis & coronis cruces & altaria. Et mox subinfertur Ad regendum hæc prælatos viros ponit litteratos iustos fidos & probatos ad robur fidelium. Sic talentum sibi datum deo reddens duplicatum ab æterno præparatum sibi scandit solium. Ecce aperte describitur quod ipse & non alter quispiam ad regenda templa per eum constructa donisque ditata prælatos iustos & fidos posuit prout ex eius quoque historia & pluribus privilegiis suis super ecclesiarum foundationibus & dotationibus confectis liquide patet. Itidem & plerique Cæsarii ac pontificii iuris interpretes suis commentariis conscriptum prodidere. [§3] Unde etiam rex & apostolus dici meruit eo quod vices apostolorum in terris prædicatione & bonorum operum atque exemplorum exhibitione gessit & propterea duas quoque cruces per collationem summi pontificis in signum suæ sanctitatis quod scilicet rex & apostolus iuste diceretur, digne meruit habere pro armorum insignibus unde ab illius tempore gens Hungarica duplicatam crucem pro armis ac insignibus habere pariter & gestare consuevit. Insignium namque quatuor fluminum scilicet Histri seu Danubii ac Thybisci seu Thyciæ necnon Zavę & Dravę a regno Pannonię quod modo Hungari incolunt atque inhabitant pro se vendicavit. [§4] TERTIO ratione legitimæ præscriptionis quoniam reges Hungarię a tempore regiminis eiusdem beatissimi Stephani nostri regis qui anno dominicę incarnationis primo supra millesimum in regem Hungarię gentis feliciter inunctus pariter & coronatus est ad hæc usque tempora semper in reali & pacifico usu ac possessione collationis huiusmodi beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum plusquam per quingentos annos persistentes tempus præscriptionis iurium ecclesiasticorum etiam sanctę sedis apostolicę iteratis & iteratis vicibus dudum transcenderunt. [§5] QUARTO quia ista libertas regni quantum ad beneficiorum collationes olim tempore domini Sigismundi imperatoris & regis nostri una cum conplurimis libertatibus huius regni in generali ac celebri concilio Constantiensi, cui triginta & duos cardinales demptis aliis viris ecclesiasticis & multis principibus Christianis præfuisse constat corroborata, iurisque iurandi religione firmata fuit prout in bulla superinde confecta clare continetur. [§6] Hoc autem concilium (ut summarie brevissimeque tangam) per quadriennium duravit. Nam anno domini millesimo quadingentesimo decimo quarto incepit. In quo concilio tandem anno salutis millesimo quadingentesimo decimo septimo papa Otto qui Martinus quintus appellatus est electus extitit postea vero anno sequenti videlicet millesimo quadingentesimo decimo octavo idem concilium ipsius Martini pontificis, præfatique Sigismundi imperatoris iussu dissolutum fuit & in eodem concilio Ioannes vigesimus tercius pontificatui (licet invitus) abdicavit, Gregorius vero sponte cessit & renunciavit sed Benedictus pene obstinatus & cedere nolens decreto concilii reprobatus ac pontificatu privatus extitit & in eodem concilio Ioannes Huss & Hieronymus Pragensis eius condiscipulus heretici combusti & incinerati fuerunt. SCISMA vero pro quo tollendo & dirimendo concilium ipsum (spiritus sancti gracia movente) aggregatum pariter & celebratum erat novem & triginta annis durasse recolitur quod tandem opera ipsius Sigismundi imperatoris sublatum extitit atque pax & tranquillitas peroptata dei ecclesię feliciter restituta.

Quod omnes domini prelati et persone ecclesiactice regi nostro ad fidelitatis homagium prestandum obligantur, et quod ratione bonorum temporalium coram iudicibus secularibus iuri stare tenentur.

Titulus. xii.

CUM igitur collatio beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum simul cum bonis & iuribus possessionariis ad ecclesias dei pertinentibus ad principem & regem nostrum spectare dinoscatur ideo omnes viri ecclesiastici cuiuscunque ordinis, gradus ac dignitatis existant, qui in hoc regno Hungarię castra, castella, fortalicia, civitates, oppida, villas, possessiones & prædia vel etiam alia quęcunque iura possessionaria gubernant & possident non obstante dignitatis & exemptionis eorum prærogativa libertate regi & principi huius inclyti Hungarię regni legitime coronato instar personarum sæcularium eiusdem regni ad homagium fidelitatis præstandum semper obligantur [§1] & ratione huiusmodi bonorum temporalium quę possident quorumlibet etiam actuum potentiariarum, ac aliorum negociarum exinde emergendorum in presentiam quorumlibet iudicum regni ordinariorum ab eorum adversariis (si quos habuerint) in causam libere conveniri & attrahi possunt, coram quibus more aliorum sæcularium respondere iurique stare tenentur.

De donationibus regiis & earum speciebus in generali. Tit. xiii.

QUoniam omnes domini prælati, barones, magnates nobilesque & proceres totius regni Hungariæ necnon regnorum eidem incorporatorum ac partium sibi subiectarum cuiuscunque status, conditionis dignitatisque & præminentię existant universa eorum iura possessionaria ex donationibus serenissimorum dominorum regum Hungariæ habent atque possident. In primis igitur de donationibus regiis & earum speciebus in generali dicendum occurrit. [§1] Ubi sciendu[m] est quod donatio regia duplex est scilicet pura & mixta. [§2] Pura donatio est iurium possessionariorum in iurisdictionem sacræ regni coronę legitimę redactorum perennalis per principem cuiuspiam ob servitia vel præclaras virtutes facta collatio. [§3] Mixta vero donatio dicitur illa quæ ultra servitium etiam summam aliquam pecuniarum complectitur & talis usitato vocabulo inscriptio nuncupatur. [§4] Regia enim maiestas (ex prædeclarata iurisdictione sacræ coronę regni huius Hungarię) de & super universis iuribus possessionariis quorumcunque decedentium & in semine vel hæredibus destitutorum ac deficientium liberam (prout voluerit) disponendi pro se scilicet reservandi vel alteri cui maluerit conferendi, aut inscribendi plenariam semper habet potestatis facultatem. [§5] ET NE pravorum hominum patrata malitia impunita relinqueretur. Neve nobilitas & rusticitas equalis estimationis censeretur. Rursus ne fidelitas ac infidelitas simile præmium sortiretur. Ad conterendam igitur infidelium proterviam & rebellionem pravorumque & flagitiosorum hominum male agendi licentiam reprimendam maiores nostri non solum iura possessionaria aliquorum in semine (ut præfertur) deficientium verum etiam contra statum publicum regni huius ex eoque in despectum dignitatis regiæ maiestatis contumaciter sese erigentium ac alios præter iuris equitatem absolute temerarieque turbantium ad sacram coronam dicti regni Hungariæ consequenterque collationem regiam (etiam superviventibus illis) devolvenda esse tum iuris rigore exigente tum vero reipublicæ utilitate exposcente communi decreto sanxerunt atque statuerunt ut exemplo punicionis sceleratorum alii terreantur alii vero ad opera fidelitatis exercenda atque peragenda si quibus forsitan talium bona collata fuerint ferventius accendantur.

De casibus notam infidelitatis afferentibus. Tit. xiiii.

SUnt igitur casus isti & vocantur notæ infidelitatis in quibus regia maiestas bona aliquorum eisdem superviventibus cui voluerit de iure libereque donandi habet facultatem. [§1] PRIMUS est de crimine læsę maiestatis si quis videlicet impias manus in personam principis nostri iniecerit vel capiti eius gladio aut veneno insidiatus fuerit sive murum aut domum in quo princeps ipse extiterit violenter invaserit. [§2] SECUNDUS casus est si quis evidenter se erigit & opponit contra statum publicum, regis & coronę. Hęc tamen erectio seipsum iuste defendendo notam afferre non intelligatur. [§3] ITEM qui conficit falsas litteras vel falsis litteris evidenter utitur in iudicio. Aut qui sculpsit vel utitur falsis sigillis. [§4] ITEM Cussores falsarum monetarum vel eisdem monetis scienter & publice in magna quantitate utentes. [§5] ITEM occisores vel vulneratores fratrum ac consanguineorum suorum usque ad quartum gradum inclusive. Necnon parricidæ, uxoricidę ac maritucidæ. Veruntamen uxoricidium & mariticiidum intellige præter iuris processum & equitatem patratum. [§6] ITEM stupratores consanguinearum similiter usque ad quartum gradum inclusive. Aut novercarum violatores. Incestuosi dum fuerint evidenter convicti vel proscripti. [§7] ITEM incendiarii publici villarum & possessionum. [§8] ITEM inductores exterorum hominum spoliatorum vel stipendiariorum ad disturbandum internum regni statum. [§9] ITEM violatores litterarum fidei publicæ vel salvi conductus dum evidenter fuerint convicti. [§10] ITEM Traditores castrorum dominorum propriorum. Necnon expugnatores & interceptores aut subtractores castrorum vel castellorum aut aliorum fortalitorum quorumcunque regnicolarum dum evidenter fuerint convicti. [§11] ITEM Interemptores, captivatores, verberatores vel vulneratores iudicum ordinariorum regni & eorundem vices in iudiciis gerentium. [§12] ITEM occisores litigantium seu causantium, sive ad regiam maiestatem aut ad octavas vel brevia iudicia sive ad sedem iudiciariam alicuius comitatus, aut alia quęcunque loca iudiciorum ad causarum scilicet prosecutionem proficiscentium vel ad dietam & conventionem generalem de regio edicto celebrandam venientium & accedentium. [§13] ITEM Occisores, vulneratores aut verberatores hominum regionum ac testimoniorum capituli vel conventus in exequutione aliqua procedentium. [§14] ITEM publici hæretici damnatæ scilicet hęresi adherentes. [§15] ITEM mutilatores membrorum & eruitores oculorum præter banos, waywodas & alios honores in confinibus regni tenentes. [§16] ITEM amissores castrorum finitimorum regni. [§17] ITEM administratores armorum & victualium thurcis & aliis infidelibus regni scilicet huius æmulis & hostibus. [§18] ITEM turbatores, detentores & spoliatores illorum qui sectæ eorum damnatæ renunciantes ex Thurcia regnum ad istud confugiunt moraturi.

Quod bona latronum, furum & homicidarum Donationi regie non subiacent. xv.

EX præmissis itaque casibus subsequitur quod furum ac latronum seu prædonum & aliorum eiuscemodi spoliatorum. Item homicidarum & alio modo nobiles vulnerantium seu verberantium (demptis casibus prædeclaratis) domosque eorum violenter invadentium; nec non possessiones & iura possessionaria territoriaque aliorum deprędantium vel occupantium bona & iura possessionaria in Fiscum regium non devolvuntur, neque collationi regiæ maiestatis subiacere dinoscuntur, sed tales capitali dumtaxat sententia fures scilicet patibulo, prædones vero palo vel rota, cæteri autem gladio iuxta scilicet eorum demerita sunt feriendi atque puniendi. [§1] Bona vero & iura possessionaria ipsorum (si & ubi morte damnati fuerint) in filios vel illis non existentibus in fratres eorum generationales aut alios legitimos eorum successores derivantur. [§2] Ubi autem gratia regia illis concessa, & sententia nihilominus exequuta fuerit extunc iura ipsorum possessionaria a manibus iudicis & adverse partem ad instantiam scilicet cuius sententia lata extiterit per filios aut fratres ipsorum generationales vel alios successores legitimos estimatione communi mediante redimuntur prout in sententiarum seriebus in secunda parte clarius dicitur.

Quod differentia est inter notam infidelitatis & sententiam capitalem dupliciter. xvi.

Differentia itaque est inter notam infidelitatis & sententiam capitalem dupliciter. PRIMO quia per notam infidelitatis & caput & hęreditas seu perpetuitas omnium bonorum iuriumque possessionariorum infidelis hominis amittitur, & nunquam hęreditas ipsorum iurium possessionariorum ad portionem suam cedentium in filios vel fratres generationales talis infidelis aut labe infidelitatis irretiti obfuscatique & condemnati hominis (si etiam capite plecteretur) de cætero revertitur. [§1] Immo genealogia sua vel generationis suæ propago in ignominiam contemptumque infidelitatis & in laudem preclarę virtutis illibatę fidelitatis quantum ad devolutionem bonorum a se perpetuo aliena efficitur. FILIOS tamen intellige iam natos & non nascituros. Nam post paternam condemnationem seu labe infidelitatis eius innodationem filii nascituri in iuribus paternis (si gratiam regiam & dominium adhuc bonorum suorum pater eorum consequutus fuerit) merito riteque succedunt. [§2] GRATIA tamen hæc regia successionem ad mutuam quantum super devolutione bonorum generationi suę (demptis filiis post condemnationem procreandis) in nulla parte suffragabitur. Nec trahit alios filios prius natos vel fratres generationales ipsa gratia cum condemnato illo ad priorem successionis eorum statum nisi mutuus super devolutione bonorum ex novo contractus per fassiones instrumentales inter eos sequeretur & consensus superinde regius impetraretur. Hoc enim modo & non aliter mortua & amissa successio vivificabitur atque instaurabitur. [§3] PER SENTENTIAM VERO capitalem proprietas & hæreditas bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum non amittitur, sed si sententia condemnatus quispiam extremo supplicio punietur extunc universa bona & iura sua possessionaria in filios (si habuerit) vel fratres suos propinquiores aut alios legitimos successores simpliciter devolvuntur. [§4] Si autem gratiam regiam meruerit, & exequutio sententię nihilominus per adversam partem peracta fuerit tunc eadem iura possessionaria filii vel fratres aut alii legitimi successores estimatione (ut præfertur) communi in termino per iudicem ad id præfigendo ad se redimendi habent auctoritatem. [§5] ALIA insuper differentia inter notam & sententiam est quoniam condemnatus homo cum adversa parte etiam post latam & pronunciatam sententiam (ante tamen eiusdem sententię exequutionem) si concordaverit aut concordare poterit extunc illi neque gratia regia est necessaria, neque iudex se in dominium bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum ipsius sententiati hominis ingerere poterit. [§6] NOTAM tamen infidelitatis si quis incurrerit si etiam cum eo quem in casibus prænaratis læserit plene concordaverit ab impetitione tamen illius cui regia maiestas bona & iura possessionaria per aliquam notam contulerit se præcavere non poterit ex iurisdicione etenim sacrę coronę regni huius contra cuius utputa dignitatem auctoritatemque infidelis ipse deliquit & ex consequenti collatione regię maiestatis impetrator eiuscemodi bonorum & iurium possessionariorum liberam agendi procedendique & ea bona iuris ordine observato pro se vendicandi & appropriandi plenariam habet potestatis facultatem.

Qui sint & intelligantur heredes & posteritates, & qualia bona solum masculinum, qualiave utrumque sexum concernant. xvii.

CAeterum quia ab inceptę materię prosecutione (ob occurrentem & quidem necessariam, notę & sententię hoc in loco declarationem pariter & distinctionem) digressionem feci. Igitur ad Donationum regiarum evidentiolem explanationem revertendo & primo clausulam illam sine hærede decedentium, vel in semine deficientium declarando. [§1] NOTANDUM est quod quamvis appellatione posteritatum omnes de iure patri vel matri succedere debentes etiam posthumis inclusis sive mares sive fœminę sint intelligantur; prolium vero nominatione tam filii quam filię iam nati vel natę posthumis exclusis significantur liberorum siquidem nuncupatione & filii & filię nepotesque & neptes pariter contineantur tamen de vetusta & approbata regni huius nostri consuetudine hæredes solummodo filii legitimi qui iuribus paternis hæreditariis succedere solent intelliguntur [§2] licet in casu quo bona & iura possessionaria paterna, vel etiam materna utrumque sexum tam scilicet mares quam etiam fœmellas concernere dinoscuntur. Hæredis nomen ipsę quoque filię (licet improprie) gerere permittantur. Filię itaque quia non omnibus bonis & iuribus paternis participant ideo recte non hæredes sed posteritates potius nuncupantur. [§3] Et posteritates quoque dico nuncupari non quantum ad iurium paternorum communiter & semper devolutionem sed quantum ad sanguinis propagationem & in casibus quibus legitime sorciuntur bonorum paternorum vel maternorum successionem. [§4] Nam iura dumtaxat possessionaria pecuniis paternis aut maternis empta & comparata. Præterea in homagium alicuius interempti nobilis data & obligata ceterorum pro iure Quartalicio seu in sortem refusionis & restitutionis quartę puellaris perpetuo collata & inscripta dummodo huiusmodi perennalis inscriptio Quartalicii non sit in preiudicium fratrum vel aliorum rite succedentium facta. Item illa etiam iura possessionaria in quibus aliquæ puellæ vel fœminæ per regiam maiestatem (sine tamen præiudicio fratrum generationalium) in veros successores quo ad utrumque sexum præficiuntur ius fœmineum æque veluti masculinum sequuntur, [§5] alia vero universa iura possessionaria qualitercunque acquisita solummodo iuri masculino deserviunt. [§6] Et dixi notanter pecuniis paternis vel maternis empta quoniam in bonis & iuribus possessionariis pecuniis aliquorum fratrum comparatis puellę seu fœminę, sorores videlicet eorum nil iuris habere possunt, neque collateralis modo ipsæ fœminę succedere, aut portionem aliquam acquirere permittuntur; sed iuribus tantum de paternis aut portionem congruentem in casibus immediate præscriptis aut ius Quartalicium pro se requirendi habent auctoritatem. [§7] Dixi etiam quo ad utrumque sexum parimodo notanter. Nam in casu quo regia maiestas puellam seu mulierem aliquam in iuribus paternis vel etiam fraternis (si frater ipse hæredibus careat, & præfectioni consenciat) in verum hæredem & successorem masculinum simpliciter præfecerit non inserendo scilicet in litteris præfectionalibus utrumque sexum extunc huiusmodi iura possessionaria mortua ipsa muliere solummodo in filios (si habuerit aliter autem rursus in Fiscum regium) devolvuntur & filiæ suæ iuribus dumtaxat earum Quartaliciis de eisdem iuxta huius regni consuetudinem provenire debentibus contentari debebunt.

Quare iura possessionaria serviciis conquisita ius fœmineum non sequuntur. xviii.

SI autem queritur quare bona ac iura possessionaria serviciis acquisita ius fœmineum non sequuntur? Responde quod ideo quia regnum istud Hungarię cum partibus sibi subiectis in medio faucibusque hostium situm & positum est quod gladio semper & armis tutari defendique solet bona etiam & iura possessionaria (ut communiter) arte militari sanguinisque effusione progenitores nostri acquisierunt & modo quoque acquiri consueverunt. Mulieres autem & puellæ armis militare cum hostibusque decertare non solent neque possunt. Et ob hoc bona ipsa iuri fœmineo non deserviunt.

Econtra cur iura possessionaria pecuniis empta ius fœmineum eque ac masculinum concernunt. Tit. xix.

SI vero econtrario queritur. Cur iura possessionaria pecuniis (ut præmissum est) paternis aut maternis empta ius fœmineum æque ac masculinum concernunt? Dic quod ideo quoniam pecunię inter res mobiles computantur: de rebus autem mobilibus tam paternis quam etiam maternis & filii, & filiæ æquales portiones sorciuntur; & ex consequenti etiam de bonis & iuribus possessionariis huiusmodi pecuniis de quibus utpote decedente patre vel matre filiæ portionem habere debebant comparatis portiones congruentes ipsis filiabus dantur. [§1] Licet originem & fundamentum considerando quod etiam pecunię maximis servitiis & laboribus, interdumque ingenti sanguinis effusione acquiri & congregari consueverint. Et quod onera bellorum & defensionem patrię mulieres seu puellę per se gerere supportareque non possint etiam de emptiis bonis & iuribus possessionariis portiones perpetuas non mererentur habere, ne tamen a successione rerum & bonorum paternorum penitus exclusæ viderentur fraternus amor & dilectio filiorum qua erga sorores afficiuntur, & iure quoque divino affici tenentur permisit filias portiones congruas perennali iure cum eis pariter de prenarratis bonis ac iuribus possessionariis emptiis habere & onera bellorum tutelamque patrię in hac parte maritis ipsarum imposuit peragere atque sufferre.

Utrum bona nota infidelitatis condemnati utrumque sexum concernentia post factam gratiam iterum utrique sexui deserviant. Tit. xx.

Item quæritur si quis in nota infidelitatis condemnatus fuerit cuius bona iurisque possessionaria utrumque sexum masculinum scilicet & fœmineum contigissent atque sequuta fuissent & tandem ipse condemnatus capiti ac bonis suis gratiam regiam habere meruerit utrum filię post gratiam nasciture in bonis paternis equaliter cum filiis succedant an ne? Quandoquidem priora privilegia per ipsam notam infidelitatis mortificata fuere. [§1] Dicendum quod sic. Quia per gratiam regiam omnia privilegia priora ipsius infidelis quantum ad hæredes ac posteritates post se (directe tamen & non collateraliter modo) sequentes vivificantur, roburque prioris firmitatis sortiuntur & ex consequenti bona illa rursus utrumque sexum sequuntur. [§2] Nisi forsitan in litteris gratiose exceptio per expressum superinde fieret. Nam in potestate principis consistit gratię collatio & bonorum ipsorum remissio. [§3] Quemadmodum igitur & quibus sub conditionibus princeps ipse gratiam fecerit illaque bona remiserit sic etiam de cætero bonorum eorundem successio sequetur. [§4] De filiabus autem ante condemnationem paternam natis nulla est quæstio. Nam illæ portiones suas ob patris delictum non amittunt, ad successionem tamen mutuum cum eo amplius (sicuti in serie differentiarum notę infidelitatis & sententię capitalis prænarratum est) non deveniunt.

An bona tum pro servitiis tum pecuniis simul collata utrumque sexum sequantur. Tit. xxi.

Quæritur ulterius si regia maiestas aut quispiam dominorum vel nobilium ius aliquod possessionarium sive castrum aut fortalium, sive oppidum, villa vel prædium existat tum pro servitorum exhibitione vel autem beneficiorum & complacentiarum impensione, tum vero pro certa pecuniarum summa in litteris superinde Donationalibus aut etiam Fassionibus expressata simul cuiquam perpetuo contulerit & inscripserit utrum huiusmodi ius possessionarium utrumque sexum sequatur, an autem masculino dumtaxat sexui deserviat? [§1] Dicendum quod virilem solummodo sexum concernit eo quod bonorum acquisitio radicem semper adeptionis & consequutionis eorundem, non autem appendiculum vel ramum respicit propterea a radice acquisitionis hæreditarium & non empticium ius esse comprobatur. [§2] Veruntamen filiæ seu fœminei sexus homines de eiusmodi pecuniarum summa portiones suas merito rehabere possunt. [§3] Ubi autem summa ipsa pecuniarum grandis adeo & notabilis esse videretur ut ius illud possessionarium modo antelato collatum vix tanti valoris reputaretur extunc ius idem possessionarium per iudicis & alicuius testimonialis loci homines communi estimatione mediante estimari & secundum huiusmodi estimationis exigentiam portio pecuniaria filiabus cedens per filios reddi debet. [§4] COROLLARIUM. Unde ex radice adeptionis bonorum elicitur quod frater quispiam vendens precio portionem suam possessionariam alteri fratri in quem etiam alioquin iure generationis & successionis huiusmodi portio (venditore ipso deficiente) devolvenda erat eadem portio ius fœmineum non sequitur. [§5] Et per portionem intellige etiam totalem possessionem & plura alia iura possessionaria similia. [§6] Cauti sint itaque acquirentes vel emptores bonorum. Prout enim litteras suas formabunt ita & bonorum suorum successionem atque devolutionem habebunt.

De clausula donationis per defectum seminis: quid per semen intelligatur. xxii.

QUoniam in serie litterarum regiarum Donationalium super bonis ac iuribus possessionariis illorum, qui hæredibus deficiunt conficiendarum hæc clausula (per defectum seminis talis vel talis &c.) semper apponi interserique solet unde putaverunt aliqui quod si dominus vel nobilis ille qui deficit filias post se reliquerit tunc necesse sit in eiusmodi Donationalibus litteris per expressum describere pariter & addere clausulam masculini sexus ut contineatur in Donationis tenore per defectum seminis masculini sexus talis aut talis &c. Alioquin autem Donationem ipsam non valere neque impetratori talium bonorum suffragari posse arguentes & allegantes illum in semine (eo quod filias habeat) nondum defecisse. [§1] Quod tendendum non est. Nam per semen virilis dumtaxat seu masculinus sexus & non fœmineus intelligitur. Frustra igitur & superfluum est id addere vel apponere quod etiam alioquin vocabuli virtus continet in se. [§2] Et ratio est quia naturaliter ex semine viri superhabundanti (ut in plurimum) masculus concipitur, & econtra ex semine fœminæ fœmina generatur. Recte igitur dicitur is in semine defecisse (si etiam filias habeat) qui in virili sexu defecit. [§3] Hinc est quod ex nobili patre & ignobili matre generati filii veri nobiles reputantur, & patris familiam conditionemque sequuntur sed non econverso prout & superius aperte declaravi. [§4] Verum tamen si bona & iura possessionaria cuiuspiam utrumque sexum manifeste concernunt & uterque sexus deficiet tunc rite & commode ponenda erit in Donatione regia per defectum seminis utriusque sexus talis &c. ut in ea parte per semen successio intelligatur.

Quanto tempore ius regium durat et prescribitur. Tit. xxiii.

QUia igitur regia maiestas cunctorum dominorum, baronum, magnatum procerumque & regni nobilium in semine deficientium verus (ut præmissi) & legitimus successor esse censetur. Sunt igitur plures dominorum & nobilium ac regnicolarum possessionatorum scilicet hominum qui iura regalia pro se male vendicantes aut videlicet pignoris titulo aut Fessione invalida & inefficaci vel regio consensu indigente & necessaria aut alio successorio vel hereditario iure in se devoluta fingentes aut alia indirecta via taliter qualiter dominium eorum (maxime guerrarum disturbiorumque temporibus) subintrantes taciturnitatis silentio tenere gubernareque & possidere solent sese in eisdem iuribus possessionariis longævi temporis præscriptione mediante firmare & fundare prætendentes. [§1] UNDE SCIENDUM est quod ius regium centum annis in bonis & iuribus possessionariis quorumlibet malefidei possessorum durat & exquiri poterit obiectione præscriptionis alicuius non obstante.

Quid sit ius regium diffinitive et quid ius possessionarium. xxiiii.

IUs igitur regium dicitur iurisdicio sacrę coronæ regni in bonis ac iuribus possessionariis per quempiam pro se mala fide contraque consensum regium usurpatis tacite latens & consistens. [§1] Nomine autem iuris possessionarii generaliter intellige castra, castella, fortalitia, civitates, oppida, villas, possessiones, terras, sylvas & prædia. [§2] UBI SCIENDUM quod possessio dupliciter accipitur. Primo quidem pro dominio usuque ac gubernatione alicuius rei mobilis vel immobilis. Et hoc modo dicitur possessio quasi pedum positio in usum ac dominium ipsius rei quam quis realiter tenet & gubernat. [§3] Alio modo autem (prout in proposito) possessionis appellatione villa significatur & intelligitur. Et hoc proprie loquendo. Nam castra, castella, civitates, opida & prædia separata habent vocabula. [§4] Veruntamen hoc in loco nomine iuris possessionarii generaliter intellige castra, castella, fortalitia, civitates, opida, villas, portiones possessionarias, terras, prata, sylvas & prædia. [§5] Prædium autem nos dicimus agrum illum esse in quo prius homines habitare solebant modo tamen nulla edificia apparent neque coloni habitant quasi prædæ expositum ab antiquis derivatum qui agros quos bello capiebant in prædæ nomine habebant. [§6] Fundum etiam seu locum sessionis nobilitaris atque Iobagionalis edificiis & habitatore penitus destitutum similiter prædium appellamus. [§7] Castra vero & castella, fortalitia, civitates & opida nota sunt & declaratione non egent. [§8] Pertinentiarum siquidem nominatione communiter intelliguntur & continentur omnia illa quæ ad civitatem, opidum aut villam aliquam spectant prout sunt terræ arabiles cultæ & incultæ, agri, prata, fœnilia, pascua, campi, sylvæ, virgulta, nemora, montes, valles, vineæ, promontoria, aque, fluvii, piscinae, piscaturæ, aquarum decursus & molendina ac eorundem loca. Et generaliter omnes utilitates ac proventus ipsi civitati aut opido vel villæ deservientes. [§9] Sæpe autem pertinentiarum appellatione comprehenduntur omnes iurisdictiones alicuius castris vel omnia bona immobilia ubilibet adiacentia ipsi castro annexa atque deservientia. Sicuti civitates, opida, villæ, portiones possessionariæ & prædia. Tamen huiusmodi nomine vel significatione raro utimur sed civitates, opida, villas portionesque & prædia ad castrum attinentia si non specificè generali tamen positione denotare solemus. [§10] Et quamvis ius regium ad universa fere iura possessionaria quæ Donationi & collationi regie quovis modo vel titulo subiacent generaliter referri & extendi queat tamen si quis dominorum aut nobilium in casibus vel criminibus notam infidelitatis afferentibus & inducentibus excesserit atque deliquerit, aut si quis in semine (de recenti) defecerit huius vel horum bona ac iura possessionaria non nomine iuris regii simpliciter sed per notam infidelitatis (eam declarando) vel autem per defectum seminis ipsius defuncti hominis impetrari & sæpe in eiusmodi Donatione ius quoque regium (si quod in illis bonis etiam aliter haberetur) impetratores apponere consueverunt, ideo descriptio super iure regio immediate prædeclarata non de huiusmodi genere iuris regii sed quantum ad celatores iurium regalium est intelligenda atque referenda.

Quod impetratores bonorum iniuste nomine iuris regii in estimatione eorundem bonorum perennali: condemnantur. xxv.

SI quis itaque nomine iuris regii aliqua iura possessionaria pro se impetraverit, in quorum utpote pacifico dominio quispiam dominorum aut nobilium ab olim perstitisset & pertransitis legitimorum terminorum in causa superinde suscitanda processibus (in quatuor enim terminis octavalibus iuxta consuetudinem modernorum eiusmodi causa finaliter terminari solet) si dominus vel nobilis ipse iusto titulo bonoque iure impetrata illa iura possessionaria se possedissee possidereque poterit comprobare extunc impetrator talis in estimatione perennali eorundem iurium possessionariorum male & iniuste impetratorum (quorum utputa perpetuitatem pro se usurpare vindicareque & legitimum possessorem illis perpetuo privare prætendebat) convinci debet & condemnari ut simili mensura sibi remerciatur & pari damno quod alteri inferre satagebat compensam sorciatur. [§1] Et idem est tenendum etiam de illis qui per notam infidelitatis in prædeclaratis casibus aliqua iura possessionaria a regia maiestate pro se impetrant, & huiusmodi crimen notæ infidelitatis adversus eos quorum iura possessionaria impetrata fuerint comprobare non poterunt quod videlicet tales quoque in estimatione ipsorum iurium possessionariorum perennali (si liti cedere noluerint) condemnantur [§2] licet plerique sentiant ipsos solummodo in emenda linguæ eorum convinci & aggravari debere ex eo scilicet ut innocentes & innoxios coram regia maiestate male diffamasse intelligantur.

Quod impetratores bonorum per defectum seminis quorumpiam in nullo onere vincuntur.

Titulus. xxvi.

SI quis autem per defectum seminis cuiuspiam decedentis & hæredibus deficientis bona vel iura possessionaria tanquam ad sacram regni coronam iure devoluta ab ipsa regia celsitudine impetraverit & tandem in examine causæ exinde movendæ eadem iura possessionaria non ad collationem regiam sed ad fratres aliquos generationales vel fœminei sexus ipsius defuncti homines aut alios legitimos successores derivata fuisse litterarum testimonio verificabuntur tunc impetrans ipse nulli subicitur pœnæ, nec ullo onere propterea gravabitur eo quod mortui hominis bona tanquam ambigua hærede scilicet masculino carentis destitutumque impetravit ut iurisdictio ipsius sacræ regni coronæ in tempore exquireretur & ambiguitas devolutionis ipsorum bonorum tolleretur. [§1] Nam ille quoque qui causam obtinuerit & ad se bona illa devoluta esse declarabit forsitan vivente eo qui iam occubuit dominium eorundem bonorum reale non habuit unde si etiam ius regium in huiusmodi litteris Donationalibus per defectum seminis emanatis casu insertum vel annexum fuerit & ulterius impetrator ille ius ipsum regium prosequi noluerit in nullo propterea iudiciali gravamine convinci debet. [§2] Si tamen ampliori processu pertinaciter cum iure ipso agere non cessabit rursusque succubuerit tunc pœne præmissæ subiacebit. [§3] Poterit autem impetrator ipse (si voluerit) in causa iuris regii legitime procedere. [§4] Nam licet consideratione illius clausulæ quæ in litteris Donationalibus semper inseri solet videlicet præmissis sic ut præfertur stantibus & se habentibus &c. arbitrati sunt nonnulli cassata & invalidata prima parte Donationis quæ per defectum seminis erat etiam reliquam partem super iure regio confectam cassari & anichilari debere. Quoniam tamen hoc verum fuit quod ille cuius bona impetrata erant sine semine decessit clausula prænotata totali Donationi & cum hoc iuri ipsi regio derogare non videtur idcirco impetrator ipse si voluerit causam suam super dicto iure regio rite prosequi valebit.

Quod bona in lite existentia per defectum seminis impetrari non possunt. xxvii.

ADvertendum est autem quod si quispiam prætextu hæreditatis aliquorum iurium possessionariorum causam litemque suscitaret, & antequam eam ad finem effectumque perduceret ab hac luce sine semine decederet tunc in eo casu bona & iura eiuscemodi possessionaria in lite existentia per defectum seminis ipsius decedentis a principe impetrari non possunt, [§1] quoniam propagatio sanguinis cuius respectu decedens ille bona ipsa acquirebat & prosequabatur extincta est. Princeps autem licet successor eius sit respective ad bona quæ vivens possidebat aut possidere poterat non tamen censetur esse propagativus hæres ad ea consequenda quæ decedens ipse iuri suo nondum appropriaverat & addixerat, sed in dubio adhuc litis illa se consequuturum sperabat. [§2] Veruntamen si habuerit bona ac iura possessionaria præ manibus alienis pignoris titulo vel pro Dotalitio aut Quartalio sive etiam alio redemptibili modo obligata talia bona regia maiestas vel ille qui Donatione regia pocietur cui ea contulerit ad se redimendi facultatem semper habebit. [§3] Nam huiusmodi obligatio non excludit bonorum proprietatem qua defunctus ipse vivens potiebatur. [§4] Et hoc idem est de fratribus quoque adoptivis per omnia sentiendum atque tenendum qui successores legitimi non tamen hæredes veri fratris defuncti reputantur & eiusmodi bona redemptibilia sibi vindicare optimo iure possunt. [§5] Hinc prodiit tritum illud & vetustum proverbium quod lites præcio venundari & cœmi non possunt. Quod quidem dictum non est sic accipiendum ut miserabilis aliqua persona egestate & inopia gravata vel alio defectu præventa non possit bonorum suorum iusto titulo se concernentium reacquisitionem & recuperationem causarumque & litium exinde suscitatarum aut movendarum directionem & prosecutionem alteri commendare. Vel etiam huiusmodi bona litigiosa seu in lite existentia bonis sub conditionibus vendere & a se alienare. Sed ita proverbium ipsum est intelligendum ut ille cui bonorum ipsorum venditio facta, vel eius causæ prosecutio commendata fuerit nomine suo proprio in eadem causa nec vivente sed neque decedente eo qui venditionem huiusmodi bonorum fecit procedere potest, sed nomine eiusdem venditoris causam ipsam dirigere & prosequi debet. [§6] Exitus autem & finis litis dubius est, & interim quo adusque pro parte actoris causa ipsa finem sortietur, venditor ille bona huiusmodi litigiosa sua esse non poterit recte affirmare. Ideo neque emptor valebit pro eisdem nomine suo proprio tanquam pro bonis venditoris in iudicio contendere. [§7] Unde si litis intermedio antequam scilicet bona prænotata per sententiam diffinitivam reoptenta fuerint venditor ille decesserit, extunc emptor ipse impensam & oleum pariter perdet. Nam ex ratione præallegata per amplius in causa illa procedere non poterit, & ex consequenti lites hoc est bona litigiosa non potuisse precio comparare manifestum erit.

Quod bona Donatione regia acquisita si etiam pecuniarum summa contradictoribus solvatur ius fœmineum non concernunt. xxviii.

Item sæpenumero contingit impetratores aliquorum bonorum & iurium possessionariorum aut per defectum seminis quorumcunque decedentium aut per aliam quamvis notam vel etiam iuris regii titulo cum contradictoribus illis qui tempore executionis huiusmodi Donationum apparuerunt & Statutioni earum contradictionis velamine obviaverunt concordare & in unionem devenire atque summam aliquam pecuniarum eisdem contradictoribus solvere, ut citius faciliusque dominium bonorum impetratorum adipiscerentur aut eadem bona ab omni prorsus ampliori solutione, cui forte prætextu iurium Quartalitorum aut dotum & rerum Paraffernalium & aliorum huiusmodi negotiorum subiacebant liberarent. [§1] Unde putaverunt nonnulli talia bona ius fœmineum perinde atque masculinum sequi debere quod minime verum videtur. Nam iurium possessionariorum proprietas ad radicem atque originem acquisitionis semper est referenda prout superius quoque breviter declaratum est & ob hoc ex stipite Donationis acquisitiva bona & non ramo solutionis emptitia esse censentur. [§2] Donatio enim, quæ præcessit in causa fuit, ut solutio pecuniaria subsequeretur.

Quomodo cum Donatione regia per defectum seminis procedendum est. xxix.

Qualiter autem cum Donationibus regiis per defectum seminis æditis & confectis procedendum sit. Quidve de bonis & iuribus possessionariis impetratis infra decisionem causæ exinde inchoandę agendum existat. Quomodo etiam causa ipsa finiri & terminari debeat ex quo in decreto generali clara super ea re mentio & articulus conscriptus habetur. Ideo modus ille ibidem denotatus in hac parte observandus relinquatur, licet vetustæ consuetudini regni huius in quibusdam clausulis præiudicari videatur nihilominus ut huius rei notitia facilius habeatur articulum in eodem decreto exinde conscriptum verbo tenus inserendum & hic annectendum curavi qui sic incipit. [§1] ITEM si in quocunque comitatu aliqua iura per defectum seminis quorumcunque decedentium devoluta fuerint, & de huiusmodi possessionibus manifeste non constat an ad ius regium pertineant vel aliquos fratres generationales seu homines fœminei sexus concernant sed inter ista duo videlicet ius regium & ius aliorum scilicet generationalium vel fœmineum dubium intervenerit extunc homo communis nobilis & idoneus in quolibet comitatu ad id per comitem parochialem cum iudicibus nobilium & aliis nobilibus comprovincialibus in unum locum congregatis non tamen ex baronibus, nec de potentioribus, sed de mediocribus nobilibus electus huiusmodi iura devoluta & dubia & alia similia siqua contigerint tamdiu conservet & manu teneat absque damnificatione qualibet excepto solum quod de proventibus consuetis huiusmodi possessionum donec in manibus suis remanebunt expensas moderatas capere & facere possit de quibus tandem rationem reddere valeat & teneatur quousque huiusmodi devolutio iurium, sine hæredibus decedentium in sede iudiciaria curiæ regiæ publicata fuerit, ipsaque publicatione facta quicunque easdem possessiones & iura sibi pertinere allegaverit infra anni unius integri revolutionem iura sua producendo easdem ad se pertinere comprobet. Quod si facere poterit iudex curiæ regiæ eidem statui mandet & faciat cum effectu. [§2] Si vero in probatione defecerit iuri regio relinquatur. Et si qui ulterius ad easdem ius habere speraverint eas de manibus regiis legitime requirant. [§3] Ubi autem uxores & filiæ huiusmodi hominum absque hæredibus masculinis decedentium in talibus possessionibus & iuribus remanserint extunc possessiones eadem & iura a manibus earum occupari & auferri non debeant priusquam de earum iuribus videlicet an hæreditarie & perpetuo ad ius fœmineum pertineant an ne veritas inquiratur. [§4] Quod si repertum fuerit eadem iura iuri fœmineo non competere extunc dictis uxoribus talium decedentium antequam de dominio dictarum possessionum excludantur per regiam maiestatem vel alios ad quos repertæ fuerint esse devolutæ de earum dotibus & iuribus plena satisfactio impendatur. [§5] Filiabus vero usque ad tempus maritacionis earum domus paterna cum quarta parte possessionum paternarum pro quarta filiali secundum consuetudinem regni sequestretur & possidenda relinquatur. [§6] Postquam vero maritata & traductæ fuerint de earum iure Quartalitio pecuniaria solutione mediante satis fiat. [§7] Ubi autem aliqua ex ipsis filiabus homini impossessionato maritata fuerit dictante eadem regni consuetudine in perpetuo iure & dominio huiusmodi quartæ filialis possessionariæ succedere debeat & remanere. [§8] Ita tamen si ipsa de voluntate & consensu fratrum seu consanguineorum suorum in quos post ipsius matrimonium huiusmodi iura seu Quartalitia reverti & redundari debeant homini ut præfertur impossessionato nupserit. [§9] Alioquin sive de domo paterna, sive de curiis & servitiis baronum seu maiorum nobilium dictis suis fratribus seu consanguineis aut parentibus irrequisitis & nolentibus, seu non consentientibus id fecerit ius suum Quartalitium non cum possessione sed cum satisfactioe pecuniarum requirendi habebit facultatem.

Declaratio articuli decreti super bonis per defectum seminis impetratorum editi. xxx.

QUI quidem articulus prout præmisi vetustæ consuetudini regni huius præiudicare videtur. PRIMO siquidem in publicatione iurium modo prædeclarato dubiorum. [§1] SECUNDO vero in termini octavalis non præfixione. [§2] TERTIO insuper in Quartalitorum puellarum ignobilibus nuptarum restitutione. [§3] Nam huius publicatio iuxta veterem & approbatam regni legem non in curia regiæ maiestatis sed in faciebus ipsorum iurium possessionariorum maxime vero in loco solitæ residentiæ illius qui in semine defecit tempore videlicet legitime statutionis eorum præsentibus vicinis & commetaneis fieri debet & a die eiusmodi statutionis atque publicationis infra ipsius anni unius integri revolutionem. Qui cunque statutioni prænarratæ contradixerint, vel etiam alii qui postea causæ & liti ipsi se se ingerere & immiscere voluerint sive sint filiæ illius defuncti in domo paterna relictæ, sive fratres generationales, sive autem cæteri fœminei sexus homines iura sua producendo coram iudice suo ad id specialiter & expresse deputato. Nunc videlicet coram domino iudice curiæ regiæ (nam alias coram domino Palatino consueverant) sive celebrentur octavæ, sive non, ad se & ad ius eorum pertinere tenentur comprobare. Aliter autem iuri regio & per consequens illi cui maiestas regia bona prænotata contulerit relinquuntur possidenda. [§4] Prout etiam in decreto serenissimi principis quondam domini Mathiæ regis de quo præsens articulus est excerptus sed variatus & immutatus manifeste continetur. [§5] Ideo enim iudex in tali defectus seminis causa per expressum denominatus est ut sciat quælibet partium infra terminum sibi præfixum ad iudicem suum recurrere, & iustitiam in premissis ab eo postulare. [§6] Filiæ autem in domo paterna (prout in articulo continetur) cum quarta parte bonorum ipsorum infra tempus maritationis earum habitabant. [§7] Uxor etiam seu relicta defuncti ex domo & curia ipsa mariti quo usque ad secundas nuptias se non transtulerit excludi non poterit sicuti infra ubi de solutionibus Dotalitiorum tractabitur clarius dicitur. [§8] Puellæ quoque seu filiæ nobilium non cum illorum vel illarum consensu, ad quos vel quas iura earum Quartalitia redundari debebunt. Sed cum patris vel fratris ipsarum qui scilicet huiusmodi Quartalitia solvere tenentur consensu nuptui dari debent.

De eo qui cum iure regio in causam cuiuspiam se immittit. Tit. xxxi.

Item super iure regio noviter impetrato si quis in causam cuiuspiam se cum litteris Donationalibus immittit non tenetur in causam attractus, vel actor ad id vel contra illud litteras statim producere, sed impetrator ille procedat de regni consuetudine cum regio iure & hoc si actor vel reus triumphabit. Nam aliter si uterque deficiet ius regium locum ibidem habebit. [§1] Et in hoc casu iudex causæ etiam post latam & pronunciatam inter ipsas partes sententiam litteras super huiusmodi iure regio Donationales ab impetratore rursus ad se acceptare & eidem iudicium super eo facere tenetur.

Quod universe Donationes regie infra anni unius revolutionem statutione legitima firmari debent. Tit. xxxii.

ET sciendum quod omnes Donationes regiæ, sive per defectum seminis quorumcunque decedentium, sive per notam infidelitatis alioquorum prave agentium, sive nomine iuris regii mala fide iura regalia detinentium, sive novæ Donationis titulo bona sua iusto iure possidentium emanatæ & confectæ infra integram anni unius revolutionem a die Donationis computandam legitima statutione firmari stabiliri que debent sive fiat contradictio, sive non. [§1] Nam aliter Donationis vigor seu virtus expirabit & ipsa Donatio inefficax viribusque destituta manebit.

De litteris Statutoriis, Reambulatoriis, Amonitoriis et brevibus Evocatoriis, quot diebus durent ad exequendum. xxxiii.

UBi notandum quod litteræ Introductorię pariter & Statutoriæ regales super qualibet Donatione cum servitiorum declaratione ęditæ & conscriptæ incipientes sic. Cum nos debitum habentes respectum &c. vel Cum nos attentis & consideratis &c. prout scilicet Donationis exordium seriesque vel continentia verbalis se habet ad ipsam usque anni revolutionem ad exequendam huiusmodi Donationem regiam efficaces sunt: roburque sortiuntur firmitatis. [§1] ALIÆ VERO omnes litterę similes tam scilicet Introductorię & Statutoriæ seu Recaptivatoriæ quam etiam Reambulatoriæ sed & Amonitoriæ quęlibet per dicitur nobis cum clausula illa Ad terminum competentem &c. emanatę sexaginta dumtaxat diebus a die emanationis ipsarum litterarum supputandis pro exequutione peragenda valide reputantur. [§2] SI TAMEN in litteris huiusmodi Introductoriis seu Recaptivatoriis aut Reambulatoriis vel Amonitoriis terminus aliquis octavalis, ad quem scilicet Evocatio (ex ratione in eisdem litteris expressa) fieri debet denotatus & conscriptus fuerit extunc ad octavum usque diem illius festivitatis cuius videlicet octavę inseruntur & inscribuntur exequutio cum illis rite legitimeque peragi poterit. Octava tamen dies ante festum & non post intelligatur. [§3] Cum litteris quoque Evocatoriis ratione quorumcunque actuum potentiariarum ad tricesimum secundum diem secundum modernorum usum sonantibus. Similiter infra spatium sexaginta dierum a die emanationis ipsarum computandorum procedendum est. Nam aliter etiam illę viribus de cętero carebunt.

Quid littere Statutorie Donationum cum declaratione, et quid sine declaratione valeant. xxxiii.

CAeterum hoc quoque sciendum quod universę Donationes regię quocunque iure, & titulo factę cum litteris Introductoriis & Statutoriis non solum cum declaratione scilicet per clausulam Cum nos &c. Verum etiam simplici modo per aliam clausulam videlicet Dicitur nobis &c. confectis & per quoslibet iudices regni ordinarios datis exequutioni demandari possunt. [§1] Verum tamen si introductio per clausulam Dicitur nobis fiet tunc in iudicio etiam litterę regię Donationales penes Statutionem in specie produci debent ut intelligatur quo iure vel titulo, aut quibus sub conditionibus Donatio ipsa facta existat. Nam aliter Statutio ipsa nullius censebitur fore firmitatis. [§2] Si tamen cum declaratione, videlicet per Cum nos Introductio & Statutio exequuta fuerit tunc in casu quo litterę Donationales super eo confectę periclitarentur & amitterentur sola ipsa Statutoria sufficet. Nam seriem Donationis & rationem, seu causam propter quam videlicet eadem Donatio facta est in se declaratam habet.

De litteris consensualibus regiis absque fassionis verbali tenore confectis. Tit. xxxv.

ET hoc idem quod de litteris Statutoriis pręmittitur tenendum est etiam de cunctis litteris consensum regię maiestatis explicantibus, quod videlicet fassio, cui maiestas sua consensum suum regium prębuit si in ipsis litteris consensualibus verbotenus inserta non fuerit extunc nisi fassio illa in specie coram iudice producat consensus huiusmodi regius penitus invalidari debet & inefficax erit.

De nova Donatione regia in generali, et unde ortum habeat. Tit. xxxvi.

ITem solent nonnulli bona & iura ipsorum possessionaria a regia maiestate novę Donationis suę titulo sæpe cum omni suo regio iure pro se & eorum hæredibus impetrare asserentes progenitores suos ab antiquo vel etiam semetipsos dumtaxat a tempore adeptionis & consequutionis huiusmodi bonorum in dominio pacifico eorundem perstitisse. [§1] Et licet plerique eiusmodi Donatione nova iuste bonoque modo utantur. In contrarium tamen plurimæ fraudes per nonnullos salutis eorum immemores in hac parte committuntur. [§2] Quidam enim fœminei sexus generationis suæ homines de ipsis iuribus possessionariis per hanc excludere nituntur litteras originales quæ scilicet iura possessionaria emptitia fuisse aut alio titulo ius fœmineum sicuti masculinum concernere declararent occultantes igne comburentes vel aliter dilaniantes Quidam vero fraterne charitati contrariantes & uxoribus filiabusque suis faventes dum potissime semen masculinum in se deficere conspiciunt, & iura sua possessionaria in fratres condivisionales devolvi metuunt nomina uxoribus filiarumque suarum in litteris novæ Donationis inscribi faciunt fratres ipsorum generationales prætermittendo & illis bonis seu iuribus possessionariis eosdem privare vel magis despoliare satagendo.

Quid sit nova Donatio descriptive et quod dupliciter illa potest attendi. xxxvii.

UNde sciendum quod nova Donatio cum clausula præsentis tempore inseri solita videlicet in cuius vel quarum pacifico dominio progenitores suos perstitisse seque persistere asserit etiam de præsentis &c. facta non est aliud quam prioris Donationis legitimæ factæ iterata roboratio [§1] quæ ex sui vocabuli significatione semper præsupponit priorem Donationem vel aliam bonorum ipsorum acquisitionem. [§2] Sed ut clarius præmissa descriptio novæ Donationis intelligatur NOTANDUM est quod nova Donatio dupliciter potest attendi vel considerari. Primo respectu iurisdictionis sacræ coronæ regni seu principis nostri ad quem ipsa Donatio spectat. Secundo autem respectu fratrum generationalium & fœminei sexus hominum. [§3] Respectu itaque iurisdictionis principis nostri nova Donatio non requirit neque præsupponit priorem Donationem. Nam si prior Donatio super aliquo iure possessionario legitime facta & statutio exinde iuridice subsequuta haberetur, non esset necessarium ius illud possessionarium de novo impetrari, sed potius deberet prior ipsa Donatio confirmari. [§4] Immo neque Confirmatio videretur esse necessaria cum Confirmatio non sit de necessitate sed solummodo de bene esse Donationis & iuris possessionarii gubernationis. [§5] Nec valeat ex se Confirmatio si Donatio in ea inserta non valere dinoscatur. Unde nova Donatio sive cum iure regio simul, sive simpliciter propterea solet a principe impetrari. Quod licet impetrator ipse sit in dominio iuris alicuius possessionarii tamen dominium illud indirecte forsitan & contra iurisdictionem ipsius sacræ coronæ considerat se possidere pariter & habere. (Non omnes enim domini vel nobiles per Donationes regias sed etiam per Fassionem instrumentales seu privilegiales diversis sub Titulis & coloribus consueverunt iura possessionaria gubernare) proinde huiusmodi defectum iuris sui per Donationem ipsam principis studet reformare effectiveque instaurare. [§6] DICITUR autem Donatio ipsa nova pro eo & in tantum quia tunc & de recenti facta sit per principem bonorum sibi collatio prout in nonnullis privilegiis & litteris Donationalibus excellentissimorum principum quondam dominorum Ludovici & Sigismundi imperatoris Hungariæ regum vidi atque legi possessionarias collationes novæ Donationis titulo factas nulla clausula apposita nullaque mentione habita de hoc quod progenitores impetratoris in dominio bonorum & iurium possessionariorum huiusmodi nova Donatione collatorum aliquando perstitissent, vel impetrator ipse perstitisset, sed cum servitorum dumtaxat (prout in omni Donatione fieri consuevit) declaratione editas atque confectas, quas quidem possessionarias collationes sed & litteras super ea re emanatas ex ratione præallegata existimo teneoque hoc titulo novæ Donationis factas & æditas fuisse, quod scilicet impetrator ipse dominium bonorum impetratorum prius sive habuerit, sive non tamen per principem tunc de recenti & non per prius fuit bonorum ipsorum facta sibi Donatio. [§7] Si enim prius quoque Donationem super eisdem iuribus & bonis habuisset tunc (ut præmissi) non nova Donatio impetrari sed potius prior debuisset confirmari [§8] & eiusmodi nova Donatio respectu iurisdictionis ipsius sacræ coronæ seu contra iurisdictionem principis nostri sive cum iure regio (ut præfertur) simul sive simpliciter facta semper valet & semper est efficax, nec poterit per alterum quempiam ius tale possessionarium nomine iuris regii vel alio defectus seminis titulo de cætero impetrari. [§9] Princeps enim ipse Donationi suæ semel facte per se, vel per alium de iure nequit iterum refragari dummodo sit hoc verum. Quod aut impetrator ipse aut progenitores eius in reali ac pacifico dominio (hoc est non absoluta potentia vel non occupatione temeraria sibi usurpato) iuris eiusdem possessionarii fuere. Nam si alias fraudulenter & inique bonorum impetratio præmisso titulo fieret puta dicendo quispiam villam aut possessionem unam suam esse & se in dominio eiusdem iam dudum perstitisse cum tamen possessio illa non sua sed regiæ maiestatis ad aliquod castrorum suorum regalium de iure & ab antiquo pertinens fuisset, tunc in tali & aliis similibus casibus ipsa Donatio non valet immo impetrator ille tanquam falsarius & mendax propterea acriter est puniendus. [§10] Secus etiam est si quispiam potentum absoluta potentia & occupatione temeraria villam unam pro se usurparet & in eius dominio male sibi vindicato revolutionem unam annualem transigeret, seque postea in reali dominio villæ ipsius longo tempore perstitisse regiæ maiestati diceret & sic eam novæ Donationis titulo pro se impetraret. Nam hoc quoque modo ipsa Donatio etiam cum iure regio facta contra iura illius a quo villa ipsa fuit occupata nil tenet nulliusque censetur esse firmitatis eo quod expositio pariter & impetratio sinistre facta fuisse comprobatur. [§11] SECUNDO VERO nova Donatio potest attendi & considerari respectu fratrum generationum ac fœminei sexus (ut præactum est) hominum & hac consideratione præmissa descriptio novæ Donationis est intelligenda. [§12] AD DECLARANDUM igitur quod iura eiusmodi possessionaria nova Donatione cum clausula prænotata in quorum pacifico dominio &c. impetrata ius fœmineum non concernant, litteræ ipsæ novæ Donationales immo etiam divisionales inter fratres masculini sexus ac Expeditorie super Quartaliorum solutione confectæ insufficientes reputantur. Sed originales quoque litteræ quibus videlicet prius eadem iura possessionaria aut acquisita, aut empta vel aliter adepta fuerint in iudicio producantur necesse est. [§13] Quæ si produci & exhiberi non poterunt quia non habentur (multorum enim nobilium & possessionatorum hominum privilegia ac litteralia instrumenta aut disturbiorum temporibus per æmulos regni direpta aut pacato quoque tempore ignis sæpe voragine conflagrata dinoscuntur) extunc in causam attracto iuramentum quinquagesimo se nobilibus meræ nobilitatis titulo & privilegio fungentibus præstandum imponitur. [§14] Qui si iurare poterit tunc a possessionaria datione absolvitur & ius Quartalium dumtaxat persolvere compellitur si quitantia seu recognitio super ea re non habetur.

Unde proveniat proditio fraterni sanguinis. Tit. xxxviii.

UBi autem alio ex latere facta & præhabita huiusmodi iuramentali depositione præactis litteris originalibus impetrator ipse si per se vel procuratorem suum usus fuerit: vel etiam aliter illas occultasse & contra contenta earundem litterarum iura ipsa possessionaria præmisso novæ Donationis titulo male & in præiudicium iurium fratrum, vel etiam fœmineorum pro se impetrasse & nomina eorum quos bona illa rite concernere dinoscebantur de litteris Donationalibus exmisisse per hocque de eisdem bonis fratres aut sorores perperam exhæreditare voluisse sufficienter et evidenti documento poterit declarari atque probari extunc talis in pœna periurii ac proditiois fraterni sanguinis merito debet condemnari. [§1]

Coniuratores nihilominus eius in fidefragio pœnaque similiter periurii omnes convincentur eo facto. [§2] Ubi autem iuramentum non præcesserit sed exhæredationis solummodo causa declarata fuerit pœna periurii tunc sublata erit & proditio dumtaxat ipsa fraterni sanguinis locum habebit.

Quid sit proditio fraterni sanguinis diffinitive, et de pena eiusdem xxxix.

Fraterni autem sanguinis proditio est fratris vel sororis iustis suis iuribus per alterum fratrem aut sororem dolosa adumbrataque & fraudulenta privatio vel exhæredatio. [§1] Per fratrem autem & sororem hoc in loco intellige quemlibet generationis suæ hominem in iuribus possessionariis secum æqualiter succedentem. [§2] PENA AUTEM proditionis fraterni sanguinis ultra dedecus & infamiam exinde contrahendam hæc est ut ille proditor ac condemnatus universis bonis & hæreditatibus suis perpetuo destituatur & in illum fratrem aut sororem quem scilicet vel quam fraudare iustisque suis iuribus despoliare & de eisdem exhæredare nitetur. Eadem cuncta bona & hæreditates transferantur & ipsemet quoque in persona sua ad fovendum pariter & serviendum illi tradatur. Quem usque ad obitus sui diem frater ipse proditus vel soror prodiva victu & amictu tanquam unum de familia sua conservare tenebitur. [§3] Et hoc idem intelligendum est etiam de mulieribus seu filiabus quorumcunque dominorum ac nobilium quarum scilicet aliqua in iuribus paternis (quæ etiam alioquin ius fœmineum contigissent) per regiam maiestatem ad supplicationem quorumpiam in verum hæredem & successorem masculinum se præficere procurabit per hocque alias eiusdem generationis seu progeniei fœmellas bonis ipsis privare machinabitur. [§4] Præterea si quispiam fratrum aut sororum alterum generationis suæ hominem de genealogia sua existere pertinaciter negabit, & ille tandem litterali documento vel deficientibus litteris humano forsitan testimonio usque ad sexaginta annorum spacium sed non amplius se de ipsa genealogia esse comprobabit tunc ex istis quoque casibus pœna proditionis fraterni sanguinis sequi debet. Nam exinde alterum iustis suis iuribus fraudare exhæredareque se voluisse declarabit.

De divisionibus bonorum paternorum et avitorum inter fratres fiendis. xl.

Item præhabita Donationum regiarum declaratione iam ad ramos earundem est recurrendum. [§1] Et primo de fratrum carnalium bonis ac iuribus possessionariis per Donationes acquisitis & tandem alio quovis titulo adeptis & consequutis, ac eorundem bonorum divisionibus erit disserendum. [§2] UNDE NOTANDUM quod universa bona & quælibet iura possessionaria cunctorum dominorum, baronum ac magnatum: & nobilium paterna & avita quocunque nomine censeantur inter filios eorundem dominorum: & nobilium fratres scilicet carnales æqualiter dividuntur: et quot sunt fratres in tot sequestrantur partes. Domus autem paterna filio iuniori deputatur ad residendum & habitandum, ita tamen ut cæteris quoque filiis seu fratribus de communi proventu huiusmodi bonorum & iurium possessionariorum aliæ domus illi paternæ similes in loco communi, ubi videlicet illorum quilibet voluerit, extruantur & ædificentur habitandæ [§3] ad quas de terris arabilibus, sylvis pratisque & fœnilibus consimiliter communibus tot & tantum quot scilicet & quantum ad ipsam domum paternam spectare dinoscitur excidatur & sequestretur atque annectatur perpetuo possidenda pariter & habenda. [§4] Et hoc verum est si tantum habuerint de communibus terris silvisque & pratis ut huiusmodi divisio eorum debite peragi & expediri poterit. [§5] Nam alioquin omnes terræ ac sylve prataque & fœnilia ad dictam domum paternam attinentes & pertinentia in tot debebunt dividi partes, quot ex novo ædificabuntur domus nobiles & ad quamlibet illarum domorum æqualis portio assignabitur utenda. [§6] Inclusa tamen semper illa quantitate atque portione terrarum ac sylvarum & pratorum quæ ad sessionem vel locum sessionis Iobagonalis in cuius scilicet facie domus nova constructur spectabat atque pertinebat.

Quid si domus paterna lapidea vel magnis sumptibus constructa fuerit. Tit. xli.

UBi autem domus ipsa paterna lapidea aut latericia vel aliter sumptuoso ædificio constructa fabricataque fuerit, & tantæ estimationis reputabitur ut de communi proventu talium bonorum similes domus construi non poterint sed ne una quidem ædificari commode poterit tunc in tali casu domus ipsa paterna una cum magistris lapicidis ac muratoribus & fabris lignariis per hominem iudicis conscientiosè estimari taxarique & summa estimationis in tot portiones quot sunt fratres dividi debet filiusque iunior seu frater portionem sibi cedentem gratis habebit. [§1] Sed portionem ceterorum fratrum pecuniaria solutione iuxta ipsius taxationis & estimationis seriem refundere, illisque persolvere tenebitur. [§2] Et hoc intellige si filius ipse iunior tantæ ætatis fuerit ut rebus suis commode prospicere non possit. Nam aliter in tali sumptuoso ædificio æqualis fieri debet inter fratres divisio. [§3] Cæterum si bona ac iura eiusmodi possessionaria ius fœmineum æque veluti masculinum concernunt, & patre defuncto filii filiaque superstites manebunt ac filiarum altera iunior ætate fuerit tunc in tali quoque casu non filia sed nihilominus filio filiam ipsam iuniorem natu immediate præcedenti tanquam digniori sexui & personæ domus paterna dabitur habitanda, sub conditionibus tamen prædeclaratis.

Quod litteralia instrumenta frater natu maior conservabit. Tit. xlii.

ET hoc idem est intelligendum etiam de litterarum: ac litteralium instrumentorum conservatione quod scilicet non filia maiori, sed filio si etiam iunior ætate foret litteræ & litteralia instrumenta factum bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum ipsorum tangentes & concernentia dari debent ad conservandum. Quas & quæ inter filios seu fratres maior natu conservare semper solet. [§1] Et hoc verum est si frater ipse maior natu sane mentis & non furiosus vel amens extiterit, ac discipator bonorum suorum manifestus non fuerit, vel ceteros fratres suos de bonis paternis & avitis ac etiam suis exhæreditare palam non prætenderit. [§2] Nam casibus in istis non fratri natu maiori, sed alteri ex fratribus ad lineam generationis paternæ propinquiore litteræ ac litteralia instrumenta dari & assignari debebunt ad retinendum atque conservandum. [§3] Filie vero transsumptum seu paria litterarum ac litteralium instrumentorum bona utrique sexui deservientia tangentium pro se coram iudicibus regni ordinariis habere possunt & illius earum fratres dare tenentur. [§4] SCIENDum hic præterea quod illis erit omnium causarum & litium contra fratres motarum vel movendarum infra divisionis tempus supportatio (communi tamen sumptu) ad quem litterarum ipsarum spectabit conservatio.

De divisionibus bonorum per fratres acquisite, et de clausula Donationis per eum. xliii.

ULterius notandum quod si duo vel plures fuerint fratres carnales aut etiam uterini in bonis & iuribus possessionariis avitis vel paternis indivisi, quorum alter in curia regia vel aliorum dominorum laribus servitio se mancipabit alter autem domesticis curis & laboribus domi vacabit, & ille servitio deditus bona aliqua seu iura possessionaria ab ipsa maiestate regia vel aliis etiam forsitan dominis servitiorum suorum meritis ita exigentibus pro se impetrabit & nomina fratrum suorum domi manentium clausula cum illa ET PER eum &c. in litteris seu privilegiis Donationalibus inscribi & inseri procurabit, tunc licet impetrans ipse ante tempus divisionis cum fratribus suis fiendæ de huiusmodi bonis per eum acquisitis & inventis liberam prout voluerit disponendi habeat facultatem. Et hoc intellige non pro se vel suis hæredibus aliquo sub colore usurpando aut reservando sed a se prius realiter alienando. Tempore tamen divisionis unusquisque fratrum portionem suam de illis sibi cedentem æque ut impetrator ipse principalis rehabere de iure potest. [§1] Iura enim possessionaria in quibuscunque litteris seu privilegiis Donationalibus contenta semper in tot debent dividi partes quot sunt personæ vel nomina hominum litteris in eisdem specificè denotata. [§2] Nisi forte exceptio vel distinctio fuerit ibidem super hoc declarata. [§3] Clausula itaque ipsa PER EUM non est intelligenda ut tantum valeat quasi post eum prout quidam plus sapere volentes, quam oportet sapere intelligendum arbitrati sunt arguentes & astruentes inde ceteros fratres vivente principali impetratore portionem de huiusmodi bonis acquisitis & inventis habere non posse sed illa post decessum ipsius impetrantis cum filiis eiusdem dividenda esse quod tenendum non est. [§4] Fratres etenim indivisi infra divisionis tempus & lucrum & damnum æqualiter participare sufferreque & tollerare debent. [§5] Hinc est quod si etiam nomina aliquorum fratrum carnalium aut uterinorum vel etiam patruelium divisionem bonorum inter se nondum habentium in litteris huiusmodi Donationalibus inscripta non fuissent tamen tempore divisionis portionem suam unusquisque illorum (ut præmittitur) de iure rehabere potest, [§6] unde per hunc terminum PER EUM &c. semper intellige medio, vel per medium eius scilicet impetrantis, quasi diceret maiestas regia consideratione servitiorum talis fidelis sui eidem & medio eius vel propter eum etiam alteri possessionem seu villam unam contulisse.

Quid si fratrum quispiam bona per se inventa pro se reservare voluerit. Tit. xliiii.

UBi tamen fratrum aliquis (cæteris torpori & negligentia desidiaque deditis) continue serviendo sanguinis sui effusione vel aliter servitiis aut virtutibus suis bona aliqua seu iura possessionaria quæsiverit & cum cæteris fratribus suis illa participare noluerit tunc si omnibus bonis & iuribus paternis renunciabit, acquisita per seipsum bona totaliter pro se & hæredibus suis perpetuo reservare valebit. [§1] UNDE SEQUITUR quod prodicio fraterni sanguinis non in acquirendis bonis & iuribus possessionariis (prout nonnulli putaverunt) sed in exhæredandis de acquisitis paternis scilicet & avitis bonis consistit.

Quod divisio bonorum inter fratres carnales non processu litis fieri debet. Tit. xlv.

SCIendum est deinde quod divisio inter fratres carnales & etiam uterinos nondum tamen divisos non processu litis sed per litteras dumtaxat regie maiestatis Præceptorias ad comites vel vice comites & iudices nobilium illius comitatus ubi bona & iura possessionaria dividenda sita sunt & adiacent sonantes vel si eadem bona in pluribus comitatibus habentur ad unum magistrorum Prothonotariorum datas & directas fieri solet, atque debet per quos vel quem universa bona & quælibet iura possessionaria paterna & avita ac etiam per eos communiter acquisita simul cum universis rebus mobilibus cuiuscunque speciei seu maneriei existant contradictione alicuius ex fratribus non obstante iuxta numerum personarum dividi & ab invicem sequestrari semper possunt. [§1] FACTA AUTEM semel inter ipsos fratres (modo ante lato) divisione si quispiam forsitan fratrum in eiusmodi iuribus possessionariis aliqua ex causa legitima rursus divisionem habere voluerit aut portionem suam minorem vel inutiliorem ceteris esse aut iuris ordine de manibus suis ablatam fuisse allegando tunc divisio hoc modo non nisi processu iuris, unico tamen termino octavali (si per iudicem ex propositis & allegatis partium admittenda censebitur) fieri poterit atque debet sepe numero enim absque rationabili & legitima causa secunda divisio postulatur. [§2] Et hic articulus etiam de fratribus patruelibus nondum divisus est intelligendus.

Quando nova divisio bonorum inter fratres condivisionales admittatur, et quando non. xlvii.

INter fratres vero condivisionales si aut avorum aut abavorum temporibus divisio in aliquibus bonis & iuribus possessionariis facta fuisset & litteræ quoque divisionales super ea re confectæ extitissent deinceps divisio non est admittenda [§1] nisi forsitan alter fratrum potentior cæteris evadens post rectam divisionem particulam aliquam iuris possessionarii vel territorii alterius sui fratris violenter pro se usurpasse seu vendicasse comprobaretur, & impotentior frater violentiæ potentioris fratris resistere non valens æquam divisionem ex novo postularet. [§2] Nam hoc casu divisio ipsa de novo peragenda dinoscitur longo tamen processu litis & hoc quoque eo modo si frater ipse divisionem postulans legitimam (ut præmissi) assignaverit rationem. [§3] Nam si considerans alterum fratrem post factam cum eo vel progenitore suo divisionem in terris sibi cedentibus vineas & promontoria plantasse, vel aliter frutices & virgulta extirpasse, ex eoque utiliorem sua portione quæ forte inculta mansit existere & propterea divisionem postulare compertus fuerit, etiam longo litis processu hoc est in quatuor terminis octavalibus novam divisionem bonorum consequi non debet. [§4] Si autem temerarie particulam aliquam iuris sui vel territorii alterum per fratrem occupatam fuisse allegaverit tunc super potentiaria huiusmodi usurpatione bonorum suorum vel particulæ iuris sui possessionarii etiam insinuatione mediante fratrem suum iure in causamque convenire licite poterit. [§5] Et hoc si tempus præscriptionis in actibus potentiariis observari consuetum non transcenderit quæ triginta & duobus annis allegari observarique solet. [§6] Nam super hæreditario iure, & proprietate iuris possessionarii inter fratres præscriptio nunquam est admittenda. [§7] PRÆTEREA si fratres aliquando per metarum inter se erectiones & distinctiones divisionem fecisse reperti fuerint extunc divisio bonorum de cætero inter eos & ipsorum hæredes fieri nunquam permittitur. [§8] Huiusmodi tamen metalis distinctio & erectio mutuam in se bonorum devolutionem inter fratres non excludit, neque exclusisse intelligitur.

Quod universa bona inter fratres divisa altero fratrum deficiente in alterum devolvuntur: etiam matrimonio interveniente. Tit. xlviii.

SCIendum ulterius quod universa huiusmodi bona & iura possessionaria inter fratres divisa altero ipsorum hæredibus carente etiam post centum, ducentos & amplius annos (si matrimonia quoque post quartum generationis ipsorum gradum inter eos vel alterum eorum celebrata fuissent) in ceteros fratres superstites & hæredibus gaudentes devolvuntur eo facto dummodo fratres ipsi in humanis agentes per rectam generationis lineam fratrem defunctum & hæredibus destitutum progenie de sua vera fuisse & cum progenitore illius in bonis & iuribus possessionariis ab ipso derelictis progenitores eorum divisionem habuisse vel fecisse valeant litterali documento comprobare. [§1] Deficientibus vero litteris etiam humano testimonio ad sexaginta annorum curricula sed non amplius prosapiam & genealogiæ suæ stirpem ramumque de iure poterunt verificare. [§2] UNDE sequitur quod bona & iura possessionaria post divisionem inter fratres factam per aliquem fratrum acquisita & inventa eodem fratre acquirente præmortuo & hæredibus destituto non in fratres condivisionales derivantur sed Fisco regio applicantur. [§3] HOC quoque necessario interserendum occurrit quod bona & iura possessionaria duobus aut tribus personis alienis sanguine nonque fratribus vel consanguineis per regiam maiestatem qualitercunque Donata, aut aliter per eosdem acquisita altero eorum decedente & hæredibus carente rursus ad collationem regiam devolvuntur. [§4] Sola enim sanguinis propago & fraternalis mutua divisio efficit ex se mutuam & reciprocam bonorum in alterutrum condescensionem atque devolutionem allegatione cuiusvis præscriptionis non obstante.

Utrum bona marito et uxori simul collata deficiente marito in uxorem ipsam devolvantur et econverso. Tit. xlvi.

QUoniam nonnulli dominorum & nobilium solent nomina uxorum suarum in litteris seu privilegiis Donationalibus super bonis & iuribus possessionariis iusto titulo servitiis eorum acquisitis conficiendis ponere pariter & inserere ideo queritur utrum decedente marito sine hæredibus portio sua in huiusmodi iuribus possessionariis & bonis habita in uxorem suam devolvatur? Cum non frater sed consors vel uxor dumtaxat mariti fuisse mulier ipsa censeatur & econverso. An uxore absque hæredibus defuncta portio sua in maritum eius condescendat atque derivetur? DICENDUM quod sic. [§1] Nam licet vir mulieri & mulier viro non sit neque censeatur esse frater sanguinis propagatione carnis tamen unione & copulatione plus quam frater esse reputatur. Iam enim secundum Evangelicam doctrinam non sunt duo sed una caro, frater autem altera caro existit. [§2] Propter unionem itaque & copulam carnis portio possessionaria mariti in uxorem suam & econtra uxoris in maritum casu in prænarrato rite devolvenda erit. [§3] Hic tamen advertendum est quod si in præallegata Donatione vel litteris Donationalibus clausula utriusque sexus non interseritur sed simplici modo Donatio emanat extunc iura huiusmodi possessionaria fœmineum (si etiam filias mulier ipsa habeat) non sequuntur sed masculinum dumtaxat sexum concernere dinoscuntur. [§4] Ubi tamen in Donationis tenore clausula ista adiecta & apposita fuerit quod videlicet si impetratorem ipsorum bonorum hæredibus masculinis carere contingat tunc eadem bona in filias suas devolvantur. Tunc ipsa bona & iura possessionaria ubi & postquam ad manus filiarum devenerint propter clausulam & rationem prenotatam utriusque sexui semper deservient. [§5] Et idem est tenendum de bonis quoque emptitiis si nomen uxoris in litteris Emptionalibus & Inscriptionalibus insertum fuerit quod scilicet altera partium deficiente in alteram illo modo antelato devolventur.

Utrum bona nota infidelitatis condemnati in fratrem adoptivum regio consensu accedente condescendant. Tit. xli.

QUia super devolutione bonorum nunc tractatur ideo ad huc quæritur. Utrum bona & iura possessionaria cuiuspiam ob notam infidelitatis condemnati post factam capiti & bonis suis gratiam in illum cum quo super devolutione bonorum suorum prius fraternalem adoptionem & contractum fecerat & huiusmodi contractui consensus regius accesserat condescendant an ne? DICENDUM quod non. [§1] Quoniam contractus ipse vim fraternalis condivisionalitatis in bonorum successione tenet. Modo certum est quod talis infidelitatis nota irretiti & obfuscati hominis bona nec in filios suos prius natos, nec autem in fratres eius carnales aut condivisionales derivantur. Et ideo neque in fratrem adoptivum (si etiam consensus ut præfertur regius super ea re fuisset impetratus) bona prænotata devolvuntur. [§2] Super condescensione autem eorundem bonorum ante collatam gratiam regiam nulla est quæstio quia tunc ipsa bona illi cessissent cui per principem donata fuissent. Quamdiu enim quisquam dominium reale bonorum suorum tenet & possidet interim semper ea delictis suis & excessibus ita exigentibus perpetuo amittere potest fraternali adoptione non obstante.

Quid de successione filiarum duorum fratrum in heredes seorsum prefectarum sit sentiendum. I.

Item ulterius quæritur si duo fuerint fratres carnales aut condivisionales quorum uterque (sexu masculino destituto) filias suas in propriis bonis ac iuribus suis possessionariis seorsum & diverso tempore in hæredes masculinos vel etiam ad utrumque sexum per principem præfici & creati procuraverit neutro fratrum huiusmodi præfectionem alterius impugnante utrum deficientibus filiabus vel hæredibus aut posteritatibus unius fratris bona & iura ipsarum possessionaria in filias vel posteritates alterius fratris super extantis devolvantur ratione consanguinitatis earum vel in regium Fiscum condescendant? [§1] Dicendum quod regio Fisco erunt applicanda. Quoniam ille non successionis vel consanguinitatis iure, sed præfectionis virtute bona ipsa adepta fuisse dinoscuntur. [§2] Præfectio autem vim naturamque Donationis representare dinoscitur & eiusmodi Donatio seorsum & non coniunctim facta fuisse reperitur ideo tanquam inter alienas personas divisim & diverso tempore facta reputatur, & per consequens in Fiscum regium derivantur, [§3] prout in Donationibus quoque fratrum carnalium post divisionem impetrandis (si nomen alterius fratris divisi non interseritur) fieri consuevit quod scilicet deficiente fratre impetratore bona post divisionem obtenta non in fratrem superviventem cum quo divisus fuerat condescendent, sed collationi regiæ maiestatis subiacebunt.

De divisione bonorum inter patres et filios eorum, et de paterna seu patria potestate. li.

Sciendum deinde est quod quamvis inter patrem & filium divisio bonorum non semper admittatur sunt tamen multi casus in quibus si etiam filius nollet pater suus eum ad divisionem peragendam compellere potest & econverso si videlicet pater nollet filius nihilominus divisionem bonorum cum patre peragendi habet auctoritatem. [§1] Sed antequam isti casus declarentur necessarium videtur scire qualem & quot modis habeant patres in filios suos potestatem. UBI NOTANDUM quod omnes filii & filia parentum legitime & illegitime ætatis non emancipati hoc est a patria servitute non liberati infra tempus emancipationis seu liberationis, quæ iuxta consuetudinem patriæ nostræ ex parte filiorum per solam bonorum & iurium possessionariorum cum patre divisionem ex parte vero filiarum per earum desponsationem & nuptiarum solennitatem seu matrimonii consumationem fieri consuevit in patria potestate consistunt. [§2] Qui ergo ex te & uxore tua nascuntur quamdiu emancipati non fuerint in tua potestate erunt, & non solum illi verum etiam nepotes tui hoc est filii qui ex tuo filio non emancipato generantur in tua pariter potestate manebunt. [§3] Qui tamen ex filia tua nascuntur illi non in tua sed patris vel avi eorum potestate fient sive pater nobilis, sive ignobilis existat, quia filii non matris sed patris familiam sequuntur. Et inde etiam est quod ex nobili matre & ignobili patre generati inter veros nobiles non computantur. [§4] PATERNARUM itaque potestatum prima est quod filius quamdiu in potestate patris erit de bonis paternis mobilibus & immobilibus invito & non consentiente patre nil quicquam vendere vel aliter alienare neque etiam contractum super his cum aliquo facere aut inire potest. [§5] SECUNDA quod patres filios eorum etiam legitimæ ætatis ipsorum de meritis interdum exigentibus castigare & corripere immo si excessus & flagitorum qualitas expostulaverit incarcerare etiam possunt. [§6] ITEM quod necessitate rationabili ingruente patres onera filiorum suscipere ac super se levare & sæpe etiam bona ipsorum nondum tamen divisorum in extremæ necessitatis casu vendere & alienare possunt prout declarabitur infra. [§7] ITEM quod invito patre filium suum apud se retinere potest nemo. [§8] ITEM quod pater potest filium suum obsidem pro se ponere, sed non e converso. [§9] ITEM quod filii non possunt testari quicquam de rebus mobilibus paternis nisi quantum patres eorum admiserint, quia testamentum ex libero testantis arbitrio debet procedere. Tales vero filii non in eorum sed aliorum videlicet patrum consistunt potestate. Secus tamen est de rebus per filios propriis eorum servitiis vel litterariis disciplinis acquisitis. Super illis namque etiam præter voluntatem patris libere testari possunt.

Casus in quibus pater potest filium ad bonorum divisionem compellere. Tit. lii.

Item ulterius sciendum quod pater potest filium suum puberem atque legitimæ ætatis sed non impuberem in casibus infrascriptis ad divisionem hæreditatum & aliarum rerum compellere, non tamen potest de illis eum exhæreditare. [§1] PRIMO si filius in parentes manus violentas iniecerit, vel aliam gravem & notabilem iniuriam eis intulerit. [§2] ITEM si parentes criminaliter accusaverit de tali causa quæ in perniciem principis vel reipublicæ totius regni non vergit. [§3] ITEM si vitæ parentum insidiatus fuerit veneno scilicet vel alio modo in necem parentum conspirando. [§4] ITEM si cum maleficis, vel aliis nefandæ vitæ hominibus contra voluntatem patris perseveraverit bona paterna prave consumendo. [§5] ITEM si parentem captum de manibus inimicorum vel de carcere cum potuerit non redemit, neque liberavit, vel pro eo fideiubere recusavit.

De casibus in quibus econtrario filius cum patre divisionem facere potest. liii.

EContrario vero filius (etiam in potestate paterna constitutus) patrem suum in casibus subnotatis ad bonorum & rerum divisionem faciendam cogendi & inducendi habet auctoritatem præmissa patria potestate non obstante. [§1] PRIMO quando pater dilapidator bonorum suorum extiterit, & bona sua ac filiorum suorum non ex necessitate & causa rationabili sed per fraudem potius alienavit, vel alienare manifeste prætendit, et de huiusmodi voluntate sua filio evidentiter constabit. [§2] ITEM si quando hæreditates & iura sua possessionaria licet non alienavit, nec alienare intendit tamen ea non debite colit aut custodit sed desolari permittit. [§3] ITEM si pater filium sine iusta causa & sine notabili culpa impie & crudeliter corripit. [§4] ITEM quando pater filium post perfectum tempus legitimæ ætatis matrimonium contrahere vetat. [§5] ITEM quando pater cogeret filium suum ad peccandum. [§6] Quamvis autem filius patrem criminaliter accusare (prout immediate prænarratum est) non valeat tamen hoc casu (deo enim magis, quam parentibus obediendum est) poterit filius honestis conditionibus patrem ad divisionem bonorum faciendam non accusando, vel criminaliter contra eum agendo sed potius errori & defectui illius compaciendo provocare & inducere atque etiam compellere. [§7] DIVISIONEM autem prædeklaratam bonorum & rerum propter præmissos casus fiendam intellige semper de bonis & iuribus possessionariis atque rebus mobilibus avitis & non propriis servitiis vel virtutibus patris acquisitis. [§8] Nam si pater ob causas & rationes præscriptas cogerit filium suum ad divisionem tunc de bonis & hæreditatibus seu iuribus possessionariis atque rebus mobilibus per eum qualitercunque conquisitis & inventis divisionem cum filio facere non tenetur. [§9] Verum si cessantibus præmissis causis divisio inter patrem & filium facta subsequutaque fuerit tunc indifferenter de omnibus bonis & rebus inter eos divisio fieri debet. [§10] Quoniam pater filio & econtra filius patri quicquid rerum & bonorum poterit acquirere iure naturali tenetur.

Adhuc de uno casu divisionis, et de bonis filium iure materno concernentibus. liiii.

Sciendum etiam est quod postquam filius annuente patre legitimam duxerit uxorem (non obstantibus prænarratis casibus) poterit patrem suum semper (rite tamen & legitime) ad divisionem in omnem eventum cogere ubi æqualiter de utriusque patris videlicet & filii bonis ac rebus divisio peragenda erit. [§1] Verum tamen si filius habuerit patrimonia ac iura possessionaria separata quæ sibi iure materno provenerunt, sive vivente, sive decedente matre eiusmodi bona cum patre dividere non tenetur. [§2] Quia in ea parte matris solum & non patris familiam bona illa sequuntur prout manifeste ratio quoque sola dictat.

De filiis furiosis et mente captis quod semper in patria potestate consistunt. Tit. lv.

Nec hoc prætermittendum est quod filii furiosi, amentes ac mente capti quia nunquam ad annos discretionis & perfectæ ætatis pervenisse existimantur ideo nunquam de patria potestate liberantur.[§1] Unde parentes eorum possunt ipsos ad omnia iusta & honesta obligare. Bona etiam illorum in casu manifestæ necessitatis alienare. Attamen ipsi quoque tenentur de victu & amictu condecenter illis providere. [§2] Idem est intelligendum (patre defuncto) etiam de fratribus ipsorum furiosorum quod scilicet frater eorum sane mentis inter alios ætate grandior curam eorundem furiosorum & amentium tanquam pater supportabit.

Quot modis cessat et tollitur paterna potestas. Tit. lvi.

Quamvis autem filii de potestate paterna per divisionem bonorum (prout prænotatum est) eliberari & emancipari soleant tamen sunt aliqui casus in quibus etiam aliter cessat & tollitur patria potestas. [§1] PRIMO per mortem patris sine testamento decedentis si videlicet tutores testamentarios filio illegitimæ ætatis non substituit, et hoc si pater ipse iam sui iuris fuerat & in potestate patris sui non erat. Nam hoc modo filius in potestatem avi sui reincidere debet. [§2] ITEM aufertur patria potestas si pater ob aliquod crimen infidelitatis vel alios enormes excessus hæreditate bonorum & iurium suorum possessionariorum privabitur, ac ad capitalem quoque sententiam per hoc condemnabitur. Nam sicuti a mutua & reciproca bonorum successione per huiusmodi notam seu criminis pœnam tam de filiis quam fratribus decidisse ita etiam patria potestas sublata & extincta esse comprobabitur, atque verificabitur. [§3] ITEM cessat paterna potestas si pater in manus hostiles & captivitatem inciderit. Nam qui captus est alium in potestate sua habere non potest. Quia tunc sui iuris non est, & hoc quamdiu in captivitate manebit. Nam post eius eliberationem atque reversionem paterna potestas instaurabitur & reviviscet. [§4] HINC EST quod etiam præscriptio contra ipsum interea non procedit, neque ipse contra quempiam præscribere potest sed infra reversionem suam omnia in statu eodem priori permanebunt, & post reditum suum in cunctis causis & earum articulis atque processibus statum priorem sorcietur.

Quod quilibet dominorum et nobilium super bonis suis propriis liberam disponendi habet facultatem. Tit. lvii.

Sciendum est autem quod quilibet dominus, baro, magnas ac nobilis & possessionatus homo filios & filias habens, sine omni consensu immo & contra voluntatem eorundem de & super rebus ac bonis & iuribus suis possessionariis per eum propriis servitiis suis acquisitis & adeptis sive propriis pecuniis quæ etiam servitiis acquiri consueverunt comparatis & emptis vita sua comite liberam prout voluerit disponendi & ea etiam alienandi plenariam habet potestatis facultatem filiorum vel filiarum Contradictione, Inhibitione vel alia quavis repugnatione non obstante. [§1] Et siquam pater ipse divisionem in eisdem rebus ac bonis iuribusque suis possessionariis in humanis agens inter filios filiasque fecerit ne eo e medio sublato dissensiones, odia contentionesque & differentiarum materię inter eosdem prævia ratione suboriantur, etiam post obitum patris filii & filiæ divisionem ipsam ratam habere & in eadem perpetuo permanere tenebuntur. [§2] Et hoc idem est etiam de bonis & iuribus possessionariis vigore alicuius contractus seu fraternalis adoptionis vel etiam præfectionis in aliquem virum aut aliquam fœminam redactis & derivatis tenendum. Quia solus vel sola eiusmodi bona consequutus aut adepta esse intelligitur atque comprobatur.

Quod pater bona avita in præiudicium filiorum alienare non potest. Tit. lviii.

Verum tamen super bonis ac iuribus possessionariis avitis pater in præiudicium filiorum vel etiam filiarum, si ea ius quoque fœmineum sequuntur, & similiter frater in præiudicium fratris super bonis ac iuribus possessionariis paternis vel avitis sine consensu filiorum ac filiarum vel fratrum quantum ad alienationem vel venditionem eorundem bonorum simpliciter nullam penitus Fassionem facere potest. Quæ si etiam fieret nullius censetur esse vigoris neque firmitatis. [§1] SOLENT NAMque nonnulli bona & iura possessionaria paterna & avita sæpe necessitate cogente, interdum vero nulla rationabili causa adurgente sed gula dumtaxat & crapula commestationeque monente, interdum autem damnabili invidia contra fratrem concepta instigante pariter & diabolo cooperante, aliquando vero bene & recte, sæpius tamen maliciose quibus possunt impignorare aut perpetuo vendere, inscribere & diversis titulis exquisitisque coloribus obligare, & ut facta super eo Fassio maioris firmitatis existat & invalidari nequeat onera filiorum filiarumque & fratrum super se & hæreditates suas in serie Fassionis assummere atque levare.

Quid sit onus assumere, et quot modis onera filiorum et fratrum assumuntur. lix.

ONera autem assumere est fideiussionem quandam super observatione paternæ vel fraternæ Fassionis emptori bonorum aliquorum facere. UNDE SCIENDUM quod onera filiorum vel fratrum tribus modis assumuntur. PRIMO modo simpliciter. SECUNDO vero rationabiliter. TERTIO autem & ultimo necessitate. [§1] PRIMO inquam simpliciter quando scilicet nulla evidenti necessitate, nulla etiam rationabili de causa (prout immediate præmissi), sed aut maliciose, aut gulose, aut etiam iniuriose onera ipsa assumuntur. Et sic nihil tenet in iudicio, sed de plano simpliciterque & assumptio huiusmodi revocatur, & Fassio quoque invalidatur. [§2] SECUNDO modo rationabiliter manifesta videlicet & rationabili causa occurrente puta possessionem præ manibus alienis in pignore habitam ad se redimendo, vel dotem & res Paraffernales atque ius Quartalitium solvendo ut scilicet una portio aut particula venderetur, & residuitas omnium bonorum ab onere necessario eriperetur. [§3] Item piscinas, molendina domosque & curias ex necessitate construendo, vel portionem aliam & forsitan meliorem præcio possessionis aut portionis venditæ emendo, aut concambium possessionarium faciendo. [§4] Quæ quia filio vel fratri in lucrum hæreditatis succedunt ideo simpliciter onera præassumpta in tali casu revocari & retractari non possunt. Sed si filius in serie Fassionis & in assumptione oneris specificè nominatus ea revocare voluerit, extunc vivente patre cum Homagio & estimatione communi universorum iurium possessionariorum patris ubilibet adiacentium, mortuo vero patre solummodo cum communi estimatione ipsorum iurium paternorum retractandi & anichilandi habet potestatis facultatem. Et idem est etiam de fratrum Fassione sciendum atque tenendum. [§5] HIC tamen advertendum est quod si assumptio oneris generaliter facta fuerit, & nomina filiorum vel fratrum in Fassionis serie nominatim expressa denotataque non extiterint tunc eiuscemodi oneris assumptio nil tenebit, sed simpliciter invalidari valebit. [§6] TERTIO vero & ultimo modo extrema necessitate urgente dum videlicet quis sententia capitali iuris ordine adversus alium convincetur & condemnabitur, & forsitan in persona quoque propria vigore ipsius latæ sententiæ detinebitur ac ad manus iudicarias ad infligendam sibi pœnam a iure statutam assignabitur vel licet non detineatur gratiam tamen regiam non consequetur, aut si gratia sibi dabitur cum conditione tamen concordandi cum adversa parte et non aliter præstabitur. Nam & alioquin regia maiestas gratiam non secus nisi ut concordet facere potest. Vel in Thurcorum, Saracenorum aut Thartarorum, seu aliorum quorumcunque hostium & inimicorum captivitate detinebitur & inde non secus nisi pactione quapiam eliberabitur. Et hoc ultimo modo præmissi oneris assumptio nunquam revocabitur. [§7] Nulla etiam via Fassio super ea re facta per filium vel fratrem retractabitur. Immo si pater portionem filii (quia propria portio ad caput suum redimendum non sufficeret) in casibus præmissis ante divisionem cum filio factam alienabit filius suffere tollerareque debet. [§8] Nec eiuscemodi Fassioni si etiam unica & singularis esset persona fatens. Nec regius nec fratrum condisionalium consensus est necessarius, sed semper de se rata manebit atque firma. [§9] COROLLARIUM itaque ex præmissis infertur quod possessionaria venditio triplex est scilicet Simplex, Rationabilis & Necessaria. SIMPLEX venditio nihil valet. RATIONABILIS vero aliquando valet & aliquando retractatur. NECESSARIA autem semper valet & semper tenet & nunquam invalidatur prout ex immediata prædeclaratione assumptionis & revocationis onerum filiorum ac fratrum clare liquet.

De legitima admonitione in possessionaria venditione necessario premittenda. lx.

NOTandum ulterius quod quia in Fassionibus tam impignoratio, quam etiam perpetuitatis iure & titulo maxime in præiudicium fratrum per plerosque faciendis damnabilis quadam abusus succrevit quod scilicet quinquaginta florenos interdum a feneratore quis accepit & centum aut ducentos florenos coram capitulo vel conventu aut iudicibus ordinariis regni se accepisse studiose & quidem maliciose fatetur. Capitulum autem & conventus vel iudices regni ordinarii iuxta Fassionis factæ seriem & modum litteras Fassionales & Obligatorias dare tenentur. Sicque nonnulli propediem tanta pecuniarum summa bona sua obruunt & involvunt ut vix medietatem summæ eadem bona valere dinoscantur. Unde sæpe evenit ut huiusmodi bona ab ipsa sua progenie perpetuo alienentur. [§1] Et ideo quælibet possessionaria venditio immo & impignoratio legitimam semper requirit filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum ad quos successio & devolutio huiusmodi iurium possessionariorum venditioni aut impignoratiioni expositorum spectare dinoscitur (ut illam vel illa ad se recipiant) amonitionem qui si legitime amoniti & requisiti possessionem seu iura huiusmodi possessionaria iuxta condignam & communem eorum estimationem ac valorem pro se habere & ad se recipere voluerint ante omnes alios emptores aut fœneratores liberam plenariamque habent pro se recipiendi & emendi facultatem. [§2] SI VERO venditor aut impignorator ipse admonitionem præmissam facere recusabit, & iura sua possessionaria præter scitum vel consensum dictorum filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum cuiquam alienabit vel impignorabit & ipsorum filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum aliquis aut aliqua emptorem huiusmodi bonorum seu iurium possessionariorum contra se in curiam regiam propterea evocabit tunc in uno dumtaxat termino iuridico scilicet Octavali causa ipsa finiri debebit, & actor ipse bona seu iura possessionaria prænotata sola ipsa communi estimatione eorundem pro se recuperabit non obstante pecuniarum summa quantumvis magna in litteris feneratoris seu emptoris super ea re Fassionibus specificata. [§3] Dempto tamen & excepto casu quo quis in capitali sententia convictus detineretur & manibus iudicariis ad luendam pœnam traderetur. Nam hoc modo (quia præter trium dierum spacium indutias ad concordandum cum adversa parte non habet) admonitionem (modo antelato) facere non tenetur sed quibus & in quanta summa poterit liberam vendendi bonorum suorum auctoritatem ibidem semper habet. [§4] Et hoc idem est intelligendum etiam de eo qui apud hostes externos in captivitate tenetur, quod scilicet is quoque bona sua sine omni admonitione pro capitis sui redemptione vendere perpetuoque alienare potest. [§5] UBI AUTEM admonitio prædeclarata venditionem perennem bonorum & iurium possessionariorum legitime præcesserit & nemo filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum bona ipsa & iura possessionaria venditioni exposita pro se habere seu emere voluerit, vel forsitan inopia præpediente comparare non poterit tunc iidem filii ac filię & fratres ipsi non aliter postea nisi pecuniæ summa in litteris Fassionibus specificata plenarie deposita & persoluta vel etiam perennali estimatione mediante & longo litis processu bona illa pro se vindicare valebunt. [§6] Nam & venditores bonorum suorum in casibus articulisque rationabilibus & admittendis non sunt adeo cœrcendi & astringendi ut iustis eorum iuribus & rebus uti aut frui debite nequeant. [§7] Attamen si quis filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum bona ipsa ad se recipere velle tempore ipsius admonitionis responderit & allegaverit tunc ad deponendam summam ipsam condignam & concordandum cum venditore terminus brevis & competens coram iudice cuius auctoritate & litteris admonitio ipsa fit & exequitur ad comparandum sibi præfigi debebit. Terminum autem ipso adveniente si summam illam iuxta iudicis ipsius deliberationem & bonorum ipsorum communem estimationem deponere recusabit venditor ille liberam bonorum suorum alienandi facultatem habebit. [§8] DE IMPIGNORATIONIBUS autem bonis & iuribus possessionariis secus est sciendum. Nam iura aliqua possessionaria supra valorem dictæ communis estimationis eorundem sive præcedat admonitio legitima sive non in præiudicium ipsorum filiorum aut filiarum vel fratrum: aut etiam iuris regii impignorari nemini possunt. Verum tamen hæc estimatio & eius series non solum domos ac curias nobiles sessionesque Iobagionales populosas ac desertas vel Prædiales in faciebus opidorum, villarum aut possessionum adiacentes sed etiam terras, silvas ac prata, piscinas & molendina (prout in Quartaliorum solutione) per omnia includit & in quantum huiusmodi estimatio iuxta limitationem iudicis se extendit in tantum etiam depositio atque restitutio pecuniarum pro iuribus impignorationibus per filios aut filias vel fratres sed & eos qui forsitan cum iurisdictione regia (in casu quo impignoratio per unicam & singularem personam defectivè seminis proximam facta fuerit) procedere videbuntur fieri debent. [§9] Filias autem & mulieres in casibus præmissis illas intellige admovendas esse quas iura ipsa possessionaria vendenda vel impignoranda cum sexu masculino æquali iure concernunt. Nam aliter filię vel mulieres ipsę pro extraneis in hac parte reputantur. Et non secus quam vicini aut commetanei agere permittuntur. Hoc excepto quod si voluerint ante omnes vicinos & commetaneos sese ad emptionem ac receptionem bonorum illorum ingerere & illa pro se habere possunt. [§10] Vicini vero & commetanei per admonitionem prædeklaratam & pro ipsorum parte factam iura possessionaria venditioni exposita pro se quidem ante omnes alios emptores extraneos & remotiores vindicare possunt. Non tamen estimatione communi prout fratres vel sorores sed capitalis semper pecuniæ summę in litteris Fassionibus expressæ depositione & plenaria solutione, vel etiam ipsorum iurium possessionariorum perennali cum estimatione. Unico tamen termino Octavali si admonitio ex parte vendentium non præcesserit, & ipsi nihilominus vicini & commetanei pro parte ipsorum admonitionem super ea re solitam peregerint. Qui pro iuribus possessionariis impignoratiis parimodo capitalem summam pro qua huiusmodi impignoratio facta fuerit persolvere tenentur. Nec de estimatione aliquali se in hac parte ingerere vel immittere possunt. Cum de proprietate & hereditate talium iurium possessionariorum nil ad eos pertinere dinoscatur.

Quomodo portio fratris per alterum fratrem vendita vel impignorata recuperari debeat. Titulus. lxi.

NOTandum ulterius quod plerumque solent fratres natu maiores & interdum etiam minores qui absentibus fratribus natu maioribus bona & iura possessionaria eorum paterna & avita nondum divisa domi manendo possident oneribus cæterorum fratrum suorum carnalium vel uterinorum in se sumptis eadem iura possessionaria impignorare aut perpetuo vendere. Per hocque emptores non solum portionem illius vendentis vel impignorantis verum etiam cæterorum fratrum eiusdem quorum utputa ille gravamina in se accepit portiones possessionarias consueverunt pro se vindicare. [§1] Unde sciendum est quod si aliquando talis venditio aut possessionaria alienatio simplici modo per quempiam committeretur tunc portiones cæterorum fratrum sine omni prorsus solutione actori vel actoribus in primis octavis reddi & restitui debent. Portio autem fratris venditoris estimabitur & valor dumtaxat communis estimationis ipsius portionis emptori recompensabitur. Sic etiam illa portio fratris venditoris actori possidenda dabitur oneris vel gravaminis preassumpti revocatione seu depositione prorsus sine omni. Pro residuitate autem & superfluitate pecuniarum summę in litteris Fassionibus denotatę reliqua bona & iura possessionaria fratris ipsius vendentis quę ad recompensam eiusdem summę se extendere sufficereque videbuntur mox & ulteriori processu iuridico non expectato per iudicem estimari & manibus emptoris sub conditionibus in litteris eiuscemodi Fassionibus declaratis dari debent possidenda. [§2] Si autem alia bona præter vendita non habuerit, & rebus quoque mobilibus ad portionem suam cedentibus adeo destitutus fuerit ut summa prænotata ex illis instaurari & recuperari non possit tunc emptor ipse damnum huiusmodi superfluitatis necessario tollerare cogitur & hoc in casu (ut præfertur) simplici superius declarato. [§3] Nam in casu rationabili etiam oneris retractatio (modo antelato) subsequi & de illa superfluitas prænarata pecuniæ (inquantum poterit) emptori refundi debet. [§4] Et hoc idem est intelligendum etiam de patre qui iura sua & filiorum suorum avita in præiudicium & sine consensu ipsorum filiorum suorum perperam & irrationabiliter alienabit, vel venditioni aut impignoratiioni exponere curabit quod scilicet Fassio sua in casu simplici præallegato simpliciter invalidari & portio filiorum sine omni prorsus solutione, portio vero patris communi estimatione mediante eisdem filiis reddi & instaurari debet.

De quibusdam Fassionibus non retractandis. Tit. lxii.

Hic tamen attendendum & cordi imprimendum est quod si frater Fassionem alterius fratris retractare & revocare volens bonis aut iuribus possessionariis per hanc venditionem aut commutatis, aut acquisitis scienter & sine iuridica reclamatione usus fuerit & fructum illorum realiter perceperit tunc Fassionem huiusmodi nunquam revocare valebit. Per usum enim realem Fassioni illi consensisse videtur. [§1] Et idem est de Fessione quoque paterna per filium retractanda dicendum. [§2] Sic pariformiter sentiendum est de Fassionibus illis quæ inter fratres generationales aut condivisionales vel etiam quoscunque alienos & extraneos prætextu iurium possessionariorum litigiosorum per modum compositionis & concordiaë fiunt atque celebrantur. [§3] Et in huiusmodi compositione certa portio vel particula iurium ipsorum possessionariorum uni partium per alteram partem bona illa litigiosa tenentem & possidentem, vel aliter efficacia forsitan iura ad ea habentem datur aut remittitur, reliqua vero particula seu portio causa pacis & unionis apud se remanebit & relinquetur perpetuo possidenda. Quæ quidem Fessiones (quia finis & exitus litium dubius adhuc & incertus erat) semper observantur & nunquam retractantur. [§4] Nam & alioquin Fessiones prædeklarataë quæ invalidari & retractari possunt non de recipiendis ad se vel obtinendis pro se sed de alienandis dumtaxat a se bonis & iuribus possessionariis intelliguntur.

De Fassionibus que Statutione legitima indigent, et que non. Tit. lxxiii.

Item Fessio perennalis inter fratres generationales & condivisionales aut in præmissis, aut etiam aliis casibus prætextu talium iurium possessionariorum, quæ etiam alioquin in alterutrum essent devolvenda coram quovis iudice ordinario vel alio loco testimoniali & autentico facta nec regio consensu, nec etiam iuridica Statutione indiget. [§1] Aliæ vero omnes Fessiones perennales super quibuslibet bonis ac iuribus possessionariis inter alienos ac extraneos quocunque modo factæ immo etiam pignoris titulo ultra summam quinquaginta florenorum celebratæ & emanatæ infra integram unius anni revolutionem Statutione legitima firmari solent atque debent. [§2] Et hoc si ille cui Fessio facta fuerit extra dominium ipsorum bonorum extiterit. Nam si in dominio eorundem reali etiam antea fuerit, aut medio eius qui Fessionem fecit dominium huiusmodi reale & possessorium de facto consequi poterit tunc (etiam transacta ipsa annuali revolutione) Statutio prænotata semper exequi valebit. [§3] HOC quoque prævisio quod si forsitan Fessionum aliqua regio consensu egeat, & consensus talis usque ad annualem ipsam revolutionem impetrari nequeat tunc Fessio huiusmodi non prius nisi post impetrationem ipsius consensus regii dicti unius anni integram (ut præmittitur) usque ad revolutionem vigore eiusdem consensus Statutione legitima (sive sequatur contradictio sive non) roborari debet. [§4] Et hoc intellige de Fessione non cum futura conditione sed de præsentis facta. Nam super aliquo contractu seu fraternali adoptione bonorumque in alterutrum devolutione si Fessio per quempiam alteri vel forsitan per duas partes sibiipsis mutuo & in alterutrum celebraretur ita videlicet ut si quam partium hæredibus deficere contingeret tunc bona & iura possessionaria eiusdem in partem superviventem devolverentur, & regia maiestas huiusmodi Fessioni seu contractui & fraternali adoptioni suum regium consensum largiretur. Quia Fessio ipsa & ex consequenti consensus ipse regius conditionalis est & non nisi altera partium deficiente locum habeat. Ideo utrisque partibus superviventibus vel forte illa persona quæ alteri Fessionem cum conditione prænotata fecit in humanis adhuc agente Statutionem aliquam subsequi non est necesse. [§5] Nisi forsitan in bonis illis & iuribus possessionariis ius regium fuisset vel esset impetratum. Isto namque casu Statutio ipsa super iure regio quod in multorum sepe bonis occultatum iacet ut legitime subsequatur necesse est. [§6] IDEM super præallegato consensu regio dicendum est ut altera partium deficiente infra anni unius revolutionem integram consensus ipse qui vim Donationis tunc habeat & ex consequenti Fessio in eodem consensu scripta legitimam sortiri debeat Statutionem.

Quid sit consensus regius diffinitive.

Titulus. lxiiii.

COnsensus autem regius est iurisdictionis sacræ coronæ regni super iuribus possessionariis in eam successorio modo iureque devolvendis per principem seu regiam maiestatem spontanea cessio. [§1] Quæ quidem iurisditio sacræ coronæ regni quantum ad devolutionem & successionem bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum isto quo nunc utimur modo a tempore regiminis seu imperii excellentissimi principis condam domini Lodovici regis ab anno scilicet dominicę incarnationis trecentesimo quinquagesimo primo supra millesimum originem summens cunctorum regum successorum scilicet suorum temporibus usque modo inviolabiliter & inconcusse servata atque ratificata super universorum dominorum, baronum & magnatum ac nobilium procerumque regni bonis & iuribus possessionariis (qui utpote in semine & hæredibus deficiunt, vel in unicum & singularem personam deveniunt, sicque defectui seminis approximabunt) legitimæ successionis virtutem semper habet. [§2] ANTE enim eius principis tempora quilibet baro, magnas nobilisque & possessionatus homo super iuribus suis possessionariis (si etiam hæredibus defecisset) prout voluit sine omni consensu regio liberam disponendi habuit facultatem. [§3] Et in eo solummodo casu si hæredibus & omnibus propinquis destitutus ac intestatus quisquam illorum decessisset iurisditio prænotata locum habuisse dinoscitur.

Quales Fassiones consensu regio indigeant & quales non. Tit. lxxv.

UNde sciendum quod nunc omnis Fassio dominorum ac nobilium & aliorum possessionatorum hominum per singularem & unicum personam ac defectui prolium vel seminis approximantem quibuscunque personis & ex quibusvis casibus ac rationibus conditionibusque & articulis super quibuscunque bonis & iuribus possessionariis perpetuo facta consensu regio (propter iurisdictionem successionis prenotate) semper indiget estque necessaria. [§1] Nam sine ipso consensu non solum super bonis perennali iure obligatis verum etiam pignoris titulo (ultra communem estimationem ipsorum bonorum) inscriptis Fassio prenarrata qualitercunque (ut premittitur) facta atque celebrata viribus destituta manebit. [§2] UNDE SEQUITUR quod Fassio inter plures & per plures personas fraternas vel alienas mutuo aut seorsum quibuspiam facta regio consensu non indiget. [§3] Ius enim successionis propter alias personas ex utraque parte hæreditario modo & iure successuras locum in principe seu iurisdictione regia nondum habet. [§4] Et hoc est verum si personæ ab una parte stantes seu Fassionem facientes vim successionis invicem & in alterutrum habent. De personis quoque ab altera parte stantibus idem est sentiendum atque tenendum. Nam aliter regius ipse consensus impetrandus semper & necessarius erit. [§5] Pluralitas enim personarum non excludit iurisdictionem regiam ubi nulla dinoscitur esse fraternitatis neque consanguineitatis connexio vel alterius successionis in bonis mutua reciprocaque vicissitudo.

Quid sit contractus diffinitive, et quando indigeat legitima Statutione. Tit. lxxvi.

NOTandum igitur est quod quilibet contractus inter quoscunque possessionatos homines aut alias personas super devolutione quorumcunque bonorum in alterutrum altero deficiente fienda formatus tam scilicet consensu regio stabilitus, quam etiam pluralitate personarum fatentium modo præallegato roboratus Statutione legitima post defectum seminis partis cuiuspiam infra annualem (ut præmissi) revolutionem ratificari debet. [§1] Interim autem pars supervivens vigore iuris successorii ex huiusmodi contractu vel fraternali adoptione sibi attributi dominium bonorum partis deficientis tanquam scilicet fratris sui condivisionalis simpliciter pro se vendicandi manibusque suis (dummodo legitimum aliquod non obsistat impedimentum) applicandi habet auctoritatem. [§2] CONTRACTUS autem seu fraternalis adoptio est alienæ cuiusvis personæ per quempiam (hæredibus legitimis deficientibus) in bonorum suorum successione permissiva substitutio. [§3] Dictum est autem notanter hæredibus deficientibus. Nam veris & legitimis hæredibus ac successoribus superextantibus & superstitibus fraternalis adoptio locum non habet. Verum illis deficientibus adoptatus ipse frater vel filius successionis huiusmodi virtutem & facultatem in bonorum ipsorum devolutione sortiendus erit. [§4] Dictum est etiam permissiva substitutio quoniam sine permissione vel consensus adhibitione principis nostri eiusmodi substitutio seu adoptio nullius est vel erit firmitatis sed bonorum ipsorum devolutio in principem ac iurisdictionem sacræ coronæ directe spectabit atque pertinebit. Neque sine consensu principis adoptivus ipse frater aut filius dominium talium bonorum ingredi vel pro se vendicare valebit.

Quod dominium bonorum duplici modo quispiam dicitur habere, et de contractibus in fine. Tit. lxvii.

ADvertendum est autem quod duplici ratione atque via dominium aliquorum bonorum quis habere dicitur. PRIMO iure possessorio dum quis reale pacificumque dominium tam in fructibus percipiendis quam etiam servitiis per colonos exhibendis bonorum aliquorum aperte tenet & hic modus generalis est ac omnibus manifestus. [§1] SECUNDA via dominium bonorum dicitur aliquis habere iure vel modo successorio quando devolutio aliquorum iurium possessionariorum ad ipsum manifeste spectat prout in bonis & iuribus possessionariis fratrum carnalium vel etiam condivisionalium in propinqua linea generationis habetur verbi gratia licet frater carnalis altero fratre similiter carnali supervivente dominium reale ac possessorium bonorum suorum post factam cum eo divisionem non habeat ius tamen ac dominium successorium de facto & immediate habet cuius virtute postquam frater ipse sine hæredibus decesserit mox & immediate superstes & in humanis agens frater bona defuncti fratris simpliciter absque omni scilicet Statutione iuridica & alio processu iuris pro se vendicabit & potestati suæ iuste meritoque applicabit. [§2] Et si frater ipse defunctus filias & uxorem post se relinqueret & bona sua sexum fœmineum non sequerentur ita videlicet quod prius vivente fratre premortuo & progenitorum quoque suorum temporibus reale dominium aliqua fœminarum in eisdem bonis non habuisset tunc easdem filias infra tempus maritacionis earundem uxorem autem seu relictam illius tamdiu quousque sub nomine & titulo domini & mariti sui vixerit & tempus viduitatis suæ peregerit eo præcise iure & modo quo frater ille defunctus dum superviveret victu & amictu omnibusque vitæ necessariis iuxta bonorum illorum exigentiam educare providereque & conservare ac honeste tandem filias nuptui tradere. Uxorem autem (si voluerit) nuptui pariter tradere & insuper Dotalitium ac res Paraffernales eiusdem persolvere frater ipse supervivens de iure tenebitur. Itidem quoque de contractibus seu fraternalibus adoptionibus (ubi de eo contractu manifeste constat) est sciendum. Nam licet frater premortuus hæredibus ex suis lumbis descendentibus caruerit hærede tamen substituto qui successor legitimus appellatur nondum defecit. [§3] Secus tamen est de illis fratribus qui ante sexaginta aut centum, ducentos vel amplius annos in bonis & iuribus eorum possessionariis divisi fuissent & a tanto iam tempore vix etiam genealogiæ suæ linea memorie haberetur sed solo quasi nomine fratres condivisionales dicerentur. Nam in hoc casu ea lege procedendum est prout in facto iurium possessionariorum per defectum seminis aliquorum decedentium a maiestate regia impetratorum procedi solet.

Quod violenti occupatores bonorum iterum violententer de illis eici possunt. Tit. lxxviii.

Item si quispiam hominum se in dominium talium bonorum & iurium possessionariorum violententer ingereret ingredereturque & quovis modo immitteret quæ in alterum & non ipsum derivata fuissent extunc ille qui vim iusque successionis in illis bonis habet infra anni unius integri revolutionem etiam per potentiam & parem violentiam ipsum occupatorem de dominio eorundem eiciendi & excludendi habet facultatem. Quoniam in hac parte vim vi repellere licet. [§1] Transacto vero anni unius spatio processu iuris contra occupatorem illum agere debet & eum prætextu indebite occupationis & usurpationis huiusmodi bonorum brevi Evocatione vel insinuatione mediante in causam attrahere poterit ubi eo directe modo quo ratione bonorum de manibus suis propriis occupatorum violens occupator eo quod iurisdictionem alterius vi & potentia pro se vendicavit in sententia capitali convinci debet si tamen actor bona illa iure successorio ad se devoluta fuisse comprobabit. [§2] Et idem est tenendum de illorum quoque iurium possessionariorum violenta occupatione in quorum reali dominio quispiam a diuturno spacio perseverasset quod scilicet spoliatus ipse occupatorem de illis pari violentia si poterit intra unius anni spatium eiciendi & expellendi habet auctoritatem.

De clausula nil iuris, et qualia bona iterum in donantem vel vendentem redeant. lxxix.

Uterius sciendum quod si in serie litterarum aliquarum Fassionum clausula illa. NULLUM ius nullamve iuris & dominii proprietatem pro se reservando &c. aut studiose, aut ignoranter inserta fuerit tale ius possessionarium super quo videlicet huiusmodi Fassio facta extiterit nunquam in eum qui Fassionem fecit (etiam sine hæredibus eo in quem ius suum transtulerat obeunte) de cætero reflectitur aut redundabit sed colationi regiæ maiestatis penitus subiacebit. [§1] VERUM tamen si Fassio absque clausula prænotata celebrabitur, sive in mutua & concambiali bonorum aliquorum permutatione sive alia perennali collatione utpote pro servitorum remuneratione (prout plerumque solet) aut alia quavis rationabili ex causa datione inscriptioneque vel obligatione extunc eo ex humanis sublato & hæredibus aliisque legitimis successoribus destituto cui collatio aut quavis inscriptio bonorum ipsorum facta fuerat rursus & iterum in illum qui Fassionem fecerat vel bona ipsa contulerat eiusdemque hæredes & posteritates universos (Quoniam iuris successorii proprietatem & dominium pro se reservaverat nec a se in alterum perpetuo transtulerat) ipsa bona devolvuntur & iuri pristino effective derivantur atque reintegrantur.

Quid sit concambialis permutatio bonorum, et quare sit adinventæ. Tit. lxxx.

Quoniam autem super concambiali permutatione bonorum & iurium possessionariorum mentio habita est, Hinc sciendum quod concambialis bonorum permutatio est iurium possessionariorum duarum vel plurium partium sibipsis vicissitudinaria commutatio & in alterutrum legitima translatio. [§1] Adinventæ autem est tum propter quietioris status consequendi facultatem tum propter uberioris fructus percipiendi emolumentum. [§2] Plurimi nanque bona sua longinquis partibus a loco residentię ipsorum magna adeo distantia & intercapedine sita habent ut plus ad provisionem illorum exponere cogantur quam de fructibus eorum percipere possint. Nonnullorum autem bona propter potentum pernitiosam & violentam vicinitatem in extremam devenere desolationem. Plerique vero ratione talium bonorum continuas habent lites & controversias ut ne nocte quidem propter eas quiescere possint. Ita ut longe plus inde iacturæ quam utilitatis reportent. [§3] QUAPROPTER quilibet possessionatus homo de bonis & iuribus possessionariis suis concambium sibi utile & proficuum iure libereque facere potest contradictione filiorum ac filiarum vel fratrum suorum simpliciter non obstante. [§4] ATTAMEN portio illa quæ in concambium sibi dabitur in fratres generationales vel condivisionales (deficiente eo fratre, qui concambium fecerat) devolvitur tanquam alia portio sua per quam commutatio concambialis facta fuerat quæ in ipsos fratres vigore iuris successorii derivanda erat.

Quid si concambium fraudulenter et simulate factum et celebratum fuerit. Tit. lxxi.

VERUM quia plurimę fraudes in huiusmodi concambiali bonorum permutatione per plerosque fieri & committi consueverunt, quidam enim bona sua in præiudicium & iacturam fratrum suorum non vere neque iuste sed fecte & simulate vendere pariter & alienare prætendentes ne fratres ipsi bona eiusmodi ab emptoribus ne dicam feneratoribus pro se repetere & iuri eorum vindicare reappropriareque possent titulum vel colorem concambialis permutationis (quæ iusto & recto modo libere fieri permittitur) in litteris seu privilegiis Fassionibus inseri procurant ius aliquod possessionarium remoto in loco, vel forte etiam propinquo situm & adiacens per emptorem seu feneratorem in concambium sibi datum esse profitentes tamen dominium huiusmodi iuris possessionarii ad modicum solum tempus (ut fraus ipsa interim palliaretur) aut nunquam pro se vindicabunt sicque fratres eorum ad quos successio bonorum & iurium possessionariorum ipsorum hoc sub titulo alienandorum spectaret defraudantes illis exhæreditabunt etiam eo iure possessionario quod venditori per emptorem in concambium dari simulabatur atque fingebatur apud eundem emptorem perpetuo remanente. [§1] Ne igitur fraus & dolus cuiuspiam patrocinari videatur postquam huiusmodi fraudulentum concambium fratribus vendentis & bona ipsa alienantis innotuerit mox ad instantiam ipsorum fratrum facta primum legitima super ea re Evocatione sola communi estimatione eorundem bonorum præmisso modo alienandorum mediante. Unico tamen semper termino Octavali actori huiusmodi bona per iudicem reddi readiudicari restatuique debebunt.

Quando concambium nullo modo poterit retractari. Tit. lxxii.

ITEM si pater vel frater quispiam concambium aliquod fecerit, & filius aut fratrum aliquis eo concambio scienter & sine iuridica reclamazione vel prohibitione usus fuerit fructumque bonorum permutatorum realiter perceperit concambium ipsum postea filius vel frater ille retractare nequibit. Usus enim realis in hac parte in vim cessionis concensusque transibit.

Si in concambio pecunia superaddatur utrum talia bona ius fœmineum sequantur. lxxiii.

ITEM quia iura possessionaria modo concambii permutata quantitate, fructuositate & valore non semper æqualiter sibi correspondent ideo solent plærrique quorum bona & iura possessionaria minoris precii valorisque existunt ad ea ut concambium equale fiat summam aliquam pecuniarum super addere unde nonnulli putaverunt huiusmodi iura possessionaria (eo quod pecunia addita est) ius fœmineum æque veluti masculinum sequi debere. Quod tenendum non est. [§1] Nam iurium possessionariorum conservatio & sequela non a ramo pecuniæ scilicet additione, sed a radice & origine acquisitionis & inventionis suę iudicanda censetur, & ob hoc in tali casu homines fœminei sexus non nisi de pecuniis superadditis portiones suas rehabere poterunt. Proprietas autem & hæreditas iurium ipsorum possessionariorum sexui masculino salva manebit. [§2] Et hoc verum est si ex origine & radice eiuscemodi iura possessionaria sexum fœmineum non sequuntur. Super ea namque ambiguitate, Utrum aliqua iura possessionaria sexum fœmineum æque veluti masculinum sequi debeant nec ne? semper ad originales litteras quibus bona ipsa acquisita & inventa fuerunt recurrendum est.

Quid valeat Evictio, seu Expeditoria cautio preassumpta. Tit. lxxiii.

CAeterum quoniam in concambiali permutatione bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum Expeditoria cautio quę apud legistas cautio de Evictione nuncupatur inseri & assummi plerumque solet. Si igitur partium aliqua legitime requisita alteram partem iuxta præassumptam tutoriam Expeditoriamque cautionem in dominio huiusmodi iurium possessionariorum permutatorum adversus quospiam causantes & legitimos impeditores conservare non poterit extunc iura sua possessionaria in concambium alteri parti data (si restant) in specie reddi & restitui, Si vero a manibus ipsius partis alienata forte fuerint & recuperari nequiverint tunc similia iura sua possessionaria quantitate ac fructuositate & valore iuribus alienatis æquipollentia parti damnificatę quę in dominio illorum conservari nequibit dari statuique debent. [§1] Et hoc verum intellige si Expeditoria cautio in litteris Fassionibus simplici communique modo inserta fuerit. Nam aliter si clausula ipsa Expeditorię assumptionis cum conditionibus & articulis aliquibus posita declarataque extiterit tunc ipsę eędem conditiones articuli que positi in hac parte observari debebunt. [§2] Et hoc idem intellige etiam de cęteris iuribus possessionariis sub expeditoria ipsa cautione per quempiam alienatis vel legitime venditis. Quod si emptor bonorum in dominio eorum per venditorem conservari nequibit extunc similia bona qualitate, quantitate fructuositateque & valore illorum loco sibi dari debebunt.

Qui intelligantur per legitimos impeditores. Tit. lxxv.

PER legitimos vero impeditores accipiendi ac intelligendi sunt causantes & processu iuris agentes, non autem violenti occupatores & manu potenti procedentes. Nam contra tales non tenetur quis alterum in iuribus venditis conservare. [§1] Emptor itaque bonorum dum per quempiam ordine iuris prætextu huiusmodi bonorum emptorum impediatur in causamque trahitur tunc venditorem eorundem bonorum in defensionem causę ipsius antequam eadem decisionem sortita fuerit penes se Evocare tenetur. [§2] Nam si Evocare neglexerit & sic iura eiuscemodi possessionaria seu bona iuridice amiserit venditor ipse ab onere Expeditorię cautionis absolvetur liberabiturque & deinceps emptorem in dominio eorundem conservare non tenebitur.

Questio notabilis super Evictione seu Expeditoria cautione. Tit. lxxvi.

ITEM quæritur si quis alterum in dominio cuiuspiam possessionis conservaturum assumpserit & se ad conservandum obligaverit, & aliqua terrarum particula ab ipsa possessione temporum in processu per quempiam metalli Reambulatione vel alio titulo distracta iuridiceque sequestrata fuerit corporali possessione salva remanente: Utrum teneatur assumens alterum in illa quoque particula terrę conservare? [§1] Responde quod non tenetur. Quoniam ipse possessionem illam cum cunctis suis utilitatibus & pertinentiis ad eandem de iure spectantibus alteri contulit & sic ipsum in dominio eiusdem conservare assumpsit. Particula autem illa terræ ad huiusmodi possessionem de iure non spectabat. Et sic ipse quoque qui vendidit quo ad particulam eandem male fidei possessor erat. Ideo alterius iura vendere non potuit prout neque vendidit vigore illius clausulæ: Ad eandem possessionem de iure spectantibus & pertinere debentibus &c. [§2] Nisi forsitan se ita obligasset ut cum eisdem cursibus metarum & limitibus quibus per eum possessio illa tenta fuisset & possessa in dominio eiusdem alterum conservaret. Hoc enim modo æquivalentem terram loco amissæ terræ alteri dare tenetur.

Quod donatores et venditores bonorum contra possessores eorundem per semetipsos agere non possunt. Tit. lxxvii.

HOC unum tamen advertendum est quod Expeditoria cautio prænarata semper ad externos & alienos causantes ac legitimos impeditores & actores, non autem ad ipsos donatores & venditores bonorum est referenda prout quosdam bona sua alteri conferentes ipse vidi contra possessores & dominos eorundem bonorum per semetipsos causam atque litem suscitasse quasi non possent illos in dominio bonorum ipsorum conservare per hoc eadem bona rursus pro se vindicare satagentes quod nunquam est admittendum.

Quid sit præscriptio diffinitive, et quot annorum curricula diversimode complectatur. lxxviii.

QUoniam præscriptionem tam prætextu bonorum hæreditariorum quam etiam ratione iurium possessionariorum impignoraticiorum, sed & actuum potentiariarum in iudiciis allegare sæpenumero consueverunt. Pauca igitur de præscriptione necessario dicenda occurrunt. Et primo de eius quidditate. Deinde vero de ipsius duratione & diversitate. [§1] SCIENDUM igitur quod præscriptio est termini ad iuridicam tum retentionem tum reacquisitionem bonorum de iure statuti temporalis completio [§2] quæ super bonis seu iuribus possessionariis venditis, occupatis & quomodolibet alienatis regalibus centum ecclesiarum, quadraginta nobilium, triginta duorum civium vero duodecim annorum curriculis completur. [§3] In actibus siquidem potentiariis triginta duorum similiter annorum spatium præscriptio requirit, [§4] villanorum autem præscriptio unius anni integri dumtaxat & unius diei terminum complectitur. [§5] Inter fratres vero generationales & condivisionales ratione iurium possessionariorum (demptis actibus potentiariis) ac in Dotalitiorum & Quartalitorum per eos solutione præscriptio nunquam admittitur. [§6] In foro autem ecclesiastico præscriptio aliter allegatur. SED quia non est mei instituti aliquid de ecclesiastico foro disserere illud silentio pertranseo & quibus interest limitandum submitto. [§7] CÆTERUM quanquam in metis quoque rectificandis & iuribus impignoraticiiis plurimi peritorum præscriptionem non esse admittendam communi sententia & proverbio astruant. Quia tamen hæc allegatio non simpliciter est intelligenda sed recto moderamine discutienda illam igitur suis in locis inferius dilucide declarabo.

Quibus temporibus præscriptio non currit locumque non habet. Tit. lxxix.

SCIendum tamen est quod si quempiam in Thurcorum, Saracenorum, Thartarorum aut aliorum infidelium manus & captivitatem incidere & ibi tempus præscriptionis transgredi contigerit, tunc eo casu præscriptio nil tenet sed nobilis bonis suis destitutus postquam ad propria remeaverit processu iuris ea pro se recuperare poterit obstaculo præscriptionis obviare non valente. [§1] Et si quis per regiam maiestatem exilio damnaretur & filius eius metu fortasse principis aut pietate suadente cum patre pariter proficisceretur ibique commorando super iurium suorum aliena detentione tempus præscriptionis iura nobilium regni transcribentis evolveretur ac compleretur redeunte filio (qui iniquitatem patris portare non tenetur) bona sua alienata ad portionem suam cedentia non obstante præscriptione idem pro se restaurandi habet auctoritatem. [§2] Quæ quidem præscriptiones etiam absque litis motione per litteras prohibitorias ac protestatorias excludi semper possunt. [§3] Nam & litis motio modernorum tempore non plurium quam ipsorum triginta & duorum annorum spacium complectitur. Et si causa interim prosequuta non fuerit expletis illis ex novo litis motio ipsa suscitari debet.

De iuribus possessionariis Impignoratiis in generali. Tit. lxxx.

Explicatis superius iurium possessionariorum proprietatibus & hæreditatibus earumque speciebus nunc de iurium Impignoraticiorum serie & quiditate dicendum restat. [§1] Et quanquam iura possessionaria Impignoratiis nedum possidere aut gubernare damnabile salutique contrarium verum etiam aliquid de illis scribere formidabile videatur quoniam tamen leges imperiales atque civiles eius usum admittunt ideo in hoc regnopartibusque sibi subiectis usus iste perniciosus multum inolevit incrementumque grande cœpit adeo ut si quosdam pœna generalis decreti super ea re inter cætera editi non perterreret etiam deposita & persoluta pecunia eis debita bona ac iura ipsa Impignoratiis remittere nusquam curarent sed in perniciem animarum suarum quamdiu possent ea detinerent. PROPTER quod de pignorationis ipsius modo & vigore pauca hic subnectenda statui.

Quid sit bonorum Pignoratio, et quot modis intelligatur. Tit. lxxxi.

UNde sciendum quod Impignoratio iurium possessionariorum dupliciter intelligitur videlicet ex parte pignorantis seu dantis & ex parte creditoris, seu recipientis. Ex parte igitur dantis impignoratio est iuris proprii necessitate cogente temporalis ad utendum alteri concessio. Quantum autem ad creditorem seu recipientem impignoratio est iuris alieni cum fructuum perceptione & capitalis summæ repetitione perniciose damnabilisque ad tempus detentio. [§1] Et hæc diffinitio non eo tendit ut fructus & utilitatis bonorum pignorum quispiam percipiat & insuper capitalem quoque summam repetat sed potius eiuscemodi repetitionem & usum confundit atque damnat. Nam si quis hoc modo bonis pignoris utitur usuram palam committere dinoscitur. [§2] Verum si omnes fructus (demptis expensis quas etiam verus dominus pro conservatione ipsorum bonorum facere deberet) in capitalem summam computaret hoc modo bona impignorata tenere non damnabile sed summe laudabile foret per hocque creditor ipse pietatis opus ad proximum suum se fecisse comprobaret.

Qualiter intelligatur præscriptio in bonis impignoratiis non ad mittenda. lxxxii.

QUIA vero in causis impignoratiis præscriptionem non esse allegandam neque admittendam in commune iam proverbium venit quæ quidem proverbii ipsius deductio non simpliciter est intelligenda sed quemadmodum immediate præmissi pignoratio dupliciter attenditur ex parte scilicet impignorantis vel dantis & ex parte recipientis. [§1] Auctoritas itaque ipsa ex parte solummodo dantis & impignorantis vera est admittendaque intelligitur. Ex parte autem creditoris seu recipientis penitus reicienda censetur. [§2] SOLENT enim plurimi bona eorum necessitate urgente pignori obligare & ea ad obitus usque diem ipsorum non posse redimere. Filii etiam aut fratres decedente patre vel fratre, aut inopia præpediti aut negligentia ignaviaque ducti interdum etiam in servitiis superiorum longinquis & remotissimis in partibus addicti vel aliter extra regnum præoccupati annos & terminos præscriptionis (eiuscemodi iura impignorantia non redimendo) longe transcendere & in tali casu præscriptio ex parte dantis non est admittenda. [§3] Ubi namque filii aut fratres nobilium Impignoratorum seu Impignorantium illorumque heredes bona ipsa & iura possessionaria Impignorata ad ipsas manus alienas titulo pignoris devenisse poterunt comprobare & ea pro se voluerint rehabere atque redimere tunc possessor ille iurium Impignorantium obstaculo præscriptionis non suffragante (si etiam binario, aut ternario, vel ampliori numero præscriptio intervenisset). Et si idem possessor (ne dicam fœenerator) bona ipsa Impignorantia nomine forsitan iuris regii interea temporis pro se impetrasset bona eadem remittere tenetur. [§4] Et siquid tandem iuris ad ea bona se habere pretendit id extra dominium eorundem processu iuris prosequi debet. [§5] Et hoc intellige si post factam prius Impignorationem iure postea perennali Impignorans ipse bona eiusmodi illi possessori non obligavit. Nam hoc casu bona eadem remittere non tenetur sed filii aut fratres Impignorantis si ipsa bona in prejudicium eorum non potuisse iure perennali obligare vel alienare allegabunt eo processu quo super iuribus hereditariis solitum est procedere talia bona & iura possessionaria requirere tenebuntur. [§6] Nam duplici titulo, Impignorantia videlicet & perennali simul nemo ius aliquod possessionarium tenere potest sed postquam perpetuitatis titulo quis illud possidere cœperit mox virtus Impignorationis cessabit & expirabit omnino. [§7] VERUM tamen eandem auctoritatem, quod in causis iuribusque & rebus Impignorantiis præscriptio non est alleganda. Nonnulli perperam abusiveque & sinistre interpretantes intelligereque satagentes multa bona. & iura possessionaria dominorum prælatorum ac baronum & regni nobilium mediantibus litteris Impignorantiis ante sexaginta, septuaginta, centum & amplius annos confectis & emanatis prænarrato pignoris titulo pro sese vindicare usurpareque nituntur. [§8] Qua propter advertendum est quod omnes eiusmodi antiquæ veteresque litteræ Impignorantiæ quæ tempus præscriptionis transcenderunt (si de violenta expulsionem vel indebita ablatione bonorum & iurium ipsorum possessionariorum impignorantium per actorem & acquirentem eorundem bonorum legitimum probabileque documentum & testimonium litterali fulcimento produci non poterit) inefficaces nulliusque firmitatis sunt censendæ atque committendæ. [§9] De violenta tamen & indebita huiusmodi expulsionem vel bonorum ipsorum ablatione sexagesimi usque anni spatium & non amplius etiam humanum testimonium (si sufficiens & iustum per actorem produci poterit) acceptandum erit. [§10] SÆPE numero namque super ea integra pecuniarum summa pro qua videlicet quis bona sua alteri impignoraverit creditori suo satisfacit. Attamen litteras impignorantias in specie non semper poterit rehabere sed solummodo littere super ea re Expeditoriæ seu Quitantiales illi dantur quæ sæpe periclitantur maxime si eundem hominem heredibus deficere & bona sua ad manus regias aut alterius ex Donatione regia vel etiam aliter applicari devenireque contigerit in simili igitur casu contra veteres litteras Impignorantias non tenetur quis signanter alienigena decedente deficienteque impignatore litteras Expeditorias exhibere, nisi forsitan minus iuste violenterque ius pignoratitium de manibus sui possessoris (sicuti prænarratum est) per quempiam ablatum fuisse posset probari. Nam hoc modo non videtur æquum pecuniis suis illum debere frustrari. Res enim vel possessio in hac parte cum onere transit. [§11] Verum tamen si meminerit capitalem summam per prius de illo se extorsisse studeat ipsi pignori potius cedere atque renunciare quam animæ suæ periculum parere.

Quod iura possessionaria ultra communem eorum estimationem pignorari non possunt. Tit. lxxxiii.

Hoc unum tamen attende (prout superius quoque breviter tetigi) quod iura possessionaria quoruncunque dominorum, magnatum & nobilium possessionatorumque hominum cuiuscunque status, conditionis dignitatisque & præminentia existant ultra valorem communis estimationis eorundem iurium possessionariorum in quocunque casu titulo pignoris obligari nequeunt. [§1] Verum tamen si ultra condignam & communem estimationem eorundem cuiuspiam forsitan obligarentur tunc ille qui alteri obligavit vita sua comite per seipsum non aliter quam deposita restitutaque pecuniarum summa per eum ad id levata ad se redimere poterit. [§2] Eo tamen decedente aut etiam in humanis agente filii vel fratres ipsius impignorantis ad quos videlicet huiusmodi redemptio spectare videbitur præmissa communi estimatione mediante pro se redimere valebunt casibus venditionis vel impignorationis prædeklaratis semper observatis. [§3] PER communem autem estimationem in hoc loco intellige non boves, equos, vaccas, oves aut alias res huiusmodi vendibiles sed valorem bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum impignoratorum in quantum scilicet se communi ipsa estimatione mediante inclusis etiam terris, silvis & pratis ac aliis pertinentiis & utilitatibus (prout etiam supra notatum est) valor eorundem bonorum extendit. Secundum enim eiuscemodi valorem solutio tandem pecuniis fieri debet.

De metarum distinctionibus et rectificationibus in generali. Tit. lxxxiiii.

Item quoniam in metis quoque rectificandis præscriptionem non currere superius diximus ideo de metarum Reambulatione simul & rectificatione breviter aliqua subiungam. [§1] UNDE sciendum est quod roborato solio regimineque huius inclyti regni Hungariae & populo Hungarico ad agnitionem veritatis & veræ fidei professionem inspirante spiritussancti gratia veniente gloriosus rex & apostolus noster beatus Stephanus. Inclytus quoque & pius rex sanctus Ladislaus. Multi deinde divi serenissimique reges Hungariae eorum scilicet successores plurimas terras (quas nunc possessiones vocamus) a castris regalibus ad quæ veluti iurisdictionem sacræ coronæ regni huius spectabant sequestrantes tum monasteriis & ecclesiis in perpetuam elemosinam, tum vero servientibus ipsorum (quos iam nobiles appellamus) exigentibus eorundem servitiis in perpetuam hæreditatem contulerunt. [§2] Quas quidem terras tempore huiusmodi Donationis metali etiam distinctione ab aliis terris segregari fecerunt. [§3] Multiplicatis dehinc baronibus ac magnatibus & nobilibus huius regni sub inclusione metarum unius terræ seu possessionis sæpe duas & interdum etiam tres aut plures villas nonnulli eorum condescendi ac collocari populisque & inhabitatoribus decorari fecerunt. Nullam aliquando metalem distinctionem sed quandam dumtaxat ad utendum limitationem inter villas ipsas facientes. Interdum tamen etiam metarum erectione easdem a se se separantes. [§4] Procedente itaque tempore filii hæredesque ipsorum dominorum baronum & magnatum ac nobilium iura eorum possessionaria inter sese dividentes uni una alteri altera villa in portionem devenit atque cessit. Quibus tandem defunctis & sæpe deficientibus eiuscemodi villæ ac possessiones ad diversorum manus hominum ex Donationibus divorum Hungariae regum vel aliter simul cum litteris metalibus devenerunt. Sicque in Reambulationibus & rectificationibus metarum differentiæ primum suborte fuerunt. [§5] Nam illi quorum ad manus litteræ metales cum possessione easdem litteras tangente inciderunt ex huiusmodi metali inclusione etiam alias villas & possessiones virtute litterarum ipsarum ad se pertinere putaverunt. Novissimis siquidem temporibus etiam per manifestam potentum violentorumque occupationem & terrarum distractionem variæ contentiones in ipsis metis rectificandis suboriri cœperunt.

Qualiter intelligitur in metis rectificandis prescriptio non admittenda. Tit. lxxxv.

Licet itaque in metis rectificandis non sit præscriptio admittenda verum tamen corporales possessiones sub inclusionibus quarumcunque litterarum metalium adiacentes (maxime in casibus præmissis) anihiları vel occupari virtute talium litterarum metalium non possunt. [§1] Tempore etenim foundationis & descensus huiusmodi corporalis possessionis reclamatio & inhibitio (ne ibi possessio aut villa extrueretur) per eum ad quem terra vel meta pertinebat fieri debuisset. [§2] Verum ad huiusmodi villam & possessionem corporalem sub inclusione ipsarum litterarum Metalium (ut præfertur) adiacentem iuxta rectam & equam iudicis ordinarii limitationem & diuturnum usum ac reale dominium terrarum, silvarum, montium, promontiorum pratorumque per colonos & inhabitatores huiusmodi villæ vel possessionis habitum & tentum Metalis distinctio pariter & annexio earundem terrarum, sylvarum, virgultorum, montium, promontiorum, aquarum pratorumque & fœnilium ad usum ipsorum colonorum sufficiens fieri constituique debet. Reliquis clausulis litterarum eiuscemodi metalium actori salvis permanentibus. [§3] Particulæ vero aut quantitates aliquarum terrarum, silvarum, promontiorum & pratorum paulatim a suo membro corporali videlicet possessione quovis modo distractæ vel occupatæ vigore litterarum metalium (dum tamen ipsæ litteræ rite sint emanatæ) instaurari & suo principali membro (vetusta & approbata regni huius consuetudine dictante) per actorem iuramento mediante iuxta eiusdem particulæ distractæ vel occupatæ quantitatem & estimationem reincorporari possunt atque debent allegatione cuiusvis præscriptionis non obstante. [§4] Qualiter autem eiusmodi terræ aut silvæ estimari debeant & quid duo aut tria, vel plura terrarum iugera fœnetaque vel silvæ valeant in serie estimationum infra clare descriptam habebis.

Quales littere metales valeant, et quales non. Tit. lxxxvi.

Sciendum ulterius quod in metarum Reambulationibus & litteris super ea re conficiendis plurimæ fraudes apertaque scandala committi consueverunt. [§1] Non nulli enim salutis & honoris eorum immemores acceptis litteris regiis aut aliorum iudicum regni ordinariorum Reambulatoriis per clausulam DICITUR NOBIS emanatis hominem regium aut Palatinalem ac alicuius Capituli vel Conventus testimonium ad Exequutionem seu Reambulationem ipsam transmissos pecuniis aut muneribus sæpe corrumpere et ad eorum relationem tales quales voluerint litteras metales privilegii more pro ipsorum parte conficere & a Capitulo vel Conventu (altera parte cuius scilicet terras perambulasse inique retulerunt penitus ignorante) pro sese extrahere easdemque litteras apud se demum occultare & Reambulationem ipsam taciturnitatis silencio usque decem, sedecem & interdum viginti quoque & amplius annorum curricula præterire & tandem vigore illarum decedentibus forsitan iam regio ac Capitulari vel Conventuali hominibus sed et vicinis & commetaneis quorum nomina fraudulenter in litteris metalibus inserta fuerunt Reambulationem metalem publice & iam iuridice peragere, sicque terras plurimas iuri eorum inique & dolose vindicare sæpenumero solent [§2] quorum damnabili lucro ut via præcludatur & veritas ex litteris eliciatur per iudices regni ordinarios & eorum Prothonotarios huiusmodi litteræ (per clausulam DICITUR nobis) ad relationem aliquorum regionum vel Palatinalium Capitulariumque aut Conventualium hominum emanatæ diligenti semper examine curaque & sollicitudine ruminantur atque super usu earum si videlicet post factam Reambulationem illam metalem vigore earundem litterarum dominium & usum terrarum in ipsis specificatarum ac inclusarum aliquando actor ipse tenuisset atque possedisset veritas inquiratur & si nullum usum ac dominium penes illas se habuisse verificabitur tunc constabit easdem litteras indebite contraque iustum processum regni confectas fuisse & per hoc inefficaces esse. [§3] LITTERÆ vero metales ex iuridica commissione quorumcunque iudicum regni ordinariorum necnon ex legitima Reambulatione inter duas aut tres vel etiam plures partes (eisdem partibus consentientibus) facta præterea per modum concordie & Fassionis inter quospiam celebratæ dummodo aliorum iura seu terras inter se sinistre non dividant vel divisisse non comprobentur. CÆTERUM communi quoque & consueta de Reambulatione per regium aut Palatinalem alicuiusque loci testimonialis homines præsentibus vicinis & commetaneis iurium possessionariorum seu terrarum Reambularum præsertim illis ad quos terræ ipsæ pertinent, vel vicinitas saltem terrarum illarum spectare dinoscitur palam manifesteque & legitime peracta confectæ & emanatæ efficaces censentur semper & robor sortiuntur firmitatis. [§4] CURSUS etiam & distinctiones metales in litteris Donationalibus quorumcunque dominorum regum Hungariæ legitimorum denotatæ & explicati semper observantur. Et hoc verum tene si post factam Donationem metalemque distinctionem terræ seu possessiones huiusmodi in alias diversasque terras vel possessiones non fuerint divisæ aut metaliter per usum & dominium segregatæ.

De terris per fluviorum vehementiam distractis quid sciendum sit. lxxxvii.

Item quia plurimarum civitatum, villarum ac possessionum multorumque opidorum & prædiorum metæ ac cursus metales fluviorum & aquarum fluvialium distinctione cinguntur pariter & clauduntur per huiusmodi autem fluvii inundationem atque vehementiam magnæ sæpenumero terrarum, pratorum & silvarum particulæ scinduntur & ad partem alterius vicinæ civitatis aut oppidi vel possessionis segregantur & accedunt. Impetus enim & vehementia fluminis de suo solito cursu alveoque & meatu in alium novum meatum sæpenumero vergi dilabique solet. Unde nonnulli putaverunt & opinati sunt eiusmodi terras, prata vel silvas quæ scilicet ex ipsius aquæ cursus meatusque seu alvei transmutatione in partem alterius vicinæ civitatis oppidique vel possessionis ceciderint & segregatæ fuerint ad eandem civitatem aut oppidum vel possessionem postea spectare pertinereque debere allegantes & astruentes metas suas per cursum meatumque & alveum fluminis dirigi. Quod tenendum non est. [§1] Nam hoc modo plurimæ fraudes committi, & aquæ seu flumina per occulta canaliam ac fossata interdum satis exigua vel aggerum positionem & repleturam in eum quem quis mallet locum & alveum deflui terræque & silvæ aut prata alterius facilime per hoc usurpari possent. [§2] SIC ITAque contraria opinio intelligenda est quod ex quo fluvialis seu fluminis præsertim vero navigabilis proventus magnæ estimationis censetur. Ideo quocunque aqua seu fluvius labatur & defluat civitas aut oppidum vel possessio illa de cuius territorio in alterius terram seu territorium verget aut divertet nunquam per hoc suis proventibus puta molendinis, vadis, vectigalibus, piscaturis aliisque utilitatibus privabitur, sed quemadmodum prius dum fluvius in suo vero solitoque. & antiquo meatu currebat ita etiam tunc, cum in alium novum iam alveum declinaverit liberam plenariamque suis proventibus & utilitatibus fruendi & utendi habet facultatem. [§3] Verum tamen silvæ prataque & terræ solummodo illius erunt cuius prius erant. Et qui pacificum eorum dominium habebat hinc est quod nonnulli aggeres & repleturas pro defensione terrarum suarum & pratorum aut silvarum in terris & territoriis aliorum facere tenereque permittuntur, ne scilicet in propriis terris & territoriis per aquarum inundationem aut vehementiam damna patiantur. Per hoc tamen alienas huiusmodi terras pro se vindicare non intelliguntur. [§4] Simile est de molendinorum aggeribus & repleturis super decursum illorum fluviorum, quorum medietas uni & altera alteri possessori vel villæ deservit constructorum quarum finis licet in terris alterius adiaceat adiacereque de iure permittatur (dummodo huiusmodi repletura damnum apertum alteri parti afferre non videatur) tamen per hoc nec fluvius nec terra alterius usurpatur sed vero domino suo semper reservatur.

Quid sit ius Quartalicium diffinitive, et quibus solvi debeat. Tit. lxxxviii.

PRæhabita iurium possessionariorum tum perpetuitatis iure tum vero pignoris titulo conservationis sed & metalium Reambulationum rectificationumque descriptione iam consequenter super quarta puellari seu iurium Quartalitorum necnon dotum & rerum Peraffernalium solutione restitutioneque disserendum est. [§1] UBI scias quod ius Quartaliticium est ius possessionarium puellis & mulieribus de bonis ac iuribus paternis hæreditariis in signum parentelę propagationis non perennali vel hæreditaria sed redemptibili lege conditioneque deputatum. [§2] QUARE autem iura possessionaria paterna servitiis acquisita ius fœmineum non concernant & filiæ de illis cum filiis pariter & hæredibus legitimis portiones habere nequeant, & quibus de possessionibus portiones hæreditarias habere debeant superius ubi de successione hæredum in bonis paternis fienda descriptio facta est expresse reperies.

De modo solutionis iurium Quartalitorum seu quarte puellaris. Tit. lxxxix.

ADvertendum est autem quod quisque baro, magnas vel nobilis sive unam, sive decem vel plures habeat filias una solutione quartę puellaris eas absolvere poterit, ita videlicet ut universa iura possessionaria paterna simul cum cunctis suis utilitatibus & pertinentiis quibuslibet in quatuor rectas & coequales segregantur partes quarum quarta pars in sortem scilicet Quartalitorum cedens communi estimatione mediante limitabitur & estimabitur iuxta cuiusquidem estimationis seriem super eodem Quartalicio omnibus filiabus una & eadem solutione pecuniaria tamen & non rerum venalium satisfactio impendi debet. [§1] PROPRIETAS autem & hæreditas huiusmodi quartę partis una cum cæteris partibus seu portionibus filiis & hæredibus perpetuo remanebit. [§2] QUÆLIBET autem filiarum poterit seorsum si voluerit Quartaliticium suum repetere. Verumtamen hæredes, a quibus repetitur, cauti esse debent, ne uni tantum solvant, quod pluribus solvere tenentur.

Quod si uni filiarum quarta puellaris data fuerit, altera adhuc super hereditate contendere poterit. Tit. lxxxx.

SI vero uni filiarum absque strepitu iuris productioneque litterarum ac litteralium instrumentorum factum iurium possessionariorum paternorum tangentium quarta puellaris persoluta fuerit altera nihilominus filiarum (si voluerit) super proprietate seu hæreditate eorundem iurium possessionariorum paternorum poterit in iudicio cum eo, cuius intererit contendere & utrum iura ipsa sexum fœmineum sequantur nec ne experiri.

Quod puelle in capillis constitute Fassiones facere non possunt. Tit. lxxxxi.

VERum quia puellæ plerumque animi levitate seducuntur ideo in capillis existentes si etiam legitimam & perfectam attigissent ætatem nunquam Fassiones perennes vel etiam temporales sibipsis aut successoribus vel fratribus earum præiudicantes facere possunt. [§1] HINC est etiam quod puellæ ipsæ ad tutelam fratrum minoris ætatis non admittuntur, neque tutorum officia ex regni consuetudine gerere permittuntur.

Qualiter puelle infra tempus maritacionis earum: in domo paterna maneant. Tit. lxxxxii.

QUo vero pacto puellę quæ capillos adhuc velamine nudatos gestant decedentibus earum genitoribus in paternis laribus iuribusque possessionariis usque ad nobiles ipsarum annos permanere & qualiter de illis tandem exmaritari debeant superius ubi de bonis per defectum seminis decedentium impetratis tractatum est manifestum habes documentum. [§1] QUALITER autem quarta puellaris estimari debeat & quid castrum, quid curia nobilitaris, quid sessio Iobagionalis &c. valeat, in serie estimationum infra clare patebit.

Quid sit dotalitium diffinitive & quid Paraffernum. Tit. lxxxxiii.

ITEM super solutione dotum & rerum Paraffernalium id occurrit animadvertendum quod quanquam dos (unde dotalitium descendit) ac Donatio & Paraffernum longe differant nos tamen confuso vocabulo dotem & Donationem simul permiscentes, dotalitium vel solummodo dotem dicimus & est quæ uxori propter eius deflorationem & concubitum de bonis mariti datur. [§1] Paraffernales autem res dicimus omnia bona mobilia quæ mulieri aut per maritum, aut parentes, vel fratres sive etiam alios quoscunque tempore solennitatis nuptiarum aut desponsationis vel subarationis eius dantur. [§2] Unde sciendum quod de regni nostri veteri approbataque consuetudine dotalitium est merces fœminarum legitime coniugatarum ob debitum matrimonii de bonis & iuribus possessionariis maritorum iuxta status illorum exigentiam dari consueta. [§3] Nam secundum status & dignitatis maritorum præminentiam ac bonorum & iurium possessionariorum eorundem quantitatem variatur fitque solutio Dotalitiorum verbi gratia relicta baronis plus consequitur ratione Dotalicii quam relicta unius magnatis. Itidem relicta nobilis centum vel quinquaginta colonos possidentis plus nomine Dotis assequitur, quam alterius nobilis cui minor fuerit colonorum numerus. [§4] Si enim maritus officium baronatus gesserit tunc mulier ipsa centum marcas, Si vero magnas vel baro solo nomine fuerit & officio Baronatus caruerit aut insignis nobilis vel miles extiterit & quinquaginta sessiones Iobagionales populosas vel plures habuerit relicta eius quinquaginta marcas pro Dote sua consequitur. Marcam quamlibet per quatuor florenos Hungaricales aut quadringentos denarios præsentis monetę computando. [§5] Relictę autem aliorum inferioris status & conditionis nobilium de bonis & iuribus maritorum possessionariis secundum magis & minus iuxta scilicet bonorum quantitatem estimatione communi mediante (exclusis agris silvisque & pratis ac aliis pertinentiis et proventibus bonorum exterioribus) Dotes suas rehabere poterunt. [§6] Mortua vero muliere qui sibi in linea consanguinitatis propinquior erit Dotalitium eius requirendi sibi que vendicandi habet facultatem.

Qui sint et intelligantur ex officio veri barones regni. Tit. lxxxxiiii

NE autem super officiis & nominibus baronatum dubium suboriri possit eorum nomina hic inserenda existimavi. [§1] Sunt Itaque veri barones quorum ab antiquo nomina decretis & litteris Confirmationalibus regiis inseri consueverunt: [§2] Palatinus regni Hungarie, Iudex curie regię, regnorum Dalmatię, Croacię & Sclavonię Banus, waywoda Transsilvanus &

Siculorum comes, Banus Zewriniensis, nam Machoniensis Banatus per Thurcos nostro ævo deletus est. Item Thavernicorum, Ianitorum, Pincernarum, Dapiferorum ac Agazonum regaliū & reginaliū magistri necnon Themesiensis & Poseniensis comites. [§3] Horum omnium relictis pro earum Dotibus & rebus Paraffernalibus centum (ut præmissum est) marcæ per eos, quorum intererit dari solent atque debent.

Quod Dotalitiōrum solutiō partim pecuniis, partim rebus venalibus fieri debet, et quales sint res venales. Tit. lxxxv.

Dotalitiōrum autem solutiō partim pecuniis numeratis, partim vero rebus mobilibus & venalibus iuxta tamen verum precium & valorem earundem rerum fieri semper solet. [§1] Exclusa tamen vestium sartitarum ac armorum & equorum boumque ac aliorum pecorum claudorum estimatione. Quę in sortem solutiōnis Dotalitiōrum non acceptantur. [§2] Res autem mobiles & venales in hac parte tales esse debent quę in foro quotidiano vendi possunt prout sunt oves, boves, equi, caprę, vaccę, vituli & porci qui se movere de loco in locum commode possunt.

Quod mulier a primo marito integram, et a secundo mediam Dotem habet, et unde Dotalitia solvuntur. Tit. lxxxvi.

Item advertendum est quod quęlibet fœminarum a primo marito ratione floridę virginitatis, in qua nuptui tradita fuit, integram Dotem, a secundo vero post deflorationem scilicet nubendo mediam dumtaxat Dotem, a tertio quartam partem, a quarto octavam solum partem Dotis habet. [§1] Siquę autem etiam quinto vel sexto marito nupserit Dos sua in tantum minuetur ut admodum exigua sit futura. [§2] Solvuntur autem Dotalitia mulieribus de bonis & iuribus possessionariis maritorum, ad quę fuerint traductę. [§3] Nam de iuribus paternis non Dotem, sed Quartalitiū habere debent. Nisi forsitan aliqua earum Dotalitiū matris vel avię suę requireret quod de iure facere poterit si Expeditoria super eo prius non fuerit data.

Qualiter Dotalitiū et Quartalitiū simul queri poterit. Tit. lxxxvii.

Sciendum est tamen quod Dotalitiū matris & avię simul una & eadem persona quærere non potest. [§1] Nam si matris meę Quartalitiū quæro tunc Dotalitiū avię meę quærere debeo. Quia mater matris meę avia mea est. [§2] Si autem sola mater mea Quartalitiū suum de iuribus paternis quærit tunc ipsa Dotalitiū matris suę & non avię quærere debet. Nam avię eius Dotalitiū illius generationis & quidem propinquioris est quærere de cuius prosapia mulier illa processisse dinoscitur.

Quomodo fœmine de bonis maritorum eici possunt, et quomodo non, et de rebus eorum mobilibus.

Titulus. lxxxviii.

Item universę res mobiles mariti sine liberis atque sine testamento defuncti cuiuscunque maneriei existant & quocunque nomine censeantur ad suam uxorem devolvuntur [§1] quę de bonis & iuribus possessionariis domoque, residentię & curia mariti quamdiu sub nomine & titulo defuncti mariti viduitatis tempora peregerit & ad alia vota se non transtulerit etiam cum restitutione Dotis suæ excludi non poterit. [§2] Postquam tamen maritata nuptaque cuiuspiam fuerit tunc ille ad quem bona & iura possessionaria mariti defuncti iure hæreditario successorioque devoluta fuisse dinoscuntur mulierem ipsam restituta primum eius Dote de eisdem bonis eiciendi & excludendi plenariam habet auctoritatem. [§3] Immo si bona & iura possessionaria viri ipsius præmortui adeo copiosa fructiferaque fuerint ut Dotalitium uxoris longe excedere videantur tunc is in quem bona ipsa derivabuntur, poterit mulierem illam si etiam nomen & titulum mariti sui gereret de reliqua parte bonorum quæ scilicet estimationem Dotis suæ præcellere & excedere videbitur iuris ordine coram suo iudice excludere & tantum dumtaxat sibi ad utendum de iuribus illis possessionariis deputare quantum Dotis quantitas postulabit. [§4] De loco tamen & domo, curiaque solite residentiæ mariti excludi mulier ipsa nequibit nisi forsitan domus ea castrum fuerit, quod sibi non conceditur sed domus alia mariti extra castrum alicubi sita ad habitandum eidem deputabitur. [§5] Secus est de illis qui multa habent atque possident castra pro loco habitationis deputata. Nam hoc casu etiam mulieri castrum deputari poterit habitandum.

De divisione rerum mobilium mariti inter relictam et liberos ac fratres eiusdem. lxxxxix.

UBi autem maritus decedens filios & filias simul cum uxore necnon fratribus indivisis in domo sua post obitum suum reliquerit tunc primum portio defuncti a portionibus fratrum indivisorum super extantum in cunctis rebus mobilibus dividi ac sequestrari debet. [§1] Deinde vero omnes res mobiles ipsius mariti præmortui quocumque nomine censeantur inter uxorem ac filios & filias eius communiter dividuntur, & in tot partes quot personæ sunt in domo nondum divisæ vel emaritate sequestrantur ac unicuique portio sua restituitur dempto eo quod equos curriferos & vestem potiore[m] mariti defuncti domina relictæ illius per se tollet. [§2] Arma vero militaria sine divisione filiis aut fratribus indivisis cedent. [§3] Illis autem omnino deficientibus non solum ea sed & omnia bona mobilia (prout iam premissum est) in eius relictam (nisi forsitan super eisdem maritus testamentum fecerit) devolvuntur. [§4] Filios autem hoc in loco cum patre defuncto nondum divisos, Filias vero de bonis suis nondum nuptui traditas & emaritas intellige. Nam post divisionem filii & post connubium filiæ portionem de huiusmodi rebus & bonis mobilibus paternis habere non possunt.

De Paraffernis et rebus cum sponsa ac tempore nuptiarum sponse datis. Tit. c.

NOTandum tamen est quod vestes & aliæ quælibet res cum sponsa per parentes vel fratres aut alios quospiam tempore (ut prænotatum est) solennitatis nuptiarum aut desponsationis vel subarationis eius date (quas nos res Paraffernales dicimus), mortuo marito sine liberis eidem sponsæ hoc est uxori (si quæ ex illis restabunt) simul cum dote sua salvæ manebunt restituere debebunt. Nec tempore divisionis aliarum rerum mobilium huiusmodi res secum traditæ divisioni subiacebunt. [§1] Immo si etiam liberos, filios videlicet & filias habuerit & ad secundas nuptias forsitan se mulier ipsa transtulerit vel aliter cum eisdem liberis suis cohabitare noluerit libere res illas pro se retinebit. [§2] Sponsa vero sine liberis & testamento defuncta res ipsas parentes eius vel fratres propinquiores recuperare sibi que vindicare possunt. [§3] Liberos tamen si post se reliquerit ad illos devolventur. [§4] Res autem per sponsum sponsæ aut pro honore nuptiarum, aut pro subaratione traditæ decedente (antequam convenirent) sponsa nunquam per sponsum recuperari poterunt. Verum tamen post copulam carnalem si sine liberis & intestata (nam testamentum super illis facere potest) ab hoc sæculo decederet apud maritum manebunt.

De equis equatilibus defuncti ad quinquagenarium usque numerum. ci.

Item hoc quoque advertendum est quod si maritus equos gregales quos equatiales dicimus infra quinquagenarium numerum habuerit stante & durante coniugio suæ uxoris aggregatos vel emptos æqualiter inter eos dividuntur. [§1] Immo si etiam ante coniugium ad manus mariti equi huiusmodi equatiales devenissent dumodo numerum quinquagenarium non attigissent pariter dividi & communes esse debebunt. [§2] Si tamen eundem numerum attigerunt vel excesserunt tunc maritus poterit de eisdem tanquam rebus per eum acquisitis testari. Sed si super eisdem intestatus decesserit circa hæreditates filiorum computabuntur. VERUM tamen si aviti fuerint tunc testatio quoque de eisdem non tenebit neque locum habebit nisi quantum ad portionem mariti testantis cederet quod de iure fieri permittitur. [§3] Reliqui tamen cum iuribus possessionariis pariter ad filios vel fratres indivisos & alios successores legitimos derivabuntur atque pertinebunt cum quibus solutio Dotalitiorum & Quartalitorum fieri debebit ne pretextu eiusmodi solutionis cogantur successores hæreditates suas alienare qui & alioquin filias de iuribus paternis emaritare nuptiisque tradere tenebuntur. [§4] Et hoc si filia portiones de rebus mobilibus paternis post eius obitum non tulerunt. Nam hoc modo portiones huiusmodi ad maritatem cedent, insuper & Quartalia sua rehabebunt.

De iuribus possessionariis mariti durante coniugio uxoris comparatis. cii.

Item ulterius sciendum quod si etiam durante coniugio maritus quispiam possessiones & iura possessionaria præcio comparaverit & nomen coniugis in litteris Fassionibus inseri non fecerit tunc de talibus possessionibus ac iuribus possessionariis (& si emptitiis) mulier ipsa pro se portionem habere non poterit. [§1] Verum si voluerit, & nomen titulumque mariti sui præmortui gesserit semper vita sua comite in bonis ac iuribus possessionariis filiorum ac filiarum residere permanereque libere valebit. Sub conditione tamen superius in articulo QUOMODO fœminæ de bonis maritorum eici possunt plane declarata. Dico autem filiarum si bona illa ius quoque fœmineum secuta fuerint. [§2] Ubi enim ad secundas nuptias mulier se transtulerit restituta dote sua de illis per eum cui competet eici & excludi poterit. Qui enim per iura hæreditaria uxori suæ cupit complacere studeat nomen eius in emptionis & Fassionis serie ponere. [§3] VERUM si iura Impignorantia maritus ipse defunctus quocunque tempore ante scilicet coniugium vel in coniugio sibi obligata post obitum suum reliquerit etiam si nomen uxoris seu uterque sexus hæredum in litteris Obligatoriiis & Impignorantiis non contineatur æqualiter tamen inter coniugem filios filiasque vel fratres indivisos instar aliarum rerum mobilium dividuntur. [§4] Quoniam iura Impignorantia redemptibilia sunt quæ post redemptionem in pecunias convertentur. Pecuniæ autem inter bona mobilia computantur. Et hoc si huiusmodi iura Impignorantia postea in hæreditates conversa non fuerint.

Quod mulier de bonis mariti etiam pignori per eum obligatis dotem suam rehabere potest. ciii.

Sciendum deinde est quod si maritus mulieris necessitate forte ingruente (prout sæpenumero fieri solet) iura sua possessionaria alteri cuiquam Impignoraverit maxime absque uxoris suæ consensu tunc mortuo marito poterit mulier ipsa dotem suam ab eo, qui iura huiusmodi possessionaria pignori tenet requirere pariter & rehabere. Quoniam Impignoratio non excludit proprietatem & perpetuitatem iurium ipsorum possessionariorum. [§1] Alioquin enim si mulier ipsa redemptionem illorum expectaret nec prius dotem suam assequi posset. Interim forsitan quoad redemptio fieret ex humanis decederet & sic dote sua fraudaretur. [§2] Attamen tempore redemptionis eorundem iurium possessionariorum ille ad quem redemptio ipsorum spectabit non solum super capitali summa pro qua utpote Impignorata fuerant sed etiam super solutione eiuscemodi restitutæ dotis satisfactionem impendere tenebitur.

Quod Dotalitium uxoris pro maleficio mariti non amittitur. Tit. civ.

PRęterea si iura possessionaria mariti pro eius maleficio aut etiam per notam aliquam infidelitatis eiusdem iuridice occupabuntur (etiam si maritus capite plecteretur) uxor ipsa nihilominus dotem suam ab eo qui iura ipsa possessionaria possidebit semper recuperare valebit.

Quod mulier in adulterio deprehensa perdit Dotalitium, sed non res paraffernas. Tit. cv.

ADvertendum insuper est quod si mulier violata fide qua marito suo tenetur adulterium commiserit & in adulterio deprehensa divortium tandem subsequutum fuerit perdit ipsa dotem suam sed non res Paraffernales hoc est res secum tempore nuptiarum per parentes aut fratres vel virum suum sive etiam alios quospiam datas. [§1] Verum si post adulterium maritus mores eius scienter approbaverit cum ipsa cohabitando & concumbendo tunc etiam Dotem suam recuperabit, & postea neque necem illi propter adulterium (si etiam secundo peccaverit) maritus inferre valebit quam prima fronte ubi scilicet ad noticiam eius adulterium devenit libere, iureque inferendi habebat facultatem. [§2] Ubi autem ipsa mulier ob huiusmodi adulterium iuridice extremo supplicio mulctata fuerit fratres eius solummodo res Paraffernales & non Dotalitium eius recuperare poterunt. Et hoc si liberos non habuerit, aut testamentum de illis non fecerit. Nam hoc modo ad liberos suos devolventur, vel testamentariis ipsis cedent.

De matrimonio inter consanguineos scienter vel ignoranter contracto. cvi.

ITem si inter virum & uxorem propter consanguinitatem vel affinitatem ignoratam divortium factum fuerit tunc fœmina tam Dotem quam res Paraffernales a viro rehabebit, soboles etiam ipsorum stante coniugio procreatæ in bonis & iuribus utrorumque parentum possessionariis iure successorio permanebunt. [§1] Per hoc tamen non est intelligendum quod uterque sexus æque succederet sed si bona ipsa iuri solummodo masculino deserviunt ad filios dumtaxat spectabunt. Si vero utrunque sexum sequuntur tunc & filii & filiaæ æqualiter succedunt. [§2] Attamen si scienter & contra prohibitionem fratrum vel eis succedere debentium matrimonium contractum & tandem divortium sequutum vel non sequutum fuerit, soboles durante matrimonio generatæ in bonis & iuribus possessionariis eorum parentum succedere non possunt sed ad fratres generationales vel alios succedere debentes eo facto devolvuntur. Quas etiam si Papa legitimaret tamen ad successionem bonorum (quæ ad fratres generationales & illis non existentibus regiam maiestatem respiciunt) ipsa legitimatio locum non haberet. Mulier præterea Dote sua carebit res Paraffernales solummodo suas a marito suo rehabere valebit.

Quomodo noscitur matrimonium inter consanguineos scienter contractum. cvii.

SCientia autem coniugum apparebit ex hoc si matrimonium illud reclamantibus & contradicentibus fratribus vel aliis ad quos successio spectat aut in tali propinquo gradu consanguinitatis fuerit contractum quod eorum eis utrisque notoria fuisset. [§1] Consanguinitas enim secundum sacros canones & regni quoque nostri legem usque quartum gradum inclusive connubium prohibet atque vetat.

Quod ignorantia legitimas, scientia vero illegitimas proles inter consanguineos generat. Tit. cviii.

INde sequitur quod ignorantia in hac parte legitimas, scientia vero illegitimas ad successionem bonorum immobilium utrorumque parentum proles generat atque producit & illegitimas proles quantum ad successionem prædictam. [§1] Neque summus (ut præfertur) pontifex, neque etiam noster princeps in præiudicium & contra voluntatem filiorum legitimorum & aliorum de iure succedentium legitimare potest nisi in casu quo filiis aut fratribus non existentibus successio directe ad principem nostrum spectaret. Nam in eo casu cuicumque & qualitercunque voluerit ipse princeps liberam super illis bonis & iuribus possessionariis disponendi habet potestatem.

Qualiter uxor Dotalitium suum marito suo relaxare potest. cix.

ITem quanquam durante matrimonio uxor Dotem suam marito (ut communiter) triplici de causa relaxare solet. PRIMO si maritus bona suæ coniugis quorum successio non respicit neque cadit in virum suum ampliaverit & augmentaverit. SECUNDO si expensas necessarias etiam alio modo bonis in illis vir fecerit. TERTIO si uxor marito suo ut prætextu Dotalitii sui ipsa decedente saluti animæ suæ consulat, commiserit vel aliter super illo disponendum ordinaverit. Tamen iuxta modernorum consuetudinem etiam præmissis causis cessantibus poterit mulier ipsa viro Dotalitium maxime in mortis articulo quando de metu & timore viri suspitio tollitur relaxare. [§1] Secus est tamen si uxor in humanis agens & sana existens per maritum metu & terrore ad relaxandum sibi cogeretur. Nam in tali casu facta per mulierem super ea re legitima reclamatione atque retractatione, relaxatio huiusmodi & Fassio quoque inde celebrata locum non habebit.

Quomodo maritus uxori et econtra a consors viro super bonis suis Fassionem facere potest. Tit. cx.

CAeterum quamvis opinione multorum maritus uxori & econtra uxor marito super bonis & iuribus suis possessionariis aut ob inmensum & eximium erga coniugem viri amorem aut mulieris a marito timorem nec perennali neque Impignoratio iure Fassionem facere queat, de veteri tamen & approbata lege huius regni nostri tam maritus uxori quam etiam uxor viro de & super cunctis iuribus suis possessionariis potissimum per sese acquisitis vel aliter obtentis quibus videlicet etiam alteri ignoto vel alienigenæ de iure sub conditionibusque de venditionibus & alienationibus bonorum superius expressis & declaratis disponere Fassionemque facere posset, liberam disponendi & perennem Fassionem celebrandi atque faciendi habet facultatem. [§1] Dummodo Fassio huiusmodi non sit in præiudicium filiorum vel fratrum manifeste vergens. [§2] Non sitque coacte & violenter vel timore celebrata. Nam his modis facta per mulierem legitima super ea re reclamazione nullius erit firmitatis. [§3] TITULO autem vel iure Impignoratitio Fassio inter coniuges simpliciter non admittitur nisi manifesta evidentique ex causa & ratione celebretur. Puta uxor aut de paternis aut prioris mariti laribus & domo paratas pecunias sive iocalia, gemmas & monilia vel res aureas aut argenteas palam & ad notitiam multorum ad maritum attulit, maritusque illas & illa aut ad bonorum emptionem vel redemptionem aut piscinarum vel molendinorum constructionem sive domorum ædificationem manifeste convertit. Isto & alio consimili (si scilicet abfuerit dolus omnis) casu Impignoratio & inscriptio ipsa admittenda censetur. [§4] Nam si simpliciter admittenda foret maritus ob amorem & favorem consortis suæ bona sua tanta pecuniarum sæpe summa involveret (si præsertim erga suos successores odio duceretur) ut vix eo decedente successores ipsi ea bona prænotata de manibus uxoris vel cui illa tandem inscriberet eliberare possent. [§5] Et idem est ex parte quoque uxoris ad virum (si rationabilis & evidens causa casusque occurrerit) intelligendum.

De legitima & illegitima puerorum etate, et procuratoria eorum constitutione. cxi.

QUoniam decedentibus & ex hoc sæculo migrantibus dominis, baronibus magnatibusque & nobilibus liberi & pueri eorum in tenera sæpe & illegitima ætate solent remanere & in tutelam educationemque & defensionem aliorum merito de iureque coguntur devenire ideo super ipsorum quoque puerorum tutela & educatione tractare necessario congruit. [§1] Antequam tamen de ipsa tutela tractetur de ætatibus eorundem puerorum aliquid disserendum occurrit. [§2] Ubi sciendum quod liberorum alii sunt perfectæ ætatis, alii imperfectæ. Perfectæ ætatis sunt masculi viginti quatuor annorum. Fœminæ vero iuxta modernorum consuetudinem sedecim annorum. [§3] Imperfectæ autem ætatis sunt, qui infra huiusmodi perfectæ ætatis annos vitam agunt. Et horum alii sunt legitimæ ætatis, alii vero illegitimæ. Legitimæ ætatis (qui & puberes dicuntur) masculi pariter & fœmellæ nostra hac tempestate sunt duodecim annorum. [§4] Licet de nostra veteri consuetudine masculi decimo quarto, fœminæ autem duodecimo eorum anno dicantur esse legitimæ ætatis. [§5] Vocantur autem vel dicuntur legitimæ pro eo quod lites iam cum alio agere & instituere possunt. Omnes autem alii infra hos annos vitam agentes illegitimæ ætatis nominantur. [§6] Quanquam igitur secundum antiquorum usum & consuetudinem masculi quartodecimo ætatis eorum anno procuratores constituere cœperint nostro tamen ævo & iuxta modernorum usum anno ætatis ipsorum duodecimo generaliter procuratores constituere, Anno vero decimo & sexto super debitis ac pignoris titulo anno autem decimo octavo de auro & argento cæterisque rebus ipsorum mobilibus Fassiones facere possunt. Anno tandem vigesimo quarto universa bona & quælibet iura eorum possessionaria vendendi, permutandi & quocunque titulo voluerint alienandi plenariam habent facultatem. Conditionibus tamen super venditione ac alienatione bonorum & iurium possessionariorum superius conscriptis per omnia semper observatis. [§7] PUELLE vero anno nativitatis earum consimiliter duodecimo procuratores constituere, Decimo quarto de debitis ac iuribus Impignoraticis auroque & argento ac aliis rebus mobilibus respondere, Sextodecimo vero anno super Quartalitiis, Dotibus ac cunctis aliis earum iuribus etiam possessionaria datione ipsas concernentibus Fassiones modo præallegato & conditionibus sub prædeclaratis facere & prout libuerit de eisdem disponere possunt. [§8] Dummodo puellæ in capillis existentes & præcipue sub tutela alienorum constitutæ ad Fassionem aliquam ipso sextodecimo anno, vel etiam post peragendam violenta coactione non inducantur. Nam hoc modo postquam nuptui traditæ fuerint Fassionem huiusmodi coactam simpliciter revocandi & retractandi habent auctoritatem, cum potissime sui iuris tunc non fuisse dinoscantur hoc est non in potestate propria constitutæ.

Qui vel que intelligantur sui iuris esse, & de puerorum triplici tutela. Tit. cxii.

SU*i* iuris autem dicuntur esse qui in nullius potestate consistunt. [§1] Virgines autem & puellas quamdiu viro nupserint semper sub alterius tutela & potestate persistere constat. Nam aliter carente tutore puellę ipsę ex ingenii earum levitate facile seduci decipique possent. UNDE merito de tutela & tutoribus puerorum aliquid dicendum congruit. [§2] Ubi notandum quod triplex est tutela scilicet Legitima, Testamentaria & Dativa quę licet diffinitive sit potestas ad tuendum eum qui ob imperfectam ætatem se defendere nequit de iure data atque permissa tamen virtute sui vocabuli defensionem semper designat. [§3] Unde & tutores auctoritatem solummodo defendendi & non alienandi bona pupillorum habent.

De prima tutela, que legitima nominatur.

Titulus cxiii.

TU*t*ela igitur Legitima dicitur parentum pariter & fratrum defensio. Nam si patre præmortuo & matre superstite filius vel filia illegitimę ætatis in domo paterna remanserit mater sua quamdiu titulum & nomen mariti sui præmortui gesserit & ad secundas nuptias se non transtulerit tutelam filii & filię gerere exercereque permittitur. [§1] Et econverso si mater decesserit patre superstite si etiam de ignobili ac rustica progenie pater ipse oriundus fuerit, & iura possessionaria in filium vel filiam non paterno sed materno iure redacta extiterint tutelam bonorum atque etiam liberorum pater & nemo alter exercebit. Maior namque reputatur tutela personę quam bonorum conservatio & hoc infra tempus illegitimę ætatis puerorum. Licet puellas etiam post tempora legitimę ætatis infra maritacionis tempus sub tutela semper esse conveniat prout immediate prænotatum est. [§2] Animadvertendum tamen est quod si pater ignobilis secundam uxorem duxerit & bona pupillorum a priore uxore relicta dilapidare ceperit hoc casu tutela eius cessabit, & in alterum transibit. [§3] VERUM TAMEN pater nobilis existens etiam nepotum suorum (filio decedente) tutelam & provisionem tanquam caput principale supportabit. [§4] NEC id prætermittendum est quod si pupillorum mater separata patrimonia ipsam solam & non maritum concernentia habuerit mortuo marito (si etiam ad secundas nuptias se transtulerit) a tutela filiorum vel filiarum in ea parte mater excludi non debet, ex quo successio bonorum sit causa tutelarum, & ipsa censeatur esse quę debet filios & filias in huiusmodi bonis suis post se relinquere successores & hæredes. [§5] VERUM tamen si filius fratres habeat ad quos successio seu devolutio iurium & bonorum paternorum spectare videatur curam & tutelam eorundem bonorum paternorum frater propinquior & non mater exercebit sicuti de fratrum & consanguineorum tutela infra clarius dicitur.

De secunda tutela, que testamentaria appellatur. Tit. cxiiii.

SE*c*unda tutela dicitur Testamentaria dum videlicet pater in agone constitutus & filios vel filias tenere illegitimęque ætatis existere & fratrem cui onus tutelę congrueret aut non habere aut habere sed illum ad bona sua diripienda aspirare & ex eo suspectum tutorem futurum esse considerans, filios suos vel etiam filias tutelę defensionique cognatorum aut consanguineorum vel sæpe amicorum suorum submittit. [§1] Et hæc tutela non solum ad filios vel filias superstites sed etiam ad postumos & postumas se extendit quę (nisi fratrum carnalium vel uxoris legitima & iusta præpediatur contradictione, & dummodo talibus personis quæ ad tutelam secundum consuetudinem patriæ nostræ admitti consueverunt testatio tutelæ fiat) semper tenet atque valet.

De tertia tutela, que Dativa nuncupatur. Tit. cxv.

Tertia tutela dicitur Dativa quia datur a principe, quæ etiam principis & patronorum tutela nuncupatur. [§1] Et habet fieri quando tam Legitima, quam etiam Testamentaria tutela desinit & deficit hoc est si pater intestatus decesserit & nec fratres nec consanguineos quibus tutela competeret post se reliquerit. [§2] Tutelæ datio ad principem & patronum spectat. Quoniam deficientibus cunctis fratribus qui vigore successionis bonorum onus tutelæ subire debebant mox huiusmodi ius successionis in principem redundabit qui tanquam legitimus & verus ipsorum orphanorum & pupillorum successor ac patronus de tutela ipsorum providere consuevit & de facto ex suscepti regiminis sui officio subvenire debet. [§3] UBI SCIENDUM quod princeps ipse noster præmissis sic stantibus tales tutores orphanis & pupillis ipsis dare designareque debet quos intellexerit ad bona & iura illorum possessionaria non aspirare & in eo comitatu habitare ubi orphani quoque ipsi residentiam personalem habent. Et quod de alienatione vel dilapidatione bonorum eorundem pupillorum per ipsos tutores facienda non timeatur. [§4] DEBENT autem huiusmodi dativi tutores coram comite vel vicecomite si fieri poterit, aliter autem coram uno aut duobus iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus in quo (ut præfertur) pupilli ipsi habitare dinoscuntur. Vel si bona & iura possessionaria eorum multa & magna in diversisque comitatibus sita fuerint & posita coram uno ex iudicibus regni ordinariis vel eorum vices gerentibus (prout videlicet bonorum ac iurium ipsorum possessionariorum qualitas & conditio requirit) super omnibus rebus & bonis ipsorum orphanorum Inventarium & regestum facere ut expleta tutela de omnibus rebus inventis & manibus eorum assignatis & de fructibus quoque bonorum tempore medio perceptis congruam rationem reddere queant. [§5] Quoniam de male dispensatis orphanis illis iam legitimam ætatem agentibus tutores ipsi satisfacere tenentur, et non solum Dativi verum etiam Legitimi ac Testamentarii tutores ad præmissa facienda pariter obligantur. [§6] QUOD AUTEM impuberes seu illegitimæ ætatis pupilli & orphani sub tutela esse debeant naturali iuri rationique consonum & conveniens videtur ut illi qui propter imperfectam ætatem sese defendere nequeunt aliorum tutela defensioneque gubernentur.

Qualiter virilis & qualiter feminei sexus fratres in tutela succedant. cxvi.

SEd ut præmissa clarius innotescant sciendum est quod quia onus tutelæ eo ordine defertur & notatur quo bonorum successio seu iurium possessionariorum devolutio, Deficientibus igitur & non existentibus testamentariis tutoribus ad fratres & consanguineos defuncti hominis in quos videlicet eo hæredibus deficiente bona sua devolvi deberent tutela pupillorum defertur & derivatur. [§1] FRATERnalis autem propagatio duplicem per lineam virilem scilicet & fœmineam descendere consuevit. Fratres itaque per lineam virilis sexus descendentes (qui & agnati nominantur) semper consanguineis & fratribus muliebris sexus (qui etiam cognati dicuntur) in tutela subeunda præferuntur & isti fœminei sexus cognati non aliter nisi deficientibus per omnia fratribus virilis sexus sive agnatis ad tutelam exercendam admittuntur. [§2] Et tunc quoque non aliter nisi bona & iura possessionaria pupillorum & orphanorum utrumque sexum virilem scilicet, & fœmineum aperte concernere manifesteque sequi dinoscantur. [§3] Nam si de bonorum & iurium possessionariorum successione atque devolutione (utrum scilicet illa utrique sexui deserviant vel certe sexum solummodo masculinum concernant) dubitatur tunc cognati ipsi (etiam agnatis non extantibus) ad tutelam non admittuntur ne bonorum ipsorum orphanorum dominium & possessionem sub huiusmodi tutelæ colore pro se vindicare videantur. Unde in hoc quoque casu Dativi magis tutores a principe postulantur.

Quid si iura possessionaria utrumque sexum concernant de tutela faciendum sit. cxvii.

ADvertendum tamen est quod si iura possessionaria pupillorum utrumque sexum aperte sequuntur hoc est si etiam fœminei sexus homines in illis iuribus possessionariis vivente adhuc orphanorum ipsorum patre reale dominium habuerunt tunc de tutela gerenda distinguendum erit. [§1] Aut enim agnati & cognati unius & eiusdem sunt ætatis aut annis & ætate inter se differunt. Si eiusdem ætatis & tutelæ capaces fuerint hoc est viginti quatuor annorum extiterint tunc agnati (prout immediate præmissum est) tutelam ipsam gerere debent. Si tamen cognati maiores & agnati minores annis fuerint interea temporis quoadusque agnati tutelæ capaces erunt cognati sunt ad tutelam gerendam admittendi [§2] licet post tempus legitime ætatis etiam infra perfectam puerorum ætatem viginti quatuor annos modo antelato representantem plerosque fratrum & agnatorum ad tutelam deputatos fuisse recolimus. In casu præcipue quo matrem orphanorum ad secundas nuptias transisse, & per hoc bona eorum desolationi subiacuisse comperimus & eiusmodi quoque tutela in casu præmisso tenet. [§3] INTELLIGENDum tamen semper est tam de agnatis quam etiam cognatis hoc est fratribus virilis & fœminei sexus modo præhabito onus & exercitium tutelæ qui in gradu lineæ consanguinitatis propinquiores orphanis & proximiores annisque & ætate maiores esse dinoscuntur.

Quid sit agnitio & cognatio, vel agnatus & cognatus. Tit. cxviii.

UBi breviter sciendum est quod hoc nomen agnationis non est naturale sed civile nomen, & inventum est iure civili ad differentiam naturalis cognationis ut per hoc diversitas originis masculorum & fœminarum distingueretur. [§1] Ex quo claret quod omnes qui sunt agnati sunt etiam cognati sed non econverso. Quoniam agnitio species est cognationis, cognatio vero generale nomen est tam ad masculos, quam fœminas pertinens. Quamvis agnatio (sicut prætractum est) virilis dumtaxat & cognatio fœminei sexus homines hoc in loco designet.

Utrum testamentaria tuitio destruat legitimam & econverso. cxix.

SEd quæstio suboritur: Utrum testamentaria tutela adimat legitimam, vel econtra Legitima testamentariam? Dicendum quod Testamentaria rite bonoque modo & illis personis quæ ad tutelam de iure admittuntur facta aufert sæpe legitimam sed non semper. [§1] PRO cuius lucidiori notitia & intelligentia advertendum est quod si pater (etiam sui iuris existens) filios suos impuberes & teneræ ætatis talibus personis quæ periuri vel publici aucarii patria lingua lwdas nuncupati aut aliter infames sive proscripti essent, vel notam infidelitatis quovis modo incurrissent (si etiam per virilis sexus lineam de parentela sua descendissent) tutandos committeret quia per eorum huiusmodi infamiam & notam a iure successionis deciderunt ad tutelam in præiudicium fratrum de iure succedere debentium non admittuntur. [§2] SIMILIter si pater filias suas (non existentibus filiis) cognatorum cuiquam in testamento submitteret defensandas huius quoque tutela in præiudicium & periclitationem iurium agnatorum seu fratrum condivisionalium & in bonis suis rite succedentium facta non tenet nec admittenda censetur ne sub colore eiuscemodi tutelæ fratres ipsi iustis eorum iuribus fraudari dinoscantur. [§3] Sæpe namque pater filiis orbatum se cernens amore filiarum captus nedum per tutelam verum etiam aliis exquisitis coloribus & titulis in bonis suis illas in fratrum succedentium præiudicium hæreditare nititur. [§4] ECONTRARIO vero ubi pater fratrum sive agnatorum suorum quempiam ad bona sua novæ divisionis vel alio titulo & colore aspirare vel de facto lites illum inde suscitare cognoverit non obstante successionis & consequenter legitimæ tutelæ iure filios suos cui maluerit protegendos testando committere poterit. [§5] Non tamen cognatis ob rationem superius prædeclaratam. Nisi forte bona & iura possessionaria utrumque sexum manifeste sequantur atque concernant. Nam hoc casu etiam cognatis suis pupillos & filios suos tutandos submittendi habet potestatem.

Duo corollaria notanda de successione Tutoria. Tit. cxx.

EX premissis itaque duo corollaria subinseruntur. PRIMUM quidem quod tutores testamentarii rite constituti cæteris tutoribus videlicet Legitimis & Dativis præferuntur: ita ut primo testamentarii deinde Legitimi & ultimo loco Dativi ad tutelam exercendam admittuntur. [§1] COROLLARIUM secundum quod quia tutela secundum bonorum (sicuti iam prædeclaratum est) devolutionem defertur ideo etiam fratres adoptivi ad quos bona & iura possessionaria cuiuspiam virtute alicuius contractus & regii consensus derivanda sunt eo in semine masculino deficiente & filias habente gerendam ad tutelam tanquam agnati rite succedunt & admittuntur cognatorum quorumcunque iure vel tutela non obstante.

De casibus, in quibus fratres: ad tutelam non admittuntur. Tit. cxxi.

SCIendum ulterius quod quatuor sunt præcipue casus, in quibus agnati seu fratres sive carnales sive uterini, sive condivisionales ad tutelam subeundam non admittuntur. [§1] PRIMUS quando fratrum quispiam caput suum & bona sua amittit prout sunt qui in sententia capitali convincuntur. Quamdiu enim frater ipse gravamini & oneri huiusmodi sententiæ subiectus fuerit tutelam exercere non permittitur. [§2] SECUNDUS casus si villam, quæ ad successionem fraternam mutuo pertinebat sine rationabili & evidenti causa vendendo vel aliter a se alienando amiserit. Si etiam per hoc libertatem capituli retinuerit tunc tutelæ officium amittitur. Nam etiam de dilapidandis & alienandis orphanorum ac pupillorum bonis præsumptio pariter & suspicio de illo per hoc habetur. [§3] TERTIUS casus est si quis fratrum sive agnatorum alieno iuri hoc est potestati se subiecerit vel subici permiserit. Qui enim iuris sui non est alterius tutelam gerere non potest. [§4] QUARTUS casus quando quis notam infidelitatis incurrit, aut de periurio convictus vel aliter infamis effectus sive proscriptus fuerit. Prout enim exinde a iure successionis cecidit ita per hoc tutela quoque deperit.

Quot modis possunt excusari tutores ab onere tuititionis. Tit. cxxii.

NOTandum deinde quod tutores & præsertim Dativi multis modis ab onere tutelæ sese excusare possunt. [§1] PRIMO propter filiorum multitudinem & loci distantiam. Quia variis negotiis incumbere nequeunt. [§2] SECUNDO propter villarum seu possessionum in diversis locis & comitatibus adiacentium multitudinem. [§3] ITEM propter continua bella principum si fuerint milites actu & opere militiam exercentes. [§4] ITEM propter servitium reipublicæ & expeditionem negociorum principum prout sunt Cancellarii, Oratores extra regnum delegati, Magistri Prothonotarii, Provisores curiarum, Administratores proventuum, Dispensatores rerum & pecuniarum & alii consimilia officia gerentes. [§5] ITEM propter insanabilem & incurabilem infirmitatem. Sæpe etiam ob litterarum inscientiam. [§6] ITEM propter capitalem inimicitiam, quam habuerunt adversus patrem pupillorum & itidem habent contra pupillos. [§7] ITEM propter senium quando videlicet sunt ultra sexaginta annos. [§8] ITEM dum imperfectæ ætatis seu minores viginti quatuor annis fuerint ab oneribus tutelarum gerendis sese (si volunt) excusare poterunt.

Quod tutores fideliter tenentur gerere officium tutele, et quot modis fiunt suspecti. Tit. cxxiii.

CONsiderandum demum est quod tutores fideliter & probe debent tenenturque gerere pupillorum tutelam. [§1] Nam aliter si comperti fuerint in suspitione maleque & sinistra tutelam gessisse non solum removentur ab officio & administratione tutelæ verum insuper si in rebus ac bonis pupilli temporalibus suspecti, deprehensi & agniti fuerint ad duplum reddendum pupillo condemnantur. [§2] Si autem in personam pupilli vel causam eius prætextu iurium suorum possessionariorum motam contrarie infideliterque egisse comperti extiterint infamia sempiterna inde sequi debet. De damnis præterea per hoc illatis ad duplum (ut præfertur) reddendum sunt compellendi. [§3] TUTORES autem redduntur fiuntque suspecti pluribus de causis. PRIMO si bona eorum propria stulte consumunt. [§4] SECUNDO si pupillis necessaria vitæ victum scilicet & amictum debite non administrant. [§5] ITEM si nulla exigente causa rationabili ipsos pupillos male tractant. [§6] ITEM si illos bonis moribus non erudiunt vel ipsi tutores malorum morum existunt. [§7] ITEM si sunt nimium pauperes. [§8] ITEM si fuerint capitales inimici patris pupillorum, aut eo decedente sunt iam vel esse volunt solis pupillis hostes manifesti. [§9] ITEM si timetur quod ad bona pupillorum sibi ipsis vendicanda aspirant & ea pro se usurpare contendunt.

Qualiter tutores accusari possunt, et de pupillis furiosis. Tit. cxxiiii.

CAeterum advertendum est quod huiusmodi tutores sive testamentarii, sive alterius generis existant super præmissa suspitione hoc est de crimine malæ dispensationis & dilapidationis rerum & bonorum orphanorum omnes indifferenter sive sint viri sive mulieres, extranei, consanguinei & affines accusare possunt si ob pietatis causam id faciunt. [§1] Pupilli tamen illegitimæ ætatis per se tutores suos accusare nequeunt. Verum adveniente transactaque legitima ipsa ætate ubi scilicet lites iam gerere & instituere poterunt si orphani sane mentis fuerint curatores suos ex consilio proximorum suorum accusare possunt. [§2] UBI sciendum quod postquam filii legitimæ ætatis annos transegerint invitis & non consentientibus eisdem patres eorum tutores illis in testamento substituere non possunt cum illius sint iam ætatis ut se processu iuris defendere queant. [§3] UBI AUTEM volentibus vel forsitan postulantibus filiis post tempora pubertatis per parentes ipsorum tutores assignantur illi iam non tutores sed potius curatores appellantur. Quia tutores impuberibus & invitis, curatores autem puberibus & petentibus dantur. [§4] Et hoc si petentes ipsi compotes sunt rationis. Nam alioquin si filii amentes, furiosi, lunatici vel mente capti fuerint etiam post tempora legitimæ eorum ætatis tutelæ testamentariorum, aut illis non existentibus fratrum sive agnatorum suorum, & illis quoque deficientibus, Dativorum a principe scilicet vel forsitan iudicibus ordinariis in iudicio deputatorum subiciuntur, & illorum provisione simul cum bonis & iuribus eorum possessionariis gubernantur. [§5] QUIQUIDEM tutores in casu necessario & præsertim ad sustentationem illorum cedenti tam onera eorum super se assumere quam etiam de bonis eorum prout necessitatis conditio postulabit disponere possunt, ea tamen alienare non possunt.

Quod princeps etiam extra terminos iudiciorum de tutore providere potest.

Titulus cxxv.

CUM itaque onus tutelæ pium opus sit accusatio tutorum de suspitione etiam extra terminos Octavales & Brevium iudiciorum semper dum suspitio occurrit libere fieri & ad principem sive regiam maiestatem deferri poterit ne bona pupillorum male & inutiliter consummantur. [§1] Et postquam aliquis tutorum de suspitione ipsa hoc est de crimine malæ dispensationis & dilapidationis bonorum orphanorum accusatus fuerit mox illi administratio tutelæ & omnium bonorum pupillorum per principem interdicitur et infra decisionem causæ ad manus communes illa dantur & assignantur. [§2] UBI autem tutor ipse suspectus priusquam cognitio suspitionis terminaretur ab hac luce decederet tunc conditio pœnaque suspitionis extinguitur quidem attamen hæredes & successores eiusdem tutoris rationem super malè dispensatis rebus dare tenentur, & ad satisfactionem compelluntur. [§3] SI VERO tutorum quispiam tutelam & officium tutelæ fraudulenter gerere & administrare deprehendatur, etiam si satisfacturum vel satis daturum se offerat & super ea re fideiussores etiam promittat atque ponat nihilominus tamen removendus est ab officio tutelæ & alius per principem bonæ famæ & conditionis tutor loco illius assignandus atque substituendus. OBLATIO enim satisfactionis tutoris propositum malum non tollit & animum iterato male agendi non evitat quin potius voluntatem diutius grassandi in rebus & bonis pupillorum præstat atque demonstrat super his autem providere remediumque adhibere ad solum principem spectat.

Quod tutores in cunctis causis pupillorum procedere possunt. Tit. cxxvi.

ITEM hoc quoque non prætermittendum est quod cum tria sint genera tutorum videlicet legitimi testamentarii & Dativi super eorum tutela testimonium evidens in iudiciis produci debet. [§1] Quod postquam productum fuerit & sese tutores esse docuerint in cunctis causis, differentiis & earum processibus & aliis negotiis orphanorum & pupillorum tam coram iudicibus regni ordinariis, quam etiam alias ubilibet vigore litterarum Revisionalium usque ad tempora legitimæ ætatis eorum procedendi & omnia rite expediendi habent auctoritatem [§2] sine quorum scitu & consensu pupilli ipsi nec procuratores (adveniente legitima ipsorum ætate) constituere debent. Nec etiam Fassiones aliquas infra tempus pupillaris ætatis eorum facere possunt. Qui si procuratores constituerent aut Fassiones interea facerent nullius erunt firmitatis omnino.

De etatibus pupillorum revidendis et litteris inde Revisionalibus. cxxvii.

Ætates autem pupillorum per iudices ordinarios regni vel eorum Prothonotarios aut in locis testimonialibus hoc est Capitularibus vel Conventualibus revideri, metiri & discuti solent. [§1] Et huiusmodi revisioni (dummodo litteræ super ea re Revisionales conficiantur) in omnibus iudiciis fides adhibetur. Et earundem litterarum Revisionalium virtute tutores in personis orphanorum tam agere & opponere, quam etiam ad obiecta & proposita respondere semper possunt. [§2] Immo si in causæ cuiuspiam processu pupillos convinci & succumbere agnoscerent pro utilitate pupillorum non autem eorum destructione plenariam cum adversa parte nominibus & in personis eorundem orphanorum concordandi & in unionem (prout negotiorum qualitas exigit) deveniendi habent facultatem.

Quid littere Revisionales valeant, & quomodo Fassionis infra perfectam etatem facte retractari debeant. cxxviii.

CAeterum litteræ Revisionales quæ vim litterarum Procuratoriarum in omnibus negociis & causis habent etiam transacta & expirata pupillari ætate tantum iuvant & conferunt orphanis ut si ipsi muneribus forte corrupti vel blandis sermonibus seducti sine metu & comminationibus aliquorum percussi atque coacti Fassionis perennes super bonis & iuribus eorum possessionariis infra & usque perfectam ipsorum ætatem viginti quatuor scilicet annorum spacia cuicumque, quandocumque & ubicumque facerent conspectis postea ipsis solummodo litteris Revisionalibus poterunt huiusmodi Fassionis per orphanos retractari & in irritum revocari. [§1] ITA tamen si orphani Fassionis illas in consulte sese fecisse perpendentes antequam tempus perfectæ ætatis eorum expleatur easdem coram iudicibus ordinariis regni, vel magistris illorum Prothonotariis, aut in locis testimonialibus ore proprio revocabunt atque retractabunt. [§2] Et eiuscemodi revocatio non solum ibi vel coram eo quo Fassio facta fuit sed etiam in conspectu aliorum iudicum & testimoniorum infra præfixi termini perfectæ videlicet ætatis ipsorum spatium rite semper fieri valebit. [§3] Si tamen interea Fassionis huiusmodi revocare & retractare non curabunt postea Fassionis ipsæ perpetuæ firmitatis robur obtinebunt semperque locum habebunt. Conditionibus tamen in possessionaria venditione requirendis superius prænotatis semper salvis. [§4] Facta vero præmissa revocatione & retractione eiuscemodi Fassionis revocans ipse semper infra tempus Præscriptionis triginta videlicet duorum annorum spatium lites & causas prætextu ipsius revocatæ Fassionis suscitandi habebit facultatem.

Quod orphani in causis contra eos tempore pupillaris etatis ipsorum motis respondere non tenentur. cxxix.

Hinc est etiam quod orphani durante pupillari eorum ætate solummodo per productionem & ostensionem litterarum Revisionalium ab omni causa & lite tempore pupillaris ætatis ipsorum contra eos mota liberantur, [§1] nec coguntur ad instantiam alicuius in processu cuiusvis causæ vel litis sive ratione iurium possessionariorum aut Dotalitiorum vel Quartalitiorum sive actuum potentiariarum vel damnorum aut etiam aliorum quorumcunque negotiorum adversus eos in ipsa pupillari seu illegitima eorum ætate subortæ & suscitata (demptis tamen causis tempore patris ipsorum inchoatis) infra tempus legitimæ ætatis eorum respondere. [§2] VERUM tamen si occasione iurium possessionariorum stante adhuc & durante pupillari & illegitima ipsa ætate causa aliqua per longum litis processum terminari solita contra pupillos exorietur tunc tenebit quidem processus usque ad responsionis terminum sed in ipso responsionis termino virtute litterarum Revisionalium pupillaris vel illegitima ætas orphanorum allegari & causa ipsa per hoc ad primum annum legitimæ ætatis, hoc est ad duodecimum annum orphanorum integrum, quando videlicet iam primo procuratores constituere incipient prorogari differrique debent. [§3] Nam aliter si prius respondere cogentur, vel etiam ex imperitia sponte responderent talis responsio non tenebit, sed simpliciter & de plano retractari valebit.

Quod pupilli in causis tempore patris eorum inchoatis respondere coguntur. Tit. cxxx.

SUPERius autem clausulam hanc: DEMPTIS causis tempore patris orphanorum inchoatis non frustra posui. Quoniam isto casu pupilli quantumcunque parvuli ad omnes causas vivente patre eorum contra se motas & suscitatas respondere & debitum finem in illis facta responsione consequi & habere tenentur. [§1] Et si in processibus eiusmodi causarum iuramentum forte per aliquem pupillorum præstandum iudicaretur depositio eiusdem iuramenti ad primum annum legitimæ ætatis ipsius pupilli prorogabitur prout hac de re limpidius in serie iuramentorum depositionum in secunda parte huius opusculi tractabitur.

Casus quidam in quo pupilli etiam illegitime etatis respondere tenentur. Tit. cxxxi.

PREterea reperitur etiam alter casus in quo pupilli non obstante illegitima & pupillari eorum ætate per tutores suos respondere & prosecutioni causarum in ipsa eadem ætate motarum superintendere tenentur quando videlicet Introductioni & Statutioni vel metali Reambulationi aliquorum iurium possessionariorum per quoscunque factæ nominibus & in personis ipsorum orphanorum contradictionis velamine obviatur. Et ob huiusmodi contradictoriam inhibitionem pupilli ad octavales terminos evocantur. [§1] Nam isto quoque casu, more & instar aliorum legitimæ ætatis hominum processu iuridico observato respondere & rationem contradictionis eorum reddere debent. ET RATIO est quia sponte & proprio eorum motu causæ huiusmodi sese ingerunt. Et quamvis ad alterius instantiam evocentur tamen ipsi magis videntur actores, quam in causam attracti tunc existere qui conantur iuribus alterius partis manifeste resistere. [§2] Nisi enim Statutioni vel Reambulationi & per consequens iuribus partis alterius sponte contradicerent, nusquam eos in litem attraherent. Et ideo non contra eos quin potius per eos causa in hac parte suscitari videtur. [§3] SECUS tamen est si Statutio vel Reambulatio metarum per quempiam in dominium talium terrarum aut bonorum & iurium possessionariorum facta fuerit, quæ pacifice præ manibus orphanorum habentur. Nam hoc casu velint nolint ipsi Statutioni vel etiam Reambulationi contradicere debent. [§4] Aliter enim per taciturnitatem de dominio illorum aut illarum excluderentur & idcirco respondere in hac parte sicuti in prænaratis cæteris causis infra tempus legitimæ ætatis eorum non tenebuntur. [§5] In causis vero ratione bonorum per defectum seminis aliquorum decedentium a principe impetratorum, vel vigore contractuum in quempiam derivatorum motis processus & ordo superius exinde conscriptus atque declaratus observari debet.

Quod evocatores pupillorum in homagiis eorum vincuntur. cxxxii.

SCIendum postremo quod ex quo pupilli usque tempora legitimæ eorum ætatis quando scilicet ab omni tutela liberantur nec cum scitu, nec sine scitu tutorum aliquid facere possunt quia sui iuris non sunt. [§1] Ideo siqui tales orphanos occasione actuum potentiarios (asserendo per ipsos aut de eorum commissione eiusmodi actus potentiarios fuisse patratos) in causam convenerint & attraxerint mox in Homagio illorum (quemadmodum super Evocationum conditionibus in ipsa secunda parte declarabitur) vincuntur.

Quid sit et qualiter fiat bonorum mobilium et immobilium estimatio. cxxxiii.

QUoniam autem ad nonnullorum negotiorum expeditionem pernecessaria est bonorum estimatio, ideo series ac modus eius hic merito subnecti debet. [§1] UNDE notandum est quod iuxta veterem & approbatam huius regni nostri consuetudinem estimatio dicitur bonorum mobilium & immobilium competentis valoris limitata quadam ac statuta taxatio. [§2] Vel aliter, estimatio est rei mobilis & immobilis secundum sui equivalentiam vel valorem taxata quadam limitatio. [§3] Et duplex est estimatio scilicet perennalis & communis. Estimatio perennalis quæ in iuribus dumtaxat possessionariis & non rebus mobilibus fieri solet decies tantum facit quantum communis. [§4] In estimatione namque communi una sessio Iobagionalis populosa pro una marca seu ad unam marcam quatuor florenos facientem, In perennali vero estimatione ad decem Marcas quadraginta florenos continentes computatur. [§5] Quæ perennalis estimatio paucis in rebus, ac causis committitur sed universus fere cœtus dominorum prælatorum ac baronum magnatumque & nobilium estimatione communi (ut plurimum) utitur. Nisi enim in Fassionibus vel obligaminibus quorumpiam estimatio perennalis claro sermone declarata aut in constitutionibus regni publicis expressa fuerit eius usus raro admittitur. Cuiusquidem estimationis series hoc modo sequitur.

- [§6] ITEM castrum lapideum estimatur ad Marcas Centum.
- [§7] ITEM monasterium sive claustum sepulturam patronorum & aliorum specialium nobilium habens, estimatur ad M. C.
- [§8] Ecclesia cum duobus pinnaculis admodum monasterii fundata estimatur ad M. L.
- [§9] Ecclesia cum duabus turribus seu duabus pinnaculis non monasterium existens, vel non per modum monasterii fundata ad M. XXV.
- [§10] Omnes aliæ ecclesiæ matrone cum una turri sepulturam habentes estimantur ad M. XV.
- [§11] Sine turri autem constructæ tamen cum sepultura ad M X.
- [§12] Capella lignea seu sacellum non lapideum sepulturam tamen continens ad M. V.
- [§13] Absque sepultura vero ad M. III.
- [§14] Ecclesiæ autem & capellæ extra Matronam ecclesiam fundatę non ponuntur in serie estimationis.
- [§15] ITEM sessio seu curia nobilitaris populosa ad M. III.
- [§16] Habitatore vero carens ad M. unam cum media.
- [§17] Edificiis autem omnino destituta ad M. I.
- [§18] ITEM sessio Iobagionalis populosa ad M. I.
- [§19] Deserta vero sed ædificia habens ad M. mediam.
- [§20] Edificiis autem penitus carens tamen in ordine aliarum sessionum sita ad quartam partem unius marcæ videlicet denarios C.
Extra ordinem siquidem aliarum sessionum posita pro campo reputatur & in ordine estimationis non computatur.
- [§21] ITEM pomarium nobilium cum adultis & fructiferis arboribus consitum, in uno iugere terrę regalis mensurę adiacens ad M. III.
- [§22] In insula tamen Challockewz quęlibet arbor adulta & fructifera estimatur ad centum denarios usque numerum duodecim arborum ultra vero duodenarium ipsum numerum quot quot sint arbores simul tamen compute estimantur ad M. III.
- [§23] Pomarium vero Iobagionale extra villam habitum ad M I.
Retro autem seu penes sessionem existens non ponitur in estimationis serie.
- [§24] ITEM terra communis vel arabilis ad unum aratrum regalis mensurę sufficiens ad M. III.

[§25] ITEM silva communis de qua decima porcorum vel tributum generaliter non exigitur nec habet aliquem certum proventum estimatur sicut terra communis ad unum aratrum videlicet regalis mensuræ adiacens ad M. III.

[§26] De rubetis etiam & virgultis idem est sentiendum.

[§27] ITEM silva magna quæ alias permissoria dicitur pro communi opere & labore apta infra quantitatem trium aratrorum regalis mensuræ existens quodlibet aratrum ad M. X.

[§28] Ultra vero tria aratra adiacens non estimatur sed ad ipsa solummodo tria aratra reducitur estimanda.

[§29] ITEM silva maior puta dolabrosa & glandifera seu sub dolabro & venatione existens ac pro quolibet opere & artificio valens in spatio vel quantitate trium aratrorum regalis mensuræ adiacens quodlibet aratrum estimatur ad M. L.

[§30] Si vero proventus eius annualis bene potest computari signanter si fuerit glandinosa tunc pro decies tanto estimatur quantum facit proventus suus annualis ultra vero ipsa tria aratra (prout permissoria) non estimatur. [§31] ITEM si terra arabilis non extendit se ad unum vel medium aratrum regale ita videlicet ut si fuerint quinque aut sex vel decem &c. iugera tunc (opinione nonnullorum) quodlibet iugerum estimabitur ad denarios quadraginta & de silva quoque permissionali ac nemore idem dicunt esse tenendum. [§32] Verum tamen hæc limitatio pro communi estimatione accepta respectu præcedentis iusta & recta non videtur sed omnino abiicienda censetur. Nam si terram vel silvam communem ad unum aratrum regale sufficientem ad tres marcas estimabis, & aratrum ipsum ad centum ac quinquaginta iugera regalis mensuræ sequestrabis tunc si bene computabis non plures quam duodecim denarii ad quodlibet iuger terræ cedent & quatuor tantum iugera inestimata manebunt quæ ad quinquaginta denarios se extendent. Quinquaginta autem denarii ad centum & quinquaginta obulos seu quadrantes commode dividi non possunt ideo quatuor illa iugera consideratione maioris partis ut in estimata maneant necesse erit. [§33] In supputatione siquidem silvæ permissoriæ vel nemoris pro communi (ut præfertur) opere valentis ad unum aratrum se extendentis quod ad Marcas decem estimatur quodlibet iuger ad denarios. xxvi. cum obulo taxari vel estimari debeat, & pro superfluo seu residuitate denarios viginti quinque habeat. Si vero aliter ad Marcas summam ipsam dividere volueris tunc quodlibet iuger ad denarios. xxvii estimabitur & tu denarios. vii. superaddere debebis. De prænarata quoque terra idem (si volueris) cum superadditione facere valebis.

[§34] ITEM pratium seu fenetum ad unam falcem sufficiens vel alias in uno iugere terræ regalis mensuræ adiacens ad unum quartale videlicet denarios C.

[§35] Feneta autem in campestribus quæ falcari quidem possunt ratio tamen vel nunquam defalcantur in ordine estimationis non ponuntur.

[§36] ITEM molendinum subtus vel desubter currens & tempore æstus non deficiens ad M. X. Deficiens autem ad M. VI.

[§37] Molendinum desuper volvens & tempore siccitatis non deficiens ad M. V. Deficiens autem ad M. III.

[§38] Locus molendini deserti subtus currentis ad M. III. Desuper autem volventis ad M. unam cum media.

[§39] ITEM fons scaturiens seu puteus effluens & non deficiens in quacunque possessione de quo populus potare solet ad M. duas cum media. Si autem plures fuerint non estimantur sed ad unum solum includuntur omnes, quoniam ad usum unius villæ sufficit puteus unus.

[§40] ITEM piscina effluens & non deficiens ad M. X. Non effluens autem & tempore siccitatis deficiens ad M. V.

[§41] Piscina magna cum clausura existens Gyalmostho vel etiam Morothwa dicta necnon alia piscatura Danubialis, vel Thicialis, sive Zawe, aut Drawe Thanya nuncupata si habet deputatum proventum annualem decies tantum estimatur quantum facit eius proventus

annualis. Si vero computatum proventum non habet prout nos generaliter utimur estimatur ad
M. L.

[§42] ITEM loca sagenarum Weyz appellata usque ad denarium numerum pro singulis marcis ultra vero decem usque centum vel amplius ad
M. X.

[§43] ITEM clausura quæ fit tempore inundationis aquarum Rekez dicta specialem vel singularem proventum habens quelibet ad denarios
C.

[§44] ITEM Tributum tam super aquis quam in terris rite exigere consuetum decies pro tanto estimatur quantum facit proventus eius annualis.

[§45] ITEM Tributum promontorii seu montis vinearum quod computatum & notabile proventum annuatim domino suo terrestri ministrat similiter ad decies tantum estimatur sed hoc in perenni dumtaxat estimatione locum habere censeo. Nam vinee generaliter tanquam rubeta & virgulta de regni nostri antiqua consuetudine estimari solent ex eo quod ubi et postquam cultores vinearum aut defuerint aut earum labores prætermiserint vinee cito defacilique in rubeta & vepres convertentur. [§46] VERUM si rusticum quempiam vel etiam nobilem in territorio alterius vineam habentem dominus terrestris de ipsa vinea eicere & excludere voluerit authoritatem quidem eiciendi habet attamen non estimatione illa communi quæ de virgulto & rubeto immediate prænotata est sed competentem valorem seu condignum precium eius iuxta æquam rectamque limitationem & taxationem iudicis ac iuratorum civium eius loci ad quem ipsum promontorium pertinet illi refundere tenentur.

[§47] Ista mensura sedecis sumpta facit unam mensuram: sive ulnam regalem.

[§48] ITEM unum iuger terræ arabilis aut silvæ regalis mensuræ continet in sua longitudine septuaginta duas in latitudine vero duodecim mensuras seu ulnas regales.

[§49] ITEM unum aratrum continet in se centum & quinquaginta iugera terrarum regalis mensuræ in estimatione rerum.

De iumentorum estimatione.

[§50] Notandum quod unus bos non claudus vel aliter non destructus ad
M. I.

[§51] Duæ vaccæ sine vitulis ad
M. I.

[§52] Una vacca cum vitulo ad
M. I.

[§53] Quatuor oves ad
M. I.

[§54] Quatuor porci ad
M. I.

[§55] Cabella sine poledro ad
M. I.

[§56] Cum poledro masculino ad
M. II.

[§57] Cum poledro fœmineo ad
M. unam cum media.

[§58] Equus sellatus secundum valorem eius estimatur.

Quot modis et quibus respectibus estimationes bonorum et rerum fiunt. Titulus. cxxxiiii.

Sciendum ulterius quod præmissa bonorum mobilium & immobilium estimatio diversis modis diversisque respectibus fieri consuevit. [§1] PRIMO quidem ad solutionem onerum iudicialium quæ communi & usitato vocabulo Birsagia nuncupantur & in illis tam iumenta quam etiam terræ & iura possessionaria iuxta limitationem præscriptam estimari pariter & acceptari debent. [§2] SECUNDO in Quartalitorum & iurium Impignoraticiorum solutione, ac bonorum per sententiam capitalem vel emendæ capitis occupandorum redemptione, in qua

(iumentis exclusis) tamen castra ac curiæ nobiles & sessiones Iobagionales populosæ desertæque & prædiales, quam etiam terræ, silvæ, virgulta, prata, piscinae, molendina, fontes, claustra, monasteria & ecclesiae, necnon tributa, pomaria sagenarumque & clausurarum loca & generaliter omnes pertinentiæ iurium possessionariorum estimandorum modo prædeclarato taxantur. Terræ tamen arabiles & prata ad sessiones Iobagionales populosas spectantes & pertinentia (demptis terris & pratis extirpatitiis, quæ colonos proprie concernunt & non ad sessiones pertinent) non estimantur, & tandem secundum huiusmodi estimationis quantitatem solutio Quartalitorum & iurium Impignoratitorum fieri debet. Et hoc idem est etiam de iuribus possessionariis in præiudicium fratrum vel aliter indebite venditis intelligendum atque tenendum. [§3] TERTIO in Dotalitorum restitutione, in qua solummodo curiæ nobiles ac sessiones Iobagionales populosæ & desertæ atque prædiales in ordine aliarum sessionum sitæ estimantur & extra corpus possessionis nulla in hac parte estimatio admittitur, & demum iuxta eiuscemodi possessionariæ estimationis seriem restitutio Dotalitorum partim pecuniis paratis, partim vero rebus mobilibus etiam iumentis inclusis fieri solet iuxta verum precium eorundem prout videlicet in foro vendi possent acceptari debent. [§4] Hoc tamen advertendum est, quod si qua mulierum mortuo marito suo in bonis ac iuribus eiusdem mariti possessionariis titulum & nomen ipsius ferendo vita sibi comite permanere voluerit & filius vel frater aut alter successor eiusdem mariti legitimus ipsi mulieri ad quantitatem & valorem Dotalicii sui iura aliqua possessionaria vita eiusdem durante possidenda & utenda sequestrare excidereque & dare decreverit, tunc in tali casu non solum curiæ nobiles sessionesque Iobagionales populosæ & desertæ ac prædiales, sed etiam extra villam terræ, silvæ, pomaria ac fœnilia & molendina, quæ mulieri dabuntur, prout in Quartalitorum solutione estimabuntur et tantum dumtaxat sibi de iuribus illis possessionariis quantum se ad valorem ipsius Dotalicii sui extendet deputabitur utendum atque possidendum. [§5] QUARTO in solutione debitorum & refusione damnorum summarie computatorum vel specificè denotatorum. Præterea in depositione oneris facti calumniæ ac emendæ linguæ & violationis sedis iudiciariæ regiæ maiestatis ac comitum parochialium quorumlibet comituum, & aliis eiuscemodi causis ac casibus in quibus pari modo res mobiles & venales iuxta verum earum valorem & non secundum limitationem præexpressam acceptantur. [§6] QUINTO & ultimo in metarum Reambulationibus et Rectificationibus estimatio communis fieri solet. Hoc tamen ultimo modo eo solum respectu estimatio celebrari consuevit ut terræ, silvæ virgultaque vel prata aut promontoria quæ inter causantes in lite manebunt ad quot Marcas sese extendere videbuntur, cum tot nobilibus huiusmodi terras, silvas, virgulta prataque vel promontoria ille cui iuramentum per iudicem præstandum deponendumque adiudicabitur pro se & iuri suo appropriare vindicareque valeat atque possit.

Finis prime partis.

[SECUNDA PARS]

De secunda parte iurium et consuetudinum regni in generali. Titulus primus.

POstquam favente deo de principalibus rebus iurium scilicet possessionariorum Donationibus earumque speciebus, necnon bonorum Divisionibus, Venditionibus, Impignorationibus, metarum distinctionibus, Dotalitiorum & Quartalitiorum solutionibus & aliis ad ea spectantibus et annexis quibus utpote omnium dominorum prelatorum ac baronum magnatumque & nobilium fundatur exordium fulciturque dominium succincte dictum est: in hac iam SECUNDA parte huius opusculi de causarum & litium processibus & exequutionibus ac sententiarum super his ferendarum serie disserendum restat. [§1] Sed antequam ad materiam specialem huius partis explanandam veniam quia constitutio regni huius plerumque interseri debet ideo in generali qualiter constitutio seu generale decretum principis & regni interpretari debeat. Præterea unde consuetudo nostra seu lex non scripta qua hoc tempore communiter utimur initium et originem summat breviter præmittam.

Quot modis generale decretum intelligatur. ii.

CONstitutiones igitur principum sive decreta regni quatuor modis (prout occurrit) considerari possunt. [§1] Quædam enim constitutiones sunt ex toto per posteriores abrogatæ simpliciterque revocatæ. [§2] Aliæ vero partim abolitæ, partim approbatæ. [§3] Quædam autem silentio præteritæ [§4] & quædam introductæ. [§5] In his igitur constitutionibus quæ ex toto sunt deletæ, sicuti iudicium Palatinale, Proclamata congregatio, iudicium Duelli & Trineforensis proclamatio attendendum est tempus abolitionis. Quia futuris & non præteritis causis ac negociis videntur legem imponere, ita quod decetero non fiant huiusmodi iudicia Palatinalia & Duellorum dimicationes, neque proclamatæ congregationes & Trineforenses proclamationes celebrentur. [§6] In causis tamen vigore earundem inchoatis servari debet modus pristinus, quo ipsæ causæ inchoatæ fuisse dinoscuntur, non quantum ad earum iterum celebrationem, sed quo ad processum ipsarum observationem. [§7] Secus esset si per verba in eadem constitutione posita & conscripta leges ac constitutiones huiusmodi traherentur etiam ad præterita. Nam simpliciter constitutiones (ut immediate prætractum est) non ad præterita, sed futura ligant. [§8] SECUNDO vero, quando scilicet partim sunt approbatæ, partim vero abolitæ, innitendum & incumbendum est formis verborum in ipsis constitutionibus & decretis positorum, ut approbata serventur, abolita autem reiciantur & non observentur. [§9] TERTIO, quando priores leges vel constitutiones fuerunt silentio præmissæ, sic quod nulla mentio habeatur de prioribus per posteriores super variatione vel immutatione earundem. Tunc priores leges vigorem habere dinoscuntur, si contrarius usus populi illis non præiudicaverit. Nam usus realis & continuus sæpe tollit legem. [§10] Quarto vero, dum videlicet novæ leges fuerint introductæ. Tunc secundum illas oportebit iudicare, sive sint efficaces, sive mitiores prioribus. Iam enim non poterit iudicari quod bene vel male fuissent constitutæ, sed secundum ipsas oportebit iudicare.

Qui possunt condere leges et statuta. iii.

SEd quæstio occurrit pertractanda: Utrum princeps per se possit condere leges ac statuta, an opus sit, ut populi quoque accedat consensus? [§1] Unde advertendum, quod quamvis olim populus iste Hungarorum dum adhuc ritu viveret gentilium & non regem, sed ducem ac capitaneos haberet directores, omnis potestas condendę legis & constitutionis apud eos fuerit. [§2] Verum posteaquam ad fidem Catholicam sunt conversi, & regem sponte sibi ipsis elegerunt, tam condendę legis, quam etiam cuiuslibet possessionarię collationis atque omnis iudiciarię potestatis facultas in iurisdictionem sacrę regni huius coronę, qua cuncti reges Hungarię coronari solent, & subsequenter principem ac regem nostrum legitime constitutum simul cum imperio & regimine translata est, & sic postea reges ipsi convocato interrogatoque populo constitutiones facere ceperunt prout & temporibus nostris fieri consuevit. [§3] Attamen princeps proprio motu & absolute potissimum super rebus iuri divino & naturali præiudicantibus atque etiam vetustę libertati totius Hungarię gentis derogantibus constitutiones facere non potest sed accersito interrogatoque populo si eis tales leges placeant an ne? qui cum responderint quod sic, tales postea sanctiones (salvo semper divino naturalique iure) pro legibus observantur. [§4] Plerumque autem & populus ipse nonnulla que ad publicum bonum conducere arbitratur unanimi consensu decernit, in scriptisque principi porrigit supplicans super illis leges sibi statui. Et si princeps ipse eiusmodi sanctiones acceptabit & approbabit, tunc vim legis pari modo sortiuntur. Et de facto pro legibus reputantur. [§5] Quę tamen omnia specialiter principis & non populi statuta nuncupantur eo quod nisi utroque modo principis accederet consensus & confirmatio nullius censeretur firmitatis ipsa constitutio. Verum generali nomine constitutiones ipsę sæpenumero regni decreta vocitantur.

Qui nomine populi et qui nomine plebis intelligantur. Tit. iii.

Nomine autem & appellatione populi hoc in loco intellige solummodo dominos prelatos, barones & alios magnates atque quoslibet nobiles, sed non ignobiles; [§1] licet iste terminus populus includat omnes nobiles & ignobiles pariter. De ignobilibus tamen (qui plebis nomine intelliguntur) in hac parte nihil est ad propositum. [§2] Populus enim eo differt a plebe quo species a genere. Nam appellatione populi universi nobiles tam magnates quam inferiores, etiam ignobilibus computatis significantur. Plebis autem nominatione soli ignobiles intelliguntur.

Quos ligant constitutiones & statuta. v.

ULterius si quæratur quos ligant constitutiones & decreta? Sciendum quod primo ligant ipsum principem qui eas populo postulante ædidit. Iuxta illud Patere legem quam tuleris ipse. Secus est de summo pontifice & Romanorum imperatore sentiendum de quibus nulla in hac parte notatur mentio. [§1] DEINde ligant omnes iurisdictioni principis subiectos. [§2] Et non solum illos sed etiam quoscumque forenses in hoc regno degentes. [§3] Verum si constitutio generalis tenderet ad penam vel damnum tunc forensibus dantur indutię trium mensium ut hoc tempus sit eis pro publicatione statutorum. Verbi gratia si decerneretur & constitueretur quod nemo Viennensium aut Wratislaviensium vel aliorum forensium sub amissione capitis & omnium bonorum suorum ad nundinas in hoc regno Hungarię celebrari consuetas cum mercibus suis venire vel autem oves, boves & equos gregatim de regno expellere & abigere auderet tunc infra trium mensium spatium si etiam deprehenderetur talis forensis de iure plecti vel rebus suis spoliari non posset. Quia ipsum ignorantia & non publicatio statutorum excusaret. [§4] SI AUTEM non esset penalis vel damnosa sed iuris alicuius, aut iudicii medela vel prosecutionis causę modus tunc forensibus unicus mensis assignatur. [§5] Interius vero cuiuscunque status, dignitatis & conditionis existant sufficit tempus provulgationis statutorum, & hoc modo nec intranei, nec forenses excusantur. Namque cum fueris Romae, Romano vivito more.

Unde traxit originem consuetudo nostra in iudiciis observanda. Tit. vi.

SCIendum secundo quod quanquam omnia fere iura regni huius originaliter ex pontificii Cæsareique iuris fontibus progressum habeant, municipalis tamen hæc nostra consuetudo qua in iudiciis modo generaliter utimur ex tribus fundamentis constat. [§1] PRIMO ex constitutionibus & decretis publicis. [§2] Secundo autem ex principum privilegiis. [§3] Tertio vero ex iudicum ordinariorum regni sententiis. [§4] PRIMO (inquam) ex constitutionibus publicis cuius rei ut origo altius repetatur advertendum est, quod primus omnium gloriosus ille rex & apostolus noster beatus Stephanus primitias regum Hungariæ qui tulit, quique ad sacræ fidei lumen gentem Hungaricam convertit præclaras ædedit constitutiones, fidei tamen magis rudimenta quam litium fomenta præse ferentes & declarantes. [§5] Deinde sanctissimus rex & confessor noster Ladislaus qui gladio suo Dalmatiam partesque maritimas regno Hungariæ subiecit, quique gentem Tartaricam fines Hungarorum crebris incursionibus invadere consuetam aperto Marte sæpe conterens ab huius regni finibus procul amovit pedemque longe referre coegit leges optimas constituit. [§6] Invictissimus postea rex Andreas tertii Bele regis filius, ac beatæ Elisabeth vidue genitor, quem nos Hierosolymitanum vocitamus post felicem ab expeditione Hierosolymitana quam pro sacræ fidei Catholicæ defensione adversus Saracenos ingenti Hungarorum cum exercitu susceperat reditum super nobilium præsertim immunitate ac prærogativis libertatibus egregias sanctiones præclaraque decreta stabilivit, quæ usque in præsentem diem gens Hungarica tanquam sacra decreta ad usque sidera tollit. [§7] Demum excellentissimi principes domini Ludovicus, Sigismundus, Albertus & Mathias reges Hungariæ temporibus suis certas pari modo constitutiones fecerunt. [§8] Novissime etiam serenissimus dominus noster modernus rex Wladislaus non minus cæteris præstantiores leges condidit cuius memoria Laudabilis apud Hungaros in benedictione semper erit. [§9] Et licet huiusmodi constitutiones, ac leges præsertim sanctorum Stephani & Ladislai regum qui catalogo sanctorum ascribi digne meruerunt vetustate nimia iam pæne sint abolitæ. Qui cum & alioquin magis de divina quam humana lege tractasse dinoscantur reliquorumque subsequentium regum decreta in certis clausulis & articulis mutata variataque habeantur. Tamen ex omnium fere ipsorum divorum regum constitutionibus per longum usum aliquid legis in consuetudinem nostram plus quam per centum annos iam approbatam derivatum traductumque esse dinoscitur. [§10] SECUNDO ex principum privilegiis consuetudo nostra processit quæ cum sæpe rebus ita exposcentibus in iudicio producta legerentur & honeste iusteque (dictante ratione) ædita & confecta fuisse aprobarentur, longum per eiusmodi iudicarium exercitium certa pars nostræ consuetudinis progressum habuit. [§11] TERTIO vero & ultimo ex iudicum ordinariorum regni sententiis litterisque Adiudicatoriis iteratis immo plurimis vicibus uno & eodem ordine ac modo processuque latis & confectis ac exequutione iuridica roboratis consuetudo ipsa emanavit. [§12] Verum tamen processus iste iudiciarius & usus processuum quem in causis inchoandis prosequendis, discutiendis & terminandis observamus regnante ipso domino Karolo rege predicti Ludovici regis genitore per eundem ex Galliarum finibus in hoc regnum inductus fuisse perhibetur qui ad hæc usque tempora (variatis solummodo per publicas constitutiones quibusdam terminis) inviolabiliter semper extitit observatus observandusque est etiam in futurum semper. [§13] Nam aliter totius nobilitatis regni Hungariæ iura novarum legum per inductionem (quoadusque illæ addicerentur in usumque commune traherentur) ut in nihilum redigerentur necesse foret.

Quid sit privilegium diffinitive, et quod duplex est privilegium. Tit. vii.

Item ex quo consuetudo nostra in quadam sui parte ex principum (ut præmissum est) privilegiis sumitur hinc de privilegio aliqua dicenda statui. [§1] Unde sciendum quod privilegium dicitur quasi lex privata & singularis quæ ad unum vel ad paucos pertinet. [§2] Aliter autem privilegium dicitur prærogativum aut honor singularis. Et est principis beneficium sæpe contra commune ius indultum. [§3] DUPPLEX est autem privilegium, scilicet generale & speciale; generale est quod universitati vel collegio prout civitati aut Capitulo vel Conventui conceditur. Et illud est perpetuum. [§4] Speciale autem est quod personæ dumtaxat donatur. Et illud cum persona extinguitur. Nisi forte in eo caveatur quod virtus privilegii etiam ad hæredes & successores ipsius privilegiati derivetur. Nam hoc modo etiam hæredibus ac successoribus eius suffragari dinoscitur.

Utrum decretum tollatur per privilegium et econtra. Tit. viii.

Sed quæri potest (prout ipse quoque sæpe quesitum audivi) utrum decretum seu ius commune tollatur per privilegium & econtra, si privilegium tollatur per decretum? [§1] Quanquam multi multa dicant aliterque & aliter sentiant & pro utraque parte probationes nonnullæ in medium afferri queant. Nos tamen generaliter omnium & omnia privilegia per ius commune seu decretum tolli & invalidari tenemus. In casibus illis quibus expresse facta fuerit in generali constitutione mentio. [§2] Prout habetur in decreto moderni domini nostri regis libertatis civitatis Wissegradiensis, abolitio nonarum a civitatibus liberis exactio & alia huiusmodi. [§3] Quæ & si privilegia super eorum libertate atque novarum exemptione & non solutione pro ipsarum parte dudum habeant confecta, tamen non privilegium sed decretum ac generalis constitutio in hac parte observatur. [§4] Privilegium autem cui non fuerit expresse derogatum per legem vel generale decretum non invalidatur prout superius de consideratione & intelligentia decreti latius habes.

Quod privilegium dupliciter potest attendi et emannari, et primo legitime. viiii.

Duplex est autem privilegii consideratio scilicet in quantum ex mera principis autoritate riteque & legitime procedit. Et in quantum non sed in damnum aliorum vergit vel alias constitutioni communi derogare videtur. [§1] In quantum igitur privilegium ex mera principis autoritate procedit prout iurium possessionariorum Donatio a tributaria tricesimarumque solutione exemptio, Fororum liberorum ac nundinarum generalium Vadorumque & tributorum collatio quæ ad solum principem spectat semper observari debet dummodo iuribus aliorum manifeste non præiudicet. [§2] Et propterea in calce huiusmodi privilegiorum clausula ista semper apponi inserique solet SALVO IURE ALIENO. [§3] Nam si princeps ipse quempiam hominem ruralem vel civitatem a solutione tributorum de presenti eximeret & libertate donaret prius tamen tributariam exactionem iuste fiendam alicui fidelium suorum contulisset tunc per istud posterius privilegium scilicet exemptionale quia priori privilegio super tributo confecto palam præiudicaret primum invalidare & huiusmodi tributariam exactionem tollere non potest. [§4] Verum in bonis & tributis propriis principis qui privilegium donavit exemptio ipsa tenebit atque locum habebit.

Quod privilegium duobus modis intelligitur iuribus aliorum preiudicare. x.

Item de concessionibus quoque Fororum, Nundinarum & Vadorum idem est sentiendum quod privilegia super eisdem ædita semper sunt observanda si in præiudicium iurium aliorum non fuerint collata. Quæ duobus modis possunt iuribus aliorum præiudicare. [§1] PRIMO ratione temporis prout dictum est immediate. Quia prius emanavit privilegium alterius quod non potest tolli per posterius etiam cum clausula derogatoria. [§2] SECUNDO ratione loci. Quia vectigalia fluviorum seu Vada concedi de iure non possunt nisi ea loca ad quæ conceduntur sint ab aliorum locis ad quæ videlicet prius fuere concessa in distantia ad minus unius miliaris [§3] licet possint etiam propinquius concedi si destructionem priorum vel illis notabile damnum concessio ipsa non esset allatura. [§4] Fora etiam Hebdomadalia ac Nundinæ generales per tantam distantiam & ad loca quoque propinquiora conceduntur concedique poterunt dummodo una & eadem die aut uno tempore cum prioribus Nundinis seu Foris Hebdomadalibus noviter concessa non celebrentur & alias nova manifeste priora non destruant.

Privilegium secundo modo formatur illegitime. Tit. xi.

Alio modo potest considerari privilegium in quantum non ex mera principis autoritate procedit hoc est quod princeps non habet iustam legitimamque facultatem concedendi tale privilegium quia vergit in præiudicium aliorum, vel quod iuri communi ac constitutioni generali præiudicare dinoscitur. [§1] Et huiusmodi privilegium non valet prout exempli gratia in decreto communi continetur quod transsumptis litterarum extra terminos Octavales confectis in iudiciis fides non adhibeatur. Princeps autem si cuiuspiam privilegium simpliciter transsummi faceret cum clausula derogatoria videlicet NON OBSTANTE lege vel decreto regni nostri huiusmodi transsumpto volumus fidem adhiberi &c. Aut Statatorias litteras cum gratia concederet quod scilicet non obstante annuali revolutione iam transacta Donationem aliquam executioni demandare teneantur. Quia iuri & consuetudini regni huius aperte derogari videtur ideo non observatur, neque observandum censetur. [§2] Idem est sentiendum super illis privilegiis si quibus super eo concessa fuerunt vel in futurum concederentur quod in sedibus iudicialibus comitatum coram comitibus parochialibus ad cuiusvis instantiam respondere non teneantur, neque in præsentiam aliorum iudicum regni ordinariorum nisi in præsentiam solius maiestatis regni vel personalis præsentie suæ in causam conveniri possint. [§3] PRÆTEREA si iuramentum cuiuspiam dominorum vel nobilium prestandum adiudicaretur, & privilegium inde produceretur quod non ipse reus in persona sua sed officialis suus illud deponere teneretur & huiusmodi etc. quia generali consuetudini totius regni ab olim approbatæ tale privilegium præiudicat nusquam tenetur. [§4] Omnes enim domini & nobiles tam scilicet spirituales quam sæculares, cæteri etiam possessionati utriusque sexus homines qui in hoc regno Hungariæ bona ac iura possessionaria gubernant pari lege unaque & eadem consuetudine in ipsorum iurium possessionariorum conservatione atque cunctarum causarum inde emergendarum prosecutione uti debent prout in PRIMA quoque parte prenotatum habetur.

Quot modis carebit privilegium sua firmitate. xii.

Notandum ulterius quod privilegium multis modis suo carebit vigore. [§1] PRIMO enim perditur & invalidum erit privilegium quando quis fecerit contra privilegium sibi concessum, aut male eo utitur. Quia meretur privilegium amittere qui concessa sibi abutitur potestate. Quemadmodum ille qui super malefactorum in territorio suo deprehensorum punitione privilegium principis habet & capto fure vel predone non eum suspendit vel palo affigit sed pactatum pecunię summam ab eo extorquendo dimittit, talis privilegio suo abutitur. Quia princeps malefactores non dimittendi sed iuxta eorum demerita feriendi mulctandique prestitit auctoritatem. [§2] SECUNDO amittitur privilegium dum quis tempore debito non utitur privilegio sibi dato atque concesso. Verbi gratia: Si cuipiam regia maiestas castrum vel quodcunque ius aliud possessionarium donaret, & ille donatarius literas suas Donationales infra anni revolutionem per regium aut Palatinalem & alicuius loci testimonialis homines exequutioni non demandaret tunc peracta revolutione ipsa annuali huiusmodi Donatio omni firmitate carebit. Neque etiam cum litteris Statutoriis per gratiam (prout immediate premissi) confectis restaurari valebit, sed de novo Donatio ipsa fieri conficique debebit. Si interea alter quispiam ius illud possessionarium pro se non impetrabit. [§3] In facto etiam Fororum hebdomadalium Nundinarumque & Vadorum idem est faciendum. Ut si princeps alicui Forum aut Nundinas vel Vada concesserit ille infra anni revolutionem Donatione & Privilegio huiusmodi utatur & uti incipiat. Nam aliter anno transacto virtus eius expirabit. [§4] HIC tamen advertendum est quod si peracta infra dictam annualem revolutionem exequutione ipsius Statutionis error aliquis aut in literis super ea re Relatoriis aut in processu eiusdem exequutionis vicio vel negligentia hominis regii & testimonii vel etiam Capituli aut Conventus commissus fuisse deprehendatur tunc in tali casu Donatio efficax manebit. Et eiuscemodi exequutio prout casus rei se obtulerit reformari poterit atque debebit. [§5] Veruntamen si simpliciter exequutio ipsa neglecta vel aliter error aliquis per Donatarium in ea commissus fuerit reformari nusquam poterit sed de novo (ut pretractum est) castrum vel ius illud possessionarium impetrari debebit. [§6] TERTIO perditur privilegium in casu quo quis incurrit crimen lese maiestatis vel notam infidelitatis. Et hoc modo non solum privilegium sed etiam caput & quęlibet bona perdit. [§7] QUARTO si privilegium in alterinis enorme damnum redundat sicuti iam hunc modum predeclaratum habes. Quia & alioquin non est verisimile principem concedentem ius alterius presens vel futurum graviter velle ledere. [§8] QUINTO si princeps vel alter iudex regni ordinarius ex certa scientia videns & agnoscens privilegium non valere multis iudicavit contra illud. Secus tamen est si aliquando contra privilegium per errorem fuisset iudicatum. Nam isto casu poterit error ipse & ex consequenti privilegii tenor per novum iudicium servatis de iure servandis reformari. [§9] SEXTO per expressam vel etiam tacitam renunciationem ipsius privilegii. Per expressam sic quod publice renunciavit vel renunciabit quis privilegio suo. Per tacitam autem sic quod publice actum sit contra illud privilegium ipso sciente & non contradicente sed per omnia subticente. Quę taciturnitas cum sit in sui preiudicium inducit contra se quandam renunciationem. [§10] SEPTIMO per posterius derogatorium priori quando videlicet utrumque confectum est vel emanavit ad unam & eandem personam aut communitatem tunc primum cassabitur & secundum observabitur. [§11] OCTAVO & ultimo perditur privilegium per expressam renovationem concedentis principis. Ex causis tamen rationabilibus in revocatione huiusmodi clare declarandis. Nam si causę rationabiles revocationem non firmaverint sed simpliciter factam fuisse litterę revocatorię denotaverint ipsa revocatio locum non habebit. Alias enim incommoda multa sequerentur: & quilibet de privilegio suo dietim desperare cogereetur. Et hæc de privilegiis dicta sufficiant.

Quid sit sigillum descriptive, et quod duplex est sigillum.

Titulus. xiii.

VERUM quia omnia privilegia sigillis roborari communiri que solent ideo super sigillis quoque in hac parte aliquid dicendum convenit. [§1] UBI sciendum quod sigillum est notorium signum auro aut alio metallo vel cære impressum corroborans omne factum. [§2] ET DUPLEX EST SIGILLUM scilicet authenticum & non authenticum. Authenticum dicitur quasi auctoritatem tenens cui credi debeat. Et est proprie principum ac ordinariorum iudicum regni, nec non Capitulorum & Conventuum. Et huiusmodi sigillum authenticum litteris appositum confirmat omne factum in ipsis litteris expressum atque declaratum. [§3] HABENT præterea etiam civitates & oppida sigilla authentica per reges & principes ipsis concessa. Quæ in factis & rebus coram eis & in medio eorum vertentibus ac emergendis robor sortiuntur firmitatis. [§4] NON AUTHENTICA vero sunt privatarum personarum sigilla. Et talia nihil perpetuitatis sub se continere possunt. [§5] Quorum multa sunt genera. Alia enim sunt dominorum prælatorum necnon comitum perpetuorum & aliorum baronum officia baronatum pro honore tenentium et alia ab eisdem baronibus propagatorum. Alia vero nobilium & procerum regni veris & peculiaribus armorum insignibus exculpta & effigiata. [§6] Superiores itaque prælati ut Archiepiscopi & Episcopi, necnon prior Aurane ac comites liberi et perpetui regni. Etiam Rascie Despotus per litteras eorum proprias veris & notoriis sigillis ipsorum roboratas procuratores constituendi facultatem habent. [§7] Cæteri autem barones & magnates atque nobiles coram ipsis iudicibus regni ordinariis ac in locis testimonialibus Capitulis scilicet & Conventibus & procuratores constituere & alias Fassiones (ut verbo domestico utar) facere tenentur. [§8] Iudices siquidem regni ordinarii ac ipsa loca testimonialia sigilla authentica habentes sub eorum sigillis tam procuratores constituendi quam etiam cunctas alias Fassiones (rite tamen & legitime) faciendi habent auctoritatem.

Quorum regum privilegia servantur et quorum non.

Titulus. xiiii.

ITEM habita iam privilegiorum & sigillorum declaratione necesse est videre quorum regum & principum huius regni privilegia observantur, & quorum in iudiciis reiciuntur nulliusque vigoris & firmitatis esse censentur. [§1] UBI SCIENDUM quod universæ litteræ sanctissimorum Stephani & Ladislai regum. Præterea serenissimorum primi Andreae genitoris regis Salomonis, necnon primi Belæ patris & primi Geysæ fratris ipsius beati Ladislai regis ac Colomanni filii dicti Geysæ qui primum episcopus Waradiensis fuit sed per dispensationem apostolicam deficiente hærede regio regni gubernacula suscepit. Et ideo Hungarico idiomate Kewnwe kalman in hunc usque diem appellatur. [§2] ITEM Stephani secundi filii eiusdem Colomanni [§3] atque secundi Belæ qui Cæcus appellatus est filii videlicet ducis almi [§4] & Geysæ secundi filii eiusdem Belæ Cæci. [§5] Necnon tertii Stephani filii ipsius secundi Geysæ. [§6] DEMUM Belæ tertii filii eiusdem Geysæ secundi fratris scilicet præfati tertii Stephani. Et hic est ille Bela qui fures & latrones persequutus est atque de regno extirpavit. [§7] TANDEM Emerici filii eiusdem tertii Belæ regum. Quiquidem Emericus ecclesiam Waradiensem certis Dotationibus decorasse pariter & amplificasse perhibetur litteræ servantur. [§8] Et secundum aliquos iste Emericus alio quasi corrupto vocabulo Henricus appellatur atque scribitur non tamen Hungarorum sed Germanorum potius usu sic intitulatur. [§9] Nec erat necessarium nomina regum istorum connumerare sed poterat hæc commemoratio brevius perstringi: pariter & annotari. Ex quo tamen nobiles regni Hungariæ super eorum nobilitate simul & libertate pauca admodum privilegia temporibus horum regum qui potius incremento ecclesiarum dei & populo christiano hoc in regno quasi noviter plantato curam salutis impendere studuerunt condonata habent, et alias certi fuerunt principes inter hos pro regibus nominati quorum litteræ in irritum transiere puta Petrus Theutunus, Abba

Hungarus, Salomon filius primi Andreę & Stephanus quartus filius dicti regis Belę Cęci qui quinque dumtaxat mensibus corona sceptroque potitus de regno turpiter fuit expulsus. Necnon Ladislaus tertius filius pręlibati Emerici sive Heinrichi qui sex solummodo mensibus regnavit propterea ut nomina pariter & privilegia regum ipsorum lucidius agnosci queant ea prolixè posui. [§10] ULTERIUS advertendum quod infrascriptorum quoque regum & principum litterę ac privilegia in quovis facto & negotio observantur, sed eorum nomina seorsum propterea notavi quoniam tempore huius gloriosi principis secundi Andreę filii (ut pręnotatum est) tertii Belę regis, qui primus erit in ordine regum subsequentium laudabilis pręclaraque libertatis pręrogativa nobilium qua generaliter usque modo fungimur & gaudemus in scriptis declarata per modumque decreti & constitutionis generalis roborata extitit. [§11] Quamvis etiam regnante sanctissimo ipso Prothorege nostro Stephano & aliorum quoque succedentium regum temporibus multi fuerint in hoc regno nobiles conditionaria tamen quadam servitute collectarumque ex parte colonorum suorum solutione regibus ipsis obnoxii erant atque tenebantur a qua primum per hunc Andream regem ipsi nobiles qui eo tunc servientes dicebantur exempti fuerunt atque immunes. [§12] Et propterea cuncti reges usque in presens tempus sibi succedentes sacro (sicuti pręnarratum est) priusquam diademate coronarentur super observando decreto ac constitutionibus eiusdem domini Andreę regis pręlatis, ac baronibus & magnatibus proceribusque & nobilibus regni huius iuramentum pręstare consueverunt. [§13] HUIUS ANDREę REGIS privilegium in monte Thaabor (ubi dominus & salvator noster transfiguratus fuerat) super quadam possessionaria collatione emanatum & confectum in comitatu Honthensi habetur hac etiam tempestate. [§14] Ad prosecutionem itaque cęptę materię redeundo pręnotati secundi Andreę, necnon quarti Belę eiusdem Andreę filii cuius tempestate Hungaria per Tartaros devastata fuit. [§15] Pręterea quinti Stephani filii ipsius quarti Belę (demptis litteris tempore ducatus eiusdem Stephani qui se iuniorem regem Hungarię & ducem Transilvanensem tunc intitulare solebat) confectis & emannatis. Nam tales litterę suę non servantur nisi forsitan ipso postea regni gubernacula iuste suscipiente pariter & possidente per eum fuissent confirmatę. [§16] ITEM quarti Ladislai filii ipsius quinti Stephani qui kwn lazlo nominatus extitit regum privilegia valent & observantur. [§17] ITEM litterę tertii Andreę regis qui Venetus cognominatus est non servantur exceptis illis si quę per dominum Carolum regem immediatum suum successorem annulari sigillo suo in cera rubea in qua habetur littera. K. circa imaginem a parte dextra pro signo confirmationis apposito fuissent confirmatę. Nam tales observantur. [§18] ITEM rex Carolus tria sigilla habuit quorum duo priora per eundem fuerunt revocata, & privilegia sub illis emannata non servantur nisi per tertium posterius fuissent roborata. Quod quidem tertium sic agnoscitur ut ex duabus partibus clipei in area sigilli exsculpti. In quo videlicet clipeo duplicata crux continetur, sunt duę figurę draconis. [§19] ITEM Lodovicus rex ipsius Caroli filius duo sigilla habuit quorum primum in partibus Vzuru deperditum, & a reverendissimo domino Nicolao Archiepiscopo Strigoniense cancellario suo subtractum non tenetur nisi per secundum novum fuissent literę sub priori sigillo æditę postea confirmatę sub quo novo sigillo tam litterę eiusdem regis Lodovici sub ipso priori sigillo suo confectę quam etiam prędicti domini Caroli regis patris sui sub duobus prioribus sigillis cassatis, annullatis emanatę per appensionem eiusdem novi seu secundi sigilli fuerunt tandem confirmatę. Et tales ubilibet servantur. [§20] Breviter itaque privilegia ipsius domini Lodovici regis ab anno domini trecentesimo sexagesimo quarto supra millesimum usque ad obitum suum videlicet annum salutis millesimum trecentessimum octuagesimum secundum supra millesimum confecta robur sorciuntur firmitatis. Sed priora non valent nisi fuissent modo antelato postea confirmata. [§21] Quę ut lucidius intelligantur clausulam per eundem Lodovicum regem ad confirmandas tales litteras suas apponi solitam & per me ex eiusmodi litteris suis confirmatis quarum plures in specie vidi atque perlegi excerptam verbotenus interserendum statui quæ sic incipit. [§22] AD PERPETUAM REI MEMORIAM Nos Lodovicus rex præfatus universis declaramus, quod ubi in regno nostro Boznæ innumerabilis multitudo hæreticorum & Pateranorum pululasset in errorem fidei orthodoxæ ad extirpandum quoque de ipso regno nostro eosdem ex una parte nos personaliter instaurato valido exercitu proficiscebamur, ex alia vero parte venerabilem in christo patrem dominum Nicolaum Archiepiscopum Strigoniensem nostrum cancellarium penes quem utrumque par sigilli nostri authentici habebatur, & virum magnificum dominum Nicolaum Palatinum cum cæteris prælatis, baronibus & regni nostri proceribus in Wzwram destinaramus. Quidam familiares ipsius domini Archiepiscopi pro custodia deputati utrumque par dicti sigilli nostri Authentici præconcepta malicia subtraxerunt. [§23] Nos itaque præcaventis ne ex huiusmodi sigilli nostri deperditione regnicolis nostris in eorum iuribus successive periculum possit imminere sigillum novum in duobus paribus fecimus pro nobis sculpi quod ad omnia privilegia nostra & condam domini Caroli regis patris nostri sub priori sigillo eiusdem tempore suę coronationis sculpto & demum per eundem (eo quod sub ipso plurimæ infidelitates perpetratae extiterunt repertæ) permactato ac sub alio sigillo ipsius in partibus Transsalpinis casualiter deperdito confecta iuxta dicta tria sigilla decrevimus fore apponendum. [§24] Ad quęcunque vero privilegia paterna dictis duobus prioribus sigillis suis consignata quę per eundem patrem nostrum per sigilla eiusdem posteriora vel per nos cum sigillo modo præmisso deperdito confirmata non haberentur & ad ipsa privilegia ipsum novum sigillum nostrum non appenderetur, vel quęcunque patentes litteræ non confirmarentur ea privilegia & litteræ sicut per eundem patrem nostrum fuerunt revocata & annullata sic & nos ipsas seu ipsa commisimus viribus caritura, nullam quoque roboris optentura firmitatem. [§25] Inter quæ præsens privilegium nostrum omni prorsus suspitione destitutum & omnia in eo superius contenta & expressa pro eodem. T. suisque hæredibus & successoribus dicti sigilli nostri novi duplicis & authentici appensione renovavimus & perpetuo confirmamus. Datum per manus eiusdem domini Nicolai Archiepiscopi Cancellarii nostri decimo Kalendas mensis. T. Anno domini millesimo trecentesimo sexagesimo quarto regni autem nostri anno vigesimo tertio. [§26] ITEM LITTERÆ DOMINI SIGISMUNDI REGIS ET IMPERATORIS ante annum domini millesimum quadragesimum sextum emanatæ non servantur ex eo quod idem Sigismundus rex de consilio dominorum prælatorum & baronum regni sui nobilium per modum generalis decreti sanxerat ut a festo beati Georgii martyris in anno domini quadragesimo quinto supra millesimum usque ad aliud festum ipsius beati Georgii martyris in præfacto anno gratię millesimo quadragesimo sexto tunc venturum iam vero transactum universæ litteræ Donationales & aliæ privilegiales præfati condam domini Lodovici regis sub ipsius secreto dumtaxat sigillo emanatæ ac dominarum Elisabeth relictæ & Marię filiæ eiusdem Lodovici regis Hungariæ scilicet reginarum necnon ipsius Sigismundi regis ante illa tempora qualitercunque confecta ad confirmationem importarentur alioquin inefficaces viribusque per omnia destitutæ relinquerentur. [§27] Post hæc autem tempora litterę eiusdem domini Sigismundi regis & imperatoris usque in diem obitus sui annum videlicet gratiæ quadragesimum tricesimum septimum supra millesimum editæ semper valent & observantur. [§28] Ut autem huius rei noticia pro tollendo dubio cunctis pateat formam ac continentiam quarundam litterarum Donationalium eiusdem domini Sigismundi regis super præmissis confectarum & in iudicio contradictorio dudum productarum sensu in nulla parte mutato adieci huiusmodi sub tenore. [§29] NOS Sigismundus dei gratia rex Hungariæ, Dalmaciæ, Croacię, &c. Marchioque Brandenburg &c. sacri Romani imperii vicarius generalis & regni Bohemiæ gubernator memorie commendamus per presentes. Quod cum nos prelatorum & baronum ac regni nostri procerum sana deliberatione exinde subsequuta pro bono utili & tranquillo statu regnicolarum nostrorum omnes & singulas litteras quondam excellentissimi principis domini Lodovici dei gratia inclyti regis Hungariæ patris &

soceri nostri charissimi sub ipsius secreto sigillo tantum modo ac illustrissimarum principum dominarum Elisabeth matris & Marie contoralis nostrarum charissimarum reginarum dicti regni Hungarię felicium recordationum, nec non nostras sub ipsarum atque similiter nostris tam maioribus quam minoribus sigillis super factis quibusvis & presertim possessionariis confectas & emanatas quibuscumque personis dignitate quavis fungentibus ad tollendum omne dubium removendum scandalum & ad evitanda multa atque varia incommoda quę propter sigillorum ipsarum dominarum atque nostrorum deperditionem ac nostri maioris videlicet duplicis ex causis & rationibus legitimis confractionem multorum iuribus & presertim possessionariis uti potuissent derogare a festo beati Georgii martyris in anno domini quadringentesimo quinto proxime præterito usque annualem eiusdem revolutionem sub pęna revocationis, annullationis & cassationis earundem (si non producerentur) per nos videndę & examinandę. Et si opus fuisset sub presenti moderno novo nostro autentico duplici sigillo confirmandę & approbandę nostrę claritati exhibendas decrevissemus & præsentandas. Eandemque elapso huiusmodi decreti & statuti nostri termino pro examinandis & revidendis huiusmodi litteris coram nobis productis vel non productis, per nosque cum præscripto nostro moderno maiori duplici sigillo confirmatis & non confirmatis in singulis dicti regni nostri comitatibus per comites nostros provinciales congregationes iussissemus celebrari generales. [§30] Demum quia .T. & .T. nobiles comitatus .T. litteras suas super Donatione portionis possessionarię in possessione .T. vocata in comitatu .T. prædicto existentis habite dudum per nostram maiestatem dicto .T. filio .T. patri ipsorum & per consequens eisdem .T. & .T. ipsorumque hæredibus facta Confirmationales coram nobis seu homine nostro in nostra personali presentia ad id specialiter deputato necnon iuratis assessoribus huiusmodi congregationis generalis prædicti comitatus .T. producere nequierunt, seu non potuerunt. Ideo nos præmisso nostro decreto iuxta vigorem eiusdem satisfacere volentes, ipsumque robur perpetuę firmitatis obtinere volentes præmissas literas Donacionales pro annotatis .T. filio .T. & per consequens ipsis .T. & .T. ipsorumque hæredibus super Donatione dictę portionis possessionarię per nos modo quo supra datas, per ipsosque præscripto autentico duplici nostro sigillo confirmare non procuratas seriatim & verbo tenus revocantes, cassantes ac suis viribus prorsus carituras decernentes & relinquentes eandemque portionem possessionariam rursum nostris regiis manibus annectentes memoratis .T. & .T. ac ipsorum hæredibus & posteritatibus universis occasione & pretextu præscriptę portionis possessionarię in dicta possessione .T. existentis ac cunctis eiusdem utilitatum & pertinentiarum perpetuum & irrevocabile silentium imponendum duximus & imponimus per presentes. [§31] Nos si quidem qui ex suscepti regię dignitatis officio fidelium nostrorum actus virtuosos & merita (prout regalem decet dignitatem) equo libramine ponderantes unicuique iuxta meritorum qualitatem regio favore occurrere debemus, consideratis & in memoriam nostrę celsitudinis revocatis fidelitatis & fidelium servitiorum præclaris meritis, virtuosis gestis & acceptis complacentiis fidelium nostrorum dilectorum magnificorum virorum .T. & .T. filiorum condam .T. quibus iidem nobis & sacrę nostrę coronę regię sub diversitate locorum & temporum cum omni sinceritatis, zelo fidelitatis, fervore devotionis, constantia & sollicitudine continua labores in personis subeuntes & expensas in rebus cum adiectione laudabilium operum se studuerunt coram oculis nostrę maiestatis reddere gratos utique & acceptos. [§32] Volentes ob hoc eisdem pro præmissis ipsorum fidelium obsequiorum meritis ad presens aliquali nostro regio occurrere cum favore eandem portionem nostram regiam possessionariam in dicta possessione .T. vocata in antefato comitatu .T. existente habitam simul sum universis suis utilitatibus & pertinentiis videlicet terris arabilibus cultis & incultis, pratis, foenilibus, silvis, nemoribus, aquis, piscinis, molendinis aquarumque decursibus, montibus, vineis & generaliter quibuslibet eiusdem portionis possessionarię utilitatum integritatibus quovis nominis vocabulo vocitatis sub eisdem veris metis & antiquis limitibus quibus eadem per suos possessores rite tenta fuisset & possessa memoratis .T. & .T. & per ipsos eorum hæredibus & posteritatibus universis ex certa nostra scientia ac prælatorum & barorum nostrorum consilio de manibus nostris regiis novæque nostræ Donationis titulo & omni eo iure quo prædicta portio possessionaria in præacta .T. habita tam prævia quam aliis quibuscunque rationibus seu de causis ad nostram legitimæ spectat collationem dedimus, donavimus & contulimus, immo damus, donamus & conferimus perpetuo & irrevocabiliter possidendam, tenendam pariter & habendam salvo iure alieno assumens nostro & nostrorum successorum regum scilicet Hungariæ nominibus & personis prælibatos .T. & .T. ipsorumque hæredes & quoslibet successores in pacifico dominio & quieto predictæ portionis possessionariæ & quibuslibet eius utilitatum & pertinentiarum præscriptarum contra quoslibet impeditores, causidicos & auctores intra vel extra iudicium semper & ubique propriis nostris & eorundem nostrorum successorum laboribus & expensis indemnes & illesos protegere, expedire ac conservare harum nostrarum vigore & testimonio litterarum mediante, quas dum nobis in specie reportate fuerint in formam nostri privilegii redigi faciemus. Datum &c. Anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo decimo editæ semper observantur. [§33] ITEM litteræ domini Alberti regis successoris immediati dicti domini Sigismundi imperatoris valent & servantur. [§34] ITEM omnes Donationes & aliæ quælibet concessionem condam dominæ Elizabeth filiæ ipsius domini Sigismundi regis relictæ scilicet dicti condam Alberti regis, necnon domini Wladislai Poloni (qui non vera sacraque regni huius corona sed reliquiarum capitis sancti Stephani regis ornamento insignitus fuerat, quique in partibus Romaniæ, iuxta opidum Warna marina prope ad littora per Amratem Thurcorum Cæsarem circa festum beati Martini episcopi & confessoris in Anno gratiæ quadringentesimo quadragesimo quarto supra millesimum debellatus occubuit) pro quorumcunque parte & quibuscunque ac quavis ratione vel titulo factæ per omnia cassatæ, revocatæ & viribus destitutæ sunt quæ nunquam tenentur excepta dumtaxat Donatione ac elemosinaria largitione per ipsam dominam Elisabeth ecclesiæ Albensis regalis facta. [§35] ITEM litteræ dominorum prælatorum, baronum procerumque et nobilium regni Hungariæ universorum sub eorum sigillo in quo duplicata crux ad instar signeti gentis Hungariæ continetur emanatæ in quantum processus iuridicos, necnon Fassionem iudiciaque concernunt, veluti litteræ unius iudicis ordinarii observantur. Quantum vero ad Donationes annuentias vel consensuum adhibitiones nihil valent prout ex tenore privilegii ipsorum in civitate Pesthiensi Secundo die festi Ascensionis domini, quæ septima die Maii fuit in anno eiusdem quadringentesimo quadragesimo quinto supra millesimum inter cætera super ea re editi clarescit quod (quia multa continet in se capitula pluresque complectitur articulos proposito nostro non correspondentes) verbotenus inserere tediosum existimavi. Super ipsius tamen sigilli sculptura & virtute articulum in eisdem litteris positum sub eadem forma verborum qua ibi scriptum vidi atque legi hic annectere curavi qui sic sequitur. [§36] ITEM quod ex nunc disponatur unum sigillum in quo sit signetum crucis sicut signetum regni Hungariæ & illud sigillum servetur in civitate Budensi ut querulantes habeant sub ipso sigillo literas necessarias & commemoriales, & procedatur iusticia mediante secundum quod decet usque Coronationem regis. ECCE clare describitur illud sigillum ad iudicia solummodo celebranda iustitiamque ministrandam fuisse institutum atque fabricatum. [§37] Clausulam autem extremam ipsius articuli super sigillo præacti conscripti (videlicet usque Coronationem regis) noli accipere, neque interpretari quod tunc in proximo novus quispiam rex debuisse coronari. Nam illustris princeps Ladislaus filius dicti condam Alberti regis dudum prius in anno scilicet dominicæ incarnationis quadringentesimo quadragesimo supra millesimum coronatus fuerat, sed intelligenda est per clausulam illa iurisdictionis sacræ coronæ regni ac plenariæ potestatis regiæ, quam tunc puerulus ille existens regere & gubernare non poterat in manus & auctoritatem ipsius domini Ladislai regis perfecta in proximo assignatio. [§38] POST obitum autem prælibati domini Wladislai Poloniæ regis usque ad electionem Iohannis de Hwnyad in gubernatorem regni huius Hungariæ Nicolaus de Wylak, alias Waywoda Transilvanus in capitaneum eiusdem regni deputatus erat, & proinde vicarium quoque regni Hungariæ intitulari se faciebat. [§39] ITEM universæ Donationes & litteræ Donationales ipsius domini Iohannis de Hwnyad gubernatoris gubernaminis sui dumtaxat officio durante & non prius, neque posterius usque ad numerum triginta duarum sessionum Iobagionalium sed non amplius factæ & confectæ observantur. [§40] UNDE infertur quod quelibet Donationes ac annuentiæ & consensuum adhibitiones per eundem Iohannem gubernatorem ultra numerum præactarum triginta duarum sessionum Iobagionalium cuiquam factæ vel collatæ non valent neque tenent. [§41] ITEM consensuum quoque super quovis contractu vel alio negotio per eundem adhibitiones. Post exitum sue gubernationis (quia tales omnes conditionales fuerunt) locum non habent. Exempli gratia, Si cuiquam annuisset ut decedente & hæredibus deficiente tali nobili bona sua in talem hominem devolvantur, Si huiusmodi annuentia vel consensus numerarum præscriptarum triginta duarum sessionum Iobagionalium non excessisset & ille nobilis stante adhuc gubernaminis sui officio defecisset talis consensus pro tunc rite locum habuisset. Sed si in præsentiarum deficeret regnante vero & legitimo iam rege locum non haberet quia gubernator ipse metas autoritatis sibi traditæ transcendere nequivit. Auctoritas autem sibi ad ulteriora maioraque data non fuit, neque dari commode potuit ex quo prefatus dominus Ladislaus ipsius Alberti regis filius licet teneret adhuc ætatis dudum tamen (ut prefertur) coronatus ad quem plenaria iurisdicio sacræ coronæ spectabat tunc in humanis agebat. [§42] Et ne quisquam aliter sentiat & temerarie contrarium obiciat articulos super autoritate in conferendis bonis ac iuribus possessionariis predicto gubernatori data & attributa confectos & ex serie litterarum prenotatorum dominorum prælatorum, baronum nobiliumque & procerum regni Hungariæ universorum Budæ in festo Annunciationis sacratissimæ virginis Mariæ anno virginei partus eiusdem quadringentesimo quadagesimo septimo supra millesimum editarum & confectarum & articulos quoque in generali eorum congregatione in civitate Pesthiensi circa festum Penthecostes tunc proxime (in anno videlicet salutis quadringentesimo quadagesimo sexto supra millesimum) præteritum quando utputa idem Iohannes Hwnyadinus in gubernatorem regni electus & sublimatus fuerat decretatos atque formatos in se seriatim continentium per me verbotenus excerptos absque omni variatione pro tollenda omni in hac parte ambiguitate apposui atque subiunxi. Quiquidem articuli (dimissis aliis ipsarum litterarum continentibus) huiusmodi verborum sequuntur sub tenore. ITEM ipse dominus gubernator his, qui fideliter sacræ regni coronæ serviverint de illis possessionibus quæ deinceps ad sacram coronam pure legitimeque sine cuiusquam alterius iure per defectum seminis, Item propter delationem falsarum litterarum, propter cussionem falsarum monetarum & fabricationem falsi sigilli, necnon propter inductionem extraneæ potentiæ in hoc regnum ac positionem ignis in eodem fuerint devolutæ in quibus scilicet possessionibus triginta duæ sessiones & non plures fuerint, vel fieri poterint & etiam in quibus infra eundem numerum triginta duarum sessionum fuerint vel fieri poterunt facere valeat Donationes. [§43] Si vero civitates, oppida & possessiones ultra numerum præscriptarum triginta duarum sessionum etiam præscriptis modis ad sacram coronam fuerint devolutæ illas partiri seu dividere in triginta duas sessiones non valeat & sub nomine triginta duarum sessionum de illis facere cuiquam Donationem sed huiusmodi omnes civitates, oppida & possessiones indivisæ ipsi coronæ reserventur. [§44] ITEM dominus gubernator si cui Donationem præmisso modo semel fecerit amplius eidem donare non valeat et cum Donationes castrorum, civitatum, oppidorum ac possessionum & similium ad ius regium dumtaxat spectare dinoscantur, Igitur ipse quibuscunque Donationem fecerit illi tempore suo teneantur accedere ad dominum regem pro confirmatione obtinenda. [§45] ITEM possessiones eorundem, quorum propter delationem falsarum litterarum aut cussionem falsarum monetarum aut aliquo modo superius expresso ad coronam fuerint devolutæ quousque illi qui per iudices suos competentes iudicialiter secundum antiquam & approbatam regni consuetudinem sententiati fuerint occupare & de eis Donationem facere non valeat quovis modo. Reliquos autem litterarum ipsarum articulos quia huic rei non quadrant prætermittendum duxi. [§46] ITEM litteræ prædicti Ladislai filii antefati Alberti regis ab anno domini quadringentesimo quinquagesimo secundo supra millesimum quo ipse gubernator officio sui gubernaminis (quod septem per annos feliciter gesserat) cessit ad obitus usque sui diem annum ut puta salutis quadringentesimum quinquagesimum septimum supra millesimum emanatæ servantur. Licet sequenti anno cessionis prænotati gubernaminis videlicet quadringentesimo quinquagesimo tertio supra millesimum quo ipse Ladislaus rex circa festum Purificationis virginis gloriosæ de Vienna Budam reductus bonorum collationes consensuumque adhibitiones & aliarum rerum expeditiones facere cepisse dinoscatur. [§47] ITEM privilegia invictissimi principis condam domini Mathiæ regis laudandæ recordationis a tempore felicitatis suæ coronationis, anno videlicet domini quadringentesimo sexagesimo quarto supra millesimum in die cenæ domini factæ mortis adusque ipsius diem feriam scilicet tertiam post dominicam Palmarum in anno incarnationis dominicæ quadringentesimo nonagesimo supra millesimum præteritam emanatæ servantur ante vero coronationem suam confectæ non tenentur nisi postea fuissent per eum confirmata. [§48] ITEM litteræ moderni & quidem gratiosissimi domini nostri Wladislai regis a die dominico proximo post festum Exaltationis sanctæ Crucis in ipso anno gratiæ quadringentesimo nonagesimo supra millesimum transacto die scilicet felicitatis coronationis suæ usque modo confectæ & in futurum quoque emanandæ rite & legitime semper servantur. [§49] ITEM quia disturbiorum temporibus signanter vero post obitum memoratorum Sigismundi imperatoris & Alberti regis plurimæ litteræ multaque privilegia diversis sub coloribus & sigillis nequitiose fraudulenterque reperiuntur fulminatæ atque fabricata, que licet omnia vix in lucem prodierint & omnia difficulter sciri vel cognosci possint ut tamen aliquarum inique æditarum (saltem in particulari, si non in generali) litterarum notitia habeatur copiam seu tenorem cuiusdam privilegii præfatorum dominorum prælatorum, baronum nobiliumque & procerum regni Hungariæ super complurimis eiuscemodi nequiter fulminatis litteris confecti & in iudicio contradictorio etiam coram me cum sigillo eorum prædeclarato producti de verbo ad verbum apponere inserereque dignum duxi. Cuius quidem privilegii continentia verbalis tenorque hoc sequitur modo. [§50] NOS PRÆLATI, barones, nobiles & proceres regni Hungariæ universi memorie commendamus per præsentem, quod ortis guerris in hoc regno nostro post mortem condam domini Alberti regis & eis diutius agitatæ demum Deo concedente huiusmodi guerris inter nos sopitis & in unum principem atque dominum videlicet illustrem dominum Ladislaum filium dicti condam domini Alberti regis veluti dominum nostrum naturalem nobis simul concordantibus cum iudicia pro mutua & durandæ inter nos pacis amplexu facere & iustitiam oppressis ministrare inchoassemus plures hincinde falsæ litteræ coram nobis in iudiciis per causantes exhibebantur. [§51] Cumque super huiusmodi fabricatione falsi cunctari cepissemus quendam Gabrielem litteratum de Zomlyn cusorem huiusmodi detestandæ pestis comperimus quo pro meritis sui sceleris in manus suorum iudicum competentium incidente huiusmodi scelus suum ante mortem eiusdem ad puritatem suæ conscientię tum verbis tumque scriptis suis propriis manibus confectis quarum seriem & continentiam præsentibus taxandam duximus palam publice confessus fuit quorum scilicet scriptorum suorum series & continentia hæc est. [§52] Una littera cum regio consensu littera scilicet condam domini Sigismundi regis pro parte dominorum filiorum Kompolth emanata quod, si semen condam Ladislai de Solmos deficeret tunc eadem Solmos, & non aliæ possessiones in ipsos filios Kompolth reflecti deberet sed ista littera non fuit de scitu ipsorum dominorum filiorum Kompolth emanata. [§53] Item libertas sub sigillo domini Sigismundi regis privilegialis cum medio capite aquile civitati Gyengyes facta. [§54] Item due litteræ una videlicet condam Sigismundi regis sub secreto sigillo suo cum medio capite aquilæ, & alia littera Statutoria sub sigillo capituli Budensis privilegialiter confectæ super præfectione filiæ in filium hic Budæ consorti Petri Polyak sartoris datæ. [§55] Item una littera Fassionalis sub sigillo Capituli Agriensis privilegialiter ad Fassionem dominorum condam Petri Episcopi, & Stephani de Rozgon: ac Johannis, filii eiusdem pro parte Ladislai de Zechen confecta. [§56] Item una littera super libertate possessionis Zabathka sub sigillo Sigismundi regis secreto cum medio capite aquilæ facta. [§57] Item litteræ sub sigillis Capituli Agriensis privilegialiter, & maiori sigillo domini Sigismundi regis patenter super possessione Abon filiis Orros factæ contra dominos de Gara. [§58] Item una littera privilegialis sub secreto sigillo condam domini Sigismundi regis cum medio capite aquilæ ad supplicationem dominorum condam Ladislai & Henrici filiorum Wayvode de Thamasii, in eo scilicet quod si ipsos sine hæredibus decedere contingeret tunc eorum bona & possessiones tam hæreditariæ quam acquisitivæ in filios Herczeg condescendant. [§59] Item una littera gratiosa patenter sub sigillo condam domini Sigismundi regis cum medio capite pro parte Emerici de Debrew super eo ut idem dominus rex capiti & bonis gratiam fecisset specialem confecta. [§60] Item una littera privilegialiter sub sigillo Capituli ecclesiæ Waradiensis ecclesiæ de Telkii in facto Kerepes est emanata. [§61] Item duæ litteræ una videlicet Fassionalis & alia Statutoria super impignoratione castri Bechæ scilicet domini Dezpoti sub sigillo Capituli Budensis condam Ladislao filio Michælis de Gezth factæ. [§62] Item aliæ duæ litteræ imperiales patentes in pergameno Fassionales contra filios Swlyok in facto possessionis Kewlewd eidem Ladislao filio Michælis factæ. [§63] Item Ladislao de Maysay nobili comitatus de Zarand, Sigismundo de Paka nobili comitatus de Bodrog, Ladislao de Pachaii & illis quinque civitatibus de Maromorosio sub sigillo domini Wladislai regis sunt litteræ in eo ut patibula in faciebus possessionum suarum erigi possint. [§64] Item una littera sub sigillo Capituli Waradiensis privilegialis, & alia condam domini Alberti regis similiter privilegialis confirmatoria super præfectione filiæ in filium magnifico domino Francisco de Chak factæ. [§65] Item una littera privilegialis sub sigillo imperialis scilicet secreto cum duobus capitibus aquilæ super gratia quondam Ladislao filio condam Iacobi Wayvode facta in facto omnium bonorum suorum confecta nunc erga Georgium filium Davidis Bani habita. Et quamvis in inferiori margine eiusdem litteræ scriptura domini Mathiæ Episcopi alias cancellarii habeatur, Quia estimans commissionem propriam domini imperatoris manu mea propria in superiori margine eiusdem litteræ scriptam fore suam tamen est falsa. [§66] Item duæ litteræ sub sigillis Capituli Agriensis privilegiales una super metarum erectione, alia vero super spirituali adoptione fraternalis cum condam Andrea Paharnok Sandrino & Mathiæ factæ. [§67] Item quibusdam Comanis scilicet Petro Sillii sub sigillo domini regis Wladislai et Matheo Beseg sub sigillo domine Elizabeth regine super libertatibus privilegialiter factæ. [§68] Item cuidam Iosa in Thobaghzenthgergh commoranti una littera Fassionalis per fratres eiusdem hominis per eundem Iosam interfecti quod eundem Iosam expeditum commisissent sub sigillo imperiali confecta patenter in pergameno. [§69] Item sub sigillo domini regis Wladislai super libertate privilegialiter cuidam Iohanni filio Egidii nunc in Madaras commoranti littera facta est. [§70] Item una littera sub maiori sigillo condam domini Sigismundi regis in pergameno sigillum a tergo positum habens super eo quod universæ possessiones condam Ladislai & Henrici filii Waywode scilicet hæreditariæ dumtaxat si semen deficeret in filios Herczeg condescendant. [§71] Item duæ litteræ una Statutoria sub sigillo Capituli Budensis & alia gratiosa domini Wladislai regis super præfectione filiæ in filium privilegialiter factæ cuidam dominæ filiæ scilicet nobilis de Koka, quæ scilicet coniux Ladsilai de Machonka fuisset. [§72] Item una littera patens imperialis super consensu regio domino Gregorio de Erdewd canonico Bachiensi data. [§73] Item una littera cuidam Comano scilicet Gregorio filio Pauli super eo ut in possessione consortis suæ, quæ est Hungara ad instar regni nobilium commorari posset sub sigillo domini Wladislai regis privilegialiter est facta sed nondum ad suas manus deventa est & ignoro ubi sit. [§74] Item una littera gratiosa iudeis facta sub sigillo condam domini Sigismundi regis cum medio capite aquilæ privilegialiter facta ut ipsi mercantias facere valeant. [§75] Item littera Sigismundi regis gratiosa pro parte Ladislai de Zechen prædecessoribus eiusdem facta quod possessiones eorundem propter notam infidelitatis non veniant in manus regias sed in fratres propinquiores condescendant sub secreto sigillo eiusdem privilegialiter emanata. Et etiam gratiosa littera super minerarum auri & argenti. [§76] Item littera super consensu regio pro parte Georgii filii Lorandi de Nemphtii super eo ut ubi Iohannem filium Henrici de Thamasii hæredibus deficere contingeret tunc castra & universa iura possessionaria in ipsum Georgium devolverentur sub secreto sigillo domini Sigismundi regis privilegialis. [§77] Item littera Capituli ecclesiæ Waradiensis privilegialis super decimis contra idem Capitulum pro parte Episcopi eiusdem emanata. [§78] Item littera super perfectione filiæ in filium ad Fassionem Stephani de Bathor cum consensu regio sub sigillo domini Sigismundi regis secreto pro parte filiorum condam Thomę de eadem Bathor confecta. [§79] Item littera sub sigillo domini Alberti regis privilegialis super libertate civitatibus in Maromorosio habitis confecta. [§80] Item una littera sub sigillo domini Lodovici regis Annulari super libertatibus civitatibus Pesthiensi & Budensi facta. Sed civibus Pesthiensibus per me assignata. [§81] Item omnia præmissa per neminem sunt facta præterquam per me Gabrielem & omnibus notum sit quod ista omnia quibus data sunt & assignata non quod ipsi per me ea fraudulenter facere procurassent sed per me facta sunt sinistre et semper hi idem easdem crediderunt esse veras & iusto modo emanatas. Ergo nullus debet suspicari quod isti essent culpabiles in præmissis. Quia non est de ipsorum fraudulentis sed ex meis. [§82] Nos itaque attentis tantis damnosis atque pestiferis actibus ipsius Gabrielis quę maligna opera nedum ad sui corporis & animæ sed & aliorum sunt vergentia corporum & animarum pericula plurimorum, volentes huiusmodi morbo pestifero remedio occurrere opportuno decrevimus ut omnes & singulæ literæ quæ in præactis manu scriptis suis præsentibus suo modo insertis sunt nominatim designatę tanquam de falso fabricatę inanes & apud omnes iudices intra & extra iudicium reiectę, reprobatę & viribus exutę semper habeantur quas & nos sic cassamus, reprobamus & damnamus præsentium per vigorem. Datum in nostra generali congregatione Pesthiensi feria secunda proxima post festum sacratissimi corporis Christi. Anno eiusdem millesimo quadringentesimo quadragésimo octavo.

De transsumptis litterarum et privilegiorum quid sit sciendum. Tit. xv.

Item ultra prenarratas nequiciose confectas litteras sunt etiam alię literę quę & si maliciose non sint fulminatę tamen in iudiciis non servantur, neque locum habent prout omnes transsumptionales, quę simpliciter & absolute in locis Capitularibus aut Conventualibus sive coram iudicibus ordinariis regni sunt vel fuerunt transsumptę & tales non sine notabili causa per constitutionem generalem extiterunt in irritum revocatę atque invalidatę. Nisi forte originales literę ex quibus scilicet transsumptę processerunt in specie valeant exhiberi. Nam hoc modo si originalia privilegia rite bonoque ordine & modo confecta fuisse dinoscuntur etiam transsumpta litterarum locum habent. [§1] TRANSSUMPTIO autem est alicuius privilegii non sensualis sed verbalis in aliud privilegium translatio. [§2] Unde transsumptiones litterarum aut in tabula & sede iudiciaria regię maiestatis in iudicio contradictorio inter litigantes aut coram iudicibus ordinariis regni in terminis Octavalibus per legitimam citationem facie ad faciem fiendam. Et item inter fratres quando bonorum divisio inter eos sequitur vel aliter de litterarum & privilegiorum ipsorum conservatione agitur coram eisdem iudicibus iuxta morem & consuetudinem modernorum & non aliter fieri possunt ut per iudices regni bene discutiantur examinenturque & diligenter rumentur originalia privilegia vel aliæ litteræ primordiales si rite & debite iustoque modo & non nequiciose aut fraudulenter sunt confecta vel emanate, & sic tandem transsumantur, in litterasque & privilegia sine dolo fraudeque redigantur. Et talia postea transsumpta servantur. [§3] Secus tamen est de litteris & privilegiis in Capitulis vel Conventibus per litteras Requisitorias inventis aut inveniendis. Quia tales semper observantur. Dummodo originales ipsæ litteræ non sint modo preallegato in se transsumptionales que (ut prefertur) non valent.

Super privilegiis cum clausula de cuius vel quorum noticia confectis, et de larvis seu ficticiis personis. Tit. xvi.

CAeterum universæ litteræ ac privilegia quorumcunque Capitulorum vel Conventuum in quibus clausula ista continetur: DE CUIUS VEL QUORUM NOTITIA nos talis homo certificavit aut assecuravit &c. annullatæ cassatæque & invalidatæ habentur neque in iudicio aliquando locum habere permittuntur. [§1] Ratio est quia Fassio per quempiam hoc modo facta non ad Capitulum vel Conventum sed illum qui ipsum certificavit & assecuravit trahitur atque refetur, ita ut non Capitulum vel Conventus, sed ille certificans videatur astruere & affirmare quod talis Fassionem vel aliam obligationem fecit. NOTITIA autem eius qui fatebitur Capitulo vel Conventui debet semper constare ut idem Capitulum aut ipse Conventus merito talem coram se constitutum fuisse & huiusmodi ac huiusmodi Fassionem fecisse libere possit affirmare. Alioquin autem ad certificationem aut assecuracionem cuiuspiam non tenetur, neque poterit iustas & legitimas litteras dare vel rite privilegia conficere. §2] LICET nonnulli reperiantur salutis & honoris eorum immemores qui personas sepe larvales & ficticias coram Capitulo vel Conventu, interdum autem coram iudicibus quoque regni ordinariis sistere statuereque & iniquas Fassiones per eas pro sese fieri procurant. Nihilominus tamen Capitulum vel Conventus aut iudices ordinarii, qui ad Fassiones talium personarum ignoranter litteras & privilegia dant per hoc non peccant quia ipsi non larvas neque ficticias personas sed eos quos illi sese nominant realiter existere putant. §3] Secus est si Capitula vel Conventus aut iudices ordinarii scienter & studiose id facerent, vel aliter falsas & iniquas litteras conficerent. Nam hoc modo tanquam falsarii & periuri punientur et ex eo Capitula vel Conventus in sigillorum præterea illi qui de membro Capituli aut Conventus tempore confectionis & sigillationis huiusmodi falsarum litterarum præsentis fuerint in beneficiorum suorum. Iudices vero ordinarii seculares in sententia Capitali, necnon perpetua bonorum & iurium possessionariorum suorum ipsos proprie concernentium ac sigillorum pariter & honoris eorum amissione condemnantur. [§4] Insuper ut stigma sigilli igniti frontibus & faciebus Capitularium vel Conventualium, qui (ut præmittitur) in confectione & sigillatione ipsarum iniquarum litterarum interfuerint ac participes extiterint imprimatur & inuratur decretum generale mandat.

Quid debet attendi in cognitione falsarum litterarum. Tit. xvii.

ITem in examine discussionequè falsarum litterarum debet attendi per iudices maxime datum litterarum seu dies emanationis privilegiorum atque annorum positio, necnon sigilli impressio vel appensio ac circumferentia & superscriptio. [§1] Item privilegiorum ac litterarum in nominibus vel cognitionibus personarum aut possessionum in eisdem contentarum & expressatarum, abrasio aut cancellatio, et his diligenter calculatis facile apparebit litterarum sive privilegiorum iusta vel iniusta confectio. [§2] Privilegia autem pono & iusto modo confecta etiam destructis & dirutis sigillis semper observantur, dummodo circumferentiæ sigillorum & scripturæ bene appareant atque cognoscantur. [§3] Falsitas autem litterarum ad Fassionem præactarum larvalium & ficticiarum personarum inique emanatarum ex hoc maxime apparebit si ille, cuius nomine & in persona eiuscemodi Fassio facta extiterit tempore emanationis & confectionis ipsarum litterarum se in alio loco & non ibi ubi ipsa Fassio fraudulenter peracta est constitutum fuisse poterit bono testimonio comprobare. [§4] Postquam igitur quispiam nobilium nomine & in persona sua Fassionem aliquam modo antelato factam intellexerit mox eidem contradicere & eam reclamare studeat. Quæ semper & ubique locorum credibilium ac testimonialium rite fieri poterit ubi huiusmodi falsitas ad noticiam sui devenerit atque deducta erit. [§5] Et hanc speciem falsitatis articulus super delatione falsarum litterarum in seriebus notarum infidelitatis prædeclaratus in se comprehendit.

Prosequutio secunde partis in speciali: et primo de Evocationibus.

Titulus. xviii.

ABSolutis itaque præmissis notabilibus ad prosecutionem cæpte materiæ huius secundæ partis revertendum est. Ubi primo de exordio causarum scilicet Evocationibus dicendum statui. [§1] Unde sciendum quod Evocatio non est aliud quam ad actionem vel querimoniam iudici ordinario per quempiam & adversus quempiam porrectam in præsentiam eiusdem iudicis legitima vocatio. [§2] QUÆ nostra hac tempestate plures habet species multaue complectitur genera. EVOCATIONUM enim aliæ sunt simplices, aliæ Peremptoriales vel Insinuationales, aliæ Amonitoria, aliæ vero Introductoriales & Reambulatoria. [§3] CAUSÆ itaque in facto iurium possessionariorum impignoratitiorum iurium Quartalitiorum, dotum & rerum Peraffernalium, debitorum, obligaminum, divisionum inter fratres indivisos fiendarum & novorum iudiciorum per quemcunque impetrandorum etiam per simplicem Evocationem motæ eo præcise brevi termino quo causæ per insinuationem intentatæ levare discutique & terminari debent. [§4] RELIQUE vero causæ per Amonitionem vel aliam simplicem Evocationem aut Statutionem & Recaptivationem bonorum, vel etiam metalem Reambulationem inchoatæ in quatuor terminis Octavalibus finaliter concludi solent. [§5] SI QUIS etiam ad præassumptam cautionem expeditoriam in defensionem alicuius causæ vel ad litteras & litteralia instrumenta apud quempiam forsitan habita aut occultata qualicunque Evocatione fuerit vocatus talis Evocatio semper unico termino ubi videlicet principalis causa levata fuerit decidi & finiri consuevit. [§6] EVOCATIONES vero cum insinuatione ratione quorumcunque actuum potentiariarum terminos præscriptionis nondum transcribentes rite semper decernuntur. [§7] In causis etiam longo litis processu motis tertiaro insinuationes loco trineforensis proclamationis subsequuntur.

Qualiter et per quos Evocationes fieri debeant. Tit. xviii.

OMnis autem Evocatio per regium aut Palatinalem & alicuius loci credibilis homines de iuribus possessionariis hæreditariis vel impignoratitiis atque etiam officiolatibus eorum qui sunt evocandi fieri debet. [§1] DE OFFICIOLATIBUS autem verum esse intellige si talis Evocatio prætextu actuum potentiariarum in illo officiolatu perpetratorum decernitur. Nam ratione iurium possessionariorum vel aliorum negotiorum Evocatio de officiolatibus cuiuspiam facta non admittitur. [§2] OMNIS autem homo regius aut Palatinalis Evocationem nec non bonorum statutionem, restatutionem, metalem Reambulationem & aliam quamlibet exequutionem iuridicam faciens, in eo comitatu, ubi exequutio fit, hæreditatem nobilitatem debet habere. [§3] Nam aliter Exequutionem aliquam nequit facere nisi forte de curia regia per iudices regni ordinarios ad ipsam Exequutionem fuerit deputatus atque missus. [§4] Nam hoc modo quilibet nobilis immo & ignobilis (si tamen ignobilis ipse scriba vel notarius curiæ regie fuerit) in qualibet Exequutione procedere potest. [§5] Antiquitus enim aulæ regię milites & alii curiales ad Exequutiones & præsertim bonorum Statutiones mittebantur.

De personali Citatione, Amonitione et Prohibitione. Tit. xx.

Hic tamen sciendum est quod si quispiam dominorum vel nobilium durantibus dietis & conventionibus generalibus vel octavis aut aliis brevibus iudiciis alterum quempiam in huiusmodi dieta vel conventionem aut Octavis & brevibus iudiciis constitutum morte, vulneribus vel verberibus aut etiam verbali dehonestatione infamiam inducente affecerit talis mox absque quolibet Capitulari aut Conventuali homine, per solum scribam seu notarium curiæ regię per iudices ordinarios vel alterum eorum ad id destinandum, ad instantiam læsæ partis personaliter in sui præsentiam citari poterit. [§1] PRÆTEREA si quis alterius bona ac iura possessionaria pignoris titulo tenens in conspectu alicuius iudicis ordinarii per eum qui bona ipsa sibi pignora vit vel ad quem redemptio eorundem bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum legitime attinet, aut solummodo per procuratorem eius legitimum repertus ad tollendam pecuniam suam & remittenda ipsa bona ac iura possessionaria semper amoneri poterit, & ille tertio aut eodem (si voluerit) die amonitionis sibi respondere debet, ita tamen si copiam seu paria litterarum Impignoratarum actor ipse coram iudice suo tunc producere valebit. [§2] Nam aliter amonitus ille respondere sibi hoc modo & processu non tenetur sed actor per regium aut palatinalem & alicuius loci testimonialis homines, ut amonitionem eiuscemodi pariter & Evocationem peragat necesse erit. [§3] Et non solum in facto Impignoratio ipsa amonitio, verum etiam in negotio iuris hæreditarii & perennalis prohibitio personalis in conspectu iudicum regni ordinariorum semper & ubique fieri poterit. Dummodo prohibens & prohibitus coram ipsis iudicibus ordinariis personaliter & non per procuratorem reperiantur. Nam aliter personalis huiusmodi prohibitio locum non habet, [§4] quæ ratione potissimum indebitæ, & potentiariæ detentionis iurium possessionariorum fieri consuevit. Et virtutem Evocatoriæ cum insinuatione factæ immo maiorem vim habet. Tertio namque die prohibitionis ipse prohibitus respondere tenetur. Si vero respondere noluerit licet contra eum capitalis vel alia sententia eo tunc non feratur tamen si prohibentem contra se infra integram unius anni revolutionem legitime evocari non fecerit, vel si etiam fecerit# attamen in debite bona & iura illa possessionaria, quorum ratione eadem prohibitio personalis facta est detinuisse vel detinere per iudicem compertus fuerit eo præcise modo quo in causa per insinuationem mota in capitali vel emendæ capitis (iuxta scilicet personarum litigantium conditionem) sententia prohibitus ipse condemnatur. [§5] Ubi vero prohibens cum omnibus litteralibus suis instrumentis factum huiusmodi bonorum litigiosorum tangentibus coram suo iudice ipsa die responsionis non comparebit, vel cum ipsis litteris paratus comparere nequibit tunc adversus prohibitum & iudicem suum in regali iudicio sex marcarum convincetur. [§6] Et si ulterius causam illam prosequi voluerit deposito ipso onere sex marcarum alio processu prosequendi habebit facultatem. [§7] Et hoc verum est si prohibitus prænotata die responsionis iuri parebit, & ad prohibitionem illam de facto & immediate respondebit. [§8] Ubi autem prohibitus vel in causam attractus litteralia sua instrumenta ibidem producendo bona ac iura ipsa possessionaria prætextu quorum eiuscemodi personalis prohibitio facta fuit ad se iusto titulo pertinere poterit comprobare tunc actor seu prohibens ipse mox in estimatione communi bonorum illorum convincetur. [§9] Si vero prohibitus ipse prædicta die tertia non respondebit, neque actorem contra se infra dictam unius anni revolutionem ad ipsam personalem prohibitionem evocabit tunc idem prohibens peracta huiusmodi annuali revolutione prohibitum primo simplici Evocatione, secundo vero ex processu iudiciario insinuatione mediante adversum se Evocare debet. [§10] Quiquidem prohibitus & in causam attractus (quia respondere & Evocationem præmissam peragere per hocque eandem prohibitionem viribus contra se accrescere permisit) in termino discussionis ipsius causæ in sententia capitali vel emendæ capitis si prohibitio ipsa potentiariam & indebitam bonorum detentionem vel occupationem denotaverit, & actor efficaci iure bona illa litigiosa ad se pertinuisse vel pertinere poterit verificare condemnabitur eo facto.

De testimoniis capitularibus ac conventualibus ad exequutiones mittendis. xxi.

ADvertendum præterea est, quod Evocationes necnon bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum Statutiones, Restatutiones, metales Reambulationes, Amonitiones & aliæ quælibet iudiciariæ exequutiones per hominem regium aut Palatinalem cum testimonio illius Capituli vel Conventus, quod vel qui in ipso comitatu, ubi exequutio sit habetur. Si autem neutrum eorum habetur tunc cum testimonio alterius loci sibi vicinioris fieri semper & peragi debent. [§1] Aliter enim condescendet causa per actorem (si voluerit) de novo inchoanda & resuscitanda, [§2] demptis testimoniis Capitulum Albensis, Budensis & Boznensis ecclesiarum atque Conventus Cruciferorum de Alba, qui in quibuscunque exequutionibus per totum regnum Hungariæ & partes sibi subiectas procedendi habent auctoritatem. [§3] SIMPLICES autem inquisitiones super actibus potentiariis etiam per aliorum Capitulum & Conventuum propinquiorum testimonia ubilibet exequi possunt.

De pena illius, qui homo regius simul et procurator in una eademque causa compertus fuerit.

Titulus. xxii.

HOc autem sciendum est quod homo regius aut Palatinalis in eadem causa qua Evocationem vel aliam exequutionem fecerit procurator seu advocatus esse non poterit. [§1] Nam si quispiam homo regius vel Palatinalis atque etiam procurator in una eademque causa repertus fuerit contra eum adversus quem procuratoris officium gerit vel gesserit in suo Homagio de facto convincetur. [§2] Et ratio est quia homo regius aut Palatinalis penes testimonium seu hominem cuiuscunque loci credibilis Capituli scilicet aut Conventus tanquam iudex in persona sui superioris iudicis ad exequutionem missus stat & reputatur. Procurator autem pro actore estimatur. Nam agens & opponens est, sicque iudex & actor esse deprehenditur. Nemo autem in una eademque causa actor & iudex simul esse permittitur. Ideo in Homagio suo merito convincetur.

De pena eius, qui mortuum vel puerum evocaverit, aut nobilem statui commiserit. xxiii.

HOc quoque non prætermittendum quod si quispiam litigantium nobilem quempiam iam præmortuum & ab hac luce decessum contra se evocari fecerit, vel etiam familiares aliquorum dominorum prælatorum aut baronum vel regni nobilium possessionatos & titulo vere nobilitatis fungentes tempore Evocationis domino suo statui commiserit, vel etiam aliter statui facere procurabit aut aliquem puerum illegitimè ætatis ratione actuum potentiariarum contra se evocaverit tunc talis actor & contra ipsum nobilem præmortuum & puerum illegitimæ ætatis atque singulos huiusmodi familiares nobiles in singulis quinquaginta marcis Homagialibus (si exceptionem & objectionem adversus actorem super ea re fecerint) convincetur & condemnabitur eo facto. [§1] NOBILES enim evocari & non statui debent. [§2] Ad solos autem rusticos vel rurales & iobagonalis conditionis homines atque familiares ignobiles attinet statutio quos proprii domini ipsorum terrestres & non officiales statuere ac in præsentiam iudicis sistere tenentur.

De Amonitionibus ratione iurium Impignoratorum & Dotalitiorum fiendis, & penis exinde sequendis. xxiii.

Amonitiones siquidem ad levandam pecuniam & remittendam portionem Impignoratitiam vel ad tollendas Dotes & res Paraffernales iuraque Quartalitia & huiusmodi &c. personaliter si actor præsentiam eius qui vel quæ amonendus aut amonenda est habere poterit. Alioquin autem de domo habitationis ac solitæ residentiæ eius fieri possunt. [§1] VERUM tamen Evocatio post amonitionem non personaliter sed de iuribus eiusdem amoniti vel amonitæ possessionariis populosis hæreditariis aut impignoratitiis unde scilicet ad notitiam sui Evocatio facta fuisse possit devenire fieri debet. [§2] Nam aliter si iobagione carebit, etiam de curia sua nobilitari ac domo solitæ residentiæ suæ talis rite admoneri pariter & evocari poterit. [§3] Si tamen Iobagionem vel Iobagiones habuerit de illis Evocatio fieri debebit. Alioquin enim si personaliter aut de domo habitationis suæ evocatus aut evocata fuerit actor contra Evocatum vel Evocatam in Homagio eiusdem convinci debet & agravari. [§4] UBI sciendum quod siqui nobilium aut quæ mulierum ad tollendas pecunias suas & remittendas portiones impignoratitias vel etiam levandam Dotem & res Paraffernales suas atque reddenda & remittenda iura possessionaria mariti sui defuncti illi ad quem de iure spectabunt amoniti aut amonitæ fuerint, & illis tempore eiuscemodi amonitionis non levatis neque iuribus possessionariis remissis Evocatio subsequuta extiterit, ac ad terminum ipsis assignatum Octavalem videlicet aut brevium iudiciorum venire vel mittere neglexerint tunc ulteriori termino non expectato actori huiusmodi iura possessionaria sine omni prorsus pecuniaria solutione per iudicem restituentur, & illi evocati vel ipsæ evocatæ iura sua extra dominium ipsorum bonorum requirere & prosequi tenentur. [§5] Immo fenerator ille qui pecunias tollere & bona iuraque Impignoratitia remittere recusavit vigore generalis decreti nostri in tanta præterea pecuniarum summa qua sibi fuerunt iura illa impignorata contra partem adversam de facto convincetur. [§6] Et hoc verum esse intellige si Amonitio pariter & Evocatio per eum facta fuerit, qui pignorationem fecit, vel eius filium aut fratrem, in quem ut puta devolutio bonorum ipsorum Impignoratorum manifeste respicit. Nam ad instantiam vicinorum aut commetaneorum eorundem bonorum pœna præmissa subsequi non consuevit. [§7] MULIER VERO amonita & prætextu dotis reique Peraffernalis suæ modo præmisso evocata siquidem comparuerit, exquisitis tamen per responsionem aliquibus subterfugiis ad alium terminum causam suam prorogari facere procuraverit, ut interea fructus bonorum illorum capere & percipere posset, & in ipso tandem termino responsionem suam bono modo probare non potuerit tunc dotem & rem suam Peraffernalem propter fraudem & frivolam suam responsionem (et quo multæ fœminæ bona pupillorum huiusmodi cavillationibus extremæ desolationi subiecisse dinoscuntur) per omnia amittet eo facto, & actori bona ac iura possessionaria ipsa sine quavis solutione dotalitii per iudicem suum reddi & restatui debent.

De clausula Evocationis: litispendentia; quid importet. Tit. xxv.

Item super clausula Evocationum LITIs pendentia si qua foret inter ipsos (Evocantem scilicet & Evocatum) non obstante Sciendum quod propter evitandum calumniæ factum quæ calumnia ex duplici & interdum longe multiplici causarum motione atque prosecutione maxime solet evenire clausula ipsa in Evocatione consuevit apponi [§1] ne actor cum reo vel in causam attracto prætextu aliquorum negotiorum in lite existente & litis inter medio partium ipsarum altera quocunque actu potentiario per alteram lederetur, vel aliter litigare cogere, & propterea causa de novo suscitaretur causæ prius motæ & intentatæ nova Evocatio quovis modo possit derogari, vel quicquam oneris aut gravaminis actori vel econtra generari. [§2] Et ista clausula in prima Evocatoria consuevit inseri. In secunda namque vel tertia Evocatoria ex processu causarum procedente non est necessaria.

Tria requiruntur in Evocatione expresse denotanda. Tit. xxvi.

Item in omni Evocatione, & actionis declaratione præsertim ratione actuum potentiariorum fienda tria requiruntur expresse denotanda. [§1] PRIMO persona per quam & contra quam querela vel actio proponitur. [§2] SECUNDO tempus vel terminus quo quis alteri damna aut iniurias patravit vel irrogavit. [§3] ET tertio locus ac comitatus ubi videlicet & in quo huiusmodi damna vel iniuriæ fuere patrata & commissa. [§4] Item si prætextu occupationis iurium possessionariorum causa mota fuerit ut portio quoque occupata bene specificetur necesse est. [§5] Nam absque conditionibus istis iudex ordinarius inter partes rectum congruensque iudicium administrare non poterit, maxime si causa ipsa ad communem inquisitionem iuxta responsiones partium submissa deductaque fuerit, in cuius celebratione & temporis expressio & loci ac comitatus descriptio atque etiam rei perpetratę series vel quantitatis bonorum occupatorum declaratio summe necessaria semper est & erit.

Quid sit communis inquisitio, & quot conditiones requirantur ad eius celebrationem. xxvii.

ULterius sciendum, quod communis inquisitio est dubietatis ex responsionibus litigantium coram iudice emergentibus per attestaciones testium certa declaratio, [§1] quæ per vicinos & commetaneos illius possessionis ubi actus potentiarii de quo agitur perpetratio accidit vel illata est nobilesque comprovinciales ipsius comitatus in quo eadem possessio adiacet in loco utpote sedis iudiciariæ eiusdem comitatus. Nisi forsitan pretextu occupationis iurium possessionariorum vel terrarum causa ventiletur. Nam in hoc casu non in loco sedis semper sed in facie terrę litigiosę sæpe fieri & celebrari consuevit. [§2] UT autem omnis communis inquisitio bono & iusto modo celebrari possit quinque conditiones sunt observandæ scilicet libertas, ætas, modalitas, conditio & sacramenti depositio. [§3] PRIMO (inquam) requiritur libertas ut libere & sine metu sponteque & non violenta coactione sed iuridica dumtaxat requisitione quisque testium veritati testimonium perhibeat ne inter arma iura silere videantur. [§4] SECUNDO exigitur ætas ut testis ipse tantæ sit ætatis quod rerum gestarum super quibus examinabitur memoriam habeat atque recordetur. Legi enim in reportatis seriebus communium inquisitionum & non modo legi verumetiam vidi plerosque dono & favore corruptos vix sedecem aut viginti ad maximum annos agere, & de rebus circiter vigesimo quinto prius anno patratæ & gestis scitu Fassionem & attestacionem constanter tanquam illis interfuisent fecisse. Et quia conspectui iudicum ordinariorum regni testes ipsarum inquisitionum personaliter adduci & præsentari non solent sed per regios dumtaxat vel

Palatinales ac Capitulorum & Conventuum homines ad id transmittendos examinationes huiusmodi testium fieri consueverunt. Ideo ipsi diligenter & ętati testium & tempori gestarum rerum superintendere veramque super ea re relationem facere tenentur. [§5] TERTIO necessaria est modalitas, ut testis de modo patratę rei super qua interrogabitur aperte manifesteque fateatur, utrum scitu vel auditu rem ipsam ac causę merita novit? aut forsitan ab ore illius qui facinus (de quo agitur) perpetravit eiusdem seriem accepit? Simplici enim auditui locus dari non solet neque debet sed prohdolor plurimi hoc tempore dum abundat iam iniquitas & non refriguit modo verumetiam extincta est multorum charitas, non eo prout ipsis constat ordine vel modo sed iuxta nutum voluntatemque actoris aut in causam attracti per quem scilicet vocati fuerint maculata coinquinataque conscientia testimonia proferunt idque ita fieri ego ipse conspexi. [§6] QUARTO advertenda est testium conditio utrum videlicet nobilis vel rusticus testimonium veritati perhibeat? Nam rusticana attestatio (demptis officialibus dominorum pręlatorum & baronum ac aliorum regni nobilium in personis eorum officia in vicinitate tenentibus, qui iuxta antiquorum consuetudinem in hac parte pro personis nobilibus reputantur) contra personam nobilitarem nihil valet nisi forsitan meritis causę ita exigentibus per iudicem ut nobiles & ignobiles pariter examinentur claro sermone fuerit descriptum atque commissum. Hoc tamen raro & non nisi partibus sic volentibus ac consentientibus fieri & admitti consuevit. [§7] Rustici enim & plebeę conditionis homines tum donis tum terroribus longe facilius citiusque quam nobiles a tramite veritatis abstrahi possunt. [§8] Et alias inconueniens incongruumque videtur nobilem tanquam superiorem testimonio inferioris scilicet rustici sententia capitali plectendum iudicari vel aliter condemnari debere prout vetusta & approbata regni huius super ea re consuetudo apud omnes fere iudices & advocatos nota manifesta que habetur. [§9] QUINTO & ultimo in celebratione communis inquisitionis requiratur iuramenti depositio, [§10] quę licet prima fronte a testibus exigenda sit primumque locum etiam inter conditiones prędeclaratas sortiri debeat, quia tamen hęc conditio vulgata nimis & manifesta est, ac in litteris quoque adiudicatoriis iudicum super ipsa communi inquisitione conficiendis expresse semper describitur, & alias quęlibet communis inquisitio iuramentali depositione terminatur prout clare inferius declarabitur, ideo ultimo illam posui.

Qualiter sunt examinandi testes in communi inquisitione & de pena eorum, qui vocati ad testificandum venire recusant. xxviii.

NEcessarium itaque est quemlibet testium antequam fateatur super eo iuramentum deponere quod ipse omni timore, odio, favore, amore & pręmio litigantium remoto ac postposito veritatem non celabit, falsitatem non iustificabit, iustitiam non falsificabit sed prout res illa de qua examinabitur sibi nota est vel constat iuste declarabit. [§1] Et ne quispiam ab eiusmodi attestazione dicenda que veritate favore forsitan partis alterius allectus, vel munere corruptus, sive metu percussus, aut odio interno tactus se abstrahere & occultare possit tum vigore generalis decreti nostri, tum vero consuetudine antiqua & longo tempore observari solita dictante comes aut vice comes parochialis illius comitatus ubi communis ipsa inquisitio celebratur & peragitur per litteras iudicis ordinarii adiudicatorias vel etiam alias super ea re dumtaxat pręceptorie emanandas requisitus quoslibet nobiles eiusdem comitatus sub onere sedecim marcarum gravis ponderis quamlibet marcam per quattuor florenos vel quadringentos denarios computando per eundem comitem vel vicecomitem super eos qui amoniti ac requisiti attestationi huiusmodi inter esse in ibique testimonium veritati perhibere recusaverint immediate & irremissibiliter exigendarum ad ipsam eandem attestacionem & communem inquisitionem peragendam convocandi agregandique plenariam habet potestatis facultatem.

Quod duplici ratione solent nomina testium in litteris relatoriis conscribi. xxix.

NOmina autem & cognomina testium & quis eorum vicinus ac quis commetaneus, aut comprovincialis fuerit in litteris Capitularibus vel Conventualibus super celebratione ipsius communis inquisitionis relatoriis semper sunt perscribenda; & hoc duplici ratione. [§1] PRIMO quoniam attestations duorum vel trium vicinorum & commetaneorum plusquam viginti nobilium comprovincialium in iudicio valent & ponderant qui longe verius meliusque quam nobiles comprovinciales super meritis causę ac gestę rei serie propter propinquitatem possunt esse certiores. [§2] SECUNDO ut testium nominibus simul & attestacionibus declaratis & conscriptis litigantium quilibet exceptiones pro se necessarias, aut de periurio vel mala testificacione, aut infamia, vel ętate contra eos quos voluerit & digne poterit facere & opponere queat. [§3] Ne presertim periurium si quod in attestacione per quempiam (prout iam crebro fieri solet) commissum fuerit impunitum pretereat. Nam & iuxta sapientem testis iniquus non erit impunitus qui & contra deum graviter peccat eius iustitiam denegando, & proximum suum damnificat iniquo testimonio ipsum decipiendo.

De pena periurorum et Aucariorum Lwdas appellatorum. xxx.

UNde iusto dei & humano iudicio quilibet fidefragus & periurus (quem nos communi vocabulo Aucarium hoc est: Lwdas appellamus) acriter est puniendus. [§1] Amittit enim (ubi de periurio fuerit convictus) universa & quelibet iura sua possessionaria atque cuncta bona mobilia ubilibet adiacentia & quocunque nomine nuncupata. [§2] Immo proprietate bonorum suorum privabitur & perpetuo carebit [§3] & non solum his exhæreditabitur sed etiam in persona sua (amisso humanitatis honore) tanta ignominia afficietur ita ut inter alios cristicolas tanquam ab humanitate relegatus atque segregatus disparibus vestibus indutus, zona canapea succinctus, discalciatis pedibus & nudato capite semper incedere cogetur. [§4] In iudicio vero ipse contra neminem adversus autem eum quilibet agendi habebit auctoritatem. [§5] Et hoc intellige respectu iurisdictionis sacrę coronę regni & contra principem nostrum fieri. Nam adversus actorem solummodo in Homagio & emenda capitis sui ducentos florenos faciente periurus & fidefragus solet condemnari. [§6] UBI sciendum quod periurium duobus modis committi intelligitur. PRIMO modo dicitur transgressio liciti iuramenti quando videlicet quispiam promittit aliquid alteri fide mediante se daturum, vel hoc & id facturum; & deinde promissionem huiusmodi transgreditur. Et in hoc casu præmissa infamia & bonorum amissio non semper sequitur. Nam per validam egritudinem ac viarum discrimina & temporum disturbia promittens ipse sepe numero super his excusatur; nihilominus tamen promissum adimplere & observare compellitur. [§7] SECUNDO modo periurium dicitur mendatium iuramento firmatum in fraudem & periclitacionem iurium cuiuspiam maliciose commissum. Et hoc modo pœna Aucariorum prædeclarata semper decernitur atque pronunciatur.

Quod celebratio communis inquisitionis binario numero fieri non admittitur. xxxi.

ADvertendum est autem quod ubi semel communis inquisitio per utramque partem celebrata fuerit turbatione notoria non interveniente tunc secundo causa ipsa ad requisitionem alicuius partis ad eandem communem inquisitionem submitti non debet prout nonnulli exquisitis diversis obiectionibus & coloribus fieri & submitti debere sepe moliuntur. [§1] De reliquis autem clausulis celebrationis atque etiam turbationis communis ipsius inquisitionis in decretis generalibus manifestam claramque habemus descriptionem.

Qualiter post communem inquisitionem, et etiam prius, litigantibus iuramenta decernuntur. Tit. xxxii.

SCiendum ulterius quod omnis communis inquisitio iuramentali depositione terminatur. [§1] Si enim actor intentum suum atque actionem & acquisitionem suam sufficienti testimonio hoc est, sex vicinorum & totidem commetaneorum atque duodecim nobilium comprovincialium attestazione comprobabit, aut si tot præcise vicinos & commetaneos habere non poterit nihilominus tamen testimonio comprovincialium huiusmodi defectum bene suplebit & in causam attractus in comprobatione sua defecerit vel si etiam modicum quid probaverit tunc actor ad caput in causam attracti quinquagesimo se nobilibus iuxta scilicet Homagium suum iurabit. [§2] Si vero utraque partium actionem ac responsionem suam sufficienter verificabit tunc reo vel in causam attracto iuxta vigores litterarum inquisitionalium per actorem tempore adiudicationis (quo ad communem huiusmodi inquisitionem causa submissa fuerat) productarum & exhibitarum iuramentum præstandum adiudicatur, ita quod si trinę litteræ inquisitorię fuerunt productæ tunc reus quinquagesimo, Si vero binę vigesimo quinto, si autem unicę dumtaxat duodecimo se nobilibus iurabit, & se ab actione acquisitioneque actoris expurgabit. [§3] UBI vero attestatio pro parte in causam attracti meliori modo quam actoris facta celebrataque fuerit tamen etiam actor aliquid probaverit, tunc reus secundum trium litterarum Inquisitoriarum vires vigesima quinta, duarum vero duodecima, unicarum autem sexta nobilium adhibita manu sacramentum præstabit, & se ab impetitione actoris eliberabit. [§4] SI AUTEM actor in attestazione sua per omnia defecerit, vel forsitan communem ipsam inquisitionem neque celebraverit tunc reus ille simpliciter ab impetitione actoris absolvi debet [§5] & econverso: Si in causam attractus communem huiusmodi inquisitionem celebrari obmiserit, aut forte celebrationem eius peregerit, sed pro sua parte nullum testimonium reportare poterit tunc sententia mox diffinitiva exinde per iudicem contra reum pronuncianda erit. Et in reliquis quoque cunctis Evocationibus idem est sentiendum atque faciendum. [§6] QUOD SI actor trinas litteras Inquisitorias produxerit, & reus proposita adversus eum simpliciter negaverit quinquagesimo se nobilibus iurabit. Et insuper si in facto occupationis iurium possessionariorum causa mota fuit actor de facto bona occupata pro se recuperabit. [§7] Si tamen negaverit, & se immunem esse communi præmissa inquisitione mediante declarare voluerit, actor autem eandem communem inquisitionem non acceptaverit tunc attractus vigesimo quinto se dumtaxat nobilibus se expurgabit; & sic consequenter ad inferiora descendendo, ut videlicet contra binas litteras Inquisitorias duodecimo, contra unicas vero tertio se nobilibus sacramentum præstabit. Nam istę quoque unicę firmitate carebunt, si actor communem ipsam inquisitionem acceptare recusabit. [§8] ITEM ubi in causam attractus in primo responsionis termino se iuramento actoris ad caput suum iuxta regni consuetudinem deponendo submiserit & actor hoc acceptare noluerit tunc attractus tertio solummodo se nobilibus (si etiam tres litteræ Inquisitoriæ fuissent pro parte actoris exhibitæ) sacramentum præstare tenetur. [§9] Si autem iuramento solius actoris hoc est in persona dumtaxat sua propria deponendo attractus se submiserit, & actor hoc quoque acceptare recusaverit reus ipse statim absolvetur. [§10] IN CÆTERIS vero minoribus causis ubi per actorem nullæ litteræ Inquisitoriæ fuerint exhibitæ reus tertio semper se nobilibus, IN FACTO tamen debiti vel mutui dum per actorem nullum probabile documentum poterit produci, reus vel in causam attractus sola sua in persona iurabit. [§11] UBI autem de facto debiti aut mutui vel aliarum pecuniarum amissarum testimonium quidem extiterit allatum, de quantitate tamen summæ illius experimentum afferri non poterit tunc actor pecuniam suam iuramento mediante quamlibet scilicet marcam quatuor florenos facientem iuramento unius nobilis recuperabit. [§12] RURALIS namque & rustica persona non nisi ad unum florenum centum denarios valentem iurandi habet facultatem, quæ in causis nobilium admitti non consuevit.

Utrum iuramentum nobilis penes rusticum & e contra in recuperatione damnorum valeat. Tit. xxxiii.

UNde quæritur: Utrum iuramentum nobilis pro damnorum vel debitorum recuperatione penes rusticum & ignobilem præstitum censeatur tantæ efficacitæ & virtutis esse quantæ sit iuramentum penes nobilem depositum aut in vim dumtaxat rusticani iuramenti transeat? [§1] ET ECONTRA si nobilis quispiam iuramentis cum rusticanis secundum facultatis eorum exigentiam deponendis sua damna vel debita possit recuperare? [§2] DICENDUM quod iuramentum nobilis tam penes nobilem, quam etiam ignobilem præstitum semper valet & semper eiusdem est efficacitæ atque virtutis, dummodo iuste, legitimeque deponatur. Nam per iuramenti depositionem iusto modo factam infamia non sequitur, & per hoc neque nobilis quispiam dignitati suæ nobilitari renunciasset dinoscitur. [§3] VERUM tamen iuramentum ignobili, & rustici tanquam inferioris penes nobilem & contra nobilem veluti superiorem non valet neque admittitur; licet nobilis contra ignobilem cum ignobilibus iurare permittitur. [§4] Et rusticus quoque per eum in causa contra nobilem ratione forsitan debitorum vel aliorum similium negotiorum mota cum ignobilibus sibi similibus iuxta iudicis deliberationem iuramentum præstandi habeat facultatem super iuramentis tamen in causis nobilium imponendis & deponendis modo præallegato semper est sentiendum.

De iuramentis in facto litteralium instrumentorum decernendis & imponendis. xxxiiii.

ADvertendum deinde est quod super facto litterarum ac litteralium instrumentorum per quemlibet occultatorum, vel aliter apud manus cuiuspiam habitorem reo & in causam attracto validior expurgatio quam in aliis actibus potentiariis imponitur. [§1] Nam si actor unquam dumtaxat vel duas ad maximum litteras Inquisitorias super ea re produxerit quinquagesimo, Si vero nullas prorsus exhibuerit sed simplici dumtaxat verborum prolacione vel iuridica amonitione quempiam litteralia ipsa instrumenta habere astruxerit denique vigesimo quinto se nobilibus iuramentum reo deponendum adiudicatur. [§2] Qui si in depositione huiusmodi sacramenti defecerit tunc tutor & expeditor illorum bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum super quorum litteris iurare non potuit esse declarabitur, & actorem suosque heredes in dominio eorundem iurium possessionariorum adversus quoslibet causidicos & legitimos impeditores semper conservare tenebitur. [§3] In litteris tamen Evocatoriis litteralia illa instrumenta quæ & qualia existant expresse debent denotari ne fraus in Evocatione per actorem committatur. [§4] ET HOC SI universas litteras & quemlibet litteralia instrumenta factum aliquorum iurium possessionariorum tangentes & concernentia apud reum existere non proposuerit. Nam isto casu non erit necessarium litterarum numerum vel qualitatem sed iurium dumtaxat huiusmodi possessionariorum nomina situsque describere. Ubi enim omnes vel universas proponit, ibi nullas excipit, [§5] & si universas posuerit caveat actor ne aliquas factum talium iurium possessionariorum tangentes litteras postea producat vel exhiberi faciat. Nam in facto calumniæ hoc casu mox vincetur. [§6] SCIENDUM deinde est quod si plures fuerint fratres carnales vel aliter indivisi litteras ac litteralia instrumenta adversus fœminei sexus homines in iudicio contradictorio (prout plerumque fieri contingit) producentes & exhibentes tunc non omnibus fratribus singillatim sed solummodo natu maiori ad quem ut puta tam litteralium instrumentorum conservatio quam etiam causarum directio pertinere dinoscitur quinquagesima manu hoc est quinquagesimo se nobilibus iuramentum adiudicari debet.

In quibus casibus sunt perscribenda nomina coniuratorum. xxxv.

ADvertendum quoque est quod in iuramentali depositione in quatuor casibus videlicet super facto probationis genealogiarum ac litterarum & litteralium instrumentorum; Item metalium Reambulationum, nec non ad capita quorumpiam fienda atque præstanda nomina coniuratorum in litteris exinde Relatoriis conscribi debent semper & declarari [§1] ut veris cum nobilibus & iuxta iudicis commissionem iuramentum eiuscemodi depositum fuisse comprobetur. [§2] In cæteris autem sacramentorum depositionibus coniuratorum nomina non sunt ex necessitate conscribenda.

De pena eius, qui alterum ignobilem vel infamem dixerit, et de diversis exitibus iuramentorum. xxxvi.

ITem si quispiam adversus coniuratores vel alterorum illorum exceptiones in quatuor præmissis casibus fecerit quod coniurator ipse aut verus non esset nobilis & mere nobilitatis titulo non fungeretur, aut aliter infamis vel periurus haberetur tunc ad declarandam pariter & verificandam illius nobilitatem vel etiam propellendam eius infamiam unicus tantummodo terminus iuridicus actori præfigi debet & assignari, [§1] in quo si ipsum verum esse nobilem litterali fulcimento ac honeste conditionis hominem alio quoque probabili documento poterit comprobare tunc reus, qui exceptionem fecerat in Homagio illius coniuratoris contra quem obiecerat ducentos florenos auri faciente eidem solum modo coniuratori persolvendo de facto convinci debet & agravari; [§2] super quibus iudex ipse ordinarius coram quo eiuscemodi causa tractatur de bonis & rebus mobilibus ipsius opponentis, & si necessarium erit de iuribus eiusdem possessionariis ubilibet adiacentibus coniuratori illi mox & indilate satisfactionem impendere tenetur. [§3] SI VERO in comprobatione præmissa succubuerit tunc opponens ipse causam illam pro se obtentam habebit. [§4] Ita ut si in causam attractus fuerat caput suum eliberabit, & se ab impetitione actoris salvabit. Si autem actor erat reum bonorum illorum littera, quorum occultavit & non restituit expeditorem (ut immediate prædeclaratum est) perpetuo habebit. VEL si prætextu metarum causa ventilabatur terram litigiosam in sempiternum pro se vendicabit. Si vero in probatione genealogiæ succubuerit iura possessionaria pro quibus agebatur amittet & e converso. [§5] IN CÆTERIS vero causis & casibus si actor in iuramentali sua depositione succubuerit actionem & acquisitionem suam amittet. Si vero reus defecerit tunc in actione & acquisitione contra se per actorem proposita vincetur; & per iudicem sententia contra eum proferetur eo facto.

Quomodo iuramentum patris tempore medio decedentis in filium vel fratrem condescendet. xxxvii.

HOc quoque non prætermittendum est quod si quempiam actorum vel attractorum cui scilicet iuramentum quodcunque præstandum fuisset adiudicatum infra terminum iuramentalis huiusmodi depositionis ab hac luce decedere contigerit: & forte uxorem pregnantem post se reliquerit tunc ipsa iuramentalis depositio in filium natu maiorem si filios prius natos habuerit, Illis vero non existentibus in eum qui tunc nascetur filium (tempus enim puerperii ipsius mulieris expectari debet) alioquin autem si non filius, sed filia nascetur in fratrem propinquiorem illius defuncti in quem utpote iura sua possessionaria devolventur condescendet; [§1] & per iudicem suum terminus ad præstandum ipsum iuramentum filio vel fratri de novo dabitur in quo illud idem filius aut frater deponere tenebitur. [§2] Et si filius ipse vel frater in ætate tenera & ad sacramenti depositionem nondum sufficienti fuerit constitutus per iudicem suum ad tanti temporis spacium iuramenti ipsius depositio prorogari debebit, in quo rite debiteque legitima illius ætate adveniente sacramentum huiusmodi deponi valebit. [§3] Et de fratribus quoque carnalibus & indivisis idem est tenendum quod altero eorum tempore medio decedente in alterum iuramenti depositio illius defuncti redundabit.

Utrum unus coniuratorum possit plures personas in eadem causa iuramento suo expurgare. Tit. xxxviii.

Item quæritur si in una eademque actione in causam attracti plures fuerint, & per iudicem ordinarium unicuique illorum sacramentum diverso in tempore, & loco præstandum (prout plerumque propter loci distantiam & rei: temporisque exigentiam fieri consuevit) adiudicatum fuerit atque unus coniuratorum in primo termino pænes unum attractum iuraverit, UTRUM in eadem causa & pro eadem actione possit etiam pænes alterum reum vel attractum in alio tempore & loco sacramentum pro illius expurgatione deponere? [§1] RESPONDE quod non. Quia una persona vel unus coniurator suo iuramento præter unam personam in una eademque actione liberare & expurgare non potest. [§2] Nam si iurare & plures personas expurgare posset facillime quilibet reus & malorum actuum patrator se ab impetitione actoris liberaret. Hodie enim unum & crastina luce secundum, tertia vero die tertium & sic consequenter iuramento suo etiam precio conductus expurgaret. [§3] Unde si quando talis coniurator pænes duas personas post sese iurabit tunc illa, pænes quam secundario iuravit in actione & acquisitione actoris eo facto condemnabitur. Iuramentum enim illius per hoc insufficienter depositum fuisse declarabitur.

Quod princeps noster nec capitalem sententiam incurrere potest, nec iuramentum contra quempiam per se prestare, sed neque iura producere tenetur. xxxix.

Item advertendum est quod regia maiestas in præsentia domini Palatini huius regni cunctis querulantibus atque causantibus iuri quidem stare & per directorem causarum suarum respondere tenetur; [§1] in sententia tamen capitali vel emendæ capitis aut amissione bonorum suorum convinci non solet, sed damna dumtaxat per officiales aut Iobagiones suos quibuscunque illata refundere debet. [§2] Si quando vero ratione terrarum in metalli Reambulatione & rectificatione vel prætextu aliorum negotiorum aut actuum potentiariorum iuramentum sibi præstandum adiudicabitur tunc ipse director causarum suarum in maiestatis suæ persona illud iuxta Palatini deliberationem deponere tenebitur. [§3] Litteras etiam & litteralia instrumenta ratione quorumcunque bonorum ac iurium possessionariorum quæ ad iurisdictionem ipsius sacræ coronæ regni quocunque titulo devoluta dicuntur producere & exhibere nusquam tenetur.

De modo iuramentorum dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac abbatum & prepositorum infulatorum. xl.

SCIendum est autem quod quilibet prælatus & baro ex officio Abbasque & præpositus infulatus & anulatus pro decem personis nobilium ratione suæ dignitatis habet iurandi potestatem. [§1] Prælatus autem & Abbas ac Præpositus in ecclesia sua Cathedrali ad conscientiæ suę puritatem coram testimonio alicuius Capituli vel Conventus per iudicem ad id deputandi, Cæteri autem sui coniuratores & item omnes barones atque nobiles ad fidem eorum deo debitam in loco ad id per iudicem deputato sacramenta præstare tenentur; [§2] & proinde etiam Homagia ipsorum dominorum prælatorum & baronum ac Abbatum & præpositorum infulatorum ad centum marcas quadringentos florenos facientes se extendunt.

Quid sit oculata revisio, & qualiter celebrari debeat. Tit. xli.

ITem habita communis inquisitionis & iuramentalis depositionis inde subsequendæ descriptione super oculata iam revisione breviter dicendum atque disserendum restat. [§1] EST AUTEM oculata revisio violenti occupatoris aliquorum iurium possessionariorum in dominio eorundem existendi visibilis ostensio [§2] quæ eodem modo quo communis ipsa inquisitio vicinorum videlicet & commetaneorum iurium ac bonorum occupatorum nobiliumque comprovincialium illius comitatus, ubi ipsa bona adiacent convocatione pariter & testificatione celebrari consuevit; [§3] præter hoc quod actor oculata fide visibilique demonstratione regio aut Palatinali Capitularique vel Conventuali hominibus reum sive in causam attractum in dominio bonorum male occupatorum existere debet comprobare & attestatio ipsorum vicinorum ac commetaneorum nobiliumque comprovincialium roborare. [§4] Post huiusmodi autem oculatam visibilemque revisionem & demonstrationem attestatio eorundem vicinorum & commetaneorum ac nobilium comprovincialium plerumque in loco sedis iudiciariæ sicuti in communi inquisitione & sæpenumero in facie iurium possessionariorum litigiosorum & occupatorum prout scilicet causæ meritum exigit fieri atque celebrari debet. [§5] UBI SCIENDUM quod oculata revisio (quia quod visu noscitur verissimo testimonio comprobatur) longe maioris efficacitæ & virtutis est quam sola communis inquisitio. [§6] Nam post celebrationem per utramque partem communis Inquisitionis iuramentalis (ut prædeclaratum est) depositio sequitur. Post oculatam autem revisionem si actor actionem & acquisitionem suam oculata ipsa revisione verificabit, & dictorum nobilium attestatio sufficienter roborabit tunc nulla iuramentalis depositio per iudicem alicui partium decernitur, sed mox & immediate contra reum sententia capitalis vel emende capitis profertur & pronunciat exequutionique eadem demandatur. [§7] Si tamen actor in probatione sua defecerit etiam in hac parte sicuti in communi Inquisitione ut reo sacramentum præstandum imponatur necesse erit.

De sententiarum speciebus ac diversitatibus & exequutionibus. Tit. xlii.

QUIa vero de capitali sententia mentio facta est ideo de sententiarum diffinitione, speciebus, exequutionibus & diversitatibus hoc loco tractandum decrevi. [§1] SENTENTia igitur in quantum propositum nostrum tangit est iudicis diffinitio causę & controversię finem imponens condemnationemque vel absolutionem continens. [§2] Quę licet multa etiam alio sensu habeat significata multisque capiatur modis, ex quo tamen proposito nostro ea significata non quadrant silentio præterire censui. [§3] Differt autem sententia ab opinione in hoc quod sententia est indubitata & firma responsio, sed opinio est cum quadam dubitatione (licet probabili causa) responsio. Unde si varię fuerint opiniones de aliqua causa tunc illa erit tenenda quæ meliori & subtiliori fundabitur ratione. [§4] UNDE sententiarum aliæ sunt capitales, aliæ emendam capitis tangentes, aliæ notam infidelitatis representantes, alię vero simplices & alię emendam linguæ vel calumniam denotantes. [§5] CAPITALIS itaque sententia nostro hoc ævo non nisi ratione invasionis domorum ac interemptionis, verberationis, vulnerationis & sine iusta causa detentionis nobilium, Præterea prætextu occupationis quorumlibet iurium possessionariorum & eorundem pertinentiarum quocunque nomine censeantur decerni solet & pronunciari. [§6] Et talis sententia capitalis solummodo personas sæculares virilis sexus & alienas a se sanguine respicit atque tangit. Nam inter & contra ecclesiasticas, necnon muliebris & fœminei sexus personas, ac fratres generationales capitalis sententia (demptis casibus infra declarandis) non decernitur neque pronunciatur sed solummodo sententia emendam hoc est redemptionem capitis concernens (vetusta de regni consuetudine) fertur & declaratur. Diverso tamen modo diversarum personarum respectu prout infra patebit.

Capitalis sententia quomodo diferat ab emende capitis sententia. Tit. xliii.

SENTENTIA autem emendæ capitis in hoc tantummodo distat & differt a capitali ut lata ipsa sententia emendæ capitis reus & convictus adversus quem fuerit pronunciata vel etiam per non venientiam & non comparitionem extradata vigore & virtute eius in persona sua detineri ac captivari & capitis obtruncatione feriri puniri que non poterit. [§1] VERUM tamen eodem præcise modo & ordine quo per sententiam capitalem universa bona & quęlibet iura possessionaria, cunctas etiam res suas mobiles ipsum solum proprie & præcise concernentes quocunque nomine vocitentur & cuiuscunque maneriei vel speciei existant (in duabus iudici in tertia vero partibus actori statuenda & occupanda atque infra tempus redemptionis eorundem iurium possessionariorum titulo pignoris iuxta valorem & exigentiam communis estimationis ipsorum possidenda) perdit & amittit eo facto. [§2] EMENDAM præterea capitis hoc est redemptionem vel Homagium suum Prælatus utputa & baro quadringentos, nobilis vero ducentos florenos solummodo actori vel actrici solvere tenetur. [§3] ET primo ac ante omnia per iudicem super huiusmodi Homagio de rebus mobilibus si reperiuntur & tandem illis non repertis si necesse fuerit de iuribus possessionariis convicti & sententiati hominis satisfactio impendi, & demum residuitas rerum mobilium ac bonorum & iurium possessionariorum ipsius convicti inter iudicem & actorem vel actricem dividi debet & tripartiri usque ad tempus (ut præactum est) redemptionis eiusdem per illos possidenda, rebus mobilibus in usum eorum libere distributis atque conversis. [§4] Fœminę præterea & mulieres non tantum iura ipsarum possessionaria & res mobiles sed etiam Dotalitia & Quartalitia ipsarum per huiusmodi sententiam amittunt. [§5] SCIENDUM tamen est quod etiam contra fœminas ac mulieres in casu quo earum aliqua maritum vel parentes aut liberos proprios malitiose occiderit vel necari fecerit (quia talis casus notam infidelitatis respicit) capitalis sententia tanquam in personam virilem ferenda est atque pronuncianda.

De casibus in quibus etiam contra ecclesiasticas personas capitalis sententia fertur. Tit. xliiii.

SCIENDUM ulterius quod tres sunt casus, in quibus etiam contra spirituales & ecclesiasticas personas capitalis sententia pronunciatur per quam ultra amissionem patrimoniorum & beneficiorum ipsorum capitalis pœna decernitur atque sequitur. [§1] PRIMUS casus si quis eorum crimen læse maiestatis commiserit. [§2] Secundus si notam infidelitatis manifestam incurrerit. [§3] Tertius si quis ipsorum voluntarium & deliberatum homicidium ac latrocinium patruerit aut perpetrari fecerit. [§4] Propter quod (prehabita degradatione) capite plecti debeat. [§5] In quibus quidem casibus licet bona ecclesiarum quibus presunt non amittant tamen privata ac separata patrimonia & iura possessionaria si quae habent, Insuper cuncta beneficia ecclesiastica quae possident perdere & amittere solent. [§6] Sed in tertio casu deliberato scilicet homicidio ac latrocinio patrimoniorum proprietatem & hereditatem non amittunt si fratres habuerint condivisionales, ad quos illa iure successorio spectant. Quoniam caput in hac parte capite compensari sufficit. [§7] In caeteris autem causis & casibus persona spiritualis & ecclesiastica contra saecularem & econverso saecularis adversus spiritualem aequali poena & gravamini subiacet emendae scilicet capitis vel Homagii atque damnorum illatorum refusioni. De quibus iudex actori & damnum passo iuxta modum (superius praedclaratum) satisfactionem impendere tenetur. [§8] Et haec consuetudo ex generali maxime decreto serenissimi principis condam domini Alberti Romanorum & Hungariae regis Austriaeque ducis excerpta est atque processit. Quae etiam in generali moderno decreto nostro roborata habetur & confirmata.

Qualiter debita ac damna spirituales persone reddere debeant. Tit. xlv.

Item si persona spiritualis cuiuscunque status & dignitatis existat ad solutionem & restitutionem aliquorum debitorum agravatus fuerit tunc adversario suo pecuniaria solutione satisfacere tenetur. [§1] Et si noluerit, aut non poterit tunc de bonis ecclesiae per iudicem adversario ipsi infra illius spatium temporis quo de proventibus ipsorum bonorum debita recuperari poterunt. Statuendis & occupandis solutio ac satisfactio est impendenda. [§2] Pecuniaria autem appellatione intelligitur hoc in loco quodlibet aurum & argentum ac omnis moneta pro tempore currens. [§3] Ubi vero ad solutionem & refusionem damnorum illatorum condemnatus extiterit, isto casu poterit si voluerit rebus cum mobilibus & venalibus, iuxta tamen verum valorem huiusmodi rerum adversario suo satisfactionem impendere. [§4] Alioquin de bonis ac iuribus possessionariis ecclesiae in hac quoque parte iudex causae adversario illius personae convictae statutione debita satisfacere tenetur.

Quomodo Capitulum vel Conventus simul, et quomodo persone private seorsum sententari debent. xlvi.

Item si Capitulum vel Conventus colectivo nomine pro actibus potentiariis maioribus vel minoribus quocunque sententiarum genere condemnatur tanquam unica & singularis persona gravatur, & non singuli singulariter debent condemnari, exceptis praemissis casibus homicidii videlicet voluntarii & deliberati ac criminis lese maiestatis & notae infidelitatis pro quibus omnes delinquentes (modo antelato) sunt puniendi. [§1] VERUM si certae personae capitulares & non tota communitas aliquos actus potentiarios de bonis ecclesiarum perpetraverint tunc ipse personae seorsum a communitate ex eo loco unde talia mala commiserunt ad iudicium libere poterunt evocari. [§2] Praesertim si patrimonia non habuerint privata nihilominus de loco prenotato citari & evocari queunt, ac iuxta causae meritum sententia contra eos per iudicem ferri poterit atque pronunciari.

Quid si una persona capitularis sententiabitur agendum sit. Tit. xlvii.

Item si una persona capitularis bona hereditaria & patrimonia separata non habens in emenda sui capitis convincetur, vel in refusione damni condemnabitur, & rebus mobilibus destitutus reperietur: QUÆRITUR unde & qualiter adversario satisfactio fiat? Quia non de commissione capituli mala ipsa patravit, & ex consequenti bona capituli propterea non videntur esse diripienda. [§1] Dicendum quod quia mala ipsa & facinora, unde videlicet emenda capitis vel damnorum refusio subsequuta est de medio & tanquam de membro ipsius capituli ille patravit quæ perpetrare aut non potuisset, aut locum patrandi non habuisset si in huiusmodi beneficio constitutus non fuisset. Ideo de proventibus beneficii eiusdem capitularis convicti per reliquos capitulares actori super eisdem rebus obtentis satisfactio est impendenda.

De compensatione damnorum per officiales ecclesiarum personarum irrogatorum. xlvi.

Item universi officiales ecclesiarum personarum sive sint spirituales sive seculares occasione quorumcunque actuum potentiariarum si quos de officiis eorum commiserint vel perpetraverint de eisdem officiis ipsorum instar aliorum regni nobilium & officialium libere semper iuri conveniri atque ad iudicium citari & evocari possunt. [§1] Et si in iudicio convicti fuerint de dictis officiis eorum tam adversario, quam etiam iudici ipsorum satisfactio administrabitur. [§2] Domini autem illorum (si talia non ex commissione eorum fuerint illata vel irrogata) poterunt ipsos officiales usque ad debitam emendam & satisfactionem etiam cum detentione personarum suarum compellere prout hoc de officialibus habetur etiam in decreto primo moderni domini nostri Wladislai regis articulo vigesimo quarto.

Quomodo prelati cum capitulo simul, & quomodo seorsum iudicium portabit. xlv.

Item si prelati cum suo Capitulo vel Conventu fuerit ad iudicium simul evocatus, tunc si prelati & Capitulum vel Conventus in illis iuribus possessionariis de quibus actus eiusmodi potentiarii aut alia malorum genera commissi vel patrata fuisse dicuntur & queruntur indivisi fuerint comperti, tunc prelati in hoc casu non separatim a suo Capitulo vel Conventu sed simul cum eisdem aut absolvi aut condemnari debet. Quoniam ratione indivisionis cum suo Capitulo vel Conventu una communitas esse censetur. [§1] Si tamen de divisis inter eos iuribus possessionariis mala ipsa suborta perpetrataque fuisse comperientur tunc et prelati & Capitulum vel Conventus separatim & seorsum condemnatur. [§2] HINC est quod si prelati cum suo Capitulo vel Conventu simul evocabitur tunc ratione divisionis vel non divisionis etiam iuramentum illis diversimode prestandum adiudicatur. [§3] Nam si modo antelato prelati cum suo Capitulo vel Conventu indivisus fuerit tunc ipse prelati cum suis coniuratoribus tam in sua quam etiam totius Capituli vel Conventus personis sacramentum prestare debet. [§4] Si vero divisus extiterit tunc tam idem prelati cum suis quam etiam Lector aut Cantor sive Custos vel Decanus in persona ipsius Capituli vel Conventus iterum cum suis coniuratoribus iuxta deliberationem & sententiam iudicis seorsum & separatim iuramenta eorum deponere tenentur. [§5] Et per Prelatos intellige non solum dominus Archiepiscopos & Episcopos sed etiam Abbates atque Prepositos tam seculares quam regulares omnes.

De annuali prorogatione dominorum prelatorum noviter electorum. I.

Item prelati ecclesiarum a suis fratribus Capitulo videlicet vel Conventu divisi a die electionis eorum privilegio pupillari gaudent, [§1] quibus de vetusta regni lege & approbata consuetudine permissum est & concessum quod etiam in causis tempore patris eorum inchoatis infra unius integri anni spatium ad cuiusvis instantiam respondere non teneantur ut interim iura paterna & litteralia instrumenta revidere calculareque & deinde prosecutioni causarum suarum commode superintendere possint. [§2] HOC tamen intellige in facto iurium possessionariorum & exhibitionis litteralium instrumentorum fieri. [§3] Nam in cæteris causis pretextu actuum potentiariorum motis in quibus productio litterarum subsequi non debet hæc concessio minime suffragatur quæ premissis casibus & causis etiam legitimæ ætatis hoc est ætatem quatuordecem, iuxta modernorum vero consuetudinem duodecem integrorum annorum habentibus a principe semper concedi & in iuditiis observari solet. [§4] Si tamen fuerint indivisi tunc huiusmodi permissio & libertatis prærogativa illis patrocinari non potest. [§5] Nam Capitula vel Conventus privilegio maiorum gaudent & ætatem perfectam hoc est vigintiquatuor annorum integrorum semper representant, quibus hæc prærogationis libertas non competit observari. [§6] Absurdum enim videretur ut post electionem cuiuslibet Abbatis vel Præpositi aut Lectoris, Custodis Cantorisque vel Canonici causa dudum mota usque ad anni integri revolutionem semper in suspenso relinqueretur, & sic indecisa per aliquot annos penderet conclusionem suam fraudaretur.

Quod prelati ecclesiarum ob delicta predecessorum suorum condemnari non possunt. II.

ULterius si de bonis & iuribus possessionariis cuiuspiam Prælati aut Abbatis vel Præpositi actus potentiarii vel malorum genera patrentur atque committerentur, & talis Prælatus aut Abbas vel Præpositus quam diu in humanis ageret propterea in curiam regiam non evocaretur, vel aliter in causam quomodolibet non attraheretur tunc decedente eo successor suus ratione huiusmodi actuum potentiariorum quantum in persona sua condemnari & agravari non poterit, sed solummodo ex parte Iobagionum ac familiarium illius ecclesiæ, per quos mala illa perpetrata fuisse dinoscuntur iudicium & iusticiam actori facere & impendere tenetur. [§1] Quoniam bona & iura possessionaria ecclesiarum (sicuti prænarratum est) nemo Prælatorum aut Abbatum vel Præpositorum, seu etiam aliarumque personarum ecclesiasticarum propter suos excessus amittere & ab ipsa ecclesia alienare potest. [§2] Sed si quispiam illorum in emendæ capitis sententia convictus fuerit tunc solummodo de Homagio & damnis illatis satisfacere (modo prædeclarato) debet. [§3] Successor itaque suus, qui non hæreditario iure sed via electionis successit emendam capitis illius prædecessoris sui (ex quo evocatus non fuit) subire compensareque non tenetur, [§4] prout etiam filii ob delicta paterna facta prius evocatione sententiarum capitalium vel emendæ capitis gravamini quantum ad pœnam non subiacent. Sed si convicti fuerint solummodo in estimatione iurium paternorum convincentur. [§5] Et hoc si patres eorum in humanis agentes evocati fuerunt. Aliter enim si post obitum parentum evocatio subsequetur non iam delictum patris qui iura possessionaria forsitan occuparat, vel res & bona mobilia alterius diripuerat sed filiorum qui male occupata vel res directas detinent compensari metrique solet. [§6] Si igitur in facto occupationis bonorum causa mota fuerit, quia forte ecclesia bona illa habet & possidet etiam decedente quolibet Prælato aut Abbate vel Præposito successor suus in hoc casu semper evocari & condemnari potest. [§7] Et hoc idem est intelligendum etiam de illis ecclesiarum Prælatiis qui per translationem in alterius ecclesiæ beneficium vel dominium se conferunt moraturos.

Quod causa factum iuris possessionarii tangens in foro ecclesiastico tractari nequit, si etiam promissio vel testamentum interveniat. lii.

Item quod nulla causa factum iuris possessionarii concernens, si etiam promissio vel testamentum occasione talis iuris possessionarii intervenisset coram ipsis spiritualibus personis: vel eorum vices gerentibus tractari poterit, sed omnis eiusmodi causa in curia regia coram iudicibus eiusdem ordinariis solet examinari pariter & terminari. [§1] Quicquid enim quisquam promittat vel testetur semper tamen standum est eius iudicio ad cuius auctoritatem & iurisdictionem res ipsa, pro qua promissio & testamentum emittitur principaliter spectat. [§2] CERTUM est autem quia hoc in regno non nisi iudicum ordinariorum curiæ regiæ sententiis & litteris Adiudicatoriis iura possessionaria gubernantur. [§3] VICARIORUM vero vel aliorum iudicum spiritualium litteræ & sententiæ in hac parte nusquam observantur. Nam et alias accessorium debet sequi forum sui principalis, propterea causa factum iuris possessionarii tangens in præsentia iudicis spiritualis ventillari concludique nequit. [§4] Et idem est sentiendum etiam de causa ratione forte debitorum vel aliorum negotiorum in qua fides intervenerit. Ille tamen qui fidem præstitit antequam causa suscitaretur decesserit mota quod videlicet in sede spirituali ea tractari non potest. Nam fides & eius pœna personalis est; quæ extincta persona extinguitur in iudicio semper. [§5] Si quid tamen debiti vel alterius rei iuxta fidem in promissione annexum & appositum fuerit hoc coram iudice suo sæculari actor ipse ab hæredibus & aliis legitimis successoribus defuncti requirendi habet auctoritatem.

Quid officialis vel decanus capitularis inter Jobagiones capitulares agens valeat. liii.

Item solent Capitula ac Conventus in eorum villis officiales & villicos qui in medio Iobagionum suorum temporalem iurisdictionem exercent tenere & conservare, [§1] quorum iudicium & iudicii impensio eam virtutem & vigorem habere dinoscitur sicuti personaliter fuisset per illos capitulares aut conventuales administratum. [§2] Decanus etiam in persona capituli eandem habet auctoritatem. [§2] Verum tamen extra officiolatum suum sine litteris procuratoriis totius capituli pro eodem capitulo respondere non potest.

De priore Aurane & eius conditione ac de sententiis in eum ferendis. Titulus. liiii.

Sciendum ulterius quod licet prior Auranæ utroque titulo spirituali videlicet & sæculari gaudeat, iura tamen possessionaria instar ecclesiasticarum personarum gubernat; ideo de ipso quoque specialiter pauca subiungere dignum duxi. [§1] UBI advertendum quod prioratus Auranæ olim in hoc regno per excellentissimum principem dominum Lodovicum regem fundatus & institutus fuisse perhibetur. Qui cum regnum Siciliae sive Neopolitanum valido cum exercitu necem fratris sui carnalis divi Andreae eiusdem regni & Hierusalem regis vindicaturus invasisset a Rhodianis non parvum fertur auxilium navale sibi collatum fuisse. Unde & eorum zelo inductus singularique amore permotus in signum religionis & professionis Rhodianorum post felicem & victoriosum suum reditum prioratum ipsum Auranæ multis possessionibus dotatum instituit atque fundavit. [§2] Cuius prior pro tempore constitutus ex regulari Rhodianorum observantia militiam sæcularem pro fidei Catholicæ defensione & tutamine semper exercere uxorisque solatio procul motus atque destitutus castitatem perpetuam observare tenetur. Qua propter occasione ipsius abstinentiæ & castitatis digne inter spirituales personas computatur. [§3] CUM IGITUR prior ipse Auranæ utroque titulo, spirituali scilicet & sæculari (prout prænaratum est) gaudeat venerabilisque & magnificus in suo titulo scribatur venerabilis ut pote propter castitatem & regularem observantiam Magnificus siquidem tanquam baronum unus ob singularem militiam, qua magnifici generosique cordis esse debet. Bona etiam temporalia, quæ possidet spiritualibus & ecclesiasticis patrimoniis quodammodo connexa esse videantur. [§4] Ideo siquando sententia contra eum fertur non in emenda dumtaxat capitis sui (quæ ratione sui baronatus ad quadringentos florenos adverse tantummodo parti persolvendos se extendit) sed insuper in damnis per eum commissis & de bonis ecclesiæ more aliarum ecclesiasticarum personarum refundendis. Et præterea cunctorum patrimoniorum suorum (siquæ ultra bona prioratus habet) amissione convinci solet & agravari. [§5] Et hoc si in facto maioris potentiæ condemnabitur. Nam in minoribus actibus potentiariis ipsum quoque sicuti & alium quemcunque onera & gravamina minus lædunt. [§6] Intelligendum est etiam si contra magnates vel alios nobiles sæcularis conditionis convincetur aut sententiabitur. Nam contra ecclesiasticam personam nec prior ipse maiori onere gravabitur quam persona spiritualis adversus eum gravaretur. [§7] SCIENDUM tamen est quod in præmissis tribus casibus videlicet criminis læse maiestatis, Notæ infidelitatis Et voluntarii deliberatique homicidii prior ipse ultra præmissam penam etiam caput amittere seu capitalem sententiam subire solet atque debet. Dum tamen evidenter & iuridice fuerit convictus & condemnatus. [§8] In aliis autem rebus quantum ad iura regni privilegio prælatorum uti gaudereque consuevit. Exercitia nihil ominus militaria more Baronum & Magnatum pro Regni defensione semper peracturus.

De capitali sententia et exequutionis eius serie. Tit. Iv.

SCIendum deinde est quod sententia capitalis ratione & prætextu antelatorum casuum contra sæcularem personam (demptis tamen personis fraternitate & consanguinitate coniunctis) lata & quovismodo pronunciata non solum res mobiles ac bona & iura possessionaria talis sententiati & convicti hominis aufert verum etiam penam capitalem infert. [§1] Ita ut ubicunque ille reperiri ac deprehendi poterit vigore litterarum sententionalium per iudicem suum ordinarium vel hominem ipsius iudicis ad id per eundem deputatum post exequutionem semper, ante autem exequutionem infra anni dumtaxat unius integri a die emanationis ipsarum literarum sententionalium computandi revolutionem in persona sua detineri captivarique & ad manus sui iudicis ad infligendam sibi pœnam a iure in hac parte statutam dari & assignari valebit. [§2] Nam adversarius suus ipsum propria sua autoritate absque homine iudicis neque captivandi, neque etiam in domo sua vel alibi (etiam per hominem iudicis detentum) conservandi habet facultatem, sed ad manus iudiciarias quam primum poterit (dietim de loco in locum se domum residentia iudicis versus vel ubi iudex ipse fuerit constitutus movendo) assignare præsentareque tenetur. [§3] Quiquidem iudex huiusmodi detentum tribus diebus causa pacis & concordia apud se conservare, Et si cum adversario suo concordare interim nequibit tunc manibus adversarii sui, ut capite plectatur: reatusque sui pœnam luat dare & assignare debebit. [§4] Cui si mortem vel aliam pœnam condignam a iure (ut præfertur) statutam adversarius intulerit nulla postea bonorum & iurium possessionariorum suorum occupatio per iudicem vel adversam partem fieri & subsequi valebit sed omnia bona & iura sua possessionaria in filios si habuerit vel fratres aut alios legitimos successores suos pure & simpliciter devolvuntur, exceptis solummodo rebus apud ipsum convictum tempore captivationis suæ repertis quæ ipsi iudici manebunt.

Qualiter bona per sententiam occupata de manibus iudicis & adverse partis sunt redimenda. Tit. Ivi.

UBi autem convictus & condemnatus ille manus iudiciarias evaserit captivarique non poterit & lata huiusmodi sententia contra eum legitime exequuta fuerit tunc bona & iura sua possessionaria filii vel fratres ac successores eius, ad quos spectare dinoscuntur a manibus iudicis & adversæ partis communi estimatione mediante redimi poterunt in termino per iudicem illis ad id præfigendo [§1] immo filiis aut fratribus & successoribus non existentibus etiam vicini & commetanei eiusmodi bonorum & iurium possessionariorum occupatorum (quia redemptibiles sunt & modum virtutemque iurium impignoratitiorum representant) ad se redimere poterunt; dummodo terminum per hominem iudicis ac testimonium loci credibilis tempore exequutionis ipsius sententiæ ad redemptionem deputatum non transcendant. [§2] Nam postea in rem iudicatam bona illa transibunt, & apud iudicem adversamque partem tamdiu manebunt donec de gratia regia vel novo forsitan iudicio convicto illi providebitur. [§3] Virtute etenim propria: & absque gratia regia sententiatus ipse & condemnatus bona sua etiam per redemptionem & præactam estimationem pro se recuperandi non habet potestatem.

Quid gratia principis homini sententiato facta valeat, & de partibus iudiciariis. Ivii.

SI vero princeps huiusmodi sententiato atque convicto gratiam fecerit specialem tunc ipsa gratia non de Homagio & tertia parte iurium possessionariorum eiusdem convicti in portionem ut puta actoris vel adversarii cedenti sed capiti tantummodo ut capitalem penam non subeat, ac duabus partibus ipsorum iurium possessionariorum ad portionem videlicet iudiciariam cedentibus patrocinari suffragarique intelligitur. [§1] Immo etiam super duabus partibus iudiciariis in causis ac sententiis coram domino Palatino regni huius vertentibus & emanandis ipsa gratia locum non habet, sed huiusmodi duæ partes iudiciariæ (antiqua regni consuetudine dictante) ad solum Palatinum vel cui ipse contulerit pertinent. [§2] In facto tamen & causa notæ infidelitatis per quam etiam hereditas & proprietates iurium possessionariorum hominis in ipsa causa succumbentis & condemnati perpetuo amitti solet collatio perennalis bonorum eiusdem condemnati ad regiam maiestatem solam & iurisdictionem sacræ suæ coronæ spectat. Et nec actor vel adversarius eius quicquam hereditatis ex ipsis iuribus possessionariis virtute eiuscemodi latæ sententiæ pro se percipere potest. [§3] Secus est autem in sententia notæ infidelitatis ex secundaria repulsione nostra hac tempestate ferenda. Nam in ea etiam adversario tertia pars bonorum & iurium possessionariorum condemnati hominis simul cum hereditate & proprietate vigore generalis decreti nostri perpetuo cedit atque datur. [§4] ET sciendum quod hæc gratia regia non amplius quam per anni integri unius revolutionem efficax manebit. Aliter enim si convictus infra ipsius anni spatium poenes principis gratiam actori vel adversario satisfacere, & cum eo concordare recusaverit mox transacta eadem annuali revolutione pristino oneri gravaminique sententiæ præmissæ subiacebit & sententiabitur. E converso nullo ampliori processu iuridico observato. [§5] HINC est quod etiam actor vel actrix litteras suas sententiales infra integri unius anni a die emanationis earundem computandi revolutionem per regium aut Palatinalem & alicuius loci testimonialis homines exequutioni demandari facere tenetur. [§6] Nam aliter post ipsum anniversarium convictum & condemnatum virtute illarum litterarum sententiarum in persona vel rebus ac bonis suis turbare, spoliare vel detinere actor ipse non potest, sed si voluerit ad onus sententiæ deponendum contra se peremptorie & cum Insinuatione evocari facere valebit; ex parte cuius indilate & ipso quidem unico termino iudicium administrandum erit. [§7] Hoc quoque non prætermittendum est quod si quispiam in sententia capitali convictus manus iudiciarias (modo præmisso) per captivitatem inciderit tunc illi gratia regia in ipsa captivitate facta, etiam ad caput suum salvandum contra actorem non suffragatur. Quoniam princeps convicto & sententiato homini gratiam aliter facere non potest nisi ut convictus cum adversario suo concordet. Adversarius autem latam pro se sententiam per illius detentionem iam executioni demandatam habet, ad concordiam vero invitus compelli non potest neque debet. Igitur gratia principis contra eum non valet sed tota salus detenti illius in manibus adversarii sui pendet. [§8] HINC est, quod detentus ipse cuncta bona ac iura sua possessionaria etiam in præiudicium filiorum ac fratrum suorum in redemptionem capitis sui perpetuo alienare potest prout in prima parte latius declaratum est.

Quando & quomodo poterit detineri in sententia capitali convictus. lviii.

Item nemo litigantium adversam partem vigore sententiæ capitalis per non venientiam & non comparitionem alterius partis latæ & provulgatæ ante litterarum sententiarum emanationem sigillationemque & manibus actoris assignationem in persona sua detineri facere potest sed quamdiu litteræ ipse apud manus iudicis fuerint convictus ille tam iudicem ab extraditione quam etiam Capitulum: vel Conventum cui sonabunt ab executione earundem semper inhibendi habet facultatem. [§1] Verum tamen facta inhibitione apud iudicem statim onus huiusmodi sententiæ deponere & ad quesita actoris respondere tenetur. [§2] In facto autem capitalis sententiæ per responsiones & ex allegationibus partium atque processu iuridico per iudicem pronunciatae mox & in continenti reus ac convictus si personaliter affuerit absque quibuslibet litteris sententiarum ad requisitionem actoris vel procuratoris sui per iudicem suum captivari (& ordine prænarrato) conservari ac puniri poterit libertate nobilitatis non obstante.

Quid sit & quando admittatur rationabilis excusatio in litteris iudicialibus inseri consueta. Tit. lix.

Item in litteris iudicialibus quas communiter Birsagiales vocant clausula ista SI SE rationabiliter non poterit excusare semper apponi inserique solet, [§1] & litteræ quoque sententiales, quæ ex huiusmodi litteris iudicialibus tandem conscribuntur prope finem octavarum & brevium iudiciorum extra dari & manibus adversariorum assignari consueverunt, ne rationabili excusatione se offerente litigantium quispiam præcipitanter & de plano bonis suis destitui vel capite puniri videatur. [§2] UNDE rationabilis excusatio est admittendaque censetur quando actore vel in causam attracto aut eiusdem procuratore de domo sua ad octavas aut breviter iudicia se movente pariter & venire satagente egritudinem validam post discessum suum idem incurrerit, aut aquarum vehemens inundatio ipsum retinuerit, vel equo suo infirmante & propter inopiam equum alium emere conducere ve non valente gressum suum retardabit, aut si per adversarios suos vel latrones interceptus, spoliatus vulneratusque aut necatus fuerit, & his vel similibus casibus præpedientibus & occurrentibus ad terminum distributionis litterarum iudicialium aut sententiarum in præsentiam sui iudicis pertingere venireque nequirit merito talis excusatur, & ab onere iudiciorum sententiarumque exoneratur. [§3] Dummodo excusatio ipsa probabili documento fulciatur, & non dolose neque fecte vel fraudulenter inducta fuisse videatur. [§4] Aliter enim nisi onus iudiciorum & sententiarum depositum persolutumque fuerit executio (modo præhabito) subsequetur, & convictus libertate (ut prædictum est) nobilitatis non obstante etiam capite punietur.

Quomodo portiones filiorum ac filiarum & fratrum tempore executionis sententiæ excidi debent. lx.

ADvertendum præterea est quod tempore exequutionis latæ cuiuslibet sententię ante omnia portiones filiorum & filiarum cuiuspiam convicti hominis si qui ante sententiam ipsam in rerum natura sunt generati & propagati. Fratrum etiam generationalium & aliorum quorumcunque qui cum eodem convicto iura possessionaria habent indivisa sequestrande sunt & excludendæ, atque portio solummodo ad personam ipsius convicti cedens inter iudicem & adversam partem (modo predeclarato) erit dividenda. [§1] De rebus siquidem mobilibus tam filii & filiæ quam etiam uxor talis convicti portiones suas per hominem iudicis ad exequutionem ipsam deputatum rehabere debent. [§2] Filius namque pro delictis & excessibus patris, & e converso pater pro demeritis filii nec in persona, nec iuribus possessionariis vel aliis rebus condemnari solet. [§3] De iuribus tamen possessionariis filiæ non aliter nisi iura eadem possessionaria sexum quoque fœmineum manifeste & reali dominio fœminarum demonstrante concernant portiones possessionarias habere possunt. [§4] Uxor vero sua Dotem ac res Peraffernales suas tam a filiis suis quam etiam ab eo qui portiones mariti sui possidebit marito ipso decedente pro se rehabere valebit prout in prima quoque parte ubi de Dotalitiorum solutionibus tractatum est notabile positum habes.

De estimatione iurium paternorum vel fraternorum litis inter medio decedentium. lxi.

Item si quis nobilium per quempiam in curiam regiam occasione occupationis iurium possessionariorum vel aliorum negotiorum factum maioris potentiæ de quo capitalis sententia vel emenda capitis evenire solet tangentium evocatus fuerit, & ante decisionem ipsius causę ab hac luce decesserit tunc filius aut frater illius defuncti ad quem iura sua possessionaria devolventur, & ex consequenti causa ipsa de regni consuetudine condescendet non in alio onere & gravamine quam in estimatione dumtaxat iurium paternorum vel fraternorum convinci, & præterea iura possessionaria male occupata actori per iudicem restatui damna etiam illata (si quantitas eorum in litteris evocatoriis specificata & sententia per non venientiam lata fuerit) simpliciter & ante omnia actori refundi & tandem residua iura possessionaria ipsius defuncti inter iudicem & actorem dividi solent. [§1] Si tamen per responsiones partium sententia pronunciata fuerit tunc damna ipsa iuramento mediante recuperari debebunt.

Qualiter filii ante & post sententiationem patris nati in bonis paternis succedant. lxii.

Hoc quoque non prætermittendum est quod filii post latam & exequatam contra patrem sententiam progeniti qui tunc in utero materno nondum fuere generati de bonis & iuribus paternis per ipsam sententiam ad manus iudiciarias vel adversę partis aut eorum medio aliorum quorumcunque deventis & statutis nullam pro se portionem habere possunt, neque de eisdem sunt consulendi; [§1] filii tamen ante latam sententiam nati & propagati tam portionibus eorum propriis quam etiam paternis (si a manibus iudicis & adversę partis portiones paternas redimere voluerint) potiri solent possuntque semper. [§2] Ubi sciendum quod filiorum alii concepti, alii nati, alii vero posthumi vocantur. Concepti dicuntur qui commixtione legitima maris & fœmineę in utero matris sunt generati, nondum tamen nati quorum natura est quod a tempore conceptionis quam partus eius iudicabit æqualia iura habent cum natis & exstantibus filiis. [§3] Posthumi autem sunt, qui Posthimationem seu sepulturam patris legitime nascuntur. Et dico notanter legitime, quia si partus facta humatione viri post decem menses fieret tunc infans ille recte de iureque Posthumus non diceretur. Non enim ex thoro semineque mariti defuncti sed potius ex fornicatione mulieris præsummeretur in lucem prodiisse, [§4] & hi omnes tam concepti, quam etiam nati & posthumi, legitime tamen (ut præmisi) generati in iuribus paternis æqualiter semper succedunt.

Utrum filius post patris sententiationem natus possit redimere paterna bona. lxi.

SEd hic quæritur: Utrum filius post sententiationem patris natus qui nullam portionem de iuribus paternis (sicuti præmissum est) habere permittitur bona & iura paterna vigore latae sententiæ occupata de manibus iudicis ac adverse partis vel aliorum quorumcunque communem per estimationem eorundem bonorum ad se redimere possit? [§1] Dicendum quod sic, quia sanguinis & parentelæ propagatio vim ad huc & virtutem vicinitatis ac commetaneitatis talium bonorum & iurium possessionariorum habet atque representat. [§2] Si igitur vicinis & commetaneis bonorum ipsorum per sententiam occupatorum redemptio (prout præactum est) de iure permittitur, ergo & filio post sententiam nato redemptio ipsa legitime conceditur.

Quid si pater cum filio vel omnes fratres simul sentiabuntur. Tit. lxi.

QUid si pater cum filio vel etiam omnes fratres simul sentiabuntur, nemoque illorum fuerit ab onere & gravamine latae ipsius sententiæ præservatus faciendum erit? [§1] Responde quod per gratiam principis, in quem proprietas & hæreditas huiusmodi bonorum occupatorum sentiatis ipsis deficientibus tendit atque respicit redemptio eorum fieri poterit & debet. [§2] ITEM de unica quoque & singulari persona, quæ nec filios vel filias, nec fratres habet, ad quos aut quibus redemptio eiusmodi bonorum de iure spectaret & competeret idem est sentiendum. [§3] Ubi advertendum quod si vicini & commetanei talium bonorum & iurium possessionariorum occupatorum ea ad se redemerint, filii post sententiam nati, aut pater cum filio sive fratres simul sentiati, vel singularis ipsa persona regia gratia suffragante de manibus eorundem vicinorum & commetaneorum illa pro se rehabere poterunt, & brevi quidem processu unico ut puta termino iuridico amonitione dumtaxat legitima super ea re præhabita. [§4] Et hoc de vicinis ac commetaneis intelligendum est semper, in casu quo sentiatus quispiam omnibus hæredibus ac fratribus condivisionalibus vel aliis legitimis successoribus, ad quos devolutio bonorum suorum spectaret omnino destitutus fuerit. Nam illis existentibus magis ad eos (si volunt) quam ad vicinos redemptio ipsa pertinebit.

Utrum per sententiam in curia regia latam etiam bona in Sclavonia vel Transsilvania habita amittantur & e converso. lxi.

QUæritur ulterius si quis nobilium tam in hoc Hungariæ, quam etiam Sclavoniæ regno vel partibus Transsilvanis bona & iura possessionaria habens in octavis aut cæteris iudiciis in Hungaria aut Sclavonia vel Transsilvania celebrandis in facto maioris potentiae, ex eo quoque in capitali aut emendæ capitis sententia fuerit convictus. Utrum universa bona & iura sua possessionaria in utroque regno & Transsilvanis partibus sita atque habita simul & semel amittat, vel solummodo illa, quæ in ipso regno, ubi sententia profertur adiacent amisisse intelligatur? [§1] DICENDUM est quod licet opinione quorundam iuristarum generaliter ubilibet & in quibuscunque regnis vel partibus adiacentia uno saltem in loco sentiatus amisisse dicatur. Hæc tamen opinio tenenda non est. [§2] Quoniam autoritas cuiuslibet iudicis solummodo ad loca iurisdictioni suæ subiecta se extendit. [§3] Modo certum est quod regnorum Dalmatiæ, Croatiae & Sclavoniæ Banus vel Wayvoda Transsilvanus non habet iurisdictionem iudicandi in comitatibus regno Hungarię incorporatis, sed tantum officiolatui suo subiectis & econverso. Nec cæteri iudices ordinarii curiæ regiæ sese in iurisdictionem aliorum iudicum ingerere vel immittere possunt. Aliter enim nulla esset distinctio regnorum pariter & iudiciorum, quæ seorsum & diverso tempore diversoque modo semper celebrari consueverunt. [§4] Et propterea in litteris quoque sententialibus ipsorum iudicum clausula ista, INTRA ambitum huius regni Hungariæ, vel huius regni Sclavoniæ, aut harum partium Transsilvanarum semper apponi solet. [§5] Verum tamen in facto & causa notę infidelitatis per unicam solummodo sententiam, vel etiam Donationem regiam (dummodo Donatio legitime facta fuerit) universa bona & cuncta iura possessionaria ubilibet & in quibuscunque regnis ac partibus sacre coronæ regni subiectis sita & habita de facto amittuntur quia iurisditio eiusdem coronæ contra quam infidelitas ipsa nota committitur, ad quævis regna & partes sibi subiectas eque se extendit. [§6] Nihilominus exequutio & bonorum illorum occupatio per eum solum iudicem, coram quo sententia huiusmodi notæ infidelitatis lata fuerit, ubilibet fieri non poterit, sed occupationem bonorum extra iurisdictionem suam habitorum ad iudicem cuius iurisdictioni subsunt ipse iudex causæ per litteras suas remittere debet.

De sententia per notam infidelitatis pronuncianda. Tit. lxvi.

Item in facto quoque & sententia notæ infidelitatis eo præcise modo & ordine, quo in capitali sententia procedendum est. [§1] Qualiter tamen nota infidelitatis ab ipsa capitali sententia differat, in prima parte, ubi de Donationibus regiis in generali tractatum est reperies. [§2] Tribus autem modis solet decerni & pronunciari nota infidelitatis. Sed horum seriem infra in repulsionis ordine statui declarandum.

De actibus potentiariis minoribus, et sententiis super ea referendis. lxvii.

Sciendum ulterius quod sententiarum alię sunt simplices, quę nec ad pœnam, nec emendam capitis tendunt, sed medietatem dumtaxat emendæ capitis hoc est centum florenos representant, [§1] & huiusmodi sententię iuxta contenta generalis constitutionis & decreti moderni domini nostri Wladislai regis, tam ad dominos prælatos & barones aliosque magnates, quam etiam nobiles æqualiter referuntur, & non ad plures, quam centum (ut prædictum est) florenos pro actibus potentiariis se extendunt. [§2] Damna insuper in actione & acquisitione actoris vel actricis declarata compensant & refundunt. [§3] Et horum centum florenorum directa medietas iudici, altera vero pars actori vel actrici remanebit. Damnorum tamen refusio in personam solius actoris aut actricis redundabit. [§4] Vigore autem eiusmodi sententiarum nemo nobilium (dempto quodam casu subnotando) in persona sua detineri poterit. Sed de onere dictorum centum florenorum & refusione damnorum de bonis & rebus mobilibus convicti si reperiri poterunt, aliter autem de iuribus eiusdem possessionariis actori vel actrici per iudicem satisfactio impendi debet. [§5] Et sub hac specie sententiarum comprehenduntur generaliter nostra hac tempestate universi actus potentiarii, præter casus prædeclaratos, ex quibus maiores sententias capitales utputa & emendam capitis tangentes generari subsequique prenotavi. Et propterea minores actus potentiarii & minores sententię solent appellari. [§6] Licet ante generale decretum invictissimi principis condam domini Mathiæ regis in anno salutis quadringentesimo octogesimo sexto supra millesimum editum (quod ipse quoque dominus noster Wladislaus rex in hac parte roboravit) omnes domini seculares & nobiles possessionatique homines ratione quorumcunque actuum potentiariarum generaliter & universaliter in facto maioris potentiae, ex eoque in capitalibus aut emendae capituli sententiis solebant aggravari. [§7] Cuius rei ut clarior notitia habeatur articulum super eo conscriptum verbotenus interserendum curavi, qui sub hac verborum sequitur forma. [§8] ITEM in causis ratione illationis damnorum caeterorumque nocentorum & iniuriarum ac actuum potentiariarum minorum motis, etiam si patrator ore suo proprio coram suo iudice profiteretur nemo deinceps in facto potentiae, sed solummodo in solutione huiusmodi damnorum illatorum & expensis actoris eidem tantummodo persolvendis, Insuper pro praemissis actibus potentiariis in viginti quinque marcis gravis ponderis centum florenos auri facientibus inter iudicem & actorem aequaliter dividendis vincatur, & per iudicem ad solutionem statim compellatur. [§9] In causis vero maioribus scilicet ratione invasionis domorum nobilium sine iusta causa, occupationis possessionum & pertinentiarum earundem, detentionis nobilium sine iusta causa, verberationis & vulnerationis ac interemptionis nobilium motis; In his taliter iudex procedere habebit quod si actor pro sui parte inquisitionem modo & ordine supranotato reportaverit in ampliorem rei verificationem si partes voluerint causam ipsam ad communem inquisitionem decernat. [§10] Si vero reus ipsam inquisitionem acceptare recusabit tunc actor pro maiori verificatione actionis suae iuxta regni consuetudinem hactenus in hac parte observatam ad caput illius adversarii iurare habebit. [§11] Ita tamen si adversarius ille sive in causam attractus in eodem comitatu, ubi mala sunt patrata propriam personalemque & continuam facit residentiam. [§12] Ubi autem talis in causam attractus in aliis partibus seu provinciis regni personalem facit residentiam, ac in eius absentia huiusmodi mala patrata sunt & commissa tunc iuxta contenta litterarum inquisitoriarum propter suam innocentiam se iuramento expurgabit [§13] ex parte denique familiarium & Iobagionum suorum vigore praesentis articuli fiat iudicium & iusticia lege regni requirente.

De causa, in quo etiam vigore minoris sententiae quis detineri poterit. Titulus. lxxviii.

Item quia plures sunt in regno unius sessionis nobiles & alii possessionati homines, qui verorum nobilium privilegio libertateque gaudent, desidia tamen & torpori dediti rebus temporalibus adeo defecerunt ut non centum florenos sed difficulter etiam centum denarios solvere queant; nihilominus mala patrare non cessant cum potissimae plures interdum proles se habere conspiciunt, & illorum iura vel portiones amittere non posse considerant, in personis etiam suis detineri se non formidant. [§1] Unde quasi in usum apud plerisque succrevit, ut spe inopiae ducti vel potius seducti quod non habeant quid perdere vel amittere valeant maiora saepe malorum genera potentioribus ditioribusque se committere & perpetrare non verentur. [§2] UNDE queritur si quisquam litigantium in ipso minori facto potentiae centum (ut praemissum est) florenos faciente, aut damnorum illatorum & irrogatorum refusione convictus & agravatus rebus mobilibus & iuribus possessionariis ad portionem eiusdem convicti cedentibus adeo destitutus fuerit per iudicem causae compertus ut nusquam huiusmodi centum florenos damnaque irrogata, res & iura sua compensare possint, utrum in tali causa convictus ipse in persona sua per iudicem detineri & usque ad emendam ac satisfactionem conservari valeat libertate nobilitatis non obstante? [§3] DICENDUM quod sic. Quoniam libertas & prerogativa exemptio nobilium a captivitate non liberat quemquam neque exemptum reddit a poena punitioneque pravi operis, sed potius damnat. Virtus enim, per quam nobilitas vera fundatur dictat ut honeste quisque vivat, & alterum non ledat. [§4] Nec etiam constitutioni generali totius regni detentio eiusmodi personalis nobilium derogat. Quae notat ut nobiles non captiventur nisi citati & ordine iuridico fuerint convicti. [§5] In hoc itaque casu post citationem vel Evocationem & post latam ordine iuris a iudice sententiam detentio personalis ipsa sequitur, quam nec constitutio generalis illa vetat. Unde merito nobilis ipse in persona sua (casu in prænotato) per iudicem suum vel eius hominem ad id specialiter deputatum captivari detinerique poterit. [§6] Quem sic captum iudex ipse quindecim diebus (prout in facto debitorum fieri consuevit) apud manus suas concordia causa conservare, Et si hoc modo atque infra illud tempus in unionem cum adversa parte devenire non curaveri, tunc idem iudex manibus dicti adversarii sui illum tradere & assignare tenetur; [§7] quem adversarius ipse tamdiu apud se detinendi habet auctoritatem, quo adusque detentus ille cum eo concordabit, & ipsum simul cum iudice suo super prædicto onere centum florenorum contentos reddet damnaque adversario suo irrogata refundet. [§8] Interim autem actor eum in persona sua punire vel impedire non poterit. [§9] Attamen detentus ille tanquam unus ex familia actoris eidem servire tenebitur.

De poena violationis sedis iudiciarie, et de solutione oneris minoris sententie. lxi.

QUIA vero violatio quoque sedis iudiciariae centum florenis compensatur ideo sub hac minori sententia ob similem eius poenam comprehenditur. [§1] Attamen non nulli putavere tam onus ipsius violationis sedis iudiciariae regie maiestatis & comitum parochialium quorumlibet comituum (quæ propter illicita verba in sede prolata vel dehonestationem in sede ipsa existentium committi solet) quam etiam huius minoris sententia (quod viginti quinque marcis argenti gravis ponderis computatur) solummodo viginti quinque florenis deponi & absolvi posse ex eo quod in sede iudiciaria regie maiestatis dum Birsagia & iuditorum gravamina solvuntur singulam seu unamquamque marcarum ad unum dumtaxat florenum vel centum denarios præsentis monetæ taxare & sic deponere consueverunt prout inferius ubi de iudiciorum solutionibus tractabitur clarius dicitur. [§2] Opinio tamen ista tenenda non est. Nam oneris huiusmodi sententiarum depositio & Birsagiorum ac iuditorum solutio longe inter se differt diversoque modo & fine clauditur, sicuti paulo inferius (ut premisi) declarabitur. [§3] Brevissime igitur sciendum quod sive in sede iudiciaria regie maiestatis, sive tempore executionis: vel post executionem harum minorum sententiarum siquis litigantium onera eorum deponere & persolvere voluerit non aliter nisi centum florenis deponere expedireque valebit. [§4] Verum tamen si pecuniis paratis caruerit, etiam solutione rerum mobilium (iuxta tamen verum valorem earundem rerum) deponendi habet potestatem. [§5] Secus tamen est de violatione sedis iudiciariae regie maiestatis, quia convictus de sede ipsa interim non emittitur donec super violatione huiusmodi satisfecerit effective.

Calumnia quid sit, et quot modis committitur, & de eiusdem poena. lxx.

QUANquam factum vel causa calumniae ad poenam capitis non tendat, quia tamen emendam capitis quodammodo tangere dinoscitur ideo de ipsa calumnia in hac sententiarum serie paucis tractandum competit. [§1] Ubi sciendum quod calumnia est litis contra quempiam duplici sub colore vel diverso tramite fraudulenta motio atque suscitatio, quæ licet pluribus in causis atque casibus ex dolosa litigantium machinatione, interdum etiam ex poena in generali constitutione declarata committatur, tribus tamen præcipue modis committi solet, de quibus etiam diffinitio prænotata posita est. [§2] PRIMO dum quis unam & eandem rem vel actionem duplici sub colore aut duplici via sequitur. Si enim quispiam litigantium possessionem unam titulo pignoris & etiam iure perpetuitatis acquirit duplex color dicitur. Si vero unam & eandem rem sub uno & eodem titulo coram tamen duobus vel diversis iudicibus prosequutus fuerit, duplex via nominatur. [§3] SECUNDO vero quando quispiam alterum super iure Quartalio vel Dotalio aut Impignoratitio vel alio etiam quovis negotio expeditum & absolutum reddit atque committit, & tandem ratione eiusdem negotii ipsum absolutum aut eiusdem hæredes & successores rursus in litem attrahit, vel forsitan eo decedente filii aut alii legitimi sui successores attrahunt, mox ubi super ea re probabile sufficiensque documentum produci poterit, talis calumniæ pœnam incurrit. [§4] TERTIO autem quando una causa processu iuris terminatur, & secundo absque gratia principis & collatione novi iudicii iterum resuscitatur, tunc factum caluniæ statim committitur; [§5] cuius vigore principalis causa hoc est res illa, quæ prosequatur sive sit castrum vel oppidum aut aliud ius possessionarium sive pecuniarum summa sive Dotalium aut Quartalium in perpetuum amittitur eo facto. Et insuper calumniator ille in quinquaginta marcis Homagialibus ducentos florenos auri facientibus, in duabus iudici in tertia vero partibus in causam attracto solvendis convincitur & agravatur ipso pariter facto.

Questio notabilis et advertenda super facto calumnie. Tit. lxxi.

Item circa hanc materiam calumniæ advertendum est quod sæpenumero contingit principem nostrum castrum, civitatem, oppidum, villam vel aliud huiusmodi ius possessionarium, cuius hæreditas & proprietas ad eum manifeste spectat & pertinet, præ manibus tamen alienis titulo pignoris aut alio inscriptionis genere ad tempus illud habetur alicui servitorum suorum in perpetuum donare & conferre, qui dominium eiuscemodi iuris possessionarii non aliter nisi deposita solutaque illius inscriptionis pecuniarum summa pro se vindicare poterit. [§1] Ille vero præ cuius manibus tale ius possessionarium habetur, etiam legitime ammonitus, pecuniam suam non secus nisi ad terminos octavales causam inde suscitandam prorogando tollere & fere coactus ad se levare consuevit sicque inter litigandum annualis revolutio creberrime subsequi præterireque solet. [§2] Certum est autem quod Donatio regia cuicumque perpetuo facta infra ipsam anni unius integri revolutionem statutione legitima roborari debet. Aliter enim viribus destituta manebit. [§3] Si itaque actor seu iuris ipsius possessionarii impetrator se in dominium eiusdem introduci illudque infra dicti anni revolutionem pro se statui legitime fecerit, ne Donatio sua viribus careat & alio ex latere amonitionem quoque iuridicam super tollenda prænotatæ pecuniæ summa sive ante, sive post revolutionem ipsam annualem peregerit mox unam & eandem rem atque causam duplici sub colore duplicique via ipsum actorem prosequi in causam attractus allegabit. [§4] SIMILE est de iuribus possessionariis virtute alicuius contractus & regii consensus in quempiam devolvendis. Quæ antequam successor ille legitimus, in quem ut pote iura ipsa possessionaria rite sunt devoluta & redacta, manibus suis applicare posset; potens quispiam dominorum sæpe etiam inferioris conditionis hominum manu violenta illa pro se occupare temerarieque vindicare crebro solet. [§5] Et si successor ipse vigore huiusmodi contractus, qui naturam vimque Donationis conditionaliter sapit & habet se in dominium talium bonorum & iurium possessionariorum introduci, eaque pro se usque dictam annualem revolutionem statui fecerit, tunc contradictione per occupatorem vel alium quempiam facta causa in longum protrahi serpereque consuevit, ita ut vix aliquando in unius ætate hominis finem debitum sortiri poterit. [§6] Quæ si etiam prius aut tunc finem fortita fuerit. De perceptis tamen tempore medio fructibus nulla recompensa vel satisfactio actori impendetur, nulla etiam debitæ ultionis pœna super actibus potentiariis hoc est violenta potentiariaque conservatione illorum iurium possessionariorum in causam attracto infligitur, eo quod causa ipsa non insinuatione mediante, sed per simplicem evocationem (quam nos longum litis processum appellamus) inchoata fuisse dicetur, licet quælibet causa virtute alicuius contractus inchoata eo precise modo brevi & ordine:

processuque terminari debeat, quo causa prætextu bonorum per defectum seminis quoruncunque decedentium ad collationem regię maiestatis derivatorum finiri determinarique & concludi solet. [§7] Si vero causa per insinuationem prætextu indebitę violentęque occupationis iurium ipsorum possessionariorum per actorem mota suscitataque fuerit (statutione quoque prænarrata super eisdem iuribus possessionariis prius vel etiam post peracta) pari modo duplici sub colore calumnio seque iura eiusmodi possessionaria actorem acquirere & prosequi occupator ipse allegabit. [§8] EX PRÆMISSIS igitur quęstio subinfertur: Utrum prædeklarata causarum motiones duplici via vel duplici colore factę pœnam calumnię afferant? AD quam questiunculam breviter dicendum est quod non, [§9] quoniam contra male fidei possessorem agitur qui postquam non poterit iuste se bona & iura huiusmodi possessionaria tenuisse possedissequē comprobare ex hoc neque poterit adversus actorem opponere male se in iuribus illis duplici ipso colore vel duplici via perturbatum fuisse. Quia iura illa non sua sed actoris fuere, quę absoluta solummodo potentia ad exitum usque litis gubernavit. Possessor enim bonę & non male fidei habet præmissa allegandi facultatem. [§10] UBI autem obiceretur quod ille, qui virtute inscriptionis regię eiusmodi talia bona possidet, bonę fidei possessor esse censetur. Verum est interea temporis quo ad levandam & tollendam pecuniam suam non amonetur, postquam tamen amonitus legitime fuerit & pecunię suę summam tollere recusaverit sed frivolis & exquisitis exceptionibus ad terminos octavales causam distulerit ut interim fructus illorum bonorum capere possit, iam non bonę, sed malę fidei possessor esse existimatur. Et nisi alia pœna in generali decreto nostro super huiusmodi feneratoribus (qui pecunias suas amoniti levare recusant) expressa fuisset talis fœnerator in perpetua estimatione ipsorum bonorum convinci deberet & agravari, dum potissime iuri consentaneam rationem non levationis pecunię suę dare vel assignare non posset. [§11] Aliter enim si violenta bonorum occupatio & fraudulenta ad tempus eorundem conservatio locum haberet inpunitaque maneret profecto difficilime tardeque nimis iustis suis iuribus aliquis potiri gaudereque posset. [§12] Idem est dicendum atque tenendum etiam in casu quo quispiam bona ac iura possessionaria defuncti & hæredibus destituti hominis Impignoratio vel alio quovis redemptibili iure præ manibus suis habuerit, & per fratrem adoptivum ac legitimum successorem ipsius defuncti rite requisitus pariter & amonitus bona illa (etiam pecunia sua deposita) remittere noluerit, & alia ex parte idem successor ne annualis revolutio elaboretur statutionem necessariam pro se peregerit, quod scilicet iuste legitimeque & amonitionem & statutionem facere poterit nulla pœna facti calumnie inde subsequente.

De emenda lingue, & de pena eiusdem. lxxii.

EMenda autem linguę viginti quinque marcis centum florenos auri facientibus compensatur, [§1] quę propter iniustam falsamque querimoniam regię maiestati aut cæteris iudicibus ordinariis porrectam & sæpenumero ob turpia inhonestaque verba contra quempiam bonę fame & honestę conditionis hominem prolata per iudices imponitur. [§2] VERUM tamen actio principalis ratione cuius causa ipsa mota fuit ob iniustam huiusmodi querelam & expositionem perpetuo non amittitur; sicuti per calumnię factum (prout immediate prætractum est) imperpetuum amitti intelligitur. [§3] Sed condescensa ipsa causa & pœna prænarrata in duabus iudici in tertia autem partibus causanti vel homini læso deposita atque persoluta poterit actor si voluerit eam iusto debitoque modo de novo suscitare.

Quid sit repulsio, & de modo ac pena eiusdem. Tit. lxxiii.

QUIa tempore exequutionis sententiarum & aliarum iuditiarum deliberationum per convictos & in causa succumbentes violenta quadam repulsio subsequi & committi consuevit, ideo de ipsa repulsione hoc in loco breviter aliquid dicendum restat. [§1] UBI sciendum quod repulsio est partis in causa triumphantis per alteram partem in causa succumbentem ab exequutione late per iudicem sententiæ violenta quadam propulsio. [§2] Quæ quidem repulsio quamvis ex vocabuli sui virtute non iuridicus processus, sed contra illum potius manifestum obstaculum esse censeatur. Finitis enim & pertransitis cunctis causæ processibus & lata per iudicem diffinitiva iam sententia, evaginato gladio vel alio quocunque armorum genere ostenso fieri committique solet. Quia tamen ex vetustissimo usu & diuturna consuetudine emanavit in mediumque venit, ideo pro quadam nostræ legis parte per huiusmodi consuetudinem dudum approbatam inductæ iam reputatur, [§3] & post finalem conclusionem cuiuslibet causæ semel sed non pluries fieri & subsequi tolleratur. [§4] Quæ si facta fuerit per unam marcam auri septuaginta & duos florenos facientem, in duabus iudici in tertia vero partibus in causa triumphanti persolvendam compensatur: atque deponitur. [§5] Secundario autem si repulsio in una eademque causa committeretur nota perpetuæ infidelitatis inde palam sequeretur, prout in generali quoque decreto nostro continetur.

Declaratio articuli decreti generalis super repulsione conscripti. lxxiii.

SEd hic advertendum est quod quia in articulo super facto repulsionis in serie ipsius generalis decreti conscripto hoc positum habetur ut repulsio ipsa per nudatum ensem vel ostensionem evaginati gladii fieri valeat, atque nomina vicinorum ac commetaneorum, qui tempore exequutionis late sententiæ cum regio vel Palatinali & alicuius loci testimonialis hominibus intererunt in litteris super ipsa repulsione relatoriis conscribantur. [§1] Ideo damnabilis quadam abusio inter nonnullos litigantes hinc emersit quod partem in causa triumphantem & victricem in sententiæ exequutione evaginatione gladii vel ensis nudati ostensione repellere nolunt, sed astutia excogitata baculo ligneo, vel Cambuca ferrea, interdum minis & terroribus hominumque caterva repellunt, & sententiam ac iudiciariam deliberationem exequutioni demandari & effectui mancipari non permittunt. [§2] Postea coram iudice suo proponunt & allegant non fuisse factam repulsionem eo quod nudati ensis ostensio vel gladii evaginatio prout in decreto continetur nulla tempore ipsius exequutionis facta vel commissa fuisset. [§3] Sæpe etiam contra vicinos & commetaneos exceptiones faciunt, quod iste non vicinus, ille vero non commetaneus esset, & pluribus eiusmodi cavillationibus iudicia iusta subvertere & processum iuris turbare moliantur. [§4] UNDE sciendum est quod in serie ipsius decreti non reperitur, neque scriptum habetur repulsionem secus & aliter fieri non posse vel non debere nisi evaginati gladii aut ensis nudati ostensione. Sed hoc dumtaxat ibi continetur quod non cum hominum turba & manibus violentis, sed per nudatum solum ensem vel ostensionem evaginati gladii repulsio fieri valeat. [§5] Et hoc ideo, quoniam priscis temporibus utraque pars tam scilicet vincens, quam etiam convicta tempore exequutionis alicuius sententiæ vel iuditiariæ deliberationis magna hominum multitudine, Sæpe etiam bellico apparatu in alterutrum contendere sævireque & crebro strages maxima inter partes subsequi consueverat. Ita ut si actor casu superior evasisset in dominium bonorum reoptentorum se collocasset, convictus vero si actorem devincere & ab exequutione illa violenter propellere potuisset, in una marca auri pro huiusmodi violenta temerariaque repulsione convincebatur. [§6] Ut igitur corruptela hæc e medio tolleretur statutum est quod non sit necessarium cum hominum turba & potentiariis manibus exequutionem aliquam peragere, sed sola ostensio evaginati gladii ad repulsionem faciendam sufficiat. [§7] Sive igitur per ipsius ensis vel gladii evaginationem, sive per baculi aut Cambucæ ostensionem, sive per hominum multitudinem vel solis minis & terroribus exequutio alicuius iudiciariæ commissionis perturbetur, & effectui mancipari non permittatur semper repulsio esse censetur. [§8] Nomina vero vicinorum & commetaneorum propterea denotabantur ne fraus aut dolus in oneribus repulsionum committi posset. Nam antiquitus singuli repellentes vel repulsionem facientes in singulis marcis auri condemnabantur, & sæpenumero tam filiorum, quam etiam fratrum ac uxoris & filiarum ipsius convicti & in causa succumbentis nomina in litteris Relatoriis conscribentur, & sic onus repulsionis in tantum crescebat, ut principalem causam creberrime præcellere longeque exuperare videretur. [§9] Quæ quidem abusus ævo nostro abolita est, & quotquot sint personæ convictæ vel repellentes unam tantum marcam auri pro unius iudiciariæ deliberationis repulsione modo persolvunt. [§10] Nihilominus tamen ipsa nomina vicinorum & commetaneorum possessionis recuperatæ nunc quoque conscribuntur, ne regius aut Palatinalis & alicuius loci testimonialis homines dono vel favore seducti atque corrupti in exequutione iuridica eorum fidei commissa repulsionem factam fuisse (si etiam non fuisset) astruere, & per hoc nota infidelitatis quempiam condemnare valeant. [§11] Eiuscemodi itaque vel simili fraude ac exquisito subterfugio processus iuris atque exequutio iudiciariæ deliberationis turbari non potest. Vicini enim & commetanei propinquiores non semper domi reperiuntur, nec exequutioni iuridicæ semper interesse possunt. [§12] Si igitur pars vincens extra dominium iuris possessionarii reoptenti fuerit inventus sufficienti argumento erit iudiciariam commissionem turbatam esse & per repulsionem exequutione sua reali caruisse. [§13] Siquis autem litigantium regium vel Palatinalem ac Capitularem aut Conventualem hominem relationem iniustam & indebitam fecisse criminabitur, poterit eosdem propterea iuri semper convenire, non tamen ea de causa processus iste iuridicus est turbandus.

Quod nota infidelitatis tribus modis fertur & pronuntiatur.

Titulus. lxxv.

ADvertendum est autem quod in causa notæ infidelitatis non semper permittitur fieri repulsio. Nota namque infidelitatis tribus modis pronuntiatur. [§1] PRIMO modo per principem & regem nostrum, ita ut si maiestas sua regia quempiam regnicolarum suorum nota infidelitatis condemnare voluerit, tunc universis dominis prælatis & baronibus cæterisque regnicolis unam generalem dietam & congregationem ad certum terminum instituat & indicet, ad quam etiam ille, contra quem nota infidelitatis obicitur, per litteras præceptorias regie maiestatis mediantibus litteris exhibitoriis ad aliquem conventum vel quodcunque capitulum sonantibus personaliter & non per procuratorem evocari debet. [§2] Qui si venerit & se expurgare poterit bene quidem, alioquin si non venerit: vel si venerit, sed se expurgare non valebit, ipsa nota crimineque infidelitatis condemnatur, et postea illi neque salvus conductus, neque etiam novum iudicium per regiam maiestatem conceditur, et subsequenter nec contradictoria inhibito, nec violenta repulsio tempore stationis & occupationis bonorum ipsius infidelis admittitur, sed absolute Donatio regia exequutioni in hac parte demandatur. [§3] SECUNDO modo fertur nota infidelitatis ex reportata serie secundarie repulsionis. Et hoc quoque modo repulsio fieri non permittitur. Quæ quidem nota etiam alioquin ex repulsione temeraria processisse secutaque fuisse dinoscitur, & non congruit id tertio iterare, quod vetatur etiam secundario facere. [§4] TERTIO & ultimo modo nota infidelitatis declaratur atque pronuntiatur per iudiciariam deliberationem & latam sententiam iudicum ordinariorum regni ex Donatione regia prætextu erutionis oculorum, mutillationis membrorum, Cussionis falsarum monetarum vel confectionis aut delationis falsarum litterarum & aliorum huiusmodi casuum notam infidelitatis afferentium cuiuspiam facta subsequentem atque provenientem. [§5] Quæ quidem iudiciaria deliberatio, quia ex propositis & responsis partium in iudicio contradictorio decernitur atque declaratur, altera scilicet partium notam ipsam factam patratamque fuisse affirmante & altera negante. Ideo tempore exequutionis huiusmodi sententiæ per responsiones (ut præfertur) partium latae vel forsitan per non venientiam & non comparitionem alterius partis pronuntiatae repulsio prænarata fieri permittitur. [§6] Et hoc ideo (prout etiam alioquin ista præcipue ratione repulsio inducta fuisse prohibetur & modo quoque fieri tolleratur) ut in termino vel tempore reportatae seriei talis repulsionis quicquid in processu ipsius causæ negligentia convicti & in causa succumbentis male actum vel obmissum fuisset, per gratiam novi iudicii aut revocationem procuratoris restauretur & in melius reformetur. [§7] Damnosum enim & nimis periculosum foret mox post latam & pronunciatam a iudice ex responsionibus partium sententiam de dominio ac pacifica possessione bonorum suorum quempiam vigore eiusdem sententiæ excludi atque tandem extra dominium illa rursus prosequi debere. [§8] Iudex enim ex obiectionibus & allegationibus duarum pluriumve partium & plerumque litterarum ac litteralium instrumentorum coram eo productarum & exhibitarum continentis & tenoribus sententiam decernere tenetur. [§9] CERTUM est autem procuratores partium sæpenumero in responsionibus suis aut negligentia, aut ignorantia, aliquando etiam malitia falli & errare. [§10] Sæpe litteræ ac etiam litteralia instrumenta litigantium periclitantur & in termino per iudicem exhibitioni illarum præfixo produci nequeunt. Unde sententia per iudicem ita fertur & pronunciat prout responsiones partium vel tenores & contentiæ litterarum ac litteralium instrumentorum expostulant. [§11] Qua propter si qua partium per se vel procuratorem suum in responsionibus suis errasse, vel in exhibitionibus litterarum defecisse se cognoverit, ne per sententiam ob eiusmodi defectum & errorem contra se latam de dominio bonorum suorum immediate excludatur, repulsionem violentam (in contemptum licet & vilipendium iudiciariæ commissionis fieri, tamen tollerari solitam) tempore exequutionis ipsius latae sententiæ facere cogitur, & ad reddendam rationem huiusmodi repulsionis unicus adhuc terminus coram iudice suo comparendi sibi præfigitur [§12] in quo tandem errorem aut defectum suum vigore novi iudicii per principem gratiose concessi, vel per revocationem & retractationem responsionis sui procuratoris restaurare & si poterit in melius reformare tenetur. [§13] NOVI namque iudicii collatio ac procuratoris cuiuspiam revocatio semper presupponit errorem & defectum. Non enim est necesse novum iudicium impetrare vel responsionem procuratoris revocare, nisi in processu causæ erratum fuisse prius deprehendatur. [§14] Postea vero ulterior terminus sibi non deputatur neque conceditur, sed lata ipsa sententia finaliter & effective exequutioni demandatur. [§15] Et si secundario quoque repulsio temerarie committitur, nota perpetuæ infidelitatis (sicuti immediate declaratum est) inde reportatur.

Utrum ille possit repulsionem facere, qui in processu cause non egit. Tit lxxvi.

SEd quia in calce quarumlibet litterarum Adiudicatoriarum ac sententionalium ista clausula CON traditione talis & talis convicti (nominando eum qui in causa succubuit & convictus est) ac aliorum quorumlibet prævia ratione non obstante inscribi & inseri & contra hanc quidem clausulam etiam repulsio prænotata subsequi & fieri consuevit; [§1] IDEO queritur: Utrum ille, qui in causa non fuit possit actorem et partem in causa triumphantem ab exequutione late sententiæ: litterarumque Adiudicatoriarum repellere. Et videtur quod non, quia non est illius turbare iudiciariam commissionem, neque immiscere & ingerere se lucro vel damno litis & causæ qui in processu eiusdem nec vicit nec succubuit. [§2] IN CONtrarium tamen plerumque accidit partem triumphantem cum litteris Adiudicatoriis atque sententionalibus ad facies talium bonorum & iurium possessionariorum accedere, quæ præmanibus alterius & non illius, qui in causa succubuit habentur, & iusto etiam forsitan titulo per eum possidentur. [§3] Sæpe etiam p̄enes unum principale membrum iuris possessionarii talia bona occupari machinantur, quæ iusto modo atque titulo ab eo membro fuerant dudum sequestrata. Verbi gratia: Castrum aut castellum vel oppidum unum simul cum cunctis suis pertinentiis, videlicet villis, prædiis portionibusque & iuribus possessionariis ad idem de iure spectantibus & pertinere debentibus, processu iuris aut ex Donatione regia vel alio titulo per quempiam acquiritur & prosequitur, a quo quidem castro, castello vel oppido verus dominus & legitimus possessor eius, qui forsitan iam in semine defecit unam vel duas villas aut aliquod prædium & terram adhuc vivens precio vendidit vel servitorum pro exhibitione donavit aut alio titulo contulit, & ille cui venditio vel Donatio facta fuit, se in huiusmodi villis aut prædio & terra, etiam consensu regio ac statutione iuridica dudum fundavit atque firmavit. [§4] Obtento igitur iam principali membro, ipso scilicet castro aut castello vel oppido una cum victis pertinentiis suis, & illo cui (ut præmissum est) venditio aut Donatio facta fuit in causa non existente (ex eo forsitan quod tempore Recaptivationis & primarię Statutionis dicti principalis membri solus ille, qui pro tunc in dominio & possessione eiusdem membri principalis fuerat totali huiusmodi Recaptivationi & Statutioni contradixerat) actor ipse etiam prænaratas villas aut prædium vel terram præ manibus alienis modo antelato iam existentes & habitam p̄enes principale eiuscemodi membrum, tanquam scilicet pertinentias eiusdem pro se vindicare & occupare nititur. [§5] In eo itaque & alio quoque simili casu repulsionem præactam, etiam ille, qui in causa non erat facere permittitur. Et hoc virtute illius clausulæ (PRÆVIA RATIONE) qua mediante nec onus repulsionis ille deponere tenebitur si pars triumphans absque debita ratione ad occupanda bona prænotata accessisse verificabitur. [§6] ITEM de iuribus quoque possessionariis impignoratiis idem est sciendum quod si quispiam litigantium hæreditatem & proprietatem alicuius iuris possessionarii pro se ordine iudiciario obtinebit, & tale ius possessionarium apud manus alienas titulo pignoris extiterit (si tamen impignoratio ipsa bono & iusto modo, & non litis inter medio facta fuisse comprobatur) vigore sententię super ipsa perpetuitate late reoptentum huiusmodi ius possessionarium actor a manibus eius, qui pignoris illud titulo possidet, simpliciter occupare non potest, sed super illa pecuniarum summa, pro qua præmisso pignoris titulo obligatum habetur, ut primum satisfaciat necesse est. Nam alioquin si de plano occupare niteretur repulsio merito subsequi poterit. [§7] Et si ad tollendam pecuniam suam possessor ipsius iuris possessionarii se tempore exequutionis dictę sententię iudiciarięque deliberationis paratum obtulerit, tunc neque p̄ene vel oneri huiusmodi repulsionis subiacebit. [§8] Et hoc intellige si de summę pecuniarum quantitate ac impignorationis qualitate pariter & veritate ibidem constabit.

De novo iudicio ac eius modo serieque & processu. Tit. lxxvii.

QUIA post factam repulsionem vel procuratorum malam responsionem sæpenumero novum iudicium solet a principe impetrari, ut in causa illa qua quispiam succubuit & convictus est non obstante eo errore vel defectu quo se in processu causę gravatum fuisse cognoscit, non obstante etiam lata iam exinde iudicis sententia, idem de novo respondere novasque allegationes, exceptiones & obiectiones facere, litteras forsitan non exhibitas producere, defectum obmissum supplere, errorem commissum emendare & generaliter omnia, quæ iuris & iustitię ac defensionis & sublevamini causę suę proficua esse cognoverit peragere valeat atque possit. [§1] SCIENDUM igitur est quod huiusmodi novi iudicii gratiam, Præterea cunctarum litterarum privilegialium rite tamen & legitime emanatarum confirmationem, necnon universorum bonorum & iurium possessionariorum titulo novę Donationis collationem princeps noster ex debito regiminis sui officio unicuique largire & concedere solet. [§2] Nova tamen Donatio conferenda est locumque habet si iuste & non fecte postulatur, hoc est si bonorum ipsorum impetrator a die adeptionis eorundem per se vel progenitores quoque sui in reali dominio illorum usque ad tempus impetrationis perstiterunt. quemadmodum in prima parte clarius super ipsa nova Donatione Notabile positum habes. [§3] ULTERIUS advertendum quod causa per formam novi iudicii inchoata unico tantummodo termino iuridico & ante omnes alias causas finiri concludique solet, ne negotium & causa per iudiciariam sententiam & deliberationem iam decisa fine confuso pendere cogatur. [§4] De cuius quidem novi iudicii serie & modo, quia in generali decreto nostro clara continetur descriptio, ideo articulum super ea re conscriptum verbotenus (prout sequitur) adieci. [§5] ITEM solent nonnulli regnicolę in eorum causis contra sese potissimum in facto possessionario motis, servatis pertransitisque legitimorum terminorum & litium processibus & litterarumque tandem ac aliorum cunctorum documentorum probabilium hincinde pro finali conclusione huiusmodi negotii productionibus factis, in ultimo cause termino, dum etiam iudices ordinarii sedis iudiciarię regni magistrique Prothonotarii & iurati eiusdem sedis assessores suam tulissent sententiam, Earundemque partium altera se in huiusmodi causa deficere & succumbere agnosceret, ac litterę Adiudicatorię exinde vel iam emanatę & extradatę extitissent, aut post latam & pronunciatam sententiam extradari deberent procuratores eorum revocare & causam condescendi facere velle, aut novum iudicium impetrare, vigore cuius partem alteram ab exequutione litterarum Adiudicatoriarum sæpius prohiberent, ut sic eorum iustis iuribus privarentur; [§6] propterea statutum est, ut a modo imposterum huiusmodi causantes non nisi lite pendente & causa nondum decisa procuratores eorum revocare & causam condescendi facere possint. [§7] Novum autem iudicium impetrent semper, si voluerint. Verum tamen eius vigore partem alteram ab exequutione latę sententię litterarumque Adiudicatoriarum superinde emanandarum extractione vel extradatione iudices ordinarios vel eorum Prothonotarios nequaquam valeant inhibere. [§8] Immo & ipsa pars triumphans huiusmodi litteras Adiudicatorias non obstantibus ipsis litteris novi iudicii sic impetratis debite exequutioni demandari facere, Pars denique ipsum novum iudicium impetrans, habita exequutione dictę latę sententię suam causam vigore ipsius novi iudicii dum voluerit exequutione demandare & idem prosequi, [§9] Casu vero quo altera partium sive ratione iurium possessionarium sive aliorum quorumcunque negotiorum per non venientiam, eo quod fortasse certis suis negociis præpedita comparere nequiret sententionaliter quoquo modo convinceretur tunc talis pars sic per non venientiam convicta & novum iudicium impetrare & tam iudices ordinarios ac Prothonotarios eorundem ab extradatione litterarum Adiudicatoriarum sententionaliumque, & partem adversam ab extractione & exequutione earundem litterarum semper dum voluerit & poterit inhibere valeat atque possit. [§10] Et quod omnes causę, in quibus per regiam maiestatem nova iudicia impetrata fuerint in primis octavis inter omnes alias causas leventur & iudicentur.

Utrum possit novum iudicium impetrare qui in cause processu non succubuit. lxxviii.

SEd quæstiuncula occurrit discutienda similis quæstioni super facto repulsionis superius propositæ. [§1] Utrum possit ille novum iudicium impetrare, qui non egit, neque fuit in processu causę? DICENDUM breviter quod quamdiu ille qui in causa succubuit in humanis egerit & supervixerit, nemo alter præter eum gratiam novi iudicii impetrare potest. Non enim congruit cuiuspiam falcem suam in alterius messem mittere. [§2] Verum tamen parte ipsa convicta ille, in quem prosequutio causę ipsius de regni nostri consuetudine condescendet, liberam plenariamque impetrandi de facto habebit facultatem.

Procuratoris revocatio quid sit et ubi fieri debeat. Tit. lxxix.

QUoniam in causa factoque novi iudicii procuratorum revocatio sæpe sequitur idcirco SCIENDUM quod procuratorem revocare est responsionem alicuius advocati per eum præter voluntatem & extra informationem constituentis in iudicio factam retractare, & eam nova responsione coram iudice reformare. [§1] Omnis autem procuratoria revocatio coram eo iudice, quo responsio illa, quæ retractabitur facta fuit, vel homine suo ad id per eundem iudicem specialiter deputato fieri solet atque debet. [§2] Verum si causa ipsa in alterius iudicis præsentiam fuerit transmissa, tunc coram eodem iudice vel eius homine, in cuius conspectu per huiusmodi transmissionem causa ipsa pendet responsio procuratoris revocari debet.

Procuratoris responsio quomodo et quo onere retractari debeat. lxxx.

ADvertendum itaque quod revocatio responsionis cuiuslibet procuratoris in longis causarum processibus, quibus videlicet etiam facta responsione iuridici processus subsequi & iudiciariæ deliberationes ac sententiæ interlocutoriæ pronunciari solent, non nisi lite pendente & causa per diffinitivam sententiam nondum decisa fieri debet. [§1] In causis vero brevibus per insinuationem motis: & aliis unicum terminum ad respondendum habentibus, etiam post latam & pronunciatam diffinitivam a iudice sententiam quilibet litigantium procuratorem suum revocare poterit. [§2] RETRACTATIO namque procuratoris (sicuti prænarratum est) præsupponit semper errorem vel defectum, quiquidem error & defectus non nisi in responsione & obiectione aut aliqua exceptione committi solet. [§3] Ac tandem facta nova responsione post revocationem prioris responsionis modo præhabito instaurari reformarique debet, ita ut ipsa die, qua sententia ac iudiciaria deliberatio pronunciatur & fertur, quilibet causantium absque quolibet onere & gravamine, postea vero infra octavarum & brevium iudiciorum celebrationem (dempta dumtaxat extrema die ipsarum octavarum vel brevium iudiciorum) semper cum minori onere, sex videlicet florenis auri, Demum autem eisdem octavis vel brevibus iudicii expiratis cum maiori onere quinquaginta scilicet marcis Homagialibus gravis ponderis ducentos florenos auri facientibus procuratorem suum revocare potest. [§4] Ultimam autem diem prænotatam verum esse intellige si retractans ille calumniose & fraudulentè agere prætenderet. Ut videlicet terminum solummodo ipsum iuridicum hac cautela revocationis præteriret & alteram partem ulteriori processu vexaret & gravaret. Nam aliter die illa, qua sententia fertur, ut eadem die & procuratoris responsio revocetur necesse est.

Procuratoris responsio duobus modis solet revocari. Tit. lxxxi.

REsponsio vero procuratoris & advocati duobus modis solet revocari. [§1] PRIMO in processu causæ ante finalem conclusionem & diffinitivam sententiam eiusdem causæ (licet responsione præhabita) ut puta si quis se litteras & litteralia instrumenta super eo negotio, quo per adversam partem lite impetitur habere & illarum vigore se ab impetitione sui adversarii defendere posse allegaret, vel factum illud pro quo lite ipsa vexatur se patrasse negaret, aut forsitan causam iudex ex partium responsionibus ad oculatam revisionem vel communem inquisitionem decerneret iam responsionem factam fuisse cuilibet constaret; [§2] antequam tamen terminus iuridicus per iudicem litterarum exhibitioni aut iuramentali depositioni vel oculatæ revisionis aut communis inquisitionis celebrationi prefixus & deputatus adveniat, partium ipsarum altera se per responsionem sui procuratoris gravatum esse vel gravari debere sentiens & agnoscens non expectato huiusmodi termino iudiciarię ipsius commissionis procuratoris sui responsionem coram iudice suo vel homine eiusdem ad id (prout pręnarratum est) specialiter per eum deputato revocare potest; [§3] & eiuscemodi revocatio (quamvis cum maiori onere quinquaginta scilicet marcis Homagialibus) etiam absque gratia principis fieri poterit. [§4] SECUNDO revocatio ipsa post latam & pronunciatam sententiam diffinitivam contingit, & hoc solummodo in causis, quibus mox & immediate per primariam responsionem partium finalis conclusio & diffinitiva sententia sequitur atque profertur. [§5] Ubi si procurator unius partis aliter respondisset processus aliquis in causa illa subsequi de iure potuisset, & casus iste rarus est, qui in causis pręcipue per insinuationem motis & suscitatis committi consuevit. [§6] Unde hoc secundo modo revocatio responsionis cuiuslibet procuratoris expiratis octavis vel termino celebrationis brevium iudiciorum non nisi per gratiam principis vigore novi iudicii sequi fierique debet. [§6] Fassio autem procuratoris, qua mediante procuratorum quispiam constituentem aliquem in quinquaginta marcis gravis ponderis aut citra sive perennali, sive impignoratio iure & titulo obligat semper sine principis gratia, maiori tamen cum onere retractari poterit.

Quod causarum condescensio duobus modis fieri solet. Tit. lxxxii.

QUoniam post revocationem procuratoriam sæpenumero causarum condescensio sequitur. [§1] Unde sciendum quod condescensio causę duobus modis fieri solet. PRIMO quidem per iudicem quando scilicet iudex causę perlecta actione & acquisitione actoris simul & evocatione inde subsequuta bene calculata tale vicium vel errorem in litteris ipsis Evocatoriis deprehendet, quo prępediente sententia ac iudiciaria deliberatio debito modo ex huiusmodi actione pronuciari non poterit. [§2] Puta quia non denotatur villa sive possessio, quę acquiritur in quo comitatu regni adiaceat. Plures autem sunt villę uno & eodem nomine vocitatę in diversis comitatibus situatę vel sæpe etiam in eodem comitatu adiacentes, aliquo tamen additamento cognominis variatę. Et si villę nomen cum suo cognomine non exprimitur, dubium mox suboritur quę sit illa, quam actor iuri suo vindicare nititur. [§3] Verbi gratia duę sunt villę hoc nomine NANDOR appellatę in uno eodemque comitatu positę, una tamen illarum cognominis appositione variatur, quoniam altera superior vel maior, & altera inferior aut minor NANDOR vocitatur; quarum altera mea est, altera vero ad te pertinet & tua est. [§4] Si itaque in Evocationis & actionis serie non declaratur, quę illarum acquiritur, non poterit iudex causę discernere ad quam earum sententia feratur. Unde causa talis merito condescendet & invalidatur de novo per actorem si voluerit inchoanda. [§5] Hoc tamen semper pręsupposito si in causam attractus per se vel suum legitimum procuratorem defectum & errorem huiusmodi per modum exceptionis allegabit. Nam aliter si ad actionem sponte respondebit, & acquisitioni illi per seipsum parebit nil obiciendo, iudex de se opponens simul & iudicans fieri nequit, sed sententiam inter partes iuxta causę meritum proferre debet. [§6] IDEM EST dicendum si quis occasione actuum potentiariorum in litem evocabitur, & quo tempore mala facinoraque in actione posita patrata sunt in actione non declarabitur quod talis quoque causa condescendet & cassabitur. Quoniam absque termini vel temporis expressione, nec actor vincere, nec in causam attractus vinci commode poterit. [§7] Omnis enim causa & litis motio ratione actuum potentiariorum facta & inchoata, & ex consequenti actio atque acquisitio in ea declarata per in causam attractum aut affirmatur, aut negatur. Si affirmatur, ut ratio quoque suę affirmationis assignetur necesse est. Nam aliter affirmans vel reus ipse mox in causa succumberet. [§8] Verum si negatur, maxime propterea negatur quod tempore patrations ipsorum actuum potentiariorum nedum pręsentem fuisse, sed forte neque in patria sua pro tunc se extitisse velit vicinorum & commetaneorum attestacione probare, & ob hoc si terminus in actione non specificabitur in causam attractus difficulter expurgabitur. [§9] HOC tamen advertendum & cordi imprimendum est quod Evocationes prætextu actuum potentiiorum ædite & actiones in eisdem positæ diversis cum clausulis declarari solent. Aliquando enim (& potissime cum actio ad personam principalem refertur) clausula ista apponitur quod talis vel talis assumptis secum talibus & talibus familiaribus ac Iobagionibus suis ad domum meam irruendo hoc & hoc patravit. [§10] Aliquando vero in Evocatione ista clausula scribitur: Missis & destinatis .T. & .T. hominibus suis ad talem villam vel possessionem meam, ibique tot & tanta damna Iobagionibus meis irrogavit & intulit. [§11] Sæpe autem Evocatio cum hac clausula decernitur de commissione & mandato talis vel talis .T. & .T. familiares & Iobagiones sui talem famulum meum in tali loco repertum aut constitutum dire & acriter verberaverunt & huiusmodi. &c. [§12] Unde semper advertenda considerandaque est clausularum prædictarum in actione positio. Aliud est enim secum assumere, aliud aliquem destinare & aliud cuiquam patrandum quid mandare & committere. [§13] Assumptio namque personalem inter essentiam semper requirit. [§14] Missio vero & destinatio præsentiam exigit, ut præsens sit ille qui mittit & qui mittitur. Licet ista missio etiam de longinquo fieri possit ad familiares referendo, sed non ad Iobagiones, qui in propinquo resident. Nisi forte medio famulorum Iobagiones mitterentur. Et hoc quoque in casu non contingenti, sed deliberato & malitiose perpetrari præconcepto. [§15] Iussio autem & missio etiam absentiam includit, potest etenim aliquis (si etiam in regionem longinquam abiret) suis famulis & Iobagionibus in domo sua constitutis antequam discedat & itineri se submittat hoc & hoc perpetrandum committere. [§16] Quapropter in missione & commissione debet semper attendi modus & ordo patratae rei atque casus contingens et non contingens vel non deliberatus. [§17] In casu namque contingenti puta si pecora & pecudes Iobagionis mei de pratis vel segetibus propter illata damna per aliquem abiguntur, & in curiam suam aut stabulum includuntur, ut interea non emittantur donec super damnis illatis satisfactio impendatur. Familiares autem vel Iobagiones mei temeritate ducti eadem die aut sequenti huiusmodi pecudes & pecora manu violenta educunt & reducunt, aut Iobagio vel famulus meus in taberna sedens & cum cæteris potatoribus ad iurgia veniens alterum vulnerabit vel forte homicidium perpetrabit, & ibidem propterea detinebitur, sed per alios famulos vel Iobagiones meos ipsa eadem vel altera die violenter eliberabitur, missio & commissio perpendi ruminarique debet. [§18] Si enim in remotis & longinquis partibus ego tunc ago certum est quod mittere vel committere nequeo cui ut pote de contingenti huiusmodi casu tam repente nil constare potuit. [§19] Si vero dicis familiaribus & Iobagionibus meis ad sortem me dudum commisisse ut si quando talis casus occurrerit hoc & hoc faciant, poterit quidem (fateor) iste casus in committendo sed non in destinando fieri. Qui (quia de futuris contingentibus non est determinata veritas) admittendus non est. Nam & alioquin si casus eiusmodi admittendus censetur (præsupposito primario committentis intento) non violenta pecudum eductio vel homicidæ eliberatio, sed potius homicidium & damnorum illatio consideranda pariter & compensanda dinoscitur. [§20] CASUS vero non contingens fit & intelligitur quando deliberate & ex præconcepta malitia patrandum aliquid facinoris committitur. Puta domorum invasio, silvarum succisio, villarum deprædatio & similes actus violenti, qui post discessum alicuius potentis ad regionem longinquam vel externa regna, etiam post centum & plures dies committi inferrique poterunt, si prius illud mandaverit in absentia sua patrandum atque peragendum. [§21] Iste vero distinctiones clausularum prædictarum positæ sunt non ut litigantibus calumniandi via pateret, sed potius causæ iusta vel iniusta motio claresceret. Sicuti enim actio iusta tuenda semper est, ita acquisitio iniusta & calumniosa admittenda non est. [§22] SECUNDO modo causarum condescensio vel depositio fit per actorem cum onere sex marcarum minoris seu levis ponderis, sex utputa florenos auri facientium, in duabus iudici, coram quo lis ipsa mota fuerat, In tertia vero partibus in causam attracto persolvendarum; dum videlicet actor suam actionem & acquisitionem ex sui negligentia vel scriptoris vicio aut alio quocunque errore occurrente male & indebite positam ac declaratam cernit & obesse potius, quam prodesse sibi considerat, antequam discussio illius causæ fiat per se vel suum procuratorem eam cum onere & gravamine prenotato sponte deponi sopirique & condescendi facit.

Quo modo ante & quo modo post latam sententiam causa condescendi debet. lxxxiii.

CAUSÆ autem condescensio semper ante latam per iudicem sententiam libere fieri atque celebrari poterit, post latam tamen & pronunciatam sententiam locum ipsa condescensio non habet. [§1] LATAM autem & pronunciatam sententiam intellige finalem & diffinitivam, non autem intermedientem, quam canonistæ interlocutoriam appellant. [§2] Nam post intermedientem huiusmodi sententiam causarum condescensio sæpe locum habet admittendaque censetur, sed non semper. [§3] SI ENIM aliqua causa per iudicem ex responsionibus partium ad communem inquisitionem vel oculatam revisionem aut litterarum & litteralium instrumentorum exhibitionem submissa fuerit tunc non obstante huiusmodi iudiciaria deliberatione & sententia intermediente, [~~causa ipsa~~]² etiam tempore discussionis reportate seriei talis communis inquisitionis vel oculatæ revisionis aut litterarum & litteralium instrumentorum exhibitionis; Si etiam per utramque partem litteræ iam coram iudice productæ essent, ante tamen pronunciationem diffinitive sententiæ ex serie attestatum vel litteralium instrumentorum ferendæ semper actor causam suam cum onere præscripto sex marcarum deponendi habet potestatem. [§4] DIXI tamen notanter non semper. Nam in casu, quo quispiam ratione occupationis aliquorum iurium possessionariorum per adversam partem in præsentiam sui iudicis evocabitur, & ipse evocatus respondebit se tempore, quo actor proposuit illa non occupasse, sed etiam per prius se in dominio eiuscemodi iurium possessionariorum pacifice perstitisse vel dudum se super ea re absolutum & expeditum esse hocque efficacissimarum litterarum exhibitione se probaturum, ADVENIENTE vero termino per iudicem productioni & exhibitioni ipsarum litterarum prefixo, & in causam attracto aliquo forte impedimento occurrente in eodem termino comparere exhiberique commissas litteras producere non valente contra ipsum per suam non venientiam & non comparitionem, ex eo quod in huiusmodi litterarum exhibitione defecit & succubuit, sententia capitalis aut emendæ capitis per iudicem pronunciatæ & forsitan debitæ etiam exequutioni demandata & tempore exequutionis eius repulsio violenta sequuta vel per litteras novi iudicii cum inhibitione (iuxta vetustam regni huius consuetudinem & contenta quoque generalis decreti nostri) confectas ab exequutione sua prohibita fuerit, & tandem in termino revisionis & discussionis reportatæ seriei eiuscemodi exequutionis aut inhibitionis actor ipse repulsionis vel solummodo litterarum sententionalium & iudiciorum Birsagialium onus atque gravamen ad portionem suam cedens ab in causam attracto & convicto tulerit & ad se levaverit, posteaque convictus ipse litteras per iudicem exhiberi commissas, sed prius produci neglectas coram iudice produxerit, quarum vigore actor ille contra ipsum in causam attractum aut in facto calumniæ, vel emendæ linguæ convinci aut alio onere condemnari se sentiens antequam sententia calumniæ vel emendæ linguæ per iudicem ediceretur, actor causam suam cum onere consueto sex marcarum deponere & condescendi facere voluerit tunc in huiusmodi casu etiam ante latam & pronunciatam diffinitivam sententiam depositio causæ locum non habet. [§5] Quia solus actor eam sententiam per non venientiam in causam attracti pronunciatam vim sententiæ diffinitive habendam censuit, ubi repulsionis vel litterarum sententionalium & iudiciorum onus ad se levavit, & per hoc iniuste partem adversam damnificavit. Fraus enim & dolus patrocinari debet nemini, & de reliquis quoque similibus casibus idem est intelligendum. [§6] Nostra tamen hac tempestate non solum prædeclaratis, sed etiam aliis pluribus modis causæ per varias & multiplices (frivolas tamen) procuratorum exceptiones allegationesque & obiectiones condescendi ac subverti consueverunt. [§7] Quas ubi iudices iuri & iustitiæ contrarias fore agnoverint, admittere illisque consentire non debent ne facientes & consentientes pari reatu detineantur. [§8] Hic est enim gladius biceps, qui pupillorum & viduarum aliarumque miserabilium personarum corda transfixit. Hic dolor, qui animas oppressorum ad intima penetravit. Hic deinde laqueus, qui plurimos in baratrum æternæ damnationis præcipitavit. Multiplex videlicet causarum iniusta condescensio, quæ tanquam peccati fomes semper est evitanda. [§9] Memoror enim ob defectum unius litteræ Alphabeticæ & sæpe obmissionem unicæ dictionis totam causam per advocatum exquisita obiectione & allegatione (consentiente iudice) subversam condescensamque fuisse.

² Either causa ipsa is superfluent or the predicate of the sentence is missing. We followed in the translation the suggestion of the Millenarian edition of the Tripartitum (p. 364. note 7).

De illis, qui in alterius causam sese ingerunt quid sit agendum. Tit. lxxxiii.

QUIA plurimi solent sese in causas ac lites duarum partium in ultimo præsertim causarum articulo dum productis iam & exhibitis coram iudice per utramque partem litteris & privilegiis merita causarum tangentibus finalis conclusio sequi & sententia diffinitiva ferri atque pronunciari deberet a tertia sæpe etiam quarta parte ingerere & immittere. [§1] Igitur sciendum est quod quando causa super hæreditate & perpetuitate iurium possessionariorum ventillatur, ante latam diffinitivam sententiam, quicumque voluerit & se iura illa possessionaria aut perennali iure, aut pignoris vel alio quovis titulo concernere agnoverit cum refusione (expensarum per actorem in processu huiusmodi causæ factarum ad portionem in causam ingerentis cedentium) liberam se in litem immiscendi & immittendi habet auctoritatem. [§2] VERUM tamen in causam attractus contra talem ingerentem mox & defacto litteras vel litteralia instrumenta seorsum ab actore producere non tenetur; [§3] maxime si quispiam nomine & titulo iuris regii noviter impetrati iura illa possessionaria pro se vindicare prætenderit. Nam ad tale ius regium prosequendum in causam immiscenti processus in huiusmodi lite solitus per iudicem dari & assignari debet. [§4] Nihilominus in causam ille se immittens genealogiæ suæ lineam (si in causam attractus negabit) immediate comprobare tenetur. [§5] Quia & si eodem dumtaxat in termino in causam se ingessit, tamen per hoc actorem se de facto effecit, actor autem paratus semper esse debet. [§6] Nam aliter ab ingressu & prosecutione huiusmodi causæ decidisse reputatur, & alio processu illam postea prosequi tenebitur. [§7] Si tamen genealogiam suam comprobabit vel forsitan neque in causam attractus illam negabit, nihilominus etiam contra eum expeditorias vel alias litteras se habere allegabit, inter actorem quidem & in causam attractum ex continentis & tenoribus exhibitarum litterarum iudicium fieri & administrari poterit. [§8] ATTamen productioni litterarum adversus in causam ingerentem exhibendarum unicus terminus per iudicem dari præfigique debet. [§9] ADVERTendum est autem quod in eam causam, quæ ratione impignoracionis vel occupationis iurium possessionariorum agitur & prosequitur nemo hæreditatem talium iurium possessionariorum pro se vindicare prætendens in causam se immittendi habet facultatem. [§10] Iuri enim & iustitiæ disconveniens videretur ut ille, qui iura sua possessionaria necessitate rationabili cogente alteri titulo pignoris ad tempus obligavit inter litigandum de dominio eorum per alium, cum quo prius nullum in hac parte commercium habuit, perpetuo excluderetur, vel possessio de manu cuiuspiam violenter occupata & in causa prætextu occupationis eiusdem suscitata non ad illius, unde occupata fuerat sed alterius manus assignaretur possidenda.

Utrum actore liti cedente possit in causam se ingerens in ea procedere. lxxxv.

SEd quia plerumque fieri consuevit ut levata iam per iudicem ad discutiendam causa duas inter partes exorta, productis etiam sæpenumero per utramque partem privilegiis et litteralibus instrumentis priusquam finalis & diffinitiva sententia inter partes pronunciaretur, cum iam a tertia quoque aut quarta parte aliquis se in eam causam immisisset, partes principales actor scilicet & in causam attractus aut proprio eorum motu aut aliorum fratrum & amicorum suorum de consilio per bona media in concordiam & unionem deveniunt causæ illi & ulteriori prosecutioni eiusdem omnino finem imponentes. [§1] UNDE queritur: Utrum in causam ille se ingerens & immiscens possit contra in causam attractum ulterius in eadem causa (non obstante præmissa concordia & unione cum actore iam facta & stabilita) procedere teneaturque in causam attractus ad instantiam illius respondere litterasque producere vel ex tenoribus litterarum adversus actorem iam forte per attractum exhibitarum valeat iudicium & iusticiam sententiamque diffinitivam habere? [§2] DICENDUM quod si concordia & unio prænarrata inter duas partes principales actorem videlicet & attractum ante sententiam diffinitivam per iudicem ferendam (si etiam ex utraque parte litteræ iam productæ extitissent) facta celebrataque fuerit, amplius in causam se ingerens & immiscens in ea procedere non potest, neque tenetur attractus ipse contra illum de cætero in eadem causa respondere. [§3] Quoniam ruente fundamento (principali scilicet actore) ut cætera quæque superedificata ruant necesse est. [§4] Verum tamen si concordia ipsa & unio post latam & pronunciatam inter omnes partes actorem videlicet & attractum, atque ingentem sententiam lata factaque fuerit dum iam de iuribus possessionariis litigiosis etiam ingenti portio congruens aut Dotalitium sive Quartalitium vel ius forsitan impignoratitium extitisset adiudicatum, aut litteralium saltem instrumentorum exhibitio fuisset attracto contra ingentem adiudicata, tunc etiam principali actore liti cedente & ulteriori prosecutioni huiusmodi causæ renunciantem ingerens & in causam se immiscens nihilominus iuxta iudiciariam commissionem & deliberationem iudicis in eadem causa procedendi habet facultatem.

Qualiter Birsagia in processu causarum accumulari solita exigi debeant. lxxxvi.

QUoniam finitis causis longo liti processu terminari solitis universa iudiciorum onera vel iuridica gravamina in processibus earundem causarum aggregata & accumulari consueta (quæ communi vocabulo Birsagia nuncupantur) exigi solent. [§1] SCIENDUM igitur quod si in causam attractus iuridica ipsa gravamina in processu cuiuslibet causæ contra se aggregata mox finita causa coram suo iudice paratis in pecuniis deponere & persolvere voluerit tunc quamlibet marcam uno floreno deponere & refundere poterit. [§2] Et huiusmodi onerum & Birsagiorum duæ partes semper iudici cedunt & tertia pars actori manebit. [§3] Ubi vero coram iudice suo illa deponere noluerit, aut non poterit; attamen iudicem super eo postulaverit pariter & amonerit ut hominem suum mittat coram quo de bonis & iuribus suis possessionariis per eorundem occupationem non expectata super ea re executione solito more fienda satisfactionem super eiusmodi iudiciorum oneribus impendere curabit, tunc singula quæque marca singulis duobus florenis deponi & persolvi valebit. [§4] Si tamen nulla amonitio facta, nulla etiam satisfactio per ipsorum bonorum occupationem impensa, sed simpliciter ad executionem causa ipsa simul cum oneribus suis submissa fuerit, tunc non aliter nisi quamlibet marcam ad singulos quatuor florenos taxando reus ipse compensare deponereque tenetur. [§5] Super quibus primo de rebus mobilibus convicti si reperiri poterunt, aliter autem de iuribus eiusdem possessionariis satisfactio impendenda erit. [§6] Qualiter vero & quo ordine eiusmodi Birsagia seu iudiciorum onera in processibus causarum contra quospiam accumulari soleant non existimo necessarium sermone prolixo describere, eo quod longus ille causarum processus, in quo iuxta antiquorum & prædecessorum nostrorum consuetudinem Birsagia ac iudicia ipsa sæpe duplari, sæpe etiam cum duplo duplato de uno iuridico termino in alium prorogari consueverant per generale decretum nostrum abolitus & extinctus est. [§7] Secundum namque modernorum legem & consuetudinem universę causę longo litis processu olim terminari solitę in quatuor tantummodo terminis Octavalibus decidi & finiri debent in quibus iudicia ipsa simplio dumtaxat modo cumulantur, & non nisi in tertia Evocatione, quę ex simplici amonitione vel Evocatione processura est duplantur. [§8] In primo namque octavali termino dum in causam attractus non comparuerit in iudicio trium marcarum vincetur & aggravatur, & per actorem tam ad earundem marcarum restitutionem, quam etiam ipsius causę prosecutionem iterum evocabitur. Et hæc Evocatio secunda appellatur. [§9] Unde si in secundo termino iuridico in causam attractus non comparebit, tunc pro ista secunda non comparitione rursus in trium marcarum iudicio, & pro non solutione priorum trium marcarum in duplo earundem condemnabitur. [§10] In simplici autem possessionaria statutione vel metali Reambulatione semper simpliciter Birsagia ipsa aggregantur. [§11] In brevi quoque causarum processu in causam attractus similiter in tribus marcis per se, & si Iobagionum vel familiarium suorum ignobilium Statutio interserta fuerit, tunc pro non statutione singulorum in singulis marcis, hoc est pro quolibet eorum in una marca, actor vero si non comparuerit in regali iudicio sex marcas faciente gravari consuevit, [§12] & in huiusmodi iudiciorum ac Birsagiorum solutione quælibet marca uno floreno vel centum denariis in sede iudiciaria coram iudice causę (modo prædeclarato) deponi atque persolvi poterit. [§13] Si tamen ad executionem submissa fuerit tunc unaquæque marca quatuor florenis vel quadringentis denariis compensanda erit. [§14] Verum tamen si reus & in causam attractus voluerit, & rebus mobilibus abundaverit, iuxta modum in serie estimationis rerum mobilium prope finem primæ partis descriptum iuridica ipsa gravamina iudici adversæque parti persolvendi habet potestatem.

Finis secunde partis

De tertia parte iurium et consuetudinum regni in generali.

Titulus primus.

ABSolutis auxiliante deo superius iudiciariis processibus & sententiarum speciebus atque diversitatibus curiæ regiæ, in hac iam tertia & ultima parte huius opusculi superest tractare de litium & causarum in ipsam curiam regiam per viam appellationis deducendarum atque transmittendarum seriebus. [§1] Et consequenter regnorum Dalmatiæ, Croaciæ & Sclavonię atque Transsylvaniae sacræ videlicet coronæ regni huius Hungariæ dudum subiectorum & incorporatorum consuetudinibus, a nostra lege parumper distantibus atque discrepantibus, de quibus plurimæ causę post finalem earum decisionem in dictam curiam regiam maturioris revisionis & evidentioris discussionis gratia transmitti consueverunt. [§2] Liberarum quoque civitatum legibus [§3] & de modo impensionis iudicii ex parte colonorum & rusticorum nostrorum fieri consueti, prout in titulis subsequentibus patebit.

Utrum quilibet populus vel comitatus possit per se condere statuta. Tit. ii.

QUIa leges et dudum approbatæ consuetudines prædictorum regnorum Dalmatiæ, Croaciæ, Sclavoniæ & Transsylvaniae certis in terminis & articulis a nostræ patriæ regni scilicet huius Hungariæ legibus & consuetudinibus discrepare, Nonnulli etiam comitatus distinctim ac seperatim ab aliis comitatibus immo etiam ab ipsa curia regia certas consuetudines, utcunque inductas loco legum observare videntur; [§1] Ideo quæritur: Utrum quilibet populus vel comitatus aut quęlibet civitas possit per se & seorsum facere statuta? DICENDum quod nullus populus & nulla universitas potest condere statuta, quæ non habet iurisdictionem propriam, sed alterius subest dominio, nisi cum consensu sui superioris. Et hoc quoque in casibus, qui iuri divino & humano præiudicari non dinoscuntur. Ita quod statuta ipsa iniquum aliquid salutique contrarium non contineant, neque iuribus aliorum palam derogare præiudiciumque inferre videantur. [§2] Unde licet Dalmatini, Croatienses, Slavonienses & Transsilvanenses in Homagiorum & Birsagiorum solutionibus: aliisque certis causarum processibus & terminorum observationibus (sicuti infra clarius dicitur) alia & alia consuetudine a nostra longe discrepante utantur utendique & fruendi habeant auctoritatem, & inter se modo quoque illis simile aliquid de consensu principis statuere & ordinare possint. Contra tamen generalia statuta & decreta regni huius Hungariæ & contra iudicia iudiciariasque deliberationes super facto bonorum & iurium possessionariorum in curia regia per iudices ordinarios administrari solita celebrarique & pronouncari consuetas nil quicquam constituere possunt nullamque statuendi habent facultatem. [§3] Et in huius documentum atque signum universæ causæ super facto iurium possessionariorum in medio eorum motæ finitis inibi causis in curiam regiam, tanquam scilicet locum interrogatorium gratia sanioris & maturioris revisionis: examinationisque & discussionis transmitti consueverunt. [§4] Ubi quicquid deliberatum & conclusum fuerit ratum semper erit atque firmum Banali vel Waywodali deliberatione non obstante. [§5] SIC etiam in diversis comitatibus diversas constitutiones super agrorum, pratorum, silvarum & fluviorum custodia vel molendinorum statu atque proventibus & aliis eiusmodi rebus immo & terminorum ac processuum observationibus, ut scilicet hic breviori & ibi longiori processu causa in sede iudiciaria comitatus coram comite parochiali mota terminetur sana inter sese deliberatione præhabita facere quidem & stabilire possunt. Generali tamen decreto totius regni atque vetustæ & approbatæ consuetudini curiæ regię in iudiciis observari (ut præmittitur) solitę præiudicare ac derogare nusquam possunt. [§6] Et huiusmodi eorum statuta solummodo inter eos & in eorum medio valent atque tenent. Ad externos tamen:

& aliorum comitatum nobiles, qui bona & iura possessionaria in ipsorum medio non habent se non extendunt. [§7] Et hoc modo civitates quoque libere nec non mercatores ac institores, sartores, pellifices, sutores, cerdones & alii opifices in ipsorum collegio & inter sese statuta condere possunt consensu principis accedente. Dummodo huiusmodi statuta iusta & honesta fiant aliisque & aliorum libertatibus ac iuribus damnum et præiudicium non inferant. Quæ sicuti præfertur in eorum dumtaxat medio valent atque durant. [§8] DEBENT autem eiusmodi constitutiones & statuta cum maiori & saniori parte populi fieri atque stabiliri. Quia aliter non dicerentur populi vel communitatis statuta. Verum si populus in duas divideretur partes tunc constitutio sanioris & potioris partis valet. Sanior autem & potior pars illa dicitur, in qua dignitate & scientia fuerint præstantiores atque notabiliores.

De consuetudinario iure regnorum Sclavonie et Transilvanie peculiari. iii.

Sciendum itaque est quod nobiles regnorum Sclavonię & Transsilvanię pluribus in articulis peculiari consuetudine gaudent & utuntur, maxime vero Homagiorum solutione. [§1] Quoniam Sclavonienses centum, Transsilvanenses autem sexaginta & sex florenis eorum Homagia compensare solent. [§2] Et proinde responsiones quoque procuratorum in ipsorum medio terminis in octavalibus simili cum onere revocantur. [§3] Dotalitia etiam uxorum quorumcunque decedentium (demptis officio baronatus fungentium vel functorum) in ipso Sclavonię regno pari modo centum, Transsilvanię vero sexaginta & sex florenis persolvuntur. [§4] Hoc tamen intellige si bona ac iura possessionaria maritorum defunctorum ad tot marcas se extendunt. Nam aliter si minoris estimationis bona ipsa fuerint, etiam ibi (prout in Hungaria) relictis eorum pro dote minus datur. [§5] Uxoribus autem baronum eo quo in Hungaria modo fieri debet solutio Dotalitiorum. [§6] Causę vero in utroque regno ratione iurium possessionariorum vel aliorum specialium arduorumque negotiorum in octavalibus terminis motę post diffinitivam sententiam ad appellationem cuiuslibet partis semel in curiam regiam domini videlicet iudicis curię regię in præsentiam maturioris examinis & discussionis gratia transmittuntur & pro finali conclusione atque exequutione earundem rursus ad priorem iudicem Banum scilicet aut Waywodam remittuntur. [§7] CAETERUM nobiles Transsilvanenses pro minoribus potentiariis actibus in quinquaginta marcis totidem florenos auri facientibus convincuntur. Vice comites autem & iudices nobilium in duplo condemnantur. [§8] Homagium vero vivum triginta & tribus florenis apud eos compensatur. [§9] Item Dotalitiorum solutio quo ad duas partes paratis & numeratis pecuniis, ad tertiam siquidem partem rebus mobilibus atque venalibus absolvi consuevit. [§10] Item violatio generalis dietę & conventionis nobilium Transsilvaniensium de regio mandato vel domini Waywode Transsilvani edicto celebrandę centum, sedis vero iudiciarię quinquaginta marcis totidem florenos valentibus taxatur. [§11] Item in facto recuperationis damnorum ac debitorum principalis nobilis actor scilicet vel in causam attractus ad tres florenos iurare permittitur. Cæteri tamen nobiles eius coniuratores non plures quam singuli singulum florenum suo iuramento recuperandi habent facultatem. [§12] Et licet in processibus causarum prænarratarum quęlibet marca Transsilvanorum more centum denarios valeat, Birsagia tamen ac iuridica gravamina in processibus causarum octavalium accumulata instar nobilium regni Hungarię quadringentis denariis (iuxta modum in fine primę partis descriptum) absolvi semper solet. [§13] Item causę in sedibus iudiciariis comitatum coram vicecomitibus parochialibus ac iudicibus nobilium ratione rerum infra tres florenos valentium motę in præsentiam Waywodalem ad terminos octavales non transmittuntur. [§14] ITEM Homagium rusticorum Transsilvanorum integrum viginti quinque, medium vero (quod vivum Homagium vocitatur) duodecem florenis & quinquaginta denariis, Mutillatio autem membrorum et manuum, aurium eruitioque oculorum & vulnus faciei viginti, Excussio siquidem dentium sex florenis estimatur. [§15] ITEM si rusticus de loco delicti aufugere poterit p̄na violentiæ & actus potentiarii per eum commissi atque patrati non læso sed terrestri domino coloni cedit. L̄esus autem damni dumtaxat vel suscepti vulneris compensam rehabebit. [§16] ITEM rustici propter pecudum & pecorum de damnis illatis abactorum violentam exmissionem & ablationem vel aliam quamlibet indebitam rerum arestationem in estimatione huiusmodi pecudum & pecorum ac rerum arestatarum convincuntur. [§17] Et in hac parte de nobilibus quoque idem iudicium observatur. [§18] ITEM in facto recuperationis damnorum ac debitorum rusticus principalis actor videlicet aut attractus unum florenum iuramento suo accipere permittitur. Cæteri vero sequentes rustici eius utputa coniuratores tres personæ florenum unum & non plures eorum iuramento recuperare possunt.

De Scitulis Transsilvanis, quos siculos vocitamus. Tit. iiiii.

SUnt præterea Transsilvanis in partibus Scituli nobiles privilegiati ab Scythico populo in primo eorum ingressu in Pannoniam propagati, quos nos corrupto quodam vocabulo Siculos appellamus, dissimili penitus lege & consuetudine gaudentes rerum bellicarum expertissimi, qui per tribus & generationes atque lineas generationum (antiquorum more) hæreditates ac officia inter sese partiuntur & dividunt. [§1] Horum Homagia viginti & quinque florenis compensantur. [§2] Emenda vero linguę ad duodecim florenos & quinquaginta denarios in eorum medio taxatur. [§3] Capitalis autem sententia contra Scitulum coram eorum comite lata ad vigintiquatuor marcas totidem florenos valentes se extendit hæreditatesque convictus & sententiatus ipse non amittit sed ad hæredes fratresque eius derivantur. Caput etiam demptis casibus notæ infidelitatis & causis criminalibus salvum præservabit. [§4] In sede vero ipsorum iudiciaria quęlibet marca quinquaginta denariis deponi & persolvi consuevit. [§5] Item in quavis causa statim post latam, & pronunciatam sententiam comes & vicecomes eorum portionem suam iudiciariam (si etiam convictus cum adversa parte concordaret) exigendi habet auctoritatem. [§6] Item causæ in facto hæreditatum ultra valorem trium florenorum inter eos suscitatae servatis appellationibus solitis in curiam regiam pro evidentiori discussione transmitti solent. [§7] Reliqua autem iura horum regnorum atque nobilium municipalia (quia in eorum dumtaxat medio valent & inter sese nota sunt) ampliori declaratione non egent.

Quid sit Homagium, et quot modis intelligatur. Tit. v.

SEd quia de Homagio ac marcis Homagialibus mentio sæpenumero præhabita est ideo sciendum breviter quod Homagium dupliciter accipitur. [§1] Uno modo secundum leges quasi hominis ligium seu ligamen. Et est fidelitas præstita superiori per inferiorem. Vel est fidelitas, quę debetur soli principi nullius alterius fidelitate salva. [§2] Alio modo sumitur Homagium secundum communem usum & tunc est mulcta vel estimatio homicidarum, quę talis est ut homicide redimant se ab his, quibus competit iuxta estimationem capitum suorum ultra alias p̄nas pro actibus potentiariis p̄nas homicidium forsitan patratis debitas & infligi solitas. [§3] Nonnulli tamen dicunt Homagium præcium esse hominis perempti licet absurdum sit ita dicere. Nam mortuus nullo præcio redimi & a mortuis suscitari potest. Sed homicida ne talionem subeat ut caput suum & non illius, quem peremit redimat necesse est. [§4] Et hoc si manus iudiciarias vel adversæ partis evaserit. Nam si in persona sua detineri poterit, & homicidium deliberate patratum fuerit, non Homagium suum deponere sed p̄nam capitalem subire debet. [§5] Homagium itaque secundo modo sumptum capitis emendam ac redemptionem nos communiter esse tenemus.

Qualiter cause de sedibus iudicialiis comitum parochialium in curiam regiam transmittantur, et de procuratorum in eisdem sedibus revocatione. vi.

QUIA vero causæ in sedibus iudicialiis comitum parochialium comitatum huius regni motæ facta primum per eosdem comites, vicecomites ac iudices nobilium iuxta responsiones partium deliberatione iuridica & sententia lata (ut plurimum) in curiam regiam ad approbandam vel reprobendam eiuscemodi ipsorum sententiam ac iudicialiam deliberationem de vetusta regni nostri lege & consuetudine transmitti, & ibidem præhabita per iudices regni ordinarios matura ipsarum causarum discussione aut probatæ aut improbatæ rursus in præsentiam prædictorum comitum parochialium & iudicum nobilium pro exequutione & perfecta conclusione huiusmodi sententiæ ac iudicialiæ commissionis eorum crebro remitti, & post ipsam remissionem partes convictæ & in causa succumbentes a principe novum iudicium impetrare, & sæpenumero etiam virtute ipsius novi iudicii procuratores suos revocare consueverunt. [§1] UNDE sciendum quod post causæ de curia regia remissionem & iudicium ipsorum ordinariorum approbationem vel reprobationem si partem per convictam & succumbentem novum iudicium impetratur aut procuratoris responsio revocatur quaecumque iudicium postea per comites, vicecomites & iudices nobilium celebretur & qualiscumque sententia feratur, de cetero tamen pro evidentiori eiusdem discussione causa ipsa in curiam regiam etiam vigore huiusmodi novi iudicii transmitti non debet. [§2] VERUM si altera pars succubuerit, ad cuius videlicet instantiam causa huiusmodi in dictam curiam regiam transmissa deductaque nondum fuisset illa pars causam eandem pro saniori sui revisione discussioneque in ipsam curiam regiam deducendi habet auctoritatem. [§3] IN sede autem iudicialia comitum parochialium comitatum regni huius procuratoria revocatio plerumque occurrit & contingit, ubi tribus dumtaxat florenis in duabus iudicibus hoc est comitibus vel vicecomitibus & iudicibus nobilium, in tertia vero partibus litiganti illi, adversus quem ipsa revocatio fieri debet persolvendis, etiam post latam ibidem sententiam responsio cuiuslibet procuratoris coram eisdem comitibus aut vicecomitibus & iudicibus nobilium vel altero eorum retractatur & revocatur. [§4] Verum post factam in ipsa curia regia eiusdem causæ ratificationem & approbationem ac in præsentiam eorundem comitum vel vicecomitum ac iudicum nobilium remissionem onus revocationis responsionis procuratoris (si quando fieri contigerit) propter huiusmodi approbationem per superiorem iudicem factam duplicatur, & per sex florenorum solutionem compensatur.

Quales cause de curia regia rursus in presentiam comitum parochialium remitti debeant. vii.

UTrum autem causa in sedibus comitatum suborta & in curiam regiam transmissa facta ibidem & habita approbatione & ratificatione sententiæ ac iudicialiæ deliberationis comitum vel vicecomitum parochialium & iudicum nobilium comitatum, de ipsa eadem curia regia per iudices ordinarios ad exequutionem submittatur, vel in præsentiam rursus eorundem comitum &c. remittenda censeatur variorum varia est opinio. [§1] Verum tamen sciendum pariter & tenendum est quod illæ causæ, quarum in processu iuridica gravamina seu onera iudicialia solvi deponique debent, sicuti sunt omnes minores actus potentiarii & sententiæ inde ferendæ, violationes sedis iudicialiæ, emendæ linguæ & huiusmodi ex quibus utputa etiam iudices portiones habere solent, rursus & iterum in præsentiam illorum iudicum, de quorum conspectu fuerunt per appellationem in curiam regiam transmissæ atque deductæ remitti debent. [§2] Nam alioquin grande præiudicium eiusdem prioribus iudicibus inferri dinosceretur, ubi per huiusmodi appellationem portio eorum & pars iudiciaria in alterius potestatem ac iurisdictionem converteretur. [§3] ALIE tamen causæ, quæ onerum vel Birsagiorum solutionem non important, sed magis executionem debitam expostulant prout dotum & rerum Paraffernalium ac iurium impignoratorum causæ & aliæ similes de ipsa curia regia ad executionem commode transmitti effectuique mancipari possunt. [§4] Secus est de causis in curia regia coram iudicibus eiusdem ordinariis motis. Nam ibi causæ cum omni plenitudine iuridicorum gravaminum qualitercunque subsequutorum & subsequendorum, de præsentia unius iudicis in alterius præsentiam transmittuntur. [§5] CAUSÆ vero in facto dotum ac rerum Paraffernalium necnon iurium impignoratorum motæ vel movendæ, quæ ultra valorem seu estimationem centum florenorum sese extendere dinoscuntur, in sedibus iudicariis comitatum vel comitum parochialium tractari & adiudicari non possunt.

De liberis civitatibus et earum conditionibus in generali. Tit. viii.

QUIA de liberis quoque civitatibus paucis tractandum occurrit iccirco sciendum quod civitas dicitur quasi civium unitas, eo quod ibi populorum pluralitas sit convocata. [§1] Est autem civitas domorum & vicorum pluralitas maeniis & præsidii circumcincta necessariis ad bene honesteque vivendum privilegiata. [§2] Sed quoniam hæc civium pluralitas unam communitatem causat atque representat. Et huiusmodi collectiva communitas sicut locorum situ, ita etiam privilegiorum & consuetudinum diversitate inter se differt & variatur. Civitatum itaque liberarum aliæ subsunt iurisdictioni personalis præsentia regis maiestatis ut Alba regalis, Strigonium & Lewchovia, aliæ vero ex antiqua regni consuetudine iurisdictioni magistri Thavernicorum regalium sicut Buda, Pesth, Cassovia, Posonium, Thyrnavia, Sopronium, Barthwa & Eperyes.

Quod cives liberarum civitatum in eorum Homagiis nobilibus equiparantur. ix.

QUARUM quidem civitatum cives & inhabitatores in eorum Homagiis nobilibus regni huius equiparantur, in aliis tamen libertatibus nobilibus inæquales habentur & eorum privilegiis non utuntur. [§1] Nam & testimonia ipsorum civium extra eorum civitates & territoria poenes nobiles non acceptantur, neque pro damnorum aut debitorum recuperatione extra civitatem singillatim ultra unum florenum iurare permittuntur.

Qualiter cause civium liberarum civitatum in presentiam magistri Thavernicorum regalium transmittuntur. x.

HARUM autem civitatum quædam magistros civium, quædam vero iudices & iuratos cives atque consules habent, quorum iudicio universæ causæ inter incolas & inhabitatores earundem civitatum, sed & aliorum exterorum hominum lites contra quospiam forsitan illorum motæ decernuntur, dirimuntur & terminantur; [§1] deinde vero ad partis super eorum iudicio non contentæ provocationem in sedem iudicariam magistri Thavernicorum regalium appellationis via transmittuntur. [§2] Demum autem parte aliqua non contenta ad examen personalis præsentia regis maiestatis deducuntur, ubi solummodo sententiæ civitatum & magistri Thavernicorum regalium revidebuntur & ruminabuntur. Utrum videlicet iuste vel iniuste, debite vel indebite sententiæ fuerint pronunciatae? iustas approbando, indebite vero latas emendando vel per totum invalidando cunctis partium exceptionibus ex novo protunc proponendis per omnia postergatis. [§3] Nisi forte talia dicerentur & proponerentur, quæ merito & de necessitate ad causarum vel sententiarum informationem ac clariorem declarationem & intelligentiam cederent. Nam in tali casu quælibet partium audienda erit.

Quomodo novum iudicium in causis civium liberarum civitatum impetrandum sit. xi.

Item si contingat causam ab examine & iudicio personalis præsentie regie maiestatis ratione ne forte incidentium vel dependentium particularum pro eius maturiori revisione ad priorem iudicem remitti, tunc si qua partium super nova huiusmodi revisione vel discussione non contentabitur ulterius ipsa causa in præsentiam magistri Thavernicorum regalium non erit transmittenda, sed directe in conspectum solius personalis præsentie regie maiestatis qui videlicet illam remiserat fiet deducenda. [§1] VERUM si post obtentam etiam secundam vel tertiam sententiam altera partium noluerit contentari poterit causam suam vel pendente adhuc lite post secundam sententiam coram personali præsentia maiestatis regie latam, aut etiam post tertiam coram ea pronunciatam per formam & gratiam novi iudicii resuscitare, sed coram eo iudice, quo causa huiusmodi primitus mota fuisse dinoscitur. [§2] Et si contra partem prius convictam & appellantem novumque iudicium impetrantem sententiatum fuerit mox & de facto huiusmodi parti sententiatæ vigore dicti novi iudicii silentium perpetuum imponendum erit, nec amplius causa illa in superiorem sedem transmitti debet. [§3] Si tamen altera pars prius videlicet vincens & triumphans succubuerit tunc illa quoque ad instar alterius partis novum iudicium pro se impetrandi & in eadem pari modo procedendi potestatem habebit. [§4] ATTAMen si contra ipsam partem sententia lata fuerit sive per modum approbationis & ratificationis sive emendationis vel invalidationis ulterior processus non dabitur sed perpetuo silentio causa ipsa ex parte quoque illius partis terminabitur, & de cætero neutra partium aut novum iudicium impetrare aut ulterius causam ipsam appellare poterit. [§5] Quoniam unaqueque partium semel novum iudicium impetravit, & in eadem causa secundo impetrare nequibit. [§6] APPELLationes vero in quibuslibet causis post earum decisionem iuxta contenta privilegiorum suorum ad sedem magistri Thavernicorum regalium & in conspectum personalis præsentie maiestatis regie fieri semper possunt. Nam aliter denegata appellandi facultate pauperes adversus potentes favore vel dono destructi iustis in eorum iuribus sæpenumero periclitarentur. [§7] Secus est de causis criminalibus, quæ ad pœnam capitum & mortis damnationem tendunt. Nam in illis locum appellatio non habet, nisi forte innocentem omnino temerario iudicio morti tradere conarentur. In quo casu possunt illico innocentis ipsius fratres aut affines ad regiam maiestatem solam confugere pariter & causam ipsam provocare. [§8] Item si in processu causarum eiusmodi civilium ante aut post remissionem earundem verba ac responsiones procuratoris necessarium fuerit revocare tunc mos & consuetudo sedis iudiciariæ illius iudicis coram quo responsio facta fuit & etiam revocari debet observanda censetur.

De testimonio extraneo inter cives non acceptando. Tit. xii.

Item in causis pro rebus hæreditariis & immobilibus coram iudicibus & iuratis civibus pretactarum civitatum motis & vertentibus nullus in testimonium coram ipsis acceptatur extraneus. [§1] Verum pro debitis & aliis quibuscunque factis ac negociis extra territorium eorum gestis & habitis quilibet hominum (dummodo bonæ famæ & honeste conditionis existat) ad testificandum coram eis admitti solet.

De Fassionibus coram iudice et iuratis civibus fiendis. Tit. xiii.

Item Fassio coram iudice aut duobus iuratis civibus ratione & pretextu quarumcunque rerum sive mobilium, sive immobilium in eorum medio vel territorio existentium & adiacentium facta semper rata permanet; [§1] nec valet alia Fassio inter ipsos cives super huiusmodi rebus coram aliis iudicibus regni vel in locis testimonialibus iure perennali facta.

Quomodo dominium hereditatum inter cives ingrediendum. Tit. xiv.

Item si coram prædictis iudice ac iuratis civibus Fassio ratione rerum immobilium seu hæreditatum puta domorum, allodiorum, hortorum, piscinarum aut vinearum facta fuerit, tunc requiritur ut per emptorem eiusmodi rerum (ubi dominium illorum intrare pro seque vindicare voluerit) fiat apprehensio sive ingressio earundem coram duobus iuratis civibus ad id deputatis. [§1] Et si contradictor quispiam apparuerit, ac velamine contradictionis obviaverit infra quindecim dies rationem contradictionis suæ in præsentia ipsorum iudicis & iuratorum civium ipse contradictor assignare tenetur. [§2] SI VERO contradictor non apparebit tunc ille, cui venditio & Fassio facta fuit dominium ipsarum rerum & hæreditatum ingredi secure poterit. [§3] Et si quispiam hominum aliquid iuris ad illas habere se postea speraverit, tandem infra anni revolutionem integram & diem unam si voluerit palam vel occulte contradicere valebit. Nam aliter iuris sui virtus extincta manebit. [§4] Palam igitur contradixisse videbitur si possessorem rerum & hæreditatum ipsarum in causam propterea convenerit, & infra dictam revolutionem annualem processus & exordium causæ sui iudicis in conspectu inchoabitur. [§5] Occulte autem sic contradicat quod coram iudice vel iuratis civibus prohibitiones legitimas & consuetas infra diem & annum super hæreditatibus ipsis faciat, et ad civitatis librum annotari committat, ne præscriptio per negligentiam inhibitionis interveniat.

De legitima prescriptione inter cives observari solita. Tit. xv.

Civitatenses enim licet super rebus alienatis duodecim annorum curriculis præscribi & præscribere debeant, modo tamen quodam abusivo & villanorum more solummodo per integri spacium anni & diem unum modernis temporibus præscribere consueverunt. [§1] UBI autem actor sive contradictor ille suum adversarium hæreditatum scilicet vel rerum ipsarum possessorem facta præmissa prohibitionem per anni spacium in litem attrahere neglexerit tunc a die ipsius prohibitionis inclusive computando rursum quolibet anno infra alterius anni curriculum & diem prædictam inhibitiones (modo antelato) faciat, ut dum opus erit & poterit litem super ea re suscitare valeat. [§2] SI VERO iudex odio forsitan vel rancore preconcepto, aut alia quavis ex causa factam coram eo vel iuratis civibus huiusmodi prohibitionem in Prothocolum seu librum civitatis annotare aut litteras prohibitorias dare recusaret, tunc poterit contra eum coram iudicibus regni ordinariis vel in locis testimonialibus libere protestari, dummodo ipsa protestatio (ubi necesse fuerit) valeat evidenter comprobari.

Quomodo hereditas cum pertinentiis inter cives apprehendi debeat. xvi.

Item si quispiam rem immobilem & hæreditatem cum suis pertinentiis in medio civium ipsarum civitatum emerit, tunc sufficit rem illam corporalem solam apprehendere & pro se statuere. Nam ea apprehensa etiam illius pertinentiæ apprehensæ intelliguntur. [§1] Appellatione vero pertinentiarum comprehenduntur omnia, quæ ad rem & hæreditatem huiusmodi corporalem de iure vel consuetudine civitatis spectare dinoscuntur. [§2] Nisi forte per venditionem & emptionem ipsam aliquid de pertinentiis specificè fuerit exemptum pariter & retentum.

De debitis civium ubi omnis probatio defecerit. Tit. xvii.

Item si quispiam civium occasione debitorum per aliquem tractus in litem fuerit, & nulla probatio contra eum per actorem produci poterit, tunc civis ille iuramento solius personæ suæ se expurgabit vetusta consuetudine civitatum liberarum requirente.

De civibus in terris aliorum hereditates habentibus. Tit. xviii.

Item cives tam prædictarum, quam etiam aliarum quarumlibet civitatum in terris & territoriis aliorum hæreditates habentes ratione proventuum dominis terrestribus de eiuscemodi hæreditatibus provenientes (invitis & non consentientibus eisdem) libertari & a solutione proventuum eximi non possunt; [§1] quin potius occasione ipsarum hæreditatum ibidem coram domino terrestri cuilibet querulanti atque causanti iuri parere tenentur. [§2] Et si quid in facie hæreditatum vel territorio ubi hæreditates adjacent excesserint, etiam ratione talis excessus ibidem iuri pariter stare compelluntur

Quomodo civitates ratione iurium possessionariorum iuri stare tenentur. xix.

Item quod omnes libere & aliæ quælibet civitates iura possessionaria quocunque titulo gubernantes ratione huiusmodi iurium possessionariorum iudicio & iudicatu iudicum ordinariorum regni nobilium ad instar semper obtemperare tenentur. [§1] ET SI de huiusmodi iuribus eorum possessionariis damna, nocumenta & aliorum malorum genera violenter nobilibus vel eorum subditis inferuntur, tunc ratione talium malorum & actuum potentiariorum iudex & iurati cives una cum communitate poterunt semper partem per læsam & damnificatam in curiam regiam evocari. Vel si pars ipsa ita voluerit in sedem iudiciariam illius comitatus, ubi bona illa situata sunt & adjacent citari & in litem conveniri. [§2] QUALITER autem in huiusmodi causis procedendum, qualisve sententia proferenda sit in generali decreto nostro clare continetur, cuius rei notitia ut hoc quoque in loco pateat articulum super eadem re æditum verbotenus adieci qui sic incipit. [§3] ITEM quod libere civitates videlicet Buda, Pesth, Cassovia, Poson, Sopron, Barthwa, Eperyes, Thyrnavia nec non Lewchovia, Monsgræciæ & omnes aliæ liberæ civitates earundemque incolæ nobilibus & possessionatis hominibus iniurias aliquas seu damna inferentes, si talis civitas seu incola & civis iniuriam & damna inferens habuerit possessiones & iura possessionaria in aliquo comitatu & ex illis bonis nobilem læserit seu damnificaverit si videlicet tales læsiones seu damnificationes factum minoris potentiæ tangere dinoscuntur teneatur propterea in illo comitatu ubi illa bona habet coram comite iuri stare. [§4] Si vero talis civitas seu civis nulla iura possessionaria in aliquo comitatu habuerit, & nobilis vel aliquis homo possessionatus contra privatam personam vel certos tantummodo & non cum tota communitate seu civitate causam seu lites habuerit ex tunc talis nobilis & possessionatus homo teneatur causam suam coram iudice illius civitatis agitare & prosequi. [§5] Si autem talis nobilis & possessionatus homo contra totam civitatem vel econtra civitas ipsa contra nobiles & alios possessionatos homines causam aliquam ratione actuum potentiariorum maiorum vel iuris possessionarii movere prętenderet, extunc talis causa coram personali pręsentia regię maiestatis habita superinde legitima evocatione moveatur & ordine iuris terminetur. [§6] Et si aliqua partium in huiusmodi causa contra sese in processu iuris coram ipsa personali pręsentia quovismodo succubuerit, si talis causa factum iuris possessionarii tangere dinoscitur extunc talis pars non in maiori onere, quam solummodo in ducentis florenis auri convincatur. [§7] Si autem huiusmodi causa factum invasionis domorum nobilium necnon detentionis, verberationis, vulnerationis ac interemptionis nobilium concernere agnita fuerit, extunc patratores huiusmodi actuum potentiariorum in sententia capitali ac amissione cunctorum bonorum suorum mobilium & immobilium condemnentur prout hactenus fuit observatum. [§8] Casu autem quo aliquis civis sub aliquo domino seu nobili in hoc regno vineas vel aliquas alias hæreditates habuerit, & quidpiam in territorio huismodi deliquerit aut aliquem damnificaverit in tali casu idem civis teneatur coram domino illo terrestri, sub quo hæreditates habet iuri stare.

Qualiter cives publicos malefactores punire possunt. Tit. xx.

Item fures, latrones, homicidas, incendiarios & alios eiusmodi publicos malefactores iuxta eorum demerita servatis de iure in hac parte servandis castigare punireque possunt mutilare vero neminem. Nobiles autem extra delicti locum nec captivare, nec ratione suspicionis ad torturam ponere permittuntur. [§1] SI igitur civitas aliqua tanquam communitas nobilem quempiam absque iusta causa morti tradiderit, tunc non omnes cives singillatim sed iudex dumtaxat & iurati cives capitali propterea sententia sunt feriendi, qui & cuncta bona ac hæreditates eorum ad proprias portiones ipsorum cedentes & provenientia amittunt, quarum duę partes regię maiestati veluti domino eorum terrestri & tertia pars adversario dari & assignari debet; [§2] reliquas vero omnes immunitates, leges, libertates & consuetudines civitates ipse in privilegiis eorum habent conscriptas, extra quarum continentias & extra territoria ipsarum in omnibus rebus & factis regni huius Hungarię legibus & consuetudinibus subiciuntur.

De homicidio per quempiam in defensione sui patrato. Tit. xxi.

QUoniam de homicidio in hac parte sermo incidit, plura autem videmus homicidia sine debite ultionis pœna pręteriri, quia multi allegant illa in eorum defensione patrasse de modo igitur defensionis & offensionis personarum breviter aliquid annotandum congruit. [§1] UBI sciendum quod hæc allegatio quia in sui defensione quis homicidium commisit atque perpetravit non simpliciter est admittenda sed debet probari quod fuit per alium armata manu hostiliter aggressus & per hoc in vitę suę periculo constitutus. Nam qui gladio evaginato alterum aggreditur statim pręsumitur quod aut necem illi inferre aut letalia vulnera infligere machinatur. [§2] CERTUM est autem quod non solum pro interemptione, sed etiam pro sola verberatione vel vulneratione nobilium capitalis sententia fertur atque decernitur. Sive igitur aggressor ille occidat sive vulneret neutrum tamen illorum pati & tollerare aggressus ipse tenetur. [§3] Et hinc est quod siquis rationabili & iusta sui in defensione suum adversarium, qui hostili more nudo cum ense ipsum aggressus erat occiderit & Homagium & sanguinis effusio talis occisi & interempti rite peribit, & nunquam recuperari valebit. [§4] SECUS tamen est in foro conscientiae. Quia si aggressus cum honore et salvatione personae suae aggressorem evadere poterit, tunc evadere & minus malum ne maius sequatur evitare tenetur. [§5] CIRCA praemissa autem advertendum est, quia ille qui occidit alium aut nondum fuit percussus ab aggressore, aut iam de facto fuit verberatus. Si primum quod scilicet nondum erat percussus fuit tamen in actu & puncto percuciendi tunc quicquid aggressus fecerit indubie sui pro defensione facere vel fecisse videtur. [§6] SI autem fuit iam percussus, & cessavit actus percussione per aliquam moram, tunc non est sibi licitum repercutere post moram, quia hoc modo non defensio, sed vindicta potius illa repercutio censetur atque iudicatur. Nisi forte percussus faceret ut evaderet alias percussiones, quas aggressor de novo facere & continuare praetendebat. Et sic differentia est inter defensam & vindictam, quia defensa sit in continenti, vindicta autem post moram infertur. [§7] SI AUTEM non apparet ex testimonio vel aliunde, quae percussio praecesserit aliam tunc culpa in illum redundabit, qui alterum ad contentionem & percussione provocavit.

Defensa quot modis et qualiter intelligatur. Tit. xxii.

SCIendum ulterius quod defensa dupliciter potest intelligi. PRIMO pro corporis & personae tutela. SECUNDO vero rerum immobilium seu haereditatum conservatione. [§1] Quantum igitur ad corporis & personae tutelam debet fieri & admitti defensa in continenti & ante consummatam iniuriam vel in eadem pugna & contentione flagrante adhuc primo crimine, antequam scilicet aggressor vel primus percussor de loco recedat. Nam si postea fieret non defensa (prout praenarratum est) sed vindicta diceretur. [§2] QUANTUM vero pro rerum immobilium & iurium possessionariorum conservatione spoliatus nobilis vel alter quilibet possessionatus homo pro iurium suorum defensione & occupatoris ac spoliatoris de illis eiectione (sicuti & in prima parte tactum est) anni unius integri revolutionem de vetusta consuetudine regni huius praefixam & deputatam habet, in qua ab occupatore & violento spoliatore utcunque poterit se defendendi, & ipsum occupatorem etiam cum notabili incommodo eiusdem de iuribus & haereditatibus suis eiciendi plenariam habet potestatem. [§3] Et in hac parte spoliatoris ac occupatoris defensio qualiscunque fiat ipsum non excusabit. [§4] ET inde est quod si pro rerum & bonorum conservatione cuilibet se defendere convenit multo magis & fortius pro corporis & personae tutela (ubi periculum imminet) se tueri licet. [§5] ATTamen secundum deum & conscientiae forum omnis defensa cum moderamine inculpatae tutelae fieri debet. Quae quidem inculpata tutela dicitur fieri quando quis aliter se sine periculo rerum & personae suae defensare nequit, nisi ille qui eum aggreditur aut occidatur, aut. vulneribus afficiatur.

Utrum propter comminationem factam liceat aliquem offendere. Tit. xxiii.

SEd quaeritur: Si quispiam comminatus est alteri mortem inferre, utrum alter ille possit eum offendere? [§1] DICENDum quod licet de regni nostri lege & approbata consuetudine propter minas & comminationes non sit licitum cuiquam alterum offendere (praeter combustionis & incinerationis articulum atque casum, in quo quilibet civitatem aut villam vel alterius domum succendere ignisque voragine conflagrare minatus morte damnari solet) de lege tamen communi si homo ille, qui minatus est alteri mortem solitus est minas suas executioni demandare, praesertim si fuerit potens & alias consuetus percutere (quia verisimiliter hoc idem praesumitur etiam de isto) mortis evitandi gratia admittitur defensa pariter & offensa. [§2]

Verum si non fuit solitus alias percutere nec minas suas exequutioni demandare tunc verbis quidem resistere & ei contradicere permittitur, sed non ferro vel gladio. Nisi forte ille expectaret socios & mora periculum esset allatura. [§3] Melius tamen & salubrius est in hoc casu illum evitare, & ab eo in alium locum declinare.

An alius alium adiuuare possit. xxiii.

ADhuc queritur: An alius alium possit adiuuare. [§1] Dicendum quod sic. Nam si pro tutela rerum & hæreditatum mearum possum amicos & fratres convocare longe fortius pro corporis & personę meę defensione. [§2] Unde quilibet etiam extraneus dum in adiutorium acclamatur poterit illum quem in periculo vitę constitutum viderit semper adiuuare. [§3] Attamen latronem & alium publicum malefactorem non tenetur neque debet alterius de manibus ad huiusmodi malefactoris clamorem eliberare.

De villanorum, quos Iobagiones nuncupamus conditionibus & legibus. xxv.

CAeterum habita Iurium civitatum liberarum ac defensionis & offensionis declaratione, iam de villanis (quos Iobagiones nuncupamus) tractandum est. [§1] Quorum multiplex est condicio. Nam alii sunt Hungari, alii Saxones & Germani, alii vero Bohemi & Sclavi Christianę fidei professores. Pręterea quidam sunt Volachi & Rutheni, quidam autem Rasciani sive Serviani & Bulgari grecorum sequentes errores. Sunt insuper Philistęi & Comani in terris regalibus residentes & habitantes christianam pariter religionem profitentes. Ruthenorum vero & Bulgarorum alii nostrę fidei alii autem Gręcorum errori sunt adherentes. [§2] ET QUAMVIS omnes istę nationes (demptis Philisteis, Comanis, Ruthenis & Bulgaris regalibus) hac libertatis pręrogativa hactenus gavisı fuerint, ut dum & quodocunque voluissent de loco residentię ipsorum ad alia loca, quę maluissent: iusto terragio deposito debitisque eorum persolutis liberam sese moraturos conferendi habuissent facultatem; huiusmodi tamen ipsorum libertatem superiore hac æstate propter seditionem & tumultuariam eorum adversus universam nobilitatem sub nomine Cruciatę ductu cuiusdam sceleratissimi latronis Georgii Zekel appellati insurrectionem, ex eoque notam perpetuę infidelitatis eorum incursionem penitus amiserunt dominisque ipsorum terrestribus mera & perpetua iam rusticitate subiecti sunt, [§3] qui secundum legem & consuetudinem huius regni dudum approbatam ratione quorumcunque negociorum (exceptis rebus forum ecclesiasticum manifeste concernentibus) nec in pręsentiam iudicum ordinariorum regni nec vicariorum ecclesiarum vel aliorum iudicum spiritualium, sed neque comitum parochialium aliquorum comitatum simpliciter & directe citari possunt sed eorum ex parte cuilibet querulanti atque causanti domini ipsorum terrestres atque temporales sive sint sæculares, sive spirituales iudicium & iusticiam primum impendere tenentur. [§4] Et tandem super huiusmodi iudicio si partium ipsarum altera contentari noluerit causam ipsam in pręsentiam iudicis sui superioris, ad quem scilicet cognitio eiusdem causę spectabit evidentioris & maturioris discussionis & revisionis gratia deducere poterit. [§5] Ita videlicet quod si causa ex eius serie forum ecclesiasticum concernere videbitur, in ordinarii sui diocesani eiusque vicarii, Si autem ad sæculare iudicium attingere dinoscetur, in comitis parochialis ac iudicum nobilium pręsentiam transmittenda erit. [§6] Et huiusmodi iudicii ac iusticie impensio sive causa in curia regia per Evocationem sive coram comitibus parochialibus vel ecclesiarum vicariis per citationem mota & suscitata existat, dum in pręsentiam domini sui terrestris remittitur, semper coram uno vel duobus iudicibus nobilium fieri celebrarique & administrari debet.

De modo et ordine impensionis iudicii ex parte Iobagionum fiende. xxvi.

IN primis igitur de modo & ordine impensionis eiuscemodi iudiciorum dicendum est. [§1] UBI quæritur: Utrum dominus terrestris sive temporalis, per querulantem simpliciter requisitus teneatur ex parte Iobagionum suorum de facto iudicium & iusticiam impendere? Et si impendere recusaverit an propterea onus aliquod iuridicorum gravaminum incurrat? Et an possit postea (citatione contra ipsum super ea re facta ut Iobagiones suos coram comite & iudicibus nobilium statuatur) ex parte eorundem Iobagionum suorum iudicii impensionem promittere, vel solus comes parochialis cum iudicibus nobilium ex parte illorum iudicium iam impendere teneatur? [§2] DICENDUM quod licet divino & humano quoque iure ac communi de lege quilibet dominus terrestris ex parte quorumlibet Iobagionum & rusticorum: ac etiam familiarium suorum ignobilium cuilibet querulanti & læso aut damnificato homini ad simplicem dumtaxat requisitionem & querimoniam mox iudicium & iustitiam facere ac administrare teneatur, antequam tamen iuridice hoc est per Evocationem vel citationem ad huiusmodi iudicii & iusticię impensionem requisitus & amonitus non fuerit (si etiam facere & impendere neglexerit) nulli propterea pœne subiacebit eo quod pœna ob contemptum & transgressionem iudiciarię commissionis in causarum processibus subsequi & imponi consuevit. [§3] Non igitur comes parochialis cum iudicibus nobilium, sed per se ipsum etiam exopt iudicium illud administrare tenetur. [§4] UNDE SCIENDUM est quod si quispiam nobilis aut possessionatus homo (sive spiritualis, sive sæcularis persona existat) in curiam regiam evocatus, vel in sedem iudiciariam comitis parochialis citatus ita fuerit ut & per se ipsum comparere & Iobagiones quoque aut familiares suos ignobiles sistere ac iuri statuere teneatur tunc si talis nobilis aut possessionatus homo non venerit solus ipse in persona sua propria in tribus marcis gravis ponderis, Iobagiones vero vel familiares sui ignobiles quotquot fuerint nominatim statuere commissi per singula capita in singulis marcis hoc est quælibet persona statui commissa in una marca gravis similiter ponderis convinci & aggravari & insuper in actione acquisitioneque actoris condemnari solet atque debet. [§5] Sic videlicet quod si causa ratione facti maioris potentię in curia regia mota fuisse dinoscitur tam nobilis vel possessionatus homo, quam etiam sui Iobagiones aut familiares ignobiles nominati & per expressum statui commissi in amissione capitum & bonorum suorum quorumlibet, mobilium scilicet & immobilium ad portionem ipsorum cedentium condemnantur. [§6] Ubi vero causa prætextu negociorum factum minoris potentię tangentium etiam in sede iudiciaria comitatum suscitata fuerit tunc nobilis in centum florenis partim iudici & partim actori solvendis, Iobagiones autem & familiares sui singillatim in eorum Homagiis quadraginta florenos facientibus actori solummodo cedentibus aggravantur. Nam in sedibus iudiciariis comitatum ratione violentiarum & actuum potentiariorum pœna ultra centum florenos decerni non potest. [§7] VERUM si venerit & responsione facta ex parte huiusmodi Iobagionum ac familiarium suorum ignobilium super obiectis: & actionibus actoris iudicium & iusticiam impendere promiserit tunc in facie illius possessionis, ubi tales rustici vel ignobiles famuli resident, in termino per iudicem suum ordinarium ad id præfigendo coram uno (ut præfactum est) aut duobus iudicibus nobilium ipsius comitatus, in quo possessio talis adiacet eiuscemodi iudicii & iusticię impensionem per se vel officialem aut villicum suum facere & peragere tenetur. [§8] SI autem in termino per iudicem ad id deputato iudicium & iusticiam huiusmodi facere & impendere renuerit & neglexerit tunc idem nobilis aut alter quilibet possessionatus homo pro non impensione ipsius iudicii ac mandati iudicis refutatione prætextu singulorum Iobagionum vel famulorum ignobilium (quorum ex parte iudicium & iusticiam administrare ac impendere tenebatur) in singulis tribus marcis in duabus semper iudici, in tertia vero partibus actori persolvendis condemnatur, et cum aliis singulis tribus marcis ad impensionem eiusdem iudicii & iusticiæ in termino iterum ad id per iudicem præfigendo cogetur & compelli debet. [§9] UBI VERO secundario quoque ab ipsa iudicii & iustitiæ impensione se retraxerit, & illud administrare subticuerit atque neglexerit tunc in Homagiis singulorum de facto condemnabitur, et super eisdem Homagiis de bonis ac rebus talis nobilis vel alterius possessionati hominis mobilibus, si reperiri poterunt, aliter autem de iuribus suis possessionariis actori satisfactionem iudex impendere tenetur. [§10] ET HOC super Homagiis verum esse accipe si actus violenti quorum prætextu causa ipsa mota fuit factum minoris potentiæ representabunt. Nam si capitalem sententiam tangunt, tunc non in Homagiis sed in amissione capitum & omnium bonorum ipsorum omnes illi ex parte quorum iudicium celebrari debebat condemnantur, & cuncta eorum bona mobilia videlicet & immobilia iudici atque adversæ parti iudicabuntur, et insuper vigore litterarum Adiudicatoriarum ubicunque deprehendi poterunt, sive intra priorum dominorum, sive aliorum territoriorum (ut condignam luant pœnam) cum litteris Adiudicatoriis & sententialibus per adversarium & actorem libere captivabuntur. [§11] ATTamen si iuxta domini terrestris promissionem & iudicis commissionem in termino & loco ad id deputatis iudicii & iusticiæ huiusmodi impensio rite peracta fuerit, & Iobagiones vel familiares ignobiles in facto maioris potentiærei & culpabiles reperti ex eoque in sententiis capitalibus ac amissione cunctorum bonorum suorum mobilium & immobilium condemnati & agravati extiterint, tunc huiusmodi bonorum duę partes domino ipsi terrestri tanquam iudici & tertia pars actori adversarioque cedent in portiones. Et præterea tenebitur dominus idem terrestris capita illorum convictorum & condemnatorum manibus adversarii iure punienda tradere & assignare. [§12] QUOD si facere dominus ipse terrestris nollet aut non curaret quovismodo tunc Homagia singulorum de rebus & bonis suis propriis deponere persolvereque tenebitur. [§13] Et hoc verum est si in termino quo iudicii & iustitiæ impensionem facere promisit eiuscemodi convicti & condemnati erga ipsum & in potestate eiusdem fuerunt. [§14] NAM si tempore medio aliquis illorum Iobagionum vel familiarium ignobilium aufugeret & manus iurisdictionemque & potestatem domini sui evaderet quoquo modo tunc idem dominus terrestris in nullo propterea onere gravari debet. [§15] VERUM si quispiam illorum post promissionis & ante impensionis iudicii diem & terminum invito domino suo terrestri palam vel occulte discederet & aufugeret tunc universas res & quælibet bona mobilia videlicet & immobilia illius in territorio ipsius domini sui existentes & adiacentia idem dominus libere pro se occupare poterit. [§16] Tamen de eisdem (si actus potentiarii maiores fuerint) Homagium illius decem scilicet marcas quadraginta florenos auri facientes primum actori persolvere & tertiam quoque partem residuitatis bonorum suorum mobilium eidem adversario dare tenebitur, duas partes eorundem bonorum mobilium pro se reservando. Et nihilominus hæreditates & bona immobilia ipsius rustic vel familiaris ignobilis estimare & tertiam partem estimationis: atque valoris earundem hæreditatum actori pariter assignare debet. Reliquas duas partes pro se similiter auferendo & occupando. [§17] Et insuper adversarius ipse ubicunque talem fugitivum reperire poterit liberam detinendi & iuxta sua demerita capitali sententia feriendi plenariam habebit auctoritatem. [§18] SI autem actus violenti minores fuerint, tunc solummodo Homagium illius actori persolvere & cum hoc super damnis per rusticum vel famulum ignobilem illatis (si in actionis serie damna declarata fuerint) de bonis eiusdem rustici vel familiaris adversario satisfactionem impendere tenetur.

Qualiter Iobagionibus et famulis ignobilibus iuramenta decernuntur. xxvii.

Item si causa in facto statutionis Iobagionum vel famulorum ignobilium in curia regia per Evocationem, aut sede iudiciaria comitum parochialium per citationem mota & in presentiam sui domini terrestris (ut iudicium & iustitiam illorum ex parte querulanti & adversario impendat) per iudicem remissa fuerit, & actor tempore impensionis iudicii tres litteras inquisitorias contra reos exhibuerit, & ille actionem adversus eos propositam simpliciter negaverint tunc cuilibet Iobagioni vel famulo in causam attracto & statui commisso iuramentum secundum Homagii sui exigentiam quadragesimo se hominibus sibi similibus hoc est rusticis & ignobilibus bonæ tamen famæ & honestæ conditionis personis pro sui expurgatione imponendum erit. [§1] Nam quilibet rusticus & impossessionatus homo cum suo iuramento unum florenum centum denarios valentem & non plures recipere potest, & ex consequenti ad maius sacramento suo nec expurgare, nec condemnare quemquam poterit. [§2] Secus est tamen in causis criminalibus quando ad caput malefactoris cuiuspiam iuratur. Nam eo tunc non Homagium sed demeritum & criminis pœna ponderatur. [§3] SI VERO binas litteras inquisitorias produxerit tunc vigesimo se, si autem unas exhibuerit decimo se sibi (ut præfertur) æqualibus rusticis sacramentum adiudicari & imponi debet. Et hoc contra nobiles & alios possessionatos homines. Nam si inter ignobiles & rusticos iudicium administrabitur, tunc modus & ordo loci ac patrię ubi reus moram trahit observatur. [§4] Litteras autem inquisitorias intellige semper illas quæ ad litteratorium mandatum regium vel litteratoriam petitionem aliorum iudicum regni ordinariorum in locis testimonialibus aut coram eisdem iudicibus ordinariis regni in conventionibus generalibus dominorum & nobilium sunt confectæ. [§5] Nam inquisitorię simplices ad legitimam scilicet & instantem petitionem cuiuscunque litigantis in sedibus iudiciariis comitum parochialium emanatę in parte solummodo & non in pleno continent vigorem. [§6] ADVERTendum tamen est quod si præmisso tempore impensionis iudicii in causam attracti actionem & acquisitionem actoris & adversarii contra eos propositam negaverint, & testimonio vicinorum suorum aut alio probabili documento sese immunes & innocentes esse declarare voluerint, & actor huiusmodi testificationem acceptare noluerit sed simpliciter & de plano iuxta exhibitaram litterarum inquisitoriarum vigores iudicium & iusticiam a iudice postulaverit tunc in tali casu iuramentum illud, quod virtute ipsarum litterarum inquisitoriarum adiudicari ac imponi deberet pro media parte defalcabitur & condescendet prout ista consuetudo etiam in causis nobilium observatur. [§7] Opinione tamen communi atque vulgata cum quot personis nobili vel domino terrestri in curia regia vel sede comitum parochialium iudiciaria iuramentum decernitur, cum tot personis etiam Iobagionibus vel famulis eius ignobilibus imponendum erit. [§8] Et si nobilis post communem inquisitionem iuramentum præstiterit etiam coloni ac familiares sui absoluti manebunt. Si vero succubuerit illi quoque condemnati intelliguntur.

Qualiter damna et debita per rusticos res ac hereditates non habentes recuperari debeant. xxviii.

Nec hoc pretermittendum est, quod si quispiam litigantium rusticum aliquem in Homagio suo aut damnorum vel debitorum solutione iuris ordine condemnaverit & convicerit, & convictus ille nec res mobiles nec hæreditates habuerit ut super ea re satisfacere possit tunc tenetur dominus terrestris ipsum rusticum sic convictum manibus adversarii sui captum tradere & assignare, quiquidem adversarius vel actor infra quindecim dies (si interea cum eo convictus ipse non concordaverit) poterit illum suis in carceribus detinere, nullum tamen detrimentum in corpore suo sub pœna Homagii eiusdem ipsi inferre valet, sed de pane & aqua interim sibi providere debet. [§1] Qui si etiam interea temporis se de huiusmodi captivitate eliberare non posset tamen adversarius rusticum ipsum in servitutem adhuc redigere non poterit sed accepta ab eo fidei cautione (quod quicquid laborando aut mendicando acquirere valebit tertiam partem adversario suo omni hebdomada donec debitum suum suppleverit fideliter administrabit) liberum dimittere tenetur. [§2] Qui si iuramentum præstare & onus hoc subire in seque levare recusaret, vel forte accepta securitate adversarium suum defraudaret tunc adversarius ipse rusticum illum ubicunque locorum poterit rursus detinendi ac incarcerandi & in suam servitutem redigendi ad effectum usque restitutionis eiuscemodi Homagii aut damni vel debiti plenariam habebit facultatem illeque supplere tenebitur invitus quod noluit liber & manu missus. [§3] ET IDEM est intelligendum etiam de causis inter nobiles prætextu debitorum & damnorum motis & subortis ut scilicet nobilis hæreditates & res mobiles ad satisfaciendum de debitis contractis & damnis per eum illatis non habere compertus etiam in persona sua detineatur & ad satisfactionem per iudicem modo de rusticis immediate prædeclarato compellatur, prout in secunda quoque parte serie videlicet sententiarum paucis tetigi. [§4] DE crescentia autem duplici debitorum si quando reus terminum solutionis per iudicem præfixum præteriisset (prout apud veteres observatum legimus) nostra hac tempestate non est quicquam iudicandum.

Quomodo res mobiles et immobiles rusticorum inter filios et filias dividantur. xxix.

Item si rusticus filium genuerit filiam quoque nondum emaritatam habens tunc uterque in rebus paternis tam mobilibus, quam immobilibus æquali iure succedit. [§1] Si tamen de rebus mobilibus filia emaritata fuerit tunc advertendum est, quia illæ res aut avitæ aut paternæ fuerunt. Si avitæ fraus nulla in emaritatione sequi potest. Quoniam filia æqualem portionem sortiri debet. Si autem res paternæ extiterint tunc pater iuxta condecenciam status & honoris sui poterit eam emaritare, & amplius portionem rebus de eisdem non habebit, sed mortuo patre ad filium devolventur, & illo quoque decedente ad fratres & consanguineos suos ab eodem stipite derivatos condecendent. [§2] VERUM si pater de sua portione testamentum condere voluerit id quidem facere poterit absque tamen fraude uxoris. Nam uxor in rebus per maritum suum stante coniugio conquisitis semper particeps & condivisionalis efficietur. Ita quod viro intestato decedente ad eam universa bona sua per ipsum ut præfertur conquisita devolventur. [§3] UBI vero pater mortua prima uxore sua aliam duxerit consortem tunc filius ex prima uxore natus si cum patre suo in rebus mobilibus & immobilibus divisus fuerit secunda uxor eius de portione filii pro se nullam portionem habere permittitur, & neque fratres sui ex ipsa secunda uxore patris generati sese ad illam ingerere possunt, sed de eisdem filius ipse prout voluerit liberam disponendi habet facultatem.

Qualiter bona rustici intestati in dominum terrestrem devolvuntur. xxx.

Item rusticus unica & singularis persona existens nullumque post se hæredem & successorem legitimum relinquens super rebus suis mobilibus libere testari potest, hæreditates tamen si avitæ fuerint omnino in dominum terrestrem devolvuntur. [§1] Si vero per semetipsum extiterint acquisitæ in duas dividuntur partes, quarum una domino ipsi terrestri, altera vero cui testamentaliter legaverit effective cedit. [§2] Si autem intestatus decesserit omnia ipsius bona tam mobilia, quam etiam immobilia ad dominum terrestrem devolvuntur. [§3] Qui ante omnia de eisdem bonis pro exequiis & sepultura illius providere, Cunctos deinde creditores suos contentos reddere et debita sua persolvere tenetur, et residuum bonorum pro se tandem tollere potest. [§4] UBI tamen rusticus hæredem post se reliquerit legitimum, & hæres parvulus fuerit ac ætatem duodecim annorum non attigerit tunc poterit pater non solum de portione sua testari verum etiam heredi parvulo infra ipsam duodecim annorum ætatem forsitan decedenti heredem alium (quem maluerit) substituere, ita ut si interim heredem ipsum legitimum præmori contingat substitutus hæres succedat. [§5] Si tamen verus hæres ætatem postea prædictam attigerit vel transcenderit eiusmodi substitutio extinguetur, & in hæredis potestatem bonorum omnium conservatio pariter & dispensatio reponetur. [§6] Verum tamen colonorum quemadmodum multiplex est conditio, ita & consuetudo iuris, quæ iuxta locorum veterem usum observanda censetur. [§7] Per hoc tamen non est intelligendum ut hæreditas per rusticum cuiusdam legata vel vendita iure perpetuo a domino terrestri alienari possit. Nam rusticus præter laboris mercedem & præmium in terris domini sui quantum ad perpetuitatem nil iuris habet, sed totius terræ proprietates ad dominum terrestrem spectat & pertinet. [§8] Per huiusmodi igitur legationem aut venditionem colonus non nisi laboris sui mercedem & præmium condignam scilicet estimationem terræ, prati, molendini vel vineæ cuiusdam legare vel vendere potest perpetuitate domino terrestri salva semper remanente, qui dum voluerit terras, prata & molendina secundum estimationem communem, Vineas vero iuxta condignum earum valorem ad se recipiendi habet facultatem.

Quod rustici per semetipsos cum nobilibus lites ingredi non possunt. xxxi.

ADvertendum præterea est quod quia rustici dominis eorum temporalibus in tantum subiecti sunt ut per semetipsos cum nobilibus ratione quorumcunque negotiorum lites protrahere non possunt. [§1] Dum igitur rusticus per nobilem quempiam indebite verberatus aut vulneratus vel aliter læsus sive etiam in rebus suis potentialiter damnificatus fuerit, & dominus suus terrestris huiusmodi nobilem in causam conveniendo reum esse declaraverit atque convicerit tunc idem nobilis adversus dominum terrestrem in facto minoris potentiæ centum florenos faciente & insuper Homagio ipsius vulnerati aut verberati rustici vel damnorum illatorum refusione & restitutione iuxta videlicet negotiorum qualitatem condemnari debet.

Qualiter publici malefactores per comites parochiales ac nobiles privilegiatos puniri debeant. xxxii.

HOc quoque sciendum quod omnes nobiles necnon oppida & villæ, qui vel quæ litteras regias super malefactorum & pravorum hominum punitione ac exterminatione pro se non habent confectas universos fures, prædones & alios publicos malefactores per eos & in eorum medio deprehensos atque detentos manibus comitum aut vicecomitum & iudicum nobilium illius comitatus, ubi huiusmodi nobiles resident aut oppida vel villæ adjacent sub pœna Homagii malefactoris detenti tradere & assignare tenentur puniendos. Nec ultra tres dies apud se illos tenere possunt. [§1] Nam si ultra triduum conservarent per singulos dies in singulis tribus marcis gravis ponderis pro qualibet persona detenta contra comites, vicecomites ac iudices nobilium prænotatos (ob venditionem iurisdictionis eorum temere per illos factam) merito convincentur. [§2] Homicidas tamen & incendiarios ac in adulterio violenti deprehensos in loco delicti sive facie vel territorio illius oppidi aut possessionis ubi facinus huiusmodi patratum fuerit captos & detentos etiam oppida & villæ ac nobiles privilegia non habentes observato iuris ordine iuxta eorum demerita feriendi atque puniendi habent auctoritatem. [§3] Dimittendi tamen illos non habent facultatem. Nam sic in Homagiis singulorum, qui dimitterentur adversus præfatos comites ac vicecomites & iudices nobilium condemnarentur. [§4] Pari modo nobiles & alii ad hoc specialiter privilegiati omnes malefactores per eos & in territorio ipsorum deprehensos atque captos punire quidem & secundum illorum demerita necare possunt, dimittere tamen nusquam possunt. Aliter enim Homagia ipsorum persolvere tenentur.

Quomodo damna per pecudes et pecora illata recuperari debeant. xxxiii.

Item si quis nobilium aut rusticorum equos, boves, oves, porcos aut alias pecudes vel pecora de segetibus aut pratis & fœnilibus vel silvis glandinosis prohibitis propter illata damna impulerit vagiandos & taxandos, & dominus eiusmodi animalium contumacia ductus illa redimere noluerit tunc damnificatus ipse non amplius nisi per triduum apud se eadem animalia conservare poterit; [§1] transactis autem tribus ipsis diebus manibus sui comitis vel vicecomitis parochialis, absente vero illo ad manus unius iudicis nobilium cuius scilicet processui territorium illud damnificatum deservire dinoscitur dare et assignare tenetur. [§2] Nam aliter post triduum singulis diebus, quibus animalia prænotata apud se reservaverit in singulis tribus marcis gravis ponderis, in duabus iudiciariis, in tertia vero partibus adversarii manibus dandis & devolvendis impellens & vagiator ipse gravabitur. [§3] Damna autem irrogata secundum conscientiosam limitationem ac estimationem iudicis & iuratorum civium illius loci, in cuius territorio fuerint illata compensari debent. [§4] Nam prohibitio cum speciali & expresso onere facta, ne in segetibus aut pratis vel silvis damna inferantur ad colonos dumtaxat eius loci, in cuius territorio huiusmodi segetes, silvæ vel prata adiacent refertur. Extranei enim non onus inhibitionis sed damni quantitatem solvere tenentur. [§5] Ubi autem colonus furtim vel manifeste manu violenta silvam succiderit, vel arbores eius decorticaverit, & ibidem comprehendi poterit omnia bona sua secum habita amittet & insuper in Homagio suo pro violentia convincetur.

De equo furtim sublato, & in exercitu vel extra exercitum reperto. xxxiiii.

Item in facto & causa alicuius equi furtim vel aliter a suo domino atque possessore ablati & alienati, ac in exercitu generali quovis modo instaurando reperti non debet neque poterit actori iudicium elargiri; sed equus ipse medio hominum fidedignorum per capitaneum aut ducem exercitus ad id eligendorum atque deputandorum in suo vero valore debet estimari, & sub fideiussoria cautione præ manibus illius apud quem reperitur ad condescensionem usque exercitus relinqui, [§1] et capitaneus aut dux exercitus certum terminum præfigere debet, in quo post condescensionem eiusdem exercitus coram aliquo iudice ordinario per eundem nominando vel agazonum regalium magistro utraque pars comparere teneatur iudicium in huiusmodi causa receptura. [§2] UBI autem in causa equi vel bovis aut alterius animalis furtim alienati extra exercitum inventi in causam attractus non poterit super eiusdem emptione evidens producere testimonium semper actor tertio se sibi similibus ad eius recuperationem suam debet deponere iuramentum. [§3] VERUM fur ille si dixerit in foro libero & communi: vel alibi se emisse, & evictorem (quem nos expeditorem appellamus) non poterit statuere, neque hospitem vel alium quempiam qui mercipotum hoc est victimam emptionis & venditionis more solito benedixisset producere patibulo reus erit.

De causarum transmissionibus & litteris transmissionalibus. Tit. xxxv.

Sciendum postremo quod universæ causæ in sedibus iudiciariis vicariorum ecclesiarum cathedralium ac comitum parochialium motæ (dempta causa, quæ in sede comitatum sacramento solius personæ actoris submittitur) in curiam regiam iudicum scilicet ordinariorum regni in præsentiam evidentioris & maturioris discussionis gratia transmitti solent atque debent. [§1] CAUSÆ vero quæ coram dominis terrestribus super factis colonorum & rusticorum (modo antelato) suscitata fuerint tunc ad instantiam & appellationem illius partis, quæ super celebrato inibi iudicio contentari noluerit primum in præsentiam comitum ac vicecomitum & iudicum nobilium tandemque altera forsitan partium ibi quoque non contenta in ipsam curiam regiam sunt transmittendæ; [§2] & pars appellans litteras tam super huiusmodi, quam etiam aliis quibusvis causis in sedibus iudicialibus comitatuum ventillatis adiudicatorias & transmissionales in sede iudiciali post ultimam & finalem adiudicationem primitus celebranda, si commode fieri poterit. Aliter autem in sede secundo celebranda excipere & ad terminum per iudicem sibi præfigendum causam illam in ipsam curiam regiam deducere tenetur. [§3] Nam si id facere neglexerit eadem causa in rem iudicatam transibit, & in tertia sede iudiciali litteræ Adiudicatoriæ iuxta latam sententiam parti victricis atque triumphanti reddi & executioni demandari debent. [§4] Et hoc si negligentia ipsa non ex parte notarii vel iudicum sed partis appellantis commissa dinoscetur.

Forma iuramenti Iudeorum contra Christianos prestandi. xxxvi.

Item quanquam ex parte Iudeorum non sit instituti mei quicquam annotare cum Iudei varia & diversa habere dinoscantur super eorum legibus privilegia plerisque in locis saluti contraria & alias perniciosum videatur de usuris iudicare, ex quo tamen sæpenumero contingit Iudeis contra Christianos iuramentum imponi & adiudicari. Formam igitur iuramenti Iudeorum in calce opusculi huius apponendam censeo. [§1] Ubi sciendum quod Iudeus iuramentum prestare volens contra solem verti & nudipes stare debet, clamide vel pallio indutus, & pileum Iudaicum in capite suo habens volumenque legis (quod tabulam Moysis vocant) manu sua tangat atque teneat & sic dicat: [§2] Ego T. Iudeus iuro per deum vivum, per deum sanctum, per deum omnipotentem, qui fecit cælum & terram, mare & omnia quæ in eis sunt quod in hac causa qua me hic Christianus inculpat innocens sum penitus & immunis. Et si reus sum terra me absorbeat, quæ Dathan & Abyron absorbit. Et si reus sum paralysis & lepra me invadat, quæ precibus Helisei Naaman Syrum dimisit & Iezii puerum Helisei invasit. Et si reus sum caducus morbus, fluxus sanguinis & gutta repentina me tangat, & mors subitanea me rapiat dispereamque in corpore & anima ac rebus meis, & in sinum Abrahamæ nunquam perveniam. Et si reus sum lex Moysi in monte Synai sibi data me deleat, & omnis scriptura quæ in quinque libris Moysi scripta est me confundat, & si istud iuramentum meum non est verum & iustum me deleat Adonay & suæ deitatis potentia. Amen.

Finis tertie partis.

Conclusio operis

Hæc sunt sapientissime ac optime princeps, quæ de inclyti regni tui Pannoniæ, cui tot annis felicissime præfuiſti legibus, institutis ac patriis consuetudinibus iussu & auspiciis tuis scribenda visa sunt. Qua in re non pauca mihi fuerant advertenda, decreta videlicet tuorum prædecessorum principum, unde præsens hoc nostrum opus totum fere sumptum reperies. Rursus occurrebant nostrates homines, qui hoc ipso opere instituendi erant. Ob primum factum est ut iisdem sæpe nominibus inscribendo usus sim, quibus principes ipsos usos fuisse compereram. Absurdum enim videbatur non eis verbis uti me quæ frequenter, qui hæc antea statuerunt, suis decretis inseruisse constabat. Nemo peritorum ambigit princeps prudentissime Romanos illos legum latores, ob vetustatis reverentiam eadem pœne vocabula suis legibus immiscuisse, quibus vetustissimæ Decemvirales illæ leges more suorum temporum usæ fuerant. Doctissimi quoque latini frequenter suis scriptis inseruisse scimus peregrinas & mere barbaras dictiones, qualis est Mastruca apud Ciceronem cum tamen Sardum sit vocabulum & pure barbarum. Item Gaza quæ Persica vox est. Plura huius genus apud Fabium Quintilianum reperies in eo loco ubi de peregrinis verbis disserit copiose. Maronem præterea poetarum Latinorum longe principem suis aureis carminibus frequenter dictiones illas priscas, vernaculas & sua iam tempestate ob vetustatem nimiam penitus aboletas quibus passim Livius Andronicus, Q. Ennius, Furius Bibaculus, Gn. Nævius, Varius, M. Actius, Pacuvius,

Q. Cornifitius, Lucretius, item cæteri tanquam vulgo notis usi sunt, immiscuisse constat. Curius (inquit) Phavorinus philosophus & Fabricius & Coruncanus antiquissimi viri nostri & his antiquiores Horatii illi trigemini plane ac dilucide cum suis fabulati sunt, neque Auruncorum, aut Sicanorum, aut Pelasgorum qui primi incoluisse Italiam dicuntur sed ætati suæ verbis loquuti sunt, quod fecisse nos nec pœnitet in hoc opere. Occurrebant rursus nostrates Pannonæ, ad quorum usus scripsimus hæc fere omnia. Constat enim nostros Pannonæ diligentius arma & ea quis sine nec potuere seri, nec fugere messes manibus, quam Ciceronis, Livii, Salustii aut Auli Gellii volumina tractavisse. Danda igitur venia a prudentioribus mihi erit si cum nostris Hungaris loquens sim ipse sæpe nudis ac pœne vernaculis verbis usus. Palladii Rutilii sententia in primo eorum librorum, quos de agricultura scripsit nos plurimum movit, ut consuetis ac planis verbis nostris hominibus loqueremur. Pars est prima (inquit) prudentiæ ipsam, cui præcepturus sis æstimare personam. Neque enim formator agricolæ debet artibus & eloquentia rhetores æmulari, quod a plerisque factum est, qui dum diserte loquuntur rusticis assecuti sunt ut eorum doctrina nec a dissertissimis possit intelligi. Lactantii præterea tertio Divinarum institutionum lib. verba sunt: Deus (inquit) hanc voluit esse naturam ut simplex & nuda veritas esset luculentior, qua satis (inquit) ornata per se est, ideoque ornamentis extrinsecus additis fucata corrumpitur. Mendacium vero specie placet aliena quia per se corruptum vanescit, ac defluit nisi aliunde ornatu quæſito circumlitum fuerit ac politum. Marcus Tullius in quo eloquentia præcipua & admirabilis fuit primo de finibus bonorum & malorum libro: A philosopho (inquit) si afferat eloquentiam non asperner si non habet non ad modum flagitem. Satis enim (inquit) in philosopho est si verbis complectitur quod vult & dicit plane quod intelligam. Sæpe ab Aurelio Augustino hæc est repetita sententia: Cum res ipsa constat non est vis (inquit) facienda in nominibus. Quis præterea credat barbaras nationes ut Persas, ut Aegyptios, ut Arabes, ut Scythas, ut Parthos, atque Hyrcanos, aliis verbis tulisse suis leges quam eo loquendi genere, quod planum & in communi usu esset apud eosdem? Græci quoque hi maxime qui interpretandi officium susceperunt, sermonem passim obvium communemque plerumque adamasse narrantur. Lycophronis dogmata pauci legunt quod nec eorum sensus a legentibus possit percipi. Heracliti Ephesii scripta non ob aliam causam creduntur amissa, nisi quod verbis obscuris nimis & Cimmeriis, ut aiunt, tenebris atrioribus usus fuerit. Hinc factum est, ut a posteris Scotinos id est tenebricosus fuerit nuncupatus. Non laudo vel legum, vel rerum aliarum interpretes quorum scripta intelligi inequeunt nisi alios fuerint expositores adepti. Epicurum qui maximus apud suos habitus est, pedestri sermone atque inerudito in suis scriptis usum fuisse cum alii plures, tum Marcus quoque Cicero testis est. Plotinus inter posteros Platonicos longe princeps ita artis elegantiam neglexisse dicitur ut cum aliquid scripsisset quod scripserat respicere bis minime tollerabat, sed nec etiam semel legere atque percurrere, neque ullam orthographiæ diligentiam adhiberet soli videlicet intelligentiæ studens. Hanc eandem in scribendo incuriam nonnulli Aristoteli quoque philosopho ascribere non sunt veriti. Accedit ad hoc quod divina illa lex quæ per Moysen dei ore Iudeis data est tanta verborum simplicitate conscripta est ut in ea nulla facundiæ ratio ab autore ipso intesta esse videatur. Quod enim omnibus percipitur observandum ita tradi debet ut facile a lectoribus possit percipi, quod præcipitur. Evangelicam preterea & Christi legem illam sanctissimam extra quam salvari nemo potest nullis verborum lenociniis constat esse conscriptam. Succurrebat rursus quod ea fere omnia quæ hoc tripartito opere scripta sunt non nisi nostratum usui futura erant. Non ab re igitur a me factum iudico si in eo ipso opere verbis quibusdam Pannoniam ipsam nostram verius, quam latium redolentibus usus fuerim. In his enim rebus (ut Aristoteles etiam testis est) ut plures loquendum est. Hæc propter eos dumtaxat dicta volumus, quibus cætera sordent omnia nisi eis fuerit vel Cicero vel alter quispiam nobilium scriptorum interdum usus. At nobis in opere hoc nostro in quo cum omnia ad iusticiæ munus explendum domesticorumque iurium ac iudiciorum rationem referantur, verbis nudis atque apertis & nostratum cuique obviis ac expositis fuit utendum. Nec enim facundiam ostentare, quæ alioquin exigua in nobis est, sed publice usui paciæ & tranquillitati domesticæ consulere fuit propositum. Illud observandum curavi ne aliquid ab huius inclyti regni tui probatis moribus & consuetudinibus regaliumve constitutionum tenore, devium aut alienum in scriptis redigeretur omniumque fides & autoritas constaret. Siquid vero per memoriæ lapsus aut ingenii tenuitatem prætermissum est maiestatis tuæ clementiæ erit benignius ignoscere, & id totum humanæ imbecilitati, quæ nihil omnibus numeris absolutum parit ascribere. Ego quippe quo ad vitali hac aura perfruar, omnem curam, omne studium ac omnis cogitatus eo convertam ut maiestatis tuæ non modo iussibus ac mandatis, verum etiam nutibus & superciliis obtemperem. Qui tum demum votorum summam attigisse credam, cum ipsius votis aliqua saltem ex parte satisfecisse videbor.

Nos igitur, qui regnum nostrum Hungariæ prædictum, cætera dominia nostra non minus legibus & statutis, quam pace & armis regere ac gubernare cupimus, accepto huiusmodi libello supplicationibusque præfatorum dominorum prælatorum ac baronum & regni nostri nobilium exauditis & clementer admissis, quia omnia capitula universosque titulos & articulos in eodem libello contenta & conscriptos præsentibusque litteris nostris privilegialibus de verbo ad verbum sine diminutione & augmento aliquali insertos iustos & honestos esse, ac consuetudines approbatas & iura præacti regni nostri Hungariæ partiumque & regnorum eidem incorporatorum atque subiectorum rite tangere & concernere, immo mera verborum expressione illas & illa complecti agnovimus, ideo easdem & eadem laudavimus, acceptavimus, ratificavimus & approbavimus, atque pro annotatis dominis prælatis & baronibus universisque nobilibus & proceribus antedicti regni nostri Hungariæ partiumque sibi (ut præfertur) subiectarum eorumque cunctis successoribus & hæredibus pro perpetuis legibus iuribusque & consuetudinibus valituras & valitura de nostræ regiæ potestatis plenitudine confirmavimus, immo laudamus, acceptamus, approbamus, ratificamus & confirmamus, promittentes illum in omnibus capitulis, clausulis titulisque & articulis observare & observari facere præsentis scripti nostri patrocínio mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam præsentis litteras nostras privilegiales appensione secreti sigilli nostri quo ut rex Hungariæ utimur communitas duximus concedendas. Datum Budæ in festo beatæ Elisabeth viduæ tricesimo scilicet tertio die dietæ & conventionis generalis prænotatæ. Anno domini millesimo quingentesimo decimo quarto, regnorum nostrorum Hungariæ &c. Anno vigesimo quinto, Bohemiæ vero quadragesimo quinto. Reverendissimis reverendisque in Christo patribus dominis Thoma tituli sancti Martini in montibus sacro sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ præbitero Cardinali ac Patriarcha Constantinopolitano & sanctę sedis apostolicę de latere legato Strigoniensis; Gregorio de Frangapanibus Colocensis ac Bachiensis ecclesiarum Canonice unitarum Archiepiscopis; nec non illustrissimo ac reverendissimo Ipolito Estense de Aragonia sanctę similiter Romanæ ecclesiæ diacono Cardinale, Agriensi; Iohanne de Erdewd electo Zagrabiensi; Francisco de Warda Transilvaniensi; Francisco de Peren electo Waradiensi; Georgio Quinqueecclesiensi, Secretario Cancellario nostro; Petro Beryzlo Wesprimiensi, Summo Thesaurario nostro ac regnorum nostrorum Dalmatię, Croacię & Sclavonię Bano; Iohanne Gozthon Iauriensi; Ladislao Zalkano Watiensi; Francisco de Chahol Chanadiensi; Stepano de Podmanyn Nitriensi; Iohanne Orzag de Gwth Sirimiensi; Michaele Keserew de Gybarth Boznensi electis & Briccio de Egerwara Thiniensi ecclesiarum Episcopis ecclesias dei feliciter gubernantibus. ITEM spectabilibus & magnificis Emerico de Peren prænotata comite perpetuo comitatus Abawywariensi, prædicti regni nostri Hungarię Palatino & iudice comanorum nostrorum; comite Petro comite de sancto Georgio & de Bozyn iudice curię nostrę; Iohanne de Zapolya comite perpetuo terrę Scepusiensi, Waywoda nostro Transilvaniensi & comite Siculorum nostrorum ac generale capitaneo nostro; eodem Iohanne de Zapolya & Barnaba de Bela Zewriniensi Banis; Stephano de Bathor comite Themesiensi & partium regni nostri inferiorum capitaneo generali; Blasiode Raska Thavernicorum; Moyse Bwzlay de Gergellaka ianitorum; Iohanne Dragffy de Belthewk dapiferorum; Iohanne Banffi de Lyndwa pincernarum; Georgio de Bathor predicta Agazonum; Michaele de Palocz cubiculariorum nostrorum regalium magistris & Iohanne Bornemyza de Berzencze comite Psoniensi aliisque complurimis comitatus regni nostri tenentibus & honores.

APPENDIX

Carmina Hieronymi Balbi doctoris: praepositi posoniensis et secretarii regiae maiestatis.

Inclyta quae Scythicis gens prodiit Hungara terris Nil nisi sanguinei Martis amabat opus.
Clara quidem bello: partisque decora triumphis Sed non pacificę conscia legis erat.
Non fora legitimis resonabant sparsa tabellis: Nullaque conscripti regula iuris erat.
Ius dubie pendens: incertęque alea litis: Sparsaque clamoso iurgia uana foro.
Inde (nefas) patriis eiectus sedibus haeres Haesit, & alterius subtulit alter opes. Inque pari causa lata est sententia dispar:
Et modo qui uictor, mox fuit ille reus.
At Stephanus ueterum laudes egressus auorum Attulit optatam prouidus author opem.
Qui nunc Pannoniae perscribit iura feroci, Armaque fulta sacris legibus esse iubet.
Ille aperit regni triplici decreta libello: Et notat ambiguo iura tuenda foro.
Atque docet mores, longo seruauit ab aeuo Quos Scytha
Caesareis legibus esse pares.
Et quae uix poterant numeroso codice claudi Sedulus in paucas diggerit ipse notas.
Actio certa patet: certa est praescriptio rerum: Et contestatae formula litis adest.
Quisque suum noscens alieno limite cedit Sponte, nec infirmus praeda potentis erit.
Iusque, piumque colent placida sub lege quieti: Sorte pari causas Croesus, & Irus agent.
Macte animi qui tanta tuis dare commoda nosti Gentibus, insignis fama futura tua est.
Ut Cretae Minoa colunt; Argique Phoroneum: Legifer & sparte templa Lycurgus habet.
Utque Solone suo dociles letantur Athenae: Sic laudes referet Pannonis ora tuas.
Maior erit sacris qui moenia legibus armat, Quam qui belligerae congerit artis opes
Nam licet arma uacent, solidi stat gloria iuris: At sine iure parum Martia bella iuuant.

Benedicti Bekenii ad dominum suum Epigramma.

Hos proprius delectat amor, sed fallens gloria famae Hos iuuat, at mentis non colit ille bona.

Tu ratus o nimium nimiumque iterumque beatum Cum patriis studeas moribus, atque fide.
Lycurgus sanxit leges & commoda gentis Inachię, & Siculos perdocet alma Ceres.
At tu probatas multo discrimine leges Congeris, & nostros patria iura doces.

Eiusdem in Ardelionem: et Zoilum Epigramma

Si tibi liuor iners urit prae cordia tantum Ut patriis nolis consuluisse bonis.
Uel te dura silex genuit: seu torua Megęra: Uel si quid magnus seuius orbis habet.
Si potis est iubeo liuentem Zoile linguam Comprime: si non pestis acerba uoret.
Post cineresque tuos frondes quot in arbore cernis, Plutonis poenas tot tibi regna parent.

The customary laws of the renowned kingdom of Hungary: A work in three parts rendered most accurately by master Stephen Werbőczy locumtenens of the personal presence of the royal majesty

Master Stephen Werbőczy, locumtenens of the personal presence of the royal majesty: greetings to the readers:

When the most serene and merciful lord Wladislas, king of Hungary and Bohemia, etc.,¹ both of his own accord and moved by the frequent entreaties of every order of his subjects, decided in recent years to reduce to the rule and reason of written law those laws and customs on which, through the long passage of time, the legal matters in this realm had stood firm throughout the upheavals of so many wars and seditions, he deigned out of all those committed by both loyalty and obedience to His Majesty to fulfill this task, to choose me, so that by gathering into one body, as it were, the many scattered and sundered limbs of the customs and constitutions of the communities of this kingdom of Hungary, and by committing them to writing, they be handed down to posterity.²

While conscious of my own inadequacies, I accepted this assignment, not because of trusting my talent but on account of the need to comply; and to the extent that my abilities and my poor gifts allowed, I have brought it to its conclusion by long and protracted labors.

Meanwhile, by the king's command, the other protonotaries,³ who were then my colleagues as judges, as well as the sworn assessors of the bench of the royal court, and many others with long experience as much in secular as in divine law, were appointed to discuss, review, and weigh this material in all its details.

When all of this was completed as expected, the same prince, in a public and general diet and assembly of all the lords-prelate, barons, nobles and notables of this realm, held in the year of man's salvation 1514, once the peasant uprising that had broken out a little before⁴ was quelled and suppressed, on the day dedicated to St Luke the Evangelist,⁵ approved with formal words and out loud at the bidding and to the applause of all this compendium of domestic law which had been compiled day-and-night at his command under his auspices, and, having confirmed it by royal power and the fullness of royal authority, he affirmed it by irrevocable sanction.

¹ Wladislas (Ulászló) II Jagiełło, king of Bohemia 1471-1516, king of Hungary 1490-1516.

² Gábor Mikó has recently demonstrated that Werbőczy was formally commissioned as late as in 1512 to prepare this work, see "Ismeretlen országgyűlési emlék a Jagelló-korból. Adatok az 1507 és 1514 közötti országgyűlések történetéhez, valamint Werbőczy Hármaskönyvének elkészültéhez [Remarks on the History of Parliaments between 1507 and 1514 and the Making of Werbőczy's Tripartitum], Történelmi Szemle 56 (2014) 455–480.

³ Protonotaries (prothonotariii Hung. ítélőmester, "master in sentencing") were lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases. See György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1971), summarized in "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary," East Central Europe/l'Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191. The persons involved in the approval of the law-book are listed below in the draft of the royal charter of approval (never issued).

Moreover, he promised that this same work, having been committed to parchment, be distributed as a gift to districts throughout all of Hungary.⁶ But it would have been a long business to produce over fifty copies of such a huge body of law—for so many are the districts and regions (called by our people counties) which should partake in these presents with their own and separate copies—and the king had to leave for meetings in Pressburg and Vienna as the affairs of his kingdoms required.⁷

The king spent the whole spring and the greater part of the summer negotiating public and personal matters with the most illustrious princes Maximilian, the elect emperor augustus of the Romans,⁸ and his own brother Sigismund, king of Poland;⁹ and thus having finally returned to the country, although he adhered constantly and firmly to his decision that these laws of the communities of his kingdom soon see publication, one matter after another kept intruding, and in the course of these delays the space of his life was by divine will brought to an end and he passed on to the heavenly fatherland.¹⁰

⁴ On the so-called Dózsa uprising, April-August 1514; see e. g., Norman Housley, "Crusading as Social Revolt: The Hungarian Peasant Uprising of 1514," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 49, no 1, (1998), 1–28 with lit. and the decretum of 1514.

⁵ 18 October 1514.

⁶ Sending out copies of the decreta to the counties seems after the mid-fifteenth century to have been the customary means of "promulgating" the laws. It was usual, however, for the receiving bodies to pay for the copies that they received. It is curious that Werbőczy should say "over fifty." for the relevant number of receiving authorities (including the main cities, to which he does not refer) was at this time closer to a hundred.

⁷ The meeting in Pressburg (Pozsony, now Bratislava) and the "First Vienna Congress" was about a mutual inheritance treaty in July 1515. Wladislas fell ill soon thereafter and died on 16 March 1516. See Zsuzsanna Hermann, Az 1515. évi Habsburg-Jagelló szerződés. Adalék a Habsburgok magyarországi uralmának előtörténetéhez [The Habsburg- Jagiełło treaty of 1515. To the pre-history of the rule of the Habsburgs in Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1961). For a succinct summary, see <http://www.wienerkongress1515.at/en/1515-congress-of-vienna/> [last accessed 2.2.2019]

⁸ Maximilian I Habsburg, king of the Romans 1493-1519, Holy Roman emperor since 1508.

⁹ Sigismund ("the Old") Jagiełło, king of Poland 1506-48.

¹⁰ The reasons for the lack of formal royal approval were often debated. It is more than likely that its partisan position in favor of lesser nobles, whose spokesman Werbőczy had been for long time, made the king's aristocratic counselor veto it, see Martyn Rady, "Stephen Werbőczy and his Tripartitum," above and also in Stephen Werbőczy, The Customary Law of the Renowned Kingdom of Hungary in Three Parts &c. János M. Bak, Péter Banyó and Martyn Rady eds. with an introductory essay by László Péter (Idyllwild–Budapest: Schlacks–Dept.. of Med. St CEU, 2005) [the printed version of the present publication, henceforth DRMH 5] xxvii–xliv.

Lest this work, having been completed after so much study and so much labor, and having been confirmed by the full strength of royal power (lacking only the attachment of the seal) molder in obscurity; and lest recollection of these matters be gradually effaced and fade to nothingness –for certainly nothing could be worse for this country and nothing more pernicious, especially in cases to be decided and in justice to be done – I arranged that these same customs and municipal laws be published unchanged in their sense and order, in the earlier form and arrangement as they had been written, and, so that they be available more widely and to more people, be printed by the skill of typesetters.¹¹

But I hope that whoever should take this [fruit of many] nights' work of mine in his hands may judge me fairly and be kindly disposed. For as much as my modest talents allow, I have made the greatest effort to search out this material and explain it. But I admit my meagre learning and my insufficiently polished style. Therefore, should anyone correct a mistake in my work or add something that has been left out, far from being angry or offended, I will be most deeply grateful to him (whoever he may be). For it is natural for human beings to err and to be led astray time and again; and it is less surprising to find that some things have been forgotten than that all has been remembered.

Farewell!

Wladislas by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria; Duke of Silesia and Luxemburg; and Margrave of Moravia and Lusatia, in perpetual memory.¹²

When the Supreme Maker of all things first of all founded and engendered rational creation, He willed that there should be such variety and distinction in the human race that part of humanity would be below and part above, that some should command and others obey. Indeed, he set up some as kings and princes to command the rest with just law, and others to receive their orders and commands. And in this twofold ordering, the whole of the human race is most wisely divided.

He willed, furthermore, that kings themselves be above all equipped and supplied with two means: namely, laws and arms;¹³ arms to drive off the enemy and keep them far from the borders, and laws to hold the inhabitants and citizens to their duties at home, and to compel the greatest to live in justice with the least and middling, and the rich and more powerful with the poorer and weaker. For these two means are so necessary to every ruler that, once removed, nothing can be steadfast, nothing stable, nothing harmonious or peaceful between men. On the other hand, if kept together and bound by the strongest links and unbreakable bonds, they can never be separated or broken.

¹¹ The Tripartitum was first printed in the workshop of Johannes Singrenius in Vienna in 1517. Singriener was one of most important publishers of his time, more than 600 books left his press between 1510 and 1562, lead by his son after his death in 1545.

¹² The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.. In this case, Wladislas’s own style as king of Bohemia etc. is added.

For who is not aware that nothing can be achieved by force of arms abroad when dishonest and unjust rather than goodly citizens prosper at home, and when it is vain to invoke the law and the courts since fear of the enemy sounds around the ears of inhabitants and citizens? So we, having been raised by divine will and providence to this lofty throne and appointed to lead so many lands and so many peoples [and] so many powerful and warlike nations and empires, have from the beginning of our reign always directed and devoted all our cares, plans, efforts, endeavors, and all our thoughts and counsels to that end that by these two arts we may preserve our subjects in peace and tranquility. For we have kept them safe from the enemy by arms (insofar as we were able) and in the administration of justice nothing has been omitted that a just and conscientious careful prince should provide.

And after we obtained by divine providence the scepter and governance of this renowned kingdom of Hungary and were crowned with its holy diadem,¹⁴ and once after warlike endeavor we had freed the country as much from the fear of enemy threats as from insurrections at home, our first and especial care was that we should render the kingdom and our subjects more secure and stable by peace at home and through laws.

Therefore, both at that time and later, out of a most careful concern for the security, tranquility and liberty of this our realm, we issued more than once various constitutions and statutes, some on our own initiative, others at the pleas and petitions of our faithful lords prelate, barons, and other notables and nobles, not because the country had lacked laws in the past, but because these were not contained in written form and they were rather called customs.

But because great problems often arose from the different interpretations of these constitutions issued by us and those [other] laws of the realm, with everyone choosing a meaning and interpretation at their own pleasure; and in judging or seeking judgment, some people followed and asserted custom of the realm, while others followed and asserted the wording of constitutions: so that not only between those whose cases were pleaded but also among the judges themselves and those most learned and expert in the laws of the realm, a great argument often arose over the interpretation of these same laws and customs: so it was that sometimes those who trusted more in strength and power than in laws and justice, rushing to the bench with a large gang of their men, were eager to obtain by shouting and numbers what they could not obtain by reason and laws, and that those who should have lost in law sought to win, not by law, however, but by tumult and force of numbers.

¹³ The equivalence of law and arms derives from Justinian's decree Imperatoriam: see the frontal to the Institutiones in the Corpus Iuris Civilis vol. 1, eds. Theodor Mommsen and Paul Krueger (Berlin: Wiedmann, 1934) [henceforth: Institutes].

¹⁴ The Hungarian crown, an insigne from the twelfth century, was regarded as that of the founding king St. Stephen and referred as "holy" ever since the mid-thirteenth century. From the extensive literature about it, see e.g., László Péter, "The Holy Crown of Hungary, Visible and Invisible." Slavonic and East European Review 81 (2003): 448-80.

Indeed, such people disregarded the authority of the judges and master protonotaries, who cited the laws of the realm. For, as the laws themselves lacked the support of the power of writing, whatsoever of the law or custom was brought to the fore, they most shamefully confused all the rationality of judgments either by dragging in a contrary opinion or by asserting that it was otherwise opined and understood by other judges in other cases.¹⁵ Thus it frequently happened that in one case someone previously had won and in a same or similar circumstance another lost and was defeated.

Then, when everything was full and overflowing with these and other errors of this type, and so many diverse and manifold interpretations of the constitutions and customs of the realm opened so wide a road to frivolous prosecutors, and the minds of the judges no less than the pleaders were turned into such a great darkness, we, to whom nothing is more important or welcome than the maintenance of our subjects in perfect peace and tranquility, moved also by the entreaties and continued complaints of our aforementioned faithful, [entrusted]¹⁶ our faithful and distinguished Master Stephen Werbóczy, protonotary of the judge of our court, to collect into one all the rights, laws, customs and constitutions received and approved of this realm; that is to say, those within this our realm, and especially those that they are accustomed to follow and observe in our royal court in judging and deciding cases, and in passing sentences; and to divide (fittingly) into titles and chapters, so that after it has been offered to us and has been revised, discussed and carefully weighed by the rest of the master protonotaries and the sworn assessors of our court of justice, it may be put together in one volume. So that now our Hungarian people, like almost all other nations and provinces that are well and wisely established, may in deciding cases and administering justice lean not only upon custom, which often changes and is inclined to slipperiness, but also upon laws written and illuminated in most faithful written records.

Finally, after we had convened in the present assembly and general gathering of all the same prelates, barons and nobles of this realm, called for the same urgent matters on the feast of blessed Luke the Evangelist last past,¹⁷ all of these same prelates, barons and nobles who appeared in our presence presented to us the same book containing the rights of the country and its communities, and their old and received laws and customs, collected and recorded by the aforementioned Master Stephen at our command; requesting that, as they recognized it in all of its clauses, articles and chapters to be written in good order and in appropriate manner on their laws and approved customs, [and] having had it read through, revised, discussed and examined by the venerable Paul Várdai, prior of St. Sigismund, the administrator of our royal revenues,¹⁸ and the magnificus vir Benedict Batthyáni, castellan of this our castle of Buda,¹⁹ as well as the

¹⁵ The complaint here suggests, however, some recognition of the role of case-law in Hungarian jurisprudence.

¹⁶ An appropriate verb is missing in the Latin original.

¹⁷ 18 October 1514.

¹⁸ Paul Várdai was chief royal treasurer, 1517–19.

¹⁹ Benedict Batthyány was castellan of Buda, 1511–1525.

distinguished masters John Ellyevölgyi, protonotary of the court of the palatine,²⁰ and Albert Bellyéni²¹, and Paul Bolyári²², those of our personal presence; likewise, Stephen Gibárti Keserű, vice-palatine of this our kingdom of Hungary,²³ George Mekksei our secretary,²⁴ Michael Szobi and Paul Dombói²⁵, sworn assessors of our said judicial bench, and Stephen Hencelfi of Petrović, director of our royal lawsuits;²⁶ we therefore deemed this book fitting, and all contained therein in its clauses, notions, chapters and articles to be issued in the form of our privileges and to be strengthened and confirmed as valid perpetual laws and customs for them and their heirs and successors, by our royal authority and by the fullness of our royal power. The same book follows in these words:

To the most serene prince and lord Lord Wladislas by the grace of God king of Hungary and of Bohemia etc., to his most merciful lord, Master Stephen Werbőczy, protonotary of the judge of the court of Your Highness, humbly commends his services.

It might seem that editing the rights of the country and people of this renowned kingdom of Hungary in a definite sequence, format, and order, and to display them as a written document is an arduous and very difficult task, one almost beyond human ability. Especially because there has never been anything of this sort among our people that has either been intended to last, or made constant by sanction or confirmed by immemorial practice and observance. Rather, new constitutions and edicts were issued by each prince and king at his whim and will, not merely at different times but within the space of a very few years. And these so often differ from and indeed contradict each other head-on that they can hardly come together and merge into one body, as it were. Moreover, it seems to surpass human capacity and faculty to remember all that emerges in court cases and judicial proceedings.

These being so, yet wishing to fulfill Your Majesty's biddings, which not to obey in all respects I have ever considered a sin, I have not shrunk from shouldering a burden I am unequal to. While ²⁰ John Ellyevölgyi was protonotary of the court of the palatine, March 1504-May 1525.

²¹ Albert Bellyén was protonotary of the court of the personal presence from March 1513 to December 1521.

²² Paul Bolyári was protonotary of the court of the personal presence, 1514-1520.

²³ Stephen Gibárti Keserű was vice-palatine, 1505-18.

²⁴ George Mekksei was a secretarius, 1514-26.

²⁵ Michael Szobi and Paul Dombói were sworn assessors representing the nobility in the royal judicature, based on the law of 1498: 2. Szobi was the master and father-in-law of Werbőczy, whom he adopted as son and heir and was proscribed together with him at the diet of 1526; see Rady, "Stephen Werbőczy" in DRMH 5, xxx; András Kubinyi, "István Werbőczy als Politiker vor Mohács (1526)," in Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők (eds), ...The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandered Full Many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak (Budapest and New York: CEU Press, 1999), 558–82 being conscious of my feebleness (so much so that, not claiming any special diligence or erudition, I would admit that I am to be classed the least among my peers and those learned in the same profession) but under Your Majesty's most supportive guidance and felicitous auspices, I shall undertake this task, never heard of before in this country and, to our great shame and even greater loss, neglected over so many centuries, namely: to join and meld together the statutes, decrees, laws, and customs of the realm, which so far have been scattered, mutilated, confused, and inconsistent, and, once put down in writing, to present them with the greatest respect to Your Majesty in order to promulgate them for common use.

²⁶ Stephen Hencelfi was director of royal lawsuits, 1505-15.

There is nothing that Your Majesty could have demanded from me for his greater glory, nor anything I could have taken on with more enthusiasm. For what is more becoming to a king's majesty and more useful for the peace and tranquility of his subjects than—once the wars and clash of arms that drive away fear of the enemy are over—to cultivate peace? And that cannot remain firm and constant unless founded on the rule of law. For it is clear that internal discord causes more harm than foreign wars, and many more powerful polities have been destroyed by poison at home than by enemy arms.

It seemed to me fitting and in accordance with Your Majesty's will, to set down all the customs, laws, and decrees of the realm clearly and plainly, in a straightforward style that any person can understand, dividing it into chapters, titles, and articles, so that from now on the rudiments of the law of our realm should not be taken from those ancient fables with which we have hitherto only wasted time by issuing this law and that, but instead from the hall and sacristy of letters and from the fount of civilian learning, so that they will remain more deeply stamped and better anchored in the minds of all.

And this attempt will (in my opinion) be all the better for our entire prosperity in the future inasmuch as our ancestors seem to have been averse to arrangements of this type. From the earliest days of our nascent realm, our people were given over to warlike pursuits and had little care for other concerns.

For the Hungarians descend and originate from the Scythian peoples, who left their native land and settled in upper Pannonia (which embraces both sides of the Danube) and under the leadership of Attila extended the bounds of their empire far and wide, carrying their victorious arms deep into Germany, Italy, and Spain.²⁷ Eventually, by the command of the holy king

²⁷ For the "prehistory" of the Hungarians and their descent from Attila, Werbőczy relied on the Chronica Hungarorum of John Thuróczi (printed in Brno and Augsburg, 1488), which contained texts from several medieval chronicles. In 1: 3 [1-4], Werbőczy quotes extensive passages from it. The idea of Scythian ancestry was a favorite of Werbőczy; he elaborated on it in several earlier writings and speeches, see, e.g. András Kubinyi, "Az 1505. évi rákosi országgyűlés és a szittyia ideológia" [The diet of 1505 at Rákos and the Scythian ideology], Századok 140 (2006), 3316-74. Cf. also Gábor Klaniczay, "The Myth of Scythian Origin and the Cult of Attila in the Nineteenth Century" in Multiple Antiquities - Multiple Modernities:

Stephen,²⁸ as if a light from heaven, they, having dropped superstition and completely rejected paganism, accepted the doctrines of Catholic faith.

Thereafter no country or people (I say ungrudgingly) guarded more determinedly or more constantly the protection and expansion of the Christian commonwealth than the Hungarians. Being well trained through many hard-fought battles against the barbarous Mohammedan pest, they have for more than a hundred and forty years (not counting earlier times)²⁹ time and time again in attack and counterattack waged to their enormous credit the most the most bloody wars against the savage Turks. They kept the rest of Christendom safe and unharmed at the cost of their blood, life and wounds (lest the enemy's rage flood further as across broken levees), with such courage and natural vigor that they virtually lived under arms.

Not engaged in commercial or vulgar matters, nobility was defined by fighting. Hence it came that little time or leisure remained to them for framing the laws with special care or reviewing them at length before promulgation.

But now thanks to Your Majesty's especial care and providence I foresee that we shall soon appear not to be inferior to any other nation in this repute either. For you, indeed best and most Christian king, just as you stand above all by the loftiness of your throne so are you rich in extraordinary, almost heavenly virtue, which is greatly illuminated by the observance of religion and devotion to the true God. Thus, none of your acts nor your thoughts lack heavenly inspiration. And this is most rightly so, for we are just if we always keep in mind and observe the piety by which we devotedly adore God. I believe that human justice, unless it comes from the divine (which is piety), is the greatest injustice.³⁰

For I am delighted by the saying of Cyprian, the most glorious martyr: "The king's justice", he said, "is the peace of peoples, the shield of the homeland, the defense of the people, the protection of the common folk, the succor of the weak, the joy of men, the temperance of the climate, the

Ancient Histories in Nineteenth Century European Cultures, Gábor Klaniczay, Michael Werner, and Ottó Gecser, eds. (Frankfurt–New York: Campus, 2001) 185-212:

²⁸ (St) Stephen I, grand duke 997-1000, and king of Hungary 1000-1038.

²⁹ Hungarian-Ottoman warfare started in the 1370s, but became a central issue for the country after the Battle of Kosovo in 1389; see Pál Engel, The Realm of Stephen: A History of Medieval Hungary 895-1526, transl. Tamás Pálosfalvi, ed. Andrew Ayton (London-New York: I.B.Tauris, 2001) [henceforth: Engel, Realm], pp. 202-4, 231-43 and Ferenc Szakály, "Phases of Turco-Hungarian Warfare before the battle of Mohács (1365-1526)" Acta Orientalia Acad. Sc Hung. 33 (1979): 65--111. The topos of Hungary as a shield or bulwark of Christendom went back into the twelfth century and was important part of the political rhetoric especially in international affairs. It has been "accepted" and broadcast in a letter of Pope Pius II of 1459.

³⁰ This is straightforwardly Virgilian: that true pietas constitutes submission to the numen.

tranquility of the sea, the fertility of the land, the consolation of the poor, the heritage of sons, and for [the king] himself the hope of future bliss.”³¹

That justice is, however, acquired not by nature but by learning, namely that learning which is afforded us by the science of law and ius, which, as Euripides said, is more admirable than the evening and the morning star.³² This virtue, I say, is the sole mistress of them all and the queen of virtues and the foundation of eternal reputation and fame.

Therefore, when Agislaus was asked whether bravery or justice was better, he said: “We would need no bravery if all were just.”³³ For it is in the nature of all human affairs that they never remain constant but always fluctuate and waver. How fickle, how changing, how treacherous is indeed this Fortune? It can be learned from the empires of the Assyrians, the Medes, the Persians, the Macedonians and the Romans. Justice alone is true to itself, is not subject to change, but is always the same, bearing with it an extraordinary constancy.

Therefore, I give and offer great and eternal thanks to Your Majesty in the name of all of your subjects for having wished to strengthen the edifice of this renowned realm by the power of laws and constitutions so that neither the malice of fortune nor the outrageous deeds of men may shake it.

For who does not know that laws were invented for the salvation and the happy and peaceful life on men? Without them neither house, nor city, nor people, nor the entire human race, nor natural things, not even the world itself, could stand.

It is not clear enough who first invented them. The Hebrews maintain that it was Moses, the Athenians that Kekrops and Solon, the Argotans that Phoreus, the Cretans that Minos and Rhadamantos, the Lacaedemonians that Lykurgos, the Egyptians that Trismegistos and the Persians that Zoroaster.³⁴

But whoever it was, he gave humanity a gift of which nothing greater nor more beneficial can honestly be asked of the heavenly divinity. For laws are the leaders and governors of all human

³¹ Pseudo-Cyprian, De duodecim abusivis saeculi, cap.9 (Rex iniquus)

³² In the Prologue (I.[2]), Werbőczy attributes this reference to Aristotle and Hesiod, although his knowledge of these texts is most likely to have been mediated by Pelbartus of Temesvár, Sermones Pomerii, Pars Estivalis, no 91 (Hagenau, 1500, and many other editions).

³³ Plutarch, Agisilaus 23.

³⁴ These names of primary law-givers were commonplace throughout Antiquity and the Middle Ages; cf. e.g. Isidore of Seville, Etymologiae. 5.1.

life: they are all based on fairness, prudence and finally on the deepest wisdom; they have all been devised for ruling, governing and defending the human race; they were all invented for the leading of a good and blissful life.

Therefore, no empire, no polity can stand for long without laws. For empires are won by arms but the gains are sustained by law. Laws are the foundations and walls of the city; in them are contained the prosperity of the good and the purposes of peace. That we stand, walk, sleep, and that we live a safe life: all that is to be ascribed to the protection of ius and law.

If they were abolished, good men would either have no place in the city or would be exposed to the most evil injuries all the time. For, according to St Augustine, justice being taken away, what are kingdoms but great robberies?³⁵

It is the laws that protect us from danger and spite, keep assassins at bay, and give distance to footpads and to the danger of snares. Finally, they keep us in complete repose and full tranquility.

Therefore nothing could have been more worthy of ineffable excellence or more suitable for attaining eternal glory, nor anything more appropriate for consolidating indissoluble ties of concord between Your Majesty's most flourishing kingdoms, than that the laws and decrees of this realm, hitherto covered by the densest darkness and obscurity, as much as they are illuminated by the light of writing under the guidance and authority of Your Majesty, be made public through your worthiness.

As soon as your majesty deigned to entrust me with this duty, although, frankly speaking, I applied all effort, diligence and skill in order, as far as was able, fully to obey your majesty, I knew that there would nonetheless be plenty of those who, inflamed by the fire of envy, would not cease disparaging such a great work, even though useful for all. For it is the habit of raging envy to direct the most bilious and frenzied attacks against what is more excellent and worthy of higher praise.

But I fully trust that Your Majesty will rescue me from the terrible fangs of that monster, and I too, shielded, as it were, by you, will undauntedly sustain or blunt the darts shot at me by these slanderers.

I shall regard myself as more than satisfactorily and amply rewarded for this assiduous work when I am seen as having been in respect of it both of service to the fatherland, the great love of which is borne in the heart of every patriot, and as obedient to Your Majesty, to whom I have submitted and devoted myself for ever, as I only could. I beg and beseech you time and again not to feel it a burden to read and re-read, review and examine this fruit of my vigils, dedicated to your most sacred name.

³⁵ St Augustine, De civitate Dei, IV, 4.

And since it is the fate of human efforts that nothing can be as refined and perfect that it cannot be improved upon, please correct and emend with your most exacting criticism everything that according to your most precise accuracy of judgment needs to be dropped, changed, or added, so that nothing remains which rivals or enemies may disparage.

No one should give himself to believe that I would have taken such liberty as to dare to make or add any new law; I have merely collected and arranged into one volume, as it were, what I have received from my predecessors and what I saw, heard, and learned as followed in the courts and in discussing cases, having previously consulted with several of my colleagues, well versed in the laws and customs of this country.

This work I now offer and dedicate to Your Majesty and humbly beseech that you deign to receive my labors with a cheerful face and, if they deserve, grant them your sacrosanct authority and promulgate them to all under your command for observance.

May Your Majesty weigh the intention of my mind rather than the smallness of the offer. For this modest offering comes from the workshop of obedience and sincerity. And in the future, I will seek with all effort, care and diligence, as far as my ability allows, that my service be of genuine use to Your Majesty. Will and devotion will certainly not be wanting. Long live Your Majesty, illustrious king, in great happiness!

While about to describe the laws and approved customs of the renowned kingdom of Hungary I thought to preface it with some important subjects regarding the present matter.³⁶ First, about justice. Secondly, about *ius*³⁷ and its division. Thirdly, about law and the kinds of laws.

³⁶ On the Prologue's legal and philosophical background, see now Martyn Rady "The Prologue to Werbőczy's Tripartitum and its Sources," The English Historical Review 121 (2006, no 2): 1-42. In the following, only general references are given to Werbőczy's sources. Where passages derive directly from Justinian's Institutes and Digest, we respectively rely here on the published translations of Peter Birks and Grant McLeod (London: Duckworth, 1987) and of Alan Watson (2 vols, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985).

³⁷ The translation of ius and lex in the Tripartitum is a tricky issue. We have translated ius and lex in many cases equally as "law," since, for example, ius naturale (verbatim: "natural right") is usually rendered as "natural law" in English. Some translators of Roman legal texts simply retain the Latin words, but we wished to limit that to a minimum, without going into the rather complicated issue of jurisprudence lying behind these words. When retaining ius in some chapters, we also took into account that the word, in its "vernacularized" form, juss (pronounced 'yush'), referring to someone's

Fourthly, about custom and its conditions. Fifthly and finally, about the characteristics of the good judge and other matters pertaining to a just judgment, adding the question: whether a judge ought to adjudicate as best he knows on the basis of what has been asserted and proven, or according to what he knows. Having briefly dealt with these things, I will begin my project with the help of the God of glory and treat in sequence the local laws and approved customs of the same kingdom of Hungary which we commonly apply in the courts (as far as my memory and limited ability allow)

[PROLOGUE]

[CHAPTER ONE]

Justice: its definition and division

Justice is an unswerving and perpetual determination to acknowledge every man's rights.³⁸ And this always not only as to deeds but also as regards intentions.³⁹ Because justice is a state of the soul and an intention of the mind, by which someone is regarded as just; that is when someone wishes, as far as he is able, to render everyone his due, without preference or distinction of persons.

[1] Then, justice is that condition of goodness which grants everyone their deserts: devotion to God; obedience to parents; deference to superiors; friendship to peers; discipline to inferiors; purity to the self; and compassionate works to the poor and the downtrodden.

[2] Then, in other words, justice is a spiritual quality which (for the service of the commonweal) grants to each his dignity, and so it is a congruent disposition of the soul which judges every case correctly.⁴⁰ For, according to the blessed Gregory's testimony,⁴¹ the highest good in human affairs is to cherish justice and serve to each his rights. For where there is justice, there is also the harmony of all other virtues. As Jerome said, every kind of virtue is included in the single name of justice. It is also proved by this little epigram of Hesiod: "Justice contains all the virtues in itself." This most glorious virtue makes the eyes of mortals outshine, as Aristotle says, both the evening and the morning stars.⁴²

[3] And justice is of two kinds: namely natural and legal. The natural one is that steady and enduring will that (as mentioned before) renders unto everyone his right. And without it no one can right to a property or a "liberty," was a crucial term in Hungarian legal discourse into modern times.

³⁸ Cf. SL Die Summa Legum brevis, levis et utilis des sogennanten Doctor Raymundus von Wiener-Neustadt, (ed.) Alexander Gál, 2 vols, Weimar, Hermann Böhlau Nachfolger, 1926 [henceforth: SL], 1.2; Justinian Institutes 1.1. The phrase suum cuique tribuendo ultimately derives from Cicero, De legibus, 1.5.

³⁹ Cf. Azo, Summa Aurea super Codice et Institutis, (Lyon: Fradin, 1557) [reprinted Frankfurt/M.: Minerva, 1989], De iustitia et iure, no 1.

⁴⁰ Accursius, Glossa Ordinaria ad Digestum Vetus, (Venice: Jenson, 1478) 1.1.10 iustitia.

⁴¹ The remainder of this titulus borrows extensively from the sermon literature of Pelbartus of Temesvár (see n. 30, above).

⁴² We apologize for having failed to identify these two references.

partake in the kingdom of God. The legal one is called law which changes frequently and without which neither peoples, nor kingdoms can exist for long.⁴³ Therefore, the justness of something is to be understood in two ways: in one sense, by the nature of the thing itself, called natural law; in another sense, by some convention among people, called positive law.

[CHAPTER TWO]

Ius and its divisions

Ius as far as it concerns our purpose, is the good and the just that follows from justice.⁴⁴ And for our purpose, this applies to our customs, whether written or unwritten.

[1] Hence, ius is the general name and a law is an aspect of ius. For every ius consists of laws and customs, that is, the written and unwritten law.⁴⁵ For in terms of Cicero's definition, the law is the art or knowledge of goodness and fairness,⁴⁶ and because of this we [jurists] are deservedly called priests, that is those who administer the sacred laws and to each his rights.

In other words, ius is called the collection of legitimate commands that incline us to observe what is good and fair, and which is useful and equitable or true, namely justice.

[3] The law is, thus, of two kinds: the one is public law, the other private. Public is the one which refers primarily to the rule and government of kingdoms, as well as the commonweal, matters sacred, the clergy and the magistrates.⁴⁷ Therefore, whoever causes harm to the clergy, to things sacred or to magistrates—that is, to the governors of the people—can be accused by anyone of a public crime. The private is separate law, which pertains to the benefit of particular persons. And this latter is of three kinds: namely, natural law, the law of nations, and civil law.⁴⁸ [4]

Natural law is common to all peoples, because it exists everywhere by virtue of natural instincts and not by any establishment, and as nature has taught to all animals. And it belongs not only to humankind, but also to every animal. From this come the union of man and woman, the begetting and upbringing of children, the same liberty for all and the capacity to acquire what is in the sky, on the land and in the sea. Then: to return things from safe-keeping or money lent, and to repel with force a neighbor's violence. Because these or similar acts, are never regarded as unjust, but natural and fair.⁴⁹

⁴³ Cf. SL 1.2.

⁴⁴ Cf. Azo, Summa in primum librum Institutionum, De iustitia et iure, no 3.

⁴⁵ Cf. SL, 1.5; Gratian, Decretum in Corpus Iuris Canonici, vol 1, ed. Emil Richter and Emil Friedrich, (Leipzig: Tauchnitz, 1871) [henceforth: D] 1.c.2; Institutes, 1.2.3.

⁴⁶ The expression ius est ars boni et æqui is commonly associated with the second-century Roman lawyer, Iuventius Celsius, and not with Cicero: see Tony Honoré, Tribonian (London: Duckworth, 1978), p. 30.

⁴⁷ Cf. SL 1, 3; Gratian D 1. C. 11.

⁴⁸ Cf. Azo, Summa in primum librum Institutionum, De iustitia et iure, no 12; SL, 1.3

⁴⁹ Cf. SL 1, 3; Gratian D 1. C. 7.

[5] Then, by natural law we mean what is contained in the law of Moses and in the Gospels which command that one should do to others what one wishes done to oneself and which forbid doing to others what one would not like done to oneself.⁵⁰ Hence the verse: “What you wish to happen to you, do to me; what not, avoid! Thus you shall live on earth by the law of the polis.”⁵¹

[6] Thus, natural law can be considered in two ways. In one way, man has a rational nature, which he shares with the divine; and thus, the natural law that belongs to man is called divine law. In another way, if one considers the sensual nature of man which he shares with other animals in regard to the senses, motion and instinct, then, in this respect, the law that belongs to man is called natural law.

[7] The law of nations is of two kinds, namely, primeval and secondary. The primeval law of nations is what all peoples have applied since the beginning of time and what was created by natural wisdom, without any establishment by the people, such as not to hurt anyone, and so on. And that is no different from natural law, except in the way it is perceived. For it is called both natural law and the law of nations, but from different perspectives: natural, insofar as it emanates from natural reason; and of the law of nations, because the peoples have applied it without any specific establishment since the beginning of the world. And by this law, a slave has a free status, because according to natural law all men are born free.⁵²

[8] The secondary law of nations is the law that peoples have introduced not by natural reason but by reason of the public good and for common use. And it is oftentimes different from natural law. For by natural law everything was common and everyone free; but by the law of nations the division of land and the separation of property was invented which brought about war, captivity, slavery and other such things, contrary to natural law. This law of the nations brought about almost all contracts, such as buying, selling, lease and similar things.⁵³

[9] Civil law is what each people or city created for itself for divine or human purposes. And it is called civil law, as if it were the specific law of the city,⁵⁴ which may be understood in three ways. First, in general; as it is universally observed in every city. Secondly, in particular; because it is created by each people or city for itself, and for divine and human purposes. Thirdly, and especially; as the special law of the Romans, which is also called imperial law. Because, when the name of this or that city is not mentioned, the law of the Romans is especially meant, just as among the Greeks the word “poet” implied Homer and among the Romans Virgil. And if Holy Scripture mentions an apostle without any other name, it is understood to be Saint Paul.

[CHAPTER THREE]

The differences between natural law, the law of nations and civil law

⁵⁰ Cf. Gratian, D.1 ante c.1.

⁵¹ Distychon in the original.

⁵² Cf. Institutes, 1.2.2.

⁵³ Cf. SL 1.3; Institutes 1.2.3; Gratian D.1.c.9

⁵⁴ Cf. SL, 1.3; Gratian, D.1 c.8.

It has to be known that natural law differs from other laws in three respects. First by origin: since it originated at the start of nature's creation.. Secondly by its eminence: since natural law is observed equally by all peoples; established alone by God, it is fixed and unchanged, while other laws, enacted by a people or a city, frequently change, either because opposite customs emerge or other, better and contrasting laws, are enacted and introduced. Thirdly, in its extent: because according to natural law everything is common, but by the law of nations or by civil law what is mine is mine and what is yours is yours.⁵⁵

[1] Further, all people who use and are governed by laws and rules use partly their own law, partly the law which is common to every human.⁵⁶ For those who do not have a general law, only their own, created for themselves, they call civil law. And the law which all people have in common is called the law of nations.

[CHAPTER FOUR]

About military law and jurisprudence

Military law means the formal declaration of war, of making alliances and, on a given sign, of engaging the enemy. Then, keeping military discipline (that is the punishment of those who break it). Then, the mode of payment, the system of ranks, the honoring with decorations such as the grant of a wreath or torque. Then, the decision over the booty and its just division, according to the quality and achievement of each man, and the share belonging to the prince.⁵⁷

[1] Jurisprudence entails knowledge of God and man, and mastery of the difference between justice and injustice; namely, knowledge of the just in order to do it, and of the unjust in order to avoid it.⁵⁸

[2] It is insufficient to know what is just or unjust, unless one also recognizes matters contrary and actual; in consideration of which, laws should be established in a diverse fashion, in accordance with the diversity of situations.

[CHAPTER FIVE]

There are differences between justice, law, and jurisprudence

There are differences between justice, law and jurisprudence.

⁵⁵ Cf. SL 1.3; Gratian D. 5 ante c 1, ibid 8. C. 1.

⁵⁶ Cf. SL 1.3; Institutes 1.2.1.

⁵⁷ Cf. Gratian D 1.c.10.

⁵⁸ Cf. SL 1.2; Institutes 1.1.1.

[1] For justice is a virtue, namely a moral one. Law is what implements this virtue. Jurisprudence is the knowledge of this law.

[2] Then, justice is the highest good among virtues, the law is the middling, and jurisprudence is the least. Then, justice renders everyone his right; law promotes this; and jurisprudence instructs how to do this.⁵⁹

[CHAPTER SIX]

About the definitions of law and its characteristics

As was said above, all ius consists of either laws or customs, that is, of the written or unwritten law; it must be known in short about the written law, namely the human law, that it can be described in a number of ways. [1] First, it is the establishment of the people, something decided together by the greater born and the common people.⁶⁰ But this definition does not suit our purpose, because all powers of jurisdiction and lawmaking, which rested once in the people, now belong to our prince, as will be stated more clearly below.

[2] In other words, law is the sanction that commands honest and forbids dishonest and contrary things.⁶¹

[3] Or otherwise: it is right reason following from equity which orders the honest and stands against the dishonest.⁶²

[4] Then, according to Papinian and Demosthenes: law is an invention of men, a gift of God, a teaching of the sages, a corrector of violent misdeeds, the common agreement of the polis, and the banisher of crime. From this definition it is clear that law was a human invention.⁶³

[5] Because once mankind had multiplied and sins had spread, kingdoms were turned into tyranny, and it became necessary to found laws. You will find explained above who first created laws.⁶⁴

[6] It has been said in the definition that law is a gift of God. For according to John Chrysostom, the law of God is the only lawful way that bends neither right nor left. Therefore, people without laws who defy the words of God and the lessons of the laws are heading to the pit of damnation on diverse roads of error. However severe the laws, they are lame unless they bear the impression of divine law; because human laws have power only for as long as they do not deviate from the divine

⁵⁹ Cf. SL 1.2; Accursius G; ad Dig. 1.1.10, Notitia.

⁶⁰ Cf. Gratian D.2.c. 1.

⁶¹ Cf. SL 1.5; Azo, Summa in primum librum Iustinianum. De iustitia et iure no. 4; but ultimately Cicero, De legibus 1.6.

⁶² Cf. SL 1.5.

⁶³ Cf. Digest, 1.3.2.

⁶⁴ See above, in the dedication, "The Hebrews..."&c.

ones; as was proven by the sage who said: “By me kings reign and rulers decree what is right.”⁶⁵

[7] Therefore human laws must emanate from divine law. Because only that polity is well ordered which, while ruled by laws, is governed by divine law. No law can be valid which goes against divine law either by the assent of the people, or a long standing custom.

[8] The third characteristic of law, according to the aforesaid definition, is that it is the teaching of the sages. Whence it must be known that, just as princes should not punish the innocent, so they must not absolve the sinner and the criminal from punishment and chastisement; especially when someone commits a crime against the polity, because he who condones the godless and condemns the just is equally loathsome to God.

[9] The fourth characteristic of the law is that it be the chastiser of violent offenses. For laws are made to restrain human recklessness by fear and to protect the innocent among the evil.⁶⁶ For men would not be encouraged to keep the law if they did not dread the legal punishment imposed upon them by a public person.

[10] The fifth characteristic of the law is that it should be the orderer of the city. The city’s name actually derives from the unity of its citizens.⁶⁷ Therefore, the judges in this kingdom of ours should also apply every law for the commonweal of the polity. Now, just as one hopes from medicine what is good for the body, because that is why it is prescribed, so we cannot expect anything from the laws except what is beneficial for the community of the entire polity, because that is why they were established.

[11] The sixth characteristic is that law must be the banisher of crime. According to the Blessed Thomas Aquinas, human laws were made to restrain people from vices and to encourage them to virtues. For humans, by nature, possess a certain longing for virtue, but to fulfill the virtues it is necessary to impose on them some discipline, which is best done by the enforcement of the law. This is why the same Thomas also said that law is an ordinance of reason for the common good, enacted by those who have the care for the community; and the rule or measure of those actions is what should be done or shunned.⁶⁸

[12] Hence, a law must be just, honest, appropriate according to nature and according to the custom of the country, suitable to the times, necessary, and useful, and also clear, so that it should not include anything that could be twisted to an unforeseen purpose because of its obscurity (that is, that no one should be able to interpret it falsely. For if something is doubtful or obscure, it must be interpreted by whoever established it, so as not to ensnare anyone); it must be enacted for the common benefit of the citizens and not for someone’s private advantage.⁶⁹

⁶⁵ Prov. 8. 15.

⁶⁶ Cf. SL 1.; Gratian D. 4.c.1.

⁶⁷ Cf. SL 1.55.

⁶⁸ The Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas, 3 vols. (Ottawa, Institutus Studiorum Medievalis Ottavienis, 1941-5) [henceforth ST] I-II. 90.1, 90.4 and 95.1.

⁶⁹ Cf. SL 1. 7; Gratian D. 4.c.2.

[13] And all of these things must be considered, because once laws have been established, one cannot later depart in judgment from them but should judge according to them.⁷⁰

[CHAPTER SEVEN]

Why laws are made; and on the four functions of law

Because all laws are either divine or human; and the divine ones are from nature; while human ones originate in usages and customs, they differ therefore from one another because other people prefer other laws.⁷¹

[1] Fas is divine law, ius is human law. For it is allowed by fas to walk through someone's land, because the land and the fullness thereof are the Lord's; but it is not a ius, because it is forbidden by statute or custom.⁷²

[2] Hence a question arises: why are human laws made? The answer is: because fear of them restrains human recklessness and makes innocence safe among evildoers; and that dread of punishment tames the recklessness of these evildoers and their capacity to do harm.⁷³

[3] And the functions of law are of four kinds: for every law either permits or forbids or punishes or commands.⁷⁴ It permits that the brave and virtuous request reward. It forbids anyone from asking holy virgins to marry. It punishes murderers by beheading. But sometimes it commands that "You should love thy Lord, thy God."⁷⁵ [Hence the] verse: The virtues of law are contained in these four words: permits, punishes, commands and forbids.⁷⁶

[CHAPTER NINE]

On statutes and municipal law

Having presented the concept and the varieties of law, it is time to discuss statute. [1] The statute, which we commonly call a decretum, is a certain law common to a kingdom, having legal force. And we call it a "statute," because it is stable and it is firmly ordered, that is, it defines the public state. Statutes often fall into the purview of civil law.

⁷⁰ Cf. SL 1.9; Gratian D. 4. ante c. 3, but ultimately St. Augustine, De vera religione c. 31.

⁷¹ Cf. SL 1.5; Gratian D 1.c.1. ⁷²

Cf. Gratian D 1.c.1 and 8.c.1. ⁷³

Cf. SL 1.6; Gratian D. 4.c. 1. ⁷⁴

Cf. SL 1.6; Gratian D 3.c.4. ⁷⁵

Cf. Gratian D 3.c.4.

⁷⁶ Cf. Hostiensis, Summa Aurea (Lyon: Marchant, 1548), lib. ii, Tit. De constitutionibus no. 11; Digest 1.3.7.

[2] Whereby it must be considered that civil law is of two kinds. One is common, that is contained in the books of civil law and this one cannot be established except by the emperor or any other supreme ruler. The other is private law, which is also called municipal or by-law. And that law can be enacted at any time by any region, province or city.

[3] Municipal law is the positive law of a certain place. It is so called precisely because it is observed in that municipality (that is, town) and in that place. It is also called (as said above) a by-law.

[CHAPTER NINE]

Whether a statute that contradicts canon, natural or divine law has effect

But it seems necessary to ask whether a statute prevails over canon, natural or divine law. Reply that in regard to canon law, if the statute contradicts the ancient liberty of churches or the privileges granted them, it has no effect. The same is to be said of statutes pertaining to the salvation of the soul. In earthly matters, however, civil statutes put aside canon laws and overturn them.

[1] Regarding natural or divine law, statutes cannot overturn them altogether, but they can make distinctions; as, for example, divine law says without distinction, “thou shalt not kill”, but human law and statute permit killing in many cases. The same must be said about the tithe, which, according to divine law must be paid, but the pope exempts many people from rendering.

[2] We may, therefore, conclude that statute or law or ordinance cannot overturn natural or divine law entirely, since neither the pope, nor any one else may order that the Old or New Testament be not observed or children not be raised by their parents; but in some particular cases, a deed contrary to natural or divine law, such as killing a robber or the thief who comes in the night, can be done with just cause.

[CHAPTER TEN]

What custom is and what is necessary to affirm custom

Now custom has to be discussed. Whence it should be known that custom is a certain law, arising from practice, taken for law where law is deficient. It does not matter whether it is based on writing or on reason, since reason also supports laws. Moreover, if law is built upon reason, then everything that is built on reason is law; providing it agrees with religion, comports with order, and serves salvation. It is called custom, for it is, as it were, common practice and human use because it is in common use.⁷⁷

⁷⁷ Cf. SL, 1. 13; Gratian D 1.c.5. The word play with usus &c. could not be rescued in translation.

[1] But to be more clear: custom may (for our purpose) be defined thus: it is that certain ius, introduced through the practices of whomsoever can by public authority enact laws. Therefore custom also falls within the name of ius, and if a prince orders that one should judge according to ius, then a judge can pass judgment according to custom and the statutes of the place. Contrariwise: a common law falls within the name of custom. Thus, if someone makes mention of custom in his plaint, then a common law may be seen as meant.

[2] Any people can introduce a local custom. In order that custom be effective and hold force, a few things are necessary.

[3] First: it must be reasonable. It is reasonable when it aims and advances the goal of law. The goal of canon and divine law is the beatitude of the soul. The goal of civil law is the common weal. Therefore, if a custom aims at the beatitude of the soul, it is reasonable by canon and divine law; and if it opposes an eternal goal, it is unreasonable. According to civil law, a custom is reasonable if it aims at the common weal. And since in this regard there are no specific rules, say that a custom may be regarded as reasonable if it does not contradict natural law, the law of nations, or positive law.

[4] But since law is founded on reason it seems that no custom can be reasonable that contradicts law. Considering the different kinds of reason, it must be said that a custom may be reasonable even if it contradicts a reasonable law. Depending upon their different purposes, two opposites may be true at the same time, for example, to marry or not to marry.

[5] Secondly, custom must be prescriptive, i.e., it must last for an appropriate time and must receive force in the course of that time required for prescription. But this holds only for canon law and is not required even by that law unless it contradicts positive law. According to civil law, a decade, that is the passage of ten years, is sufficient for the introduction of a custom, even if it contradicts civil law. If, however, a custom contradicts canon law, then the space of forty years is required. Yet, if a custom is introduced in the absence of law, then, even in respect of canon law, a decade seems to be sufficient. The passage of ten years begins from the time the first act is performed by the people.

[6] What I have said concerning civil law, that ten years is sufficient overall, is limited to cases where custom is invoked in matters that are not reserved to the prince as the mark of his supreme power. For then a custom cannot be introduced except after so long a time that no one can recall when the custom started.

[7] Thirdly, according to the common opinion of the doctors, repetition of the act is needed. Say, however, that a repeated act is not in itself necessary for the establishment of a custom. But because the consent of the people cannot be deduced from one single act, the repetition of the act can be seen as the cause and custom as the effect. And it is necessary to have so many and such well known acts that it becomes in all likelihood known to most of the people, for it is not the act but the tacit consent of the people that establishes custom.⁷⁸ Thus, when the tacit consent of the people can be deduced, then the great recurrence of acts is unimportant. What is more, a custom can occasionally be introduced by a single act with a repeated cause lasting for as long as it takes to establish a custom; for example, a custom can be introduced if someone has a bridge on the public road or something of this kind.

⁷⁸ Cf. Bartolus, Repetitio ad Dig. Vet. 1.3.31 no. 10 in Bartolus, Commentaria, 3 vols. (Basel: Froeben, 1562)

[CHAPTER ELEVEN]

How law differs from custom; and on the threefold value of custom

And law differs from custom in three ways. First: as tacit and express.

[1] Second: as written and unwritten, though this is not an essential difference. For the law of the prince, even if unwritten, does not fail to be law. And if custom is put in writing, it still remains custom; for example: the Customs of Fiefs⁷⁹ which are writtendown.⁸⁰

[2] Third: as momentary and continual; because custom cannot be introduced in an instant. What is tacit progresses at a slower pace than what is expressly stated. Nor is that which emerges from inference as certain as that which is expressed. Therefore, custom cannot be introduced by the people at once, but only gradually.

[3] Custom has a threefold value. Namely, explanatory, as it is the best interpreter of the law; so when law is doubtful, we have to refer to the custom of the place, and if it is clear from that there is no need to deviate from the meaning given by custom.⁸¹ [4] Secondly, it has abrogatory value, because it supersedes law when it contradicts custom.

[5] Thirdly, it has substitutive value, because it replaces law where this is deficient.⁸²

[CHAPTER TWELVE]

What is to be held of contradictory law, statute and custom

Here the question arises: where a law, constitution or custom appear to contradict one another, which of them should be observed? Say this: if a law precedes a contrary custom that followed later, then the custom, if it is general, overrules the law in general and totally. If a custom is only local, it does not overrule a law in general, but only in that place where the custom is in force.⁸³ If, however, a custom precedes a contrary law that came after it, then the custom does not overrule the law; in fact, the later law abolishes that custom.

⁷⁹ The reference here is to the Lombard Liber Feudorum, compiled in the mid-twelfth century.

⁸⁰ Cf. Bartolus, Repetitio ad Infortiatum 28.5.2 no.1.

⁸¹ Cf. SL 1.14; Digest 1.3.37.

⁸² Hostiensis, Summa Aurea, lib. I, Tit. de consuetudine no 11.

⁸³ Cf. Bartolus, Repetitio ad Dig. Vet. 1.3.31 no.5 in Idem. Commentaria; Accursius, Gl ad Dig. Vet. 1.3.332.

[1] Canonists, however, hold the opposite, asserting that papal law, if it does not make mention of it, does not abolish the contrary custom of a certain place because the pope is not presumed to know contrary customs. From this, one can with reverse reasoning infer that, if a city or any community enacts a statute contrary to its own custom, then the custom is overturned, even if it makes no mention of it, because a city or a people is presumed to know its own custom. [2] Let me then establish two rules. The first is when custom precedes and a general law contrary to it follows, then it overturns the previous custom.⁸⁴ The second rule is: when law precedes and then a contrary custom follows, it overturns the previous law. And understand this (as I said above) only if the custom is general and introduced by a people who are able to introduce both laws and general customs. Because, if it is the particular custom of some place, it overrules the law only in that place.

[3] Where a case emerges that may be determined neither by written law nor by custom, but resembles partly written law, partly custom, many are in doubt as to which resemblance shall be followed and which shall be preferred. Considering all cases, say this: when a case seems to resemble custom only, then that shall be applied; if however it resembles law only, then that will be applied. If, however it is found to resemble both law and custom, then first one ought to examine which one it resembles more, and secondly, which one is more reasonable and more equitable. If there is equality in every respect, then, if we are in matters customary, the similarity to custom has to be applied. If we are in matters of written law, then the similarity to written law must be applied.

[CHAPTER THIRTEEN]

What a judge is, what a judgment, what a law-suit, what a plaintiff and an accused

But since judges, who by virtue of the jurisdiction belonging to them decide individual matters with the proper scrutiny of judgment, preside over the application of the law, it is not inappropriate to explain something about them. [1] Whence it should be known that a judge is called iudex meaning ius dicens, or meaning he who declares what ius is, that is: administers justice to the people. [2] Ius is the object of justice; therefore the judgment is, by its name, the determination of what is just and right in a law-suit that is brought before a judge.⁸⁵

[3] The term causa (lawsuit) comes from the word casus (case). For this is the issue and the origin of the matter set out before the inquiry of the trial; which, by the submissions joined, becomes a legal case; during the trial it is considered adjudication, and in its conclusion, justice. And here what is called justice means law. For law is said to be the state of ius; because a judgment does not make law by itself, but declares the state of the ius.

[4] However, all cases, which come to trial, require these persons: judge, plaintiff and accused. In business which is unclear, witnesses are necessarily also required. [5] The plaintiff acts as accuser, because he summons to the lawsuit. The accused (reus) is named after the thing (res) at issue, even if he does not regard himself as guilty. [6] Witnesses used to be called superstites, because they were summoned in the matter (super statu causæ).

⁸⁴ Cf. Bartolus, ibid.

⁸⁵ Cf. ST II-II, 60.1.

[7] Hence, people (as Aristotle said) turn to the judge as if to a kind of living justice.⁸⁶

[CHAPTER FOURTEEN]

What is needed for a judgment to be an act of justice. Also on jurisdiction, and on the office and attributes of the good judge

(According to Thomas) three things are needed for a judgment to be an act of justice. First, to come from an inclination to justice; secondly, from the authority and jurisdiction of the judge; thirdly, to be the outcome and result of the right reason of wisdom.⁸⁷

[1] Because if the judgment either contradicts the righteousness of justice, or comes from those who have no authority to pass judgment, or lacks wise consideration, it is regarded not as correct, but as a corrupt and illicit judgment.⁸⁸

[2] Jurisdiction is a power granted by public law, and gets its name from the terms ditio, power, and ius, as it were, the power of ius.

[3] The office of the judge is the relevant right granted to the same judge to carry out those things that he is held to do as a judge. The office of the judge relates to jurisdiction as a claim to obligation. As one obtains by claim what comes from obligation, so what is brought into effect through the office of judge comes from jurisdiction; and he puts it into action.

[4] The judge's primary duty is to try every issue maturely; in passing judgment he should not be thoughtless and hasty, lest his impetuosity be called the stepmother of justice. He should not favor one party over the other; nor should he be partial to any person, and he should perceive the fate of others as his own. Above all, he should be free from passions of the soul, so that no plea, hatred or love may move him. For a judge, even if passing a just sentence, is responsible to the court of conscience should he have acted more upon hatred than upon love of justice.

[5] The judge should be neither too cruel nor excessively merciful, but even-handed in judgment. In every judgment, mercy and virtue, that is: justice, are conjoined; even-handedness lies in their conjunction. Whence Gregory said: "Everyone who judges fairly, holds scales in his hands, and has justice and mercy in either pan of the scale; he judges the sins with justice and mitigates the punishment of sin with mercy; so that with just weighing he corrects some by even-handedness and allows others by mercy; he who always keeps in his eyes the judgment of God with fear and trepidation, dreads in every matter that he might fall by leaving the path of justice.”⁸⁹ For where justice exceeds its limits, it engenders the vice of cruelty; and too much mercy leads to the dissolution of order.

⁸⁶ Cf. ibid.

⁸⁷ Cf. ST, II-II. 60.2.

⁸⁸ Cf. ibid.

[6] Human judgment is usually perverted by four things. By fear, when we dare not speak the truth for fear of someone’s might. By greed, when we corrupt someone’s soul with gifts. By hatred, when we devise against any adversary of ours. By love, when we seek to favor a friend or relative. All these a judge should with all his might avoid and flee.

[CHAPTER FIFTEEN]

Whether the judge is held to pass judgment according to what is alleged and proven or according to what he knows

Now the question must be added whether the judge should pass judgment according to what is alleged and proven by the parties or according to what he knows and according to his conscience. For example: someone is accused with a capital or other crime, and the judge knows that he is innocent because he saw the crime committed by someone else; but the witnesses testify against him; knowing this, should he condemn the innocent? Say then that judgement belongs to the judge according to his function as a public power; hence, when he passes judgment he must do so not according to what he knows as a private person but according to what he has learned as a public person.

[1] He can learn this in two ways: either in general, namely through public, divine or human laws, which are not subject to test of proof; or, in particular, through records, witnesses and other lawful documents, which in judging he must follow more than what he knows as a private person. This is why Augustine said: “a good judge does nothing of his own will, but pronounces according to the laws and rights.”⁹⁰

[2] In this case, nevertheless, the judge must be very careful to support the party which he knows in his conscience to be true, lest he perish because of the defects of the witnesses and lawyers.

[3] If, however, it happens that during the trial such valid proofs are submitted which can neither be refuted nor challenged, then the judge has to strive with all his skill and effort to rescue the innocently condemned.

[4] If no way to do so can be found, he should seek a reason, by which, without causing scandal, someone else is assigned to the case; if that cannot be done, he should pass judgment according to what is alleged and proven. For the office of the judge is to work more for the common weal than for the individual; for as a judge he is a public person and according to the first book of Ethics the common good is more noble than the individual.⁹¹

⁸⁹ The passage derives in fact from the Sententiae of Isidore of Seville; J.P. Migne, Patrologiae cursus completus, Series Latina (Paris: Migne 1844-64) 83 col. 724

⁹⁰ Quoted in ST, II-II, 67.2 as from Augustine. In fact, the quotation comes from St. Ambrose.

[5] For, should a judge pass judgment in favor of an innocent man who had nevertheless been convicted in a trial, it would cause public disaster because people would be scandalized and the road would be open for the innocent to be oppressed and the guilty acquitted. For then, if a judge wished to punish an innocent person, he might say that in his knowledge he knew him to be guilty; and similarly, if he wished to absolve a criminal. Thus the way to judging badly would be open to unjust judges. I admit that there are some people who think otherwise, but this is the more common and balanced opinion.

[CHAPTER SIXTEEN]

The two kinds of a judge's knowledge: namely, factual and verbal

But because the theologians' firm opinion is that he who acts against what he knows, sins:

[1] It should be known that knowledge is of two kinds: namely, of what is real and of what is said. Thus a judge may act contrary to knowledge of what is real, that is the affairs or things done, but still not act contrary to the knowledge of what is said, that is the testimony. For it is one thing to know something simply and another to know something as a judge should.⁹²

[2] For the judge has a dual personality: a private and a public. It can thus happen that he knows something as a private person and that he does not know it as a public one; just as it is said to know something as God but not to know it as man, as the Gospel is our witness. No one knows the day and hour (namely of the Last Judgment), neither the angels of God, nor the Son, but the Father alone; and it must be understood that the Son does not know this as a man, but knows it as God. The same is true of the priest hearing confession, who, even when questioned as a witness, may say that he does not know what he heard during confession, because he does not know it as a witness. Likewise, the judge should fashion his knowledge [even] in those matters that concern his private person according to those things that can be known in a public trial.⁹³

[3] Let me add two things. First, that if someone is the highest judge, such as the pope, the emperor or anyone else who is not bound by law, then he should follow the truth. However, if he is a lower judge, then he is held to pass judgment according to what is alleged and proven even against what he knows; and then he does not sin, because he is bound so to do by the authority of the law.

[4] Secondly: if the judge presides at court and someone happens to commit a crime before him, he can immediately punish him, as if proven by witnesses. For it is better to prove something through the deed itself than through witnesses. But if he is not presiding at court then it is the opposite. Now if a judge saw from the window of the court-house or of his own house someone killing somebody else, and this homicide is not prosecuted, or prosecuted but not proven, and the judge wanted of his own will to put the killer to torture in order to elicit the truth by his confession, then he certainly could not do this. For the judge's knowledge in itself is not enough to put the accused to torture, because he does not know this as a judge but as a private person; moreover, his testimony could have no value in this case, because no one can be witness and judge in the same case. Therefore, he has to gather information from elsewhere, either witnesses or other documents, in order to torture the criminal.⁹⁴

⁹¹ Aristotle, Ethics I.2.

⁹² Cf. ST, II-II, 67.2.

⁹³ Cf. ibid.

[5] There is also doubt concerning the officers and executioners who know that witnesses have sworn falsely or that the judge has judged unjustly, but who are still forced by the judge to slay or otherwise punish the innocent. In this respect, the common opinion of the theologians is that if they know this for certain then they do not have to obey; but it is different if they are in doubt, because then they are excused by the merit of obedience. Similarly, according to St Thomas, they do not have to obey if the judgment contains a terrible mistake and wrong; otherwise the butchers who killed the martyrs could be excused. If, however, it does not embrace such a manifest injustice, then they do not sin by carrying it out, because it is not their duty to examine the judgment of their superior, nor is it they who cause the death of the innocent but the judge whom they serve.⁹⁵

⁹⁴ This is the only reference in the Tripartitum to the use of torture in extracting confession.

⁹⁵ Cf. ST, II-II. 64.6.

[PART ONE]

CHAPTER ONE

The three-part division of the laws and customs of the renowned kingdom of Hungary, in general

Having finished, with God's help, the noteworthy matters with which it seemed necessary to preface this modest work, it remains now to discuss in detail the customs of this renowned kingdom of Hungary.

[1] Since every customary rights that we use concerns either persons or things or actions, but as it is certain that all rights were established for the benefit of persons, it seems proper to start the treatment of the matter at hand with the law of persons, and then to discuss the other two parts of customary law (not always in a direct order, however, but sometimes in a reverse one, as is required by the nature and manner of business coming before the courts), so for this reason I thought it best to divide the present work into three parts.⁹⁶

[2] The first part of it treats upon matters concerning persons: namely, the ancient liberty of our nobility, and the acquisition, administration, division, sale, alienation, exchange, prescription, pledge and perambulation of boundaries of goods and property rights, the payment of the filial quarter and the dower, and the estimation of movable and immovable goods.

[3] The second part is about things⁹⁷ and the procedures to be followed in cases that are started and initiated regarding the aforementioned goods and property rights and other matters, as well as the executions and kinds of judgment to be passed in consequence.

[4] Finally, the third and last part of the work [treats upon] the rules and means of transferring and moving cases and legal actions by way of appeal into the royal court from all the counties of the kingdom, and also from Croatia, Slavonia, and Transylvania, and from the courts spiritual; then it will treat in proper order upon the laws of the free cities and upon criminal cases and how they are to be decided, including everything that is needed in respect of the aforesaid topics.

CHAPTER TWO

First part of the rights and customs of the realm in particular, and first that both ecclesiastical and lay persons enjoy one and the same liberty ⁹⁶This tripartite structure (which Werböczy did not observe in the following) goes back to Justinian.

⁹⁷Logically rebus should stand here instead of rerum. Cf. I.1.1.

It should first of all be known that of the persons whose rights and customs are discussed here, some are spiritual, that is, ecclesiastical, and some are lay.

[1] And although persons spiritual, designated by our Lord and Savior as the mediators of human redemption, are considered worthier than lay persons, all lords prelate, rectors of churches,⁹⁸ barons, and other magnates, nobles, and notables of this kingdom of Hungary,⁹⁹ enjoy, nevertheless, by reason of their nobility and temporal goods one and same prerogative of liberty, exemption, and immunity; nor has any lord more nor any nobleman less liberty.¹⁰⁰ For this reason they live under one and same law and custom, and follow one and the same legal procedure in court, and they differ from one another only in the amount of their man-price.

[2] For the man-price of the lords prelate and barons is one hundred marks,¹⁰¹ and that of nobles fifty marks, as will be explained more clearly below. And this is so not because of their liberty, but because of their dignity and office, namely the prelates by virtue of their priestly dignity, and the barons by virtue of the office they hold and to which they are raised by the prince.

[3] Hence, they stand or sit close to the king and they are the first to speak in council,¹⁰² and they precede other noblemen in promoting the commonwealth and in defending the fatherland, and by virtue of their dignity and office they are deservedly given preference over them.

CHAPTER THREE

The origin of our nobility and how government was transferred to our prince

It was my plan to describe the customs and the special and approved laws of this realm and not to write history. Nevertheless, since (as I have said) all lords prelate, barons, and nobles enjoy one and the same prerogative of exemption and liberty, and, in any case, many often ask whence our nobility, and from it all baronage and all other lordship has its origin, and who are and are ⁹⁸ rectores ecclesiarum may here refer to clergy in charge of non-episcopal churches.

⁹⁹ Barons meant above all the officers of the court (or such lords who held offices) (see I. 92), magnates would have referred to other great men without being actual members of the government; proceres (which we translate as notables) are listed in laws and charters ever since the fourteenth century, referring perhaps to more influential nobles, but that remains unclear.

¹⁰⁰ Cf. 11 December 1351:11, where, however, this clause referred to the equalization of status of regional nobles with the “true nobles” of the rest of the kingdom. It acquired its central significance for Hungarian nobility through its insertion here.

¹⁰¹ The mark was a measure of silver (and sometimes of gold), often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century the Buda mark (~245.54 gr.), belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary.

¹⁰² The royal council was an informal body of major household officers (barons), prelates and viceroys who happened to be in the king's court at the time it convened; mostly referred to as prelati et barones.court. Full meetings of the royal council, to which individual summonses were sent, usually preceded convocations of the diet, in respect of which the royal council met separately in the manner of an “upper house.”

considered to be true noblemen of the realm, I have decided briefly to explain the history and origin of this nobility.

[1] It should be known that although, according to the common opinion of the learned, a nobleman is a man whom his own virtues ennoble, as far as it concerns our subject, the nobility, who are generally reckoned as free men, are said to have their first origin among the Huns or the Hungarians after they entered from Scythia into Pannonia (whose name changed and is now called Hungary after the Hungarians living here).¹⁰³ This is how it came about.

[2] When the Huns left Scythia with their wives, sons, daughters, and all their households, after passing and wandering through a number of lands, they first appointed captains and, moreover, they did by single accord elect and designate one judge to settle the quarrels of disputants and to punish thieves, robbers, and other wrongdoers; then, with the common consent and resolution of all, it was decided that when issues equally affecting the whole community arose or a general levy of the army was necessary, a sword or blade dipped in blood should be carried around the dwellings and encampments of the Huns and the call should be uttered by criers, saying: It is the word of God and the command of the entire community, that everyone must appear in such-and- such a place (naming that place), armed or any way he can, to listen to the counsel and command of the community and to hear its instructions.

[3] This custom was strictly observed among the Hungarians until the time of Duke Géza,¹⁰⁴ father of our glorious prince and apostle Saint Stephen, the first king of the Hungarians,¹⁰⁵ and many of the Huns fell into perpetual servitude because of it.

[4] For they passed a decision and a resolution that whosoever failed to heed such an order, unless they could offer a reasonable excuse, should either be disemboweled with a knife or be reduced to common and perpetual servitude.

[5] As previously mentioned, this sanction is said to have reduced great numbers of Hungarians to the status of common people. Otherwise it could not have happened that one of them became a lord and the other a servant, one a noble and the other ignoble and a peasant, since they all descended from one and the same lineage, that is, from Hunor and Magor.¹⁰⁶

[6] But after the Hungarians came to recognize the truth and receive the Catholic faith, inspired by the grace of the Holy Spirit and through the efforts of our holy king, they elected him their ¹⁰³ The identification of the Hungarians with the Huns and their country of origin with Scythia was a learned construction of medieval Hungarian chroniclers, eager to find a “place” for their people in the classical (and also Biblical) scheme of “ethnography.” See the introductory essay by Jenő Szűcs in Frank Schaer, László Veszprémy, ed. and transl. Simonis de Kéza Gesta Hungarorum. Simon of Kéza, The Deeds of the Hungarians (Budapest: Central European University Press, 1999) xxix-cii. The following four paragraphs are an almost verbatim quotation from the Gesta (ca. 1272-78), 29-31.

¹⁰⁴ Géza, grand duke of the Hungarians 972-997.

¹⁰⁵ Stephen I, grand duke 997-1000, and king of Hungary 1000-1038.

¹⁰⁶ The anonymous ancestor of the Magyars is first mentioned—as Magog—by the Anonymous Notary’s Gesta Hungarorum (ca. 1210), see “Anonymus, Notary of King Béla, The Deeds of the Hungarians &c.” ed. and trans. Martyn Rady and László Veszprémy in Anonymus and Master Roger (Budapest–New York: Central European University Press, 2010) 7. Simon of Kéza called him Magor and added Hunor.

king and crowned him of their own free will,¹⁰⁷ and then was transferred by the community, out of its own authority, to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of this realm and consequently to our prince and king, the right and full power of ennoblement, and therefore of donating estates which adorn nobles and distinguish them from ignobles together with the supreme power and government. Hence all nobility now originates from him, and these two, by virtue of some reciprocal transfer and mutual bond between them, depend upon each other so closely that neither can be separated and removed from the other and neither can exist without the other.¹⁰⁸

[7] For the prince is elected only by the nobles, and nobles are created and adorned with the dignity of nobility only by the prince.

CHAPTER FOUR

That true nobility is earned through military service and other virtues, and is validated by the donation of estates

Thus true nobility can be acquired through military skill and service and by other talents and virtues of mind and body. For when our prince gives a castle, a town, or a village or other property right to a man of whatever condition on account of his outstanding deeds or services, such a man immediately becomes a true nobleman by virtue of the prince's donation (followed by lawful institution), and he is entirely relieved of the yoke of servitude.

[1] And this liberty by donation our people call nobility. Therefore, the sons of such nobles are rightly called heirs and free men. And these nobles, because of the involvement and connection described immediately above, are considered members of the Holy Crown,¹⁰⁹ and they are subject to the power of none other than the lawfully crowned prince.

CHAPTER FIVE

That everyone is free to dispose of his goods obtained by him by his own services

¹⁰⁷ Stephen I was crowned in 1000 AD according to Thietmar of Merseburg in his Chronicon, IV, 39 [38] (W. Trimlich, ed., Berlin: Huetten & Loening, 1957, pp. 174–5) at the “encouragement” of the Emperor. There is no evidence for an election of any form.

¹⁰⁸ This clause gave rise in the nineteenth century to the “doctrine of the Holy Crown” (Szentkorona-tan) which claimed that the medieval kingdom of Hungary was a legally independent state whose king and parliament were joint possessors of legislative sovereignty. In the Tripartitum the context of crown membership meant, however, the system of royal land donations rather than either legal independence or the political rights of the nobility; see Péter “The Holy Crown of Hungary,” 448–80; briefly also in János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14–16. Jahrhundert (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973) 6–8, 74–9.

¹⁰⁹ The gradual development of the use of the well-known medieval body-metaphor for the kingdom of Hungary and persons and communities constituting it was analyzed by Ferenc Eckhardt, in A szentkorona-eszme története, [History of the idea of the Holy Crown] (Budapest: MTA, 1941) and summarized in Bak, Königtum, pp. 75–7, with lit.

Such property rights as were obtained by military services are called by the legists a peculium castrense, but those obtained by someone's knowledge of letters or learning they call a peculium quasi castrense. It is called a peculium, in the sense of private or personal property, such that a son can do with it whatever he wishes, even against the wishes of his father, and vice versa.¹¹⁰

[1] This is the origin and foundation of our praiseworthy and ancient custom, approved long ago, that all barons, magnates and noblemen may always dispose freely and as they wish of all goods, chattels, and property rights obtained or acquired in any way by their own effort, service, or merit before a division takes place with their father or kinsmen, as shall be discussed more clearly below regarding cases of division between kinsmen.¹¹¹

CHAPTER SIX

That noblemen can be created without the donation of an estate; and that a coat of arms is not required in court to prove nobility

It should be known, furthermore, that one can become or be created a true noble in another way, without the donation of property rights: namely, when our prince separates and frees common people from servility and ignobility, placing and assigning them in the society, rank, and number of the true nobles of the realm. Such men are regarded as true nobles even without the grant of an estate, and these nobles, howsoever created, and all their heirs who descend legitimately in the male line must always be regarded as true nobles, even if they do not possess a noble coat of arms or letters describing the coat of arms and its grant.

[1] For a coat of arms given to anyone by the prince is not a prerequisite of nobility but it is better to have it. A grant of a coat of arms does not ennoble anyone in itself, as numerous burghers and common people possess coats of arms granted them by the prince, but are not by that counted as noblemen.

[2] Thus it is not necessary to present a coat of arms in court to prove nobility; all that needs to be produced is the letter of donation or letter of institution testifying to the grant of an estate; indeed, if these are lacking, a letter of quittance for payment of the filial quarter (provided the prescription of the royal rights has passed)¹¹² is more than enough to prove noble status.

[3] For the filial quarter¹¹³ is only paid from acquired property rights.¹¹⁴

¹¹⁰ Although Werbőczy twists the meaning of Dig. 49. 17 to suit his purpose, this is a plausible reading of the original civilian text.

¹¹¹ See below, I. 57.

¹¹² That is, 100 years; see below, I.78 [2].

¹¹³ The filial quarter (quarta [filialis]) was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the properties of their fathers. Scholarly debates on it were summed up in Ferenc Eckhart, "Vita a leánynegyedről" [Debates on the Filial Quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, "La 'quarta puellaris' dans l'ancien droit hongrois," Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, "Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére." [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval

[4] From purchased [property] rights the girls and daughters of barons, magnates, and noblemen are given not the filial quarter but an appropriate share.

CHAPTER SEVEN

That children born to a noble father and a non-noble mother are considered true nobles, but not vice versa

Then, those born of a noble mother, and to a servile father are not called true nobles, unless the woman has been, perchance, perfected and made a true heir to the paternal rights by the king (without prejudice to the lawful successors).

[1] For her sons, even of a non-noble father, should in this case be regarded as true nobles (since perfection has and constitutes the same power and character as a donation or grant of property rights).

[2] Contrariwise, sons born to a noble father and to a non-noble mother are considered genuine and true nobles.

[3] For the father is the begetter, and the mother only gives and imparts shape to the begetting.

[4] You will find an explanation of how perfection can and should be done written below.¹¹⁵

CHAPTER EIGHT

That nobles are also made and created by adoption

Then, there is yet another way to become a noble, namely through adoption: that is, when a lord or nobleman adopts a person of servile or ignoble status as his son and presents him as the successor and heir to his goods, and royal approval is added to this adoption and it is followed by lawful institution to the property (since, like perfection, adoption with royal approval has the power of a donation), then this ignoble person and his sons are considered true nobles.

legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), 103–7. On further details, see below I. 90–92.

¹¹⁴ Here and in the following paragraph Werbőczy contrasts acquired to purchased land in a misleading fashion which contradicts his previous statement in I. 5 [1]. By acquired goods should clearly also be understood here inherited and paternal property.

¹¹⁵ Perfection (perfectio in filium, in heredem masculinum, Hung. fiúsítás) was a royal privilege by which the king “promoted” the daughter (or daughters) of a nobleman without male heirs in the third (since 1397 fourth) degree, to a son, i.e., authorized her to inherit the paternal fortune just as if she were a man, starting a new kindred. Actually, Werbőczy does not give any precise definition or description of perfection. Cf. I. 17 and I. 50.

The four privileges and chief liberties of noblemen

Although nobles possess a great number of liberties, as are set out in the privileges and statutes of princes, I have thought to list here the four which are considered the main ones.¹¹⁶

[1] The first is that they can never be arrested by anyone in their person at anyone's instance, complaint or request without being first cited or summoned and condemned by judicial process.

[2] This right, however, is set aside in criminal deeds and cases, namely homicide, the burning of villages, theft, robbery, or banditry as well as rape, in which cases any such person loses the honor, title, and liberty of nobility. And, if possible, such a person may be freely arrested even by the hand of a peasant at the place where the crime and wrong was committed, and condemned according to his misdeeds and punished according to his deserts.

[3] However, if he flees the place of the crime and evades the hands of his pursuers, he must not afterwards be condemned and punished unless by way of citation or summons and judicial process.

[4] The second liberty is that the nobles of the whole realm are subject to the power of none else than the lawfully crowned prince (as explained above); even our very prince may not, by virtue of his ordinary power, disturb any of them in his person or his belongings upon anyone's mere complaint and malevolent suggestion, without going to law and without hearing the other party.

[5] The third is that they can freely use and enjoy as they will their just [property] rights and all revenues within the boundaries of their estates at all times; they are held entirely exempt and free of all servile obligations, and of paying taxes and dues, tolls, customs, and the thirtieth;¹¹⁷ and they need only serve under arms in defense of the realm.

[6] The fourth (not to mention the others) and last one is that if any of our princes and kings should venture to act contrary to the liberties of the nobles, then, as stated and expressed in the general decree of the most illustrious prince, our former Lord King Andrew the Second, called 'of Jerusalem' (which decree every Hungarian king is wont to swear on oath to observe before the Holy Crown is placed on his head), they have for ever more the liberty to resist and oppose him without the charge of infidelity.¹¹⁸

¹¹⁶ This chapter, in shorthand called the "prima nonus" (in essence going back to the Golden Bull of 1222,) came to be the major point of reference for the nobility until 1848.

¹¹⁷ The thirtieth (usually 5 %) was a custom duty that developed from different levies on merchandize. (In Transylvania it was a twentieth.). On its origins, see Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Age" in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky, Balázs Nagy, Péter Szabó and András Vadas ed s. (Leiden: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64.

¹¹⁸ For the right of resistance see 1222:31. On the idea of it, see F. Kern, Gottesgnadentum und Widerstandsrecht im frühen Mittelalter: Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Monarchie (Leipzig: Koehler, 1914; English translation by S. B. Chrimes, Kingship and Law (New York: Praeger, 1956), pp. 1–147; for Hungary, see A. Degré, "Az ellenállási jog magyarországi története" [History of the Right of Resistance in Hungary], Jogtudományi Közlemény, 35 (1980), 366–377 and Zoltán J. Kosztolnyik, "De facultate

[7] By ‘nobles’ you should here generally understand all the lord prelates, barons, and all the other magnates, as well as the other notables of this realm, who (as explained above) are always protected by the prerogative of one and the same liberty.

CHAPTER TEN

That our prince is the true and legitimate successor of all the lord barons and nobles of the realm

Since it was said above that the full power of ennoblement and of granting estates has been transferred to our prince, it should accordingly be noted that our prince is the true and legitimate successor of all the lord barons, magnates, and other nobles and men of property of the realm when any one of them dies without heirs and descendants.

[1] For all their goods and property rights, by virtue of the aforementioned transfer, derive originally from the Holy Crown of the kingdom of Hungary, and always have regard to it and escheat to it when there is no lawful owner.

[2] Hence that custom arose, approved long ago, that a sole individual, lacking and without a true and lawful successor, is not free to dispose permanently of his property rights without royal consent. Indeed, he has no capacity to make a recognizance of pledge above their common estimation, as shall be discussed more fully below at the proper place.¹¹⁹

[3] Furthermore, our prince is also the true and legitimate heir of all the lords-prelates and ecclesiastics: not insofar as he may remove and sequestrate the goods and property rights from a church, but inasmuch as he can grant these to another person, together with the administration of a church, when an episcopal see or other ecclesiastical office is vacant; not including, however, the right of confirmation of archbishoprics and bishoprics, which is known to belong to the jurisdiction of the Holy Roman Church alone.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

That the pope retains no jurisdiction in the donation of ecclesiastical benefices in this kingdom other than his authority to confirm them

It is to be known, that even though the pope, that is the supreme pontiff, has two kinds of jurisdiction, namely temporal and spiritual, he does not exercise jurisdiction over the grant of resistendi: Two Essential Characteristics of the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222.” Studies in Medieval Culture, 5 (1975), 97–104. The estates resigned this right only in the seventeenth century.

¹¹⁹ See below I.60:8 (Cf. I. 65, III.30.). Recognizance (fassio) refers to legally relevant statements usually made in front of witnesses of a place of authentication (chapter or convent so authorized). For details, see I, 63 &c.

ecclesiastical benefices when they fall vacant in this realm, apart from the authority of confirmation.¹²⁰
And this is for four reasons:

[1] First, because of the founding of the churches. Since all churches, bishoprics, abbeys, and collegiate churches in this realm were founded solely by the kings of Hungary, they have acquired and won as a result of their founding every aspect of the right of patronage, nomination, election, and grant of benefices. For this reason, that is: by virtue of the right of patronage, the assignment of ecclesiastical benefices in this realm always belongs to our kings.

[2] Secondly, because of the adoption of Christianity. For the Hungarians embraced the Catholic faith not through apostolic preaching or the apostles, the prince of whom the pope represents and personifies in this world, but at the instruction of their own king, namely our most holy king Stephen, whom I have mentioned above. It was he who first founded bishoprics, abbeys, and collegiate churches in this realm; and he alone with the pope's approval conferred the prelates and benefices of these churches to whomever he wished (to suitable men, adorned with the virtues of goodness). In the words of the church's solemn hymn:

He, like Solomon, instated
Holy temples, gifts donated,
With crowns and jewels decorated
Altars and the Crucified.

And further:

Prelates he ordained as rulers, Tried and trusted, learned scholars,
Whom the faithful saw as pillars,
Guardians of their piety.
Thus the talent to him tendered
Unto God twofold he rendered.
To the throne he then ascended,
His from all eternity.¹²¹

Here it is clearly described how it was he and none other that installed just and faithful prelates to govern the churches he built and enriched with gifts; and this is also clearly evident from his

¹²⁰ On the royal right of patronage see Elemér Mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil und das königliche Patronatsrecht in Ungarn, (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1959).

¹²¹ Translated by the late Dr. Barbara Reynolds.

Life¹²² and the various privileges issued by him concerning the foundation and endowment of churches. The same, too, has been written by scholars of imperial and of papal law in their commentaries.

[3] Hence, he also merited the name of king and apostle, because he represented the apostles in this world by his teaching, good works, and example. For this reason he deservedly earned by grant of the supreme pontiff the right to have the double cross as his coat of arms as a sign of his holiness, so that he is rightly called king and apostle. Hence from his time the Hungarian people have and use the double cross as their arms and insignia. And the representation of the four rivers, namely the Ister or Danube, the Tibiscus or Tisza, the Sava, and the Drava, they took from the country of Pannonia where the Hungarians now dwell and live.¹²³

[4] Thirdly: because of legal prescription. For the kings of Hungary have for more than five hundred years continuously exercised truly and peacefully the right to grant such ecclesiastical benefices, ever since the reign of our holy king Saint Stephen, who was felicitously anointed and crowned king of the Hungarian people in the year of the Lord one thousand and one, until the present time, by which time the prescription regarding both the law of the church and of the holy apostolic see has many times and long since expired.

[5] Fourthly: because this liberty of the kingdom concerning the grant of benefices, together with many other liberties of the realm, was sanctioned and confirmed by solemn oath at the celebrated and general council of Constance (which, as is known, was presided over by thirty-two cardinals along with other ecclesiastics and numerous princes of Christendom) in the time of our lord king and emperor Sigismund,¹²⁴ as is clearly contained in the bull issued in this matter.¹²⁵

[6] And this council (to put it briefly) lasted for four years, beginning in the year of our Lord fourteen hundred and fourteen. In this council, finally in the year of Salvation fourteen hundred ¹²² The best-known Vita of St. Stephen, written around 1110 by Bishop Hartvick maintains that Stephen received what would be legate or apostolic powers from the pope; see, with English translation by Nora Berend, in Gábor Klaniczay (ed.), Sanctitas Principum: Sancti Reges, Duces, Episcopi et Abbates Europae Centralis (Saec. XI-XIII) – The Sanctity of the Leaders: Holy Kings, Princes, Bishops, and Abbots from Central Europe (Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries). Central European Medieval Texts Series, vol. 7 (Budapest: CEU Press, forthc.). On the claims of Hungarian kings to legate authority see J. Deér, “Der Anspruch der Herrscher des 12. Jahrhunderts auf die apostolische Legation,” Archivum Historiae Pontificiae 2 (1964) 117-86.

¹²³ The double cross appears on Hungarian seals and coins in the late twelfth century see, Josef Deér “Der Globus des spätromischen und byzantinischen Kaiser. Symbol oder Insigne,” Byzantinische Zeitschrift 54 (1961), 53-85, 239-319; see also Éva Kovács, “Signum crucis - lignum crucis : A régi magyar címer kettős keresztjének ábrázolásairól [S.c.-l. c. On the representation of the double cross on the old Hungarian coat of arms], in: Eszmetörténeti tanulmányok a magyar középkorról, György Sékely, ed. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1984), pp. 407-423. Werbőczy’s description of the dexter side of the Hungarian coat of arms is an early example of the identification of the four silver bars on gule with the four rivers.

¹²⁴ Sigismund of Luxemburg, king of Hungary 1387–1437, Holy Roman Emperor 1433–37, king of Bohemia 1420/37, presided over the Council of Constance.

¹²⁵ Cf. 6. April 1404, on which see Mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil (as n.119, above) and seventeen, Otto was elected pope and named Martin the Fifth.¹²⁶ In the following year, namely, fourteen hundred and eighteen, the council was dissolved on the command of the same Pope Martin and the said Emperor Sigismund, and at the same council John the Twenty-Third¹²⁷ abdicated from the papacy (albeit against his will), and Gregory¹²⁸ voluntarily quit and abandoned his claim. But Benedict,¹²⁹ resisting still and being unwilling to retire, was censured by a decree of the council and removed from the papacy. At the same council, John Hus and his disciple Jerome of Prague were burnt and given to the ashes as heretics. The schism, for the termination and healing of which the council (inspired by the Holy Spirit) was assembled and held, lasted, as it is known, for thirty-nine years; finally it was concluded through the efforts of the same Emperor Sigismund, and the long-desired peace and tranquility of the church of God was happily restored.

CHAPTER TWELVE

That every lord prelate and ecclesiastical person is obliged to swear homage of fealty to our king, and, in regard to their temporal goods, they must appear before secular judges

Since the granting of ecclesiastical benefices, together with that of the goods and property rights pertaining to the churches of God, is known to belong to our prince and king, all ecclesiastics of whatever order, grade, or rank who administer and own castles, fortified houses, strongholds, cities, towns, villages, estates, and deserted lands or any other property rights in this renowned kingdom of Hungary, are always accordingly obliged to swear an oath of fidelity to the lawfully crowned king and prince of this renowned kingdom of Hungary, just like any lay person of the ¹³⁰realm, notwithstanding the special liberty of their dignity and exemption.¹³¹

[1] And in respect of all such temporal goods as they own, as well as any act of might or other matter originating from these, they can be freely summoned and cited by their adversaries (if such there be) before any of the justices ordinary of the realm, before whom they are bound to reply and appear, just as laymen are.

¹²⁶ Martin V (Oddone Colonna) pope 1417–31.

¹²⁷ John XXIII (Baldassare Cossa) anti-pope 1400-15.

¹²⁸ Gregory XII (Angelo Corarrio) pope 1406-15.

¹²⁹ Benedict XIII (Pedro de Luna) anti-pope 1394-1417.

¹³⁰ Act of might (potentia, factum/actum potentiae; was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. “Criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed (referred to as quinque casus) and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. Werbőczy writes repeatedly about major and minor cases of act of might, without ever defining either, obviously well known to his readers.

¹³¹ Laymen were not, in fact, required to swear to the ruler oaths of fidelity for their property rights. Rather, it was understood that land was donated them by the ruler on account of the faithfulness they had already shown, in the hope of prompting further demonstrations of loyalty. See thus I. 13 [2] and I. 13 [5].

Royal donations and their types, in general

As all the lord prelates, barons, magnates, nobles, and notables of the entire kingdom of Hungary and of the kingdoms incorporated within it and the lands subject to it,¹³² of whatever estate, condition, dignity and rank they be, have and own all their property rights as grants of their most serene highnesses, the lord kings of Hungary, it is thus proper that royal donations and their types in general should first be discussed.

[1] Here it should be known that a royal donation can be of two kinds: pure and mixed.

[2] A pure donation is a permanent grant by the prince of property rights which have lawfully reverted to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm, to a person as a reward for service or outstanding merits.

[3] A donation is called mixed if it is obtained not only by service but also by paying an amount of money. The usual name for such a grant is an “inscription.”¹³³

[4] The royal majesty (by virtue of the aforementioned authority of the Holy Crown of this kingdom of Hungary) always has full power to dispose freely, at his will, of all the property rights of anyone who dies in default of issue and without heirs:¹³⁴ that is, he can keep them himself, or he can donate or inscribe them to whomsoever he wishes.

[5] And in order that the evil committed by wicked men should not go unpunished; and so that nobility and country-folk are not counted as equal; and, again, so that faithfulness and faithlessness do not receive the same reward: therefore, in order to crush the impudence and rebellion of the faithless, and to restrain the licentious wrongdoing of evil and shameless persons, our ancestors, as the rigor of law demanded and the needs of the common good required, decided and stated in a common decree that there should devolve upon the Holy Crown of the said kingdom of Hungary and hence be available for royal donation not only the property rights of anyone lacking issue (as mentioned above), but also (even during their lifetime) the property rights of those who audaciously and insolently rise up against the public order of the realm and in so doing spite the dignity of the royal majesty, or rashly and recklessly aggrieve others without legal cause, so that the example set by punishing evil-doers should deter some, while encouraging those others who happen to be granted the property of these men, to act and persevere in faithful service all the more fervently.

¹³² This formulation refers to the medieval kingdom of Hungary's claim to territories beyond the Hungarian-Croatian dual kingdom to areas on the Balkans and beyond the Eastern Carpathians, see above, the Intitulatio of Wladislas's diploma.

¹³³ See below I. 80. where it refers to property in pledge. The term inscriptio is otherwise used very rarely regarding property rights.

¹³⁴ For semine deficiens – defectio seminis (or simply defectio), the technical term for the lack of male heir, see below I. 22.

Cases that bring about the charge of infidelity

These are therefore the cases in which the royal majesty has the capacity lawfully and freely to give to whomsoever he wishes of any persons' goods, even in their own lifetime, and they are called charges of infidelity.

[1] The first case is lèse-majesté: namely, when someone lays impious hands on the person of our prince, or plots against his life by sword or poison, or violently invades the walls or house wherein the prince himself is staying.

[2] The second case is when someone openly rises against or opposes the public order of the king and the crown. However, if the attack is carried out in justifiable self-defense, it is not understood as bringing about the charge.

[3] Then, he who forges documents or uses false documents openly in court; or, who cuts or uses forged seals.

[4] Then, those who mint counterfeit coins, or who knowingly and publicly use these in great quantity.

[5] Then, those who kill or wound their kinsmen or blood relatives within the fourth degree. Similarly, parricides, uxoricides, and killers of their husbands. However, reckon only those killings of wives and husbands that are committed unjustly and outside the legal process.¹³⁵

[6] Then, those who seduce female relatives to the fourth degree inclusive. Or who violate a stepmother or commit incest, once they have been publicly condemned and outlawed.

[7] Then, public arsonists of villages and estates.

[8] Then, those who invite foreign bandits or mercenaries to disturb the internal order of the realm.

[9] Then, those who violate a letter of public trust or safe conduct, once they have been publicly condemned.

[10] Then, those who betray their lord's castles. Similarly, those who capture, take or subvert the castles, fortified houses, or other strongholds of any gentlemen of the realm,¹³⁶ once they have been publicly condemned.

[11] Then, those who kill, keep captive, beat, or injure the justices ordinary of the realm or their deputies in court.

[12] Then, those who kill litigants or parties to a lawsuit who are traveling to the royal majesty, or to the octave courts¹³⁷ or courts of short summons or any county court or any other court of justice in pursuit of their case, or those going or proceeding to a diet and general assembly called by royal proclamation.

¹³⁵ It was thus possible to kill a wife caught in flagrante delicti: see below I. 113 [1].

¹³⁶ Regnicola, verbatim "inhabitant of the kingdom" was used in medieval Hungarian law for the members of the enfranchised nobility (and very rarely for all inhabitants). We translated it as "gentleman of the realm."

[13] Then, those who kill, wound, or beat royal bailiffs¹³⁸ or the witnesses of chapters or convents when they are engaged in any way in some legal business.

[14] Then, public heretics, namely, those adhering to one of the condemned heresies.

[15] Then, those who mutilate someone or gouge out his eyes, except the bans, voivodes, and others holding honors on the borders of the realm.

[16] Then, those who surrender the kingdom's border fortifications.

[17] Then, those who supply arms or victuals to the Turks and other infidels who are enemies and are bent on seizing the realm.

[18] Then, those who aggrieve, detain, or rob those people who, having renounced their cursed sect, flee from Turkey into this kingdom in order to stay here.¹³⁹

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

That the goods of robbers, thieves, and homicides are not subject to royal donation

It follows, therefore, from the cases above that the goods and property rights of thieves, robbers, bandits and other such plunderers, as well as those of homicides and those who otherwise wound or beat nobles (apart from the aforementioned exceptions) or invade their houses, or despoil or seize the estates, property rights, or the lands of others, do not devolve to the royal fisc and are ¹³⁷ Octaves or octave courts were the regular session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times. In the later Middle Ages they gradually came to be in continuous session. Short summonses were issued for appearance in court within 30 days. County courts were the first instances for most minor offenses.

¹³⁸ Bailiff (homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge) was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. From the thirteenth century it was prescribed that the bailiff be accompanied by a witness of a place of authentication (a convent or chapter authorized to act as such) recording the action. It seems that in lawsuits bailiffs were selected by the litigants from among the nobles of their counties. Royal clerks were also commissioned as specially delegated royal bailiffs with powers more extensive than regular royal bailiffs.

¹³⁹ From the beginning of the fifteenth century onwards, several orthodox southern Slav lords and their peasants moved to Hungary and Croatia, and became an important element in the country's defense system against the Ottoman advance; see .e. g., Ferenc Szakály, "The Hungarian-Croatian Defense System and Its Collapse," in J. M. Bak, B. K. Király, ed. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Late Medieval and Early Modern Hungary, Brooklyn, 1982 (War and Society in Eastern Central Europe 3) pp. 141-58.

not subject to grant by the royal majesty. Such persons shall be condemned and punished with capital sentence; namely, thieves shall be hanged, robbers impaled or broken on the wheel, and the rest beheaded, according to their deserts.

[1] However, their goods and property rights (if and when they are sentenced to death) pass to their sons, or, if these are lacking, to their other kinsmen by blood or their lawful successors.

[2] Should the king pardon them, and the sentence has been carried out, then the sons, kinsmen, or other lawful successors can redeem their property rights by way of common estimation from the hands of the judge and the opposing party, that is of the party that asked for the sentence, as will be explained in more detail in the discussion of sentences in Part Two.¹⁴⁰

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

That the difference between the charge of infidelity and capital sentence is twofold

The difference between the charge of infidelity and capital sentence is twofold. First, because by the charge of infidelity, both the head and the inheritance, namely, the perpetuation of all the goods and property rights of the traitor, are lost, and none of his sons or kinsmen can ever recover their share of the inheritance of the property rights belonging to this treacherous man, blemished, dishonored, and condemned for the crime of infidelity (even if he is beheaded).

[1] Moreover, to make infidelity infamous and loathsome and to extol the sovereign virtue of flawless faith, his entire lineage and the descendants of his kindred will be for ever alien to him as far as the inheritance of his goods is concerned. By sons understand those ones already born, and not any who might be born afterwards. For the sons born after their father's condemnation or commission of an act of infidelity will rightly and in due course inherit their father's rights (providing their father has by then won the king's pardon, including the ownership of his property).

[2] However, this royal pardon shall be of no benefit to the mutual inheritance of his kinsmen in respect of the devolution of his goods, except to the sons begotten after the condemnation. Nor does it restore sons born beforehand and other kinsmen to their former position in respect of the rights of inheritance of the condemned man, unless they make a new agreement between themselves through a written recognizance regarding the devolution of the goods, and obtain the king's assent to this. Only in this way and not in any other can the dead and lost inheritance be revived and renewed.

[3] By capital sentence, however, the ownership and right of inheritance of goods and property rights is not lost, but if a condemned person has suffered the ultimate sanction by sentence, then all his goods and property rights devolve directly upon his sons (if he has any) or closer kinsmen or other lawful successors.

¹⁴⁰ See below II. 60.

[4] And if he deserved the royal pardon, but his opponent has had the sentence carried out all the same, then the sons, kinsmen, or other lawful successors can redeem the property rights by way of common estimation (as was said above),¹⁴¹ within the term set by the judge.

[5] Beside this, the charge [of infidelity] and [capital] sentence differ in a further respect: because if the condemned party has come or can come to an agreement with his adversary even though [capital] sentence has been passed and pronounced (but before it is carried out), then no royal pardon is necessary, nor can the judge interfere with the ownership of the goods and property rights of the person who has been sentenced.

[6] But if someone incurs the charge of infidelity, even if he has reached full agreement with the person whom he had injured in the aforementioned cases, he cannot avoid being sued by the person to whom the royal majesty granted his goods and property rights on the grounds of whatever charge [of infidelity]. For the person who obtained these goods and property rights has full power and means to bring and pursue a lawsuit, and, observing due process of law, to claim and acquire these goods by the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of this kingdom—the dignity and authority of which was offended by the other's infidelity—and by the consequent grant of his royal majesty.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Who are and should be regarded as heirs and descendants, and what goods belong solely to the males and what to both sexes

Furthermore, as I have digressed from the main subject (because of the need to explain at this point and make clear the distinction between the charge [of infidelity] and [capital] sentence), let me return to a more explicit discussion of the matter of royal donations, and first of all explain the clause "of those who die without heirs, that is in default of issue."

[1] It should be noted that the term "descendants" is understood as referring to all those who may lawfully succeed their father or mother, including posthumous children, be they male or female; whereas sons and daughters already born, excluding posthumous children, are referred to as "offspring"; while the term "children" equally embraces sons and daughters and male and female grandchildren. However, according to the ancient and approved custom of this kingdom, only legitimate sons who usually succeed in the paternal, hereditary rights are understood by the term "heirs".

[2] Although when the paternal or maternal goods and property rights belong to both lines,¹⁴² namely both the male and the female, the term "heir" can also be applied (albeit inappropriately) to daughters; since daughters do not therefore [normally] share in all the paternal goods and property rights, the correct name for them is not heirs, but rather descendants.

¹⁴¹ See above I. 15: 2.

¹⁴² We translated sexus here and elsewhere as "line," considering that the expression refers not only to a male or a female person but their successors of either gender as well. See also the usage of ius foemineum below in I. 18.

[3] And I say that they are called descendants not because of the common and usual devolution of paternal rights, but because of the continuation of the bloodline, and of the succession in paternal or maternal goods in cases in which these goods are lawfully shared.

[4] For only the property rights bought and acquired with the money of the father or mother, as well as those given and assigned as composition for the killing of a nobleman; and in addition those property rights that were transferred and inscribed permanently as filial quarter, or as a recompense and reimbursement for the filial quarter, shall follow equally the female and male line, as long as the transfer of the filial quarter in perpetuity shall not be prejudicial to the kinsmen or other rightful successors; so too those property rights to which the royal majesty has perfected girls or women, (but without prejudice to their kinsmen), making them true heirs in both lines.

[5] All other property rights, obtained in whatever way, shall belong solely to the male line.

[6] And I used the expression "bought with the money of the father or mother" advisedly, because girls or women, namely sisters, can have no share at all of the goods and property rights purchased with their brothers' money, and collateral female relatives have no right of succession nor can they acquire any share: they have the right to claim from the paternal rights either their proper share, as in the aforementioned cases, or the filial quarter only.

[7] I also used the expression "in both lines" advisedly. For if the royal majesty perfected a girl or a woman in regard to the property rights of her father or even of her brother (supposing the brother has no heir and has agreed to the perfection), making the female the true heir and male successor in a simple manner, namely without inserting the words "in both lines" into the letter of perfection: then, upon the death of the woman, these property rights can pass only to her sons (if she has any, but otherwise to the royal fisc), and her daughters shall be satisfied with the filial quarters which belong to them by custom of this realm.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Why the female line does not succeed in property rights acquired by services

And if the question is asked, why does the female line not succeed in goods and property rights acquired by services, reply thus: because this kingdom of Hungary, with the lands subjected to it, lies amidst and indeed in the jaws of enemies, and has always been protected and defended by the sword and by arms; and our forefathers obtained their goods and property rights (in general) by warfare and by the shedding of their blood, just as they do today. Since girls and women do not and cannot wield arms or fight with the enemy, such goods do not belong to the right of the female line.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

In contrast, why do property rights purchased for money belong to both the male and the female line

If, in turn, the opposite question is asked: why do property rights purchased from the father's and mother's money belong to both the male and the female line (as was said above)? Then you should say this: because money is counted among chattels, and both sons and daughters receive equal shares from maternal as well as paternal chattels, and consequently daughters get their rightful share of the goods and property rights purchased with such money, from which they would as daughters duly receive some portion on the death of their father or mother.

[1] But when we consider the basic facts and essentials of the matter, we see that money, too, is usually obtained and gathered by extraordinary service and labor, and sometimes even at great cost of blood; and since women and girls cannot bear the burdens of war and sustain the defense of the kingdom in person, they do not merit an inheritable share in the purchased goods and property rights either. Nevertheless, lest they should seem to be entirely excluded from the inheritance of the paternal wealth and goods, the sons' fraternal love and the brotherly affection that they feel towards their sisters—which indeed, by divine law, they are bound to feel—permits it that the daughters along with the sons should have a permanent and rightful share of the aforementioned purchased goods and property rights, assigning to their husbands the tasks of battle and the burden of defending the realm.

CHAPTER TWENTY

Whether the goods of a person condemned to the charge of infidelity which belongs to both lines, belongs to both lines again if a pardon is granted

Then, it may be asked: if a person whose goods and property rights would otherwise belong and pass to both the male and female lines is condemned to the charge of infidelity, and he subsequently receives a royal pardon for his life and goods, do those of his daughters born after the pardon get an equal part of the paternal goods to the sons or not, since as a consequence of the charge of infidelity the earlier privileges had lapsed?

[1] The answer is yes: for by the royal pardon all the earlier privileges of the condemned man will come to life and regain their lost strength as far as his heirs and descendants are concerned (although only the direct ones and not the collateral ones); therefore these goods shall pass through both lines again.

[2] Unless it happens that the letter of pardon makes express exception on this point: for it lies within the power of the prince to grant pardon and to restore goods.

[3] The order of inheritance of such goods will accord with the manner and conditions under which the prince grants pardon and returns these goods.

[4] As for daughters born before their father's condemnation, there is no dispute. They will not lose their share on account of their father's crime; however, they will no longer come into mutual succession with him (as was explained above in the discussion of the difference between the charge of infidelity and capital punishment).¹⁴³

¹⁴³ See above I. 16.

Whether goods granted partly for services and partly for money belong to both lines

A further question: if either the royal majesty or some lord or nobleman has granted and inscribed to someone in perpetuity a property right, be it a castle, stronghold, town, village, or some deserted lands, in reward for some services rendered or out of favor and goodwill,¹⁴⁴ but at the same time against a certain amount of money specified in the letter of donation or even a letter of recognizance: does such a property right belong to both lines or solely to the male line?

[1] The answer must be the following: that it belongs solely to the male line, because the acquisition of property always has regard to the root and not to the branch or bough of the grant; hence it follows that these goods and property rights, by virtue of the root of their acquisition, are hereditary and not purchased.

[2] However, the daughters and persons of the female line can duly recover their own portions as are owed from this money.

[3] If the amount of money was so large and significant that the property right granted in the aforementioned way scarcely seems worth so much, then its value has to be set by way of common estimation by the men of the judge and of the place of authentication, and the sons must hand over that portion of the money which belongs to the daughters according to this estimation.

[4] Corollary: hence, from the root of the acquisition of goods it follows that, if one brother sells his own share to another brother, upon whom — in case of default [of issue] of the vendor—it would have anyway devolved in accordance with the right of kinship and inheritance, that portion does not belong to the female line.

[5] And under the term "portion", let entire estates and other similar property rights be also understood.

[6] Therefore, let the acquirers or purchasers of goods take care: for the way their letters are crafted will correspondingly determine the inheritance and devolution of their goods.

¹⁴⁴ In Hungary it was not a common practice that lords granted landed property to their servitors, familiares or anyone else for services, Werbőczy apparently accepted the reality of such relationships and grants, even though he did not discuss this institution at all. See Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy: The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred, ed. Damir Karbić (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), 33-4; Rady, Nobility, pp. 20-22; János M. Bak, "Feudalism in Hungary?" in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. pp. 203-17 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011).

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

The formula of donations “by default of seed”. What shall be understood by “seed”¹⁴⁵

Since this clause ("by default of the seed of so-and-so") is always included in and attached to the text of royal letters of donation drawn up concerning the goods and property rights of persons who lack heirs, some people have maintained that if the lord or nobleman in default of issue left behind daughters, then the words "the male line" must be expressly written in and added to such a letter of donation, so that the text of the letter of donation reads: “by default of the seed of so-and-so in the male line (and so on)”, and that otherwise the letter of donation is invalid, and he who obtains such goods may not be supported, in accordance with the argument and position that the seed of the deceased is not yet extinct since he has daughters.

[1] This opinion cannot be accepted. For by the word "seed" only the masculine, that is the male, sex is understood and not the female one. So it is pointless and unnecessary to add or insert what is included anyway in the meaning of the word.

[2] And the reason is because by nature (mostly) boys are conceived from the superabundant seed of men, while by contrast girls are begotten from the seed of women. So it is proper to say that a man's seed is extinct when his family is extinct in the male line, even though he has daughters.

[3] This is why sons born to a noble father and a non-noble mother are regarded as true nobles and follow their father's family and status, but not the other way round, as I have clearly explained above.¹⁴⁶

[4] However, if someone's goods and property rights manifestly belong to both lines, and both lines die out, then it is right and proper to insert the words “by default of the seed of so-and-so in both sexes, and so on” into the royal letter of donation, so that in this context succession be understood by the term "seed".

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

How long does the royal right last and when does it lapse

Because the royal majesty (as I said above) is considered the true and legitimate successor of all the kingdom's barons, magnates, notables, and nobles in default of issue,¹⁴⁷ there are some lords, nobles, and gentlemen of the realm: that is, men of property, who wrongly claim royal rights for themselves and make out that these have devolved to them either by title of pledge or on the basis of an invalid and unacceptable recognizance, not done with the necessary royal approval but under the fiction of some other right of succession or inheritance, or they otherwise inveigle themselves this way or that into possession of these goods (especially in times of wars and disorders), and keep, govern and possess them under the cloak of silence intending to consolidate and establish themselves in these property rights, taking advantage of the prescription by the passage of time.

¹⁴⁵ Although we always translated defectus seminis as default of issue, in this chapter we had to retain the literal form in order to keep the gist of the argument.

¹⁴⁶ See above I. 7.

¹⁴⁷ See above I. 10.

[1] In which matter it should be known that the royal right over the goods and property rights of a mala fides possessor lasts for one hundred years, and during this period can be invoked, notwithstanding any countervailing prescription.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

What is the definition of the royal right and property right

Royal right is thus the tacit, hidden but existing jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm over such goods and property rights as have been usurped by someone mala fide without royal consent.

[1] Under the term “property right” the reader should understand in general: castles, fortified houses, strongholds, cities, towns, villages, estates, lands, woods, and deserted lands.

[2] It must be noted, however, that the word possessio has two senses. First, it refers to the ownership, use, and management of goods, movable or immovable. In this sense it is called a possessio as if a pedum positio [“the placing of one’s feet”] into the use and ownership of something which somebody actually holds and manages.

[3] In another sense, however, (as in our context), possessio means and denotes a village. And correctly so: for castles, fortified houses, cities, towns, and deserted lands have their own terminology.

[4] However, under the term “property rights” understand here castles, fortified houses, strongholds, cities, towns, villages, parts of estates, lands, meadows, woods, and deserted lands, in general.

[5] We call a praedium [deserted land] a field which used to be inhabited by people, but which is now devoid of either buildings or peasants.¹⁴⁸ The word implies “subject to praeda (pillage)” and comes from the ancients, who held such lands as they had conquered in war to be praeda.

[6] Similarly, we call a plot or lot of a noble or a tenant peasant which is devoid of buildings and any inhabitant, a praedium.

[7] What castles, fortified houses, fortifications, cities and towns are is well known and needs no explanation.

¹⁴⁸ Praedium was earlier the name of a plot of land, cultivated by a family, see István Szabó, “The praedium: studies on the economic history and the history of settlement in early Hungary,” Agrártörténeti Szemle 5 (1963 Supplementum), 1–24. 72. By the late Middle Ages it changed its meaning to abandoned fields or settlements; as an example, see András Kubinyi, Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen und Wirtschaft in den Besitzungen der Magnaten-familie Garai in Ungarn in: Festschrift Othmar Pickl (Graz: Leykam, 1987) pp. 367-377.

[8] Under the word “appurtenances” is commonly meant and included everything that belongs to a city, town, or a village: such as cultivated and uncultivated arable lands, fields, meadows, hayfields, pastures, open lands, woods, wood pastures, groves, hills, valleys, vineyards, wine hills, waters, rivers, fishponds, fish weirs, water channels, mills and sites of mills, and generally all fruits and revenues of the city, town, or village.

[9] Often, however, by “appurtenances” is meant all the jurisdiction of a certain castle, or all the immovable goods linked and belonging to the castle, wherever located, namely, cities, towns, villages, parts of estates, and deserted lands. But this name or sense is rarely used; cities, towns, villages, parts of estates, and deserted lands belonging to the castle are usually denoted, if not one by one then at least by a more general reference as to where they lie.

[10] And although the royal right can be generally applied and extended to almost any property right that is subject to royal donation and grant, made in any way or under whatever title, nevertheless, if a lord or noble is involved in or has committed an act or crime that invokes the charge of infidelity or if someone’s issue has recently become extinct, then his or their goods and property rights are usually not obtained simply by name of the royal right, but because of the charge of infidelity (which needs to be declared) or because of the deceased's default of issue, and in this type of donation the recipient often makes reference to the royal right lest it should exist in these goods in some other way as well). For the same reason, the above definition of the royal right shall be meant and applied not to this sort of royal right, but only insofar as it applies to concealers of royal rights.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

That those who unjustly obtain goods on the grounds of the royal right, shall be fined at the value of the perpetual estimation of those goods

If someone obtains for himself on the grounds of the royal right some property rights that had long been in the peaceful possession of a lord or noble, and if that lord or noble, when the term of the lawsuit filed against them has passed (and a case of this kind is nowadays usually concluded in four octave courts), can prove that he had and has a just title and good right to the possession of the property rights obtained, then the recipient shall be condemned and fined at the value of the perpetual estimation of the wrongly and unjustly obtained rights (the perpetual rights of which he wanted to usurp and to claim for himself, and of which he intended to deprive the lawful possessor for ever). Thus he should receive measure for measure and suffer the same damage as he wanted to do to the other.

[1] The same should apply to those who obtain from the royal majesty property rights for themselves on the grounds of the charge of infidelity, as listed before,¹⁴⁹ and are unable to prove the crime that brought about the charge of infidelity of those whose property rights they have obtained; such persons (if they refuse to drop their claim) shall be condemned to the value of the perpetual estimation of those property rights.

¹⁴⁹ See above I.14

[2] However, many believe that they should be condemned and punished only with a fine of the tongue, inasmuch as they maliciously defamed blameless and innocent people before the royal majesty.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

That those who obtain goods on the grounds of someone's default of issue are not to be sentenced to any burden

And if a person dies without heirs and someone obtains from the royal majesty his goods and property rights as having devolved upon the Holy Crown of the kingdom on the grounds of that person's default of issue, and later in the course of a lawsuit filed in this matter it can be proved by means of documents that these same rights were not subject to royal grant but should have devolved upon some of the deceased's kinsmen or the female line or upon other lawful heirs, then the recipient is not subject to any punishment nor will any burden be placed on him. For he obtained these goods as being of ambiguous status, since the deceased lacked male heirs, so that the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown should be investigated in timely fashion and the doubt regarding the descent of these goods eliminated.

[1] For it may well be that the person who wins the suit and shows that the goods devolved to him, had not enjoyed effective ownership of these goods in the lifetime of the deceased, so even if the royal right was inserted or attached to such a letter of donation issued on the grounds of such default of issue, and providing the recipient does not choose to pursue the royal right further at law, he shall not on that account be punished with any judicial fine.¹⁵⁰

[2] But if he obstinately continues the suit by reference to the royal right, and loses it for a second time, then he will be subject to the aforementioned punishment.

[3] The recipient, however, can go to court in the matter of the royal right, if he wishes.

[4] Some, however, have judged that in this case, since the first part of the donation based on default of issue has been cancelled and annulled by virtue of the clause that is always inserted in the letter of donation (that is, "if the above stated facts stand and are true as presented" and so on), then the second part, regarding the royal right, must be cancelled and annulled as well. But, as it was true that the person whose goods were obtained died without issue, so it seems that the aforementioned clause does not apply to the whole donation and, by extension, to the annulment of the royal right itself; hence, the recipient can proceed lawfully with the suit in respect of the said royal right, if he wishes.

¹⁵⁰ The argumentation of Werbóczy is rather unclear at this point as well as in the next three paragraphs. It is possible that at this point Werbóczy conflates two different types of claim: that a nobleman has died without issue and that his land, having fallen to the crown, may now be obtained; and that the nobleman had no claim in the first place to the land in question, that it thus belongs by implication to the crown, and that it may accordingly be obtained.

That goods under litigation cannot be obtained on the grounds of default of issue

It should be noted that if someone initiates legal proceedings regarding the inheritance of some property rights, but dies without heirs before the conclusion and decision of the case, then in this instance the goods and property rights in dispute cannot be obtained from the prince on the grounds of default of issue.

[1] For the bloodline, which the deceased had in mind when taking action to obtain the goods, has become extinct; and although the prince is the successor of the deceased in respect of those goods that the latter possessed or might in his lifetime have possessed, he cannot be regarded as an heir by blood to those expectations which this other party had not yet acquired and established as his own but which still remain uncertain in law.

[2] By contrast, if he has goods and property rights in the hands of others, bound either in pledge or in return for a dower or filial quarter, or in any other redeemable way, then the royal majesty or the person who receives the royal donation, or upon whom they are bestowed, has the right to redeem them at any time.

[3] For an obligation of this sort does not exclude ownership of goods that the deceased possessed while he was alive.

[4] And the same shall obtain and be valid in every respect for adopted brothers, who are considered as lawful successors but not as the true heirs of their deceased kinsman, and who have every right to claim this redeemable property for themselves.

[5] This is whence the trite old proverb that “lawsuits cannot be sold or bought for a price”¹⁵¹ comes from. But this saying should not be understood as meaning that an unfortunate person, burdened by need and indigence or hindered by some other failing, cannot entrust someone to regain and recover goods which belong lawfully to him or to initiate and conduct cases and lawsuits brought about or arising therefrom, or that such a person cannot sell or alienate such disputed or contested goods on favorable terms. This proverb shall be understood as meaning that the person to whom the goods were sold, or who was asked to conduct the suit, cannot litigate under his own name in cases such as these, either during the lifetime of the vendor or after his death, but that he must conduct and prosecute the suit under the name of the vendor.

[6] Besides, the result and outcome of the suit being in doubt, until the case is decided in favor of the plaintiff, the vendor cannot in the meantime rightfully state that these disputed goods belong to him. For this reason the purchaser may not litigate under his own name for the goods claimed by the vendor.

[7] Hence, if the vendor should die during the suit, that is before he is able to reobtain the aforementioned goods by final sentence, then the purchaser loses both his investment and trouble.¹⁵² Because, for the aforementioned reason, he cannot litigate in that suit any longer, so it is evident that one cannot buy lawsuits, that is contested goods, at a price.

¹⁵¹ We have been unable to establish the provenance of this proverb.

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

That goods acquired by royal donation do not belong to the right of the female line, even if the objectors were paid some amount of money

Then, it often happens that people obtain goods and property rights either because someone's issue has become extinct at his death or on account of some kind of charge [of infidelity] or even by title of royal right, and objectors come forward at the execution of this type of grant and obstruct institution by means of their contradiction; and then the recipients make peace and come to terms with these objectors and pay them a certain amount of money so that they may the sooner and the more easily take possession of the goods obtained, or otherwise free the goods completely from any further charges that may burden it, such as filial quarters, dowers, paraphernalia, or other such obligations.

[1] Hence some have assumed that such goods shall belong to the right of both the female and the male line, but this seems quite incorrect. For the quality of property rights shall always be considered as related to the root and origin of the acquisition, as was briefly explained above;¹⁵³ hence, these goods are to be considered as acquired property and as coming from the stem of donation, and not, by the ramification of payment, as purchased property.

[2] For the earlier donation was the cause of the subsequent payment.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

What shall be done in case of a donation granted on the grounds of default of issue

How to proceed in cases where royal donations have been made and issued on the grounds of default of issue? What is to be done regarding goods and property rights that have been obtained before a suit is decided? And how should a case of this sort be settled and concluded? Since there are unequivocal references and articles on this matter in a general statute, the ways stated there have to be followed in this matter, although some of its clauses seem to be prejudicial to long-held custom of this realm. Nevertheless, I have decided to insert the relevant article of the decree, word for word, and to attach it here, to make the subject more easily known; and it starts thus:

[1] Then, if in any county the rights of a deceased person escheat because of default of issue and it is not clear whether such an estate falls under the royal right or belongs to the kinsmen or to the heirs in the female line, and there is doubt regarding these two, namely the right of the king and that of others, that is, of kinsmen and of the female line, then those escheated and disputed rights and any other rights which might occur in these cases must be managed and held in hand until the devolution of the rights of such an owner deceased without heirs be announced by the judicial bench in our royal court, by a suitable lesser nobleman, elected in each county by the county's ispán, the noble magistrates, and other nobles gathered together in a meeting from among the middle-ranking nobles,¹⁵⁴ and not the barons or major lords, without causing any damage, except that he be allowed to make and to spend moderate expenses from the usual income of these properties, for which he must and is obliged to give account afterwards; and if, after the announcement, anyone should claim these estates and rights, he must within a year prove that he has a right to these; and if he can do so, then the Judge Royal¹⁵⁵ should order and carry out institution of the estate.

¹⁵² oleum et impensam perdet. Cf. the latin proverb oleum et operam perdere e.g. Plautus Poen. 5.4.66. Cicero Fam. 7.1.3

¹⁵³ See above I.21.

[2] If however, evidence fails him, the estates and rights shall remain under the royal right and whoever subsequently aspires to claim [these] will have to seek his rights at law from the hands of the king.

[3] Where, however, wives or daughters of men dying without male heirs are left in the estates and rights of such a man, these estates and rights ought not to be seized and taken from their hands until the truth is established about their rights: namely, whether these rights belong by inheritance and in perpetuity to the female line or not.

[4] If it is found that these rights do not belong to the female line, then, before the wife of such a deceased man is excluded from the ownership of the aforesaid estate, she is to be given by the royal majesty or by those to whom the rights devolve, full satisfaction for her dower and other rights.

[5] For the daughters, however, the paternal house and a quarter of the property are to be set aside as the filial quarter and kept in their possession until the time of their marriage, in accordance with the customs of our country.

[6] After the daughter has been given away and married, she should be given satisfaction by way of a monetary payment for her rights to the filial quarter.

[7] When, moreover, one of these daughters marries a man without property, then she should enter into possession of the filial quarter according to the same customs of our country and keep it in perpetuity.

¹⁵⁴ The ispán (comes) was the head of the county ever since the time of the foundation of the kingdom, in the later Middle Ages he was often a great lord at court, holding more than one county and having his retainer, the alispán administer the county; noble magistrates (judices servientium, nobilium, Hung: szolgabíró) were elected noblemen both assisting the ispán (or alispán) and representing the community of the county's noblemen, who regularly met at local assemblies for various legal and financial matters.

¹⁵⁵ The Judge Royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró), originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200). From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda. The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. Some towns came to be briefly subject to this judge.

[8] Providing she married the aforementioned propertiless man with the knowledge and permission of her brothers and of those kinsmen of hers to whom these rights and the filial quarter would otherwise have devolved after her marriage.

[9] Otherwise, if she gets married either from the paternal home or from the court and service of a baron or a major noble without the knowledge and permission or without asking the consent of her brothers, kinsmen or her parents, she cannot demand her filial quarter in land, but [only] as a monetary satisfaction.¹⁵⁶

CHAPTER THIRTY

Explanation of the article of the decree issued regarding goods obtained on the grounds of default of issue

This article, as I have noted above, seems to slight the ancient customs of the realm. First of all, in respect of the announcement of the aforementioned disputed rights.

[1] Secondly, in its failure to set a date for the octave court.

[2] And thirdly, in giving out the filial quarter to girls who marry commoners..-

[3] For, according to the old and approved law of the realm, an announcement of this sort should be done not in the court of the royal majesty, but at the location of the property rights, preferably at the usual residence of the person who [has died] in default of issue, at the time of the institution in the presence of the neighbors and abutters. And all those who contradict the said institution, or any others who subsequently wish to involve themselves in and to join in this case and lawsuit— be they the deceased's daughters living in the paternal residence, or his kinsmen or other kinsmen of the female line—must, within a year of the day of the institution and announcement, present their rights before their specially and explicitly assigned judge, that is: nowadays the Lord Judge Royal (while previously it used to be done before the Lord Palatine¹⁵⁷), whether he holds or not an octave court, and prove that those goods belong to them and that they have the right to possess them. Otherwise these goods devolve to the royal right, and, will pass into the possession of those to whom the royal majesty grants them.

[4] All this is quite clearly stated in the decree of the most serene prince, the late Lord King Matthias,¹⁵⁸ whence this article, albeit modified and altered, has been extracted.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵⁶ Almost verbatim from 8 March 1435 17-18, Cf. 25 January 1486:26.

¹⁵⁷ The Lord Palatine or count palatine (comes palatines) was originally the head of the king's household and highest officer in the realm. By the mid-twelfth century he had become the king's deputy and commander of the royal host; he gradually moved out of the court and served as the king's itinerant judge administering justice to the nobles. The palatine also became the judge of the Cumans. The election or selection of the palatine was a contested issue between king and estates. (Werböczy was elected count palatine for a year between 1525 and 1526.)

¹⁵⁸ Matthias I Corvinus, king of Hungary 1458–1490.

[5] The judge is designated explicitly in these cases of default of issue in order that either party may¹⁶⁰ turn to his judge within the set term and claim justice from him in the case.

[6] And the girls (as it is said in the article) stay in the paternal house with one quarter of the goods, until they are married.

[7] Nor can the wife, that is the widow of the deceased, be excluded from her husband's house and residence until she remarries, as will be explained more clearly below when discussing payment of the dower.¹⁶¹

[8] Girls, too, that is the daughters of nobles, shall not be given in marriage with the consent of those men or women, who might benefit from their quarters, but with that instead of their father or kinsmen, who are obliged to pay the filial quarter.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

Those who intervene in another's lawsuit with royal right

Then, in respect of a royal right newly obtained, if anyone intervenes in the case of another with a letter of donation, neither the respondent nor the plaintiff is required to produce on the spot letters in support or against this, but the person who obtained [the donation] shall proceed with the royal right according to the custom of the realm, whether it be the plaintiff or respondent who triumphs. Otherwise, if both fail to prove their claim, the royal right will prevail.

[1] And in this case the judge of the lawsuit, even after he has concluded and declared the sentence between the original parties, must admit before him the letter of donation on the same royal right from the recipient, and he is bound to give his judgment on it to him.¹⁶²

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

That every royal donation must be confirmed by lawful institution within the course of one year

And it must be known that every royal donation which is issued and made either on the grounds of the default of issue of some deceased person, or on grounds of the charge of infidelity of some evildoer, or in the name of the royal right against those retaining royal rights mala fide, or under ¹⁵⁹ Although the decree of Matthias 1486:26 in fact treats about the same matter, Werbóczy quotes the text of 8 March 1435.

¹⁶⁰ sciat recurrere seems to be a Hungarism (tudjon fordulni).

¹⁶¹ See below I. 98–99.

¹⁶² Neither the procedure nor the essence of this paragraph is entirely clear. The gist seems to be that, in a property-dispute between two parties, in which a third party appears, claiming that the disputed land has been given to him by the king, the original case should be judged first.

the title of a new donation in respect of those holding their goods lawfully, must be confirmed and made permanent by lawful institution within the course of one year from the date of the donation, whether any contradiction is made or not.

[1] Otherwise the power and effect of the donation will cease, and it will be invalid and without force.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

Letters of institution, letters of perambulation, letters of notice, and short summons. How many days may pass before their execution

In respect of this it must be noted that the validity of royal letters of introduction and institution to any donation, issued and composed with a statement on services, and beginning by way of introduction with the words "When we, suitably appreciating, etc." or "When we took notice and consideration of, etc.", as the wording and content of the text of a donation may put it, lasts and remains in force for execution for one year after such a royal donation.¹⁶³

[1] All other such letters, including letters of introduction and institution, those of recapture, as well as letters of the perambulation of boundaries and even those of notice, that were issued with the introduction "We were told" and close with the clause "To a suitable term etc." are regarded as valid for execution within only sixty days of their date of issue..

[2] However, if an octave term is appointed and written down in these letters of institution, recovery, perambulation, or notice, within which a person should be summoned (on the grounds stated in the letter), then the execution of the letter can be done properly and lawfully by the eighth day of the feast, the octave of which was inserted and written in the letter. But this should be understood as the eighth day before, and not after, the feast.

[3] Regarding letters of summons, issued in respect of any act of might for the thirty-second day, procedure shall start within sixty days of their issue, in accordance with present custom. Otherwise, these also lose their force.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

What force do letters of institution have with a specification [of services] and without

But it should also be known that every royal donation, given by whatever title and right, can be sent for execution not only by a letter of introduction and institution issued with a statement [on services], that is, with the clause "When we etc.", but also by a simple letter with the other clause "We are told, etc." given by any of the judges ordinary of the kingdom.

¹⁶³ It seems that, at least from the end of the fifteenth century, the introductory formulae indicated the legal character of the different "writs." Werbőczy, as an experienced judge of the royal courts often refers to such formulae.

[1] But if the institution is done with [a letter containing] the clause "We are told", then in any suit the letter of royal donation will need to be presented in addition to the letter of institution, to make it clear by what title or right and under what conditions the donation was made; for otherwise the institution itself will be considered as having no force.

[2] But if the introduction and institution was done with a statement, that is, with the clause "When we, etc.," then, if the letter of donation issued in this matter gets damaged or lost, the letter of institution will in itself suffice, for it contains the circumstances of the donation and the reason or cause on account of which the donation was made.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

Royal letters of consent issued without a verbatim text of the recognizance

And the same as was said before about letters of institution shall be applied to all letters that express the royal approval. That is, if the recognizance to which His Majesty gave his royal consent is not inserted in the same letter of consent word for word, then this royal approval shall be rendered totally ineffective and invalid, unless the original recognizance is presented to the judge.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

New royal donations in general and where they come from

Then, there are some who, under the title of new donation, obtain goods and property rights from the royal majesty often with their entire royal right, for themselves and for their heirs, and they maintain that their ancestors had from olden times, or at least they themselves from the time they acquired and obtained them, undisturbed ownership of these goods.

[1] And although most make use of such a new donation lawfully and bona fide, on many occasions fraud is committed in this area by some others, mindless of their salvation.

[2] For there are people who endeavor by this to exclude the female line of their kindred from these property rights by hiding, burning, or otherwise destroying the original letters that would prove that the property rights were purchased or else belong to both the male and the female lines by other title; while others, repudiating brotherly love, and favoring their wives and daughters— especially when they see that their seed might default in their person and fear that their property rights may devolve upon their kinsmen by blood—have the names of their wives and daughters written into the letter of new donation, bypassing their kinsmen, and endeavoring to exclude, or rather rob, them of those goods and property rights.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

The explanation of a new donation; and how it can be understood in two ways

It should be known that a new donation with the clause which is nowadays customarily included, namely: “and he maintains that his forefathers were and he still remains at present in the peaceful possession of this or these (and so on),” is simply a repeated confirmation of some earlier lawfully-granted donation.

[1] Thus, by its own name, it always presupposes either a prior donation or the acquisition of those goods by some other way.

[2] But, to make it easier to understand this explanation of the new donation, it should be noted that a new donation can be understood or considered from two perspectives: first, in respect of the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the kingdom, or of our prince to whom donation pertains; and secondly, in respect of the kinsmen and the persons of the female line.

[3] In regard to the jurisdiction of our prince, a new donation neither demands nor presupposes an earlier donation. For if it is agreed that an earlier donation of a certain property right was granted lawfully and that a correct institution followed, then there is no need to obtain anew the grant of that property right; instead, that previous donation needs to be confirmed.

[4] Indeed, even this confirmation seems unnecessary, as confirmation is not an essential part of a donation and of the ownership of a property right, but merely does good to it.

[5] Nor is the confirmation in itself of use if the donation inserted in it is recognized as invalid. So new donations—either together with the royal right or simply—are usually obtained from the prince for the following reason: because the recipient, although he has ownership over some property rights, believes that he may possess and own it improperly or against the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown. (For not all lords and nobles hold their property rights by royal donation, but on the basis of letters of recognizance or privilege of different titles and colors.) Hence, they strive to mend the defect in their right, through this donation from the prince, and effectively correct it.

[6] This donation is called new for the reason and to the extent that it is a grant of goods by the prince to a person which is at the time newly made; as in certain letters of privilege and donation of the most renowned princes, the late lords Louis¹⁶⁴ and Emperor Sigismund, kings of Hungary, I have seen and read grants of estates with the title of new donation issued without any clause inserted and without any mention that forebears of the recipient or the recipient himself had ever been in possession of these newly granted goods and property rights, but merely with a specification of services (as it is usual to do in every donation). On these grounds I believe and maintain that these grants of estates, as well as the issuing of the letters regarding them, were made and issued under the title of new donation; in other words, whether or not the recipient had previously been in possession of the goods, the prince granted them to him at that time, and not earlier.¹⁶⁵

[7] Because if he had previously granted these rights and goods, then (as I have said) he would not have needed to obtain a new donation, but rather the confirmation of an earlier one.

¹⁶⁴ Louis I, king of Hungary 1342-82.

¹⁶⁵ Werbőczy indicates correctly here that a great number of royal grants of land made from the mid-fourteenth century onwards were given under the title of new donation, even though he cannot discern the reason for this. See Pál Engel, “Nagy Lajos ismeretlen adományreformja” [An unknown reform of donations by Louis the Great] Történelmi Szemle 39 (1997), 137-58.

[8] And this kind of new donation, granted either with royal right (as was said above) or just simply, always has force and is effective regarding the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown, that is, against the jurisdiction of our prince. Nor can anyone else henceforth obtain this property right either on the grounds of royal right or of default of issue.

[9] For by rights, once a donation has been granted by the prince, it cannot be taken back again either by him or by others. It only needs to be that the recipient himself or his forebears held that property right truly and peacefully (that is, not by having usurped it by pure violence or by reckless seizure). Because otherwise if the goods were obtained under the aforesaid title fraudulently or unjustly—if, say, someone states that a certain village or estate was his and that he had long been in ownership of it, when in fact the property was not his but belonged to the royal majesty and had long ago been lawfully assigned to one of his royal castles¹⁶⁶—then in this case and in similar cases the donation is of no value at all; indeed, the recipient shall be severely punished as a counterfeiter and a liar.

[10] It is different when a powerful person usurps for himself a village by raw power and reckless seizure and spends a year in its ownership claiming it wrongly, and then tells the royal majesty that he has long had effective ownership of the village and so obtains it under the title of new donation. For this donation has no effect, even when done with the royal right, and should be considered without consequence in respect of the rights of the person from whom he had seized the village, because both the petitioning and the obtaining of it are proven to have been done deviously.

[11] Secondly, new donation can be understood and considered in respect of the kinsmen and (as was mentioned before) persons of the female line, and the definition of new donation shall be understood with this in mind.

[12] Thus, for the purpose of proving that property rights obtained as a new donation with the aforementioned clause "in the peaceful possession of which, etc." do not belong to the female line, neither the letter of new donation itself, nor even a letter of division issued between the kinsmen of the male line and a letter of quittance regarding the payment of the filial quarters is regarded as sufficient. Rather, the original letters, by which the same property rights were earlier acquired, purchased, or in any other way received, must also be produced in court.

[13] And if these cannot be produced and exhibited, because they do not have them (for it is well known that the letters of privilege and other documents of many nobles and men of property¹⁶⁷ have been destroyed by the enemies of the realm in times of upheaval, or are frequently devoured

¹⁶⁶ Estates of the royal domain were attached to royal castles for their upkeep etc. See Erik Fügedi, Castle and society in medieval Hungary (1000–1437) trans. János M. Bak (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1986).

¹⁶⁷ Werbőczy (and some other legal texts) have these two groups, whereas, to our best knowledge, all property in medieval Hungary was in noble hands; the issue was discussed, without a solution, by György Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law]. (Kolozsvár: Nagyenyedi Bethlen-Nyomda, [1947], repr. Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó, 2000).

by flame even in peaceful times), then an oath must be taken by fifty nobles including the defendant,¹⁶⁸ chosen from among those with the title and privilege of true nobility.

[14] If he can offer this oath, he is freed from the obligation to hand over land, and he only has to pay the filial quarter if he does not have a receipt or certificate in this matter.

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

What is the origin of the betrayal of fraternal blood

If, on the other hand, after taking such an oath the recipient made use of those said original letters either personally or through his advocate, or it can otherwise be shown and proven with sufficient and written evidence that he hid them and, contrary to the content of those letters, obtained these property rights for himself under the aforementioned title of new donation wrongfully and in prejudice of the rights of his kinsmen and the female line, and left out from the letter of donation the names of those to whom he knew the goods rightly belonged, and by this sought wrongly to exclude his brothers and sisters from the inheritance of the goods: then such a person shall be duly condemned for perjury and the betrayal of fraternal blood.

[1] Similarly, all of his oath-helpers shall be condemned outright as oath breakers and punished for perjury.

[2] And if an oath taking did not precede his act, and only the intention to exclude from the inheritance is proven, then there is no punishment for perjury, and the charge will only be the betrayal of fraternal blood.

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

The definition of the betrayal of fraternal blood, and its punishment

Betrayal of fraternal blood is the deceitful, sly, and fraudulent deprivation or disinheritance of a brother or sister from their lawful rights by their brother or sister.

[1] By the terms brother and sister should in this context be understood any member of the kindred who succeeds equally in the property rights.

[2] The punishment for betrayal of fraternal blood is, besides the inherent dishonor and infamy it attracts, that the person condemned of betrayal be deprived in perpetuity of all his goods and property, and the entirety of these goods and property shall be transferred to the same brother or sister whom he tried to defraud, deprive, and disinherit of his or her lawful rights; moreover, he shall be given over to him in his person for service and care, and the betrayed brother or sister shall be obliged to clothe and feed him to the end of his life as a member of his household.

¹⁶⁸ We have chosen this awkward translation because the Latin (and Hungarian) term for this kind of counting the oath-helpers does not exist in English.

[3] The same applies to the wives and daughters of any lord or nobleman, should any of them arrange through someone's petition to the royal majesty that he [the royal majesty] prefer her in regard to her father's goods (even if they belonged to the right of the female branch anyway), and, by doing this, schemes to deprive of those goods the other females of the same kindred or line.

[4] Moreover, if any brother or sister obstinately denies that a person belongs to his or her kindred, and the denied person can subsequently prove by means of written documents or, lacking such proof, by oral testimony going back sixty years (but no more), that he is of that kindred: then the punishment of betrayal of fraternal blood shall follow in these cases, because he has demonstrated his desire to defraud and disinherit the other of his or her just rights.

CHAPTER FORTY

The division of paternal and ancestral goods among brothers

After the preceding explanation of royal donations, we need to return to their ramifications.

[1] First, goods and property rights acquired through donation by brothers born to the same father shall be discussed; then those that were acquired or obtained by any other means, and then their division.

[2] Here it should be noted that all the paternal and ancestral goods and property rights of any lord, baron, magnate, or nobleman, by whatever name called, shall be divided equally among the sons of the same lords and nobles (that is, the brothers of the same father) and be apportioned into as many parts as there are brothers. The paternal house shall be assigned to the youngest brother to reside and live in, in such a way, however, that other houses similar to the paternal one shall be erected and built for the other sons or brothers from the common revenue of the said goods and property rights, on commonly owned land wherever any of them want them.

[3] And to these shall be set aside, assigned, and joined in perpetual ownership as many and as much of the similarly common arable lands, woods, meadows, and hayfields as are known to belong to the paternal dwelling.

[4] And this only holds true if there is enough common land, woodland, and meadow to make and complete such a division properly.

[5] Otherwise, all the lands, woods, meadows, and hayfields pertaining and belonging to the said paternal house shall be divided into as many parts as there are new residences to be built, and an equal share shall be assigned for use to each of those houses.

[6] However, these shares shall include the quantity and portion of those lands, woods, and meadows that belong to the lot or plot of the tenant peasant on which the new house is built.

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE.

What if the paternal house is of stone or built at great cost

When the paternal house is built and constructed of stone or brick or otherwise at great cost, and it is held to be estimated so high that similar houses could not be built from the common revenue of the goods, or not even one could easily be constructed, then in this case the paternal house shall be scrupulously estimated and valued by the bailiff of the judge with the help of stonecutters, masons, and carpenters, and the estimated amount shall be divided into as many parts as there are brothers, and the youngest son or brother will get his portion for free.

[1] But he must compensate the other brothers and refund their portions in cash according to the decided value and estimate.

[2] And understand this to happen when the youngest brother is of such an age that he is unable to manage his own affairs properly; otherwise the brothers have to divide up equally this expensive building.

[3] Finally, if those goods and property rights devolve upon the female and the male line equally, and sons and daughters remain after their father's death, and one of the girls is the youngest of all: then in this case too, the paternal house shall be given as a residence not to the girl, but instead to the brother closest in age to this youngest daughter, as the worthier person and sex, although under the aforementioned conditions.

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO.

That the written instruments shall be kept by the eldest brother

The same rule shall be applied to the keeping of charters and written instruments; namely, the charters and written instruments regarding and pertaining to the matter of their goods and property rights must be given for safekeeping not to an older daughter but to a brother even if he is younger than she; because these are always kept by the eldest of the sons or brothers.

[1] This holds true when the eldest brother is of sound mind, and is not mad or insane, when he is not evidently squandering his goods, and when he does not plainly strive to disinherit his other brothers of the paternal and ancestral goods as well as of his own.

[2] In such cases, the charters and written instruments shall be given and assigned for retention and safekeeping not to the eldest brother but to the second of the brothers who is the next in line of descent from the father.

[3] The daughters, however, may before the justices ordinary of the realm ask for a copy or transcript of the charters and written instruments regarding those goods that belong equally to both lines, and their brothers are obliged to give them these.

[4] Furthermore, it should here be known that all earlier or future cases and lawsuits brought against the brothers in the period preceding the division shall be attended (albeit at common expense) by that brother to whom the safekeeping of the charters pertains.

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE.

The division of goods acquired by brothers, and the clause per eum (“Through him”) in [letters of] donation

It shall further be noted that if two or more brothers or half-brothers have not made a division of paternal or ancestral goods and property rights, and one of them is serving at the royal court or in the household of some lord while the other is managing the house and the land; and the one who took up service obtains certain goods and property rights in reward for his services from the royal majesty or perhaps from another lord, and he has the names of the brothers who stayed at home written and inserted in the letter or privilege of donation with the clause, “And through him, etc.”; then, in the period before division between the brothers, the person who obtained the donation is free to dispose at will of any such goods as he received and acquired. And understand this as meaning that he does not usurp and retain them unlawfully for himself or for his heirs under some guise, but up to that time can actually alienate them. However, at the time of the division, each and every one of the brothers can justly claim the share due to him, in portions equal to the main recipient himself.

[1] For property rights mentioned in letters of donation or privileges shall always be divided into as many parts as the number of persons or the names specifically noted in the same.

[2] Unless there is a stated exception or distinction regarding this in the letter.

[3] So the clause “through him, etc.” should not be understood as the equivalent to “after him,” as some people, trying to be cleverer than they should be, have thought to interpret it. And hence they argue and make out that the other brothers cannot receive shares from goods acquired and received while the main recipient is still alive, but they should be divided up among themselves and the sons of the recipient [only] after his death. But this is not to be accepted.

[4] Because joint-owning kinsmen must, up to the time of the division, share equally the yields and the losses, and accept and suffer both.

[5] Hence, even if the names of particular brothers, half-brothers or cousins who have not divided the possessions among themselves are not included in such a letter of donation, at the time of the division each of them (as was said above) has the right to receive his part, nevertheless.

[6] Hence, always understand the expression “by him” to mean: “via him”, namely, the one who obtained it or “by means of him”—as if the royal majesty were saying that, in consideration of the services of so-and-so, his faithful man, he was donating to him an estate or village—and through him, or on his account, to another as well.

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR.

What if one of the brothers wants to keep for himself the goods which he has earned

And when one of the brothers (while the others gave themselves up to neglect and indolence) was acquiring goods and property rights with ceaseless service and the shedding of his blood or by other services and virtues, and has no wish to share them with his brothers: then, if he renounces all the paternal goods and property rights, he is free to keep the goods which he himself acquired, for himself and for his heirs in perpetuity.

[1] Hence it follows, that betrayal of fraternal blood is not committed by the one who acquires goods and property rights for himself (as some people have thought), but by the one who deprives his kinsmen of the paternal acquisitions and ancestral goods.

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE.

That the division of goods held by brothers of the same father is not to be done by litigation

It should also be known that a division among brothers and half-brothers who have undivided property is normally not, and should not, be made in court, but rather, through a letter of command from the royal majesty addressed to the ispáns or alispáns and the noble magistrates of the county where are located and situated the goods and property rights that are to be divided; or, if the goods are located in several counties, then the letter is to be drawn up and sent to one of the masters protonotary. Then they or he may—notwithstanding the objection by any of the brothers—divide and parcel up all the paternal and ancestral goods and property rights according to the number of persons, including those acquired jointly by the brothers, along with all the chattels in whatever form or shape they may be.

[1] Once a division (in the aforementioned manner) has been made among the brothers, if by chance one of the brothers wants on some legitimate ground to have the property rights divided again, alleging that his part is smaller or of lesser value than the others, or that his part was taken from him by legal action, then a new division (assuming the judge considers this as appropriate on the basis of the complaints and claims of the parties) can, and must be, performed in court, and within one octave term. For it often happens that the second division is demanded without reasonable or legitimate cause.

[2] This article shall be understood as also applying to joint-owning cousins.

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX.

When a new division of goods is allowed among co-inheriting kinsmen, and when it is not

No subsequent division is allowed among co-inheriting kinsmen where a division of the goods and property rights was made in the times of their grandfathers or great-grandfathers, and where a letter of division has been issued on this.

[1] Unless it may be proved that one of the kinsmen, having become more powerful than the others, violently usurped or claimed for himself some part of the property right or lands of his kinsman after the proper division was made, and the weaker kinsman, impotent to resist the violence of the stronger, asks for a fair and new division.

[2] For in such cases a new division is allowed, but only by a protracted suit and this only if the kinsman who obtained the division gives a legitimate reason for it (as I said above).

[3] For if it is found that he requests the division because he observes that after the division with him or with one of his ancestors, the other kinsman planted vines on the land that fell to him, or else cleared it of bushes and undergrowth, and in so doing made his portion more profitable than his which may have remained uncultivated; then he cannot cause the property to be divided again even with a protracted suit, that is, one lasting four octave terms.

[4] But if he alleges that a certain portion of his property right or land was seized rashly by the other kinsman, then he is free and has the right to start a suit against his kinsman even with a terminal summons¹⁶⁹ for this type of usurpation by force of his goods or portion of property rights.

[5] But only if the prescription normally observed in cases of acts of might, (which is usually put and accepted as being thirty-two years) has not expired.

[6] On the other hand, no prescription is ever admitted regarding hereditary rights and the ownership of property rights among kinsmen.

[7] Besides, if it is established that the kinsmen carried out a division among themselves at some point by erecting and marking boundaries, then thereafter a further division of the property among them and their heirs can never happen.

[8] But this erecting and marking of boundaries does not exclude, and has never been accepted as excluding, the mutual devolution of goods among kinsmen.

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

That if one of two brothers is in default [of issue], all goods divided between them devolve upon the other, regardless of any marriage

It also must be known that if one kinsman dies heirless, all goods and property rights divided among the kinsmen immediately devolve upon the surviving kinsmen who have heirs even if the division was done a hundred, two hundred, or more years before, and even if marriages were contracted between them or between some of them beyond the fourth degree of kinship. But the living kinsmen have to prove with written instruments that the kinsman who has died without heirs was a direct descendant of their lineage and that their ancestor made a division with that man's ancestor in respect of the goods and property rights he left behind.

[1] In default of documents, they have the right to establish their descent and the stem and branches of their genealogy by the testimony of witnesses in respect of matters which do go back to sixty years but no further.

[2] Whence it follows that the goods and property rights acquired and earned by a kinsman after the division will not devolve upon the co-inheriting kinsmen but, should the kinsman die heirless, revert to the royal fisc.

¹⁶⁹ Terminal summons was issued after three or more citations remained unresponded. They implied that sentence may be passed even without the presence of the accused.

[3] It is also important to add that if the royal majesty donated goods and property rights in any way to two or three persons unrelated by blood and not kinsmen or relatives, or if they acquired these goods in any other way: then when one of them dies heirless, his goods will return to the royal right of disposal.

[4] For the mutual and reciprocal passage and devolution of goods from one person to another is based only on the bloodline and the mutual division among kinsmen, notwithstanding any claim to prescription.

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

Whether goods granted to both the husband and wife devolve upon the wife after her husband is in default [of issue], and vice versa

Some lords and nobles are in the practice of having the name of their wife inserted and written in the letters or privileges of donation issued in respect of goods and property rights acquired by just title as a reward for services: so, a further question arises from the second corollary just mentioned, whether, when the husband dies heirless, his portion of the aforementioned goods and property rights devolve upon his wife— because the woman cannot be regarded as her husband's kinsman, only as his spouse and wife. And vice versa, if the wife should die heirless, does her part devolve upon and pass to her husband? The answer must be: yes.

[1] For although the husband cannot be considered by virtue of the bloodline as his wife's kinsman and the wife as her husband's kinsman, still, because of their union and relationship in the flesh they are regarded as more than kinsmen; for the Gospel teaches us that husband and wife "are no longer two, but one flesh",¹⁷⁰ while the kinsman is a different flesh.

[2] So, because of their union and joining in the flesh, the husband's portion of property rightly devolves upon his wife in the aforementioned case, and vice versa, the wife's rights upon the husband.

[3] Here it must be noted, however, that when the clause mentioning both lines is not inserted in the aforementioned grant or letter of donation, but the donation is done in simple form, then such property rights do not devolve to the female line (even if the wife has daughters), but they belong solely to the male line.

[4] Where, however, a clause is included and inserted in the text of the donation stating that if the man who had obtained the goods should die without leaving male heirs, his goods shall devolve upon his daughters, then in this case these goods and property rights, once they have devolved to the daughters, will always belong to the descendants of both lines by virtue of the aforementioned clause and on the grounds explained above.

[5] The same is true of goods bought for money when the wife's name is inserted in the letter of purchase or inscription; namely, that if one of the parties is in default [of issue], the goods shall devolve upon the other in the aforesaid way.

¹⁷⁰ Matthew 19: 6

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

Whether the goods of a man condemned to the charge of infidelity pass on to a brother adopted with royal consent

As the present subject is the devolution of goods, a further question arises: whether the goods and property rights of someone condemned because of the charge of infidelity, but granted pardon for his life and goods, pass on to a man with whom he had signed a contract adopting him as a brother in respect of the devolution of his goods, and this contract has received royal consent?

The answer is: no.

[1] Because, in respect of the devolution of goods, this contract empowers co-inheritance as a kinsman. Now it is accepted that the goods of a man entangled in and blackened by the charge of infidelity should devolve neither upon his previously-born sons nor upon his brothers or kinsmen by right of inheritance. Hence, the aforementioned goods cannot pass to the adopted brother either, even if royal consent (as said above) had been obtained for the adoption.

[2] However, there is no question concerning the passage of the same goods before royal pardon is granted: in this case the goods pass to the person to whom they have been granted by the prince. For as long as someone has effective ownership of his goods, he can always lose them once for all as a punishment for his crimes and transgressions, notwithstanding any fraternal adoption.

CHAPTER FIFTY

How should the inheritance of two brothers' daughters who were separately prefected be regarded

Then, a further question arises. Suppose two brothers or co-inheriting kinsmen having no male successors separately and at different times have the prince prefect their daughters (or grant rights of succession to both lines) to their respective goods and property rights, and neither of the kinsmen objects to the other's action; and suppose the daughters or heirs or descendants of one of the brothers or kinsmen are in default [of issue]: do their goods and property rights devolve upon the surviving kinsman's daughters or descendants by virtue of the girls consanguinity, or do they escheat to the royal fisc?¹⁷¹

[1] The answer is that they are to be joined to the royal fisc; because the daughters have clearly received the goods not by right of inheritance or blood, but by force of the prefection.

[2] Prefection has the quality and force of donation; and each donation was given separately and not in connection to the other, and so must be regarded as having been bestowed on unrelated persons, separately and at different times; hence, these goods escheat to the royal fisc.

¹⁷¹ This entire chapter sounds more as a topic of an academic disputatio than a real-life legal problem.

[3] Just as in the case of donations that brothers obtain after a division (assuming that the name of the other brother who participated in the division was not written in the letter of donation). If the brother obtaining the donation dies heirless, the goods he acquired after the division do not devolve upon the surviving brother with whom he made the division, but become subject to the right of disposal of the royal majesty.

CHAPTER FIFTY-ONE

The division of goods between a father and his sons; and paternal, that is, the father's power.

It must also be known that although a division of goods is not always permitted between father and son, still there are many cases when a father can force his son to make a division even if he does not want to; and conversely, the son has the right to divide the goods with his father even against his father's will.

[1] Before these cases are discussed, however, it seems useful to know what power fathers have over their sons, and in how many ways. Here it should be noted that all the sons and daughters of parents, whether they have reached lawful age or not, remain under paternal power, unemancipated (that is, not released from their father's power) until the time of their emancipation or release, which according to the custom of our land, can only happen in the case of sons as a consequence of a division of goods and property rights with the father, and in the case of daughters when they are betrothed and celebrate their wedding or consummate their marriage.

[2] So any children born to you and your wife will be under your power until they are emancipated; and not only they, but also your grandchildren, that is the sons of your non-emancipated son, will be similarly subject to your power.

[3] But your daughter's children will be not under your power but under the power of their father or paternal grandfather, whether their father is a nobleman or not; since the sons follow their father's family and not that of their mother. Hence it is that persons born of a noble mother and a non-noble father are not counted as true noblemen.

[4] The first of the paternal powers is that a son, as long as he is under his father's power, cannot sell or otherwise alienate anything from the paternal goods, movable or immovable, against his father's will and consent, nor can he make or enter into a contract regarding these.

[5] The second is that fathers can correct and punish their sons for their misbehavior even if they have reached lawful age; indeed, they can even imprison them if their transgressions and the nature of their misdeeds so warrant.

[6] Then, if reasonable need demands, fathers can shoulder and take on themselves their sons' burdens, indeed in cases of extreme necessity they can sell and alienate the undivided goods, as will be explained below.¹⁷²

¹⁷² See below I. 55, 59, 61, II. 57.

[7] Then, no one can detain a son against his father's will.

[8] Then, the father can give his son as a hostage instead of himself, but not the other way around.

[9] Then, sons cannot make wills regarding their father's chattels except with their father's agreement. Because a testament must come from the free will of the testator. These sons, however are under not their own power but that of another person, namely: their father's. It is different, however, in the case of those goods that the sons acquired by their own services or learned skills. Of these they are free to make a will even without the consent of their father.

CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO

Cases in which the father can force his son to divide the goods

Then, it must further be known that in the following cases the father can force his adult son who has reached lawful age—but not one who is under age—to divide the property and other goods, but cannot disinherit him.

[1] First, if the son has violently laid hands on his parents or committed some other grave and notable injury against them.

[2] Then, if he accuses his parents of a crime that implies no danger to the prince or to the common weal of the entire kingdom.

[3] Then, if he should attempt at his parents' life, that is conspire to cause the death of his parents by poison or some other way.

[4] Then, if he keeps company with criminals or with other men of evil life against his father's will, wickedly wasting the paternal goods.

[5] Then, if he did not redeem or free his captured father from the hands of the enemy or from prison, although he could have, or if he refuses to vouchsafe on his behalf.

CHAPTER FIFTY-THREE

Cases in which, in turn, the son can make division with his father

On the other hand, the son (even if he is still under paternal power) has the right to force and persuade his father to divide the goods and chattels, notwithstanding the said paternal power, in the following cases:

[1] First, when the father has squandered his goods, or alienated his own and his sons' goods fraudulently, not out of necessity or with a reasonable cause, or if he obviously wants to alienate them, and the son has clear indication of an intention of this sort.

[2] Then, even though he has not alienated estates or property rights and neither has an intention to do so, he nonetheless does not properly tend and protect them, but lets them go to waste.

[3] Then, if a father belabors his son without any just cause or notable fault in a wicked and cruel way.

[4] Then, when the father prohibits his son from marriage after he has reached lawful age.

[5] Then, when a father forces his son to commit a wrong.

[6] Thus, while the son (as was said above) cannot accuse his father of a crime, still (as one must obey God more than one's parents) in such a case the son can—in a decent manner, not by accusation or by bringing charges against him, but rather making allowance for his errors and shortcomings—appeal to, persuade, and even compel his father to divide the goods.

[7] And understand that the said division of goods and chattels made in the aforementioned cases should apply always to the ancestral goods, property rights and chattels and not to those acquired by the father through his own services and merits.

[8] For if the father forces his son to make a division on account of the reasons mentioned before, he is not obliged to divide with his son the goods and estates, that is: property rights as well as movables that he has in any way earned or acquired.

[9] But if division took place and was made between father and son for reasons other than the above-written, then a division shall be made of all the goods and things without distinction.

[10] For according to natural law, the father is obliged to acquire all the goods and wealth he can for his son, and vice versa.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

One more instance of division and on the goods that belong to the son by maternal right

It must also be known that when a son, with his father's consent, lawfully weds a wife, he can, notwithstanding the aforementioned cases, always and every time force his father to make the division under all circumstances (but only properly and lawfully). The division should be made equally in respect of the goods and chattels of both the father and the son.

[1] However, if the son owns a separate heritage and property rights that came to him from his mother, he is not obliged to divide these goods with his father, irrespective of whether she is dead or alive.

[2] Because these goods belong to the mother's family and not to the father's, as is clearly dictated by reason.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

That mad and lunatic sons must always remain under paternal power

It should not be overlooked that mad, insane and lunatic sons, since they can never be considered as reaching the years of discretion and full age, will never be released from paternal power.

[1] Hence, their parents can oblige them to do anything that is just and honest, and, in the case of manifest need, alienate their goods. On the other hand, they have to properly provide them with food and clothing.

[2] The same applies after the death of the father, to the madmen's brothers; namely: that the eldest sane brother will take care of his mad and insane brothers as if a father.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX

In how many ways does paternal power come to an end and cease

Although sons are usually emancipated and released from paternal power by the division of goods (as mentioned before), there are some instances when the paternal power ends and ceases differently.

[1] First, if the father dies intestate, that is, if he has not appointed testamentary guardians for his under-age son. But this only applies if the father himself is sui iuris and not subject to his own father's power, for in that case the son shall pass under his grandfather's power.

[2] Then, paternal power is removed if the father is deprived of the inheritance of his goods and property rights for some crime of infidelity or some other major trespass and is sentenced to capital punishment. Since, just as he is excluded from the mutual and reciprocal inheritance with his sons and kinsmen as a punishment for such a charge or crime, so his paternal power is also considered and adjudged as being removed and extinguished.

[3] Then, paternal power ceases when the father falls into the hands and captivity of enemies. For a man in captivity cannot hold anyone under his power since, as long as he is IN captivity, he is not sui iuris himself. After his liberation and return home, his paternal power will be restored and revived.

[4] Hence, prescription against him is in the mean time suspended and neither can he invoke prescription against someone else, but everything shall remain in its previous state until his return, and when he comes home he will be restored to his previous state in all his lawsuits, cases and proceedings.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN

That every lord and nobleman has the right to dispose of his goods freely

It is to be known that every lord, baron, magnate, nobleman and man of property who has sons and daughters, has during his lifetime full authority to dispose of and, as he wishes, alienate all the chattels, goods and property rights that he has acquired and won with his service, or has acquired and bought by his own money (which is usually also obtained by service), without the consent of his sons and daughters, even against their will, notwithstanding his sons' and daughters' objection, contradiction or any other kind of protest.

[1] And if the father has divided these chattels, goods and property rights among his sons and daughters during his lifetime, the sons and daughters must after the death of the father also accept that division as valid and acquiesce in it in perpetuity lest it cause dissent, hatred, quarrels or matters of discord after his demise.

[2] The same holds for those goods and property rights that devolved upon and were passed to some man or woman by some contract or by adoption as a brother or by preference; since it shall be understood and deemed that those goods were obtained by him or received by her alone.

CHAPTER FIFTY-EIGHT

That the father cannot alienate the ancestral goods with prejudice to his son

Nevertheless, neither the father nor any kinsman can carelessly¹⁷³ make any recognizance whatsoever involving the sale or alienation of ancestral goods and property rights that prejudice his sons' or—if the goods belong to the right of the female line as well—his daughters' or his kinsmen's rights to the paternal or ancestral estates and property rights, without the consent of his sons and daughters or his kinsmen. If this be done, it should be regarded as having no validity or force.

[1] There are, however, some people who pledge their paternal and ancestral goods and property rights or sell them permanently or inscribe and make a contract for them under various titles and different pretexts to whomever they can, often driven by urgent necessity, but sometimes without any reasonable cause, merely moved by gluttony, drunkenness and revelry, at other times induced by cursed spite of their kinsman and also in cohorts with the devil; sometimes rightly and correctly, but frequently maliciously.¹⁷⁴ And in order that the recognizance may have greater power and not be cancelled, in the letter of recognizance they assume and take the burdens of their sons, daughters and kinsmen on themselves and on their property.

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

What “assuming the burden” means and in how many ways the sons' and kinsmen's burdens are assumed “Assuming the burdens” means to give an assurance that a father or kinsman's recognizance to a purchaser will be observed. Whence, it must be known that the burdens of sons and kinsmen can be assumed in three ways: first, carelessly; secondly, in a reasonable way; thirdly and finally, out of necessity. [1] So first: carelessly, when burdens are assumed not out of evident necessity and not for a reasonable cause (as said immediately above), but out of malice or gluttony or even intent to harm. This has no legal force at all, and this kind of assuming of a burden is to be instantly and straightforwardly cancelled and the recognizance annulled.

¹⁷³ simpliciter meant in medieval Latin not merely “simply” but also “carelessly” or “negligently” (see .Du Cange, Glossarium 7: 491...); Hungarian legal terminology was “inexcusably,” which carries much the same meaning.

¹⁷⁴ In spite of this moral invective, the pledging of properties was an everyday practice even in Werbőczy's time.

[2] Secondly, in a reasonable way, when there is an obvious and reasonable cause; for example to redeem an estate held in pledge by some outsider, or to pay dower, paraphernalia or filial quarter, when, by selling a portion or part of the goods in this way, the rest is freed from encumbrance.

[3] Then, to create, if necessary, fishing ponds, build mills, houses and residences or to buy another and perhaps better estate for the price of the sold estates or portion, or to exchange estates.

[4] Since all these will add profit to the son's or the kinsmen's inheritance, in these cases the assuming of burdens may not straightforwardly be revoked and withdrawn. But if the son, named specifically in the letter of recognizance and assumption of burdens, wants to revoke it, then he has full authority to retract and cancel it but only if—while his father is still alive—he pays the man-price and the common estimation of all property rights of the father, wherever they may be, or—if the father has died—the common estimation of the paternal goods. The same shall be held and understood of the recognizances of kinsmen.

[5] Here it is important to note, however, that if the assuming of the burden was made in a general way, without the expressed insertion of the names of the sons and kinsmen in the letter of recognizance, then the assuming of the burden will have no legal force but can be straightforwardly cancelled.

[6] Thirdly and finally, the assuming of a burden can be done out of extreme necessity, that is when someone has been condemned and sentenced by legal procedure against his opponent to capital sentence, and by the force of the sentence given is arrested in his person and handed over to the court to suffer the punishment that has been assigned and imposed upon him by law; or if he has not been arrested but has not yet received royal pardon; or if he has received a pardon, had it on the condition that he reach an agreement with his opponent (because the royal majesty may not grant pardon otherwise, only if they reach an agreement), or if he has been captured by the Turks, the Saracens, the Tartars or any other foe and enemy and may only be freed by making some arrangement:¹⁷⁵ then the assuming of a said burden made in this last way can never be revoked.

[7] There is no way a son or kinsman may alter a recognizance made in such a matter; moreover, if in the aforementioned cases the father alienates his son's portion before making a division with him (because his own part was not sufficient for the redemption of his head), the son shall tolerate and put up with that as well.

[8] Even if the recognizance is made by a sole individual, it requires neither the king's nor the kinsmen's consent, but it is always of its own accord valid and firm.

[9] It follows as a corollary from the aforesaid that the sale of a property can be of three kinds: careless, reasonable and necessary. The careless sale is not valid. The reasonable one is sometimes valid and sometimes can be retracted. And the necessary one is always valid, always has legal force and cannot be cancelled at any time, as can be clearly seen from the aforementioned explanation about the assuming and retraction of the burdens of sons and kinsmen.

¹⁷⁵ From the fifteenth century onward it was a regular experience that nobleman fell into the captivity of the Ottomans or their allied forces, and the ransom often ruined entire families.

CHAPTER SIXTY

Legal notice should precede the sale of property

It should also be noted that a certain and cursed abuse has developed, practiced by the many people who make permanent recognizances regarding pledges or rights and titles with prejudice to the kinsmen: namely, when someone who has received fifty florins from a usurer states deliberately and malevolently before a chapter, convent or the justices ordinary of the realm that he had received one or two hundred florins. The chapter, convent or the justices ordinary of the realm are required to issue letters of recognizance and obligation according to the words and ways in which the recognizance was made. In this way some people burden their goods and impose upon them huge amounts of money though they are known to be hardly worth even half that amount; and as a consequence the said goods are often permanently alienated from their progeny.

[1] Therefore it is always necessary when selling or even when pledging any property that the sons and daughters or the kinsmen, upon whom would otherwise devolve the property rights that are intended for sale or pledge, shall be given notice so that they can acquire them for themselves. If they, after receiving legal notice and offer, want to have and acquire the estates and property rights for the appropriate and common estimation and value, [then] they shall have full and unlimited authority to purchase and acquire them before any other buyer or usurer.

[2] If, however, the vendor or pledger fails to give the said notice and alienates or pledges his property rights to anyone without the knowledge and consent of the said sons, daughters or kinsmen, and one of the sons, daughters or kinsmen then summons the purchaser of these goods and property rights to the royal court: then the case must be settled in a single term at an octave court and the plaintiff can acquire the aforementioned goods and property rights for himself simply by the common estimation, notwithstanding the amount of money, however large, specified in the letter of recognizance issued to the usurer or the purchaser in this matter.

[3] Excepting, however, and excluding when someone condemned to capital sentence is arrested and handed over to the court to suffer his punishment. In this case (since he has no more than three days to reach an agreement with his adversary) he is not required to give notice in the aforementioned manner, but is always free to sell his goods to anyone and for as much money as he can.

[4] The same applies to whosoever is held in captivity by external enemies. That is, his goods can also be sold and permanently alienated without notice in order to redeem his head.

[5] When, however, the aforementioned notice lawfully preceded the perpetual sale of goods and property rights and none of the sons, daughters or kinsmen wanted to acquire or purchase the goods and property rights up for sale, or, because of their poverty none of them was able to buy them; [then] the same sons, daughters and kinsmen can only subsequently recover them if they produce and pay in full the sum specified in the letter of recognizance or even through the perennial estimation and by a protracted process of law.

[6] Because the vendors of goods should not, in reasonable cases and under proper circumstances, be restricted and restrained to the extent that they are rendered unable to use and enjoy their due rights and chattels.

[7] In contrast, if one of the sons, daughters or kinsmen answers and announces at the time of the notice that he or she wants to purchase the goods; then a short and sufficient term shall be fixed for depositing the proper sum of money and for reaching an agreement with the vendor by appearing before the judge by whose authority and letter the notice was given and presented. If at the fixed date the person fails to deposit the sum decided by the judge's deliberation according to the common estimation of the said goods, then the vendor shall have the right to alienate the goods.

[8] One has to think differently of pledged goods and property rights. No one, whether with or without a preceding notice, is allowed to pledge property rights beyond their value by common estimation, prejudicing the sons, daughters and kinsmen or the royal right. This estimation, however, includes not only the houses and noble residences, settled, deserted or empty plots of tenant peasants located in towns, villages and estates, but also the arable lands, woods, meadows, fishing-ponds and mills in general (as is usual when paying the filial quarter); and what this estimation amounts to according to the judge's decision shall be set as the sum to be deposited and paid for the goods in pledge by the sons, daughters, kinsmen and even by those acting on behalf of the royal jurisdiction (in cases when the man pledging the goods is a sole individual and thus default of issue is imminent).

[9] In the aforementioned cases you should understand that only those daughters and women have to be given notice that have the same right as the male line to the property rights up for sale or pledge. Otherwise the daughters and women shall be regarded as outsiders in this respect and have no other rights than neighbors and abutters. Excepting that, if they want, they can intervene to purchase and acquire the goods before any neighbor and abutter and have them for themselves.

[10] The neighbors and abutters, however, once the aforementioned notice is also specifically given to them, can claim the property rights up for sale for themselves before any other outsider and buyer from farther afield. Not, however, at the common estimation like the kinsmen and kinswomen but rather by depositing and paying in full the sum of money defined in the letter of recognizance or even the perennial estimation of the property rights. They can do so within a single octave term, if the vendors fail to give notice beforehand, but the neighbors and abutters issued the usual notice on their part.¹⁷⁶ For pledged property rights, they shall pay the same amount of capital for which the pledge was made. They may not intervene or interfere in any kind of estimation in this matter, since it is known that neither the ownership nor the hereditary right to these property rights belong to them.

¹⁷⁶ The procedure is unclear and Werbóczy does not mention anywhere else the possibility of neighbors or abutters giving notice.

How should a brother regain his portion sold or pledged by another brother

It has to be further noted that older and sometimes even younger brothers, who, staying at home, are in possession of their absent brothers' paternal and ancestral, still undivided, goods and property rights often pledge or sell permanently those property rights, assuming the burden of their brothers and half-brothers. In this way the purchasers acquire not only the vendor's or the pledger's portion, but are also accustomed to claim the portion belonging to the rest of his brothers, whose burdens he [i.e. the vendor or pledger] assumed.

[1] Hence, it has to be known that when someone makes such a property sale or alienation carelessly, then the portion belonging to the rest of the brothers shall be given and restored to the plaintiff or plaintiffs at the next octave court without any further payment. And the portion of the brother who made the sale shall be estimated and only its common estimation be refunded to the purchaser. Thus, the portion of the brother who made the sale shall be given to the plaintiff without the assumed burden and responsibility being revoked or cancelled. For the remaining and residual part of the sum of money specified in the letter of recognizance, the remaining goods and property rights of the brother who made the sale shall be immediately estimated by the judge as are sufficient to repay the sum, without waiting for any further legal action, and shall be handed over into the possession of the purchaser under the conditions included in the letter of recognizance.

[2] If he has no other goods than what he sold, and is so short of chattels that the aforementioned sum cannot be recovered from it or reimbursed by him, then the purchaser has inevitably to suffer the loss of the surplus amount himself; but (as stated before)¹⁷⁷ only in the case of careless alienation (as discussed above).

[3] In reasonable cases, the cancellation of burdens has to be made (in the manner discussed above),¹⁷⁸ and the aforementioned remaining surplus of the price shall be refunded to the purchaser as far as possible.

[4] The same applies to a father who improperly and unreasonably alienates, sells or pledges his own and his sons' ancestral goods with prejudice to his sons' right and without their consent; that is, in the case of negligent alienation, his recognizance can be simply annulled, and the portions of the sons shall be given and returned to them without any further payment, and those of the father by way of common estimation.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁷ See above I. 59.

¹⁷⁸ See above I.49.

¹⁷⁹ This chapter suggests a significant variation in the practices to be followed when a brother, as opposed to a father, carelessly alienates property. The key may be the word consueverunt in the first paragraph: that is, Werbóczy discusses here actual practice as opposed to giving us a legally coherent explanation.

CHAPTER SIXTY-TWO

Some recognizances that are not to be retracted

It must be noted here, however, and impressed in the heart that if one of the brothers who wants to retract and annul the other brother's recognizance, has used those goods and property rights that were exchanged or acquired for the alienated ones knowingly and without lawful objection and has actually enjoyed their fruit: then he can never retract the recognizance, because by actual use he is seen as having agreed to the recognizance.

[1] The same shall be said of a father's recognizance that the son seeks to retract.

[2] The same shall similarly be held in respect of those recognizances that were made and performed in peaceful concord and agreement between kinsmen or co-inheriting kinsmen or even between strangers and outsiders regarding property rights that are in dispute.

[3] And in agreements of this type, a certain part or portion of the property rights should be given and handed over to the one party by the other who holds and is in possession of the disputed goods or who happens to have some other lawful right to them, while the remaining part or portion, for the sake of peace and concord, is to be left with him in permanent possession. Such recognizances always remain valid and can never be withdrawn (because the final outcome of the suit was at that time still doubtful and uncertain).

[4] At any rate, those aforementioned recognizances that can be annulled and cancelled relate not to the manner in which goods and property rights were received or acquired but instead to the manner of their alienation.

CHAPTER SIXTY-THREE

Of recognizances: which of them needs institution and which not

Then, a permanent recognizance concluded between kinsmen or co-inheriting kinsmen in the aforementioned or other such cases as concern property rights which devolve upon one kinsmen from another, and which is made before one of the justices ordinary or places of authentication and testimony, requires neither royal consent nor judicial institution.

[1] Any other permanent recognizance made between strangers and outsiders in respect of any goods and property rights, even recognizances performed and issued as a pledge (if the amount exceeds fifty florins), must be and usually are confirmed by lawful institution within a year.

[2] This applies if the person in whose favor the recognizance was made is not in real possession of the goods. Because if he has effective ownership of the goods or is able to acquire this kind of effective ownership and possession with the help of the person who made the recognizance, then the aforementioned institution can be made at any time, even after the lapse of one year.

[3] And consider this also, that if a recognizance lacks the royal consent for some reason and this consent cannot be obtained within the year, then a recognizance of this type needs to be confirmed by lawful institution within but a year (as said before) ¹⁸⁰ of that time that the royal consent was granted (regardless of whether or not an objection is made).

[4] And hold this true only for recognizances that are valid under present and not future conditions. Because if the recognizance is set to be performed either by contract or by fraternal adoption only at such a time as the goods are to devolve upon one party from the other; or if both parties mutually prescribe the devolution in such a way that only when one of the parties dies heirless, will his goods and property rights devolve upon the surviving party; and if the royal majesty deigns to give his consent to this kind of recognizance or contract and fraternal adoption; that recognizance, and consequently, the royal consent is conditional as well, and will only take effect when one of the parties is in default [of issue].¹⁸¹ So institution is not necessary while either party or the person who made the recognizance for the other under the aforementioned condition is still alive.

[5] Except if in these goods and property rights the royal right should exist or is obtained. In this case, institution is necessary in respect of the royal right that is often latent in many people's goods.

[6] Then, it must be noted about the aforementioned royal consent that if one of the parties is in default [of issue], then the royal consent—which in this case has the force of a donation—and consequently the recognizance contained in the said written consent must be followed by institution within a year.

CHAPTER SIXTY-FOUR

How is royal consent to be defined

Royal consent is the voluntary relinquishment by the prince, that is the royal majesty, of the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm over those property rights that lawfully escheat to it by inheritance.

[1] This jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm regarding the devolution of and succession to goods and property rights which, in the form we use today, dates back to the age of the reign and governance of our renowned prince, the late lord King Louis, that is to the one thousand three hundred and fifty-first year of the incarnation of the Lord, and has existed unimpaired and unshaken and observed and confirmed by other kings, ¹⁸² his successors, up until now, always has

¹⁸⁰ See above I. 32

¹⁸¹ Werbőczy alludes here to a mutual inheritance pact, whereby two noblemen agreed that each would succeed to the other's land in the event of the one dying in default of heirs. Arrangements of this type required the royal consent. For noblemen without heirs (or with sickly sons) pacts of this sort were a convenient way of discharging debts owed to another, as for instance an avaricious lawyer. A part of Werbőczy's own wealth rested on pacts of this sort.

¹⁸² In the law of 11 December 1351 the king expressly altered the rule of the Golden Bull of 1222 which allowed free testamentary disposition for nobles lacking heirs, by prescribing unlimited hereditary rights legal claim to the lawful succession of the goods and property rights of all the lords, barons, magnates and noblemen of the kingdom (that is, when they are in default of issue and heirs or they are sole individuals and their default of issue is thus imminent).

[2] Before the times of that prince, any baron, magnate, nobleman, and man of property could dispose of his own property rights with full authority according to his will, without any royal consent, even if he had no heirs.¹⁸³

[3] And the aforementioned rule is known to have had legal force only in cases when one of them, lacking heirs and any relative, died intestate.

CHAPTER SIXTY-FIVE

Which recognizances require royal consent and which not

Hence, it should be known that every recognizance made in perpetuity by a lord, nobleman, or other man of property who is a sole individual and whose default of issue and children is imminent, on anyone's behalf in any matter and for whatever cause and reason, and under any kind of condition and stipulation, regarding whatsoever goods and property rights, always requires and needs royal consent (on account of the right of succession as mentioned before).¹⁸⁴

[1] Because without that consent not only will those recognizances that were made permanently on goods be invalid and have no legal force but also those on goods inscribed by title of pledge (for a sum that exceeds common estimation), however made and performed, as was said before.¹⁸⁵

[2] Whence it follows that recognizances made among and by several persons, kinsmen or strangers in respect of their mutual or individual rights, do not require royal consent.

[3] For the hereditary right of the prince, that is, the king's jurisdiction is not yet effective since there are other persons on both sides who succeed by hereditary right and title.

[4] This holds true if the persons on the one side, that is those who make the recognizance, have mutual hereditary right from one another. The same is to be understood and held regarding the persons on the other side. Otherwise royal consent is always necessary and must be obtained.

[5] The number of persons does not exclude the royal jurisdiction when they are not kinsmen and are not related by blood or are not entitled to inherit the goods in any other mutual and reciprocal way.

of kinsmen. (the so-called rule of aviticitas). However, reference to the right of escheat is missing from the 1351 text, in contrast to 1222:4.

¹⁸³ Historical evidence does not support this. Although earlier legislation included the free right of disposal over property (see previous note), this may very well have been a reflection of ecclesiastical interest in contrast to traditional custom. Record evidence does not show any changes of practice in this respect after 1351.

¹⁸⁴ See above I. 64. 1.

¹⁸⁵ See above I.60. 2.

CHAPTER SIXTY-SIX

What is the definition of a contract and when does it require a lawful institution

It should be noted that a contract made between any men of property or other persons in respect of the devolution of their goods upon the other, in the event of one of them being in default [of issue], shall be confirmed by lawful institution within a year of the default of issue of one of the parties (as was said above),¹⁸⁶ whether it be confirmed by royal consent or corroborated by all of those who made the recognizance in the aforementioned manner.

[1] In the meantime, however, the surviving party, by virtue of the hereditary right that he acquired by this contract or fraternal adoption, has the right straightforwardly to claim and take ownership of the goods of the party that died in default [of issue] just as if he were his co-inheriting kinsman (unless there are some lawful obstacles to this).

[2] A contract or fraternal adoption means that someone who has no lawful heirs permits another, unrelated person to substitute for him as heir in his goods..

[3] It was said expressly: “who has no heirs”. Because if there are true and lawful heirs and surviving successors, there is no place for fraternal adoption. But when these are lacking, the person adopted as a brother or son will win the capacity and faculty to inherit those goods.

[4] It was also said that the substitution takes place “with permission”; for without the permission or consent of the prince, this substitution or adoption does not and may not have any legal force; but the goods will escheat directly upon the prince and belong as well as pertain to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown. Without the consent of the prince, the adopted brother or son cannot take ownership of these goods nor can he claim them for himself.

CHAPTER SIXTY-SEVEN

That one can have ownership of goods in two ways. And a final word on contracts

But it should be noted that it is said that one can have ownership of any goods by two titles or in two ways. First, by right of possession, when someone clearly has effective and peaceful ownership of the goods receiving both the revenue and the services of the peasants. This is the general sense and it is obvious to all.

[1] The second way of having ownership of goods is said to be by way and right of succession, when some property right evidently devolves upon someone, as on a brother or a co-inheriting kinsman belonging to the closest branch of the kindred. For example, although a brother has no effective ownership and possession of the goods of his brother after the division with him while the other is alive, he really and directly has the right and title by succession; by virtue of which, when his brother dies heirless, the living and surviving brother is allowed to secure the goods of the deceased outright, that is, immediately, directly, and without judicial institution or any other process of law, and he can take control of these by his just rights.

¹⁸⁶ See above I. 32.

[2] And if the deceased brother left daughters and a wife behind, but his goods do not follow the female line, that is, none of the women had previously had effective ownership of those goods in the lifetime of the deceased brother and in the times of his ancestors; then the surviving brother is obliged by law to bring up, support and provide for the deceased's daughters with food, clothing and all the necessities of life until they are married, and also his wife, that is, his widow as long as she stays in widowhood, keeping the name and title of her man and husband, by the same right and way as his deceased brother had done until he died, in accordance with the measure of these goods, and also to give the daughters in marriage honestly and give the wife in marriage, too, if she wants to get married, and to hand over her dower and paraphernalia. The same shall be held of contracts and of fraternal adoptions (if it is unequivocally included in the contract). For although the deceased brother has no heirs descending from his loin, since he has a substitute heir who is to be reckoned his lawful successor, he is not yet in default [of issue].

[3] It is different, however, with those brothers who divided their goods and property rights sixty, one hundred, two hundred or more years ago, and, after so much time, their common descent from the same line of the kindred is barely remembered and they are called co-inheriting kinsmen only in name. In this case, the same law shall be applied as in matters of property rights obtained from the royal majesty on grounds of someone's default of issue.

CHAPTER SIXTY-EIGHT

That violent occupiers of goods can be likewise violently expelled from them

Then, if some man violently intrudes upon or enters into or in any way invades the ownership of goods or property rights that have passed on to someone else and not to him, then he who has the power and right of succession to these goods has the right to expel and exclude the occupier from those goods, even by force and equal violence within the course of one year. Because in this case one may match force with force.

[1] After one year, however, legal action has to be initiated against the occupier and he can be summoned by short or terminal summons on account of the unlawful occupation and usurpation of those goods; and in this case, the violent occupier shall be convicted to capital punishment just as if he had seized someone's goods from his own hands, because he seized someone else's right of succession by force and violence, providing that the plaintiff can prove that the goods devolved to him by right of succession.

[2] The same shall be held of the violent occupation of those goods that have been in someone's effective ownership for a long period of time. The deprived person is authorized to expel and oust with equal violence the occupier from those goods within one year.

CHAPTER SIXTY-NINE

The clause: “nil juris.” And what goods return to the donor or the vendor

Furthermore, it has to be known that if the clause “reserving no right and no possession of right and ownership for himself, etc.” has been inserted in the text of a letter of recognizance, either intentionally or out of ignorance, then the property rights in respect of which the recognizance was made will never in future return to or come into the possession of the man who made the recognizance (even if the person upon whom the rights were transferred should die heirless), but will be entirely at the disposal of the royal majesty.

[1] But if the recognizance was performed without the aforementioned clause, whether it was done as a mutual exchange of goods or as some other permanent donation, for example (as is often the case) in reward for services or for any other reasonable cause, as a gift, or as an inscription or obligation; then if the person to whom the goods were donated or in any way transferred should pass away without leaving heirs or other lawful successors, the said goods will return to, and effectively be transferred and restored in their original rights to the person who made the recognizance or who granted the said gifts and also to his heirs and all of his descendants (because he retained the ownership and the right of succession and did not transfer them to anyone else).

CHAPTER SEVENTY

What is exchange of goods and why it was established

Since the exchange of goods and property rights has often been mentioned here, it should be known that the exchange of goods means the mutual handing over and lawful transfer of property rights between two or more parties.

[1] It has been introduced as much as to ensure peaceful conditions as to achieve a more abundant income.

[2] Because many people's goods are located far from their residences, at such a distance that they must spend more to manage them than the revenue they obtain from them. Some people's goods have become completely devastated on account of the ruinous and dangerous proximity of mighty men. Again, others put up with endless litigation and arguments about their goods so they do not rest even at night because of them, and those goods cause more trouble than they are worth.

[3] Therefore, any man of property is free and has the right to exchange his goods and property rights usefully and profitably; notwithstanding any contradiction whatsoever by his sons, daughters or kinsmen.

[4] But if the kinsman who made the exchange should die in default [of issue], the portion [of property] that he received in exchange devolve upon his kinsmen and co-inheriting kinsmen in the same way as the other portion that was given in exchange would have devolved upon those kinsmen by right of succession.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-ONE

What if the exchange of goods was made and performed fraudulently and only by pretense

Many people commit and perpetrate various frauds through the exchange of goods. Because some of them (wanting to sell and transfer their goods not truly and lawfully, but fictitiously and by guile in order to cause harm and loss to their kinsmen, so that those kinsmen may not reclaim, acquire or seize back those goods from the buyers, or, to my mind, from the usurers) insert the title and name of the exchanged goods—which can be done freely in a lawful and proper way—into the letter of recognizance or privilege, saying, that the buyer, that is, the usurer, gave them some property rights in exchange on some remote, or even close location; but they do not take control of those property rights at all, or just for a short period (to hide the fraud), and in this way, they disinherit their kinsmen who would otherwise have inherited the goods and property rights transferred on the pretext of this exchange, the goods, given to the vendor by the buyer under a fictitious and pretended exchange, remaining for ever the buyer's property.

[1] In order to avoid that someone's fraud and deceit be of benefit to him, when this kind of fraudulent exchange becomes known to the kinsmen of the man who sold and transferred these goods, the judge, after issuing lawful summons at the request of the kinsmen, should return, restore and reinstitute to the plaintiff the goods that were transferred in the said way, always within one octave term and only for their common estimation.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-TWO

When an exchange cannot be annulled in any way

Then, if the father or the brother made an exchange of goods, and if his son or some kinsman, knowing it, used the exchanged goods without lawful objection or protest and collected their yield: then this exchange of goods cannot be later annulled by the son or the kinsman, because in this respect, actual use has the power of release and consent.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-THREE

If the exchange of goods includes cash, whether these goods follow the female line

Then, since property rights exchanged are not always equal in quality, yield and value, many people whose goods and property rights are of lesser value and worth often pay a certain amount of money to make the exchange equal. Some conclude from this that these goods (because they were acquired for money) should follow not only the male, but also the female line. But this is not the case.

[1] Because the keeping and transmitting of property rights shall not be judged by the branches, that is, the additional money, but by the root and origin of the way they were acquired and obtained. Hence, in these cases the persons of the female line can ask for their part only out of the additional money. But the ownership and inheritance of the property rights will remain entirely with the male line.

[2] This is indeed the case when the property rights do not by their origin and root follow the female line. And if there should be any doubt whether some property rights follow the female line with the same right as the male, then recourse should be had to the original deed by which those rights were acquired and earned.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-FOUR

What is eviction, that is, a warranty clause previously undertaken, good for

In the exchange of goods and property rights, a warranty (which is called by legists a “warranty against eviction”) is usually inserted and made. So if one of the parties, summoned by lawful process, cannot maintain the other party in the ownership of the exchanged property rights against litigants and legal challengers according to the warranty previously undertaken: then he has to give back and restore the property rights specifically given in exchange to this other party (if he still has them); and if he has already transferred them out of his hands so that they cannot be reacquired, he must give and restore to the damaged party, whom he could not maintain in the ownership of the exchanged goods, other property rights, that are estimated equal in quantity, yield and value to the transferred ones.

[1] And understand this to be true only if the warranty clause is inserted in the letter of recognizance in a simple and common form. For otherwise, if the warranty clause is written and declared with certain conditions and terms, then these stated conditions and terms must be observed in this matter.

[2] And you should understand the same of other property rights transferred by someone or sold lawfully with a warranty clause. If the vendor cannot maintain the buyer in the ownership of the goods, he is obliged to give other goods instead of these, similar in quality, quantity, yield and value to the ones sold.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-FIVE

Who are understood to be legal challengers

As legal challengers shall be understood and counted only litigants and those who proceed by law, and not violent occupiers and those who act by a mighty hand. Because no one is obliged to maintain the other party in the ownership of sold goods against such people.

[1] So when the buyer of the goods is challenged by whomever is brought to court by due process of law in respect of these goods, he must summon the vendor of the goods to court to defend his case before final judgment is passed.

[2] Because if he fails to issue summons and, because of that loses the property rights by judgment, the vendor is free and exempt from the burden of warranty, and from then on he is not obliged to maintain the buyer in his ownership.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-SIX

A notable question regarding eviction or a warranty clause previously undertaken

It may moreover be asked, that when someone undertakes to maintain another person in the ownership of a certain property, and commits himself to protect him; but later a piece of land is taken and detached by law from that estate by a third party through a perambulation of boundaries or through some other means, the body of the estate remaining intact: is the person who undertook [the warranty] obliged to maintain the other in the possession of that particular piece of land as well?

[1] Reply that he is not obliged; since he transferred that estate to the other party with all of the benefits and appurtenances belonging to it by right, and thus undertook to maintain him in the ownership of those goods. But that particular piece of land had not belonged by right to the estate and thus the vendor himself had been a mala fide possessor in regard to that parcel. Therefore, he could not have sold someone else's rights, and he did not sell them by virtue of the clause that says: with whatever "belongs or should belong to that estate by right".

[2] Unless, however, he undertook that he would maintain the other party in the ownership of the estate within the same boundaries or borders as he had held and possessed them. For in this case he must give a piece of land, equal in value to the lost one, to the other party.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-SEVEN

That donors or vendors of goods may not themselves take action against the new owners

But one more thing should be noted: that the aforementioned warranty clause refers only to outsiders and external actors, legal challengers and plaintiffs, and not to those who donated and sold the goods. I have seen cases myself when those who transferred their goods to others, themselves initiated a case and suit against the owners and lords of those goods pretending that they could not maintain them in the ownership of the said goods, thereby seeking to reacquire those goods for themselves, which should never be allowed.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-EIGHT

What is the definition of the prescription, and how many years have to pass before it variously expires

Since prescription is often referred to in court in respect of hereditary goods as well as property rights pledged, and even in cases of acts of might, a few things need to be said about the prescription. First about its nature, then about its duration and variety.

[1] So it must be known that prescription is the passing of that time which is set by the law for the just retention or re-acquisition of goods and property rights.

[2] And this period of time is a hundred years for the royal, forty years for the ecclesiastical, thirty-two years for the noble and twelve years for the burghers' goods and property rights sold, seized or alienated in any way.

[3] Likewise, in the case of acts of might, prescription is also thirty-two years.

[4] However, among villagers prescription lasts only one whole year and a day.

[5] Among kinsmen and co-inheriting kinsmen, no prescription is ever applied regarding their property rights (with the exception of acts of might), and the payment of the dower and filial quarter.

[6] Prescription is considered differently in an ecclesiastical forum. But since it is not my aim to discuss an ecclesiastical forum, I will remain silent on this and leave it to those whom it concerns.

[7] Moreover, although it is commonly held and stated by many scholars that prescription cannot be applied to the perambulation of boundaries and goods pledged, this is an opinion that should not be taken at face value, but should be properly investigated; hence, I will clearly explain it later, at its proper place.¹⁸⁷

CHAPTER SEVENTY-NINE

What are the times when prescription is suspended and when it has no place

However, it must be known that if someone happens to fall into the hands and captivity of the Turks, the Saracens, the Tartars or other infidels and his stay there exceeds the prescription; then in this case prescription has no effect whatsoever, but the nobleman deprived of his goods, arriving home, can recover them himself by judicial process without being hindered by the prescription.

[1] And if the royal majesty sentenced someone to exile, and the son – either out of fear of the prince or out of filial duty – escorted him, and while he is far and away, the prescription set for the goods of nobles of the realm in respect of the property rights acquired by others, runs out and expires; the son (who is not to be punished for his father's sin) has, upon his return, full authority to recover those parts of the alienated goods that belong to him, notwithstanding the prescription.

[2] Prescriptions of this type can always be suspended by a letter of prohibition or protest, without going to court.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸⁷ See below I. 82, I. 85.

¹⁸⁸ It was common for nobles to issue protests at places of authentication at such intervals as to keep the case open, thus rendering the prescription meaningless.

[3] For in our times the right to initiate a suit lasts only thirty-two years; and if the case had not been prosecuted in the meantime, after that time the suit has to be newly initiated.

CHAPTER EIGHTY

Pledged property rights in general

Having explained above the ownership and inheritance of property rights, and their different types, now the form and quality of rights pledged have to be discussed.

[1] Although it seems not only damnable and contrary to salvation to hold and manage pledged property rights, it is just as abominable to have to write about them. However, since imperial and Roman law allows its use, and, therefore, this dangerous practice is very common and widespread in this kingdom of ours and in the territories subjected to it, to an extent that many are not deterred by the punishment of the general decree issued, among others, in this respect, and are not willing to return property rights pledged, even when the pledge-money is deposited and repaid, but keep them as long as they can, to the peril of their souls; so it seems fitting to append a few things about the means and force of a pledge.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-ONE

What is the pledging of goods, and in how many ways it can be understood

Hence, it must be known that the pledge of property rights can be understood in two ways: from the viewpoint of the pledger, or giver, and from that of the creditor, or recipient. On the part of the pledger: pledging is the temporary transfer of his own property right to another's use, out of necessity. On the part of the creditor, or recipient: pledging is the dangerous, damnable and temporary retention of the right of another, with the gathering of its fruit and demanding the capital sum.

[1] This definition does not endorse someone reaping the fruit and yield of the pledged goods, and, in addition, demanding the capital sum; but seeks rather to condemn and denounce this kind of demand and practice. Because someone who uses the pledged goods this way should be considered as committing naked usury.

[2] But if he includes all the revenue in the capital (with the exception of those expenses that the real owner would have anyway incurred in the course of maintaining the estate), then the possession of the pledged goods should not be condemned but rather praised, as by this the creditor shows that he has performed a charitable deed to the advantage of his neighbor.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-TWO

How shall be understood that no prescription is admitted for pledged goods

It became almost a common say that prescription can neither be claimed nor admitted in cases of pledge. But the consequences of this saw may not be understood in any simple sense, but, as was explained above, the pledge should be considered in two regards, namely, that of the pledger or giver and that of the recipient.

[1] So this rule can be called true and acceptable only on the part of the pledger or giver; but on the part of the creditor or recipient, it shall be rejected outright.

[2] For it often happens that some people, forced by necessity, pledge their goods, and are unable to redeem them in their lifetime. Their sons or kinsmen, after their father's or kinsman's death, cannot redeem those pledged goods – either hindered by poverty or out of negligence or laziness, sometimes because they reside in far and distant lands in the service of their superiors, or are otherwise engaged outside the country – so they very much exceed the years and deadline of the prescription. In this case the prescription cannot be applied to the pledger.

[3] In this case, namely when the pledging nobleman's sons or kinsmen, or the heirs of the pledger can prove that those pledged goods and property rights were transferred to the hands of another as pledge, if they want to redeem and regain those goods: then the possessor of the pledged goods is obliged to return them, in spite of the hindrance of the prescription (even if the prescription had expired two, three or more times), or even if the possessor (not to say usurer) had in the meantime obtained the pledged goods on the royal right.

[4] And if he claims certain rights regarding those goods then he must seek it by due process of law, while out of real possession of the estate.

[5] But this is true only if the pledger, after pledging his goods, did not later assign those goods in perpetuity to the possessor. Because in this case the possessor is not obliged to return those goods, but the pledger's sons and kinsmen – if they allege that those goods should not have been assigned and alienated permanently to their prejudice – must follow the same legal process to reclaim such goods and property rights as is usual in cases of hereditary rights.

[6] For no one can possess the same property right on a double title, namely by pledge and by permanent right; but, when he begins to possess it in perpetuity, the effect of the pledge immediately ends and completely ceases to exist.

[7] Some people, however, understanding and interpreting wrongfully, deceitfully and malevolently the rule that says that prescription cannot be applied to goods and things in pledge, try to usurp and claim for themselves many goods and property rights of lord prelates, barons and noblemen of the realm by letters of pledge, written and issued sixty, seventy, one hundred or more years before, on the basis of the said pledge.

[8] Thus, it must be noted, that all these old and aged letters of pledge that have exceeded the prescription are to be regarded and considered null and void, having no legal force, unless the plaintiff and the acquirer of those goods can present legal and trustworthy documents and written testimony as to the violent expulsion or the unlawful seizure of those pledged goods and property rights.

[9] Regarding this kind of violent and unjust expulsion or seizure of goods, if, however, the plaintiff can present sufficient and honest testimony within the space of sixty years, but no more, that must also be accepted.

[10] Because it frequently happens that someone repays the creditor the whole amount of money for which he had pledged his goods, but does not receive or get back the letter of pledge, and the creditor gives him a letter of receipt or quittance which is easily lost, particularly if the said man is in default of heirs and his goods devolve upon and are transferred to royal hands or to others by royal donation or by any other means, so similarly in a case involving ancient letters of pledge, when the pledger dies in default [of issue], no one, especially not an outsider, should present a letter of receipt, unless it is proved (as mentioned before) that the pledged right was taken unjustly and violently from the hands of the possessor by someone. Because it would not be fair that he lose his money. Therefore things and properties are transferred to this party, along with the encumbrances.

[11] But if the creditor remembers that he has already received the capital from the pledger then he had better cede and return the pledge rather than bring damnation on his soul.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-THREE

That property rights may not be pledged above their common estimation

But you should note this point (as I briefly mentioned above)¹⁸⁹ that no lord, magnate or nobleman or man of property, be he of whatever estate, condition, dignity or eminence, may in any circumstance pledge his property rights above the value of their common estimation.

[1] If, however, the goods are pledged over their proper and common estimation to someone, then the person who pledged them to another may during his lifetime redeem them in no other way than by depositing and repaying the amount of money he has received for them.

[2] But after his death, and even during his lifetime, the sons or kinsmen of the pledger who clearly have the right of redemption can redeem those goods by the said estimation; always taking into account the aforementioned rules of selling or pledging.

[3] By common estimation you should in this case understand not oxen, horses, cows, sheep and other chattels that may be easily sold, but the value of the pledged goods and property rights, that is, how much these goods are worth according to the estimated value, including (as was mentioned above)¹⁹⁰ the arable lands, woods, meadows and other appurtenances and revenues. For, the cash payment, in the end, ought to be based on this value.

¹⁸⁹ See above I. 60. 2

¹⁹⁰ See above I 60.8.

The fixing and adjustment of boundaries, in general

Since we mentioned above that prescription does not apply to the adjustment of boundaries, I shall briefly say something about the perambulation and adjustment of boundaries.

[1] About this it must be known, that when the throne and governance of this renowned kingdom of Hungary was established, and the Hungarian people, inspired by the grace of the Holy Spirit, came to perceive the truth and professed the true faith, our glorious king and apostle, Saint Stephen, the renowned and pious king, Saint Ladislas,¹⁹¹ and many of the late serene kings of Hungary, that is their successors, granted a great number of lands (which we now call estates) separating them from the royal castles inasmuch as they belonged to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of this realm, to monasteries and parishes as alms in perpetuity, or to their servitors (whom we now call noblemen) in consideration of their services, as property in perpetuity.¹⁹²

[2] These lands were separated from other lands by landmarks at the time of their donation.

[3] The number of barons, magnates and noblemen of the realm multiplying, some of them settled and founded two, sometimes three or more villages within the boundaries of one land or estate, populating these with people and inhabitants; and sometimes they did not make any separation of boundaries among those villages. But they made among these villages some determinations as to what each might use. Sometimes, however, they did separate them by erecting landmarks.

[4] As time passed, the sons and heirs of those lords, barons, magnates and noblemen divided the property rights among themselves and one received as his share one of the villages, and the other another. When these men died, often in default [of issue], those villages and estates, devolved into some other man's hands as a donation of the late kings of Hungary or in other ways, together with the letters of boundaries; and thus the first cases regarding the perambulation and adjustment of boundaries emerged.

[5] Because those to whom passed these letters of boundaries, along with the estates mentioned in the same letters, came to believe, by virtue of these letters, that they were entitled to such other villages and estates as lay within their boundaries.¹⁹³ And even in the most recent times, many different cases regarding the adjustment of boundaries have emerged as a consequence of the occupation and outright seizure of lands by powerful and violent men.

¹⁹¹ Ladislas (László) I, king of Hungary 1077–95.

¹⁹² This is not an entirely unhistorical account of the origins of the Hungarian nobility. Most nobles were the descendants of warriors and servicemen attached until the thirteenth century to the retaining and supplying districts of royally-owned castles.

¹⁹³ Werbőczy here alludes to the territorially fractured nature of landholding in medieval Hungary. Even within a single village, there might be plots and half-plots which were owned by different noblemen.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-FIVE

How shall it be understood that no prescription applies to the adjustment of boundaries

Although prescription does not apply to the adjustment of boundaries, however, separated estates included within any letter of boundaries may not be treated as naught nor seized (especially in the aforesaid cases) by virtue of those letters of boundaries.¹⁹⁴

[1] Because the person, to whom the land or boundary¹⁹⁵ belonged, should have objected and protested at the time of the foundation and settlement of such a separated estate (so that no estate or village be established).

[2] Thus, for this separated village or estate lying (as was said) within the letter of boundaries, a delineation and assignment of boundaries, together with the long-term use and effective ownership of lands, woodlands, hills, vineyards and meadows held and owned by the peasants and inhabitants of these villages or estates, sufficient for the use of these same peasants in respect of these lands, woods, wood pastures, mountains, vineyards, waters, meadows and hayfields should be done and decided by the just and fair decision of a justice ordinary. The other clauses of the letter of boundaries remain intact to the plaintiff's benefit.

[3] Those portions or parts of lands, woodlands, vineyards and meadows, however, that were gradually detached or occupied in any way from the body, that is, the separated estate, can and must be restored by virtue of the letter of boundaries (providing that the letter was issued lawfully), and (in accordance with the ancient and approved custom of this realm) be re-incorporated to its original body by the plaintiff by means of an oath according to the quantity and estimation of the detached or occupied part; notwithstanding any argument as to the prescription.

[4] And how these lands or forests should be estimated, and how much two, three or more iugera of land, hayfield or wood are worth you will find written below, in the discussion of estimation.¹⁹⁶

CHAPTER EIGHTY-SIX

Which letters of boundaries are valid and which are not

It must further be known that during the perambulation of boundaries, and in the letters issued in these matters, many frauds and scandals are often committed.

¹⁹⁴ A rather obscure passage as the exact meaning of the expression corporalis possessio is unclear, but it seems to mean a newly founded settlement within the boundaries of an older property. The word inclusio of the letter of boundaries is a hapax legomenon, and the participle adiacens^w refers to the actual location of a property rather than its insertion in a letter. We follow here –more or less–the traditional Hungarian interpretation of this text.

¹⁹⁵ meta: could very well be a Hungarism where the word boundary (határ) also means the outlying fields of a settlement, namely, “as far as its boundaries go.”

¹⁹⁶ See below I:133.

[1] Because frequently some people, mindless of their salvation and honor, after receiving the letter of perambulation issued by the king or by one of the justices ordinary of the kingdom with the clause "We are told", bribe with money or gifts the royal or palatinal bailiff and the witness of the chapter or convent who are sent for execution, that is, the perambulation of boundaries; and, on the basis of their report, they get the chapter or convent to issue and give them such a letter of boundaries as they want, in the form of a privilege (the other party, whose lands' boundaries were fraudulently reported to be perambulated being ignorant of this), and they secretly hide these letters at home and keep quiet about the perambulation of boundaries for ten, sixteen, sometimes even twenty or more years; and then, finally, when the royal bailiff, the men of the chapter or convent, as well as the neighbors and abutters – whose names were fraudulently written in the letter of boundaries – are probably dead, they execute this perambulation of boundaries publicly and now lawfully by virtue of that letter of boundaries, and this way they appropriate much land for themselves in an unjust and deceitful way.

[2] So that these people's damnable avarice is curbed and the truth brought forth from the letter, the justices ordinary and their protonotaries should always ruminate with scrutiny, care and attention upon this kind of letter (with the clause "We are told"), issued on the basis of the report of a royal or palatinal bailiff or of the men of chapters and convents; and the truth must be established regarding their use, that is, whether the plaintiff after the perambulation of boundaries really had and possessed, by virtue of the letter of perambulation, the ownership and use of the lands mentioned and included in the letter. And if it is proved that he had neither the use nor the ownership of those lands, then it will be clear that this letter was issued unlawfully and against the due process of law of the realm, and, thus, it is null and void.

[3] However, those letters of boundaries that were issued on the legal commission of one of the justices ordinary of the realm or on a lawful perambulation of boundaries conducted with the consent and recognizance of two, three or more parties; moreover, those letters that were issued on the basis of an agreement or recognizance of the parties, as long as they do not malevolently apportion among themselves somebody else's goods and lands or cannot be proved to have done so; finally also those letters that were issued and given openly, publicly and lawfully by the royal or palatinal bailiff and the men of some place of authentication, based on a common and ordinary perambulation of boundaries conducted in the presence of neighbors and abutters of the property rights, that is, the perambulated lands, and chiefly in the presence of those to whom it is known that the possession of those lands or at least that of the neighboring lands belongs – all these letters are always to be reckoned as valid and having legal force.

[4] All borders and landmarks described and defined in letters of donation issued by any of the lawful lord kings of Hungary shall always be observed. But you should only hold this to be true when those lands and estates were not divided into several lands and estates after the donation and the fixing of boundaries or if they have not been split up by boundaries through use and ownership.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-SEVEN

What shall be thought about the lands separated by the force of rivers

Then, as the boundaries and borders of many free cities, villages, estates and many towns and deserted lands are set and defined by rivers and streams; and by the flood and force of these waters often large pieces of land, meadows and woods are separated, carried away and attached to the area of another neighboring city, town or estate; since the river, driven by vehement flood often strays and spills from its usual course, flow and bed into a new bed; so some people think and believe that the lands, meadows and woods that were annexed and attached to the area of another neighboring free city, town or village due to a change in the flow, course or bed of the river ought to belong to and come into the possession of that free city, town or village; arguing and stating that their boundaries are set by the flow, course and bed of the river. But this opinion is not correct.

[1] For, this way many frauds could be committed, and the waters and rivers – with hidden canals, and sometimes by making shallow dikes, or raising dams or filling up the bed – could be driven into a new course and bed in any direction, according to will; thus someone could easily usurp another's lands, woods and meadows.

[2] Therefore the opposite opinion shall be accepted as correct, which says: since the revenue of the water, that is, the river, especially that of the navigable river is estimated to be of great value; so if the water or river sets a new course, the free city, town or village, from the area of which the river strayed and went to others' lands and territory, cannot be deprived of its revenue, namely its mills, its ferries, its tolls, its fishing and other revenues, but rather it can reap and enjoy its revenue and benefit with full and unlimited authority when the river set a new course, as it used to do when the river flowed in its true, usual and old bed.

[3] Woods, meadows and arable lands will remain in the possession of him to whom they used to belong and who used to hold peaceful ownership of them. Because of this, some people are allowed to build and maintain dams and dikes on the territories and lands of others, to protect their own lands, meadows and woods so that their lands and territories do not suffer damage from flooding and force of water. But they should not be understood as claiming these lands for themselves.

[4] The same is true for the dams and races of mills that have been built on such a river, the one bank of which belongs to this owner or village and the other to another. Although the end of these dikes may be located on someone else's land, which is lawful (as long as it does not cause obvious harm to the other party), no river and no land of another is seized by this, but they will always remain in the hands of their true owner.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-EIGHT

What is the definition of quartal right and to whom shall it be paid

Having explained hereditary and pledged property rights, as well as the perambulation and adjustment of boundaries; now the filial quarter or quartal right shall be discussed as well as the payment and refund of the dower and the paraphernalia.

[1] Here, you have to know that the quartal right means those property rights that are given to the daughters and women from the hereditary paternal goods and property rights as a sign of descent from the kindred, not with permanent or hereditary right but under the stipulation and condition of redemption.

[2] You can find expressed above, where I described the inheritance of heirs from the paternal goods,¹⁹⁷ why the paternal property rights acquired by service do not belong to the right of the female line, and why daughters cannot get a share of these equal to that of the sons and lawful heirs; and, moreover, of what estates the daughters must get a hereditary share.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-NINE

The mode of paying the quartal rights, that is, the filial quarter

It must be noted that every baron, magnate and nobleman – whether he has one, ten or more daughters – can satisfy them with the single payment of the filial quarter, in such a way, that all the paternal property rights, together with all their revenues and appurtenances of any kind, are divided into four equal and equivalent parts: and from these one quarter, which is set aside for the filial quarter, is valued and estimated by common estimation; and the quarter shall be paid according to this estimation with a single payment to all of the daughters, and only in cash and not in marketable chattels.

[1] The ownership and hereditary right of this quarter, together with the other quarter parts or divisions, will always remain with the sons and heirs.

[2] But any of the daughters can ask separately for her quarter if she wants. However, the heirs from whom she is asking it should take care not to pay to one what they have to pay to all.

CHAPTER NINETY

That if the filial quarter was given to one of the daughters, then another one can still litigate for her inheritance

And if the filial quarter was paid to one of the daughters without legal discussion and without producing the letters and written testimonies touching upon the paternal property rights, another daughter can still litigate (if she wants) for the possession and hereditary rights of the same paternal property rights with him who was involved in this, and find out whether these rights should pass on to the female line or not.

CHAPTER NINETY-ONE

That unmarried girls cannot make recognizances

¹⁹⁷ See above I. 17, I. 21.

Since girls are often misled by their fickleness of spirit, they are never permitted to make either permanent or temporary recognizances that could cause harm to the rights of her descendants or kinsmen even if they have reached lawful and full age.

[1] This is why girls cannot be guardians of their younger brothers, and the custom of our realm does not allow them to discharge the duty of guardian.

CHAPTER NINETY-TWO

How the girls can stay in the paternal house until they get married

A clear explanation of how girls, who do not yet have their hair covered with a kerchief,¹⁹⁸ may stay in the paternal house and property rights after the death of their parents until the age of marriage, and how they should eventually be married off from these, you can find above, in the discussion of goods obtained on account of default of issue.¹⁹⁹

[1] And how the filial quarter is to be estimated, and what is the value of a castle, of a noble residence and of a tenant peasant's plot, and so on, will be clarified below, in the section on estimation.²⁰⁰

CHAPTER NINETY-THREE

The definition of dower and trousseau

Then, regarding the payment of dower and paraphernalia it must be noted that although dos [dower] (whence the word dotalitium comes), gifts and paraphernalia are very much different, we, however, with a muddled vocabulary mix up dower and gift and say dotalitium or simply dos; and this is given to the wife from her husband's goods for the defloration of her virginity and the consummation of the marriage.

[1] And we call all those chattels paraphernalia that are given to the woman either by her husband or her parents, or by her kinsmen or by anybody else on the occasion of marriage, engagement or betrothal.

[2] About which it must be known that according to the ancient and approved custom of our realm, dower is a payment which is usually given to women who are lawfully married for performing the marriage dues, out of the husbands' goods and property rights, as the status of the husband demands.

[3] Because the payment of dower is varied and made in accordance with the rank of the standing and dignity of the husband, as well as with the quantity of their goods and property rights, thus, the widow left by a baron gets more in dower than a magnate's widow. Similarly, the widow of a nobleman having a hundred or fifty tenant peasants gets more dower than that of another nobleman who had less tenant peasants.

¹⁹⁸ This expression refers to unmarried girls.

¹⁹⁹ See above I. 29.

²⁰⁰ See below I. 133.

[4] If the husband held baronial office, then his wife will get a hundred marks; or if he was a magnate or was a baron by name alone and did not hold baronial office; or if he was a distinguished nobleman or knight and he had fifty or more inhabited tenant peasants' plot, then his widow will get fifty marks in dower, each mark calculated at four Hungarian florins, that is four hundred pence in our present money.

[5] Widows of noblemen of lesser status and condition get more or less dower from their husbands' goods and property rights, in proportion to the quantity of the goods decided by common estimation (excluding arable lands, woodlands, meadows and other appurtenances and external revenues of the goods).²⁰¹

[6] After the woman's death, the person closest in line of consanguinity has the capacity to require and claim her dower.

CHAPTER NINETY-FOUR

Who are and who are to be reckoned ex officio the true barons of the kingdom

In order that no doubt arise concerning the offices and names of baronies it seemed proper to list their names here.

[1] The true barons, whose names have been included for a long time in the decrees and royal letters of confirmation,²⁰² are the following:

[2] The palatine of the kingdom of Hungary; the judge royal; the ban of the kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia; the voivode of Transylvania and ispán of the Székely; the ban of Severin, as the banate of Mačva²⁰³ was eliminated by the Turks in our times; then, the king's and queen's Masters of the Treasury,²⁰⁴ of the Doorkeepers,²⁰⁵ of the Cupbearers, of the Stewards and of the Horse, as well as the ispáns of Temes and Pozsony.

²⁰¹ This remark on the exclusion of the major parts of a noble estate from the estimation of the dower sounds rather peculiar. We have no evidence on this way of calculation from the practice.

²⁰² For an example of such a list see the draft of the royal approval of the Tripartitum.

²⁰³ The banate of Severin (Hungarian Szörény) was situated at the lower run of the Danube; the banate of Mačva was a territory south of Belgrade.

²⁰⁴ The master of the treasury (magister tavernicorum): was originally responsible for the royal court's provisioning, derived from the Hungarian name for the guards of royal magazines (tavernici); from the fourteenth century onwards, the master of the treasury was no longer associated with the treasury, but was rather the presiding judge of the appeal court of certain royal cities (sedes tavernicalis). For more, see, below III.11.

[3] The widows left by all of these usually do and should receive one hundred marks in dower and trousseau (as was mentioned above) from those whom it concerns.

CHAPTER NINETY-FIVE

That the dower has to be paid partly in cash and partly in marketable chattels, and what are marketable chattels

And the dower is always paid partly in cash, partly in movable and marketable chattels, according to their true price and value.

[1] Patched dresses and weapons, lame horses, oxen and other cattle are, however, excluded from the valuation. These cannot be accepted as payment of the dower.

[2] The movable and marketable goods shall in this respect be such that are sold in the daily markets: sheep, oxen, horses, goats, cows, calves and pigs that can easily move from one place to another.

CHAPTER NINETY-SIX

That the wife is to get the whole dower from her first husband, and half of it from the second; and what the dower shall be paid from

Then, it should be considered that any woman will get the whole dower from her first husband, because of the bloom of her virginity with which she is given in marriage; from the second husband whom she married after having lost her virginity, she will get only half of the dower; from the third, one quarter of it, and from the fourth, she will get only one-eighth of the dower.

[1] And if she gets married for the fifth or sixth time, her dower will be reduced to a very small amount.

[2] The dowries of women are paid from the goods and property rights of the husbands to which they have been brought.

[3] For, from their paternal rights they shall receive not the dower but the filial quarter, unless the woman should demand her mother's or grandmother's dower, which she can do lawfully if no quittance had been given for it.

²⁰⁵ The master of the doorkeeper (ostiarius) seems to have been something like the Speaker of the royal council. The other "masters" were barons, members of the government, usually not connected any more to their original ceremonial titles, just as in other European courts.

CHAPTER NINETY-SEVEN

How the dower and the filial quarter can be claimed together

However, it must be known that one and the same person cannot claim at the same time her mother's and her grandmother's dower.

[1] Because if I claim my mother's filial quarter, then I would be claiming my grandmother's dower, because my grandmother is my mother's mother.

[2] And if it is only my mother who claims her own filial quarter from the paternal goods, then she would be claiming her mother's and not her grandmother's dower. For claiming her grandmother's dower is up to the kin and indeed the closest one from the line of which that woman is known to have descended.

CHAPTER NINETY-EIGHT

How women can be ousted from their husbands' goods, and how not; and about their movable chattels

Then, if a husband dies childless and intestate, all his movable chattels of whatever kind and name devolve upon his wife,

[1] who, once the dower has been restored to her, cannot be excluded from her husband's goods, property rights, residence and mansion, as long as she keeps her late husband's name and title, and lives in widowhood and does not enter another marriage.

[2] If she, nevertheless, marries and becomes someone's wife, then he, upon whom the deceased husband's goods and property rights have devolved, by right of inheritance and succession has full authority to oust and exclude the woman from these goods, having first paid off her dower.

[3] Nay rather, if the goods and property rights of the deceased husband are so ample and lucrative that they far exceed the woman's dower, then he, upon whom those goods devolve can exclude the woman—even if she kept her husband's name and title—from the rest of the goods, namely those parts that surpass and exceed the value of the dower, by lawful process before his judge, and leave only such a portion of those property rights for her use as is required by the size of the dower.

[4] But the wife cannot be evicted from the place, house and mansion of her husband's usual residence, unless it happens that this house is a castle, which should not be given to her; but instead another house of her husband, located somewhere outside the castle has to be assigned for her living.

[5] It is different with those who have and own more than one castle that can serve for living in; in this case, even a woman can have a castle designated for her living.

CHAPTER NINETY-NINE

The division of the husband's movable chattels among his widow, children, and brothers

When upon his death, the deceased husband, left in his house not only a wife, but also sons and daughters, as well as joint-owning kinsmen, then first the deceased's portion in every movable chattel has to be separated and set aside from the portions of the surviving joint-owning kinsmen.

[1] Then all the deceased husband's chattels, called by whatever name, shall be equally divided between his widow, sons and daughters, and those chattels, except for the carriage horses and the husband's best garment which are to be kept by the lady widow, should be distributed in as many equal portions as the number of the still joint-owning or unmarried persons in the family, and all of them shall get their parts.

[2] Arms, however, should be transferred to the sons or to the joint-owning kinsmen without division.

[3] And if there are no such persons at all, then not only these things, but all movable chattels should devolve upon his widow (as was mentioned before), unless the husband included these in his will.

[4] Under the term "sons" understand all those boys who have not made a division with their deceased father; and under "daughters", those girls who have not yet been given in marriage or wed from his goods. For sons, after the division, and daughters, after their marriage, cannot get a portion from these kinds of paternal things and movable goods.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED

The trousseau and the chattels given with the bride and to the bride at the time of the marriage

It has to be noted, however, that the garments and other chattels that are given with the bride on the occasion (as mentioned above) of her marriage, wedding and nuptials by her parents, kinsmen or any other person (which we call trousseau) shall (if anything be left of them) remain intact and be returned to the same bride, that is the wife, when her husband dies childless. Nor should these sorts of chattels, given to her, be subject to division when the other chattels are divided.

[1] Moreover, if she has children, namely sons and daughters, and if she happens to get married a second time or otherwise does not want to live with her children, she is free to keep these chattels for herself.

[2] If the woman died childless and intestate, her parents or her closest kinsmen can recover and claim these chattels for themselves.

[3] However, if she left children, they will pass to them.

[4] The chattels given to the bride by the groom as a present either in honor of the marriage or at the engagement, can never be recovered by the groom should the bride die (before they were joined). If, however, she leaves this world after their bodily union, childless and intestate (for she can make a will about these), the chattels will remain with the husband.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND ONE

On the deceased's stud of less than fifty horses

Then, it has to be also noted that if the husband has a group of horses, which we call a stud, but less than fifty, which he collected or bought during and at the time of his marriage with his wife, it shall be divided equally between them.

[1] Moreover, even if they were in the possession of the husband before his marriage, they should be divided equally and be common property, providing their number is less than fifty.

[2] However, if their number reaches or exceeds that number, the husband can leave them by will as goods acquired by him; but if he dies intestate in respect of them, they shall be added to his sons' heritages. Nevertheless, if they are ancestral property, then testamentary provision made about them will neither hold nor be valid, except for the portion which is conceded to belong to the husband, as is allowed by law.

[3] What remains, however, will devolve with the property rights upon and belong to the sons, the joint-owning kinsmen and other lawful successors; and the dower and filial quarter can also be paid from it, so that the successors may not be forced to alienate estate in order to cover payments of this type, as they are obliged to betroth and give in marriage the daughters out of the paternal rights.

[4] But this is only when daughters, after their father's death, have not received a portion of his chattels. Because in this case their portion should be counted among the marriage dues; they should, moreover, receive their filial quarter.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWO

The husband's property rights acquired during marriage with his wife

Then, it must further be known that if the husband, even during the marriage, purchased estates and property rights and did not have his spouse's name inserted in the letter of recognizance, then the woman cannot receive a portion of these estates and property rights, (even though they were bought).

[1] However, if she wishes to, and keeps her deceased husband's name and title, then, until her death, she is free to reside and to live in her sons' and daughters' goods and property rights, but only under the condition clearly explained above in the chapter titled “How can the women be ousted from their husbands’ goods”.²⁰⁶ When I say “in her daughters’ goods”, I mean only those rights which also belong to the female line.

[2] When, however, the widow marries for a second time, she can be excluded and ousted from the goods by whosoever is entitled to do so, once the dower has been paid off. Whoever wants to please his wife through rights that are hereditary, should be sure to have his wife’s name inserted in the letters of purchase and recognizance.

[3] Nevertheless, if the deceased husband leaves behind property rights pledged to him at any time, that is before his marriage or during it, and even if his wife’s name and that of the heirs of both sexes are not inserted in the letters of obligation and pledge, then these rights should be divided equally among the spouse, the sons, the daughters and the joint-owning kinsmen in the manner of other chattels.

[4] Because pledged goods are redeemable and converted into money after redemption. And money is regarded as chattels. But this is only true if the pledged goods have not been subsequently converted into hereditary goods.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THREE

That the wife can recover her dower even from her husband’s pledged property

Furthermore it must be known that, if the woman’s husband in dire necessity (as often happens), has pledged his property rights to someone else, particularly when he has done so without his wife’s consent, then the woman, after her husband’s death, has the right to claim and receive her dower from the person who holds this property right in pledge. Because pledging does not obliterate the ownership and hereditability of these property rights.

[1] Otherwise, if the woman had to wait for their redemption, she would not be able to recover her dower. She might in the meantime depart this world before their redemption and thus be cheated of her dower.

[2] However, at the time of the redemption of those property rights the person to whom the [right of] redemption belongs, has to make satisfaction not only for the capital sum for which the goods were pledged, but also to give satisfaction in respect of the paying off of the dower.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND FOUR

That the wife’s dower is not lost because of the husband’s wrongdoing

Moreover, if the husband’s property rights are seized by law because of a misdeed or some charge of infidelity, his wife can always recover her dower from the person who comes into the possession of those property rights (even if the husband is beheaded).

²⁰⁶ See above I.98.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND FIVE

That the woman caught in adultery loses her dower but not her trousseau

It also must be noted that if the wife, violating the wifely faith she owes her husband, commits adultery, and being caught in the act, is divorced from her husband, then she loses her dower, but not her trousseau, that is, the things that were given to her at the wedding by her parents or kinsmen, her husband, or anybody else.

[1] However, if the husband, knowingly condones his wife's behavior by dwelling and sleeping with her after the adultery, then she should retain her dower as well; and afterwards, if she happens to err a second time, the husband may no longer punish her with death, which he could have done freely and justly on the first occasion, namely, when he learned of the adultery.

[2] When, however, the wife was justly punished with death for this kind of adultery, her kinsmen can demand only her paraphernalia, but not her dower. But this only if she has no children and did not make a will about these things; otherwise, they devolve upon her children or her testamentary heirs.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND SIX

Marriage between blood relatives, contracted knowingly or ignorantly

Moreover, if the marriage between a man and wife has been dissolved because of their unknown consanguinity or affinity,²⁰⁷ then the woman will recover from the man her dower as well as the trousseau. Their children, who were begotten during the marriage, will also retain the right of succession to both parents' goods and property rights.

[1] However, this does not mean that both lines will equally inherit: if those goods are subject only to the male right, they will belong only to the sons, and if they follow both lines, then the sons and daughters will equally inherit.

[2] In contrast, if such a marriage was contracted knowingly and against the objection of their kinsmen or those who should succeed them, and regardless whether or not a dissolution eventually happened; then the children begotten during the marriage cannot inherit their parents' goods and property rights, but these instantly devolve upon the kinsmen or whomever should succeed. The act of legitimization has no consequence at all for the inheritance of goods (which belong to the kinsmen and, lacking these, to the royal majesty) even in respect of marriages which the pope legitimates. In addition, the woman loses her dower, and can only recover her paraphernalia from her husband.

²⁰⁷ The counting of affinity in Hungarian legal practice is discussed by Erik Fügedi in The Elefánthy, 13-5.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN

How can a marriage knowingly contracted between blood-relatives be recognized

And the knowledge of the spouses will be obvious when the marriage was contracted over and against the reproaches and objections of the kinsmen or of whosoever else should succeed; or the consanguinity between them was so close that they must both have known it.

[1] Because consanguinity, according to the holy canons and also the laws of our realm, prohibits and forbids marriage within and including the fourth degree.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHT

That the ignorance of blood-related spouses makes their children legitimate, and the knowledge makes them illegitimate

Whence it follows that ignorance in this matter makes and brings forth legitimate children; knowledge, however, illegitimate ones in regard to the inheritance of both parents' immovable property.

[1] And neither the pope (as we said before) nor our prince can make [children] legitimate in respect of the aforementioned succession to the prejudice and against the wishes of the legitimate sons and other lawful heirs; except in the case, when, not having sons or kinsmen, the inheritance belongs directly to our prince. For in this case, the prince has the full power to dispose of those goods and property rights, to whomsoever and in whatever way he wishes.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND NINE

In what ways can a wife release her dower to her husband

Yet the wife (usually) releases her dower to her husband during their marriage for three reasons: first, when the husband increases and augments his spouse's wealth, the inheritance of which will not belong nor devolve to him; secondly, when the husband otherwise incurs needful expenses on these; thirdly, when the wife out of her dower charges, commits or in any other way obliges her husband with her salvation after her death. However, according to present custom, the woman can release her dower to the man notwithstanding the aforesaid conditions, especially on her death-bed, when the suspicion of fear and the threat of the man are removed.

[1] It is different, however, if the wife, being alive and healthy, is forced by her husband through fear and dread to concede her goods. Because in such a case, once lawful protest and retraction has been made by the woman, the release and the recognizance performed about it will not be valid.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TEN

In what ways can a husband make a recognizance about his goods in favor of his wife, and vice versa, a wife, in favor of her husband

Furthermore, although many people have the opinion that because of the husband's boundless and profound love for his wife and because of the woman's fear of her husband neither the husband in favor of his wife, nor the wife in favor of her husband can make a recognizance about their goods and property rights permanently or in pledge; nevertheless, according to the ancient and approved law of this realm of ours, both the husband in favor of his wife and similarly, the wife in favor of her husband is allowed to draw up and make as well as perform permanent recognizances regarding all their property rights, especially those acquired or otherwise gained by themselves, in respect of which they could draw up and perform recognizances even to other unknown persons or outsiders, selling and alienating those goods under the conditions listed and explained above.

[1] As long as such a recognizance is clearly not prejudicial to the sons and kinsmen.

[2] And it should not be performed under coercion, force or fear. For in that case it will have no validity once the woman makes lawful objection.

[3] Recognizance by title or right of pledge between spouses is not admitted at all unless it is performed for an obvious and manifest cause and reason. Supposing that the wife openly and with many people's knowledge brought with her from the house and home of her father or of her previous husband cash, or jewels, gems or necklaces or gold and silver objects to her husband, and the husband converted them for the purchase or redemption of goods or the construction of fishponds or mills or the building of houses; then in these and similar cases (if namely no fraud is implied), a pledge and inscription is regarded as admissible.

[4] Because if it is straightforwardly admitted that the husband had often encumbered his goods with such amounts of money out of the love and favor of his spouse, then after his death his successors (particularly if these are odious to him) will only with difficulty be able to extract the aforesaid goods from the hand of the wife or of whomsoever they were inscribed.

[5] And the same applies to the wife in favor of the man (if there is reasonable and obvious cause and circumstance).

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND ELEVEN

The children's lawful and non-lawful age and their appointing of attorneys

Since the children and sons of barons, magnates and noblemen are often left behind at a young and non-lawful age when their fathers pass away and depart from this world, and it is fitting and right that they be subject to someone's guardianship, education and protection: so it seems necessary to talk about the guardianship and education of these children.

[1] But before we discuss this guardianship, it is appropriate to address the ages of the same children.²⁰⁸

[2] So it is to be known that some children are of full age, others are not. Males reach full age at twenty-four; females, according to our present custom at sixteen years of age.

[3] Under age are those who are younger than the years of full age. Among these, some are of lawful age, others are of non-lawful age. Those of lawful age (who are also called adolescents) are in our times twelve years old, males and females alike.

[4] Nevertheless, according to our ancient custom males were considered to be of lawful age at the age of fourteen, and females at the age of twelve.

[5] And they are considered and called of lawful age, because they can initiate and pursue lawsuits against others. All those who are younger than these years, are said to be of non-lawful age.

[6] According to ancient practice and custom, males may start to appoint attorneys in the fourteenth year of their lives; in our times and according to present practice, however, they can appoint attorneys at the age of twelve; they can make recognizances about debts and pledges at the age of sixteen; and about their golden and silver objects and other chattels at the age of eighteen. Finally, at the age of twenty-four, they have full authority to sell, exchange and alienate by any title all their chattels and property rights as they wish; fully complying, however, with the aforementioned conditions regarding the sale and alienation of goods and property rights.

[7] Girls can similarly appoint attorneys at the age of twelve; at the age of fourteen they are allowed to answer for debts and pledges, as well as for their gold and silver and other chattels; at the age of sixteen, they can make recognizances about and dispose, as they wish, of their filial quarter, their dower and all their other property rights, in the aforementioned manner and under the previously stated conditions.

[8] But girls, and especially those who are under someone's guardianship, should not be forced by threat of violence at the age of sixteen or even above to any recognizances. And in this case, after they have been given in marriage, they are free to revoke and retract such a forced recognizance without any ado, because they were principally not at that time sui iuris, that is, they were not under their own power.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWELVE

Who are considered to be sui iuris and on the three kinds of guardianship of children.

Those are said to be sui iuris who are not under anyone's power.

[1] It is known that virgins and girls are always under someone's guardianship and power, until they are married to a man. For, otherwise, not having a guardian, they could on account of their fickle disposition be easily misled and deceived. So it is appropriate to say something about the guardianship and guardians of children.

²⁰⁸ On the matter of age in medieval Hungarian law, see József Holub, "Le rôle de l'âge dans la droit hongroise du moyen âge." Revue d'histoire de droit française et étrangère 1 (1922): 78–140.

[2] Here it is to be noted that there are three kinds of guardianship: statutory, testamentary and appointed. Guardianship can be defined as a justly given and bestowed power to take care of those who, because they are under age, cannot protect themselves; still, in the true sense of the word, it always means protection.

[3] Hence, guardians have authority only to protect the wards' goods, not to alienate them.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN

The first kind of guardianship, called statutory

Protection by parents as well as by kinsmen is called statutory guardianship. Now, if the father predeceased, and the mother survived, and boys and girls of non-lawful age remain behind in the paternal house, then the mother is allowed to hold and exercise guardianship over her sons and daughters as long as she bears her late husband's name and title and does not marry for a second time.

[1] And, conversely, if the mother dies and the father survives, even if he is of non-noble and peasant origin, and the property rights devolve upon the sons and daughters not by paternal but by maternal right, the father, and no one else, may take custody of the goods and even of the children. Because tutelage of the person is held to be more important than the maintenance of goods. And this is to be for as long as the boys remain of non-lawful age; however, as mentioned above, daughters have to be under continuous guardianship even at their lawful age, until they wed.

[2] It has to be observed, however, that if a non-noble father takes a second wife and starts to waste the goods of his wards left from his first wife, then his guardianship will cease and pass on to someone else.

[3] Nevertheless, if a son pass away and his father be a nobleman, he will hold the guardianship and take care of his grandchildren as the paterfamilias.

[4] And let us not forget, that if the wards' mother possesses some separate paternal goods belonging only to her, not to her husband, then the mother cannot be excluded from her sons' and daughters' guardianship in this regard after her husband's death, (even if she enters a second marriage); since inheritance constitutes the basis of guardianship, and in this case the mother is considered as leaving the sons and daughters as her successors and heirs.

[5] But if the son have kinsmen, upon whom his paternal goods and rights should devolve and pass, then the guardianship and maintenance of these paternal goods will be exercised not by the mother but by the kinsman closest by birth, as will be discussed in detail below, regarding the guardianship of kinsmen and cognates.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTEEN

The second kind of guardianship, called testamentary

The second kind of guardianship is called testamentary. That is when the father, on his deathbed, considering that his sons and daughters are young and of non-lawful age, and that he lacks a kinsman who ought to take the burden of guardianship, or has one, but he knows that this kinsman intends to grab his goods, and, thus, would be an untrustworthy guardian, submits his sons and daughters to the guardianship and protection of his cognates or blood-relatives or often of his friends.

[1] And this guardianship extends not only to the living sons and daughters, but also to those born posthumously, and it will always be lawful and valid, provided that it is not precluded by the lawful and just objection of the brothers or of the wife, and as long as the will specifies only such persons as are eligible to be guardians according to the custom of our realm.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN

The third kind of guardianship, called appointed

The third kind of guardianship is called appointed, since [the guardian] is appointed by the prince, and it is also called the guardianship of the prince and protectors.

[1] And this occurs when statutory as well as testamentary guardianship are absent and lacking, that is, should the father die intestate and leave neither brothers nor kinsmen to whom the guardianship could go.

[2] The appointing of guardian pertains to the prince and protector. Since in the absence of any kinsman who ought to bear the burden of guardianship by virtue of succession in the goods, this right of succession will directly devolve upon the prince, who, as the lawful and true successor and protector of those orphans and wards, is the provider of their protection, and he must in fact assist them, by virtue of having assumed the royal office.

[3] Wherefore it should be known that in these circumstances our prince must designate and appoint such guardians for the orphans and wards whom he knows not to covet their goods and property rights and who live in the same county where the orphans themselves have their personal residence; and where there is no fear that they might, as guardians, alienate or waste their wards' goods.

[4] These appointed guardians must make an inventory and list of all the orphans' goods and property rights in the presence, if possible, of the ispán or alispán, or, otherwise, in the presence of one or two noble magistrates of the county in which (as was said before) the wards themselves live; or, if their goods and property rights, being numerous and large, are located in several counties, then in the presence of one of the judges ordinary of the realm, or one of their deputies (according to the quality and condition of the goods and property rights), so that at the end of the tutelary period they can make a proper account of all the goods listed and entrusted to them, and also of the fruits of the goods collected in the meantime.

[5] Because, the guardians have to compensate the orphans, when they reach lawful age, for wrongful management. And not only the appointed, but also the statutory and testamentary guardians are so obliged.

[6] That the minor wards or orphans, that is, who are of non-lawful age should be under guardianship is proper and in accord with natural law and reason, for those, who, being under age, cannot take care of themselves, should be governed by the guardianship and protection of others.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTEEN

How should the kinsmen of the male and female lines follow each other in guardianship

To comprehend the aforesaid more clearly, it should be known that the task of guardianship passes and is recognized as following the same order as the succession of goods, that is, the inheritance of property rights. Thus, in the absence and lack of testamentary guardians, the office of guardianship passes and devolves to the deceased person's brothers and kinsmen who would inherit his goods were he to die in default of heirs.

[1] And kinship extends in two ways, namely on the male and the female lines. In assuming guardianship, the kinsmen descending on the male line (who are also called agnates) always precede the blood-relatives and kinsmen on the female line (who are also called cognates). And these cognates of the female line are not allowed to exercise guardianship unless there are absolutely no kinsmen of the male line or agnates.

[2] And even that holds when it is recognized that the goods and property rights of the wards and orphans belong to both lines, namely the male and the female ones, and clearly follow both lines.

[3] Because if the succession and devolution of the goods and property rights is doubtful (namely, whether they belong to both lines or pertain exclusively to the male line), then the cognates are not allowed to be guardians, even when there are no agnates, lest they appear under cover of guardianship to arrogate to themselves the ownership and possession of the goods of the orphans. In such cases appointed guardians should therefore be requested from the prince.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTEEN

What should be done about guardianship when the property rights belong to both lines

It should also be considered, however, that if the property rights of the wards patently belong to both lines, that is, if the persons of the female line held effective ownership of those property rights while the orphans' father was still alive, then a distinction will need to be made in respect of guardianship.

[1] The agnates and cognates will either be of one and same age, or they will differ from each other in age and years. If they are of the same age and capacity as guardians, that is, if they have reached twenty-four years of age, then the agnates (as was just said) should assume guardianship.

But if the cognates are older, and the agnates are younger, then the cognates should be assigned as guardians until such a time as the agnates are capable of guardianship.

[2] Although we recall some cases when, having reached lawful age, kinsmen and agnates were assigned as guardians, but before full age of children that is marked, as said before, by the twenty-fourth year of age. In cases in particular when the mother of the orphans is reported to have married a second time, and, we so found their goods to be in danger of waste, in a case such as this, the aforesaid guardianship is also valid.

[3] It should be known, however, as being always the case in respect of the agnates as well as the cognates, that is, of the persons of both the male and the female lines, that the burden and exercise of guardianship shall be taken by those (as said before) who are known to be closer and nearer to the orphans in the line of consanguinity, and are older by age and years.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTEEN

What is agnation and cognation, or agnate and cognate

Where it has to be briefly noted that this usage of "agnation" is not a natural, but rather a civil term, and it was introduced by civil law as a distinction in natural kinship, so that it can denote the difference in origin of males and females.

[1] Whence it is clear that all our agnates are also our cognates, but not vice versa. Because agnation is a species of cognation; but cognation is a general name that is applied to both males and females. However, (as said above) here the term agnation designates only persons of the male line, while cognation those of the female line.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND NINETEEN

Whether testamentary guardianship cancels statutory guardianship, and conversely

But here the question arises: whether testamentary guardianship cancels statutory guardianship, or conversely, the statutory cancels the testamentary? The answer is that testamentary guardianship, created properly and in the right way, vested in persons who are lawfully eligible, often overrides statutory guardianship, but not always.

[1] To make it more clear and easier to understand, it has to be considered that if a father (even if sui iuris) entrusts his immature and young sons to some persons who are perjurers or notorious oath breakers, called ludas in the vernacular,²⁰⁹ or who are otherwise infamous or proscribed, or who have incurred the charge of infidelity in any way: they cannot (even if they descended from the male line of ancestry) be admitted to the guardianship with prejudice to their kinsmen who should lawfully inherit, since they are barred from the right to inheritance because of their infamy and charge.

²⁰⁹ On ludas see below II. 30.

[2] Similarly, if the father (not having sons) in his testament entrusts his daughters to the protection of one of the cognates, this kind of guardianship is not regarded valid and permitted, since it would cause harm and prejudice to the rights of agnates, or the co-inheriting kinsmen who would normally inherit his goods. Lest under the cover of such guardianship the kinsmen be defrauded of their just rights.

[3] Frequently, though, a father, perceiving that he lacks sons and seized by love for his daughters, often tries to make them inherit his property rights, not only through guardianship, but also by different means and titles, with prejudice to the kinsmen who should succeed him.

[4] Conversely, however, when the father notices that one of his kinsmen or agnates covets his goods through a new division or by other devices and pretexts, or has even started a lawsuit for this reason, then the father can entrust the protection of his sons to whomsoever he prefers, notwithstanding the right of inheritance and, consequently, the right of statutory guardianship.

[5] However, he cannot entrust it to the cognates, due to the aforesaid reasons; unless the goods and property rights are to devolve upon and belong clearly to both lines. For, in this case he can entrust the guardianship of his orphans and sons to cognates as well.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY

Two noteworthy corollaries on the succession of guardianship

Two corollaries can be inferred from the aforesaid. First, that properly assigned testamentary guardians have priority before other guardians, namely the statutory and appointed ones, in a way that first the testamentary guardians, then the statutory ones, and finally the appointed ones are to be entrusted with the guardianship.

[1] The second corollary is, that guardianship (as was explained above) follows the order of devolution of goods; hence, adopted brothers, who are to inherit someone's goods and property rights by virtue of some contract and royal consent, if that person dies in default of male issue, and has only daughters, rightly succeed and can like agnates be entrusted with the guardianship, notwithstanding the right or guardianship of any cognate.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-ONE

Cases when kinsmen must not be entrusted with the guardianship

It also should be known that there are four particular instances when agnates, brothers or half-brothers, or co-inheriting kinsmen, must not be allowed to take up guardianship.

[1] First, when one of the kinsmen loses his head or goods, such as those sentenced to capital punishment. Because as long as the kinsman is under the weight and burden of such a sentence, he is not permitted to exercise guardianship.

[2] Secondly, when he, without reasonable and obvious cause, squandered a village that belonged to the mutual inheritance of the kindred (by selling or otherwise alienating it), then he will lose the office of guardianship, even if by doing so he redeemed his head; because it can now be assumed and envisaged that he would similarly squander and alienate the goods of the orphans and wards.

[3] Thirdly, when one of the kinsmen or agnates subjects himself or lets himself be subjected under the right, that is, the power, of someone else. Because if someone is not sui iuris, he cannot bear the guardianship of another.

[4] Fourthly, when someone has incurred the charge of infidelity or been condemned for perjury, or otherwise become infamous or proscribed. Just as he was deprived of his hereditary rights, so also he loses the guardianship.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-TWO

In how many ways can the guardians be excused of the burden of guardianship

Furthermore, it has to be noted that the guardians, particularly appointed ones, can be excused of the burden of guardianship in many ways.

[1] First, because of the great number of their sons and the remote location of their residence, since they cannot cope with diverse affairs.

[2] Secondly, because of the great number of their villages or estates, located in various places and counties.

[3] Then, because of the continuous warfare of the princes, if they are soldiers, doing active and regular military service.

[4] Then, because of public service and handling the princes' affairs, such as chancellors, envoys sent abroad, protonotaries, stewards, administrators of incomes, dispensers of things and monies, and similar officeholders.

[5] Then, because of an incurable and fatal illness; and often because of illiteracy.

[6] Then, because of the mortal enmity that they hold against the wards' father, and similarly against the wards.

[7] Then, because of old age, that is, if they are over sixty.

[8] Then, if they have not reached full age, that is, they are younger than twenty-four, they can (if they wish) request to be excused of the burden of guardianship.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THREE

That the guardians have to discharge the office of guardianship faithfully, and in how many ways they can become untrustworthy

It also must be considered, that guardians have to exercise guardianship over the wards in good faith.

[1] Because otherwise, if the suspicion be proven and they are found to have exercised guardianship badly and wickedly, they are not only to be removed from the office and exercise of guardianship, but, moreover, if they should be found and acknowledged as untrustworthy in respect of the properties and worldly goods of the ward, they are condemned to repay double the damage done to the ward.

[2] If, however, it becomes evident that they acted unfaithfully or contrary to their duty against the person of the wards or in a lawsuit about their property rights, it will bring eternal infamy to their head. Moreover, they should be forced to pay back double (as said before) the damage caused by this.

[3] And the guardians become and turn untrustworthy in several ways. First, if they squander fool headedly their wards' goods.

[4] Secondly, if they do not give their wards the necessities of life, such as food and clothing.

[5] Then, if they maltreat their wards without proper reason.

[6] Then, if they do not teach them good behavior, or if the guardians themselves behave badly.

[7] Then, if they are very poor.

[8] Then, if they were mortal enemies of the orphans' father, or, after his death, they are or intend to be open enemies of the wards.

[9] Then, if it is feared that they covet the goods of the wards, and they want to usurp those goods.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR

How can guardians be accused? And on insane wards

It shall be further noted that such guardians, be they testamentary or of any other kind, can be accused by anyone at all—man or woman, outsider, cognate, or brother-in-law—providing they are acting honestly, on suspicion of the aforementioned matters, namely the misuse and squandering of the goods and property of the orphans.

[1] But wards who are of non-lawful age are, of course, not allowed to accuse their guardians; but once they reach and pass lawful age (that is, when they can be part of and initiate lawsuits), providing they are of sound mind, they can accuse their trustees on the advice of their relatives.

[2] Where it must be known that, when the sons have reached lawful age, their father cannot in his will order a guardian for them against their wishes and consent; since they are of the age when they can defend themselves in the course of the law.

[3] And when the parents assign a guardian for their sons, with their consent or on their own request when they have reached maturity, then he is not called a guardian, but rather a trustee. Because guardians are given for immature children without their consent, while trustees are ordered for the mature ones, upon their request.

[4] And this only, if those requesting are of sound mind. Because if the sons are insane, mad, lunatic or demented, even after reaching lawful age, they are subject to the protection of the testamentary guardians, or lacking these, that of their brothers or agnates, and lacking even these, that of the guardians appointed by the prince or the justices ordinary of the realm by order of a court, and they [the sons], along with their goods and property rights, are directed by their [the guardians'] provisions.

[5] And these guardians, as may be necessary, especially for the sustenance of their wards, can assume their burden as well as make dispositions in respect of their goods as necessity requires, but they cannot alienate them.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE

That the prince can assign a guardian even when the courts are not in session

Since taking on the burden of guardianship is a pious act, therefore, an accusation against untrustworthy guardians can be freely made at any time when suspicion emerges, even when the octave and the short courts are not in session, and these cases can be submitted to the prince, that is, his royal majesty, so that the goods of the wards may not be badly and uselessly squandered.

[1] And when a guardian is accused on suspicion of this, namely of the crime of misusing and wasting the orphans' goods: the prince will immediately suspend him from the guardianship and the administration of all the goods of the wards, and they will be given and assigned to the public hand until the case is decided.

[2] And if the untrustworthy guardian departs this world before the investigation in the case is concluded, then the manner and punishment of what has been suspected shall be dropped, but the heirs and successors of the said guardian must account for the misuse of the property and are obliged to give satisfaction.

[3] And if a guardian is proven to have borne and conducted the guardianship and the office of guardian fraudulently, he must still be removed from guardianship even if he offers satisfaction and compensation, promising and naming guarantors in this matter; and the prince will assign and order another guardian of good repute to stand in his place. Because the guardian's offer of satisfaction does not erase the wrongful intent and does not remove the propensity for repeated wrongful acts; rather, it shows and demonstrates his intent to continue misusing the wards' property and goods. And it pertains to the prince alone to take measures, and to apply remedy.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIX

That the guardians can proceed in every case of the wards

It must not be omitted that since there are three kinds of guardians, namely statutory, testamentary and appointed, therefore they must present clear evidence of their guardianship in court.

[1] Once they presented it and verified their guardianship, they have the authority, by virtue of a letter of age, to proceed in every case, dispute, procedure and other affairs of the orphans and wards, either in the courts of the justices ordinary or anywhere else, until they reach lawful age, and to arrange everything properly.

[2] And the wards (even if they reached lawful age) may not, without their knowledge or consent, employ an attorney nor can they make any recognizances during the time of their wardship. And if they employ an attorney or make a recognizance, these will lack all legal capacity.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVEN

The examination of the age of the wards and letters of age

The age of the wards is usually examined, measured and debated by the justices ordinary of the realm or by their protonotaries or at places of authentication, that is, in chapters and convents.

[1] And such an examination (as long as a letter of age is issued in respect of it) will be given credence in every court; and by the virtue of these letters of age, the guardians can at any time take action and make objections, as well as respond to objections and allegations in the name of the orphans.

[2] Moreover, if they notice that in the course of any lawsuit that their wards will be found in the wrong and lose the case, they have full authority to make an agreement and (in accordance with the nature of the case) come to terms with the other party in the name of the orphans, but only to their advantage and not to their detriment.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHT

What force letters of age have and how recognizances made before full age have to be revoked

Since letters of age carry in all matters and suits the force of a letter of advocacy, they may help and empower the wards once the age of wardship has been reached and has run out, should they have made a permanent recognizance in respect of their goods and property rights to anyone at any time at any place before they reached full age, that is, twenty-four years, lured by gifts and deceived by flattering talk, and not being frightened and forced by someone's menaces or threats: such recognizances can be later revoked and cancelled by presentation of a letter of age.

[1] But only so, if the orphans, considering that they made these recognizances unadvisedly, revoke and retract them with their own words before the justices ordinary of the realm or before their protonotaries, or at places of authentication, before their full age is completed.

[2] And this kind of revocation can be done properly not only where and before whom the recognizance had been [previously] made, but also before other judges and other witnesses within the set time, that is, before reaching full age.

[3] But if they neglect to revoke and retract such recognizances in time, the recognizances will subsequently have the force of permanent validity and will always stand; however, within the aforesaid required conditions of alienating property.

[4] The said revocation and retraction of the recognizance being done, the revoker himself can always initiate litigation and action in respect of the revoked recognizance within the time of prescription, that is, thirty-two years.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINE

That orphans do not have to respond in cases initiated during the age of wardship

Hence, the orphans, while they are in the age of wardship, may be freed of any lawsuit or case brought against them during their age of wardship simply on production and presentation of a letter of age.

[1] Nor are they obliged to respond at anyone's request before their lawful age in cases and lawsuits initiated and brought against them during their age of wardship and non-lawful age (excepting cases initiated during the time of their father), in matters of property rights, dower or filial quarter, or acts of might, or damage or any other matter whatsoever.

[2] However, if a case about property rights, which is usually handled in a protracted lawsuit, is brought against the wards during the time of their wardship and non-lawful age, then the lawsuit will continue until the term set for legal response, but, at the term of response, the orphans' wardship and non-lawful age has to be adduced through the letter of age, and in this way the case may be postponed and adjourned until the first year of lawful age, that is, when the orphans turn twelve, namely, when they may first employ an attorney.

[3] For, otherwise, if they are forced to respond earlier, and even if they respond willingly out of ignorance, such a response will not stand, but may be revoked straightforwardly and without ado.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY

That the wards are obliged to respond in cases initiated during their father's time

I did not casually include the aforesaid clause "except cases initiated during the time of their father", because in that case the wards, however young, must respond in cases that were initiated and brought against them during their father's lifetime and, after the response, pursue the cases and bring them to conclusion.

[1] And if during the case one of the wards happens to be judged to take an oath, this oath-taking shall be postponed until the first year of the lawful age of that ward; as will be discussed in more detail in the second part of this work, describing the ways of taking oaths.²¹⁰

²¹⁰ See below II. 37: 2.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-ONE

Another case, in which the wards must respond during their non-lawful age

Beside this, there is another instance in which the wards, notwithstanding their non-lawful age and wardship, must respond through their guardians and oversee the proceedings of cases brought against them while in that age. This is when the institution of some property rights or the perambulation of boundaries, done by anyone, is thwarted by objection made in the name and person of the orphans, and the wards, because of this contradictory objection, are summoned to an octave court.

[1] Because in this case, they are obliged to respond and give reason for their objection observing due legal process in the way and form as persons of lawful age do. The reason for this is that they interfered in this case of their own accord and volition. And although they are summoned to court on somebody else's request, they are not defendants, but are rather plaintiffs, who clearly attempt to oppose the other party's rights.

[2] Because if they did not deliberately object to the institution or the perambulation of boundaries, that is, the rights of the other party, they would not have been summoned to court at all. Thus, it can be seen that in this respect the case was raised not against them but rather by them.

[3] It is a different matter, however, when someone tries to obtain institution or make a perambulation of boundaries of such lands or goods and property rights that are peacefully owned by the orphans. In this case they must wilfully object to the institution or the perambulation of boundaries.

[4] Because if they stayed silent, they would be excluded from their ownership; therefore, in this matter, just as in the cases mentioned earlier, they will not be obliged to respond before their lawful age.

[5] And in cases raised for goods that were obtained from the prince on the basis of default of issue of a deceased person or devolved upon someone by force of contract, the course and order of the law shall be kept in the way described and explained above.

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-TWO

That those who summon wards shall be sentenced to their man-price

Finally, it has to be known, that wards cannot do anything either with or without the knowledge of their guardian until they reach lawful age, when they are freed from any guardianship, because they are not sui iuris:

[1] Therefore, those who summoned and accused the orphans of acts of might (stating that they, or others at their behest, committed such acts of might) will be immediately sentenced to their man-price (as will be discussed in the second part, on conditions of summons).²¹¹

CHAPTER ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THREE

What is the judicial estimation of movable and immovable property, and how it is done

Because the estimation of goods is especially needed in the arrangement of many matters, it is proper to add here its way and order.

[1] Wherefore it is to be noted that in accordance with the ancient and approved custom of this realm of ours judicial estimation is the fixed and established appraisal of the proper value of movable and immovable goods.

[2] Or in other words: the estimation is the fixed appraisal of movable and immovable goods, on the basis of their equivalence or value.

[3] There are two kinds of estimation: perennial and common. Perennial estimation, which is usually applied only to property rights and not to chattels, is ten times higher than the common estimation.

[4] In common estimation a populated tenant peasant's lot is valued at one mark, that is one mark of four florins, but in perennial estimation it is valued at ten marks, that is at forty florins.

[5] This perennial estimation is applied in few matters and cases; almost the entire body of the community of prelates, barons, magnates and nobles uses the common estimation. Unless the perennial estimation is stated with clear words in someone's recognizances or letters of obligation or is expressed in the general decrees of the realm, its use is rarely permitted. The list of common estimation is as follows:

[6] A castle of stone is estimated at 100 marks.

[7] Then, a monastery or cloister, in which there are burial places of the patrons or other distinguished noblemen, is estimated at 100 marks.

[8] A church with two towers, founded as a monastery, is estimated at 50 marks.

[9] A church with two towers, not a monastery or not founded as a monastery, is estimated at 25 marks.

[10] Any other one-towered mother-church, which has a burial place, is estimated at 15 marks.

[11] Built without tower but still having a burial place, at 10 marks.

[12] A chapel built of wood or a sanctuary not made of stone, but with a burial place, at 5 marks.

²¹¹ See below II 23

- [13] Without a burial place, at 3 marks.
- [14] Churches and chapels built in addition to the mother-church, are not taken into account in the estimation.
- [15] Then, a populated noble plot or noble house, at 3 marks.
- [16] If not populated, at one-and-a-half marks.
- [17] Without any buildings, at 1 mark.
- [18] Then, a populated tenant peasant's plot, at 1 mark.
- [19] A deserted one with buildings, at half a mark.
- [20] If there are no buildings at all on it, but it is located next to other plots, it is estimated at one quarter of a mark, that is, 100 pence. And if it is not located next to other plots, it is to be considered as a field and it is not estimated.
- [21] Then, a noble orchard planted with full-grown and fruit-bearing trees, which is one royal iugerum in size,²¹² at 3 marks.
- [22] On the island of Csallóköz²¹³, however, every full-grown and fruit-bearing tree, up to twelve of them, is estimated at 100 pence; the trees above twelve, be they of whatever number, are estimated collectively at 3 marks.
- [23] The orchard of a tenant peasant, if it is located outside the village, at 1 mark. The orchard located behind or at the plot is not estimated.
- [24] Then, common or arable land, that measures at least one royal aratrum,²¹⁴ at 3 marks.
- [25] Then, a common wood, on which no pig-tithe or other tax is collected, and which has no definite income, is estimated at the same amount as one royal aratrum of arable land, that is, at 3 marks.
- [26] For scrub and thickets the same rule is applied.
- [27] Then, a large wood, also called permissoria, that is suitable for common work and use, up to three royal aratra, each aratrum being estimated at 10 marks.
- [28] However, whatever is above three aratra is not subject to estimation, but is estimated only as three aratra.
- [29] Then, a major wood, that is, a lumber- or acorn-bearing wood, which is used for timber and hunting, and is good for any kind of work or craft, if it measures three royal aratra in size or volume, each aratrum is estimated at 50 marks.

²¹² iugerum (Hung. hold), a measure of land of Roman origin (120×240 feet = 0.66 acre), but of highly variable size. In medieval Hungary a 'royal hold' was equal to 0.84 ha.

²¹³ Csallóköz (Žitný ostrov in Slovak) is an island between two branches of the Danube, now in Slovakia, southeast of Bratislava.

²¹⁴ aratrum (=plough): usually referring to the size of land that--customarily--could be cultivated by one plough team, has been estimated at very different sizes from 50 to 150 ha; the best argued being ca. 126 hectares, containing 150 jugera (as below [49])

[30] And if its annual income can be easily calculated, especially, if it is an oakwood, then it has to be estimated at ten times its annual income. The part above three aratra is not subject to estimation, as in the case of permissoria.

[31] Then, if the arable land does not measure one or a half royal aratrum, so it is only five, six or ten, etc. iugera, in this case each iugerum (according to how many) should be estimated at 40 pence. Some say that the same rule applies to permissoria and groves.

[32] However, for the purpose of common estimation, this valuation, in contrast to the one above, does not seem to be just and proper, and shall be altogether regarded as inadmissible. Because if you estimate arable land or common wood, measuring one royal aratrum at three marks and the aratrum is divided into one hundred and fifty royal iugera; then properly calculated no more than 12 pence will fall on each iugerum of land, and only four iugera remain not estimated that will be valued at 50 pence. Fifty pence, however, cannot be easily divided into one hundred and fifty fillér or obulos. This is why those four iugera, according to the majority, should not be estimated.

[33] In calculating the permissoria or woodlands suitable (as said before) for common work, measuring one aratrum and estimated at ten marks, each iugerum shall be put or estimated at 26 pence and 1 fillér,²¹⁵ and 25 pence will remain as surplus or residue. And if we want to divide the amount in a different way into marks, then each iugerum is to be estimated at 27 pence, and seven more pence need to be added. Regarding the aforementioned land you can do the same calculation (if you wish).

[34] Then, one *falcastrum*²¹⁶ meadow or hayfield that, in other words, measures one royal iugerum is estimated at one quarter of a mark, that is, at 100 pence.

[35] Hayfields in outlying fields that can be scythed, but are rarely or never scythed, are not subject to estimation.

[36] Then, the undershot mill which also works at times of drought, at 10 marks; one that does not, at 6 marks.

[37] The overshot mill which works at times of drought, at 5 marks. The one that does not work in drought, at 3 marks.

[38] The site of an undershot, deserted mill, at 3 marks; one of an overshot one, at one-and-a-half marks.

[39] Then, a spurting spring or a running well that does not dry out, which is used for drinking by the people in any village is estimated at three-and-a-half marks. And if there are more of these, they are not estimated but counted as one, since one well is enough for one village.

[40] Then, a draining fishpond which does not dry out, at 10 marks. A non-draining fishpond that dries up in drought, at 5 marks.

[41] A big fishpond with a sluice, also called a gyalmos-tó or morotva, and other fisheries, called tanya on the rivers Danube, Tisza, Sava and Drava, if they yield a definite annual income shall be ²¹⁵ Fillér (or obulus) was a small coin. Less than a penny (denarius); the word comes from German vierer and is not regularly used in the medieval Hungarian monetary system.

²¹⁶ Falcastrum was a land measure used especially for hayfields (about 0.8 ha).

estimated at ten times of the annual income. And if it does not have a calculated income, according to the general custom it is estimated at 50 marks.

[42] Then, places for seines, also called vész, up to ten, at one mark each; over then up to a hundred or more, at 10 marks.

[43] Then, an enclosure called rekesz, which is used at times of flood, if it yields a particular and individual income, at 100 pence each.

[44] Then, a toll, collected lawfully either on water or land, is estimated at ten times the amount it yields annually.

[45] Then, the toll of vineyards or wine-hills that yields a definite and sizable income for the lord, is also estimated at ten times. I think, however, that this should apply only in the perennial estimation. Because vineyards, according to the ancient custom of our realm, are usually estimated like scrub and wood pastures, since when and where the vineyard is not attended, and its cultivation neglected, it turns into scrub and shrub land easily and quickly.

[46] But if a lord wants to expel and exclude a peasant or even a nobleman who has a vineyard on somebody else's land, he has the right to expel him, but not with the common estimation mentioned before regarding scrub and thickets; rather, he is required to redeem its real value and proper price, based on the reasonable and fair estimation and valuation of the reeve and jurymen of the place where the vineyards are located.

[47] This measurement²¹⁷ taken 16 times makes one mensura, that is, one royal ell.

[48] Then, a royal iugerum of arable land or wood measures seventy-two royal mensurae in length and twelve royal mensurae in width.

[49] Then, one aratrum, when estimating property, consists of one hundred and fifty royal iugera.

The estimation of cattle

[50] It has to be noted that an ox which is not lame and is not otherwise worn out, at 1 mark.

[51] Two cows, without a calf, at 1 mark.

[52] A cow with a calf, at 1 mark.

[53] Four sheep, at 1 mark.

[54] Four pigs, at 1 mark.

[55] A mare, without a foal, at 1 mark.

[56] With a foal, at 2 marks.

[57] With a filly, at one and a half marks.

[58] A saddle horse is estimated at its own value.

²¹⁷ The reference is to the bar that was printed on the side of the text, its length is 18.9 cm.

In how many ways and with respect to what estimations of goods and properties are done

Finally, it shall be known that the aforementioned estimation of movable and immovable property is done in different ways and for different reasons.

[1] First, in exacting judicial fines that are commonly and usually called birsagium. In these the cattle as well as the lands and property rights have to be equally estimated and accepted in accordance with the aforesaid appraisal.

[2] Secondly, in paying the filial quarter and pledged goods, as well as in redeeming goods seized for capital punishment or as a “fine of the head”. In this case the castles, noble residences, populated and deserted tenant-peasants' plots, also the ones in deserted lands, as well as the lands, woods, wood pastures, meadows, fish-ponds, mills, springs, cloisters, monasteries and churches, also tolls, orchards, as well as places for seines and sluices, and generally all appurtenances of the property rights to be estimated are valued in the aforementioned manner (the cattle being excluded). But the arable lands and meadows belonging to populated tenant peasants' plots are not estimated (except assarted lands and meadows that are the tenant peasants' property and do not belong to their plots). Finally, the payment of the filial quarter and pledged goods shall be done according to the amount of such an estimation. And the same shall be understood and held in respect of property rights sold in a way prejudicial to the kinsmen or otherwise inappropriately.

[3] Thirdly, in satisfying the dower, in which case only the noble residences, the populated and deserted tenant peasants' plots, also the ones in deserted lands, if they are located next to other plots, are estimated; but the plots outside the body of the village are not to be estimated at all. And the satisfaction of the dower, according to this kind of estimation of property, is usually made partly with cash and partly with movable things, including also cattle, according to their real value, namely, for what they might be sold in the market.

[4] It shall be considered, however, that if a woman after her husband's death, retaining his title and name, wants to remain in his goods and property rights until the end of her life; and if the same husband's son, kinsman or other lawful successor decides to separate, detach and give some property rights to the widow, equal to the quantity and value of her dower, to hold and use until the end of her life, then in this case not only the noble residences, the populated and deserted tenant peasants' plots, and also the ones in deserted lands shall be estimated, but also the lands, woods, orchards, hayfields and mills outside the village, just as in the payment of the filial quarter; but from these property rights only the amount shall be granted to the widow for use and possession that equals the value of her dower.

[5] Fourthly, in repaying debts, and also compensating damage calculated summarily or listed singularly. Then, in acquitting oneself of fines for frivolous prosecution and as fine of the tongue, and for paying the fine for contempt of the court of the royal majesty or that of a county ispán of any county, and in cases and matters of this sort; in these cases, movable and marketable goods shall similarly be accepted at their real value, and not by the aforementioned appraisal.

[6] Fifthly and finally, common estimation is usually applied in perambulations and adjustments of boundaries. In the latter case, the estimation is performed only in the respect that as many noblemen are required for the party that has by the judge's decision to take the oath vindicating his rights over those lands, woods, thickets, meadows and vineyards and acquiring them, as the lands, woods, thickets, meadows or vineyards, which are the subject of the suit between the parties are worth in marks.

End of Part One.

[PART TWO]

CHAPTER ONE

Second part of the laws and customs of the realm in general

Now that (with God's help) the principal matters have been concisely discussed, namely donations of property rights, and their types; the division of goods, sales, pledges, the definition of borders, the payment of dowers and filial quarters; and other matters related and connected to these – which provide the foundation and support of the lordship of all lords prelate, barons, magnates, and nobles: in the second part of this work it remains to discuss the procedures of actions and suits, executions, and the order of verdicts to be passed regarding these.

[1] But before I turn to the explanation of the subject matter of this part, I will briefly discuss in general how a constitution, or a general decree of the prince and the kingdom²¹⁸ should be interpreted, because the term 'constitution of this kingdom' will often need to be mentioned; moreover, what is the beginning and origin of our custom, that is, the unwritten law which we commonly use at this time.

CHAPTER TWO

In how many ways is “general decree” to be understood

The constitutions of princes, or the decrees of the kingdom, can be grouped in four kinds, as it comes to mind:

[1] Some constitutions have been abrogated in toto by subsequent ones, and simply revoked.

[2] Others have been partly abolished and partly approved.

[3] Some have been passed over in silence.

[4] Some have been introduced.

[5] In regard to constitutions deleted in toto (such as the court of the palatine, the extraordinary county assembly, trial by combat, and the summons at three fairs),²¹⁹ the time of abolition must be considered, since it is clear that they legally regulate future and not past actions and matters, inasmuch as palatinal courts and judicial combats no longer take place, nor are extraordinary county assemblies and the summons at three fairs any longer performed.

[6] However, in cases which were initiated during the validity of the former, the old procedure has to be observed in which these cases are recognized as having been initiated, not inasmuch as they are reinstated but in order to keep the procedural order.

²¹⁸ In this case the word regnum clearly implies the estates. Cf. II. 2-3.

²¹⁹ Most of these changes were enacted in the Decretum maius of King Matthias, 1486.

[7] It would be otherwise if such laws and constitutions also applied to past matters through the wording incorporated and written in the same constitution. For, to put it simply, constitutions (as noted just above) are binding not in respect of the past but of the future.

[8] Secondly – where constitutions have been partly approved and partly abolished – careful attention must be paid to the form of the wording included in these constitutions and decrees, in order that what has been approved is retained and what has been abolished is rejected and not observed.

[9] Thirdly, where earlier laws or constitutions have been passed over in silence, so that no reference is made to the earlier laws in later ones respecting any variation or alteration in the same, then the earlier laws are [only] recognized as having force when contrary use by the people has not prejudiced them. For real and continuous use often invalidates a law.

[10] Fourthly, when new laws have been introduced, then these laws have to be followed in passing judgment, whether they be stronger or milder than the earlier ones. For it is not possible to judge whether they have been well or badly enacted, but one should pass judgment in accordance with them.²²⁰

CHAPTER THREE

Who can establish laws and statutes

However, the question arises for consideration, whether the prince can establish laws and statutes of his own accord, or whether the consent of the people is also necessary.

[1] Concerning which it should be noted that although formerly, when this Hungarian people were still living as pagans and had as their rulers not a king but a duke and captains, all power to establish law and constitution resided in them.

[2] Yet, once they were converted to the catholic faith and of their own accord chose for themselves a king, then the right to found law as well as to grant any property and all judicial power were transferred to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of this realm with which all kings of Hungary are usually crowned, and hence to our lawfully constituted prince and king, along with the supreme command and governance. And thus, thereafter the kings themselves began to make constitutions after calling together and consulting the people, as is also customary in our times.

[3] And yet the prince cannot make constitutions proprio motu and by himself, particularly in matters where divine and natural law are prejudiced, or which diminish the ancient liberty of the Hungarian people as a whole. But once the people are summoned and asked whether such laws are acceptable to them or not, and they approve the laws, then such bills are henceforth to be observed as laws (keeping always divine and natural law).

²²⁰ A critical and historical discussion of the concept of decretum in medieval Hungary is offered by György Bónis, as “Begriff, Wirkung und gesellschaftliche Rolle des Dekrets”, in Decreta regni Hungariae &c. 1301–1457, Ferenc Döry, György Bónis and Vera Bácskai, eds. (Budapest Akadémiai Kiadó 1976), 15–31.

[4] However the people themselves often unanimously decide upon measures that they deem conducive to the public good, and present them in writing to the prince, begging that laws be enacted for them on these matters. And if the ruler himself approves and accepts them, then they acquire the force of law in the same way and indeed are regarded as laws.

[5] Yet all such statutes are specifically called the ruler's statutes, and not the people's, inasmuch as without the ruler's consent and ratification the constitution may in neither case be regarded as having any force. But as a general term these constitutions are often called decrees of the kingdom.

CHAPTER FOUR

Who are included under the terms 'the people' (populus) and 'the common people' (plebs)

The term 'people' is here to be understood as referring only to the lords prelate, barons, and other magnates, as well as nobles, but not to non-nobles.²²¹

[1] Albeit the term people includes all alike, noble and non-noble, nevertheless the non-noble (to whom the term plebs applies) will not be considered in the present section.

[2] For people differs from plebs as species from kind. For the term people refers to all nobles, both the magnates and the lower nobility, as well as the non-noble, whereas the term plebs refers only to the non-noble.²²²

CHAPTER FIVE

Who are bound by constitutions and statutes

Regarding the further question of who are bound by constitutions and decrees, it should be noted that in the first instance they bind the prince himself who issued them at the people's request, in accordance with the principle: Submit to the law which you yourself introduced. It is to be understood differently of the supreme pontiff and the Roman emperor, about whom no mention will be made here.

[1] Thereafter, the laws are binding on all those subject to the prince's jurisdiction.

[2] And not only on them, but also on any foreigners staying in this kingdom.

[3] However if a general constitution includes a punishment or penalty, then foreigners are given three month's grace; this time is set for making known the statutes to them. For example, supposing it is decreed and ordained that no person from Vienna or Wrocław or any other foreigner, on pain of death and the confiscation of all his goods, should presume to come with his wares to a fair customarily held in this kingdom of Hungary or to drive and lead away herds of ²²¹ Actually, this definition would also cover what elsewhere is called regnum (Hung. ország).

²²² The self-contradiction in this chapter must have originated from the author compiling different texts.

sheep, cattle, or horses from the kingdom; then such a foreigner even if apprehended cannot be legally bound or stripped of his goods within the space of three months, as he is excused by his ignorance of the statutes and the fact that they were not made known.

[4] But if no punishment or damage is involved but the redress of someone's right or of a judgment, or the means of pursuing a case, then foreigners are granted only one month.

[5] But for inlanders, of whatever status, dignity or condition, the time of the promulgation of the statutes is binding; and neither natives nor foreigners are excused in this way, for, 'When in Rome, live as the Romans do.'

CHAPTER SIX

Where did our custom that is to be observed in court originate

Be it known, secondly, that although almost all the rights of this kingdom originally evolved from sources in papal and imperial law, nevertheless this municipal custom of ours, which we now commonly use in court, is based on three foundations:

[1] First, on constitutions and public decrees.

[2] Secondly, on the privileges of princes.

[3] Thirdly, on the verdicts of justices ordinary of the kingdom.

[4] First, then, on public constitutions. To explore the origin of this matter more deeply, it should be noted first of all that the glorious king and our apostle, the blessed Stephen (who set the beginnings of the kingdom of Hungary and converted the Hungarian people to the light of holy faith), issued splendid constitutions, which however bear and promulgate the rudiments of faith rather than the rules of law suits.

[5] Then the most holy king and our confessor Ladislas, who with his sword subjugated Dalmatia and the coastal regions to the kingdom of Hungary and who in open warfare crushed many times the Tartar nation,²²³ which had been accustomed to invade the borders of the Hungarians in repeated incursions, and moved them far from the bounds of this kingdom and forced them to withdraw a great distance, laid down excellent laws.

[6] Afterwards the most invincible King Andrew,²²⁴ son of King Béla III, and father of the blessed widow Elizabeth,²²⁵ he whom we style 'of Jerusalem', after his felicitous return from the expedition to Jerusalem, which he undertook with a huge army of Hungarians against the Saracens in defence of the holy catholic faith, established excellent decisions and splendid ²²³ In fact, Ladislas acquired Croatia, but only his successor Coloman reached the Adratic; the "Tartars" here refer to some other steppe people (in the chronicles falsely called Cumans) against whom the king had to fight several times.

²²⁴ Andrew II (1205-35).

²²⁵ Best known as St. Elizabeth of Thuringia (1207-31).

decrees, particularly concerning the immunity prerogatives and liberties of the nobility: these the Hungarian people to the present day exalt to the stars as if they were holy decrees.²²⁶

[7] Finally, the most illustrious princes the lords Louis,²²⁷ Sigismund, Albert²²⁸ and Matthias, kings of Hungary, made in their times some constitutions in the same manner.

[8] Most recently, too, and no less than the others, our most serene lord, the present King Wladislas,²²⁹ laid down outstanding laws; his praiseworthy memory will be considered forever blessed by the Hungarians.

[9] And albeit such constitutions and laws, especially those of the holy kings Stephen and Ladislas, who worthily deserve to be enrolled among the catalogue of saints, have by now been almost entirely effaced due to their extreme age, although they are recognized as being more concerned with divine than human law; and the decrees of other later kings are held to be changed and altered in certain clauses and articles; it is, nevertheless, acknowledged that through long use some element of law has flowed down from the constitutions of almost all these saintly kings, and for over a hundred years been carried over into and been approved by our custom..

[10] Secondly, the privileges of princes are a source of our custom. Since these are often produced and read in court when matters so demand, and are accepted as having been made and issued worthily and justly (as reason dictates), so a certain part of our custom has evolved from long judicial practice of this sort.

[11] Thirdly and finally: custom has emanated from the verdicts of the justices ordinary of the kingdom and from repeated letters of adjudication passed and delivered and composed in one and the same order, manner and procedure on many occasions, and confirmed by judicial execution.

[12] Nevertheless this judicial procedure and procedural practice which we observe in initiating, pursuing, deciding and concluding cases, is recorded as having been introduced into this kingdom in the reign of the lord King Charles,²³⁰ father of the said King Louis, by him from the land of the Gauls. It has always been observed without violation down to the present time (with only the alteration of certain terms through public constitutions) and must continue to be observed forever henceforth.

[13] For otherwise the rights of the whole nobility of the kingdom of Hungary would necessarily be reduced to nothing by the introduction of new laws (even though these be learned and brought into common use).

²²⁶ Werbőczy refers here to the Golden Bull of 1222.

²²⁷ Louis I (1342–82).

²²⁸ Albert I Habsburg (1437–9).

²²⁹ Wladislas II (1490–1516).

²³⁰ Charles (Robert) I of Anjou (1301/7–42). It is interesting that Werbőczy regards his judicial reform as of being French origin, though there is no evidence, nor indication on this.

CHAPTER SEVEN

What is the definition of privilege? And how many kinds of privileges there are

Then, since a certain part of our custom is, as aforesaid, taken from the privileges of the princes, I have decided that some things should be said here about a privilege.

[1] Whence it is to be known that a privilege can, as it were, be considered as a private and singular law which pertains to one or a few.

[2] In another sense, though, a privilege is a prerogative or singular honor, being a boon of the prince, often conferred against common law.

[3] Moreover, a privilege may be of two kinds: general and special. It is general when it is conceded to a corporation or community, such as a city or a chapter or a convent; in these cases it is permanent.

[4] On the other hand, it is special when it is conferred on just one person. And it is extinguished with the person, unless perchance an exception is made therein that the virtue of the privilege should also flow on to the heirs and successors of the person who receives the privilege. For, it is thus accepted as being enjoyed by his heirs and successors as well.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Whether a decree is annulled by a privilege, and vice versa

But it may be asked (as I myself have often heard it asked) whether a decree or a common law is annulled by a privilege; and, contrariwise, whether a privilege is annulled by a decree.

[1] Although people say many different things and have different opinions, and various arguments can be adduced on both sides, nevertheless, in general we hold that all privileges, and the privileges of all persons, are annulled and invalidated by common law, that is, by decree. In these cases they will be expressly referred to in a general constitution.

[2] As is contained in a decree of our present lord the king: the abolition of the freedom of the city of Visegrád;²³¹ the collection of ninth from free cities; and other such cases.

[3] For although they have long had privileges drawn up on their liberty as well as their exemption from and non-payment of the ninth, nevertheless it is not the privilege but the decree and the general constitution which is observed in this case.

²³¹ See 1492: 102 and 1498:39. Visegrád had obtained from King Matthias a most unusual immunity for all its citizens probably in order to enhance the status of the new royal residence there. See András Végh, “Visegrád város kárhozatos privilégiuma” [The damnable privilege of the city of V.], in Beatrix F. Romhányi et al. (eds) Es tu scholaris: Ünnepi tanulmányok Kubinyi András 75. Születésnapjára (Budapest: Budapest Történeti Múzeum, 2004), pp 71–6.

[4] But a privilege not expressly rescinded by a contrary law or general decree remains in effect, as you may see more fully explained above, on the way a decree should be evaluated and understood.²³²

CHAPTER NINE

A privilege is regarded and can emanate in two ways. And first, lawfully

A privilege can be understood in two ways: namely, insofar as it proceeds by due course and lawfully from the prince's authority alone; and insofar as it does not, but tends to cause damage to others or else appears to detract from a common constitution.

[1] Therefore, insofar as a privilege proceeds from the prince's authority alone—as the donation of property rights; exemption from payment of tolls and the thirtieth; or granting the right of free markets, general fairs, fords, and levying tolls, which belong solely to the king—the privilege should always be observed, as long as it does not manifestly prejudice the rights of others.

[2] And for this reason the following clause is always attached and inserted at the foot of privileges of this sort: salvo iure alieno (keeping the rights of others).

[3] For if the prince himself exempts and frees as of now some countryman or a city from the payment of tolls, but has justly conferred the collection of tolls on one of his faithful men before, then he cannot by this later privilege, i.e. of exemption, invalidate the former and abolish this collection of toll, since it clearly prejudices the previous privilege drawn up concerning these tolls.

[4] But in regard to the goods and tolls belonging to the prince who granted the privilege, the exemption will stand and remain.

CHAPTER TEN

Privilege is understood to prejudice the rights of others in two ways

Then, concerning the grant of markets, fairs, and fords, the same position is to be held: that privileges issued on these matters are always to be upheld, providing they were not conferred in a way prejudicial to the rights of others. And privileges can prejudice the rights of others in two ways.

[1] First, in respect of time, as has just been discussed: since the other person's privilege was given earlier, it cannot be abolished by a later one, not even through a derogatory clause.

[2] Secondly, in respect of place: because river-tolls, that is fords, cannot rightly be granted unless the places for which they are granted are at a distance of at least one mile from other persons' places (for which they were granted earlier).

²³² See II.2.

[3] Albeit, they can also be granted more closely, provided the grant does not cause the ruin of the previous ones, or occasion them significant loss.

[4] Weekly markets and general fairs should and may be granted at a similar distance, and at closer places too, provided the newly-granted fairs are not held on one and the same day or at the same time as the previous fairs, and that the new ones do not otherwise obviously ruin the earlier ones.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

A second way in which a privilege is unlawfully issued

A privilege can be considered in another way, inasmuch as it may not proceed from the prince's authority alone, that is, because the prince does not have just and lawful power to grant such a privilege, since it aims at the prejudice of others, or because it is clearly prejudicial to a common law and a general constitution.

[1] And such a privilege has no force. For example, should it be contained in a common decree that no credence be given in court when transcribed letters are drawn up outside an octave courts. Now, if the prince simply caused a person's privilege to be transcribed with a derogatory clause, to the effect: "notwithstanding the law or the decree of our kingdom, we wish that credence be given to this type of transcript"; or were he to concede letters of institution under the prerogative: namely that: "a certain donation should, notwithstanding the passage of a year, be carried out", since this is considered to detract from the law and custom of this realm, it is not observed, nor is it considered worthy of observation.

[2] The same should be held concerning those privileges which may have been conceded or are conceded at any future time, to the effect that [a person] is not bound to respond on anyone's instance at the judicial seats of the counties before the county ispán, and lawsuits can only be started [against him] before the royal majesty or his personal presence and not before other justices ordinary of the kingdom.

[3] Moreover, if a judgment is handed down that an oath is to be sworn by some lord or noble, and a privilege is thereupon presented to the effect that the defendant is not required to provide the oath in his person but can entrust his official to deliver it, and so on, then, since such a privilege is prejudicial to the general constitution of the whole kingdom which has long been approved, it should never be upheld.

[4] For all lords and nobles, spiritual as well as temporal, and all other men of property of either line who hold goods and property rights in this kingdom of Hungary must observe one and the same law and the same custom in the maintenance of their property rights and the pursuit of all cases emerging therefrom (as has been noted in the first part).²³³

²³³ See I.2, 12.

In how many ways a privilege can lose its force

Note further that there are many way in which a privilege can lose its force.

[1] In the first place, the privilege is lost and becomes invalid when anyone acts against the privilege granted to him or exploits it in an improper way, since he who abuses the power granted to him deserves to lose his privilege. For example, a man who has a privilege from the prince in respect of the punishment of malefactors seized in his territory, abuses this privilege if, when a thief or brigand is captured, instead of hanging or impaling him, he comes to an understanding with him and releases him after extracting a sum of money; for the prince conferred authority to smite and punish malefactors according to their deserts, not to let them off.

[2] Secondly, a privilege is lost when a person does not in due time exercise the privilege given and granted to him. For instance, if the royal majesty bestows on someone a castle or some other property right, and the grantee fails within the course of a year to request that his letters of donation be executed by a royal or palatinal bailiff and with the men of some place of authentication, then after a full year has elapsed, a grant of this sort becomes completely invalid. Nor is it possible to restore it with letters of institution composed under the prerogative (as I have just explained); instead, the grant will have to be made and composed afresh, assuming that no second person has in the meantime obtained that property right for himself.

[3] In the case of weekly markets, fairs, and fords, the same must be done. For example, if the prince grants a person a market, a fair, or fords, he should use and begin using such a grant and privilege within the space of a year; for otherwise its validity will expire once the year is passed.

[4] However, it should at this point be noted that if the institution is carried out within the aforementioned year, but then some mistake is found to have been made either in the letters of record or in the manner of the institution, whether by the fault and negligence of the royal bailiff or the witness or even of the chapter or convent, then in such cases the grant will remain in effect, and the execution of the same can and must be rectified according to the circumstances of the case.

[5] However, if the institution is simply not carried out, or if in some other respect an error is made by the grantee, then it cannot be rectified, and (as previously discussed) the castle or other property right will have to be obtained afresh.

[6] Thirdly, a privilege is lost in the event of a person being charged with lèse-majesté or incurring the charge of infidelity; in such cases, he forfeits not only his privilege but his life and all his goods as well.

[7] Fourthly, as has been previously explained, when a privilege causes excessive loss to another person, since it is not at all likely that the prince in granting it would seriously wish to infringe another person's right either now or later.

[8] Fifthly, if the prince or another justice ordinary of the realm, seeing and recognizing from certain knowledge²³⁴ that a privilege lacks validity, repeatedly passes judgment against the privilege. This, however, is not the same as when a judgment is passed in error against a privilege; in such a case the mistake can be rectified and the tenor of the privilege be upheld by revising the judgment, providing all legal formalities are respected.

[9] Sixthly, by the express or tacit waiving of the privilege: expressly, when a person has publicly waived or waives his privilege; and tacitly, when a contravention of the privilege has occurred in public with his knowledge and without his contradiction but with his total silence; this silence being prejudicial to him implies a kind of waiver.

[10] Seventhly, because a later one modifies the earlier privilege: thus when two privileges are composed or issued in relation to one and the same person or community, the first will be rendered invalid and the second will be observed.

[11] Eighthly, and finally, a privilege is lost when it is expressly revoked by the prince who grants it, on reasonable grounds, which are to be clearly stated in such revocation. For if the revocation is not justified on reasonable grounds but is simply stated as taking place in the revocatory letter, then the revocation will not stand; for otherwise numerous problems would arise, and a person might live in daily uncertainty as to his privilege. Let this discussion suffice on the subject of privileges.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

What is the description of a seal. The two types of seals

However, since all privileges are confirmed and ratified with seals, it is appropriate to include some discussion of seals in this section.

[1] Wherein it is to be noted that a seal is an identifiable sign impressed upon gold or some other metal, or into wax, confirming all that has been done.

[2] There are two types of seal, authentic and inauthentic. The term authenticum can be analyzed as authoritatem tenens, i.e. 'having authority' from the person whose authority it represents. Properly, it belongs to princes and justices ordinary of the realm, as well as to chapters and convents.²³⁵ When affixed to a letter, an authentic seal of this kind confirms all matters stated and expressed in the letter.

²³⁴ Ex certa scientia is an expression extensively used in inquests, where it implies the firm direct knowledge of a witness, in contrast to hearsay (ex auditu). Occurs in laws and diplomas as well.

²³⁵ As mentioned already earlier, members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and—mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller—convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des

[3] In addition, cities and towns have authentic seals which kings and princes have granted them, and which confirm facts and matters which are moved and come to pass before them and in their midst.

[4] Inauthentic seals are those of private persons. Such seals have no quality of permanence.

[5] Of these there are many types: the seals of lords prelate, as well as those of perpetual-*ispáns*²³⁶ and other barons holding baronial honors; the descendants of the same barons; and those of nobles and notables of the kingdom, with the true and special insignia of their arms engraved and drawn on them.

[6] However, the higher prelates (like the archbishops and bishops), as well as the prior of Vrana, and the free perpetual-ispáns of the kingdom, and the Despot of Rascia²³⁷ have the power to appoint attorneys by means of their personal letters endorsed by their true and recognized seals.

[7] Other barons, magnates and nobles are obliged to appoint attorneys and make recognizances (to use our domestic term)²³⁸ in the presence of justices ordinary of the kingdom and in places of authenticity, namely chapters and convents.

[8] Likewise, justices ordinary of the realm who have authentic seals, and the places of authentication which have authentic seals, have authority under their seals to appoint attorneys as well as to make all other recognizances (providing they are so done properly and lawfully).

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Which kings' privileges are upheld and which not

Having discussed privileges and seals we must now consider which are the kings and princes of this kingdom whose privileges are upheld, and which are those whose privileges are rejected in court and treated as lacking any force and validity.

[1] Here it is to be known that all the charters of the most holy kings Stephen and Ladislas, further those of the most serene Andrew I,²³⁹ father of King Salomon,²⁴⁰ and of Béla I²⁴¹ the

Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66-73

²³⁶ Already in Árpáadian times some prelates were given the title of comes perpetuus of the county of their residence. It became more widely granted to great men of the realm in the later Middle Ages, though the estates often protested against it.

²³⁷ The Despot (ruler) of Rascia (i.e. Serbia) was from the early fifteenth century a great landowner in Hungary, especially after the loss of his country to the Ottomans.

²³⁸ It is unclear why Werbőczy finds the term fassio peculiar at this point, despite having used it many times before.

²³⁹ Andrew I, king of Hungary, 1046–60.

father, and Géza I,²⁴² brother of the same Blessed King Ladislas, and of Coloman,²⁴³ son of the said Géza, who first was bishop of Várad, but by papal dispensation took over the governance of the kingdom in the absence of a royal heir. Therefore in the Hungarian language he is still called “Könyves Kálmán”.²⁴⁴

[2] Then the charters of the kings Stephen II, son of the same Coloman,²⁴⁵

[3] and of Béla II, called the Blind, son of Prince Álmos,²⁴⁶

[4] and of Géza, likewise the second,²⁴⁷ son of the same Béla the Blind,

[5] as well as of Stephen III,²⁴⁸ son of the same Géza II;

[6] finally of Béla III,²⁴⁹ son of the same Géza II and brother of the said Stephen III. And it was this Béla who hounded thieves and brigands and rid the kingdom of them.

[7] Lastly those of Imre,²⁵⁰ son of the same Béla III, who, it is said, endowed and enriched the church of Várad with certain donations.

[8] And according to some, this Imre was otherwise called and styled by the corrupt word Henry, but this appellation is more according to German than to Hungarian usage.

[9] It might not have been necessary to enumerate the names of these kings and I could have cut my commemoration of them short. But very few of the privileges which the nobles of the kingdom of Hungary enjoy regarding their nobility and freedom derive from the time of these kings (who rather strove to increase the number of God's churches and ensure the salvation of the Christian people like that of a recent plantation in this kingdom). There are certain other princes, ²⁴⁰ Solomon, king of Hungary 1063–74 (crowned 1057, died c. 1087).

²⁴¹ Béla I, brother of Andrew I, duke under his reign, king of Hungary 1060–63.

²⁴² Géza I, king of Hungary 1074–7.

²⁴³ Coloman “the Bookman” was king of Hungary 1095–1116.

²⁴⁴ Literally, Coloman “the bookish;” his ecclesiastical training meant he could read.

²⁴⁵ Stephen II, king of Hungary 1116–31.

²⁴⁶ Prince Álmos, Coloman’s brother, was blinded by the king, together with his son, after several rebellions against him. Coloman’s son Stephen died heirless and Béla the Blind became king of Hungary 1131–41.

²⁴⁷ Géza II, king of Hungary 1141–62.

²⁴⁸ Stephen III, king of Hungary, 1162–72.

²⁴⁹ Béla III, king of Hungary, 1172–96. There is no evidence for the characterization given to him by Werbőczy. He, who grew up in Byzantium, is usually—probably falsely--credited with the introduction of written administration and organization of the royal chancellery.

²⁵⁰ Imre (Emerich), king of Hungary, 1196–1204. Imre is in fact a variant of the name Henry/Heinrich. King Imre’s grant to Várad (Oradea) was made in 1204 and constituted of a portion of market dues raised locally, see Imra Nagy et al. eds. Hazai Okmánytár/Codex diplomaticus patrius (Budapest-Győr: Sauerwein-Franklin, 1865–91) VII, 5, 149.

including some with the title of king, whose charters have been rendered invalid, such as Peter the German,²⁵¹ Aba of Hungary;²⁵² Salomon, son of Andrew I; and Stephen IV, son of the said King Béla the Blind,²⁵³ who only bore the crown and sceptre for five months before being shamefully expelled from his kingdom; as well as Ladislav III,²⁵⁴ son of the aforementioned Imre, or Henry, who only reigned six months. I have therefore given a full list of the names of these kings, to ensure that they and the privileges they conferred are the more clearly acknowledged.

[10] It should further be noted, moreover, that the charters and privileges of the kings and princes listed below are to be observed in every instance and in every matter. I treat them separately simply because the nobility's praiseworthy and splendid prerogative of liberty, which we have and enjoy in general to this day, was set in writing and confirmed by a decree and a general constitution in the time of the king who heads the list, the glorious Prince Andrew II (King Béla III's son, as noted before).²⁵⁵

[11] Of course, there were many nobles in this realm even in the reign of our first king, the most holy Stephen, and in the time of succeeding kings. However, they were in a sense subject to these kings by conditional services and the payment of taxes collected from their serfs. From these they were first exempted and made immune by King Andrew, at a time when the nobility were called servientes.²⁵⁶

[12] For this reason all succeeding kings down to the present day, before being crowned with the holy diadem (as mentioned above),²⁵⁷ have been accustomed to furnish an oath to the prelates, barons, magnates, lords and nobles of this kingdom that they will observe the decree and the constitutions of the same lord King Andrew.²⁵⁸

[13] A privilege drawn up and issued by King Andrew on Mount Tabor – the place of our Lord and Saviour's Transfiguration – concerning the grant of a certain property is preserved to this day in the county of Hont.²⁵⁹

²⁵¹ Peter Orseolo (a Venetian), son of the sister of Stephen I, was king of Hungary 1038–40 and 1044–46.

²⁵² Samuel Aba, probably also related to the first king, was king between 1040 and 1044.

²⁵³ Supported by Manuel Komnenos, Prince Stephen (IV), younger brother of Géza II, was crowned king in January 1163 but the legitimate king, Stephen III expelled him from the country in June. Werbőczy does not mention another pretender, Ladislav II, also supported by Manuel, who was crowned in 1162 but who died the next year.

²⁵⁴ Ladislav III was crowned as a child in 1204 but died in the following year in Austrian exile.

²⁵⁵ The Golden Bulls of 1222 and 1231.

²⁵⁶ The expression servientes regis seems to have been applied in the thirteenth century to those warriors attached either to castles or to the royal retinue, many of whom later became the “lesser nobility” of the medieval kingdom.

²⁵⁷ See above I.3.6.

²⁵⁸ Actually, the first such confirmation was that of 1351 and it had not been as continuous as Werbőczy implies.

²⁵⁹ Unclear, why Werbőczy singled out this charter that does not seem to have survived.

[14] So – to return to our previous discussion – the privileges of the following kings are in force and are observed: the aforementioned Andrew II, Béla IV,²⁶⁰ son of the same Andrew, in whose time Hungary was ravaged by the Tartars,

[15] Stephen V, Béla IV's son (excepting the charters drawn up and issued during the period when the same Stephen was a duke, when he referred to himself by the titles of rex iunior of Hungary and duke of Transylvania; such charters are not observed unless they happen to be subsequently confirmed by him when he lawfully entered and held the governance of the kingdom),²⁶¹

[16] Ladislas IV, Stephen V's son, who was known as Kun László.²⁶²

[17] Then, the charters of King Andrew III, surnamed the Venetian,²⁶³ are not observed, with the exception of those to which his immediate successor, the lord King Charles, affixed his signet ring in red wax (where the letter K appears on the right side next to the design) in token of confirmation, such charters being observed.

[18] Then, King Charles had three seals. The first two were cancelled by him, and the privileges issued under them are not observed unless later confirmed by the third one. This third one is recognized by having two dragons on the two parts of the oval where the design is cut, with a pair of crosses on the oval.

[19] Then, King Louis,²⁶⁴ Charles' son, had two seals. The first was lost in the region of Usora²⁶⁵ after it was removed from the most reverend lord Archbishop Nicholas of Esztergom,²⁶⁶ his chancellor. It is disregarded unless charters issued under this earlier seal were subsequently confirmed with a second one. In such cases the affixing of the new seal not only confirms once and for all the charters of the same King Louis drawn up under his earlier seal, but also those issued by his father, the aforesaid lord King Charles, under the two earlier seals which were cancelled and annulled. Charters so confirmed are always observed.

[20] In short, this means that the privileges of the lord King Louis drawn up between the year of Our Lord 1364, and the year of his death, viz. the year of salvation 1382, retain their authority. But his earlier ones are not valid unless subsequently confirmed in the manner indicated above.

²⁶⁰ Béla IV was king of Hungary, 1235–70. The Mongol invasion devastated Hungary in 1241–2.

²⁶¹ Stephen, who was styled “younger king” after 1262 when he challenged his father’s rule; became king of Hungary 1270–2.

²⁶² Ladislas IV (1272–90) was called “Kun,” that is, the Cuman, as his mother, Elisabeth, was the daughter of the chief of the Cumans who had settled in Hungary.

²⁶³ Andrew III (1290–1301) was the son of the posthumously born son of King Andrew II and the Venetian Tomasina Morosini; his legitimacy was challenged by the Sicilian Anjou, who finally won against other pretenders, not mentioned by Werbőczy

²⁶⁴ Louis I (“the Great”) of Anjou, king of Hungary 1342–82.

²⁶⁵ Region in Northern Bosnia (Hungarian: Ozora)

²⁶⁶ Nicholas Fraknói, archbishop of Esztergom 1358–66

[21] To make this clearer, I have decided to quote word for word a clause which the same King Louis used to attach to confirm such charters of his, cited from his confirmed charters, of which I have seen and perused a number of originals. The clause begins:

[22] “For permanent record. We, the aforesaid King Louis, declare to all persons that at a time when a countless multitude of heretics and Patarenes had spread throughout our kingdom of Bosnia,²⁶⁷ to the confusion of the true faith, and we were advancing in person at the head of a strong army in order to root out these same heretics from our kingdom, we sent to Usora our chancellor, the venerable father in Christ the lord Archbishop Nicholas of Esztergom, who had in his possession both of our authentic seals, and the lord Palatine, the vir magnificus Nicholas, along with other prelates, barons and lords of our realm, but certain household members of the lord archbishop, charged with their keeping, removed both of our said authentic seals with malice aforethought.

[23] Therefore, taking care lest in future the rights of our subjects be threatened through the loss of this seal, we have had a pair of new seals cut for us, and have decreed that all our privileges, as well as those of the late lord King Charles, our father drawn up under his previous seal (the one made at the time of his coronation and eventually destroyed by him because of the large number of false documents that were discovered to have been drawn up under it), as well as those drawn up under another seal of his, one accidentally lost somewhere beyond the Alps,²⁶⁸ should have this seal attached to them alongside the other three seals.

[24] But in regard to any of our father's privileges sealed with the two previously mentioned seals, which cannot be regarded as confirmed by our father by means of his later seals or by ourselves with the seal lost in the previously explained way, and to which our new seal is not appended, or any letters patent which have not been confirmed, just as these privileges and letters were revoked and annulled by our father, so we too declare these privileges, letters or charters to be lacking in force and devoid of authority.

[25] Among these we have renewed and confirmed on behalf of the same N. and his heirs and successors in perpetuity this present privilege of ours, to which no suspicion attaches, and everything contained and expressed in it above, by the affixing of our aforesaid new, double, authentic seal. Given by the hand of the same lord Archbishop Nicholas, our chancellor, on the tenth day before the calends of the month N. in the year of our Lord 1364, the twenty-third year of our reign.”

[26] Then, the charters of the lord Sigismund, king and emperor, issued before the year of our Lord 1406 are not observed for the reason that on the advice of the lords prelate, barons and nobles of his realm the same King Sigismund specified in a general decree that between the feast of the blessed martyr George in the year of our Lord 1405 and the same feast (then to come but now passed) in the above-mentioned year of grace 1406, all letters of donation and other privileges of any kind issued up to that time by the aforesaid late lord King Louis under his privy seal (but no others), and those given by the queens of Hungary, the lady Elizabeth widow of the same King Louis, and the lady Mary, his daughter,²⁶⁹ as well as those of King Sigismund himself, were to be submitted for confirmation, or else be invalid and lose all authority.

²⁶⁷ The fight against the so-called “Bosnian heresy” (on which see John V. A. Fine, The Bosnian Church. A New Interpretation, Bolder, CO: East European Monographs, 1975) with papal support served as a legitimation for Hungarian expansion on the northern Balkans. The appellation “Paterene” is borrowed from the ultra-radical reformer heretics of eleventh-century Milan. Technically, Bosnia was not a kingdom in the fourteenth century but was ruled by a hereditary ban.

²⁶⁸ The reference here is to the Transylvanian Alps (Carpathians) and to the battle of Posada (1330), in which the royal seal was lost during an encounter with the Wallachians. The precise location of the battle is, however, disputed.

[27] On the other hand, documents issued by the same lord King and Emperor Sigismund thereafter up to the day of his death in the year of grace 1437 are always valid and observed.

[28] To remove doubt and to make this matter clear to everyone, I attach the form and contents of a particular letter of donation of the same lord King Sigismund drawn up concerning the above matters and on one occasion brought forward in a judicial dispute. The sense has not been altered in any way, and the text runs as follows:

[29] “We, Sigismund, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., margrave of Brandenburg etc., vicar general of the Holy Roman Empire and regent of the Kingdom of Bohemia, place on record by these presents that after having held wise counsel on this matter with the prelates, barons and lords of our realm we have decreed for the good, benefit and tranquility of our subjects that all and singular documents drawn up and issued by our most dear father and father-in-law, the late most illustrious prince, the lord Louis, by the grace of God renowned king of Hungary, under his privy seal (but not otherwise) must be presented and shown to us; also those of the most renowned princesses of blessed memory, the lady Elizabeth, our mother and the lady Mary, our wife, most dear queens of our said kingdom of Hungary; and also our own charters issued under the seals of these ladies as well as our own great and small one, to any persons holding any office concerning any matters, but particularly those drawn up and issued relating to properties, in order to remove all doubt, clear up abuses and avoid the many and various problems which the loss of the seals belonging to these ladies as well as our own, and the destruction on legitimate grounds of our great, double one, may have occasioned diverse persons regarding their rights, and in particular their property rights. These documents must be seen and examined by us during the period between the feast of the blessed martyr George in the year of our Lord 1405 just passed and the same date a year later, on pain of being revoked, annulled and cancelled should they fail to be produced, and they should be confirmed and validated, as is necessary, under our present new authentic double seal. Finally, when this time limit specified in our decree and statute expires, we order general congregations to be held by our county ispáns in the several counties of our said kingdom for the purpose of examining and reviewing such charters produced (or otherwise) before us and confirmed (or otherwise) by us with our aforesaid new great double seal.

[30] Wherefore, as N. and N. , nobles of the county of N., have been unable to produce or have failed to produce in our presence or in the presence of our man specifically deputed in our personal presence with the task, and in the presence of sworn assessors of such a general congregation of the aforesaid county of N. , their charters of confirmation relating to the grant of a piece of property in the estate called N. located in the aforesaid county of N. , which had formerly been conferred by our Majesty on their father, the said N., son of N., and in turn on the same N. and N. and their heirs, therefore in our desire to enforce the aforementioned decree and to give it permanent authority, we do totally and in all particulars revoke, cancel, decree invalid and reject the aforesaid letter of donation conferred by us in the above-mentioned manner in regard to the grant of the said estate on behalf of the aforesaid N., son of N., and hence to the aforesaid N. and N. and their heirs, but not brought by them for confirmation with our aforesaid authentic double seal. We take back the same estate into our royal hands, and have deemed it fit that perpetual and irrevocable silence should be placed, and do so place by these presents, on the aforementioned N. and N. and all their heirs and successors over and in respect of the aforementioned piece of property located in the said estate N., with all its utilities and appurtenances.

²⁶⁹ Dowager Queen Elisabeth (Kotromanič) was de facto regent for her daughter Queen Mary (1382–95) between 1382 and her murder in 1387.

[31] Now we, who, due to the royal office we have assumed, must weigh with even hand the worthy acts and meritorious deeds of our faithful, as befits the royal dignity, and bestow royal favour on each according to their deserts, considering and recalling the outstanding loyalty, faithful service, worthy deeds and welcome courtesy of our beloved faithful magnifici viri N. and N. , sons of the late N. , by which the same persons strove to render themselves pleasing and welcome in the eyes of our Majesty by enduring labors in their persons and at their expense in the performance of laudable works on behalf of us and of our Holy Crown at diverse places and times with all sincerity and zeal, fervent loyalty, constant devotion and unremitting solicitude,

[32] Wishing therefore to recompense their aforesaid loyal services with some token of royal favor in the present, we have given, bestowed and conferred this same portion of royal domain in the said estate called N. located in the aforesaid county of N., together with all its utilities and appurtenances, namely its arable lands, both cultivated and uncultivated, meadows, hay meadows, woodlands, woods, waters, ponds, mills, watercourses, hills, vineyards and in general any utility, by whatever name it is known, naturally pertaining thereto, under its true boundaries and ancient limits within which the estate has been duly held and possessed by its owners, on the aforementioned N. and N. and through them to all their heirs and successors, from our certain knowledge and on the advice of our prelates and barons from our royal hands and by title of new donation and with every right with which the said estate in the aforementioned N. which legitimately belongs to our granting for the previous or any other reason or cause whatsoever. Indeed, we give, bestow and confer it to be possessed, held and owned permanently and irrevocably, keeping the rights of others, undertaking in our name and person and that of our successors the kings of Hungary to protect, assist and maintain the aforementioned N. and N. and their heirs and any of their successors in the peaceful and undisturbed ownership of the said estate and all its aforementioned utilities and appurtenances against any claims, charges or actions, in court or outside, at our expense and labor and that of our successors at all times and in all places, through the authority and witness of this our charter; which, when it is brought to us in written form, we will cause to be drawn up in the form of a royal privilege. Given etc. in the year of our Lord 1410²⁷⁰ edited are always observed.²⁷¹

²⁷⁰ A charter from 1410, issued in the same style and sense survived and is in the National Archives as MNL OL DL 64137.

²⁷¹ Misplaced, repetitive clause, omitted from the later editions.

[33] Then, the charters of the lord King Albert,²⁷² the immediate successor of the said lord Emperor Sigismund, are always valid and observed.

[34] Then, all donations and other grants of the late Lady Elizabeth, daughter of the lord King Sigismund and widow of the deceased King Albert aforementioned, as well as those of the lord Wladislas of Poland – who was not crowned with the true and Holy Crown of this kingdom but with an ornament borne by St Stephen's head-reliquary, and who was defeated and killed in a battle with Amurat, emperor of the Turks, by the town of Varna on the coast of Romania²⁷³ on the feast of St Martin, bishop and confessor, in the year of grace 1444 – are entirely cancelled, revoked and devoid of authority, no matter on whose behalf, or for what persons, or for what reason, or under what title they were made.²⁷⁴ These are never to be adhered to, with the sole exception of the grant and donation of alms made by the lady Elizabeth to the church of Székesfehérvár.²⁷⁵

[35] Then, the charters issued by all the prelates, barons, lords and nobles of the kingdom of Hungary under their seal bearing the double cross, the emblem of the Hungarian nation, have the same validity as the letters of any justices ordinary in regard to judicial procedures, recognizances and fines. However, their validity does not embrace grants, consents and approvals, as is clear from the text of a privilege issued by them on this and other matters in the city of Pest on the second day of the feast of the Lord's Ascension, which was on 7 May, in the year of the Lord 1445.²⁷⁶ There seems little point in quoting the full text, as it contains many chapters and articles which have no relevance to the present context. However, I cite the article in the charter describing the cutting of the seal and its authority in the exact words which I saw written there and which I read. The article runs as follows:

[36] “Then, that a single seal be now cut, on which there should be the sign of the cross, as the sign of the kingdom of Hungary, and that seal be kept in the city of Buda so that plaintiffs may have letters of complaint under that seal and that justice may proceed suitably until the coronation of the king.”²⁷⁷ Thus it is clearly described that that seal was ordered and made only for the purpose of the administration of justice and the holding of judicial sessions.

[37] The final words of this article concerning the seal in question – that is, “until the coronation of the king” – should be disregarded. They should not be taken to mean that at the time a new king was soon to be crowned. In fact, the illustrious Prince Ladislas, son of the aforementioned late King Albert, had been crowned a long time before, in the year of Our Lord's incarnation ²⁷² Albert I (Habsburg) was king of Hungary 1437–39.

²⁷³ That is, of the lands historically associated with the Byzantine (Roman) Empire.

²⁷⁴ In 1440 the diet elected Wladislas Jagiełło (III in Poland, called Warneńczyk) king of Hungary, but Elisabeth's party managed to steal the “Holy Crown” and have the posthumous child of Albert (Ladislas V, king 1453–57) crowned. Wladislas was crowned with a “replacement crown,” but for the following years the country was torn by civil war between the two sides; see Engel, Realm, pp. 280-8.

²⁷⁵ We have not succeeded in identifying this privilege.

²⁷⁶ During the interregnum after 1444 a group of magnates empowered by the estates ruled “in the name of the Holy Crown,” as already in 1384-86; see Bak, Königtum, 49–50.

²⁷⁷ See 1445: 15

1440. Rather, the additional words should be understood as referring to the anticipated full transfer of the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the kingdom and the king's plenary power – which at the time he could not exercise as he was a child – into the hands and authority of the Lord King Ladislas.

[38] Now after the death of the aforesaid lord King Wladislas of Poland up until the election of John Hunyadi to the governorship of this kingdom of Hungary, Nicholas of Újlak, also known as voivode of Transylvania,²⁷⁸ was deputed as captain of the kingdom, and consequently had himself given the additional title of vicar of the kingdom of Hungary.

[39] Then, all grants and letters of donation of the lord Governor John Hunyadi²⁷⁹ during the period of his governorship (but not before or after) are observed providing they do not exceed thirty-two peasant plots.

[40] By inference, any grants, consents and approvals made or assigned to any person by the same Governor John in excess of the said thirty-two peasant plots are not valid or binding.

[41] Then, approval given by him concerning any contract or other business after the end of his governorship are not admitted in court, since these were all conditional. For example, if he gave consent to any person that, on the death in default of heirs of such-and-such a noble, his goods should pass to such-and-such a person, and this consent or assent did not exceed the stipulated number of thirty-two peasant plots, and the noble died while John was still in office, then such an assent would have been duly admitted in court. But if the person were to die in default [of issue] at the time when a true and legitimate king was on the throne, then it could not be, since the governor was not able to overstep the bounds of the authority entrusted to him, and the authority was not and could not properly be conferred on him more widely or for a longer period, since the aforesaid lord Ladislas, son of King Albert, although still under age, had nevertheless already been formally crowned (as previously mentioned), and the plenary jurisdiction of the Holy Crown was his.

[42] So, lest any person believe otherwise or rashly maintain the contrary, I have included and appended without variation, in order to remove all doubt on this matter, the articles drawn up concerning the authority given to and conferred upon the said governor to assign goods and property rights, which I quote verbatim from the text of the charter of the aforementioned lords prelate, barons, nobles and lords of the kingdom of Hungary, issued and drawn up in Buda on the feast of the Annunciation of the most holy Virgin Mary in the year of the Virgin Birth 1447, which includes the series of articles decreed and formulated in their general congregation in the city of Pest at the previous feast of Pentecost (that is, in the year of salvation 1446), when the same John Hunyadi had been elected and elevated to the governorship of the kingdom. The text of these articles (the remaining contents of the charter being ignored) runs as follows: “Then, the lord governor should be able to make grants to those who faithfully serve the Holy Crown of the kingdom from those estates which henceforth devolve clearly and legally to the Holy Crown due to lack of an heir, the proffering of false documents, the minting of counterfeit money or the making of false seals, or because of the inveigling of a foreign power into this kingdom, or the committing of arson, if no one has a right to them and these estates have and can have no more than thirty-two plots, and also those estates in which there are and can be less than the said number of thirty-two plots.²⁸⁰

²⁷⁷ Nicholas Újlakai [of Ilok] (c. 1410–77), ban of Mačva 1438, voivode of Transylvania 1444–65, ban of Slavonia 1457–73; in 1472 crowned king of Bosnia.

²⁷⁸ John (János) Hunyadi (1404/9–56) was ban of Severin 1439–46, co-voivode of Transylvania with Újlaki 1444–46, 1445 elected as one of the captains of the kingdom and regent 1445–53, see below.

[43] If cities, towns, and estates with more than the said number of thirty-two plots also devolve to the Holy Crown in the foregoing manner, he [the lord governor] should not be able to cut or divide them into portions of thirty-two plots and make grants from them under the heading of thirty-two plots, but all such cities, towns, and estates must be reserved undivided to the same Holy Crown.

[44] Then, the lord governor may not grant anything further to the same man to whom he once granted something in the aforementioned manner. And, since grants of castles, cities, towns, estates, and similar possessions are known to belong to the royal right, the lord governor may make grants to anyone in the preceding manner, but they should come at the proper time before the lord king to receive confirmation of them.

[45] Then, those estates which devolve to the crown because of their owners' proffering of false documents, minting of counterfeit money, or for any other reason expressed above should not be seized and given away before the accused have been judged at law by the appropriate judges according to the ancient and approved custom of the kingdom."²⁸¹ I have decided to omit the other articles of this charter as they do not concern this matter.

[46] Also observed are the charters issued by the aforesaid Ladislas, son of the aforementioned King Albert, from the year of our Lord 1452, when the governor retired from office (having happily held the governorship for seven years), to the day of his death in the year of salvation 1457, although, it is known that King Ladislas began to issue grants of goods, permissions and other measures in the year following the end of the said governorship (that is, 1453), when he returned from Vienna to Buda during the feast of the Purification of the Glorious Virgin.

[47] Also observed are the privileges issued by the most invincible prince, the late lord King Matthias of praiseworthy memory, from the time of his felicitous coronation on the feast of Our Lord's Supper in the year of our Lord 1464, until his death on the Wednesday after Palm Sunday, in the year of the incarnation of Our Lord 1490. On the other hand, any privileges drawn up by him before his coronation²⁸² are not binding unless subsequently confirmed by him.

[48] Then, the charters drawn up by the reigning monarch, our most gracious lord King Wladislas, from the Sunday following the feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross in the year of grace 1490, the day of his coronation, up to the present, and any which are issued in future, lawfully and in due form, are always to be observed.

²⁸⁰ A tenant plot (arable and meadow plus rights to commons) consisted generally of 36 holds, a hold being around 1.5 acres, thus a peasant holding was roughly a quarter square mile.

²⁸¹ See 1446: 10

²⁸² As the "Holy Crown" remained in the hands of Ladislas Pothumus's guardian, Emperor Frederick III, Matthias I Corvinus had to negotiate for its return, which he achieved only six years after his election and enthronization. See 1464.

[49] Then, from times of troubles, especially after the deaths of the aforementioned Emperor Sigismund and King Albert, one finds numerous documents and a number of privileges put together and fabricated criminally and fraudulently under various guises and seals. Unfortunately, few of these forgeries have yet come to light and it is difficult to detect and to recognize them all. But to give some idea of them (even if this is confined to specific instances), I thought it worthwhile to include here a word-for-word copy of the text of a particular privilege composed by the aforesaid prelates, barons, nobles and notables on the subject of this plague of false documents, which has been produced in litigation, and even before me, under the seal described above. The words of the text contained in the privilege are as follows:

[50] “We, all the prelates, barons, nobles, and notables of the kingdom of Hungary, commend to memory by these presents that, following the outbreak of war within our realm on the death of the late lord King Albert, which long continued but which by the grace of God were eventually laid to rest among us, after we agreed unanimously on the choice of a single prince and lord, namely our illustrious lord Ladislas, son of the said late lord King Albert, as our natural lord, and we began to deliver judgments in order to foster mutual and lasting peace among us and to administer justice to the oppressed, many false charters were produced before us in court by litigants.

[51] When we began to probe the fabrication of these forgeries, we discovered that a certain litteratus, Gabriel of Zömlén, was the perpetrator of this infamous scourge. As his crime merited, he was handed over to the appropriate judges, and before his death, in order to purge his conscience, he made a public and open confession in words and writing concerning the documents written in his own hand. A list of these documents and their contents, which I have deemed worthy of inclusion, here follows.

[§52] A letter of royal consent issued in favor of the sons of the Kompolti family of the late king Sigismund, that if the seed of late Ladislas of Solymos would be extinct, then only the village of Solymos and no other property would devolve to the sons of Kompolt, and that letter was issued without the knowledge of the sons of Kompolt. [§53] Then, a charter of liberty under the privilegial seal of lord King Sigismund with the medium eagle-head for the community of Gyengyes (Gyöngyös?) [§54] Then two letters, one with the privy seal of the late King Sigismund with the medium eagle-head and another letter of institution under the seal of the chapter of Buda, in privilegial form on the perfection to a son of the daughter of the wife of Peter the Tailor. [§55] Then a letter of recognizance under the seal of the chapter of Eger issued in privilegial form about the recognizance of the lords the late bishop Peter and Stephen and John of Rozgony in favor of Ladislas of Szécsény. [§56] Then a letter on the liberties of the settlement Szabadka under the privy seal with the medium eagle-head of King Sigismund.. [§57] Then, letters patent with the seal of the chapter of Eger and the major seal of the lord King Sigismund about the village Abony for the sons of Orros against the lords Garai. [§58] Then a privilegial charter under the privy seal of the late lord King Sigismund with the medium eagle-head on the request of the late lords Ladislas and Henry sons of Voivode of Tamási regarding that in the case they would decease without heir then their goods and possessions, both inherited and acquired should devolve to the sons Herceg. [§59] Then a letters patent of grace of the late lord King Sigismund under the seal with the medium head issued in favor of Imre Debrő that the same lord kind granted special pardon for his head and properties. [§60] Then a privilegial charter was made under the seal of the chapter of the cathedral of Oradae/Várad for the church of Telki in matters of Kerepes.

[§61] Then two letters, one of recognizance and another of institution made up on the pledging of the castle of Becse of the Lord Despot under the seal of the chapter of Buda in favor of Ladislas, son of Michael of Geszt. [§62] Then two other imperial letters patent on parchment about a recognizance against the sons Sulyok regarding the village Kőlöd for the same Ladislas son of Michael. [§63] Then there are letters under the seal of the lord King Wladislas for Ladislas of Majsa, nobleman of Co. Zaránd, Sigismund of Páka, noblemen from the Co. Borsod, Ladislas of Pacsaj, and their five towns in Maramureş in which they are permitted to erect walls in front of their properties. [§64] Then a charter of privilege under the seal of the chapter of Oradea/Várad and another, similarly privilegial of confirmation of the late King Albert issued on the perfection into son for the magnificent lord Francis of Csák. [§65] Then a charter of privilege under the imperial privy seal with the two-headed eagle on the pardon for head and all goods for Ladislas, son of the late voivode James now owned by George son of Ban David. And even though in the lower margin of that charter there is the writing of the lord Bishop Matthew, sometime chancellor, and the personal commission of the lord emperor is in the upper margin of the charter, pretending that it is his, it is still forged.. [§66] Then two privilegial letters made up under the seal of the chapter of Eger, one about setting bounds another about the adoption as spiritual brother of the late Andreas and Matthew Pohárnok Sandrino. [§67] Then, privileges of liberty for a certain Cuman, namely Peter Silli under the seal of the lord King Wladislas and for Matthew Beseg under the seal of the lady Queen Elisabeth. [§68] Then for a certain Józsa, living in Tobágyzentgyörgy, a letters patent of recognizance by the brothers of that person whom the same Józsa had killed that they let him go free, under the imperial seal on parchment. [§69] Then, a charter of privilege under the seal of the lord King Wladislas on the liberties for a certain John son of Egyed, now living in Madaras. [§70] Then, a charter with the major seal of the late lord Sigismund on its rear on parchment on that in the case of extinction of seed, all hereditary properties of the late Ladislas and Henry, sons of the voivode should devolve to the sons of Herceg.²⁸³ [§71] Then, two letters, one of institution under the seal of the chapter of Buda and another privilegial of grace by the lord King Wladislas on the perfection into a son for a certain lady, daughter of the nobleman of Koka, who was the wife of Ladislas of Macsonka. [§72] Then an imperial letters patent on the royal approval given to Gregory of Erdőd, caonon of Bács. [§73] Then a charter to a certain Cuman, Gregory son of Paul, that he may stay in the possession of his wife, a Hungarian, like the nobles of the kingdom, under the seal of the lord King Wladislas, but it never reached his hand and I do not know where it is. [§74] Then, a letter of grace for the Jews made up under the seal of the late lord King Sigismund with the medium eagle-head, that they can trade. [§75] Then, letters of pardon of King Sigismund under the privy seal in favor of Ladislas of Szécsény, made for his ancestors that his goods [confiscated] because of charge of infidelity should not escheat to the hands of the king, but devolve to the closest kinsmen. And also letters of pardon for the gold and silver mines. [§76] Then, a charter of privilege on royal consent on behalf of George son of Roland of Nemti that if the seed of John son of Henry of Tamási were to extinct, then [his] castles and all possessionary rights should devolve to the same George. [§77] Then, privilegial letters of the chapter of Oradea regarding the tithe issued on behalf of their bishop. [§78] Then, a letter on the perfection into a son about the recognizance of Stephen Báthori with royal consent under the privy seal of the lord King Sigismund made for the daughters of the late Thomas Báthori. [§79] Then a charter of privilege made up with the seal of the lord King Albert on the liberties of the cities in Maramureş [§80] Then, a charter with the signet ring of the lord King Louis on the liberties of the cities of Pest and Buda, but it was assigned by me to the burghers of Pest.

²⁸³ Seems to be a duplication, see §58.

[82] “Therefore, taking notice of the damaging and wicked acts of the same Gabriel, whose evil deeds brought into peril not only his own body and soul but also those of very many other persons, and wishing to apply a timely remedy to this plague of forgeries, we have decreed that all and singular documents which are referred to by name in his aforementioned writings inserted into these presents, are always, inasmuch as they are forgeries, to be treated as worthless and to be rejected, disregarded and voided of authority in the eyes of all judges in and out of court; and we do so cancel, reject and condemn these documents by the force of these presents. Given at our general congregation in Pest on the Tuesday after the feast of Christ's most Holy Body, the year of Our Lord 1448.”

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

What should be held about transcribed letters and privileges

Then, apart from the aforementioned feloniously made letters, there are other letters which, even if not maliciously composed, are not taken into account in court, nor do they stand. These include all transcribed [letters] which are or have been simply and straightforwardly transcribed in places [of authentication], at chapters and convents or before justices ordinary of the kingdom. Such letters have, not without good reason, been cancelled and invalidated by a general constitution, unless, of course, the original letters from which they were transcribed can be physically produced. For if they can be, and the original privileges are acknowledged as having been composed rightly, in the proper order and manner, then even the transcribed letters stand.

[1] Transcribing is the transferal of some privilege into another, not by its sense, but verbatim.

[2] Hence, the transcribing of letters can only be made according to our present manner and custom either in the court and judicial seat of the royal majesty, in an adversarial suit between litigants; or before justices ordinary of the realm in octave terms through a legal summons delivered face to face, and likewise, in the case of kinsmen when a division of goods ensues among them or some other issue arises regarding the preservation of letters and their privileges, before the same judges, and not otherwise. The original privileges or other primary documents can thus be properly discussed and examined by the justices of the realm and carefully deliberated upon, in order to see that they have been composed and issued according to accepted procedure and in due fashion and in the correct way, and not malevolently or fraudulently. Only then may they be transcribed and drawn up as letters and privileges free of any malice and fraud. Such transcribed copies are thereafter observed.

[3] However, letters and privileges recovered or to be recovered in chapters and convents upon letters of request are treated differently; these are always observed, providing the originals of these letters are not in themselves transcripts of the aforesaid type, since (as explained above) these are not valid.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Privileges which are issued with the clause "de cuius vel quorum notitia." And on puppets, or fictitious persons

Furthermore, all letters and privileges of any chapter or convent whatsoever containing this clause: "concerning the identity of whom such-and-such a person has affirmed or assured us" and so on, are held to be annulled, cancelled and invalidated, and are not allowed to stand in court at any time.

[1] This is the reason: a recognizance made by any person in this way refers and relates not to the chapter or convent but to the person who attested and affirmed him; thus it is not the chapter or convent but the person doing the assuring who should be regarded as stating and affirming that so-and-so made the recognizance or other obligation. But the chapter or convent must always establish the identity of the person who makes a recognizance, so that the same chapter or convent can freely affirm that this person presented himself before them and made such-and-such a recognizance. Otherwise no right and lawful letters can or should be given, or proper privileges issued, upon anyone's assurance or affirmation.

[2] Albeit there are found persons heedless of their salvation and honor who often design to set up and establish before a chapter or convent, and sometimes also before justices ordinary of the realm, puppet-figures and fictitious personages, and have false recognizances made for themselves by means of these. Yet the chapter, convent or justice ordinary who in ignorance issues letters or privileges on the strength of the recognizances of such persons are not to be blamed at all for this, since they believed that these people were in fact those whom they said they were and were not puppets or fictitious persons.

[3] The matter is different if chapters and convents or justices ordinary act knowingly and willfully, or if they otherwise compose illegal and false letters; in such cases they will be punished as forgers and perjurers. And for this, chapters and convents are to be punished by the loss of their seals; those members of the chapter or convent who were present at the composition and sealing of such false letters, [by loss of] their benefices; and the secular justices ordinary, by capital sentence, and the permanent loss of their goods and property rights, as well as of their seals and honor.

[4] Moreover, a general decree demands that those members of a chapter or convent who (as was said) were present or took part in the composing and sealing of these false letters are to be stamped and branded with the red hot mark of the seal on their forehead and face.²⁸⁴

²⁸⁴ 1498: 14.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

To what should attention be paid in the examination of false letters

Then, in examining and considering false letters, judges must attend, in particular, to the date of the letter, that is, the day the privileges were issued and the years that are put, as well as the impression or appending of the seal, its circumscription, and what is written on it;

[1] Then, the erasure or obliteration of names or the identities of persons or properties included and listed in the privileges and letters. If these are carefully investigated, the lawful or unlawful composition of the letters or privileges will easily become apparent.

[2] Privileges composed in the proper and correct manner are always upheld, even if the seals are damaged and broken, providing the borders of the seals and the writing on them are clearly visible and legible.

[3] But the falsity of a letter unjustly issued on a recognizance of the aforesaid puppets or false personages will be most clearly evident when the person in whose name and person such a recognizance was made can show on good evidence that he was elsewhere at the time the recognizance was issued and drawn up, and not at the place where the recognizance was fraudulently composed.

[4] Once any nobleman discovers that a recognizance has been composed in the aforesaid manner in his name and person, he should take care to speak up and protest it without delay. This can be duly done at all times and in any place of authentication or testimony once the forgery comes to or is brought to his notice.

[5] This type of forgery is included in the earlier article on the proffering of forged letters in the list of charges of infidelity.²⁸⁵

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

The continuation of the second part in particular: firstly, on summonses.

Having dealt above with the noteworthy matters, we must return to the discussion of the matter of this second part. Here I have decided to deal first with the opening of cases, that is, summonses.

[1] Concerning which it should be noted that a summons is nothing other than a lawful call to a judge because of a plaint or complaint tended to the same judge by someone against someone.

[2] These days a summons can take many forms and be of many types. Some summonses are simple, others peremptory or terminal, others with notice, others for institutions and perambulations.

[3] Thus cases involving pledged property rights; rights of filial quarters, dowers and paraphernalia; debts; obligations; divisions to be made among joint-owning kinsmen; and new trial obtained by someone, should be opened, tried and concluded within the same short terms as suits started with terminal summons, even if initiated by a simple summons.

²⁸⁵ See above I. 14.

[4] But other cases, initiated by a summons with notice or some other simple summons or involving institutions and recovery of goods, or even the perambulation of boundaries, should usually be concluded within four octave terms.

[5] If anyone be called by any form of summons on account of a warranty clause previously undertaken in defense of someone's suit, or on account of letters or written instruments held or concealed by someone, then such a summons is usually always decided and finished within one judicial term, namely in which the principal action has been initiated.

[6] However, terminal summonses in regard to any act of might whatsoever can always be issued in due form provided that the prescription has not run out.

[7] In cases initiated as protracted lawsuits, three terminal summonses replace the announcement at three fairs.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

How and by whom should summonses be served

Every summons must be served by a royal or palatinal bailiff and a man of some place of authentication at the property rights, inherited or pledged, or even at the place of service of the persons who are to be summoned.

[1] Regarding place of service, hold this only true if such a summons is served for acts of might committed in the course of that service. For, a summons in matters of property rights or other matters should not be served at the place of service.

[2] However, any royal or palatinal bailiff who serves a summons, or makes an institution, re-institution, or perambulation of goods, or any other judicial execution, must have noble property in the county where the execution takes place.

[3] Otherwise he cannot make any execution, unless it happens that he has been deputed and sent by justices ordinary of the realm from the royal court to perform that execution.

[4] For, in that case any noble, indeed even a non-noble person (provided that this non-noble is a scribe or notary of the royal court) can proceed in any execution.

[5] For, in former times knights of the royal court, and other courtiers were sent to effect executions, particularly those involving institution of goods.

Personal summons, order, and prohibition

However, it should be known here that if, in the course of a diet or general assembly or octave or any short-term court, any lord or noble should kill, wound, beat or even verbally abuse and disparage anyone attending such a diet, assembly, octave or short-term court, then at the instance of the injured party such a person can be forthwith summoned by justices ordinary or others appointed to the case into their presence by a scribe, that is, a notary of the royal court without the man of a chapter or convent.

[1] Moreover, if someone holding another's goods and property rights in pledge is found before a justice ordinary by the one who pledged him the goods or who has the legal right to redeem the same goods and property rights, or merely by his lawful attorney, he can always be ordered to take his money and return the goods and property rights. He will be required to respond on the third day of notice or (if he wishes) on the same day, providing that the plaintiff is able to produce at that time his copy or the exemplar of the letter of pledge before the judge.

[2] For otherwise the person given notice is not bound to respond in this way and manner; instead, the plaintiff will have to apply to the royal or palatinal bailiff and the man of some place of authentication to have this kind of notice served along with the summons.

[3] Further, not only can a notice be issued at any time or in any place in front of justices ordinary of the realm in matters of pledge, but so can a personal prohibition in a matter involving hereditary or permanent rights if the prohibitor and the prohibitee present themselves personally, and not through an attorney, before the justices ordinary. For, otherwise a personal prohibition of this kind does not stand.

[4] [A prohibition] is usually made because of the unlawful and violent occupation of property rights and has the same or even greater force than a terminal summons. For, the prohibitee is bound to respond on the third day of the prohibition. If, however, he refuses to respond, then although no capital or other sentence is to be passed against him at that time, should he nevertheless fail to have the prohibitor legally summoned to face him within the course of one full year or even if he does, but is found by the judge to have unlawfully held and to be still holding the goods and property rights in respect of which this personal prohibition was made, then the prohibitee should be sentenced to capital punishment or the redemption of his head (according to the status of the persons litigating), exactly as if the case were initiated by terminal summons.

[5] If, however, the prohibitor fails to appear before his judge on the day of response with all those written instruments of his that bear on the matters of the goods under litigation, or is unable to appear with the letters in question, he will be condemned to a royal fine of six marks in favor of the prohibitee and his judge.

[6] If he then wishes to pursue the action further, he will be free to pursue it in another suit once he has paid the six-mark fine.

[7] And this holds true when the prohibitee appears in court on the aforementioned day of response and responds to the prohibition relevantly and forthwith.

[8] But if the prohibitee or respondent can prove, by producing there his written instruments, that the goods and property rights, in respect of which such a personal prohibition was issued, belong by just title to him, then the plaintiff, that is, the prohibitor himself, should then be condemned to the common estimation of the goods.

[9] On the other hand, if the prohibitee fails to respond on the aforesaid third day, and does not summon the plaintiff to appear before him in response to the personal prohibition within the aforementioned yearly period, then the same prohibitor, after the course of one year, has to summon the prohibitee to face him, in the first instance by a simple summons, and then according to judicial procedure, by a terminal one.

[10] And, if the prohibition was made on grounds of unlawful occupation and usurpation of the goods, and the plaintiff is able to prove that the goods belonged and still belong to him by just right, then the prohibitee or respondent should immediately be condemned to capital punishment or the redemption of his head within the term of the discussion of the case (for he allowed a response to be made and the aforesaid summons to be served and so the prohibition acquired accumulated force against him).

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Testimonies of chapters and convents to be sent for executions

Note furthermore that summonses, institutions of goods and property rights, recoveries, perambulations of boundaries, notices and all other judicial executions should always be made through the royal or palatinal bailiff with the testimony of that chapter or convent which is in the county where the execution is made, or, if there is neither, then with the testimony of some nearby place [of authentication].

[1] For otherwise the case will fail. It can be initiated anew and reactivated by the plaintiff, if he so wishes.

[2] Excepting the testimony of the chapters of the churches at Fehérvár, Buda, and Bosnia,²⁸⁶ as well as the Hospitaller convent at Fehérvár,²⁸⁷ which have authority to proceed with any execution whatsoever throughout the entire kingdom of Hungary and the parts subject to it.

[3] On the other hand, simple inquests concerning acts of might can also be executed anywhere on the attestation of whichever chapters and convents are closest.

²⁸⁶ The bishopric of Bosnia was in the mid-thirteenth century removed by Béla IV to Diákóvár (Djakova) in Valkó county, in the southernmost part of Hungary. The bishopric of Bosnia retained extensive properties throughout the medieval kingdom.

²⁸⁷ The Order of the Knights of the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem, or the Hospitallers, established a house in Hungary during the reign of Géza II (1141–1162). This was the convent of St. Stephen the King, located in Székesfehérvár, see Zsolt Hunyadi, The Hospitallers in the kingdom of Hungary c. 1150–1387 (Budapest: CEU—METEM, 2010) 102–4.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Punishment for him who is found to act both as royal bailiff and attorney in one and the same suit

It has to be known that a royal or palatinal bailiff cannot act as attorney or advocate in the same suit for which he serves summons or [performs] other executions.

[1] For if someone is found to act as a royal or palatinal bailiff and also as an attorney in one and the same suit, he will be immediately convicted to his man-price against the person on whose behalf he acted or is acting as an attorney.

[2] The reason for this is: the royal or palatinal bailiff accompanied by the testimony or man of some place of authentication (viz. a chapter or convent) stands and is regarded as a judge, sent out for execution, on behalf of his superior judge; the attorney, however, is seen as a party, as he pleads and responds. Thus he would be perceived as both judge and party. And no one is allowed to be both party and judge in one and the same suit; for this reason he is justly convicted to his man-price.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Punishment for him who summons a dead person or a child, or who orders a noble to be brought [to court]

It also should not be omitted that if any litigant has a noble who is already dead and deceased summoned against him, or if, at the time of summons, enjoins any prelate, baron or noble of the realm to have a propertied retainer bearing the title of true nobility brought to court or arranges in any other way his being brought to court; or summons against himself a child under lawful age on account of acts of might: such a plaintiff who sues against a dead nobleman, or child of unlawful age, or any individual noble retainer will be sentenced and fined fifty homagial marks in every case (provided a [legal] exception and objection is made against the plaintiff in this matter).

[1] For nobles must be summoned, and not brought before the court.

[2] For being brought to court applies only to peasants or villagers and persons of tenant peasant status as well as non-noble retainers, who are to be brought and presented to the judge by their own lords, and not by officials.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Notices served in connection with pledged [property] rights and dowers; and penalties in consequence

Notices on payment for and return of pledged property, or on receiving dower and paraphernalia, filial quarters and similar things, can be served either personally, if the plaintiff can find the man or woman to be given notice, or else at his or her dwelling or usual place of residence.

[1] On the other hand, a summons following a notice cannot be served personally, but at the settled, inherited or pledged property rights of the man or woman given notice, whence it may come to his or her knowledge that the summons has been served.

[2] For otherwise, if the person has no tenant peasants, a notice as well as summons can be duly served at his noble court or at his usual place of residence.

[3] However, if he has one or more tenant peasants, summons must be served through them. For otherwise, if he or she is summoned either personally or at their home, the plaintiff must be convicted and charged at their man-price against the person summoned.

[4] Here it should be known that if any noble man or woman is given notice to take his or her money, and return a property in pledge, or to take her dower and paraphernalia, and restore and return the property rights of her deceased husband to the person to whom they belong by law; and if these are not taken at the time of notice nor are the property rights returned, and a summons is subsequently served, and if they fail to come or to send [someone] to the appointed term, that is the octaval or short-term court, then these property rights will be restored by the judge to the plaintiff without waiting for the next term and without any monetary payment at all, and the summoned man or woman will have to seek and pursue their rights while out of possession of these goods.

[5] Indeed, by the force of our general decree a usurer who refuses to take his money and to restore the pledged goods and [property] rights will in fact be convicted to the sum of money for which those rights were pledged to him, against the opposing party.²⁸⁸

[6] And hold this to be true, only when both the notice and the summons were served on behalf of the person who made the pledge, or his son or kinsman, to whom the devolution of those pledged goods patently belong; for it is not customary that the aforesaid penalty be imposed at the instance of the neighbors or abutters of these goods.

[7] If however a woman notified and summoned in the aforesaid manner in connection with a dower and trousseau appears in court, but contrives to introduce some subterfuges in her response, so as to have her action postponed to a later term, in order that she can in the meantime receive and enjoy the fruit of those goods; and then, at that later term, she is unable to prove her case in a proper way; then, she will lose immediately all of her dower and paraphernalia on account of her deceit and her empty response (whence it is known that many women have reduced their wards to destitution through delaying tactics of this type). The judge should order those goods and property rights to be returned and restored to the plaintiff without any payment of the dower.

²⁸⁸ 1486:25.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

The clause litis pendentia in a summons: its significance

Regarding the clause “notwithstanding pending suits, if there are any between them” (namely between the summoner and the summoned) it should be known that this clause is customarily appended to a summons in order to avoid frivolous prosecution, as frivolous prosecution principally happens on account of the initiation and prosecution of two or, on occasions, a multiplicity of lawsuits.

[1] Thus, when the plaintiff and the defendant or respondent are litigating in some matter, and in the course of the suit one of the parties is injured by the other through some act of might, or is in any other way forced to go to court, and in consequence a new case emerges, then the new summons may not in any way restrict the previously initiated and pursued action, nor may any burden or encumbrance be imposed on the plaintiff, and vice versa.

[2] This clause is customarily inserted in the first letter of summons. However it is not required in the second and third summonses issued in the course of the suit.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

Three things are required to be expressly included in a summons

Then, in every summons and presentation of a plaint, especially those made for acts of might, three things should be expressly included.

[1] First, the person by whom and [the one] against whom the complaint or action is brought.

[2] Secondly, the time or the time span within which the damages and injuries were inflicted or caused by one [party] to the other.

[3] And, thirdly, the place and the county where and in which such damages or injuries were inflicted and caused.

[4] Then, if the case was initiated on the grounds of seizure of property rights, it is also necessary that the goods seized be clearly specified.

[5] For if these conditions are not met, the justice ordinary will not be able to hand down a correct and appropriate verdict to the parties, especially when, on account of the way the parties responded, the case has been submitted and brought before a common inquest. When that is held, it is always highly important to indicate the time, to specify the place and the county, to detail the things committed and to state the quantity of goods seized.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

What is a common inquest, and how many conditions must be met in order to hold one

Furthermore, it should be known that a common inquest is a definite clarification through the testimony of witnesses of doubts arising from the responses made by the litigants before a judge.²⁸⁹

[1] It is usually undertaken and conducted through the neighbors or abutters of that property where the relevant act of might occurred, or was committed, or through nobles of the same county in which the property lies, at the place of the judicial seat of the same county; unless it happens that the case is pursued on the grounds of the seizure of property rights or lands, for in this case it is often held on the site of the land in dispute, and not necessarily at the judicial seat.

[2] For any common inquest to be held in a proper and correct manner, five conditions need to be observed: liberty, age, manner, status, and the deposition of an oath.

[3] First (as I said) liberty is needed: so that each witness may give evidence of the truth freely, without fear, of his own accord, without being violently coerced, but merely at lawful bidding, lest in the clash of arms the laws appear to be silent.²⁹⁰

[4] Secondly, age is required: the witness should be old enough to remember and recall the events about which he is being examined. I have read in the records of common inquests – and not only read of this, but seen – numerous cases where, under the influence of money, or favor sixteen- or at the most twenty-year olds were included and confidently made statements and recollected evidence about matters which occurred and were done some twenty-five years previously, as if they had been present. And since it is not usual for witnesses in these inquisitions to be brought and presented in person before justices ordinary of the kingdom, but the examination of the witnesses is usually done only by royal or palatinal bailiffs and the men of chapters and convents sent to perform this task, they must therefore pay careful attention both to the age of the witnesses and to the time when the events occurred, and make a true report on the matter.

[5] Thirdly, the manner is important: that the witness plainly and openly states in respect of the deed about which he is asked: how he knows the matter and the merits of the case, whether out of knowledge or by hearsay, or whether he has perhaps received an account of it from the mouth of the person who perpetrated the deed in question. Normally simple hearsay is not admitted, nor should it be. But, alas, these days, when wickedness flourishes, and many people's charity has not only grown cold but been extinguished, very many people give their testimony with stained and defiled consciences, not after the order and manner which they know to be true but according to the instructions and wishes of the plaintiff or defendant by whom they were called. I myself can testify to such practices.

[6] Fourthly, attention must be paid to the status of the witnesses, namely whether it is a noble or a peasant who gives evidence as to the truth. For a peasant's testimony carries no weight against a person of noble status (except for the officials of prelates, barons, and other nobles of the realm, holding positions in the neighborhood on their behalf, who by ancient custom are regarded in this respect as noble persons). An exception might be cases where, on account of the merits of the case, the judge makes a ruling and order in so many words that persons of both noble and non-noble status be examined. However, this happens and is allowed rarely, and only when the parties desire and agree to it.

²⁸⁹ On the significance of inquests and, in general, oral procedures in medieval Hungary, see Erik Fügedi, "Verba volant ... Oral culture and literacy among the medieval Hungarian nobility" in Idem, Kings, bishops, nobles and burghers in medieval Hungary &c. János M. Bak, ed. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986) ch. VI.

²⁹⁰ Werbőczy adapted here the proverb Inter arma silent musae.

[7] For peasants and commoners can be lured from the path of truth by gifts or threats much more easily and quickly than nobles.

[8] In any case it seems inappropriate and unseemly that a nobleman, as a person of higher status, be exposed to the sentence and verdict of beheading or other punishment on the evidence of a person of lower status, namely a peasant, as the ancient and approved custom of this realm is known and recognized in this matter by almost all judges and attorneys.

[9] Fifthly and finally, the deposition of an oath is required when a common inquest is held.

[10] Although an oath is required of the witnesses in the first stages of the proceedings, and deserves to be foremost among the aforementioned conditions, my reason for mentioning it last is that this condition is commonly stipulated and obvious, and in any case it is always also expressly stated in the letters of adjudication drawn up by judges for a common inquest; and, anyhow, a common inquest always ends with the deposition of an oath (as will be explained clearly below).

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

How should witnesses be examined at a common inquest? The penalty for refusing to appear when called as a witness

Thus, every witness before making his statement is required to swear an oath to the effect that he has set aside all fear, hate, favor or love, does not look to the litigants for material reward, and will not conceal the truth, justify falsehood, or falsify justice, but will justly declare what he knows or understands of the matter about which he is to be examined.

[1] And so that no one can hold back or hide from giving evidence and stating the truth, either out of favor to one party or because of bribery, fear or hatred, both by the force of our general decree²⁹¹ and the requirements of ancient and long observed custom, the ispán or alispán of the county where the common inquest is held and performed, called upon by the letter of adjudication of a justice ordinary or any other letter of command issued in this matter, has full right and authority to summon and call on the nobles of the same county to give evidence at a common inquest, on pain of a fine of sixteen marks of heavy weight (each mark valued at four florins, or four hundred pence), which should be levied by the same ispán or alispán forthwith and irredeemably on those who, when notified and called upon, refuse to attend such a hearing and to give evidence therein as to the truth of the matter.

²⁹¹ See e.g. 1486: 14.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

There are two reasons why the names of witnesses are usually entered in the letters of report

The names and surnames of the witnesses, and which of them is a neighbor and which an abutter or a noble of the same county, should always be entered in any letter of report from a chapter or convent on the holding of the common inquest. There are two reasons for this:

[1] First, the testimony of two or three neighbors or abutters carries more weight and authority than that of twenty nobles of the same county; living nearby, they are likely to be much better and more accurately informed than nobles of the county of the merits of the case and the course of events.

[2] Secondly, in order that, by the listing and writing down of the names of the witnesses together with their testimony, any of the litigants can make such challenges as he finds necessary against anyone he wishes, as he is rightly allowed, on grounds of perjury or false witness, infamy or age.

[3] This is done particularly to avoid allowing perjury to go unpunished, should any such have been committed by anyone in giving their evidence (as is frequently done); as the sage said, “A lying witness will not go unpunished,”²⁹² since he both sins grievously against God in denying His justice, and harms his neighbor, by cheating him with false testimony.

CHAPTER THIRTY

The punishment for perjurers and aucarii known as ludas

Consequently by just judgement of God and man any faith-breaker or perjurer (whom in common parlance we term aucarius, that is, ludas)²⁹³ is to be punished severely.

[1] This means that, once convicted for perjury, he forfeits everything, all his property rights, and all his movable goods, wherever located and known by whatever name.

[2] Indeed, he will be deprived of the ownership of his property, and forfeit it forever.

[3] Not only will he be dispossessed from these, but in his own person he will lose his honor as a member of human society, and suffer such disgrace that he will be obliged to move among other Christians in distinct clothing at all times, with a belt of hemp, barefooted and bareheaded, as if he were relegated and separated from human society.²⁹⁴

²⁹² Prov. 19.

²⁹³ Werbőczy calls the perjurers aucarius=goose-man. It may go back to a pun of Aristophanes about a person swearing falsely ton khena and not ton Zena (i. e., by Zeus); khena=goose, hence auca → aucarius. Its way into Hungarian, where lúd means goose, thus ludas “one with goose” is a puzzle for linguists. In contemporary Hungarian it simply means “someone who is guilty of something fishy.”

²⁹⁴ The description of dress and appearance of the perjurer resembles that of excommunicates.

[4] He will have no right to take action in court against any person, whereas any person will have authority to take action against him.

[5] And understand this in regard to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm and against the prince; for against a plaintiff, he is usually condemned as a perjurer and faithbreaker to the man-price and the redemption of his head, which amounts to two hundred florins.

[6] Wherefore it should be known that the act of perjury may be understood in two ways. The first sense refers to as the breaking of a licit oath. This occurs when someone promises to give another something, or to do this or that by oath and then breaks such a promise. In such a case the said dishonor and the forfeiture of goods do not necessarily follow, since not infrequently the one who made the promise is exonerated on grounds of genuine ill-health, difficulties of travel, or times of disturbance; nonetheless, he is still obliged to keep and fulfill his promise.

[7] The second type of perjury is when a lie is confirmed by an oath taken maliciously to deceive or harm someone's rights. In this case the aforementioned punishment for aucarii is always imposed and proclaimed.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

A common inquest must not be held twice

It should be noted that once a common inquest has been held on behalf of either party and has not been interrupted by an obvious disturbance, then it is not allowed to have the action subsequently resubmitted to the same common inquest at the bidding of one party, although on many occasions various people have concocted ingenious quibbles in an attempt to prove that this should be allowed.

[1] Other details of the holding of a common inquest and even how it may be disturbed are clearly and unambiguously set out in general decrees.²⁹⁵

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

How oaths are granted to the litigants after or even before a common inquest

It is further to be known that every common inquest is brought to a conclusion with the deposition of an oath.²⁹⁶

²⁹⁵ See inter alia 1486:14.

²⁹⁶ Oath (iuramentum) as a mode of proof survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers. The ways and modes of oath-taking, after the abolition of ordeals in the mid-thirteenth century, were first regulated in detail by Charles I as part of his judicial reform see 1320, 13328.

[1] For if a plaintiff can prove his intent, plaint and claim with adequate evidence, namely the testimony of six neighbors and the same number of abutters, and twelve nobles from the same county or, failing to come up with this number of neighbors and abutters, if he can make good the number with testimonies of nobles from the same county; and suppose that the respondent fails to prove his case, or even if he proves it partially: then fifty nobles including the plaintiff – according to his man-price – will take an oath “on the head of” the respondent.²⁹⁷

[2] But if both parties can convincingly support their plaint and claim, then an oath will be required of the defendant or respondent according to the letters of inquest produced and displayed by the plaintiff at the time of adjudication, when the suit was submitted to this common inquest. If three letters of inquest were produced, fifty nobles including the defendant will take the oath; if two, twenty-five; or if only one, twelve, and thus he will be quit of the plaint and claim of the plaintiff.

[3] But when the evidence favors the respondent more than the plaintiff, yet the plaintiff is able to prove something, then the fifty nobles including the defendant will take an oath if there are three letters of inquest, twelve if there are two, and six if there is one. And thus he will be quit of the charges brought by the plaintiff.

[4] But if the plaintiff altogether fails in his testimony, or if by chance does not even arrange for the inquest, then the charges against the defendant shall simply be dismissed.

[5] And conversely, if the respondent fails to arrange for such a common inquest, or perhaps does so, but can provide no witness to support his case, then the judge should pass final sentence right away against the defendant. And the same should held and done in all other cases of summons.

[6] Now if the plaintiff has produced three letters of inquest, and the defendant denies the charges outright, fifty nobles including him will take an oath. Moreover, if the case was opened on the seizure of property rights, the plaintiff will recover his seized goods straightaway.

[7] However, if he denies the charges, and chooses to claim his innocence through a common inquest, and the plaintiff does not accept the same inquest, then the respondent will be cleared of the charges if twenty-five nobles, including him, swear an oath and so on downwards: twelve nobles against two letters, and three against only one. For a single letter will have no force if the plaintiff refuses to accept that inquest.

[8] Then, if the respondent at the first term of response has submitted himself to the plaintiff's capital oath, according to the custom of the realm, and the plaintiff declines to accept this, then the respondent is required to take an oath with only two other nobles, even if three letters of inquest were presented on behalf of the plaintiff.

[9] But if the respondent agrees to submit himself to the oath of the plaintiff alone, that is in his own person, and the plaintiff refuses to accept this, the defendant is to be immediately acquitted.

[10] However, in other minor actions where no letters of inquest were produced by the plaintiff, the defendant shall always take the oath together with two other nobles; if, however, a debt or loan is at stake, and the plaintiff cannot produce any convincing document, the defendant or respondent will in this case take the oath alone.

²⁹⁷ Capital oath (iuramentum ad caput) was an oath that the defendant was not allowed to counter by his own oath. Such a decisive oath was also allowed when the plaintiff presented three favorable letters of inquest and the defendant refused to submit to a fourth one.

[11] If some evidence is offered concerning a debt, loan, or lost money, but there is no means of determining exactly the amount of money involved, then the plaintiff can recover his money by means of an oath, namely by the oath of one nobleman for every mark (equivalent to four florins).

[12] A villager or a peasant can only swear an oath for one florin worth one hundred pence, and this is not customarily admitted in the suits of nobles.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

Whether the oath of a noble for a peasant or vice versa, is valid in matters of damages

The question arises, whether in cases involving the recovery of losses or debts the oath of a noble on behalf of a peasant or non-noble person can be regarded as retaining the same force and validity as if it was given on behalf of a noble, or does it become equivalent to the oath of a peasant.

[1] Conversely: can a noble recover his losses or debts through the oaths of peasants, taken according to their ability?

[2] It must be stated that the oath of a noble is always valid, whether given in favor of another noble or even of a non-noble person. It retains the same force and validity as long as it is given rightly and lawfully. For no disgrace can result from the deposition of an oath sworn in the right way, nor is any noble considered to have forfeited his status as a noble in consequence.

[3] On the other hand the oath of a non-noble person or a peasant, being of inferior status, has no force and is not admitted for or against a noble, as a superior, though a noble is permitted to take an oath with non-noble persons against a non-noble person.

[4] The peasant for his part must be free to take an oath with other non-noble persons in any case initiated against a noble for, say, a debt or any other business, according to the decision of the judge. However regarding the granting and taking of oaths in cases involving nobles the position outlined above must be taken.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

Oaths to be granted and taken in cases involving written instruments

Further it is to be noted that in regard to documents and written instruments which someone has concealed or which are in someone's hands in some other way, a more forceful defense is required of the defendant or respondent than in the case of other acts of might.

[1] For if the plaintiff has produced only one or at the most two letters of inquest on the matter, the defendant will be judged to give an oath with fifty nobles including himself, but if the plaintiff has no letters at all to show, but simply states in his own words or at the judicial notice that someone has those written instruments, then twenty-five nobles take the oath.

[2] Now if he fails in such an oath, then he will be obliged to protect and warrant the goods and property rights in regard to which he was unable to supply the oath and will be bound to maintain the plaintiff and his heirs in the possession of the property rights against any litigants and legal challengers.

[3] Nevertheless, in the letters of summons it must be expressly noted which and what kind of written instruments are meant, to prevent fraud being committed by the plaintiff in the summons.

[4] And this only, if he does not suggest that all the documents and written instruments touching on and concerning the matters of some property rights are in the hands of the defendant. For in this case it will not be necessary to describe the number of documents or their nature, but simply the names of the property rights and their location. For when he refers to all and every of them, he excludes none.

[5] And if he claims all, the plaintiff shall take care not to produce at a later date any letters relevant to the matter of these property rights, or have them exhibited, for in so doing he will be condemned forthwith for frivolous prosecution.

[6] Then it should be known that if there are several brothers, or other joint-owning kinsmen, who (as often happens) produce and show documents and written instruments against persons of the female line in an adversarial trial, then the oath will be adjudged not for all the brothers individually, but only for the eldest, (as the fiftieth hand, that is, fifty nobles including him) since it is recognized that he is the one who is responsible both for safeguarding such written instruments and for arranging lawsuits.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

Cases in which the names of oath-takers are to be written down

It should also be observed that there are four cases where the names of the oath-takers are always to be written down and stated in the relevant letters of report when an oath is taken. These are: instances of proof of genealogies; of documents and written instruments; of perambulation of boundaries; and for those made and taken on someone's head.

[1] This is to ensure that the oath was taken with the support of true nobles, and according to the judge's instruction.

[2] However, in other cases of oaths the names of the oath-takers need not necessarily be recorded.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

The penalty for calling another person non-noble or of ill repute. The various consequences of oaths

If in the four above-mentioned cases some person takes exception to the oath-takers, or to any one of them, on the grounds that he is not a true noble with a genuine title to nobility, or is otherwise known as being of ill repute or a perjurer, a single judicial term is to be set and assigned to the plaintiff in which to state and verify his noble status or to refute the charge of infamy.

[1] If at this time he can prove by written evidence that he is a true noble, and by any other acceptable proof that he is a person of honest condition, then the defendant (who has made the exception) has to be actually condemned and fined to the man-price of the oath-taker which amounts to 200 gold florins, to be paid exclusively to the oath-taker.

[2] For this [amount] the justice ordinary presiding over the case is to award the oath-taker forthwith immediate satisfaction out of the goods and the movable property of the opponent, or if necessary, out of his property rights, wherever they may lie.

[3] If on the other hand [the accused] fails in the aforementioned proof, then his opponent will win the case.

[4] In this case, if he was a respondent, he saves his head, and is quit of the plaintiff's claim, while if he was the plaintiff, the defendant will be obliged to warrant (as explained above) permanently the goods, the letters concerning which he had hidden and not returned; or, if the case was pursued over boundaries, he will be allowed to keep the disputed land forever. Whereas if he fails in the proof of genealogy, he loses the disputed property, and vice versa.

[5] In other cases and suits, if the plaintiff fails in the deposition of the oath, he loses his plaint and claim; if on the other hand the defendant fails, the plaint and claim brought against him by the plaintiff will be upheld, and the judge will find against him right away.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

How the oath of a father who died in the meantime descends upon his son or kinsman

It should also not be omitted that if either a plaintiff or respondent who was judged to take an oath happens to die before the term set for the deposition of this oath – and additionally, perhaps, is survived by a pregnant wife – then the obligation to take the oath falls to his eldest son, if he had sons born before; or if not, then (waiting for the time when the woman gives birth) to the son who is then born, or, otherwise if a daughter is born rather than a son, to the closest kinsman of the deceased – as the person to whom the property rights will pass.

[1] And his judge will assign to the son or kinsman a new term for the deposition of the oath, in which the son or kinsman will be required to take the oath.

[2] And if the son or kinsman is of tender age and not yet able to swear an oath, the judge will be required to postpone the oath until such time as he duly and properly reaches legal age when he can take the oath validly.

[3] The above holds true of brothers and joint-owning kinsmen as well: if one dies during [the proceedings] the obligation to swear an oath falls to the other.

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

Can a single oath-taker take an oath exculpating several persons in the same legal action

Then it can be asked: if there is more than one respondent in one and the same action, and the justice ordinary ordered each of them to take the oath at different times and places—as commonly happens owing to the distance of the place and deed or pressure of time—and one of the oath-takers in the first term takes an oath for one of the respondents, is it possible for him to take an oath at another time and place to clear another defendant or respondent in the same case and action?

[1] Reply that not. For it is not possible for one person, or one oath-taker, to take an oath exonerating and exculpating more than one person in one and the same case.

[2] For if it were possible to take an oath for and exculpate more than one person, then it would be quite easy for any defendant, or any malefactor, to escape the charges laid by the plaintiff; he could swear an oath—or even be paid to do so—and clear one person today, another tomorrow, and a third person the day after, and so on.

[3] Hence, if an oath-taker should so swear for two persons in succession, then the one for whom he swore for the second time is to be condemned immediately according to the plaint and claim of the plaintiff: as the oath should be declared invalid.

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

Our prince cannot be sentenced to capital punishment nor can he himself swear an oath against any person, nor is he required to prove his rights

It is to be noted that although the royal majesty is held to appear and to respond through the director of his suits to all complainants and litigants before the Lord Palatine of this realm;

[1] he is not condemned to capital punishment or to the redemption of his head or to the loss of his goods; he is only required to make good any damages caused to anyone by his officials or tenant peasants.

[2] In cases involving land, the perambulation and adjustment of boundaries, or other matters, or acts of might, where he is ordered to take an oath that will be sworn by the director of his suits in the name of his majesty, according to the decision of the palatine.

[3] Moreover, he is never obliged to produce and show letters or written instruments regarding any goods or property rights which are alleged to have devolved to the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown of the realm under any title whatsoever.

CHAPTER FORTY

The way lords prelate, barons, mitered abbots and priors swear oaths

It should be known that any prelate, any baron ex officio, any mitered and ringed abbot or prior has the right to swear an oath worth that of ten nobles.

[1] A prelate or abbot or prior should swear oaths by the purity of their conscience in their cathedral church before the witnesses of some chapter or convent appointed by the judge for that purpose; their other oath-takers, as well as all barons and nobles, should swear by their faith in God at the place designated by the judge.

[2] Accordingly, the man-price of lords prelate, barons, mitered abbots and priors is set at 100 marks, that is, 400 florins.

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

What is the view, and how it should be held

Then, having described the common inquest and the deposition of oaths following it, it remains to add a few notes and comments on the view.

[1] View means the visible identification of the fact that a violent occupier of property rights is in possession thereof.

[2] This procedure is carried out in the same way as a common inquest; in other words, the neighbors and abutters of the property rights seized and the nobles of the county are called together and their testimony heard.

[3] Besides which, the plaintiff must visibly demonstrate by the proof of sight to the royal or palatinal bailiff or the man of the chapter or convent that the defendant or respondent is in possession of the wrongly seized goods; and then corroborate this with the testimony of the neighbors, the abutters, and nobles of the county.

[4] After such a view and inspection, the testimony of the neighbors, abutters, and nobles of the county commonly takes place at the judicial seat of the county (just as in a common inquest), and often at the actual site of the contested seized property rights – all depending on the merits of the case.

[5] Where it is to be known that a view is a more effective and better procedure by far than the common inquest: after all, what the eye sees for itself is the most convincing proof of all.

[6] Now once a common inquest was held by both parties, the taking of the oaths follows (as explained above). Following the view, should the plaintiff sufficiently prove his plaint and claim by this view and the testimony of the said nobles, no further oaths are required of either party by the judge. A sentence of capital punishment or redemption of the head is then delivered and pronounced against the defendant forthwith and ordered to be executed.

[7] If, however, the plaintiff fails in his proof, then here too, just as in a common inquest, it is necessary to submit the defendant to the deposition of an oath.

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

Kinds of sentences, their varieties and their execution

Having mentioned capital sentence, I have decided at this point to discuss the definition of sentences, their types, their execution, and varieties.

[1] For our purposes a sentence is the decision of a judge which ends a suit or dispute by condemnation or acquittal.

[2] In fact, the word has many other meanings, and can be interpreted in a variety of ways; however, as these meanings are not relevant to our purpose, I have resolved to pass over them in silence.

[3] A sentence differs from an opinion in this respect, that a sentence is a firm response which leaves no room for doubt; whereas an opinion is a response with a certain degree of doubt (albeit on probable grounds). This means that if opinions vary in a given case, the one based on the better and more subtle reasoning is to be accepted.

[4] There are different sentences: some are capital sentences, others involving redemption of the head, others implying the charge of infidelity, again others simple sentences, and others determining fine of the tongue or frivolous prosecution.

[5] These days a capital sentence is usually not handed down or pronounced except for invasion of houses; the killing, beating, wounding of a noble or detaining him without just cause; further, the seizure by whatever name of anyone's property rights and their appurtenances.

[6] And such a capital sentence touches and affects only secular persons, males, and those not related by blood; for apart from cases to be detailed below, capital sentence is not pronounced between or against ecclesiastics, women or female persons, and kinsmen. By ancient custom of the realm such persons can only incur the sentence involving the redemption, that is, relief of the head. Other kinds of persons are treated differently, as will be made clear below.

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

The difference between capital sentence and a sentence of the redemption of the head

The sentence of the redemption of the head differs from capital sentence only inasmuch as after a sentence of the redemption of the head has been pronounced, the convicted defendant – or one condemned because of his absence or failure of appearance – cannot by force and virtue thereof be in his person arrested, caught, and punished by beheading.

[1] However, just as in the case and manner of a capital sentence, he immediately loses and forfeits all his goods and property rights, as well as all his chattels that personally and positively belong to him, known by whatever name and of whatever sort or kind; two thirds of this is to be instituted for and occupied by the judge and one third by the plaintiff, who will hold them in pledge until the time of the redemption of these property rights by the value and extent of their common estimation.

[2] The relief or redemption of the head, that is, the man-price of a prelate or baron is four hundred florins, and of a noble, two hundred florins, to be paid to the male or female plaintiff alone.

[3] First and before anything else, satisfaction must be made by the judge towards the man-price from the chattels of the convicted and sentenced person, if enough can be found, or if not, then if necessary also from his property rights; and thereafter the remaining part of his chattels, goods and property rights of the same convicted man are to be divided into three parts between the judge and the male or female plaintiff to be held by them (as explained above) until the time of their redemption; having divided the chattels among themselves, and converted them for their own use.

[4] Females and women so convicted forfeit not only their property rights and chattels but also their dower and filial quarter.

[5] It should also be known that capital sentence can be passed and pronounced also against females and women, just as against male persons, in cases when any of them maliciously kills, or procures the killing of her husband, her parents, or her own children, for such a case falls under the charge of infidelity.

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

Cases in which capital sentence is passed against ecclesiastics

It is further to be known that there are three cases in which capital sentence is pronounced against persons spiritual and clerical, in which capital punishment is decided and passed on top of the loss of patrimony and benefice.

[1] The first case is if one of them commits lèse-majesté.

[2] The second, if he manifestly incurs the charge of infidelity.

[3] The third, if one of them commits or arranges to commit willful and premeditated homicide and brigandage.

[4] For this they must lose their head, following defrocking.

[5] In these cases, although they do not lose the property of the churches they are in charge of, they do forfeit and lose their private and separate patrimony and property rights, if they have any, and in addition all ecclesiastical benefices they possess.

[6] In the third case, however, that is, premeditated homicide and brigandage, they do not lose the ownership and inheritance of their patrimony if they have co-inheriting kinsmen to whom these rights belong by succession; for in this case it is enough to pay for a head with a head.

[7] In other cases and suits, a person spiritual or clerical against a layman, or vice versa, a layman against a spiritual is subject to equal penalty and punishment, namely redemption of his head or man-price and compensation for damages caused; from which the judge has to satisfy the plaintiff and injured party, in the aforementioned way.

[8] And this custom derives and comes from the general decree of the most serene prince Albert,²⁹⁸ king of the Romans and of Hungary, and duke of Austria, and moreover has been ratified and confirmed in a recent general decree of ours.²⁹⁹

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

How persons spiritual have to repay debts and damages

Then if a person spiritual of whatever status and rank is convicted to repay and make good any debts, he has to satisfy the other party with a payment in cash.

[1] And if he refuses or is unable, then the debts shall through the judge be recovered for the adversary from the goods of the church out of their revenues and for as long as it takes; they are to be instituted in and occupied until the debt is repaid.

[2] Payment in cash is here understood to mean gold, silver, or any other money in circulation at that time.

[3] When he is convicted to recompense and to make good the damages done, he may in this case, if he so wishes, compensate his adversary from marketable chattels, however at the true value of these things.

[4] Otherwise, the judge of the suit will also in this case give satisfaction to the adversary of the convicted person by proper institution in the goods and property rights of the church.

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX

How chapters and convents together, and private persons separately have to be sentenced

If a chapter or convent is condemned collectively for any major or minor act of might, by whatever kind of sentence, then it is convicted as a sole individual, and the singular members are not condemned individually; the only exceptions being the aforementioned cases of willful and premeditated homicide, lèse-majesté, and the charge of infidelity, in which all the offenders are punished in the aforesaid manner.

[1] If, however, certain members of the chapter, and not the whole community, commit acts of might from church property, then these persons may freely be summoned—separately from the community—from the place whence those acts of might were perpetrated.

²⁹⁸ 29 May 1439: 33.

²⁹⁹ 25 January 1486: 72.

[2] In particular when they have no private estates, they are still be summoned and cited from the said place, and, sentence can be passed and pronounced against them by the judge, as the case deserves.

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

What is to be done when a single member of a chapter is to be sentenced

Then, if a single member of a chapter who has no separate hereditary goods and estates is sentenced to the redemption of his head or convicted to make good damages, and is found to lack chattels, the question arises as to how and whence satisfaction can be given to his adversary.

After all, he did not commit the offence at the instigation of the chapter, so that it does not seem proper to expropriate the property of the chapter for this.

[1] The answer is as follows. Because he had committed the wrong or the misdeeds from which the redemption of the head or the compensation for damages followed, from the midst of the chapter as if a member thereof; as he could not have committed these actions, or would not have had a place to commit them, had he not been the holder of such a benefice; therefore, satisfaction is to be given to the plaintiff, in respect of the things awarded to him, by the other members of the chapter from the income of the benefice of the convicted member.

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

Compensation for damages incurred by the officials of ecclesiastics

Then, all the officials of ecclesiastics, be they cleric or lay, in the event of acts of might which they committed and perpetrated from their place of service, can always be freely called, cited to court, and summoned from their place of service in the same way as other nobles or officials of the realm.

[1] And if they are convicted by the court, compensation will be awarded both to the adversary and the judge, from their said place of service.

[2] Moreover, their masters—assuming these were not committed and caused by their commission—can force such officials, even by detaining their persons until the debt or compensation is paid. This is set out in article twenty-four of the first decree of our present lord King Wladislas, concerning officials.³⁰⁰

³⁰⁰ 1492:24.

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

How a prelate is judged together with the chapter and how separately

Then, if a prelate is summoned to court together with his chapter or convent, and if it is established that the prelate and the chapter or convent have joint ownership of the property rights from which the acts of might or other kind of misdeeds are alleged and claimed to have been committed and perpetrated; then in this case the prelate is either acquitted or condemned not separately from his chapter or convent, but together with them. For he and the chapter or convent are treated as one community on the basis of their joint ownership.

[1] If, on the other hand, it is established that the misdeeds were committed from property rights divided between them, then sentence will be handed down to the prelate and the chapter or convent separately and distinctly.

[2] Hence, if a prelate and his chapter or convent are summoned together, then the type of oath will also be adjudged differently according to whether they have divided or not.

[3] For if the prelate is a joint owner with his chapter or convent in the aforementioned way, then the prelate and his oath-helpers will be required to swear an oath both in his name and in the name of the whole chapter or convent.

[4] If, on the other hand, they are divided, then separate oaths will be required of the prelate and his men on the one hand, and of the lector, cantor, warden, or deacon on behalf of the chapter on the other, in each case together with their oath-takers, according to the decision and judgment of the judge.

[5] The term "prelates" is to be understood to refer not only to archbishops and bishops but also to abbots and priors, both secular and regular.

CHAPTER FIFTY

A year's grace granted to newly elected prelates

Then, prelates who have divided with their brethren, that is, their chapter or convent, enjoy from the day of their election the privilege of wards,

[1] to whom it is granted and permitted by the ancient law and approved custom of the realm that for the period of a year they are not required to answer at anyone's instance in the matter of suits initiated in the time of their father, so that they can in the meantime acquaint themselves with and make a reckoning of their paternal rights and written instruments, and then they can properly oversee the prosecution of their suits.

[2] Note, however, that this refers to property rights and the presentation of written instruments.

[3] For this concession—which is usually always granted by the prince and accepted in the courts in the aforementioned way and in the aforementioned cases and suits even in respect of those of lawful age, that is fourteen years, or, as is the custom today, twelve full years of age—is of no use in other cases moved by reason of acts of might, where the productions of documents is not necessary.

[4] On the other hand, when they have not divided, then an allowance of this sort or prerogative concession cannot be utilized by them.

[5] For chapters and convents enjoy the status of adults and always count as of full age, which is twenty-four full years, and for them it is not proper to observe such a prorogation.

[6] After all, it would be absurd if after the election of an abbot, prior, lector, warden, cantor or canon, a case moved at some earlier date should be left in abeyance for a full year, and thus be pending for however many years without decision and deprived of its end.

CHAPTER FIFTY-ONE

Prelates of churches cannot be convicted for offences committed by their predecessors

Furthermore, if an act of might or other kind of crime is committed from the goods and property rights of some prelate, abbot or prior and this prelate, abbot, or prior is not summoned during his lifetime to the royal court for this nor accused in any other way in the matter, then, after his death, his successor cannot be condemned and convicted in his person for such an act of might. Only those tenant peasants or retainers of the church who are known to have committed those crimes, should be brought to justice and make amends to the plaintiff.

[1] The reason is that goods and property rights of churches (as said previously) cannot be lost through the excesses of a prelate, abbot, prior, or other churchman nor alienated from that church.

[2] If, however, any of them is convicted to the redemption of the head, then he is required only to pay the man-price and amend for damages (in the aforementioned way).

[3] Thus his successor, not having succeeded him by hereditary right but by election, is not liable to pay the redemption of his predecessor's head (for which he was not summoned).

[4] Just as sons cannot be subjected to capital sentence or the redemption of their head as punishment for offences committed by their father through a summons made earlier, but if convicted they can only be held liable to the estimation of their fathers' [property] rights.

[5] And this only if the summons was issued while their fathers were alive. Otherwise if the summons is issued after the death of the father, then usually not the father's offence of, say, seizing someone's property rights or taking away his goods or chattels, should be compensated and measured, but that of the sons who keep hold of the spitefully seized [property rights] or stolen objects.

[6] So if the case is initiated over the seizure of goods now held and kept by a church, then even after the death of the prelate, abbot, or prior, his successor can always be summoned and convicted in this matter.

[7] And the same is to be held also in cases of those prelates of churches who, being transferred, move to another church's benefice or property.

CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO

A case touching upon property rights cannot be heard in an ecclesiastical court even if a vow or a will is involved

Then, no case concerning property rights, even if a vow or a will is involved in connection with such a property right, can be dealt with before ecclesiastics or their representatives; all such cases are usually heard and settled in the royal court before its justices ordinary.

[1] For whatever someone vows or wills is always subject to the judgment to him under whose authority and jurisdiction the matter (about which the vow or will was made) principally falls.

[2] It is evident, that in this realm property rights are governed exclusively by the sentences and letters of judgment of the justices ordinary of the royal court.

[3] The letters and sentences of vicars or other judges spiritual are never observed in this respect. For anyhow the accessory always has to follow the court of its principal; therefore, cases touching upon property rights cannot be pursued or concluded before judges spiritual.

[4] And the same is to be held also of a case initiated, for example, over a debt or some other matter, which may involve a vow and the one who took the vow dies before the case is heard; namely that this cannot be tried in a court spiritual. For the vow and the penalty for it is a personal matter, which with the extinction of the person also extinguishes in court.

[5] If, however, something is attached and added to the sworn vow respecting a debt or some other matter, then the plaintiff has the right to claim it before his secular judge from the heirs and other lawful successors of the deceased.

CHAPTER FIFTY-THREE

What is the power of the official or the deacon of the chapter acting among the tenant peasants of the chapter

Then, chapters and convents commonly have and maintain officials and reeves in their villages, in order to administer temporal jurisdiction among their tenant peasants.

[1] Their judgments and decisions are known to have the same force and authority as if they had been delivered personally by members of the chapter or convent.

[2] A deacon, too, has the same authority when representing the chapter.

[3] However, outside his place of service, he cannot respond on behalf of his chapter without letters of attorney of the whole chapter.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

The prior of Vrana, and his position; sentences passed against him

It should be noted furthermore that although the prior of Vrana enjoys a dual title, namely ecclesiastical and secular, he holds his property rights as an ecclesiastic. In view of this I thought it worthwhile to add a few words about his special position.³⁰¹

[1] About this it should be known that the priorate of Vrana is recorded as being first founded and established in this kingdom by the most illustrious prince and lord, King Louis. When he invaded the kingdom of Sicily, that is, of Naples, with a strong army to avenge the death of his brother, the blessed Andrew, king of the same kingdom and of Jerusalem, it is said that those of Rhodes furnished him considerable naval assistance. So, moved by their devotion and by singular love, he instituted and founded the priorate of Vrana upon his felicitous and victorious return and endowed it with many estates according to the rule and profess of the Rhodians.

[2] The prior of the order, by observing the rules of the Rhodians, is bound always to perform temporal knighthood in defense and protection of the Christian faith and to keep perpetual chastity, lacking and abstaining from the solace of a wife, while he is appointed. Because of this abstinence and chastity he is worthy to be counted among persons spiritual.

[3] And since the prior of Vrana enjoys both titles, namely the spiritual and secular, as said above, and he is styled venerable and magnificus – venerable as it were for his chastity and observance of the rule; magnificus, as one of the barons, for his special knighthood, for which he has to be noble and of great heart. The temporal goods he holds are considered to be in some way connected to spiritual and ecclesiastical property.

[4] Therefore, if judgement is ever passed against him, he is usually not only condemned and convicted to the redemption of his head (which in view of his baronial status would amount to four hundred florins, to be paid to the opposite party alone), but also has to compensate for the damages done by him, to be made good out of church goods, as in the case of other ecclesiastics, and further with the loss of all his inheritance (if he owns any apart from the goods of the priory).

[5] And this, if he is sentenced for major acts of might; for, in cases of lesser acts of might, a lighter burden and punishment is imposed on him, just as on any other person.

[6] It should also be understood that this is if he is sentenced against secular magnates or nobles; if the opposing party is an ecclesiastic, the prior himself cannot be more heavily punished than his ecclesiastical adversary.

[7] At the same time it should be noted that in the three aforementioned cases (namely lèse- majesté, charge of infidelity, and willful and premeditated homicide) the prior must and is usually sentenced beyond the above punishment to lose his head, that is, to capital sentence, provided that he is clearly and lawfully convicted and condemned.

³⁰¹ The Order of the Knights of the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem, or the Hospitallers of Rhodes established a house in Hungary already during the reign of Géza II (1141–1162); see Zsolt Hunyadi, The Hospitallers in the kingdom of Hungary c. 1150–1387 (Budapest: CEU—METEM, 2010) [also: http://doktori.bibl.u-szeged.hu/100/1/hunyadi_phd_diss.pdf]. The Hungarian priory was located at Vrana on the Adriatic coast in Dalmatia, originally the seat of the Templars, see B. Stossek, “Maisons et possessions des Templiers en Hongrie,” in: Zsolt Hunyadi, József Laszlovszky, eds. The Crusades and the Military Orders. Expanding the Borders of Medieval Latin Christianity (Budapest: CEU Press, 2001) pp. 245-51.

[8] However, in other cases he customarily enjoys and cherishes the privilege of prelates according to the rights of the realm. He must, nevertheless, fulfill his military obligations to the defense of the realm in the manner of barons and magnates.

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

Capital sentence, and the way of its execution

It should further be known that a capital sentence brought and pronounced in any way against a secular person (with the exception of persons bound by kinship and blood relationship) for the offences mentioned earlier, not only involves the loss of the chattels, goods, and property rights of the sentenced and condemned man, but it involves capital punishment as well.

[1] This means, that he can be sought and arrested by his justice ordinary or by the bailiff of the same judge deputed to the task by him on the strength of the letters of sentence at any time after the execution [of the sentence]; before the execution, however, he can be arrested, imprisoned in his person, and handed over to his judge to suffer the punishment prescribed by the law for the offence only within the course of a full year dating from the day of issue of the letters of sentence.³⁰²

[2] For, the other party has no right without the bailiff of the judge either to seize him or to hold him in his house or anywhere else (even if he was arrested by the man of the judge), but he must hand him over and present him to the judge as soon as he can (by traveling daily from place to place to the residence of the judge or to wherever the judge is located).

[3] The judge will then detain the arrested man with him for three days in case peace and reconciliation can be effected. If in this time he is unable to reconcile himself with the other party, the judge will then hand him over to his accuser so that he lose his head and the guilty man pay his penalty.

[4] Once death, or whatever other appropriate penalty prescribed by the law (as discussed previously)³⁰³ has been delivered by the other party, thereafter neither the judge nor the other party can occupy the goods and property rights of the condemned man. All his goods and property rights pass directly and straightforwardly to his sons, if he has any, or to his kinsmen or other lawful successors, excepting only the belongings which were with the convicted person at the time of his arrest, which remain with the judge.

³⁰² Execution in this case means the seizure of property. However the logic of this paragraph escapes us (if the regulation was put the other way around, it might make more sense). The apparent illogicality may partly be explained by the fact that a capital sentence was not actually intended to result in a beheading, but rather through its graduated application to force the defendant to come to terms with the plaintiff.

³⁰³ See above I, 42: 4–6.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX

How are goods seized by sentence to be redeemed from the hands of the judge or the opposing party

If the convicted and condemned man evades the course of justice and cannot be taken into custody, and the sentence passed against him is lawfully executed, then his goods and property rights can through common estimation be redeemed from the judge and the other party by his sons, kinsmen, or successors to whom they are known to belong within the period of time determined by the judge.

[1] Moreover, if he has no sons, kinsmen, or successors, then the neighbors and abutters of these seized goods and property rights can redeem them (since they are redeemable, and have the same status and quality as pledged [property] rights), provided they do not exceed the period specified for redemption by the bailiff of the judge and the testimony of the place of authentication at the time the sentence was executed.

[2] For, thereafter the goods become res iudicata, and remain with the judge or the adversary party for as long as a royal pardon or, perchance, a retrial does not favor the condemned man.

[3] Without a royal pardon, the sentenced and condemned man is unable of his own accord to regain his goods through redemption and the aforementioned estimation.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN

What is a royal pardon given to a convicted man worth. The role of the judge

If the prince grants a special pardon to a convicted and sentenced person: then this pardon is understood to imply protection and salvation only for the head, namely that he should suffer neither capital punishment, nor the two-thirds of the property rights of the convicted which would be the judge's share. It does not imply protection for the man-price and for the other third which would go to the plaintiff, that is, the adversary.

[1] Moreover, the pardon will not affect the two-thirds judicial portion if the case was heard and decided before the Lord Palatine of this realm; these judicial two-thirds (as ancient custom of the realm dictates) belong only to the Palatine or to whomsoever he confers them.

[2] In the matter and case of the charge of infidelity, however, by which the hereditary right and ownership of the property rights of the condemned man are usually also lost, the permanent granting of the goods of the same condemned man pertains solely to the royal majesty and the jurisdiction of his Holy Crown; so, not even the plaintiff, that is, his adversary can obtain for himself any property from these property rights on the grounds of such a sentence.

[3] It is different these days, however, in sentences of charge of infidelity which are passed for a second repulsio. For, in this case, one-third of the goods and property rights of the condemned man, together with the hereditary right and ownership, is permanently ceded and given to the adversary, by virtue of our general decree.³⁰⁴

[4] It should be further known that this royal pardon only remains in effect for one full year and no more. Otherwise, if the convicted man, having obtained the pardon of the prince, refuses within this year to satisfy the plaintiff, that is, the adversary and to come to terms with him, then after the year has elapsed, he will be sentenced and subject to the original burden of the earlier sentence, without, however, any further judicial process.

[5] That is why the plaintiff is also obliged to have his or her letters of sentence put into execution by the royal or palatinal bailiff and the testimony of some place of authentication within the space of one year from the date of issue of the same.

[6] For, otherwise, once a year has passed, the plaintiff cannot disturb, harm or detain the convicted and condemned man in his person or chattels and goods by virtue of the letter of sentence, but, if he wishes, he can have him summoned by a peremptory and terminal summons in order to quit himself of the burden of the sentence, on the basis of which a decision must be made without delay and within one single judicial term.

[7] It should also not be omitted that if someone convicted to a capital sentence came into the custody of the judge (in the aforementioned way), then the royal pardon given to him while he was in custody cannot save even his head against the plaintiff. Because the prince cannot grant a pardon unless the condemned and sentenced man can come to terms with his adversary. Through the detention of the condemned man the adversary has already put into execution the sentence passed in his favor, and he cannot be compelled against his will to make terms—nor indeed should he. Therefore, royal pardon has no impact upon him, and the life of the detained is wholly in the hands of his adversary.

[8] That is the reason why the detained man can alienate permanently all his goods and property rights in order to save his head, even to the prejudice of his sons and kinsmen, as is explained amply in the first part.³⁰⁵

CHAPTER FIFTY-EIGHT

When and in what way can a person condemned to capital sentence be arrested

Then, neither of the litigants can have the opposite party arrested in his person on the strength of a capital sentence that has been passed and imposed because of the absence and non-appearance in court of the other party before the letters of sentence have been drawn up, sealed, and handed over to the plaintiff. As long as these letters remain in the hands of the judge, the convicted man always has the right to prohibit the judge from giving them out as well as the chapter or convent to whom they were written from executing them.

³⁰⁴ See e.g. 1504:4.

³⁰⁵ See above I. 60:3.

[1] However, after he has made the prohibition, he is required to quit himself forthwith of the burden of the sentence before the judge and to respond to the charges of the plaintiff.

[2] In the case of a capital sentence passed by the judge on the basis of the allegations and responses of the parties and through judicial process, the guilty and convicted person, if present in person, can at the request of the plaintiff or of his attorney be immediately and without delay arrested by his judge without any letters of sentence whatsoever, and (in the way described previously) held in custody and punished, notwithstanding noble liberty.

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

What is "reasonable excuse," and when can it be inserted in letters of fine

Then, the clause: "If he cannot give a reasonable excuse" is usually inserted in letters of fine (or birsagiales, as they are commonly called).

[1] Likewise, the letters of sentence which are eventually drawn up on the basis of letters of fine are usually issued and handed over to the opposite party close to the end of the octave and short courts, lest any of the litigants offering a reasonable excuse seem to be suddenly and completely stripped of his goods or has to pay with his head.

[2] Thus, a reasonable excuse is and counts as admissible when the plaintiff or the respondent, or his attorney, was traveling from his home to the octave or short courts and was taking steps to attend, and he fell seriously sick after setting out; or a severe flood held him up; or his horse grew sick and he was unable to buy or hire another one because of his poverty, and so his journey was delayed; or he was waylaid, robbed, wounded or killed by his opponents or by highwaymen: and these or similar circumstances prevented him from arriving and coming before the judge by the time set for the handing over of the letters judicial or the letters of sentence; these are all justifiable excuses which will quit him of the burden of fines and sentences.

[3] The excuse should be supported by credible evidence and must not show signs of craft, invention, or fraud.

[4] Should it prove otherwise, then unless he pays and quits himself of the burden of the fines and sentences, the execution will follow (in the way specified above), and the convicted man will pay even with his head notwithstanding noble liberty (as it was mentioned).

CHAPTER SIXTY

In what way the portions of the sons, daughters, and kinsmen have to be separated at the time of the execution of the sentence

Moreover, it should be further noticed that when any sentence passed is executed, the first thing to be done is to sequester and set aside the portions of any sons or daughters who were begotten and born in a natural way before the sentence, as well as of his kinsmen or other persons who have undivided property rights with the condemned; and only the portion which belongs personally to the condemned man should be divided between the judge and the adversary party (in the way described above).

[1] The respective portions of his chattels must be restored to his sons and daughters as well as to his wife by the bailiff of the judge deputed with the task of execution.

[2] For the son is not condemned for the crimes and excesses of his father, and likewise, the father for the misdeeds of the son, either in his person or in regard to his property rights or any other goods.

[3] Daughters, however, can get portions only from those property rights which evidently pertain also to the female line, demonstrated by the effective ownership of the women.

[4] A wife can recover for herself her dower and trousseau once her husband is dead, from her sons as well as from the person who has taken possession of her husband's portions, as you can find already clearly set out in the first part, where the payment of dowers is discussed.³⁰⁶

CHAPTER SIXTY-ONE

Estimation of the [property] rights of the father or kinsman who has died in the middle of a lawsuit

Then, if a noble is summoned by someone to the royal court on account of the seizure of property rights or other matters involving a major act of might which usually entails capital sentence or capital fine, and this person dies before the decision is made in this lawsuit, then the son or kinsman of the deceased to whom his property rights would devolve and – as a consequence – the lawsuit passes according to the custom of the realm, are usually convicted to no further burden or penalty, excepting the estimation of the [property] rights of the father or kinsman; then, the unjustly seized property rights are usually re-instituted to the plaintiff by the judge and the damage done (if its value has been specified in the letters of summons and a sentence on account of non-appearance has been passed) is straightforwardly repaid before anything else; finally, the remaining property rights which belonged to the deceased are divided between the judge and the plaintiff.

[1] If, on the other hand, the sentence was handed down after the responses of the parties, then the damages must be recovered by oath.

CHAPTER SIXTY-TWO

How sons born before and after the sentencing of the father succeed in the paternal goods

It should also not be omitted that sons begotten after a sentence had been passed and executed against their father, that is, who were not even conceived in their mother's womb, cannot obtain a portion for themselves from the goods and paternal [property] rights which have been handed over and awarded by the same sentence to the judge and the adversary party, or via them to some other persons, nor need they be consulted about them.

³⁰⁶ See above I. 98–104.

[1] On the other hand, sons born and begotten before the sentence was passed can and usually do receive their own as well as their father's share, should they choose to redeem these from the hands of the judge or the adversary party.

[2] Here it should be known that the term 'sons' can mean those conceived, those born, and those born posthumously. By conceived are meant those not yet born but quickening in the womb of the mother as a result of lawful intercourse between a man and woman. They have by nature equal rights with the living sons already born from the time of their conception, which is indicated by the time of birth.

[3] The term 'post-humus' refers to those sons born legitimately after the 'in-humation' or burial of their father. And I use 'legitimately' intentionally, since, if the birth occurs more than ten months after the father is buried, then in this case a son of this sort is not properly or legally called posthumous, as it can be assumed that he was not born in wedlock or from the deceased husband's seed but as a result of the woman's fornication.

[4] All such sons—conceived as well as born or posthumous—provided they are born legitimately (as I mentioned above), always inherit equally in the paternal [property] rights.

CHAPTER SIXTY-THREE

Whether a son born after a father is sentenced can redeem his father's goods

The question here arises whether a son born after a father is sentenced—who (as it was said above) is not allowed to have a portion of the father's [property] rights—can redeem his father's goods and [property] rights at the common estimation from the judge, the adversary party, or any other persons once these have been seized on the strength of the sentence.

[1] The answer is, yes. For the continuation of the bloodline and parentage has and represents the same force as the title of neighbor and abutter of such goods and property rights.

[2] In other words, if redemption is lawfully allowed for neighbors and abutters of such goods as may be seized as a result of a sentence (as was previously mentioned), then redemption is also lawfully allowed to a son born subsequent to the sentence.

CHAPTER SIXTY-FOUR

What if both father and son, or all the kinsmen, are convicted together?

What is to be done if the father and son, or even all the kinsmen, are convicted together, and none of them escapes the burden and penalty of the sentence passed?

[1] Answer that the redemption can and must be done through the pardon of the prince, to whom the ownership and property of such seized goods belongs in the default [of seed] of the sentenced.

[2] Then, the same is to be held in case of a sole individual, who does not have sons and daughters, or kinsmen, to whom the redemption of such goods might pertain and belong.

[3] In such case it should be noted that if the neighbors or abutters of such goods and property rights have already redeemed these for themselves, then sons born after the sentence, or a father sentenced with his son, or kinsmen collectively sentenced, or a sole individual can reacquire these for themselves from the hands of the neighbors and abutters, by the force of royal pardon, and by short process, namely, within a single judicial term, providing lawful notice has been made beforehand.

[4] And this should always be understood in respect of neighbors and abutters when a sentenced man has absolutely no heirs or condivisional kinsmen, or other legitimate successors to whom the goods may devolve. Because if there are such, then they are more entitled to redeem them (if they so wish) than the neighbors.

CHAPTER SIXTY-FIVE

Would goods held in Slavonia or Transylvania also be lost by a sentence passed in the royal court, and vice versa

A further question arises: if a nobleman who has goods and property rights in the kingdoms of both Hungary and Slavonia³⁰⁷ as well as in Transylvania is convicted of a major act of might at an octave or other court held in Hungary, Slavonia, or Transylvania, and as a consequence is punished with a capital sentence or a fine of the head, then, does he forfeit once and for all his goods and property rights owned and situated in either country and in the Transylvanian parts, or is it understood that he loses only those which lie in the country in which the sentence was given down.

[1] It must be answered that although some jurists opine that in such a case a person sentenced in one particular place is held to lose all possessions wherever and in whatsoever kingdom or part they lie, this view cannot be upheld.

[2] The reason is that a judge's authority is valid only within the areas subject to his jurisdiction.

[3] And there is no doubt that the ban of the kingdoms of Dalmatia, or Croatia, or Slavonia, or the voivode of Transylvania, have no judicial jurisdiction over the counties incorporated within the kingdom of Hungary, but only over those subject to their official authority. And vice versa, nor are justices ordinary of the royal court able to intervene or interfere in the jurisdiction of other judges. For otherwise there would be no distinctions between the countries and between the courts, which are customarily convened separately at separate times and in different ways.

³⁰⁷ Technically speaking Slavonia was not a "kingdom," only Croatia was.

[4] This is the reason for the inclusion of the clause: "within the judicial ambit of this kingdom of Hungary" or "of this kingdom of Slavonia" or "of these Transylvanian parts" in the letters of sentence of these judges.

[5] However, in the case of the charge of infidelity all goods and property rights owned and situated in any of the countries and parts subject to the Holy Crown of the realm are actually lost even by a single sentence, or a single royal donation (provided the donation has been made legitimately). The reason is that the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown against which the charge of infidelity was committed extends equally over each and every country and part subject to it.

[6] Nevertheless, the execution and the occupation of the goods cannot be done anywhere by the same judge before whom the sentence of the charge of infidelity had been passed, but the judge of the case must transfer by letters the occupation of the goods which are outside of his jurisdiction to the judge to the jurisdiction of whom these [goods] pertain.

CHAPTER SIXTY-SIX

The sentence pronounced for the charge of infidelity

Then, in cases and sentences of the charge of infidelity, the procedure to be followed is exactly the same both in manner and order as with a capital sentence.

[1] However, the differences between the charge of infidelity and capital sentence you will find in the first part, where royal donations are dealt with in general.³⁰⁸

[2] The charge of infidelity is usually decided and pronounced in three ways. But I decided to set out these ways below in connection with the repulsio.³⁰⁹

CHAPTER SIXTY-SEVEN

Minor acts of might, and sentences to be passed for these

It should further be known that there are also simple sentences which do not bring about capital punishment or fine of the head, but amount to a half of the fine of the head, that is, one hundred florins.

[1] Such sentences apply equally to lords prelate, barons, and other magnates, and to nobles, according to what is stated in the general constitution and decree of our present lord King Wladislas,³¹⁰ and the fine will not exceed one hundred florins for acts of might (as it was mentioned).

³⁰⁸ See above I.16.

³⁰⁹ See below II. 75.

³¹⁰ 1492:55.

[2] In addition, the damages related in the plaint and claim of the plaintiff will be compensated and paid for.

[3] Exactly half of the one hundred florins goes to the judge, and the other half remains with the plaintiff. Compensation for damages, however, will be paid to the plaintiff alone.

[4] At the same time, no noble can be detained in his person on the strength of such sentences (excepting the case discussed below). Rather, the judge must make satisfaction to the plaintiff from the one hundred florins fine and compensation for damages out of the goods and chattels of the convicted, if there are any, otherwise out of his property rights.

[5] This kind of sentence includes these days all acts of might in general (with the exclusion of the cases aforementioned which I have explained as incurring and leading to major capital sentence and fine of the head). For this reason these are usually referred to as minor acts of might, and minor sentences,

[6] although previous to a general decree of the most invincible late lord King Matthias issued in the Year of Salvation 1486, which was confirmed in this respect by our lord King Wladislas, all secular lords, nobles, and men of property were generally and universally convicted of major acts of might, and consequently to capital sentence or the fine of the head, for any kind of acts of might.

[7] To make this clearer I have taken the trouble to include a verbatim transcript of the article dealing with this, the text of which runs as follows.³¹¹

[8] “Then, in suits moved for damages done or other harm or injury and minor acts of might, even if the perpetrator has made a confession with his own mouth personally before his judge, no person is henceforth to be convicted of acts of might, but will only be sentenced to pay for the damages which he caused and for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff (which are awarded to the latter alone), plus twenty-five heavy marks, equivalent to 100 florins, to be divided equally between the judge and the plaintiff, and he will be forced to immediate payment by the judge.

[9] However, in major cases, namely, the breaking into houses of nobles without just cause, the seizing of their estates and the appurtenances thereof, the arrest of nobles without just cause, or the beating, wounding, or slaying of nobles, the judge will proceed in the following manner: that if the plaintiff for his part has presented evidence at an inquest in the manner and order aforementioned, then the judge should send the case to a common inquest in order to clarify the issue if the parties so wish.

[10] If, however, the defendant refuses to accept this inquest then the plaintiff should swear upon the head of his adversary in order better to prove his plaint according to the custom of the realm observed in this matter.

[11] But this will only apply if his opponent or the respondent has his own, personal and continuous residence in the county in which the offence was committed.

³¹¹ Cf. 1492:55-56.

[12] Where, however, such a respondent personally resides in another part or province of the kingdom, and the aforesaid offence was committed in his absence, he will be required to clear himself by an oath in accordance with the contents of the letters of inquest.

[13] Finally, his retainers and tenant peasants are to be tried and justice administered according to the present article, as the law of the realm requires.”

CHAPTER SIXTY-EIGHT

Cases in which a person can be detained by the force of a minor sentence

Then, because there are in this realm many nobles and other men of property with only one tenant plot who enjoy the privileges and liberty of true nobles³¹² but who, on account of sloth and indolence, are so short of temporal goods that they have difficulty in paying a hundred pennies, let alone a hundred florins; yet they do not cease from evil deeds especially when they realize that they have numerous offspring and believe that they cannot lose their property rights and portions, and so have no fear of being arrested.

[1] Whence, so to say, the practice has emerged among many, that they, induced, or rather seduced, by their poverty, having nothing to give up or lose, often have no qualms about committing serious kinds of crimes against those who are richer and more powerful.

[2] The question then arises: if any litigant is convicted of a minor act of might to the aforesaid fine of a hundred florins or to compensation for damages done and caused, and is found by the judge of the case to be so destitute of chattels and property rights falling to him that he could never pay these hundred florins and the damages done out of his goods and [property] rights; can in this case the convicted man be arrested in his person by the judge and held until payment and satisfaction, notwithstanding his noble liberty?

[3] The answer is, yes. For freedom, prerogatives, and exemption of nobles do not release anybody from arrest nor does it exempt anyone from punishment and retribution for evil deeds; rather, they count against him, for virtue, the basis of true nobility, dictates that a person should live an honest life and not cause harm to others.

[4] Nor does such arrest in person of a noble contradict the general decree of the whole realm which contains that nobles cannot be arrested unless summoned and convicted by due process of law.³¹³

[5] However, in such a case arrest in person follows the citation, summons and the sentence passed in due course by the judge. Nothing in the general decree gainsays such arrest. Thus, the noble can be rightly arrested and detained in his person (in the aforementioned case) by his judge or his bailiff deputed for this purpose.

³¹² András Kubinyi, in Matthias Rex (Budapest: Balassi, 2008) p. 37 suggested that two thirds of the nobility—counting some 130 thousand persons--were “one-plot nobles.”

³¹³ This privilege goes back to the Golden Bull 1222:2 and its renewals.

[6] Once under arrest, the judge is held to keep him in his own custody for fifteen days (as is usual in cases of debt) in order to bring about a settlement, and if under these conditions and during that time he fails to come to terms with the other party, the judge must assign and hand him over to the hands of the said adversary.

[7] The adversary will then have the right to keep him in custody for as long as it takes for the arrested man to come to terms with him and satisfy both him and the judge as to the hundred florins fine and to make good the damages he has caused his adversary.

[8] In the meanwhile, the plaintiff has no right to punish or hurt him in his person.

[9] Nevertheless, the arrested will be required to render him the same service as if he were a member of the plaintiff's household.

CHAPTER SIXTY-NINE

Punishment for contempt of court, and the payment of burdens of minor sentences

Because the contempt of court also incurs a fine of one hundred florins, it should be treated among minor offences because of its similar penalty.

[1] Nevertheless, some people have suggested that the burden of contempt of court at either the judicial seat of the royal majesty or of the ispán of any county, (usually committed by uttering unacceptable words at court or insulting persons present at the court) can be redeemed and absolved with a fine of only 25 florins, just as that of minor sentences (which is counted as 25 heavy marks of silver), the reason being that in the courts of the royal majesty fines and judicial penalties used to be calculated at only one florin, or a hundred pennies of the present money for each and every mark and so paid, as will be explained more clearly further below where the judicial payments will be discussed.³¹⁴

[2] But this opinion is not to be held, for quitting oneself of the burdens of such sentences, fines, and judicial payments is quite different and embraces different means and purposes, as will be explained (as I said) just below.

[3] To put it briefly, whether a litigant wishes to quit himself of the burdens and pay at the court of the royal majesty either at the time of execution or after the execution of such minor sentences, he can do that only by 100 florins and not otherwise.

[4] However, if he lacks ready cash, he can equally settle the debt by paying with chattels, as long as these are estimated at their true value.

[5] It is different, however, with contempt of the royal majesty's court, for the convicted man is not to be released from the court until he has given full satisfaction for such contempt.

³¹⁴ See below II 86.

CHAPTER SEVENTY

What is frivolous prosecution, how is it committed and its penalty

Even though, the case or charge of frivolous prosecution³¹⁵ does not lead to capital punishment, it is, nevertheless, recognized, in a certain sense, as a matter involving a capital fine, so it is appropriate to treat on frivolous prosecution among these sentences.

[1] Here it should be known that frivolous prosecution is the fraudulent instigation and initiation of a suit against someone under double title or by different paths. Although in many cases and suits this may be committed by the malicious scheming of the litigants and sometimes even upon the penalty specified in the general decree, still, there are three principal ways in which it is committed. The definition cited above refers to these.

[2] The first is when a person pursues one and the same thing or suit under double title or by double path. Suppose a person claims an estate both in pledge and also by permanent right, then it is called by double title. If, however, he sues one and the same thing under one and the same title but before two different judges, this is called double path.

[3] Secondly, when someone quits and absolves another of the rights of filial quarter or dower or pledge or any other matter, and later he or, perhaps, after his death his sons or other lawful successors, takes him whom he had absolved or his heirs and successors to court again on the same matter, then, if it is possible to produce probable and sufficient proof in this matter, then he incurs the penalty for frivolous prosecution.

[4] Thirdly, when a suit comes to an end in due process of law, and is subsequently reopened without the special grace of the prince and permission for a retrial, then this amounts immediately to the fact of frivolous prosecution.

[5] On the strength of this the principle cause, that is, the object of the lawsuit, be it a castle, town, or other property right, or a sum of money, a dower, or a filial quarter, will be immediately lost in perpetuity. Moreover, the frivolous prosecutor will be convicted and sentenced to 50 homagial marks, making 200 golden florins, of which two-thirds are to be paid to the judge and one third to the respondent.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-ONE

A famous and notable question on the matter of frivolous prosecution

Then, in the matter of frivolous prosecution it should be noted that it often happens that our prince makes a permanent donation, conferring upon one of his retainers a castle, city, town, village, or some such similar property right, the ownership and inheritance of which indisputably belongs and pertains to the prince, but which for the time being is held in the hands of another by ³¹⁵ “Frivolous prosecution” is our translation of calumnia, the Classical meaning of which is calumny, false charges. In Hungarian it was called patvarkodás, by its grammatical form implying repeated actions.

title of pledge or other kind of inscription. In such a case, he will only be able to claim for himself the ownership of the said property right if he lays down and pays over the sum of the inscription.

[1] The one who has such property right at hand, even if lawfully given notice, usually only receives his money after postponing the suit initiated in this matter to several octaval terms and usually takes it as though being coerced. Thus, very often even a year passes and lapses while litigating.

[2] However, it is clear that a royal donation conferred permanently on anybody must be confirmed by lawful institution within the space of a year or else it loses its validity.

[3] So if the plaintiff, or the party who obtained the property right, has himself lawfully introduced in the ownership of the same, and has the property right instituted for him within the period of one year so that his donation does not become invalid and, on the other hand, he gives, either before or after the year is up, judicial notice that the said sum of money be collected, then the respondent will allege that the plaintiff is pursuing his ends by double title and double path.

[4] It is similar with property rights which are to devolve on someone by virtue of a contract and royal consent.³¹⁶ These are often seized violently and claimed presumptuously by some lord or even by men of lower condition before the lawful successor (that is, the person to whom the property rights have duly passed and devolved) can take possession of them.

[5] And if the same successor by the force of such a contract, which has and enjoys conditionally the force and nature of donation, has himself introduced in the ownership of such goods and property rights and has them instituted to himself within the said course of a year, then, by the contradiction of that occupier or some other person, the case may be dragged on and extended at length so that, sometimes, it cannot be completed even within a human lifetime.

[6] And even if the case is then, or perhaps earlier, brought to an end, the plaintiff is not bound to receive any compensation or satisfaction from the fruits enjoyed in the meantime, nor the respondent to be punished for his acts of might, that is the violent and forceful and violent retention of the property rights. The reason is that this case was not opened by terminal but rather by simple summons (which we call a protracted lawsuit). However, any case that is opened on account of any contract has to be completed, decided and concluded in exactly the same ways, means and procedures, as a case about goods which fall under the donation of the royal majesty because of the default of issue of a deceased person.

[7] If, however, the case is opened and initiated by the plaintiff through terminal summons in respect of the improper and violent occupation of the property rights (the institution referred to above having been completed in regard to the property rights either earlier or later), the occupant will similarly allege that the plaintiff has claimed and pursued the property rights by frivolous prosecution: by double title.

[8] Following from the above a further question arises: whether actions of the type described above which have been initiated by double path or double title incur the penalty for frivolous prosecution. The short answer to this little question is no.

³¹⁶ Werbóczy used the term “contract” for filial, or mutual adoption, see I. 63, above. It needed royal consent.

[9] Because the case is against a possessor of bad faith who cannot subsequently prove that he owns and holds these goods and property rights justly; therefore, he cannot charge the plaintiff for having disturbed him in this rights by double title or double path. Because these rights were not his but the plaintiff's and, until the end of the lawsuit, he held onto them by sheer violence. Only an owner in good and not in bad faith has the right to allege the aforesaid charge.

[10] Now if it is argued that he who owns these goods by the virtue of a royal inscription is to be regarded as a possessor of good faith. This is true as long as he is not given notice to accept and receive his money. If, however, after having lawfully been given notice, he refuses to take his sum of money but brings the case with frivolous and far-fetched objections to the octave courts, so that he can receive the income from the goods in the meantime: in this case he should no longer be regarded as a possessor of good faith, but of bad faith. Such usurers should be convicted and fined to the perpetual estimation of the goods in question, unless some other punishment is specified in a general decree of our realm for usurers of this sort (who refuse to accept their money after being given notice), especially if they cannot give a reason consonant with law for not accepting the money.

[11] Because otherwise if it were the case that the violent occupation and fraudulent retention of goods over time should remain unpunished, then this would involve great problems indeed, and it would take far too long before anyone were able to hold and enjoy possession of their due [property] rights.

[12] The same has to be said and maintained when someone has at his hands the goods and property rights of a deceased and heirless person in pledge, or under another redeemable title and, after having been rightfully requested and given notice by the adoptive brother and legitimate successor of the deceased, he refuses to return the goods even though the money is deposited and, on the other hand, this successor arranges the necessary institution for himself lest the annual term lapses, and he makes both the notice and the institution justly and lawfully, no punishment for frivolous prosecution should accrue in consequence.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-TWO

The fine of the tongue and its punishment

The fine of the tongue makes 25 marks, equivalent to 100 gold florins.³¹⁷

[1] It is imposed by the judges for an unjustified and false complaint made before the royal majesty or other justices ordinary; and often for slanderous and defamatory language directed against a person of good name and respectable condition.

[2] However, the principal plaint, by reason of which the suit was initiated, does not lose its force in consequence of any such unjust accusation and account, in contrast to the act of frivolous prosecution (as discussed immediately above) when it is understood to be lost forever.

³¹⁷ It was called thus, because the person so fined could not litigate lest paying the fine, "his tongue tied."

[3] Instead, once the case [initiated for fine of the tongue] fails and the aforementioned punishment has been deposited and paid, with two thirds going to the judge and one third to the other litigant, that is, the injured person, then the plaintiff may, if he so wishes, justly and properly recommence [the principal suit].

CHAPTER SEVENTY-THREE

What is repulsio, its ways and its punishment

Because at the time of execution of sentences and other judicial decisions often a violent repulsio by the convicted and losing party follows, it therefore behoves that some brief mention here be made of such a repulsio.

[1] Where it should be known that a repulsio is when the losing party violently obstructs the party winning in the case in the execution of the sentence passed by the judge.

[2] Hence, this repulsio as the term itself indicates, cannot be considered a judicial process, but rather, an outright impediment of the same. It is usually done by the unsheathing of a sword or the brandishing of some other weapon after the conclusion and completion of all elements of the trial once the definitive sentence has been passed by the judge. However, as it became common having its origin in most ancient practice and has been in custom for long, it is by now therefore considered as a part of our law introduced by long accepted custom.

[3] And it is tolerated if it is done and followed after the final conclusion of a suit only once and not thereafter.

[4] And if it is done, it has to be compensated by the payment and deposition of one mark of gold, worth 72 florins, of which two thirds is to be paid to the judge and one third to the winner of the case.

[5] However, if secondary repulsio is done in one and the same case, it brings about the perpetual charge of infidelity, as it is contained in our general decree.³¹⁸

CHAPTER SEVENTY-FOUR

Explanation of the article in the general decree concerning repulsio

Here it is to be noted that, as is stated in the article concerning acts of repulsio in the text of the general decree, a repulsio should be done by a naked sword, or by the brandishing of a drawn sword, and the names of the neighbors and abutters present together with the royal or the palatinal bailiff at the time of the execution of the sentence passed, should be recorded in the letters of report on the act of repulsio.

³¹⁸ 1504:4.

[1] An abuse has thus arisen from this that while some people refrain from repulsio in the form of drawing a sword or brandishing a weapon at the time of execution of the sentence against the party that emerged triumphant and victorious in the case, they with cunning contrivance repulse with a wooden cudgel, an iron mace, or sometimes by threats and intimidation and a gang of men, and prevent the sentence and judicial decision from being executed and effected.

[2] They then state and allege before their judge that no act of repulsio was made at the time of the execution of the sentence, since no sword was drawn nor any naked weapon brandished, as specified in the wording of the decree.

[3] Frequently exception is taken to neighbors and abutters: that the one was not in fact a neighbor, the other not an abutter, and by such prolonged quibbling they do their best to overthrow just decisions and undermine the judicial process.

[4] Therefore, it should be understood that there is nothing stated or written in the text of that decree that says a repulsio can or must only be done by the brandishing of a drawn sword or weapon; it is clearly contained there that a repulsio should not be done with a gang of men and physical violence but simply by drawing one sword only or brandishing a weapon.

[5] And this was stated, because in ancient times it was common for both parties—the winner as well as the convicted—to set upon each other with a considerable number of men, attired even for battle, when the time came for execution of the sentence of the court and the judicial decision, and to fight so fiercely that often vast slaughter ensued among the contending parties. The result was that the plaintiff might win his case, and so establish his ownership to the goods he had won back; however, the loser might manage to defeat the winner and keep him by violent means from executing the sentence, in which case the loser would be fined one mark of gold for his violent and rash attack.

[6] In order to eliminate this abuse, it was decreed that at the time of execution of the sentence the mere brandishing of a drawn sword was sufficient for a repulsio, and gathering a band of men or making a physical attack was unnecessary.

[7] Whether a sword or a weapon is drawn, or a cudgel or mace brandished, or a band of men is brought in, or mere threats and intimidation are made so as to impede the execution of any such judicial order and prevent its being effected—then such acts are always deemed to constitute a repulsio.

[8] The names of the neighbors and abutters are recorded for this reason: to prevent the possibility of fraud and trickery being committed in regard to the burden of repulsio. For in former times anyone who resisted or made a repulsio was condemned to a fine of one mark of gold. So frequently the names of the sons, kinsmen, the wife, and daughters of the person who lost the suit and was convicted were recorded in the letters of record, so that the burden of repulsio grew to an amount that frequently surpassed and went far beyond the original charge.

[9] Now this abuse has in our times been abolished, and now however many persons are convicted or make repulsio, the burden imposed is still only one mark of gold for the repulsio of any one judicial decision.

[10] Nonetheless, the names of the neighbors and abutters to the recovered property should now also be recorded. This is to prevent the royal or palatinal bailiff or the witnesses of a place of authentication being corrupted and seduced by bribery or favor from affirming that a repulsio was made at the execution of a case entrusted to them (even if there was none), so that the person concerned might then be condemned to the charge of infidelity.

[11] In this way, such and similar tricks and clever subterfuges may be prevented from undermining the judicial process and the execution of the judicial decision; for the neighbors and abutters cannot always be found at home and cannot always be present at the judicial execution of the sentence.

[12] Consequently, if the winning party is found out of possession of the property right which he has won back, this will be sufficient proof of interference in the judicial sentence, the execution of which was de facto and effectively blocked by a repulsio.

[13] If one of the litigants charges the royal or palatinal bailiff or the man of a chapter or convent of having made an unjust or improper report, then he always can bring him to court on this account; but legal proceedings are not to be interrupted because of this.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-FIVE

The three ways in which the sentence of the charge of infidelity is passed and pronounced

It should be noted, however, that it is sometimes not acceptable to make a repulsio in a case involving the charge of infidelity. For there are three ways in which the charge of infidelity is pronounced:

[1] First, by our prince the king. If his royal majesty wishes to condemn any of his gentlemen of the realm to the charge of infidelity, he summons and calls a general diet and congregation of the community of lords prelate, barons, and other gentlemen of the realm to a certain date. He, against whom the charge of the charge of infidelity is made, has to be summoned in person, and not through an attorney, through letters of command from the royal majesty via letters of exhibition addressed to some convent or chapter.

[2] If he comes and can clear himself, then well and good; but if he does not appear, or if he appears but cannot clear himself, he will be condemned to the charge of infidelity. Thereafter, he will not be granted safe conduct nor a new trial by the royal majesty, and consequently not be allowed to contradict or make a violent repulsio at the time of the installation and occupation of the goods of the condemned. The king's donation in this matter will be unconditionally executed.

[3] The charge of infidelity may be decided in a second way, namely on the basis of a record of second repulsio. Here too recourse to repulsio is not permissible because the charge is regarded as having proceeded from and as consequent to a rash act of repulsio. Moreover, it would not be proper to do a third time what was forbidden a second.

[4] The third and final way of declaring and pronouncing the charge of infidelity is by the judicial decision and sentence passed by justices ordinary of the realm, arising from and following a royal donation made to any person on the grounds of the putting out of eyes; mutilation of limbs; counterfeiting money; composing or proffering forged instruments; or other such acts that bring about the charge of infidelity.

[5] Inasmuch as a judicial decision of this type arises from and is based on the depositions and responses of the parties present at an adversarial trial—where one party affirms that the infidelity has been done and committed and the other denies it—it is permissible that the previously described repulsio be made when the execution of such a sentence is due, whether it is based on the responses of the parties involved (as mentioned before), or has been passed on account of the non-appearance and non-attendance of one of the parties.

[6] And this is done (as in other circumstances too, and is the main reason why repulsio have been introduced and also tolerated nowadays) so that at the time and term of the report on such a repulsio, whatever was improperly done or omitted in the course of a suit by the negligence of the convicted person and the loser of the suit may be repaired and made good by the grace of a new trial or by the recalling of an attorney.

[7] For it would cause harm and great danger if, when the judge had passed sentence on the basis of the responses of the parties, someone should be excluded from the ownership and peaceful enjoyment of his goods, and then be forced to seek to regain the property while being out of possession.

[8] For the judge is bound to pass sentence on the basis of the allegations and verbal exchanges of the two or more parties, and, mostly, of the contents and formulations of the letters and written instruments produced and shown to him.

[9] But there is no doubt that on many occasions the attorneys of the parties are led astray by carelessness or ignorance, or even at times by malice, and make mistakes in their responses.

[10] Often the letters and written instruments of litigants are misplaced, or cannot be produced at the term set by the judge for their presentation. Then the judge pronounces the sentence according to the responses of the parties and the contents and formulations of the letters and written instruments.

[11] Suppose, therefore, that one of the parties realizes that either he or his attorney erred in his statements or failed to produce all required written instruments; and in order to avoid immediate exclusion from ownership of his goods as a result of an unfavourable sentence passed against him because of this error or omission, he is forced at the time the sentence is executed to make a violent repulsio (which, to be sure, constitutes spite and contempt for the judicial process, but is commonly tolerated). A single term is to be set at which he is to appear before his judge in order to justify this act of repulsio.

[12] At that term he is required to correct his errors or failures either in a new trial granted by the grace of the prince, or by retracting and revoking the statement of his attorney and, if possible, improve his case.

[13] The grant of a new trial or the retraction of the statement of an attorney always assumes an error or omission. There would be no need to obtain a new trial or revoke the statement of an attorney were it not first recognized that a mistake had been made in the course of the proceedings.

[14] Thereafter, however, no further term will be granted, and the sentence passed will be put into execution effectively and finally.

15. And, if anyone is rash enough to commit repulsio a second time, he will be convicted to the charge of infidelity in perpetuity (as explained immediately above).

CHAPTER SEVENTY-SIX

Whether a person not party in a suit can make repulsio?

Because it is the usual to add at the end of letters of adjudication and sentence the clause, “notwithstanding the contradiction [made] because of the previous reason of so-and-so condemned (stating the name of the person who lost the case and has been convicted) or any other persons,” frequently repulsio (as previously described) is made against this clause.

[1] Therefore the question arises: can a person who was not party to the lawsuit perform an act of repulsio against the plaintiff and the party which won the case in order to prevent execution of the sentence and the letters of adjudication issued? The answer, it would seem, is no. For to disturb the judicial proceedings, or interfere, or to seek to influence the course of a lawsuit for better or worse, is not the right of a person who has neither won nor lost the same lawsuit.

[2] In spite of this, the contrary mostly happens when the party winning with the letters of adjudication and sentence comes to the location of the goods and property rights, and they are not in the hands of the one who lost the case but of another person who indeed may be in his possession by just title.

[3] Often too, besides the main body of a property right, people attempt by trickery to lay their hands on goods which had at an earlier date been separated from that body in a just way and title. For example: a person acquires or earns by a lawsuit or by royal grant or some other title a castle, a fortified house, or a town with all its appurtenances (that is, its villages, empty lots, plots, and property rights duly and necessarily pertaining to the same); but from that castle, fortified house, or town its true owner and legitimate possessor had—perhaps in default of issue—sold off during his lifetime a village or two, or some empty lot and its land, or made a gift to someone in return for services, or bestowed it under some other title; and the person to whom it was sold or given, had already long ago established himself and settled in the said villages, or fortified house, and land, most likely with royal permission and lawful installation.

[4] Thus, once having acquired the principal body of the estate (that is, the castle, or fortified house, or town itself with its aforementioned appurtenances), the plaintiff also attempts to seize and obtain for himself the aforesaid villages, lots, or land which are now, as explained, in another's hands, on the grounds that these appurtenances belong to the principal body, and the aforementioned other person, to whom the sale or grant was made, was not party to the [original] lawsuit, perhaps because at the time of the recovery and first institution to the principal body only the person who was at that time in possession and ownership of the same principal body protested against the entire recovery and institution.

[5] In such a case, or any other like it, even the person who was not party in the lawsuit is entitled to the aforesaid repulsio. What makes this possible is the clause: praevia ratione ([made] because of the previous reason). On the basis of this the person in question is not required to quit himself of the burden for repulsio if the winner of the suit can be shown to have entered into possession of the said property without just reason.

[6] The same holds true regarding property rights in pledge. If one of the parties in a lawsuit has by legal process acquired for himself the inheritance [right] and ownership of some property right, and the said property right is in another's hands as a pledge (if it can be established that the pledge was drawn up in due and proper manner and is not under litigation), then the person who has been awarded the property right by virtue of the sentence in respect of which its permanent ownership is determined, cannot simply take it from the hands of the person who holds it in title of pledge. He must first make satisfaction with the sum of money representing the amount to which the property is held in pledge. Otherwise, if he were to occupy it outright, there would be just grounds for a repulsio.

[7] And he is not subject to the punishment or burden of repulsio if, at the time when the sentence or judicial decision is executed, the owner of the property right offers to take the money furnished.

[8] And note that this holds when the amount of money involved and the conditions and integrity of the pledge stand clear.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-SEVEN

New trial: its mode, sequence, and procedure

Inasmuch as it is common practice for a new trial to be obtained from the prince following an act of repulsio or an inadequate statement on the part of the attorneys; this is to give the person who lost the case and was convicted, the opportunity and means, notwithstanding the mistake or omission which he is conscious of having committed in the course of the proceedings, nor indeed the subsequently passed sentence of the judge, to respond anew on the matter at issue; to bring new allegations, exceptions, and objections; to produce letters which may not have been brought forward; to make good any omission of evidence; to correct any error; and generally to do all things which are in keeping with right and justice and are useful in the support and defense of his case.

[1] Therefore it shall be known that the grace of a new trial, the confirmation of any properly and legally issued letter of privilege, and the grant by the title of new donation of any goods and property rights is usually granted and allowed to anyone by our prince through his office as ruler.

[2] However, a new donation needs to be conferred, and will be admitted in court, only if the request for it is based on valid and not fictitious grounds; in other words, provided the person obtaining the goods had held them either in his person or through his predecessors in effective ownership up to the time they were obtained, as you can read more clearly in Part One, under "new donation".³¹⁹

³¹⁹ See above I 37.

[3] Further it should be noted that when a suit is started in the form of a new trial, it is usually finished and brought to a conclusion within one single judicial term, and before all other cases are heard, lest a matter and case which has already been subject to judicial deliberation and sentence is kept pending with its end uncertain.

[4] In regard to the order and manner of a new trial, there is a clear description in a general decree of our realm; I will therefore include here the text of the article word for word: ³²⁰

[5] "Many a gentleman of the realm, mostly in cases started against them over matters of ownership tend to recall their attorneys, wish to have their cases declared failed, and obtain a new trial often in order to prevent the other party from executing the letters of adjudication, and thus depriving it of its just rights once the deadlines in the process and the lawful terms had passed, and the letters and all other written instruments are produced in evidence from both parties before the final conclusion of the matter, at the final term of the suit, while also the justices ordinary of the judiciary seats of the realm and the masters and the protonotaries of the court and the assessors of the court had delivered their sentence, and one party recognizes that he has failed and lost the suit, and the resulting letters of adjudication have either already been composed and issued or are to be issued once sentence has been pronounced.

[6] For this reason it has been decided that henceforth such litigants can recall their attorneys and have the case fail only as long as a suit is pending and no decision has yet been reached.

[7] However, let them obtain a new trial, whenever they wish. Yet this must in no way obviate the other party from executing a sentence that has been passed, or to hinder the issue of letters of adjudication nor the justices ordinary and their protonotaries from handing these out.

[8] Rather, the winning party may have the letters of adjudication executed, notwithstanding any letter of new trial obtained in this way; thereafter the party which has obtained a new trial, once the already delivered sentence is executed, may, if it chooses, pursue its action through a new trial and have it executed.

[9] But in a case relating to property rights or any other business that one of the parties loses on the grounds of non-appearance—having been hindered from appearing by, say, some particular matters of concern to him—and receives a sentence of condemnation; then such a party, having lost the case through non-appearance, should always be able and, whenever he wishes, have the right to obtain a new trial, and to prevent both the justices ordinary and their protonotaries from issuing letters of adjudication and sentence, and the other party from obtaining them.

[10] Furthermore: all such cases in which a new trial is obtained from the royal majesty are to be heard and adjudicated at the first octaves among all other cases."

CHAPTER SEVENTY-EIGHT

Can a person who has not been defeated in the course of a suit obtain a new trial?

One small question worth discussing is similar to a question raised above in regard to a repulsio.

³²⁰ See 1492:51-52.

[1] Namely, can a person who did not initiate an action, and who was not involved in it, obtain a new trial? The short answer is: for as long as the person who lost the case remains alive and survives, no other person can obtain the favor of a new trial; for it not proper that any person “take his sickle to a neighbor’s field.”³²¹

[2] However, once the sentenced party has passed away, the person on whom the conduct of the case devolves according to the custom of our realm has by that fact alone complete freedom and every right to obtain one.

CHAPTER SEVENTY-NINE

Recall of an attorney: what this means, and where it must be done

Since cases and matters of new trials are frequently followed by the recall of attorneys, it should be understood what it means to recall an attorney. It is to retract the response which some attorney made in court without the agreement or knowledge of his client; and to correct it by a new response before the judge.

[1] Any recall of attorneys is usually and must be done before the judge to whom the response which is to be retracted was made, or before his man specially deputed by the same judge in this matter.

[2] But if the case is transferred to the hearing of another judge, the recall of the attorney’s response should be done before that judge, or man of his, in whose presence the case is moved by transfer.

CHAPTER EIGHTY

How an attorney’s response is retracted, and under what burden

It should be noted therefore that the retraction of the response of any attorney in protracted lawsuits—namely, in which, usually legal actions follow and judicial decisions as well as interlocutory sentences are pronounced, even after legal responses—can only be made when the suit is still sub iudice and the case not closed by a final sentence.

[1] In short trials initiated by terminal summons and others in which a single term is assigned for responses, any of the litigants can recall his attorney even after the judge has pronounced the final sentence.

[2] For the retraction of an attorney (as mentioned above) always presupposes some error or omission; and such errors or omissions are usually contained in a response or objection or in some legal exception.

³²¹ Vaguely referring to Deut. 23: 25.

[3] And following the retraction of the previous response, a new response has to be formulated and drawn up in the manner previously alluded to, so that if any of the litigants is able to recall his attorney on the same day as the sentence and judicial decision is passed, made and announced, he may do so without any fee or penalty; thereafter within the period of the octaval sessions and short trials (with the exclusion of the last day of the octaves or brief trials) always with a minor fine, namely six gold florins; finally, after the octaves or short trials, only with a major fine, namely 50 homagial marks of heavy weight, equivalent to 200 florins.

[4] Understand that the last day referred to above holds true when the person retracting attempts to act fraudulently, committing frivolous prosecution; namely to evade the single judicial term by this device of recall, and to continue to pursue and harass the other party with further lawsuits. For otherwise, the recall of attorney must take place on the same day as the sentence is delivered.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-ONE

The response of an attorney is usually retracted in two ways

The response of an attorney or advocate is usually retracted in two ways.

[1] First, in the course of a lawsuit before its final conclusion and before a definitive sentence in the case is delivered, although responses may have been made: for example, suppose someone claims that he has letters and written instruments regarding the matter for which he is charged by his adversary and by means of which he can defend himself against the charges of the adversary; or if he denies that he committed the deed for which he is being pursued at law; or if it so happens that on the basis of the responses of the parties, the judge refers the case for a view or to a common inquest; in such cases it is clear to anyone that a response has already been made.

[2] If, however, before the juridical term set by the judge for producing the letters or swearing an oath or for view or for holding a common inquest, one of the parties feels and recognizes that the response of his attorney has been or is likely to be to his detriment, he can, without waiting for the said judicial term, retract the response of his attorney before the judge of his case or the judge's man specially appointed by him for this purpose (as explained above).

[3] And such a retraction can be done even without royal favor (however, with a major fine, namely 50 homagial marks).

[4] Secondly, when the retraction is made after sentence has been delivered and pronounced. This is only allowed where the final conclusion and definite sentence follows forthwith and immediately upon the first responses of the parties;

[5] when, if the attorney of one party had responded differently, procedural consequences might have followed in the case. But this is rare, and is chiefly encountered in cases initiated and moved by terminal summons.

[6] Consequently in regard to this second way, the retraction of the response of any attorney after the expiry of the octaval term or of short sessions should be followed and done through a new trial granted by grace of the prince.

[7] An attorney's recognizance by which the attorney obligates his client to a fine of 50 heavy marks or more, either in perpetual or pledged rights and titles can always be retracted without royal grace, but only with a major fine.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-TWO

Two ways in which cases fail

The recall of attorneys is usually followed by the failure of cases:

[1] So it should be known that lawsuits can fail in two ways: first judicially, namely when the judge of the case having studied the plaint and claim of the plaintiff as well as the consequently issued summons detects in the letters of summons such a fault or error that renders it impossible to pass an appropriate sentence or judicial decision in the case:

[2] For example, because it has not been recorded in which county of the realm the village or estate which is being claimed lies; since there are many villages with one and the same name situated in different counties, indeed not infrequently in the same county, which are nevertheless distinguished by some additional appellation. And if the name along with the distinguishing appellation of the village are not recorded, doubt quickly arises as to which was the village which the plaintiff intended to acquire for his right.

[3] For example: there are two villages with the name Nándor, situated in one and the same county; but one of them is distinguished by the addition of an extra name, one being called Upper, or Greater Nándor, and the other Lower, or Lesser Nándor; and one of these is mine, and the other belongs to you and is yours.

[4] If, then, in the text of the summons and the text of the claim, it is not stated which of these is the subject of the claim, the judge of the case will not be able to distinguish on which of the two he should pass sentence. Because of this, it is proper that the case be declared failed and that it lapses, and must be begun afresh by the plaintiff (if he so wishes).

[5] All of which presupposes that the respondent on his own initiative or through his lawful attorney draws attention to the error or omission in the form of an exception; for otherwise if he replies of his own volition to the charge, and accepts the claim without objection, then the judge cannot act on his own initiative because he would be both judge and party, but he must pass sentence between the parties according to the merits of the case.

[6] The same applies if a person is summoned to court on the charge of an act of might: the case will fail and be null and void if the time when the crimes, which form the subject of the action, were committed is not indicated in the plaint; for without the dates and times being stated it would not be proper for either the plaintiff to win the suit nor for the respondent to be convicted.

[7] In every case or suit brought and initiated for an act of might and lawsuit arising in consequence, the plaint and claim therein muted should be either affirmed or denied by the respondent. If it is affirmed, then a reason for the affirmation must also be given; otherwise the person affirming, or the defendant, will lose the case forthwith.³²²

[8] On the other hand, if it is denied, the particular reason for denying is most likely to be that— as he will try to prove by the statements of his neighbors and abutters—he was not present at the time the acts of might were perpetrated, perchance he was not even in the country at the time. For this reason, if the time were not specified in the lawsuit, it would be difficult for the respondent to clear himself.

[9] Here, however, it should be noted and taken to heart that summonses issued in regard to acts of might and the cases which arise from them, are usually issued with different clauses. For sometimes (especially when the case refers to the principal person) this clause will be attached: “That N., taking with him such-and-such retainers and tenant peasants, broke into my home and committed such-and-such acts.”

[10] But at times the following clause is inserted in the summons: “Having sent his men N. and N. to my village, or estate N., he caused there such-and-such damage to my tenant peasants.”

[11] Often the summons is issued with the following clause: “On the instigation and command of N., his retainers and tenant peasants severely and harshly beat my servant N. whom they found in such-and-such a place, and so on, etc.”

[12] Therefore, attention must always be paid to the placing of such clauses in the plaint. It is one thing to take someone with oneself; another to send a person; and again another to order and command someone to the perpetration of some act.

[13] For taking with oneself always implies personal participation.

[14] Whereas sending merely implies presence, that is, of the one who sends and the one who is sent. To be sure, the sending can be from a distance, in which case it will refer to retainers, not tenant peasants, as the latter live nearby (unless perhaps peasants are sent through the retainers). All of which implies not contingent circumstances, but a deliberate and maliciously conceived misdeed.

[15] Command and order can involve absence. For it is possible for a person even if he goes away into a distant part to entrust his retainers and peasants at home before he leaves and sets out on his journey to carry out such-and-such a deed.

[16] Consequently regarding sending and enjoining the manner and sequence of the deed committed must be taken into account, and whether the case was contingent or non-contingent, that is, not deliberate.

[17] For regarding contingent cases: suppose my tenant peasant’s herds or animals are driven off by another person from the meadows or cornfields because they have been causing damage, and he shuts them up in his courtyard or stable, and will not let them out until satisfaction is paid for the damage caused; but my retainers or tenant peasants, behaving rashly, on the same or the following day violently remove the said beasts or herds and bring them back. Or my tenant peasant or retainer sitting in the tavern comes to blows with the other drinkers and wounds another man or perhaps commits homicide and is detained there for this reason; but other retainers or tenant peasants of mine the same or the next day use violence to set him free. Then [the question] of sending and enjoining must be pondered and reflected upon.

³²² The logic of this paragraph escapes us.

[18] For if I am in remote and distant parts, it is certain that there can be no question of my having sent them on this task, since no information could have reached me so quickly about such a contingent action.

[19] But suppose you now say that I had previously given instructions to my retainers and tenant peasants that, should such and such an eventuality arise, they should behave in such-and-such a manner, then I should have to admit that I might have instructed them to do so, but I could not have actually sent them to do so. But this cannot be accepted (since truth is not determined by future contingencies). For otherwise if such an eventuality were to be admitted and the primary intent of the perpetrator presupposed, it would not be the violent release of the animals or the freeing of the manslayer but the act of homicide itself or the causing of the damage which would be at issue and the subject of compensation.

[20] A non-contingent case is to be understood as when deliberately and with preconceived malice some crime is entrusted to another to carry out: for example the breaking into a house, or the cutting down of woods, the looting of a village, and similar violent acts, which can be entrusted and given to others to do after the departure to a distant region or foreign realm of some powerful person, even after a hundred days or more, if he has previously entrusted it to be committed and carried out in his absence.

[21] The distinctions in the afore-discussed clauses have been defined not so that litigants should have a free hand to frivolous prosecution, but rather that it should become clear whether an action has been justly or unjustly set in motion. For just as a justified action should always be supported, so an unjustified action and claim of frivolous prosecution should not be allowed.

[22] The second manner in which a case fails or is put aside is if the plaintiff pays a fine of six marks of lesser or light weight (the equivalent of six gold florins), two thirds to the judge before whom the suit was opened and one third to the respondent. This happens when the plaintiff realizes that his plaint and claim was wrongly and improperly brought and stated, either through his own negligence or by the fault of the scribe or some other error, and thinks that it would rather harm him than be to his advantage. Before the case is heard, either he or his attorney can have the case cancelled, suppressed and declared as failed of his own accord with the payment of the aforementioned fine.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-THREE

How can a case be made to fail before and how after sentence is passed?

A case can always freely be made and declared failed before a sentence is passed by the judge; but once the sentence has been passed and pronounced there is no room for failure.

[1] Understand the words “once the sentence has been pronounced” to refer to the final and definitive sentence, not the intermediate one which canonists refer to as interlocutory.

[2] For making a case failed after such an intermediate sentence is often—though not always—allowed and regarded as justifiable.

[3] For if on the basis of the responses of the parties a case is sent by the judge to a common inquest, or view, or he calls for the presentation of letters and written instruments: then notwithstanding such a judicial decision and intermediate sentence,³²³ even at the time of the discussion of the report delivered on a common inquest or view of this type, or the production of letters and written instruments, even if the letters have been produced before the judge but a final sentence has not been reached on the basis of the text of the reports or of the written instruments, then the plaintiff always has the right to have the case declared failed with the burden of a fine of six marks.

[4] However, I specifically said “not always.” For suppose a person is summoned by an adversary party before his judge on a charge of the seizure of property rights; and the person summoned responds that he did not seize them at the time the plaintiff alleges but was already before in peaceful possession of the property rights in question, or that he had already been acquitted and absolved of this charge, and he intends to prove this by producing the most incontrovertible letters; but when the time set by the judge for the production and exhibition of the said written instruments arrives and the respondent, due perhaps to some obstacle, is unable to appear at the given term and produce the requested letters and so capital sentence or a sentence of capital fine is pronounced against him on the grounds of non-appearance and absence because of his failure to produce the said letters and the sentence may be already given to execution; but at the time of execution either an act of violent repulsio is performed or the execution is prevented by letters granting a new trial issued with an injunction [prohibiting the seizure of his property] (in accordance with the time-honored custom of our realm and the contents of our general decree); and finally at the date for the revision and discussion of the text of the report of the execution or injunction, the plaintiff himself receives and accepts his part of the penalty or the fine for the act of repulsio or simply the judicial fines of the letters of sentence from the respondent who has been found guilty and, afterwards, the convicted respondent succeeds in producing before the judge the letters the judge ordered him to show but which he earlier failed to produce, on the strength of which the plaintiff, feeling that he could be convicted for frivolous prosecution or fine of the tongue in favor of the respondent: what then, if before a sentence of frivolous prosecution or fine of the tongue is imposed by the judge, the plaintiff declares his intention to abandon his suit and make it fail on payment of the customary fine of six marks? In such a case it is not accepted that the case fails even before sentence is pronounced.

[5] The reason is that the plaintiff acknowledged that the sentence against the respondent for non-appearance would be a definitive one when he accepted the fine for repulsio or letters of sentence and judgement, and in so doing unjustly damaged the other party. For fraud and trickery should not advantage anyone. The same should be held of other similar cases.

[6] Nevertheless, in our days it has become the custom not only in the aforementioned ways but in many others to have cases fail and be subverted through many different (however frivolous) exceptions, allegations, and objections by attorneys.

³²³ Either the causa ipsa is superfluous or the predicate of the sentences is missing. In the translation, we followed the Millennial edition of the Tripartitum, p. 364, note 7.

[7] Whenever judges detect these and recognize that they are contrary to right and justice, they should not allow them or go along with them, lest if they do and agree they themselves become guilty of the same.

[8] For this is the two-edged sword which pierces the hearts of orphans and widows and other persons deserving of pity. This is the pain which wounds to the depths the souls of the oppressed. This is the snare which casts so many into the pit of eternal damnation. For the unjust failing of cases takes many forms, but it is the breeding-ground of sin and is always to be shunned.

[9] For I can remember many occasions where for one mistaken letter or the omission of a single word a whole suit was undone and failed through the technical objections and allegations of the attorney and with the connivance of the judge.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-FOUR

Those who intervene in another suit: what should be done?

Because often several persons intrude and interfere as a third or often even as a fourth party in cases and suits between two parties, especially in the last stage of the hearing when both parties have already brought forth and exhibited before the judge the letters and privileges relevant to the merits of the case and the final conclusion is due to follow and the definitive sentence about to be handed down and pronounced,

[1] it should be known that when a case is being heard regarding heredity and perpetuity of property rights, then, before the handing down of the final sentence, anyone who wishes and deems that he has some claim over those property rights either by perpetual right or by pledge or under some other title is free to intrude and involve himself in the suit (provided he repays the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in the course of such a suit).

[2] However, the respondent does not have to produce immediately and actually to the intervener but only to the plaintiff.

[3] Especially if a person maintains that he is claiming these property rights on the basis and title of newly obtained royal right; because for the pursuit of this royal right, the process usual in such suits must be given and granted by the judge to the intervener.

[4] Nonetheless, the person intervening in the case is (if the respondent denies) obliged immediately to prove his genealogy.³²⁴

[5] For although he intervened only at this stage in the case, nevertheless by doing so he has made himself a de facto plaintiff; and a plaintiff must always be well-prepared.

[6] For otherwise he will be regarded as having failed to enter into and prosecute the case, and will be obliged to pursue his claim by another lawsuit.

³²⁴ The implication being that the intervener claims common ancestry of some sort. There do not seem to have been written genealogies or armorials of Western European type in the medieval kingdom of Hungary; cf. Fügedi, "Verba volant" (as n. 288, above).

[7] However, if he proves his genealogy, or if perhaps the respondent does not challenge it but still maintains that he has letters of quittance or other letters against him, then judgment can be made and handed down between the plaintiff and the respondent on the basis of the contents of the letters produced.

[8] All the same, a single term should be fixed and given by the judge for the production of letters to be exhibited against the intervener.

[9] It is to be noted that in cases regarding the pledging or seizure of property rights, no one has the right to intervene who wishes to claim the inheritance of such property rights.

[10] For it would seem not in keeping with right and justice that a person who on grounds of reasonable necessity temporarily pledges property rights to another should during the course of litigation be excluded perpetually from the ownership of the same by a third party with whom he previously had no dealings in this regard; or that the ownership of an estate violently seized from someone's hand [and] in a suit opened regarding the same seizure should be made over to another person rather than the one from whom it was seized.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-FIVE

If the plaintiff abandons a suit, can an intervener take it up

But it commonly happens when a judge has proceeded to try a lawsuit between two parties, and both sides have produced their privileges and written instruments on many occasions, and some third or fourth party has already intervened in the case before the final and definitive sentence has been pronounced between the parties, that the principal parties, that is the plaintiff and the respondent, either at their own initiative or on the advice of their kinsmen and friends come through good mediation to accord and unity, thus bringing an end to the case and any further prosecution of the same.

[1] So the question arises whether the ingrent and intervener can proceed further in the same case against the respondent (notwithstanding the aforesaid accord and unity established and confirmed with the plaintiff), and whether the respondent has to respond and produce letters at his demand; or whether he has the right to obtain right, judgment and a definitive sentence based on the contents of the letters which may already have been produced by the respondent against the plaintiff.

[2] It has to be said that if the aforesaid accord and unity between the two principal parties (the plaintiff, namely, and the respondent) was made and performed before the judge gave his final sentence, even if letters have already been produced on both sides, then the ingrent or intervener has no right to proceed in the case, nor is the respondent bound to make any further response to him in the same case.

[3] For once the foundation of the case—which is the principal plaintiff—collapses; whatever else is built upon it must collapse as well.

[4] Nevertheless, if the settlement was reached and made after sentence had been passed and pronounced between all the parties (that is, the plaintiff, the respondent, and the ingrent): and the ingerent has been awarded the appropriate share from the contested property rights, or the dower, the [filial] quarter or perchance the pledged rights, or if a decision has been made in favor of the respondent against the ingerent that written instruments are to be produced, then even if the principal plaintiff abandons the suit and declines to prosecute the case further, the ingerent or the one intervening in the suit has the right to proceed in the same suit, albeit in accordance with the command and decision of the judge.

CHAPTER EIGHTY-SIX

In what way are the fines that accrue in the course of a trial to be collected?

Once cases tried in protracted lawsuits are brought to a conclusion all the judicial fines and judicial penalties which usually add up and accumulate in the course of that case—commonly termed bírság—are collected.

[1] So it should be known that if the respondent wishes to pay and settle in cash as soon as the case is concluded and pay and deposit before the presiding judge the fines that have accumulated against him in the course of the proceedings, he will be able to settle at the rate of one florin for one mark.

[2] In respect of burdens and fines of this type, two thirds always go to the judge and one third to the plaintiff.

[3] But if he refuses to pay up before the judge, or is unable to, but nevertheless petitions and gives notice to the judge, asking that if he send his bailiff to him he will undertake to give satisfaction from his goods and property rights for the fines imposed by the court by their occupation without waiting for the execution of the sentence as is usual in regard to these fines, then he will be able to settle and pay at the rate of two florins for one mark.

[4] If however no notice was issued, nor any satisfaction given by the occupation of the goods, but the case was simply sent for execution along with the fines, then the defendant is to pay and deposit compensation at the rate of precisely four florins for one mark.

[5] In regard to which, satisfaction must be paid first from the chattels of the convicted, if these can be found, or if not, from his property rights.

[6] How and in what order these bírságs or judicial fines mount up in the course of a suit against particular persons I do not deem it necessary to describe at length; for that course of protracted lawsuits in which, according to the customs of our forebears and predecessors, bírságs and juridical burdens were wont to be doubled and often even doubled and doubled again from one judicial term to the next has been abolished by our general decree.³²⁵

[7] For according to the contemporary law and custom all cases which used in former times to be tried in protracted lawsuits should be settled and ended within four octaval terms and no more;

³²⁵ The known relevant decrees contain neither abolition nor approval of such a practice. Cf. 8 March 1435:7; 25 January 1486:52; 1492:66.

and within this interval fines accumulate in a simple way. They only double when a third summons is issued following upon a simple summons or notice.

[8] For in the first octave, if the respondent does not appear, he will be fined and punished to 3 marks. Then a further summons will be issued against him by the plaintiff for the payment of the 3 marks as well as for prosecuting the case. This is termed the second summons.

[9] Then if the respondent does not appear at the second judicial term, he will again be fined three marks for this second non-attendance, and then the double of it for the non-payment of the previous three marks.

[10] However, in simple cases involving institution or perambulation of boundaries, fines always accumulate simply.

[11] Likewise, in cases of short trials the respondent is customarily fined 3 marks himself and, if the case also involved the presentation of his tenant peasants or ignoble retainers, one mark each, i.e. one mark for each of the latter; the plaintiff, on the other hand, is fined for non-appearance at the royal fine which amounts to 6 marks.

[12] In the payment of such fines and fines each mark has to be paid at the judicial seat before the presiding judge (as previously described) with one florin or 100 pennies.

[13] If, on the other hand, the case was sent for execution, then each mark has to be paid at the rate of four florins or 400 pennies.

[14] If, however, the defendant and the respondent so wishes, and he has plenty of chattels, he has the right to pay the judicial fines to the judge and the opposing party according to the formula set out in the section on "Valuation of chattels" at the end of Part One.³²⁶

End of Part Two

³²⁶ See above I. 134.

[PART THREE]

CHAPTER ONE

Third part of the laws and customs of the realm, in general

Having with God's help taken care of judicial procedures and the kinds and different sorts of sentences of the royal court, it remains in this third and last part of this work to treat on the order of suits and cases referred or brought by way of appeal to the royal court;

[1] and, further, of the customs of the kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia, as well as of Transylvania, which have long been subject to the Holy Crown of this kingdom of Hungary and incorporated therein, these being somewhat different to and at variance with our law; whence very many cases are commonly sent after final sentence to the said royal court for more mature deliberation and more detailed discussion;

[2] and of the laws of the free cities;

[3] and how judgment is commonly passed in the case of villagers and peasants, as will be set out in the chapters which follow.

CHAPTER TWO

Can any people or any county establish statutes on its own?

Because we see that the long-established laws and customs of the aforesaid kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, and [of] Transylvania vary in certain terms and articles from the laws of our country, namely this kingdom of Hungary, and that some counties, independently and separately of other counties or even of the royal court, observe certain customs introduced in whatever ways in place of laws;

[1] whence arises the question: can any people or county, or any city, of its own and separately establish statutes? The answer is that no people, and no corporation which does not have its own jurisdiction but is subject to the authority of another, can establish statutes except with the consent of its superior. And this only in cases which are known not to be prejudicial to human and divine law, so that these statutes should not manifestly contain anything unjust or contrary to salvation nor should they obviously hurt or prejudice the rights of others.

[2] Hence, although the Dalmatians, Croatians, Slavonians, and Transylvanians have various customs quite different from ours regarding the payment of man-price and fines and in certain other legal procedures and in the observing of [judicial] terms (as will be explained more clearly below),³²⁷ and have the right to use and enjoy these customs, and are allowed, even now, with the prince's consent, to make statutes and ordinances among themselves on similar matters;

³²⁷ See below III 3–4.

nevertheless, they cannot establish any law and they have no right to make statutes in contravention of general statutes and decrees of this kingdom of Hungary or against sentences and judicial decisions in cases of goods and property rights which are usually made, passed and pronounced in the royal court by justices ordinary.

[3] The token and proof of this is that all cases initiated among them involving property rights are, once the case is decided there, customarily referred to the royal court as a place of inquiry, as it were, for the sake of sounder and more mature revision, examination, and discussion.

[4] There anything decided and concluded will always be valid and unchangeable, notwithstanding the decision of the ban or voivode.

[5] And likewise, in different counties they can make and establish different statutes, after having sound deliberation among them, concerning the guarding of fields, meadows, woodlands, and rivers, or the status and income of mills, and other such matters, and even the observation of judicial terms and procedures, so that a case initiated before the ispán of the county may be concluded in a short suit at one county's judicial seat and in a protracted one at another. Nevertheless, they can never prejudice or derogate from a general decree of the whole realm or the ancient and approved custom of the royal court that (as aforesaid) is observed in court cases.

[6] Their statutes are only valid and recognized between and among themselves. They do not extend to outsiders or to nobles of other counties who do not have goods and property rights within them.

[7] In the same way, free cities, as well as merchants, and traders, tailors, furriers, cobblers, tanners, and other artisans can also—with the consent of the prince—make statutes within their guild and between themselves, providing such statutes are just and honorable and do not damage or prejudice others and the liberties and rights of others.³²⁸ As said before, such statutes have force and application only among themselves.

[8] Such constitutions and statutes must be made and established with the approval of the major and sounder part of the people; otherwise they could not be termed the statutes of the people or community. But if the people are divided into two groups, then the decision of the sounder and worthier party will prevail.³²⁹ By sounder and worthier party is meant the one in which there are more outstanding and notable persons in terms of dignity and knowledge.

CHAPTER THREE

The customary law peculiar to the kingdoms of Slavonia and Transylvania

It should be known that the nobles of the kingdoms of Slavonia and Transylvania in many matters enjoy and use customs of their own, especially in regard to the payment of man-price.

³²⁸ Although the first guilds appeared in Hungary in the fourteenth century and were first regulated by King Louis I in 1376, guild regulations survive mainly from the fifteenth century. Only in a few cases, however, were these regulations submitted to the ruler for his approval.

³²⁹ The term constitutio is unusual in this context, and may owe something to Auquinas ST I–II, 90. 3.

[1] For Slavonians are wont to pay one hundred florins as the man-price, and the Transylvanians pay sixty-six florins.

[2] Consequently, the recall of the statements of attorneys at octave courts incur a similar fine among them.

[3] Additionally, the dowers of wives of deceased persons (with the exception of those who hold or held baronial offices) are likewise paid off by one hundred florins in the kingdom of Slavonia, and sixty-six florins in Transylvania.

[4] And understand this when the goods and property rights of the deceased husband amount to that many marks. Otherwise if the estimation of the goods is lower, then there too, as in Hungary, the widows receive less for the dowers.

[5] The repayment of the dowers of the wives of barons is done the same way as in Hungary.

[6] In both countries, cases initiated at octave courts in matters of property rights or other special and important matters may, after final sentence, be once referred to the royal court, namely to the presence of the lord judge royal, at the request of either party, for the sake of more mature examination and discussion, and then sent back to the first judge (that is, the ban or voivode) for final resolution and execution.

[7] Furthermore, Transylvanian nobles³³⁰ are convicted in the sum of fifty marks for minor acts of might, amounting to the same number of gold florins. Alispáns or noble magistrates are condemned to twice as much.

[8] Among them, the man-price of the living is paid with thirty-three florins.

[9] Then, the payment of dowers is usually paid two thirds with ready cash down and one third with movable and marketable chattels.

[10] Then, contempt of the general diet and the noble assembly of the Transylvanians held on the mandate of the king or of the lord voivode of Transylvania is fined by a hundred marks, amounting to the same number of florins; and that of a judicial seat, by fifty.

[11] Then, in the matter of recovery of damages or debts, the principal noble party, be he plaintiff or respondent, is permitted to swear an oath up to three florins. The other nobles, however, his oath-helpers, cannot recover more than one florin each by their oath.

[12] And although in the trials of the aforementioned cases, any mark is equivalent to a hundred pennies according to Transylvanian reckoning, nevertheless fines and judicial burdens accumulated in the course of octave cases are always paid in the same way as nobles of the said kingdom of Hungary, with forty pennies as described at the end of Part One.³³¹

³³⁰ On the different legal standing of Transylvanian nobles and the debate on the origin of the nobility of Transylvania see Elemér Mályusz: "Hungarian Nobles in Medieval Transylvania," in Kinship, Property and Privilege Ed J. M. Bak, History and Society in Central Europe II., Medium Aevum Quotidianum 29 (1994), 54.

³³¹ In fact, the, the ways of paying fines is described at the end of the second part, see II 86.

[13] Then, cases brought to the judicial seats of the counties before the alispáns and the noble magistrates in matters worth less than three florins are not transferred to the octave terms of the voivode.

[14] Then, the full man-price of peasants in Transylvania is twenty-five florins; and a half (which we call man-price of the living) is twelve florins and fifty pence; the mutilation of limbs, such as hands, ears, and the gouging out of eyes or wounds to the face is set at twenty florins; and the striking out of teeth at six florins.

[15] Then, if a peasant succeeds in fleeing the scene of a crime, the punishment for the violence and acts of might committed and perpetrated by him goes not to the injured man but to the lord of the peasant; the injured person can only claim compensation for the loss or wound inflicted.

[16] Then, for the violent release and carrying away of animals and herds impounded for damage done, or for any other unjust seizure of property, peasants will be sentenced to pay the estimation of the said animals or herds, or of the other things seized.

[17] In this matter, the same sentence should be applied to nobles as well.

[18] Then, in the matter of the recovery of damages or debts, the principal peasant party, be he plaintiff or respondent, is permitted to swear an oath for one florin. The other peasants, that is: his oath-helpers, cannot, however, by their oath recover more than one florin for every three of them.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Scythians of Transylvania, whom we call Székely

There are furthermore in Transylvania, privileged nobles called Scythuli, originating from the Scythian people when they first came to Pannonia, whom we call by a corrupt name: Székely. They enjoy quite different laws and customs; they are very skilled in warfare; and they divide up and distribute inheritances and offices among themselves by tribes and kindreds and the lineages of kindreds, in the manner of the ancients.³³²

[1] Their man-price is set at twenty-five florins.

[2] Fine of the tongue among them is twelve florins and fifty pence.

[3] Capital sentence passed against a Székely by their ispán amounts to twenty-four marks, worth the same number of florins. The convicted and sentenced man does not lose his property but it devolves to his heirs and kinsmen; and he does not lose his head except in cases of the charge of infidelity and criminal cases.

[4] And in their judicial seats every mark is customarily deposited and paid at fifty pence.

³³² The Székely were a large tribal grouping of warriors that was moved to the east Transylvanian border-territory during the thirteenth century. Their association with the ancient Scythians later led to the myth that they were the direct descendants of the Huns.

[5] Then, whatever the case, their ispán or alispán has the right to receive the judge's portion immediately after sentence has been passed and pronounced, even if the convicted party has come to terms with his adversary.

[6] Then, cases involving properties worth more than three florins are usually referred to the royal court for fuller discussion, observing the usual ways of appeal.

[7] The remaining rights of these countries and the local ones of nobles (as they are in force only among them and are known only to them) do not require more detailed explanation.

CHAPTER FIVE

What is homagium, and in how many ways it is understood

But since we have already frequently made mention of homagium (man-price) and homagial marks, we should briefly note that homagium is to be understood in two ways.

[1] The first is according to the laws: as the bond (ligium) or binding (ligamen) of a man, namely, the loyalty due by an inferior to his superior; or otherwise, the fidelity which is due only to the prince, all other loyalties being disregarded.³³³

[2] In another way, man-price according to common use is this: the mulct or the estimation of the manslaughter, which means, that the manslaughterers redeem themselves from those whom it concerns according to the estimation of their heads, over and above any other punishment due and customarily imposed for any acts of might as may have been committed in addition to the killing.

[3] Some maintain that the man-price is the price of the man killed. However, it is absurd to say that: for the dead cannot at any price be redeemed and raised from the dead. But it is necessary that the killer in order to avoid eye-for-an-eye punishment redeem his own head and not that of the one whom he killed.

[4] And this holds if he has escaped the hands of the judiciary or the opposing party. For if he can be personally detained, and he committed the homicide deliberately, then he should not pay the man-price but be subject to capital punishment.

[5] We therefore commonly consider man-price in its second sense as to save or redeem one's head.

CHAPTER SIX

How cases are transmitted from the judicial seats of the county ispáns to the royal court, and about the recall of attorneys at those seats

³³³ This use of homagium, as the equivalent of the western "homage," is otherwise unknown in Hungary.

Whereas cases initiated at the judicial seats of the county ispáns of the counties of this kingdom, once judicial deliberation and sentence has been passed by the same ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates according to the responses of the parties, are by the ancient law and custom of this realm of ours usually transmitted to the royal court, then these same sentences and judicial deliberations may be approved or rejected; then, once mature discussion of the cases has been done there by the justices ordinary of the realm, and they have been either approved or rejected, the cases are often referred back to the said county ispáns and noble magistrates for execution and for the proper conclusion of such a sentence and judicial instruction; and after such remission, the convicted and defeated parties obtain a new trial from the prince and very often in connection with that new trial they recall their attorneys;

[1] whence it should be known that, once the case has been remitted from the royal court, and the justices ordinary have approved or rejected it, should the losing and convicted party obtain a new trial, or retract the statements of his attorney, then whatever trial is subsequently held by the ispán, alispán, and the noble magistrates, and whatever sentence is passed, that case must not be sent up to the royal court for more extensive discussion, even on the strength of a new trial.

[2] If, however, the other party loses (namely, the one at whose request the case has not yet been transferred and sent up to the royal court), then that party has the right to take the case to the royal court for sounder review and discussion.

[3] The recalling of attorneys frequently occurs and happens at the judicial seat of the county ispáns of the counties of this kingdom. The recall of any attorney can take place there before the ispáns, alispáns, the noble magistrates or any one of them, even after sentence has been passed in the court, for only three florins, of which two are to be paid to the judges (that is, the ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates) and the third to the party against whom this recall has to be made.

[4] However, once the case has been ratified and approved in the said royal court, and remitted to the same ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates, then the burden of the recall of the attorney – if this is done – is doubled and has to be paid by six florins, as approval was given by a higher judge.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Which cases are to be remitted from the royal court to the county ispáns

There are various opinions as to whether cases initiated in the county court and transferred to the royal court where the sentence and the judicial deliberation of the ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates is ratified and approved, should be sent for execution from the same royal court by the justices ordinary, or whether they should be remitted to the same ispáns etc. again.

[1] Nevertheless, it has to be known and indeed maintained that those cases in which fines and judicial burdens should be paid and deposited, such as minor acts of might, and the sentences following from them; fine of the tongue and suchlike in which the judges also receive their portion – are to be remitted and returned again to the presence of those judges from whose hearing they had been sent by appeal to the royal court.

[2] For otherwise, the previous judge would appear to be seriously prejudiced, if by such an appeal their portion, and judicial part be made over to another's power and jurisdiction.

[3] Other cases, however, which do not involve the discharge of burdens or fines but rather demand execution, such as cases of dower, paraphernalia and rights in pledge, and similar matters, can, as is convenient, be sent for execution from the royal court and put into effect.

[4] It is different in cases initiated in the royal court before its justices ordinary, because here cases are transferred from one judge to another along with the previous and subsequent juridical charges of whatever kind in their entirety.

[5] However, matters of dower, paraphernalia, or rights in pledge which are known to be over one hundred florins value or estimation cannot be tried and adjudicated at the judicial seats of the counties or county ispáns.

CHAPTER EIGHT

Free cities and their conditions; in general

Since it is hereabouts appropriate to discuss briefly the free cities, it is to be known that a civitas is so called as if a civium unitas (body of burghers) because a great number of people are gathered there.

[1] A city in fact is a great number of houses and streets, necessary walls and fortifications, privileged for a good and honest life.³³⁴

[2] But as this great number of burghers forms and represents a single community, and such collective communities differ among themselves both in their location as well as in their privileges and customs, so some free cities are subject to the jurisdiction of the personal presence of the royal majesty, such as Székesfehérvár, Esztergom, and Levoča, and others by ancient custom of the kingdom to the jurisdiction of the Master of the Royal Treasury, such as Buda, Pest, Košice, Pressburg,³³⁵ Trnava, Sopron, Bardejov, and Prešov.

CHAPTER NINE

Burghers of the free cities have a man-price equal to nobles

The burghers who live in such cities are equal to the nobles of this realm in respect of their man-price. However, in regard to other liberties they are not regarded as equal to nobles, and do not enjoy their privileges.

³³⁴ This phrase, describing the purpose of the polis, originates with Aristotle (Politics, 1. 2. 8-9). What follows most probably derives from Aquinas (ST, I-II, 90. 3), albeit in a mediated form. See also Marsilius de Padua, Defensor pacis, I, xvii, 11.

³³⁵ Presently Bratislava: alternatively, Pozsony, Pressburg, Prespork, Wilsonovo.

[1] For outside their cities and territories the testimonies of burghers are not accepted among nobles; nor are they permitted to give an oath for compensation of damages or debts over the value of one florin per person outside the city.

CHAPTER TEN

How cases involving the burghers of free cities are transferred to the Master of the Royal Treasury

Among these cities some have mayors, some have judges, and sworn burghers and consuls. All the cases of the inhabitants and burghers of these cities and also the trials of other outsiders initiated as may be against them are decided, defined and brought to a conclusion by their judgment.

[1] From here, however, they may be transferred by way of appeal to the judicial seat of the Master of the Royal Treasury at the instance of the party dissatisfied with the judgment.

[2] If any party is still dissatisfied, the case will be sent for examination to the personal presence of the royal majesty, where only the sentence of the city and of the Master of the Royal Treasury will be reviewed and chewed over, namely whether the sentences were justly or unjustly, properly or improperly pronounced. The just will be approved, the improper will be amended or altogether rejected, leaving entirely aside all exceptions newly presented by the parties.

[3] Unless, perchance, they say or propose such things which rightly and indisputably inform and aid the better clarification and understanding of the case or the sentence. In such a case, any of the parties has to be heard.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

How a new trial may be obtained in cases of the burghers of free cities

Then, if it happens that a case is remitted from the examination and judgment of the personal presence of the royal majesty to its previous judge for more mature review, except in incidental or subordinate details, and if any of the parties expresses dissatisfaction with such a revision or discussion, it will not thereafter be possible to refer the case to the presence of the Master of the Royal Treasury but it will have to be sent directly to review by the personal presence of the king alone, who remitted it.

[1] But if after obtaining a second or third judgment either of the parties still refuses to be content, he can have his case revived again by the means and grace of a new trial while the case is still pending after the second sentence of the personal presence of the royal majesty or even after a third one pronounced there; but only before that judge before whom the case was originally initiated.

[2] And if the sentence goes against the party convicted who was appealing and seeking a new trial, then perpetual silence is to be imposed immediately and effectively upon the party sentenced by virtue of the said new trial, and that case can be no more transmitted to a higher court.

[3] If, however, the other party, which had previously been winning and successful, fails, then he too, like the other party, may obtain a new trial, and he has the right to proceed in the same way.

[4] On the other hand, if a sentence is passed against that party, either by approving and ratifying or emending or quashing, no further trial will be granted, but the case will be closed in perpetual silence for his part as well, and, henceforth, neither party will never more be able to obtain a new trial or appeal the case.

[5] For both parties have obtained a new trial once, and in the same case they cannot obtain a second one.

[6] However, appeals in whatever case can, once they have been decided, always be made to the court of the Master of the Royal Treasury and to the personal presence of the royal majesty according to the content of the relevant privileges; for otherwise, if the right of appeal was denied, the poor could often be harmed by the powerful by favor or gift and their just rights jeopardized.

[7] The case is different in criminal cases that lead to capital punishment and death sentence. For in these appeal has no place, unless they try to put an innocent person to death by a completely rash judgment. In which case the kinsmen or relations can take refuge alone with the royal majesty and correspondingly take the case higher.

[8] Then, if in the course of civil cases, either before or after their remission, the words or responses of the attorney have to be recalled, then should be followed the practice and custom of that judge's judicial court where the exchange took place and the recall is made.

CHAPTER TWELVE

The testimony of outsiders, which is not to be accepted among burghers

Then, in cases initiated and tried before the judges or sworn burghers of the said cities in matters of inheritance and immovable goods, no outsider is accepted as a witness in their court.

[1] However, in cases of debts or any other matters or transactions made and done outside their territory, anybody is normally allowed to give evidence before them providing he is of good reputation and honest condition.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Recognizances made before the judges and sworn burghers

Then, any recognizance regarding any movable or immovable goods whatsoever made among them or on their territory before a judge or two sworn burghers is always valid.

[1] But any other recognizance with perpetual right on such matters made by burghers before other judges of the realm or at places of authentication is not valid.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

How burghers should enter into the ownership of property

Then, if a recognizance is made before the said judge and sworn burghers regarding immovables or properties such as houses, lands, gardens, fishponds, or vineyards, then it is necessary that the taking of possession or acquisition of them be made by the buyer of such things before two sworn burghers delegated for that purpose [at the time] when he wishes to enter and claim them for himself.

[1] And, if some contradictor should appear and block it by way of contradiction, then the contradictor has to present the reason for his contradiction within fifteen days in the presence of the same judge and sworn burghers.

[2] But if the contradictor does not appear then he, in whose favor the sale and the recognizance was made, can safely enter into the ownership of those things and properties.

[3] And if somebody subsequently claims some kind of right to these things, then within the course of one year and a day he can contradict if he wishes publicly or privately; otherwise his right will lose its force.

[4] His contradiction will be considered public if he summons to court the possessor of these things and inheritances, and, within the said course of the year, he initiates and opens the case before his judges.

[5] And privately, he should contradict so that he makes the lawful and usual prohibitions within a year and a day before the judge or sworn burghers about that inheritance, and has it registered in the city's book, lest prescription may intervene through neglect of protest.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Lawful prescription usually observed among burghers

Although in matters involving alienated things prescription should occur and be applied in the course of twelve years by and against burghers; nevertheless, nowadays it is usual to prescribe in a year and day, albeit improperly and like among peasants.

[1] When the plaintiff or contradictor makes the aforementioned prohibition but neglects to bring his opponent (that is, the possessor of the inheritance or things) to court within a year, then he may make (as aforementioned) inhibition within the space of a year in any year counted inclusively from the day of the prohibition, and when he needs or can, he may initiate a suit in the matter.

[2] But if the judge, perhaps out of hatred or some preconceived grudge or for any other reason, refuses to have the prohibition that was made before him or before the sworn burghers recorded in the minutes or in the city book, or to issue letters of prohibition, [the contradictor] may freely protest against this before the justices ordinary of the realm or at a place of authentication, provided the protest (where such is called for) can be supported by evidence.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

How a property and its appurtenances are to be taken into possession among burghers

Then, if someone buys immovable goods and properties with their appurtenances among burghers of these cities, then it is sufficient to take physical possession of the substance and have himself instituted, because by taking that the appurtenances are also understood as being taken.

[1] And under the term appurtenances are included everything which are recognized as belonging by right and custom of the city to that physical thing and property.

[2] Unless by chance some part of the appurtenances is specifically exempted and retained in the course of the sale and purchase.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Debts of burghers where all proof is missing

Then, if any burgher is sued by another because of debts, and the plaintiff cannot produce any proof against him, then the burgher can clear himself simply by taking an oath in his own person, according to the old custom of free cities.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Burghers who have properties in the lands of others

Then, burghers of the said as well as other cities who have properties in lands and territories of others cannot free themselves from the payments due to the lords out of these properties and cannot be exempt from the rendering of the same (without the wish and consent of the lords).

[1] Indeed, they are obliged to stand trial in regard to these properties before the lord against any complainant or litigant.

[2] And if they overstep their rights within the bounds of the properties or in the territory where the properties lie, they will likewise be compelled to stand trial there regarding their fault.

How cities are held to stand trial regarding their property rights

Then, all free, and any other, cities which administer any property rights under whatever title are obliged always to defer to the judgments and jurisdiction of the justices ordinary of the realm in regard to these property rights, in the same way as nobles.

[1] And, if they violently cause loss, damage, or other sorts of harm to nobles or their servants from these property rights, then the judge and the sworn burghers can always be summoned together with the community to the royal court by the injured and damaged party for such misdeeds and acts of might; or if the said party wishes, they can be summoned and brought to trial at the judicial seat of the county in which those goods are situated and lie.

[2] How to proceed in such cases, and what kind of judgment is to be passed, is set out clearly in our general decree.³³⁶ To explain clearly what this means in this context, I have copied word for word the article on this subject. It begins as follows:

[3] “If free cities—that is, Buda, Pest, Košice, Pressburg, Sopron, Bardejov, Prešov, Trnava, as well as Levoča and Zagreb, and all other free cities—or inhabitants of the same cause any loss or damage to nobles and men of property, and if such a city or inhabitant and burgher that causes loss and damage have goods and property rights in any county and have from that property injured or caused loss to a noble, then they will be compelled to stand trial before the ispán in the county where they hold these goods, if such acts of loss or damage are considered to amount to a minor act of might.

[4] But if such a city or burgher has no property rights in any county, and a noble or any other man of property has a suit or case against a private person, or against particular individuals only, and not the city or community as a whole, then such a noble and man of property will be required to pursue his claim before the judge of that city.

[5] If such a noble or man of property endeavors to initiate a suit against the whole city, or conversely the city against nobles and other men of property concerning a major act of might or a property right, such a case should, follow lawful summons, and be initiated and terminated by due process of law before the personal presence of the royal majesty.

[6] Now in such a case if either of the parties is defeated in the case against him in the course of the proceedings before the same personal presence, then if the case involves a property right, the party in question will be required to pay not the major fine, but only two hundred gold florins.

[7] If, on the other hand, such a case is acknowledged to involve an act of invading noble houses or the arrest, beating, wounding, or slaying of a noble, the perpetrators of such acts of might will be condemned to capital punishment and the loss of all their movable and immovable goods, as has been observed heretofore.

[8] In a case when a burgher possesses vineyards or other [hereditary] properties belonging to any lord or noble in this kingdom, and he commits any offence in this territory or causes any damage to someone, in such a case the same burgher must stand trial before the lord from whom he holds the properties.”

³³⁶ 1498:38.

CHAPTER TWENTY

How burghers can punish public criminals

Then, thieves, brigands, homicides, arsonists and other such public criminals should be chastized and punished according to their deserts observing what is to be observed by law. But, no one is to be mutilated. Nor can nobles be arrested except at the scene of the crime, or put to torture on grounds of suspicion.

[1] If, therefore, a city as a community has a noble put to death without just cause, then the judge and the sworn burghers, and not all the burghers individually, are to be subject to capital punishment in consequence. They will lose all their goods and property which belong and pertain to them personally, two thirds of which should be given to the royal majesty, as their lord, and one third to the other party.

[2] All other immunities, laws, liberties, and customs of the cities are written down in their privileges. Beyond these and outside their territory, they are subject to the laws and customs of this kingdom of Hungary in all matters and deeds.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Homicide committed by someone in self-defense

As the subject of homicide has been raised in this section, and we often encounter cases of homicide which are not duly punished, because many claim that they committed the act in self-defense, it is appropriate to add a few remarks about the ways of defending and offending.

[1] Here it should be known that the allegation that a person committed and perpetrated homicide in self-defense ought not to be accepted at face value, but it must be proved that he was attacked in a hostile fashion by another bearing a weapon and through this was placed in danger of his life. For if a person approaches another with an unsheathed sword it may at once be presumed that he plans either to kill him or inflict a mortal wound.

[2] It is certain, however, that capital sentence is brought and decided not only for the killing but also for just the beating or wounding of a noble. Therefore, whether the attacker would kill or merely wound, the person attacked is not bound to suffer or allow either of these.

[3] Hence it follows that if a person in reasonable and just self-defense kills someone who has advanced on him in a hostile manner with a naked blade, both the man-price and the [fine for] bloodshed of the man killed and slain will be lost, and can never be recovered.

[4] It is different, however, in the forum of conscience. For if it is possible for the person attacked to escape his attacker with his honor intact and save his own life, then he must do so, and avoid the lesser evil lest a greater ensue.³³⁷

[5] In such cases, note should be taken as to whether the person who slew the other had not yet been struck by his attacker or whether he had indeed been hit. If the former (i.e. where he had not been struck), but [the other] was in the act of and on the point of striking, then whatever the attacked person did, it is clear that he was undoubtedly acting, and had acted, in self-defense.

[6] If, however, he has been already struck, and the striking stopped for a time, then he had no right to return the blow after the interruption; for by doing so, it may be considered and judged that the return blow was not an act of defense but rather of vengeance: unless, the person struck was perhaps acting to escape other fresh blows which his attacker intended to repeat and continue. In other words, there is a difference between defense and vengeance: defense takes place at once; vengeance after a delay.

[7] If, however, it does not emerge clearly from testimony or otherwise which blow preceded the other, then the guilt will fall on the person who provoked the other to fight and to strike a blow.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

In how many ways, and how self-defense is understood

It should further be known that self-defense can be understood in two ways: in the first, it is in order to protect the body and the person; in the second, to preserve immovables, that is, properties.

[1] Regarding the protection of body and person, self-defense can be done and is allowed only immediately and before the wrong is completely finished or in the same fight and struggle during the commission of the first crime: that is, before the attacker (or the person who struck first) departs from the scene. For, as previously explained, if it is done afterwards, it cannot be called self-defense, but vengeance.

[2] Regarding the protection of immovables and property rights, a dispossessed noble or any other man of property, is, for the purpose of defending his rights and ejecting the occupier or despoiler (as was also dealt with in Part One),³³⁸ given by ancient custom of this realm one full year's space in which he has full right to defend himself against an occupier and violent despoiler any way he can, and to eject the said occupier from the [property] rights or properties, even to the latter's great loss.

[3] And whatever defense a despoiler or occupant makes in this regard, it will not excuse him.

³³⁷ The Latin is unclear (usually the lesser evil is taken and not avoided).

³³⁸ See above I. 68.

[4] Hence it is that since everyone is allowed to defend himself so as to preserve his things and goods, then everyone is all the more and more strongly entitled to protect his body and person (in the face of pressing danger).

[5] Nevertheless, any act of self-defense should be done by means of blameless defense³³⁹ following God and the forum of conscience. It is considered blameless defense when a person cannot defend his person and his belongings from danger without killing or inflicting wounds upon his attacker.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Whether it is allowed to attack someone because of threats

Now it may be asked: if a person threatens to kill another, can the latter attack him?

[1] It must be said that although it is not permitted by the law and approved custom of our realm to attack another in response to threats or menaces (except in case and act of arson, where the person who threatens to set fire to and burn down a city, village, or another person's house is usually punished by death), nevertheless, by common law, if the man who threatened to kill another usually puts his threats into effect, and especially if he is powerful and has the habit of beating others, then (because the same act can be presumed again from his side) self-defense as well as attack is allowed, in order to avoid being killed.

[2] However, if the person is not of the habit of beating others or of putting his threats into effect, then it is permissible to argue with him and resist him by words, and not by arms or sword. Except perhaps if he is waiting for others to join him, and to delay would be dangerous.

[3] All the same, it is better and more expedient in such a circumstance to avoid the person and go elsewhere away from him.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Whether one can come to the help of another

A further question: whether one can come to the help of another.

[1] The answer is, yes. If I can gather my friends and kinsmen to help protect my things and properties, all the more may I do so in defense of my own body and person.

[2] Therefore, anyone, even a stranger, who is called on for assistance, can always come to the help of a person he sees placed in mortal peril.

[3] On the other hand, he is not obliged, nor should he, to set free from another's hands a brigand or other public criminal, at the shout of that criminal.

³³⁹ The expression, 'blameless defence', derives from Aquinas – vim vi repellere licet cum moderamine inculpatae tutelae: ST, II-II, 62. 7.

The condition and laws of the peasants whom we call jobbágy

Finally, having explained the rights of free cities, and self-defense and attack, now the peasants (whom we call jobbágy) are to be treated.³⁴⁰

[1] Their condition is varied. Some are Hungarian, others Saxons and Germans, others Czechs and Slavs professing the Christian faith. Then there are some who are Wallachs and Ruthenians and some who are Rascians or Serbs and Bulgarians, following the errors of the Greeks. In addition, there are Jász and Cumans³⁴¹ living and residing on lands belonging to the king, and they also profess Christianity. As for the Ruthenians and Bulgarians, some adhere to our faith and some to the error of the Greeks.³⁴²

[2] Now, in the past, all these nations (with the exception of the king's Jász, Cumans, Ruthenians, and Bulgarians) enjoyed that prerogative of liberty that gave them free right to betake themselves from their place of residence as and when they wanted in order to live in other places which they preferred, provided they first paid the required land-rent and settled their debts. However, they lost their liberty last summer³⁴³ and are now subject to their lords in full and perpetual servitude, because of their revolt and rebellion against the nobility as a whole under the guise of a crusade, led by a most wicked brigand by the name of George Székely, by which they incurred the eternal charge of infidelity.

[3] Such persons, by law and long approved custom of this realm, cannot be summoned simply and directly to appear before justices ordinary of the realm or before the diocesan or other ecclesiastical judges, nor before the county ispán of any county, in any matters whatsoever

³⁴⁰ Jobagio, Hung. jobbágy : the word originally meant a royal office holder but was gradually transferred to rustici jobagiones (lit. peasant retainers), who had acquired personal liberty but were bound to the lord of the land by having to render seigniorial dues (in kind and money, later more also in in labor). We translate it as tenant peasant. They were subject to seigniorial jurisdiction, but – at least until 1514 – free to move once they had paid their annual dues and obtained a license. The jobagio-jobbágy status remained the characteristic legal condition of Hungarian peasants until 1848. See János M. Bak “Servitude in the medieval kingdom of Hungary (a sketchy outline).” in Forms of servitude in Northern and Central Europe: decline, resistance, and expansion, ed. Paul H. Freedman and Monique Bourin, (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005), 387–400.

³⁴¹ The Cumans and Jász (As) settled in Hungary during the thirteenth century. Both were originally nomadic, the Cumans being of Turkic origin and the Jász of Iranian. Although both groups were rapidly assimilated, they preserved until the nineteenth century their own customary laws and social organization. See Nóra Berend, At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and “Pagans” in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001).

³⁴² “Ruthenians” were Slavs settled in the northeastern Carpathians and together with the Romanians/Wallachs and Southern Slavs, mostly Orthodox Christians.

³⁴³ The reference is to the law (1514) punishing rebellious peasants after the rural uprising April-August 1514 that imposed “eternal servitude” (rusticitas)—and not infidelity—on the peasants. The measure was more rhetorical than practical, see Bak, Servitude, 395–400.

(unless they clearly concern an ecclesiastical forum). Instead, their lords, be they secular or spiritual, should first administer law and justice regarding them to any accuser or litigant.

[4] Only then, if one of the parties does not wish to content himself with that decision, can he bring the case before his higher judge, namely: before him to whom the hearing of the case belongs, for clearer and more mature discussion and review.

[5] In which case, if from its content the case seems to belong to an ecclesiastical forum, then it should be transmitted to the diocesan ordinary and his vicar; but if it is clearly a matter concerning a secular court, to the county ispán and the noble magistrates.

[6] And when it is remitted to the lord, any such administration of law and justice should always take place, and be done and performed before one or two noble magistrates, whether the case was moved and initiated by summons in the royal court or by citation before the county ispáns or ecclesiastical vicars.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

The way and order of the administration of justice in regard to tenant peasants

So, first the way and order of doing justice needs to be discussed.

[1] Here the following questions arise: is the lord or the holder for the time being obliged actually to administer law and justice and pass judgment at the simple request of a complainant in regard to his tenant peasants? And if he refuses to do so, is he to be burdened with any fine because of that? And, once a summons is issued against him, to make him bring his tenant peasants before the ispán and the noble magistrates, is he subsequently allowed to promise to administer law and justice in regard to these same peasants, or is it only the county ispán together with the noble magistrates who is then required to pass judgment regarding them?

[2] The answer is as follows. Although by divine and human law, and by common law, any lord is bound to administer law and justice forthwith on simple request and complaint to any injured or harmed complainant regarding any tenant peasants or countryfolk or any of his non-noble servitors: nevertheless, before he is lawfully, that is: by summons or citation, warned and admonished to administer such law and justice (assuming he has neglected to do so), he will not be subject to any penalty on this account, for that punishment is normally incurred in the trials of cases because of contempt and violation of judicial orders.

[3] Therefore, not the county ispán and the noble magistrates, but he himself is expected to administer justice, even thereafter.

[4] Here it should be known that if some noble or man of property (whether he be a person secular or spiritual) is summoned to the royal court or cited to the judicial seat of the county ispán on such terms that he is required both to appear in his own person and to bring and present before the court his tenant peasants or non-noble servitors, then if such a noble or man of property fails to appear, he himself will be convicted and fined three heavy marks in regard to his own person, while his tenant peasants or non-noble servitors, who were enjoined by name to appear, however many they be, will be punished and fined one heavy mark per head, that is for every person enjoined to appear one mark of heavy weight. Furthermore, they usually are and indeed ought to be convicted in the plaint and claim of the plaintiff.

[5] Thus namely, if the case is known to have been brought before the royal court regarding a major act of might, then both the noble or man of property and his tenant peasants or non-noble servitors who have been expressly enjoined to appear, should be condemned to capital punishment and to forfeiture of all goods which fall to their share, both movable and immovable.

[6] And if a case regarding the matter of a minor act of might is brought before the judicial seat of the county, then the noble will be fined 100 florins (one part to be paid to the judge, the other to the plaintiff), while his tenant peasants and servitors will be fined individually, each to the amount of their man-price (that is: 40 florins), to go to the plaintiff alone. For county judicial seats cannot impose a fine exceeding 100 florins in cases of violence and acts of might.

[7] If, on the other hand, he presents himself, answers the charges, and promises to administer law and justice in regard to his tenant peasants and non-noble servitors in respect of the charges and plaints of the plaintiff, then he will be required, at a date to be set by his justice ordinary, to administer law and justice, either in person or through his steward or bailiff, on the site of the property in question where the said peasants or non-noble servitors reside, in the presence of one or two noble magistrates (as mentioned before) of the county in which the property lies.

[8] If, on the other hand, he refuses and fails to pass judgment and administer justice by the date fixed by the judge, then for his failure to administer justice and for refusing the judge's instructions the same noble or other man of property will be condemned to pay three marks for each tenant peasant or non-noble servitor in whose regard he was called to administer justice, two thirds of which is to be paid to the judge and one third to the plaintiff, and then by another three marks each be compelled and forced to administer justice on the same charge at a date to be set again by the judge.

[9] And if he declines to administer justice and pass judgment for a second time, and neglects or disregards to administer it, then he will be condemned outright to the man-price of each individual. And from these man-prices the judge has to offer satisfaction to the plaintiff out of the goods and chattels of the noble or the man of property, if such can be found, or if not, from his property rights.

[10] And hold this to be true of the man-price only if the acts of violence for which the case was initiated represent a minor act of might. For if they involve a capital sentence then the punishment of all those who are put on trial should be condemned not in their man-price but to the loss of their head and the confiscation of all their goods, movable and immovable, in favor of the judge and the adversary party. And in addition, on the strength of the letters of adjudication, they may be seized at will by the adversary party and plaintiff holding the letters of adjudication and sentence wherever they may be found, whether on the property of their owners or on another's (in order to suffer their due punishment).

[11] If, however, such an administration of justice and judgment is properly carried out according to the promise of the lord and the order of the judge, and the tenant peasants or non-noble servitors are found guilty and culpable of the major act of might and condemned and convicted to capital punishment and the confiscation of their movable and immovable goods, then two thirds of such goods go to the lord as judge and one third to the plaintiff and adversary party. Moreover, the same lord is obliged to hand over and surrender the condemned and convicted men to the plaintiff for lawful punishment.

[12] Should the lord for any reason refuse or fail to do so, then the man-price of every single person has to be taken out and paid from his own wealth and goods.

[13] And this holds when those persons convicted and condemned in this way were with him and under his own power at the time for which he promised to administer justice and judgment.

[14] For should in the meantime any of the tenant peasants or non-noble servitors escape or evade the hand, jurisdiction, and power of their lord in whatever way, then that lord is in no way to be burdened with a fine.

[15] If, however, any one of them escapes or runs away without the permission of his lord, openly or secretly, after the promise but before the day and term of the administration of justice, then the same lord has the right to seize for himself all things and all goods, movable and immovable, which are and lie on his land.

[16] But from these—if the act of might was a major one—he is held to pay his man-price, that is ten marks making 40 gold florins, and also give a third of his movable goods to the adversary party, retaining for himself two parts of the movable goods. Nonetheless, he has to have the properties and immovable goods of the same tenant peasant or non-noble servitor estimated, and to hand over one third of the estimation and value of the properties to the plaintiff. The remaining two parts are to be taken and occupied by him.

[17] And, moreover, the adversary party has the full right to arrest such a fugitive wherever he can find him and to submit him to capital punishment according to his crime.

[18] If, however, the violent acts were minor ones, than only the man-price has to be paid to the plaintiff and satisfaction made for the damages caused by the tenant peasant or non-noble servitor from the goods of the same tenant peasant or non-noble servitor (provided that these damages were included in the plaint).

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN

How is the oath awarded to tenant peasants and non-noble servitors

Then, if a case is initiated regarding the presentation of tenant peasants and non-noble servitors in the royal court by summons, or at the judicial seat of the county ispán by citation, and it is remitted by the judge to the lord (in order to administer law and justice to the complainant and adversary) and the plaintiff presents at the time when justice is administered three letters of inquest against them, but they simply deny the charges brought against them, then every tenant peasant and non-noble servitor respondent brought to court is to be judged to swear an oath to clear himself together with 39 other peers, that is, peasants and non-nobles, but men of good reputation and honest condition, according to their man-price.

[1] Because any tenant peasant and man without property can recover by his own oath only one florin (of 100 pennies) and not more; thus he is not able to clear or condemn anyone above this sum.

[2] It is different in criminal cases, when the oath is sworn on the head of the evildoer, because then not the man-price but the guilt and the punishment of the crime should be considered.

[3] If, however, [the plaintiff] presents two letters of inquest, the oath sworn with 19 has to be awarded and imposed, and if only one, then with 9 peers, similarly peasants. This is to be held in cases against nobles and other men of property, because if justice is administered among peasants, then the way and order of the place or the home where the culprit lives should be observed.

[4] By letter of inquest always understand those which were issued in a place of authentication or before the justices ordinary of the realm at a general assembly of lords and nobles on the written royal mandate or written request of any of the same justices ordinary.

[5] Because simple letters of inquest issued at the lawful and urgent request of a litigant by the judicial seat of the county ispán are only partially valid and not in their entirety.

[6] However, it should be noted that if at the aforementioned time of the administration of justice the respondents deny the plaint and claim of the plaintiff and adversary against them and wish to prove by the testimony of neighbors or other admissible evidence that they are not guilty but innocent, and the plaintiff refuses to accept such testimony and demands from the judge justice and judgement simply and by short procedure on the strength of the presented letters of inquest, then the oath that should be adjudged and imposed on the basis of the letters of inquest have to be reduced and decreased by half, just as this custom is observed in the cases of nobles.

[7] According to common and general opinion, however, oaths should be ordered to be taken by as many tenant peasants and non-noble servitors as it is decreed for nobles and lords in the royal court or the judiciary seat of the county ispán.

[8] And if the nobleman takes an oath after a common inquest his serfs and servitors are also quit of the charges, and if he fails, they should also be held to have failed.

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT

How damages and debts have to be recovered from such peasants that have neither chattels nor properties

It should not be left unmentioned that if any litigant succeeds in having a peasant condemned and convicted to his man-price or the repayment of damages or debts and that convicted man has neither chattels nor properties sufficient to make satisfaction for these,³⁴⁴ then the lord is obliged to hand over and surrender the convicted peasant to his adversary. The plaintiff or adversary can keep him in his jail for fifteen days (unless the convicted man himself makes an arrangement with him); however, he must not physically harm the man during his captivity on pain of his man- price, but should supply him during that time with bread and water.

³⁴⁴ Due to the partible inheritance and other factors, the number of landless peasants (inquilini)—technically regarded as such if not owning at least a quarter of a plot—increased in the later Middle Ages; many of them lived on tenant peasants' plots and supplied the wage labor in times of seasonal employment. See István Szabó, "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén" [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], in Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1976) 167–200; see also Kubinyi, "Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen" as n 147, above.

[1] And if the peasant is unable to free himself during that time, the adversary is still not allowed to reduce him to servitude, but has to release him once he has received his sworn promise that for as long as the debt remains, he will every week faithfully hand over one third of whatever he is able to earn by work or begging.

[2] If he refuses to swear such an oath and take this burden on himself or perhaps, after having been released, cheats his adversary, then this adversary has full right to arrest and incarcerate that peasant wherever he can find him and keep him in his servitude until he has paid off this man- price or damage or debt, and have him complete involuntarily that what he had refused when he was at large and free.

[3] The same should also be understood in cases initiated and started between nobles in matters of debts and damages; namely, that the nobleman who is found not to have properties and movable goods for the satisfaction of debts incurred or damages caused, is to be arrested in his person and forced by the judge to give satisfaction in the way just mentioned for peasants, as I have briefly touched upon in the second part in regard to judgments.³⁴⁵

[4] The duplication of debts when the culprit misses the term of payment set by judge (which we read as being observed in olden times) should not nowadays be ordered.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

How the movable and immovable goods of peasants should be divided between sons and daughters

Then, if a peasant sires a boy while he also has an unmarried daughter, then both succeed equally in the paternal goods, both movable and immovable.

[1] If, however, the girl has been given in marriage with movable goods, it has to be considered whether these goods were ancestral or paternal. If ancestral, then no cheating is allowed in the marrying-off, and the girl has to receive an equal share. If, however, the goods were paternal, then the father can marry her off according to his estate and honor, and she will not have any further portion of them, but after the father's death they will devolve to the son, and after his death to the kinsmen and blood-relatives of the same branch.

[2] But if the father wishes to make a will about his part, he can do so but without defrauding the wife. Because the wife becomes always a co-owner and heir of all things that the husband acquires during their marriage, so that if the man dies intestate all things acquired by him, as mentioned above, will devolve on her.

[3] If, however, the father married another wife after the death of his first wife, then, if the son has divided the movable and immovable goods with his father, the second wife cannot take for herself any part of the son's portion nor can the sons born of the father's second wife interfere with it, but the son himself is allowed to dispose of it as he wishes.

³⁴⁵ See II. 68: 2–9.

CHAPTER THIRTY

How the goods of an intestate peasant devolve to the lord

Then, a peasant, who is a sole individual leaving no heir or lawful successor behind him, can freely make a will on his movable goods. His properties, however, if they are ancient, devolve fully on the lord.

[1] But if he acquired these himself, then they are to be divided in two parts, one of which goes to the lord and the other to whom he willed it.

[2] If, however, he died intestate, all of his goods, movable and immovable, devolve to the lord.

[3] From these he has to provide, before all else, for the funeral and burial of the dead man, then to satisfy all his creditors and pay off his debts, and finally keep the rest for himself.

[4] When, however, the peasant has left a lawful heir and this heir is a child who has not reached the age of twelve, then the father has the right to designate an heir not only for his own portion but also, whomever he wishes, as heir of the child in case he dies before his twelfth year of age, so that if the lawful heir should happen to die in the meantime, the substitute heir will inherit.

[5] But when the true heir reaches or passes the aforesaid age, this kind of substitution lapses and the right to keep and dispose of the entire inheritance passes to the heir.

[6] Nevertheless, just as the conditions of tenant peasants are diverse, so are the legal customs that have to be kept according to the ancient usage of the place.

[7] It should not, however, be understood by this that a property, left or sold by a peasant to someone, can be alienated from the lord by permanent right, because the peasant has no permanent rights in the lands of his lords beyond the wage and fruit of his labor, but the ownership of all land belongs and pertains to the lord.

[8] Thus, by such a will or sale a peasant can will or sell to anyone only the wage and fruit of his labor, that is, the fields, meadows, mills or vineyards at their proper estimation, saving that the perpetual ownership always remains with the lord, who, if he wishes, has the right to acquire for himself the lands, meadows, and mills for their common estimation and the vineyards at their proper value.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

That peasants themselves cannot sue nobles

It has to be noted furthermore that, because peasants are to such an extent subject to their present lords, they cannot themselves engage in lawsuits against nobles in any matter whatsoever.

[1] If, therefore, a peasant is unduly beaten or wounded or otherwise injured by a noble or violently damaged in his goods, and his lord sues that nobleman and has him convicted and found guilty, then that nobleman should be condemned for a minor act of might amounting to 100 florins, and additionally to the man-price of the wounded or beaten peasant, or to compensation and restoration of the damages done, according to the nature of the deed.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

How the county ispáns and privileged nobles ought to punish public criminals

It should also be known that all nobles, towns and villages who or which have no royal privilege issued to them for punishing and eliminating criminals and evil men, are held to hand over and deliver for punishment to the ispán, alispán and noble magistrates of that county in which they respectively reside or lie, all those thieves, despoilers and public criminals whom they have found and detained among them under the penalty of the man-price of the detained criminal. And they are not permitted to hold them for more than three days.

[1] For, if they keep them beyond the three days, they shall be duly convicted of three marks of heavy weight for each of the arrested men and for every day in favor of the said ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates because they dared to usurp their jurisdiction.

[2] Homicides and arsonists or rapists apprehended and arrested at the scene of the crime or in the territory of the town or estate where such a crime was committed can be chastised and punished according to their deserts even by non-privileged towns, villages and nobles, observing due course of law.

[3] But they have no right to release them, and if they do, they are to be convicted to the man-price of every released person in favor of the said ispáns, alispáns and noble magistrates.

[4] Similarly, those nobles and others who hold a privilege for this, can punish and, according to their crime, put to death all criminals apprehended and captured by them in their own territories, but can never release them, otherwise they are held to pay their man-price.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

How damages caused by cattle or beasts should be recovered

Then, if a noble or peasant drives off horses, cattle, sheep or pigs or other beasts and animals from cornfields or meadows or hayfields or oakwoods under prohibition because of damages done in them, in order to keep them for redemption and compensation, and the master of the animals, driven by stubbornness, is unwilling to redeem them, then the damaged party cannot keep these animals for more than three days.

[1] After these three days, he is held to hand them over and give them into the hands of the county's ispán or alispán or in their absence to one of the noble magistrates (to the one in whose circuit the territory of that damaged party is known to belong).

[2] For otherwise if after the three days he keeps the said animals with him, the person who drove off and kept them as pawns should be fined three marks of heavy weight for each of them, two of which are to be paid and given to the judge and one to the adversary.

[3] The damages caused have to be recompensed according to the scrupulous evaluation and estimation of the judge and sworn burghers of the place in the territory of which they were done.

[4] For the prohibition under specific and expressed fine, not to cause harm to cornfields or meadows or woodland refers only to the peasants of that place in the territory of which these fields, meadows and woodlands lie. Outsiders have to pay not the fine due to the prohibition, but the extent of the damages.

[5] If, however, a peasant secretly or openly, violently cuts or debarks trees of the woodland and can be caught there, he loses all the goods that he had with him and has moreover to be convicted to his man-price for the offense.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

Horses stolen and found in or outside the camp

Then, in the matter and case of such a horse that was taken away and removed from its owner secretly or otherwise and was found in the general levy called up for whatever reason, no judgment can and ought to be passed in favor of the plaintiff. The horse has to be estimated at its true value by trustworthy men selected and commissioned for this by the captain or commander of the army and be left, under sworn warranty, in the hands of him with whom it was found until the dismissal of the levy.

[1] And the captain or commander of the army has to set a certain term at which, after the dismissal of the same levy, both parties must appear in front of one of the judges ordinary chosen by him or the Master of the Royal Horse, in order to hear judgment in the case.

[2] If the defendant in the case of the stolen horse, cattle or other beast found outside the camp cannot produce clear evidence of the purchase of the same, the plaintiff has to swear an oath with two of his peers to recover it.

[3] But if that thief says that he has bought it at a free and public market or anywhere else but cannot present a warrantor (whom we call an expeditor), nor is he able to produce the seller or anyone else who would have drunk to and toasted the sale and purchase as is usual,³⁴⁶ he shall be consigned to the gallows.

³⁴⁶ On the ceremony of toasting a sale, see Christopher McNall, 'Litkup in the Rural Court Books of Old-Time Poland', Czasopismo Prawno-Historyczne, 49, 1-2, 1997, pp 11-25.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

The transfer of cases and letters of transfer

Finally, we have to know that all cases initiated at the judicial seat of episcopal vicars and county ispáns (except those trials at the county seats which are submitted to the personal oath of the plaintiff), are and have to be transmitted for more clear and mature deliberation to the royal court, that is to the justices ordinary of the realm.

[1] Those cases, which are opened in the court of the lords in matters of peasants and country folk (as mentioned before), should first be transferred to the presence of the ispán, alispán and noble magistrates at the request and appeal of that party that is unwilling to accept the judgment and only then, if perchance one of the parties should be still dissatisfied, to the said royal court.

[2] And the appealing party has to take out the letters of judgment and of transfer at the judicial seat of the county in these and any other such cases tried in these judicial courts at the first session after the final and decisive judgment, if that can be easily done, or otherwise at the second session that is held, and take the case at the term set for him by the judge to the royal court.

[3] For if he neglects to do this, the case becomes res judicata, and the letter of judgment has to be handed out to the winning and triumphant party and ordered to be executed at the third judicial session according to the judgment passed.

[4] And this holds when negligence was clearly committed not by the notary or the judge but by the appealing party.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

Formula of oath to be sworn by Jews against Christians

Then, although it is not my task to write anything about the Jews, since the Jews have diverse and different privileges, in many parts against salvation, or about their laws, and anyhow, it seems dangerous to judge usury, still, because it frequently happens that Jews are judged and required to swear and oath against Christians, I decided to append to the end of this little work the formula of the oath of the Jews.

[1] Where it is to be known that the Jew who wishes to take an oath has to turn to the sun, stand barefoot and wear a tunic or coat and Jewish hat; he has to touch and hold the book of laws (which is called the tables of Moses) and say this:

[2] “ I, N. Jew, swear by the living God, the holy God, the almighty God who created heaven and earth and sea and all that is in them that in this case with which this Christian charges me I am entirely innocent and not guilty. And if I am guilty, the earth should swallow me as it swallowed Dathan and Abiron. And if I am guilty I should be smitten with the paralysis and leprosy that smote Naaman the Syrian on the prayer of Elisha.³⁴⁷ And if I am guilty I should suffer falling sickness, sudden pox and flux of blood. And I should perish body and soul with all my things and never reach the bosom of Abraham. And if I am guilty, the law given to Moses on Mount Sinai should destroy me, and all the scripture that is written in the five books of Moses should smite me. And if this oath of mine is not true and just, Adonai and the power of his divinity should destroy me. Amen.”

³⁴⁷Cf. Numeri 16: 10-11 and 2 Kings 5: 1-4.

Conclusion

These are, most wise and supreme Prince, what I deemed fit to compose at your behest and under your auspices concerning the laws, institutions, and ancient customs of your renowned realm of Pannonia which you have governed most felicitously for so many years.

In this task I had to deal with many matters, namely, the decrees of your princely predecessors, from which you will find almost all this our work has been taken and, moreover, there are many countrymen of ours who require instruction by this work. In respect of the former I have often used the same terms here that I found the princes had themselves used; for it seemed to me pointless not to use the same words which had been frequently used in the decrees they had issued. Most wise prince! None of the authorities doubt that the Roman lawgivers out of respect for antiquity interwove in their laws almost the same words that were used by the decemvirs for their most ancient laws according to the custom of their times.

We know that even the most learned Latins often inserted foreign terms and even barbarian ones into their writings, such as mastruca in Cicero, which is a Sardinian³⁴⁸ and purely barbarian word, or gaza, a Persian one.³⁴⁹ You will find many words of this kind in Quintilian, where he discusses foreign words at great length.³⁵⁰

It is agreed that Virgil, by far the leading Latin poet, often included in his golden songs such ancient vernacular expressions as were used as everyday words by Livy, Quintus Ennius, Furius Bibaculus, Gnaeus Naevius, Varius, Marcus Actius, Pacuvius, Quintus Cornificius, Lucretius,³⁵¹ and others, but by his day, were so old that they had totally disappeared.

Favorinus, the philosopher, says: “Curius and Fabricius and Coruncanus, our most ancient ancestors, and even before them the three Horatii conversed clearly and simply with their ³⁴⁸ mastruca: Sardinian cloak of (sheep) skin, see: Cicero, Pro Scauro 45; Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 1.5.8.

³⁴⁹ gaza: royal treasure of Persia, see e.g.: Cicero, De officiis 2.76; Hrabanus Maurus, De rerum natura, 22.8; Thomas Aquinas, Catena aurea in Lucam 21.1.

³⁵⁰ Institutio oratoria 1.5.8.

³⁵¹ Roman authors, mostly representatives of the archaic Latin literature. – Livius Andronicus (ca. 285– 204 BC) – Ennius (239–169 BC) – Furius Bibaculus (1st century BC) – Naevius (ca. 269–204 BC) – Varius (ca. 71–14 BC) – Accius (2nd century BC) – Pacuvius (ca. 220–130 BC) – Cornificius (ca. 78–42 BC) – Lucretius (ca. 94–55 BC)

fellows, and used the words of their day and not those of the Auruncians or Sicanians or Pelasgians who are said to have been the first inhabitants of Italy.”³⁵² And I do not regret having done the same in the present work.

And I thought of our fellow Pannonians for whose use we have written all this. For our Pannonians are known to prefer handling arms and tools needed for sowing and reaping crops rather than the volumes of Cicero, Livy, Sallust, or Aulus Gellius. So wiser men must forgive me if I often use plain, almost homespun, words in talking to our Hungarians.

I was much moved by a remark of Palladius Rutilius in the first book of his work on agriculture that we should speak with ordinary and simple words to our people: “the first part of wisdom”, he says, “is to form an estimate of the person you are teaching. For the educator of husbandmen does not have to imitate the art and eloquence of rhetors, which is done by many, who, when speaking eruditely with peasants end up with their teaching not being understood by even the most erudite ones.”³⁵³ Besides, Lactantius has the following to say in the third book of his Divine Institutions: “God”, he says, “has willed this to be the nature of the case, that simple and undisguised truth should be more clear, because”, he says, “it has sufficient ornament of itself, and on this account it is corrupt when embellished with adornments from without, but that falsehood should please by means of a splendor not its own, because being corrupted of itself it vanishes and melts away, unless it is set off and polished with decoration taken from another source”.³⁵⁴ Cicero, who was of marvelous and supreme eloquence, writes in the first book On the Limits of Good and Evil: “If a philosopher”, he says, “displays eloquence, I would not scorn him; but if he lacks it I would not particularly demand it. For”, he says, “it is sufficient for a philosopher to express in words what he means and to say plainly what I should understand.”³⁵⁵ St Augustine oft repeated this saying: If the matter is clear, don’t insist on words.³⁵⁶

Furthermore, who would believe that barbarian nations—Persians, Egyptians, Arabs, Scythians, Parthians, Hyrcanians,³⁵⁷ and so on—made laws for themselves only in a way of speech which was clear and in common use among them?

The Greeks too, particularly those who undertook the task of explanation, are said to have largely thoroughly cherished everyday and ordinary language. Few read the teachings of Lycophron,³⁵⁸ because their meaning cannot be grasped by readers, and the writings of Heraclius of Ephesus are held to have been lost for the simple reason that the words he used ³⁵² Aulus Gellius (fl. 150 AD), Noctes Atticae 1.10.1.

³⁵³ Palladius Rutilius (4th centry AD), Opus agriculturae 1.1.

³⁵⁴ Lactantius, Divinae institutiones 3.1.

³⁵⁵ Cicero, De finibus bonorum et malorum 1.15.

³⁵⁶ Cf. e.g. De sententia Jacobi liber seu epistola CLXVII, Migne, PL 33:741.

³⁵⁷ Hyrcania: province of the ancient Persian empire beside the Caspian Sea. ³⁵⁸

Lycophron (3rd century BC): Greek poet and grammarian in Alexandria were excessively opaque, “darker than the darkness of the Cimmerians”³⁵⁹ as people put it. Hence it came about that he was called by posterity Scotinus, that is, The Obscure.³⁶⁰

I cannot applaud persons who interpret the law, or anything else, in writings that cannot be understood without the help of other commentators. Epicurus who was held to be the greatest of his contemporaries, used plain, unlearned prose in his works, as testified among many others by Cicero.³⁶¹

Among the later Platonists Plotinus is by far the greatest. He is said to have held elegance of style in such little esteem that he could not bear to look twice over something once he had written it, not even to read or glance through it again, and he paid not the slightest heed to spelling; his only concern was the meaning.³⁶² Some persons have even attributed such carelessness in composition to Aristotle, the philosopher.³⁶³

Additionally, the Divine Law uttered by the mouth of God to the Jews through Moses was written in such simple language that it seems the author had no concern for eloquence. Because if it is enjoined that something be observed by all, then it should be so handed down so that readers can easily understand what is enjoined. The gospels, too, and Christ’s most holy law, without which there is no salvation, are evidently written with no embroidered words.

Furthermore, it came to my mind that almost everything written in this three-part work was intended for the use of none other than our countrymen. So I feel I am not off the mark in using particular words in this work which spring rather from the soil of our Pannonia than Latium. For in such matters (as Aristotle himself testifies)³⁶⁴ one must speak as most do.

We only wanted to say this on account of those who despise everything that was not used either by Cicero or by some other distinguished writer. But in this work, as everything concerns the completion of justice’s purpose, and the principle of native laws and courts in it, we had to use simple and plain words intelligible and clear to any of our countrymen. The purpose was not to make a display of eloquence, of which in any case I have little, but to further the common weal, peace, and domestic tranquility.

I have taken great care to ensure that nothing I wrote down deviated or was foreign to the proven ways and customs and the text of royal constitutions of this renowned kingdom of yours, and that everything has credit and authority.

If, however, anything has been overlooked through lapse of memory or deficiency of ability, may your royal clemency find the grace to pardon it and ascribe it to nothing other than human frailty, which ensures that no endeavor is ever perfectly realized in all its details.

³⁵⁹ Cf. Ammianus Marcellinus, Res gestae 29.2.4.

³⁶⁰ Vitruvius, De architectura 2.2.1.

³⁶¹ Cicero, De finibus bonorum et malorum 1.13, 1.26.

³⁶² Porphyrius, Vita Plotinonis, c. 8. Circa princ.

³⁶³ The reference is too general to be traced to its source.

³⁶⁴ Aristotle, Topics 2.2.

For my part, as long as I live, I shall direct all my care, efforts, and thoughts to obey your majesty's every bidding and command, indeed every nod and wink. I believe that I have reached the summit of my desires if I feel that I have to some degree satisfied your majesty's.

Wherefore we, who desire to rule and govern the aforesaid kingdom of Hungary as well as our other dominions no less by laws and statutes as by peace and arms, having received this small book and having listened and graciously acceded to the pleas of the aforesaid lords prelate, barons, and nobles of our realm, inasmuch as we recognize that all the chapters contained in the same small book and the titles and articles written in it and included in our present letters of privilege, word for word without subtraction or addition, are just and honorable, and correctly touch upon and refer to the approved customs and laws of our aforesaid kingdom of Hungary and the parts and countries incorporated in and subject to it, and indeed comprehend them in plain words; therefore we have commended, accepted, ratified, and approved these, and confirmed their validity as perpetual laws, rights, and customs for the aforesaid lords prelate, barons, and all nobles and notables of our aforesaid kingdom of Hungary and all the parts, as aforementioned, subject to it, and of all their heirs and successors, by the plenitude of our royal power, and do indeed commend, accept, approve, ratify and confirm them, promising to observe them and have them observed in all its chapters, clauses, titles, and articles by the force of these presents.

In memory and perpetual confirmation of which we have deigned to grant these present letters of privilege, confirmed by the attachment of our privy seal used by us as king of Hungary. Given at Buda, at the feast of St Elizabeth the widow, on the thirty- third day of our aforesaid diet and general convention, in the year of our Lord 1514, the twenty-fifth year of our reign over Hungary etc., and the forty-fifth over Bohemia. In the time of the felicitous governance of their churches of the most reverend lords, the reverend fathers in Christ: Thomas of the title of St Martin in the Mountains, cardinal priest of the holy Roman Church, patriarch of Constantinople and legate a latere of the holy apostolic see, archbishop of Esztergom;³⁶⁵ and Gregory Frangepán, of the canonically united churches of Kalocsa and Bács;³⁶⁶ as well as the most illustrious and reverend bishops: Ippolito d'Este of Aragon, cardinal deacon of the holy Roman church, of Eger;³⁶⁷ John Erdódi elect of Zagreb;³⁶⁸ Francis Várdai of Transylvania;³⁶⁹ Francis Perényi, elect of Várad;³⁷⁰ George of Pécs, our secretary of the chancellery;³⁷¹ Peter Beriszló of ³⁶⁵ Thomas Bakócz (c. 1442–1521), bishop of Győr 1486–94, archbishop of Esztergom from 1497, cardinal from 1500, patriarch of Constantinople since 1507.

³⁶⁶ Gregory Frangepán/Frankapan (1481–1521), provost of Alba Julia from 1495, royal chancellor, bishop of Veszprém from 1500, archbishop of Kalocsa–Bács from 1513.

³⁶⁷ Ippolito d'Este (1479–1520), nephew of Queen Beatrix, archbishop of Esztergom 1485, cardinal 1493, bishop of Eger 1497 and of several Italian dioceses.

³⁶⁸ John Erdódi (1474–1519), bishop of Zagreb since 1511.

³⁶⁹ Francis Várdai (1474–1524), bishop of Vác 1509–1514, then until his death of Transylvania

³⁷⁰ Francis Perényi (1500–26), son of the palatine, bishop-elect of Várad (Oradea) 1513.

³⁷¹ George [Szatmári], bishop-elect of Pécs, privy chancellor, after 1521, archbishop of Esztergom.

Veszprém, our chief treasurer and ban of our kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, and Slavonia;³⁷² John Gosztony of Győr;³⁷³ Ladislás Zálkán of Vác;³⁷⁴ Francis Csaholyi, of Csanád;³⁷⁵ Stephen Podmanyni, of Nitra;³⁷⁶ John Gúti Ország, elect of Srem,³⁷⁷ and Michael Gibárti Keserű, elect of Bosnia;³⁷⁸ and Briccius Egervári of Knin.³⁷⁹

Likewise when the following high and most regarded³⁸⁰ men held the offices of ispán and honors in our kingdom: Emeric Perényi, perpetual ispán of the county of Abaújvár, palatine of our aforesaid kingdom of Hungary and judge of our Cumans;³⁸¹ comes Peter, count of Szentgyörgy and Bazin, judge of our court;³⁸² John Szapolyai perpetual ispán of the land of Spiš, our voivode of Transylvania, and ispán of our Székely as well as our captain-general;³⁸³ the same John Szapolyai and Barnabas Bélai³⁸⁴ being bans of Severin; Stephen Bátori ispán of Timiș, and captain-general of the lower parts of our kingdom;³⁸⁵ Blaise Ráskai master of our royal treasury;³⁸⁶ Moses Buzlai of Gergely-laka, master of the doorkeepers;³⁸⁷ John Drágfi of Béltek, master of the stewards;³⁸⁸ John Bánfi of Lindva, master of the cupbearers;³⁸⁹ George [from] the aforementioned Bátori [family], master of the horse;³⁹⁰ Michael Pálóci, master of ³⁷² Peter Beriszló/Berislavić (1475–1520), royal secretary from 1504, royal treasurer from 1512, bishop of Veszprém from 1512, ban from 1514.

³⁷³ John Gosztonyi (d. 1527), bishop of Vác 1506, of Győr 1509, returned to studies in Paris in 1514.

³⁷⁴ Ladislás Szalkai, bishop of Vác 1513–22, later archbishop of Esztergom (1524–26).

³⁷⁵ Francis Csaholyi, bishop of Csanád (Cenad), 1514–1526.

³⁷⁶ Stephen Podmaniczky (b. before 1480–1530), bishop of Nitra/Nyitra since 1512

³⁷⁷ John Guti Ország (1487–1536), bishop of Srem 1505–22, later of Vác.

³⁷⁸ Michael Gibárti Keserű, bishop of Bosnia 1509–19.

³⁷⁹ Briccius Egervári. (b. 1473), bishop of Knin 1492–1523.

³⁸⁰ Spectabilis and magnificus were the official predicates of barons and high officers.

³⁸¹ Emeric (Imre) Perényi (d. 1519), was count palatine since 1504.

³⁸² Peter Szentgyörgyi (d. 1517), judge royal since 1500.

³⁸³ John Szapolyai/Zápolya (1487–1540), voivode of Transylvania from 1511; became king of Hungary 1526–40.

³⁸⁴ Barnabas Bélai, since 1505 ban of Severin.

³⁸⁵ Stephen Bátori (of Ecsed) (d. 1530), tutor of Louis II, 1510 castellan of Buda, 1511 also ispán of Timiș, became palatine in 1519.

³⁸⁶ Blaise Ráskai (d. 1518), master of the treasury 1503–1516.

³⁸⁷ Moses Gergelylakai Buzlai (fl. 1476–1519), master of the doorkeepers (Hofmeister) 1511–1519; judge royal 1517–1524.

³⁸⁸ John Bélteki Drágfi (d. 1526), master of the stewards since 1508, later became master of the treasury and judge royal.

³⁸⁹ John Lendvai Bánfi (fl. 1498–1534), chamberlain 1513; master of the cupbearers 1514–1525

³⁹⁰ George Bátori (fl. 1490–1526), master of the horse since 1507.

our royal chamberlains;³⁹¹ John Bornemissza of Berzence, ispán of Pozsony,³⁹² and numerous others.³⁹³

³⁹¹ Michael Pálóci, (fl. 1491–1517), master of the chamberlains 1510–1517.

³⁹² John Berzencei Bornemissza (d. 1527), tutor of Louis II, 1506 castellan of Buda, 1514–26 ispán of Pozsony.

³⁹³ These kinds of lists of dignitaries (not witnesses!) were characteristic of the eschatocols of major royal privileges from the thirteenth century

APPENDIX³⁹⁴

*The Verses of Doctor Hieronymus Balbus,*³⁹⁵
Prior of Pozsony and Secretary of His Royal Majesty¹

The most renowned Hungarian folk, which came from Scythian soil, Then did only love bloody Mars's own toil.

Glorious in war truly; enriched with victories, But knowing so little of the laws of peace.

In Hungary's courts, no codes resounded,
And written law's rules were quite unfounded.

Justice uncertain; the suit in doubt;

Unheard the plea, though loud the shout. The son robbed, O shame, of his father's land,

His fortune stolen by another man's hand; In cases the same, the verdict not;

Be victor now, next day in the dock.

But Stephen, exceeding his forbears in praise,
Gives generously here some strength for our days.

Wild Pannonia's laws he has put down in writing, Adding law, the sacred, to the business of fighting.

The three parts of his book tell our kingdom's decrees, Show tribunals uncertain the law to be seized.

Customs they teach, ones almost eternal, Scythian ones, equal to imperial.

And what many volumes might have filled, He has in a few pages here distilled.

Procedures are clear; titles are known;

In solving disputes the way is full shown.

Each knowing his own, doing others no wrong, The weak must no longer submit to the strong.

Seeking full justice in the good law's repose,

³⁹⁴ Printed in the 1517 edition.

³⁹⁵ Gerolomo Balbo (c.1450–c. 1535), humanist, poet, diplomat, finally bishop of Gürk, was a friend of Werbóczy, whom he had accompanied on his missions to the Worms and Nürnberg imperial diets in 1522 and 1524.

So Irus, like Croesus, to court samewise goes. You have added so much to our people's praise,

Your fame will resound till the end of the days.

As the Cretans hailed Minos, and the Greeks Phoroneus, As temples were built to the Spartan Lycurgus,

As Solon was feasted by the Athens he taught,

To your ears will the praise of Pannonia be brought.

For greater is he who arms walls with the law,

Than he who knows naught but the splendor of war.

Let arms be silent! Let justice soar!

And prove how much lesser the fell deeds of war.

Epigram of Benedict Békényi³⁹⁶ to his lord

Pursuers of passion, or of self-love and fame Don't put their minds to any great strain.

Thrice happy were you during all those days

When you did faithfully study your own people's ways.

To Inachos's folk Lycurgus gave laws and ease

And the Sicilians were nurtured by the sweet Ceres. You've discernfully gathered such rules as are known

And the laws of our homeland to us you have shown.

Epigram of the Same on a Busybody and Zoilus³⁹⁷

If your soul's eaten up by envious resent

And with what you've been given you're still not content.

Then you must have been sired by a frightful old rock, Or else you belong to some more horrid stock.

Zoilus! Stop your tongue's bilious twitching!

³⁹⁶ Benedict Békényi studied in Vienna and later served in the chancellery; in his 1514 edition of the poems of Janus Pannonius, Békényi also addressed a dedication to Werbőczy.

³⁹⁷ A pettifogging critic of Homer.

Or else of the pox you'll soon be the victim.

With your funeral done, dark Pluto's halls will allow Torments as many as leaves on a bough.

Glossary and Select Subject Index

(compiled and updated by Zsolt Hunyadi)

Abbreviations

1222 = the Golden Bull of Andrew II

1404/I = 6 April 1404

1404/II = 21 December 1404

1405/I = 15 April 1405

1405/II = 31 August 1405

1435/I = 8 March 1435

1435/II = 12 March 1435

C 1440 = Compilatio ante 1440

1458Sz = the decree of governor Szilágyi in 1458

1492 Slav = the articles on Slavonia

1518B = the dietal decision of Bács

1518T = the dietal decision of Tolna

CC = charter on the Cameral Contract of 1342

Col = the law of Coloman

ColIud = Coloman's law on the Jews

La2 and La3 = the two laws of St Ladislas

Praef = Praefatio to the Tripartitum.

Prop 1417 = Propositions of 1417

Prop1432/3 = Propositions of ca. 1432/3

SStr = the canons of the Synod of Esztergom (Strigoniae)

St1 and St2 = the two books of the Laws of St Stephen

SSz = the canons of the Synod of Szabolcs (Ladislas 1)

W. = Werbőczy

Trip. = Werbőczy's Tripartitum (the Roman numerals refer to the Parts, the subsequent Arabic ones to articuli, sometimes with paragraph numbers after the colon)

Decreta and dietal decisions not listed above are referred to by year (if necessary also month) of issue.

References

Bak 1973 = Bak, János. Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14–16. Jahrhundert. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973.

Bak 2005 = Bak, János M. "Servitude in the medieval kingdom of Hungary (a sketchy outline)." in Forms of servitude in Northern and Central Europe: decline, resistance, and expansion, ed. Paul H. Freedman and Monique Bourin, Turnhout: Brepols, 2005, 387–400.

- Bak 2011 = Bak, János M. “Feudalism in Hungary?” in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. Turnhout: Brepols, 2011, 203–17.
- Bak–Pálffy (forthc.) = János M. Bak and Géza Pálffy, Crown and coronation in Hungary 1000–1916. Budapest: MNM and BTK, forthc.
- Banyó 2000 = Banyó, Péter. “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92.
- Berend 2001 = Berend, Nóra. At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and “Pagans” in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Bertényi 1970 = Bertényi, Iván, “Die städtischen Bürger und das Gericht der königlichen Anwesenheit im 14. Jahrhundert.” AUSBp, Sect. hist. 11 (1970): 3–31.
- Bertényi 1976 = Bertényi, Iván. Az országbírói intézmény története a XIV. században. [A history of the office of the judge royal in the fourteenth century] Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1976.
- Bogdán 1978 = Bogdán, István. Magyarországi hossz- és földmértékek a XVI. század végéig. [Measures of length and land in Hungary before the end of the sixteenth century]. Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978.
- Bolla 1981 = Bolla, Ilona, Pál Horváth, “La rôle de la liberté commune dans la développement de la société hongroise médiévale, Annales Universitatis Budapestiensis, Sectio iuridica 23 (1981), 9–25.
- Bónis 1947/2003 = Bónis, György. Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban. [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law]. Kolozsvár: Nagyenyedi Bethlen-Nyomda, [1947] (reprint 2003).
- Bónis 1965 = Bónis, György. “The Hungarian feudal diet: 13th–18th centuries.” Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l’histoire comparative des institutions 25 (1965): 287–307.
- Bónis 1977 = Bónis, György. “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary,” East Central Europe/l’Europe de centre-est 4:2 (1977): 181–191.
- Borsa 1993 = Borsa, Iván. “Írattípusok a középkori Magyarországon.” [Types of documents in medieval Hungary] Levéltári közlemények 64 (1993): 27–37.
- Csizmadia 1975 = Csizmadia, Andor. “La ‘Decima’ en Transylvanie.” Analecta Cracoviensia 7 (1975): 245–264.
- Degré 1977 = Degré, Alajos. A magyar gyámsági jog kialakulása a dualizmus korának gyámsági kódexéig. [Development of the Hungarian right of tutelage until the Code of Tutelage of the age of the dual monarchy]. Budapest: ELTE Magyar Jogtörténeti Tanszék, 1977.
- Eckhart 1913/15 = Eckhart, Ferenc. “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555.
- Engel 1996 = Engel, Pál. “Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom.” Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.
- Engel 1997 = Engel, Pál. “Nagy Lajos ismeretlen adományreformja.” [An unknown reform of donation by Louis the Great] Történelmi Szemle 39 (1997): 137–157.

- Engel 1999 = Engel, Pál. “Erbteilung und Familienbildung.” in ... The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandered Full Many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, ed. Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők, Budapest: CEU Press, 1999, 411–421.
- Engel 2001 = Engel, Pál. Realm of St. Stephen. A history of medieval Hungary 895–1526. London–New York: I.B. Tauris, 2001.
- Font–Fedeles–Kiss 2007 = Font, Márta, Tamás Fedeles, Gergely Kiss. Magyarország kormányzati rendszere (1000–1526) [The governmental system of Hungary (1000–1526)]. Pécs: n.p., 2007.
- Fügedi 1972 = Fügedi, Erik, “Die Ausbreitung der städtischen Lebensform: Ungarns oppida im 14. Jahrhundert,” in W. Rausch, ed. Stadt and Stadtherr im 14. Jh. Linz: Wimmer, 1972, 165–192.
- Fügedi 1982 = Fügedi, Erik. “Medieval Hungarian Castles in Existence at the Start of the Ottoman Advance.” in From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: war and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary, ed. János Bak and Béla Király, Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982, 59–62.
- Fügedi 1984/86 = Fügedi, Erik. “Verba volant... Oral Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility.” in Erik Fügedi. Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary, ch. VI. London: Variorum, 1986.
- Fügedi 1986 = Fügedi, Erik. Castle and society in medieval Hungary (1000–1437). tr. János M. Bak, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1986.
- Fügedi 1998 = Fügedi, Erik. The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. Budapest: CEU Press, 1998.
- Fügedi 1975/86 = Fügedi, Erik. “Das mittelalterliche Königreich Ungarn als Gastland.” in Die deutsche Ostsiedlung des Mittelalters als Problem der europäischen Geschichte, ed. Walter Schlesinger, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1975, 471–507. (reprint in Fügedi 1986, ch. VI.)
- Gerics 1976 = Gerics, József. “Über das Rechtsleben Ungarns um die Wende des 13.–14. Jahrhunderts.” Annales universitatis scientiarum Budapestinensis, Sectio Historica 17 (1976): 45–80.
- Göckenjan 1972 = Göckenjan, Hans-Gerd. Hilfsvölker und Grenzwächter im mittelalterlichen Ungarn. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1972.
- Gönczi 1997 = Gönczi, Katalin. Ungarisches Stadtrecht aus europäischer Sicht. Die Stadtrechtsentwicklung im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn am Beispiel Ofen. Frankfurt am Main: Klostermann, 1997.
- Györffy 1975 = Györffy, György. “Civitas, castrum, castellum,” Acta Antiqua Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 23 (1975), 331–334.
- Györffy 1975 = Györffy, György. “Die Entstehung der ungarischen Burgorganisation” Acta Archaeologica Acad. Scientiarum Hungariae, 28 (1976), 323–358.
- Györffy 1983 = Györffy, György. Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft der Ungarn um die Jahrtausendwende, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1983.
- Hermann Róbert, ed. Illustrated Military History of Hungary. Budapest: Zrínyi Média, 2012, 13–62.
- Holub 1917 = Holub, József. “A főispán és alispán jogi viszonyának jogi természete.” [The legal nature of the relationship of the ispán and alispán] in Emlékkönyv Fejérpataky László életének hatvanadik, történetírói működésének negyvenedik, szemináriumi vezetőtanárságának harmincadik évfordulója ünnepére. Budapest: Franklin, 1917, 186–211.

Holub 1922 = Holub, József “Le rôle de l’âge dans la droit hongroise du moyen âge.” Revue d’histoire de droit française et étrangère 1 (1922): 78–140.

Holub 1935 = Holub, József, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria Aldo Albertoni. Padova: Milani, 1935, 3: 275–97.

Hóman 1916 = Hóman, Bálint. Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325. [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1916.

Hóman 1922 = Hóman, Bálint. “La circolazione delle monete d'oro in Ungheria dal X als XIV secolo e la crisi europea dell'oro nel secolo XIV.” Rivista Italiana di Numismatica 35 (1922): 109–56.

Hunyadi 2003 = Hunyadi, Zsolt. “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Rady 2003, 25–35.

Jakubovich 1933 = Jakubovich, Emil. “I. Endre törvénybeidéző ércbilloga” [The metal summoning bull of Andrew I]. Turul, 47 (1933): 68–78.

Karácsonyi 1891 = Karácsonyi, János. “Egy katonai becsületbírótság 1515–1516-ból.” [A military court of honour in 1515–1516] Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 16 (1891): 482–488.

Karbić 1998 = Karbić, Marija. “Inheritance and Family in the nobilis communitas Campi Zagrabiensis.” in Paper presented as part of the workshop of the “Nobility in Medieval Central Europe” Research Project, Central European University, Budapest, 6–8 November 1998.

Klaić 1904 = Klaić, V. “Marturina. Slavonska daca u srednjem vijeku” [The mardurina: A Slavonian tax of the Middle Ages]. Rad Jugoslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti, 157 (1904): 114–123.

KMTL 1994 = Kristó, Gyula, Pál Engel, Ferenc Makk, ed. Korai Magyar Történelmi Lexikon, 9–14. század. [Encyclopedia of Early Hungarian History, 9th–14th centuries] Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1994.

Kristó 1979 = Kristó, Gyula. A feudális széttagolódás Magyarországon. [The feudal division of Hungary] Budapest: Akadémia Kiadó, 1979.

Kubinyi 1972 = Kubinyi, András. “Der ungarische König und seine Städte im 14. und Beginn des 15. Jahrhunderts.” in Stadt und Stadtherr im 14. Jahrhundert. Entwicklungen und Funktion, ed. Wilhelm Rausch, Linz: Österreich. Arbeitskreis für Stadtgeschichts-forschung, 1972, 193–220.

Kubinyi 1987 = Kubinyi, András, “Wüstungen, Zersplitterung der Bauernhufen and Wirtschaft in den Besitzungen der Magnatenfamilie Garai in Ungarn” in Festschrift Othmar Pickl. Graz-Vienna: Leykan, 1987, 367–77.

Kubinyi 1991 = Kubinyi, András. “Nagybirtok és főúri rezidencia Magyarországon a XV. század közepétől Mohácsig.” [Large estate and baronial residence in Hungary from the mid-fifteen century to Mohács] A Tapolcai Városi Múzeum Közleményei 2 (1991): 211–228.

Kubinyi 2000 = Kubinyi, András, “Politika és honvédelem a Jagellók Magyarországon.” [Politics and border defence in Jagello Hungary] Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 113 (2000): 397–413.

Kubinyi 2008 = Kubinyi, András. Matthias Rex. Budapest: Balassi, 2008.

- Kubinyi 2011 = Kubinyi, András “Beisitzer im königlichen Rat aus dem mittleren Adel in der Jagellonenzeit,” in: Idem, Stände und Ständestaat im spätmittelalterlichenn Ungarn, transl. T. Schäfer. Herne: Schäfer, 2011, 233–52.
- Ladányi 1977 = Ladányi, Erzsébet, Libera villa, civitas, oppidum. Terminologische Fragen der ungarischen Städteentwicklung. AUSBp: Sect. hist., 18 (1977): 6–14.
- Laszlovszky 1999 = Laszlovszky, József. “Field systems in Medieval Hungary.” in ...The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandered Full Many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, ed. Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebök, Budapest: CEU Press, 1999, 423–444.
- Laszlovszky–Szabó 2003 = Laszlovszky, József, Péter Szabó, ed. People and Nature in Historical perspective. CEU Medievalia 6. Budapest: CEU Press–Archaeolingua, 2003.
- Laszlovszky 2018 = Laszlovszky, József et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary. Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018.
- Maksay 1978 = Maksay, Ferenc. “Das Agrarsiedlungssystem des mittelalterlichen Ungarns.” Acta Historica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 24 (1978): 83–108.
- Mályusz 1953 = Mályusz, Elemér. “Az egyházi tized-kizsákmányolás.” [Church tithe-exploitation] in Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez Magyarországon a 14. században, ed. György Székely, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1953, 320–333.
- Mályusz 1994 = Mályusz, Elemér. “Hungarian Nobles in Medieval Transylvania.” in Kinship, Property and Privilege, History and Society in Central Europe II., ed. János M. Bak = Medium Aevum Quotidianum 29 (1994): 25–54.
- Neumann 2003 = Neumann, Tibor. “Telekpusztásodás a késő középkori Magyarországon.” [Land desertion in late medieval Hungary] Századok 137 (2003): 849–884.
- Nógrády 2009 = Nógrády, Árpád, “Mennyit ér a kegyelemlevél?” [What is the value of the letter of pardon?] in Honoris causa. Tanulmányok Engel Pál tiszteletére, ed. Tibor Neumann and György Rácz, Budapest–Piliscsaba: MTA TTI–PPKE BTK, 2009, 235–249.
- Pach 1966 = Pach, Zsigmond P. “The Development of Feudal Rent in Hungary in the Fifteenth Century.” Economic History Review, 2nd ser. 19:1 (1966): 1–14.
- Pálffy 2000 = Pálffy, Géza. “The Origins and Development of the Border Defence System Against the Ottoman Empire in Hungary (Up to the Early Eighteenth Century).” in Ottomans, Hungarians, and Habsburgs in Central Europe: The Military Confines in the Era of Ottoman Conquest, ed. Géza Dávid and Pál Fodor, Leiden: Brill, 2000, 3–69.
- Pálóczi-Horváth 1989 = Pálóczi-Horváth, András. Pechenegs, Cumans, Iasians: Steppe people in medieval Hungary. Hereditas. Budapest: Kultúra, 1989.
- Péter 2003 = Péter, László. “The Holy Crown of Hungary, Visible and Invisible.” Slavonic and East European Review 81 (2003): 448–480.
- Rady 1992 = Rady, Martyn. “Voivode and Regnum: Transylvania’s Place in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary.” In: László Péter, ed. Historians and the History of Transylvania. Boulder, Col. and New York NY: East European Monographs, 1992, 97–101.
- Rady 2000 = Rady, Martyn. Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000.
- Rady 2001 = Rady, Martyn. “The ‘Title of New Donation’ in Medieval Hungarian Law.” Slavonic and East European Review 79:4 (2001): 638–652.

- Rady 2002 = Rady, Martyn. “Warranty and Surety in Medieval Hungarian Land Law,” Journal of Legal History 23 (2002): 23–36.
- Rady 2003 = Rady, Martyn, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003.
- Rady 2003a = Rady, Martyn. “Hungarian Procedural law and Part Two of the ‘Tripartitum’.” in Rady 2003, 47–70.
- Rady 2015 = Rady, Martyn, Customary Law in Hungary: Courts, Texts and the Tripartitum. Oxford: OUP 2015.
- Solymosi 1998 = Solymosi, László. A földesúri járadékok új rendszere a 13. századi Magyarországon. [The new system of seigniorial rights in thirteenth-century Hungary] Budapest: Argumentum, 1998.
- Szabó 1960 = Szabó, István. “La répartition de la population de Hongrie entre les bourgades et les villages dans les années 1449–1526.” in Études historiques, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1960, 359–385.
- Szabó 1963 = Szabó, István. “The praedium: Studies on the economic history and history of settlement in early Hungary.” Agrártörténeti Szemle 5 (1963): Suppl. 1–24.
- Szabó 1969 = Szabó, István. A középkori magyar falu. [The village in medieval Hungary]. Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1969.
- Szabó 2005 = Szabó, Péter. Woodland and Forests in Medieval Hungary. British Archaeological Reports 1348. Oxford: Archaeopress, 2005.
- Szakály 1982 = Szakály, Ferenc. “The Hungarian-Croatian border defense system and its collapse,” in From Hunyadi to Rakóczi: war and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary, ed. János Bak and Béla Király, Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982, 159–178.
- Szentirmai 1957 = Szentirmai, Alexander. “Das Recht des Erzdechanten [Archidiakon] in Ungarn während des Mittelalters.” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte: Kanonistische Abteilung 43 (1957): 132–201.
- Szentirmai 1956 = Szentirmai, Alexander. “Der Ursprung des Archidiakonats in Ungarn.” Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht 7 (1956): 231–244.
- Thallóczy Lajos A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary]. Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879.
- Tringli 2009 = Tringli, István. “Megyék a középkori Magyarországon.” [Counties in medieval Hungary] in Honoris causa. Tanulmányok Engel Pál tiszteletére, ed. Tibor Neumann and György Rácz, Budapest–Piliscsaba: MTA TTI–PPKE BTK, 2009, 487–518.
- Tringli 2013 = Tringli, István, “Le contee in Ungheria nel periodo degli Angiò”. In: L’Ungheria angioina. A cura di Enikő Csukovits. Bibliotheca Academiae Hungariae – Roma, Studia 3. Rome: Viella, 2013, 139–178.
- Veszprémy 2009 = Veszprémy, László. “The state and military affairs in east-central Europe, 1380–c. 1520.” In: F. Tallett and D. J. B. Trim, eds. European Warfare, 1350–1750. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009, 96–109.
- Virágos 2002 = Virágos, Gábor. Noble Residences and Their Social Context in Hungary in the Thirteenth through the Sixteenth Centuries. PhD Diss., Central European University, 2002.

Zajtay 1954 = Zajtay, Imre. “Le register de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XIIIe siècle.”
Revue d’histoire de droit 4/32 (1954): 527–562.

Zsoldos 1999 = Zsoldos, Attila. A szent király szabadjai – Fejezetek a várjobbágyok történetéből.
[The freemen of the Holy King – Chapters from the history of the castle warriors] Budapest:
MTA TTI, 1999.

Zsoldos 2003 = Zsoldos, Attila. “Az özvegy és a szolgabírák.” [The widow and the noble magistrates] Századok 137 (2003): 783–808.

abutter (commetaneus): the owner of a piece of land adjacent to another person's property; referred to usually in the context of the perambulation of boundaries (q.v.) or other matters concerning contested property rights. The testimony of abutters was given special credence at common inquests (q.v.) or at the rectification of boundaries (v. boundary). C 1440:10; 1435/I:3; 1435/I:9; 1439:29; 1447:13; 1458/I:1,16; 1464:20; 1486:77; 1500:19; 1523:50; Trip. I 30:3, 60:9–10, 86:1,3; II 24:6, 27:1, 29, 32:1, 41:2–4, 56:1, 63:1–2, 64:3–4, 74, 74:3,8,10–11, 82.

act of might (potentia, factum/actum potentiae; (in the first part translated as “violent trespass”): a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (sc. rape). Lesser violent acts were classified as “minor,” but no decree, nor W. specified the precise nature of these crimes. See Gerics (1976), 61, 76. C 1440: 1,3–5,20; 1405/II:1–5,7; 1427(a):2; 1435/I:3–4,6,11; 1435/II:8; 1439:3,24,29–31; 1443:2; 1444:9–10,20,23,25,30; 1445:3,7,11,20,23; 1447:3,9,40; 1454:8,15; 1492:17,22,24,62; 1495:1,9; 1498:8,26,38; 1500:2,14; 1504:1; 1514:26–27,31,69; 1518T:19; 1521:55; 1523:48; 1526:20; Trip. I 12:1, 33:3, 46:5, 78, 78:3,5, 129:1, 132:1; II 18:6, 19:1, 21:3, 23, 25:1, 26, 27:1, 34, 39:2, 46–47, 49, 50:3, 51, 54:5, 61, 65, 67, 68:2, 71:6, 82:6–20; III 3:7,15, 5:2, 7:1, 19:1,3,5,7, 26:5–18, 31:1.

minor: 1492:55; 1504:5; 1514:51; 1523:57; Trip. II 54:5, 67, 68:2; III 3:7, 7:1, 19:3, 26:6, 10; III 31:1.

major: 1514:52; 1523:4; Trip. II 42:5, 54:4–5, 61, 65, 67:9; III 19:5, 26:5,11,16.

adoption (adoptio): one of the ways whereby a nobleman without heirs might prevent his property escheating to the crown by reason of default of issue (q.v.), i.e. by adopting another noble as his son. It required royal consent. Trip. I 8, 27:4, 49:1–2, 57:2, 63:4, 66, 67:2.

fraternal adoption (called contractus by W.): fraternal adoption was often used as part of a mutual inheritance pact between families, by the terms of which the one would succeed to the other's property in the event of default of issue (q.v.). Pacts of this sort also required royal consent. See Rady (2015) 35, 90. 1498:65; Trip. I 27:4, 49:2, 57:2, 63:4, 66, 67:2, 120:1, 131:5; II 71:4–6.

admonitio: see notice

age (aetas): no reference to age appears in the earlier laws lawful (legitima aetas): for children (minors), which meant only partial legal capacity, was 12 years in respect of females and 14 for males. Trip. I 51:5, 91, 111, 115, 117, 124, 126:1, II 50:3.

non-lawful (illegitima aetas) (still minors) Trip. I 51, 91, 111, 113, 124.

full (perfecta aetas): sons and daughters reached full legal capacity by their full age, at 24 and 16 respectively. Trip. I 55, 117, 122:8, II 50:5. See Holub (1922), 78–140.

agnates Hungarian inheritance law tended towards agnatic rather than cognatic succession; the Roman law terms, however, occur only infrequently in medieval legal texts in Hungary, see for instance Trip. I 114, 116:1,3, 117–118, 119:2,4, 121, 124:4 (see also: guardianship). C agreement, peace (concordia): the right of litigating parties to settle their differences “out of court” even after sentence had been passed.

1440:8; 1435/I:4; 1439:30; 1486:5,55; 1492:68,74; 1495:13; 1500:15:5; Trip. I 16:5–6, 28, 59:6, 60:3,7, 62:2, 86:3, 127:2; II 55:4, 57:4,7, 68:6–7, 85; III 4:5, 28.

alispán (vicecomes): in the earlier Middle Ages the deputy of the county’s ispán (q.v.) was also castellan of the castle in the center of the county, hence called comes curialis; by the late thirteenth century, he was usually a noble retainer (q.v.) of the ispán and the actual administrator of the county. During the fourteenth century, when several counties were granted as honors (q.v.), the alispán, joined by the noble magistrates (q.v.), handled the financial and military matters of the county and chaired the county court (q.v.). In the late Middle Ages the laws usually refer to ispán and/or alispán together. From the early sixteenth century, the alispán was usually elected by the noble community of the county. See Holub (1917) and Rady (2000), 114–115, Tringli (2013). 1290:3, 1300:1–2; 1405/II:10,15; 1411:4,6; 1421; 1435/I:2,7,13; 1435/II:7; 1447:19–20,24; 1454:15; 1486:67; 1492:53,73,75,80,94:3; 1495:10,12,15–21,24,27; 1498:35,60,71; 1500:21:2,40,42; 1504:2,9,16,18; 1514:4;6–8,11,26–29,31,33,37–39,41,45–46,49–51,60–61; 1518B:10,28; 1518T:15–16; 1521:21–22; 1523:7; 9–10; Trip. I 54, 115:4, II 28:1.

ancilla: see bondwoman

appeal (appellatio): a procedure underdeveloped (from a strictly legal point of view) in Hungarian law and largely confined to urban jurisdictions and lower seigniorial jurisdiction. (5 III 35.) Instead of appealing, unsuccessful litigants could petition the king for a new trial, (q. v.) or force the case to be re-opened by a repulsio (q.v.), prohibition (q.v.), or other legal remedy. Since the major courts were royal courts, there was no room for appeal. 1 St2:9; 1279:7 1405/II:11; 1443:9, 1486:53–54, 1492:72–73, 1498:71; 1500:6; 1504:7 Trip. III 4:5, 7:1–2, 10:1, 11:2–8, 35. Reference to appeal appears in regard to ecclesiastical jurisdiction prohibiting litigation in the papal court except by appeal, see e.g. SStr:24; 1440:4; 1447:33; 1471:19; 1481:17; 1492:45; 1495:10; 1498:63.

appurtenances (pertinentiae): while donations of property rights (q.v.) mainly refer to tenant plots (q.v.) or whole villages (q.v.) and their arable land, they usually imply additional lands, such as meadows, hayfields, woodlands, etc. (frequently used as commons) and valuable immovable property, such as waterways, fishing places, mills and so on. From the mid-fourteenth century, the appurtenances of an estate were usually listed and sometimes identified in some detail. On the different types and terminology of land use, especially of woodlands, see Szabó (2005). 1279:2, 1435:19, 1486:15; 1492:56, Trip. I 24:8–9, 76:1, 83:3, 89, 93:5, 134:2; II 14:30, 32, 42:5, 67:9, 76:3–4; III 16.

aratrum (= plough): usually referring not to the tool but to the size of land that – customarily – could be cultivated by one plough team. It has been estimated at very different sizes from 50 to 150 ha; the best argued being ca. 126 hectares, containing 150 jugera (Hung. hold, a measure of Roman origin but in the Middle Ages of very varied size; a “royal hold” was ca. 0.84 ha). See Bogdán (1978), 15–64, 190. Col:26; 1290:14; SStr: 35; C 1440:11; 1492:49; Trip. I 133:24–33 (aratrum regalis).

arbitration: many cases even though initiated in court were settled by arbitration. It was usual for parties going to arbitration to deposit a cash sum or vinculum that would be forfeited in the event that they refused the decision. The term originates in Roman Law but it is unlikely that the arbitrators has particular legal knowledge.

archdeacon (archidiaconus): since the end of the eleventh century the ecclesiastical administrator of a district that usually coincided with a royal county, four or more of which constituted a diocese. Later the archdeacon (also called archpriest, archipresbiter) moved to the episcopal see and became a (mainly judicial) administrative officer of the bishop, entrusting a part of his office to a priest of a major parish (plebanus) as vice-archdeacon (vice archidiaconus). See Szentirmai (1956, 1957). Col: 58–61, 65; SStr:47,65 1439:34; 1486:63; 1492:29; 1495:6; 1498:51,53; 1514:60; 1518B:18.

assumption oneris: see burden

astatio falsi termini: see frivolous prosecution

attorney (procurator): in all suits proceeding before the principal courts of the realm, excepting only those actions introduced by a “personal prohibition”, the parties could be represented by attorneys. Few of these had received formal legal education, most having acquired their skills through pupillage (in patvariis) or by previous court service (see Trip. II. 22). In order to represent a party in court, the person had to present letters of attorney (q.v.). Rady (2015) passim s.v. lawyers appointment of: 1492:97; Trip. I 111, 126:2, 129:2; II 13:6–8. (see also letters of attorney) recall of: a statement made by an attorney might be retracted by his client. Such a retraction (revocatio) carried with it a fine, the size of which depended upon the stage that the trial had reached. It was also possible to dismiss an attorney, which usually had the consequence of forcing a new trial (q.v.). 1492:51; 1500:15; Trip. II 75:6,12–13, 77:5–6, 79–81; III 3:2, 6:3–4, 11:8.

aucarius: the term for perjurer in Hungarian Latin; see Trip. n. 253.

aviticitas (Hung. ősiség): the principle of inheritance within a kindred elaborated in the course of the Árpáadian period and codified in 1351 Pref. Rady (2015) 85–92; see inheritance, division.

babka: originally Czech coin of minor value, equal to 1/3 of the Kreutzer (q.v.), which became widespread during the rule of King Louis II. In Hungarian it became batka and acquired the proverbial meaning of ‘very low value’ (“not worth even a [wooden] batka”) Laszlovszky (2018) 295–308. 1521:6[14]; 1526:39.

bailiff (in the early centuries called pristaldus, probably from a Slavic loan-word, pristav*; later homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge): the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. In early laws, the bishop’s man collecting the tithe is also called pristaldus. In the eleventh century the bailiff may have been identical with the bilochus (q.v.). From the thirteenth century it was prescribed that the bailiff be accompanied by a witness of a place of authentication (q.v.) recording the action. It seems that in lawsuits bailiffs were selected by the litigants from among the nobles of their counties. Royal clerks were also commissioned as specially delegated royal bailiffs with powers more extensive than regular royal bailiffs. SSz:40; La2:8,12–13, Col:28–30,33,41; 1222: 9, 1231:10; c.1320:1; 1435:8,10; 1444:25; 1458:27, 1486:6 1492:14,43,53; 1495:9,16; 1498:43; 1504:16; 1523:57; Trip. I 14:13, 41, 86:1–3; II 12:2,4, 19, 20:2, 21, 22, 27:4, 41:3, 55:1–2, 56:1, 57:5, 60:1, 68:5; 74:10,13, 86:3; III 26:7.

ban (banus, Hung. bán, from Avar bajan or Slavic ban, pan = lord):

(1) the royally appointed governor of the kingdoms of Croatia-Dalmatia (q.v.), and/or the region called Slavonia (q.v.). In the twelfth to thirteenth centuries members of the dynasty were frequently appointed bans with a ducal title. The political importance and income of the ban was significant; he was always a member of the royal council. 1222:30; 1290:28; 1486:6,21,51,53,68,73; 1492:8, 33; 1498:70; 1514:67; 1518T:10; 1518B:6; Trip. II 65:3.

(2) royal officer in charge of one or more of the southern border areas, called banates, (q.v.), from the late thirteenth century. The bans were usually (but not necessarily) members of the royal council and, with the increase of the Ottoman threat, holders of crucial strategic positions. See Kristó (1979), 118–38. 1478:11; 1492:8; 1495:36; 1514:67; 1518B:21 Trip. I 14:15, etc.

banate (banatus): territories south of the River Sava and along the Lower Danube (south of the Carpathians), controlled or claimed by the kings of Hungary as “buffer areas” against Byzantium, later Serbia, Bosnia, and finally, the Ottoman Empire. Their area and existence depended on the power relations between Hungary and her southern neighbors. Banates were (from east to west) those of: Severin/Szörény (ca. 1228–1524), Mačva/Macsó (1247–1496 [from 1479 titular]), Sal/Só (post 1253), Srebernik/Szebernik (1404/64–1512), Uzora/Ozora (post 1253), Jajce/Jajca (1476/78–post 1529). Most of them had been lost to the Ottomans by ca. 1500. (KMTL 1994; Font–Fedeles–Kiss (2007), 85–92). Occasionally, the office of a ban was also called banatus. 1492:8.

bandlerial lords (domini banderiatii): major office holders of the realm who were obliged to lead their banderium (q.v.) to field from the late fourteenth century onwards, based on their landed estates. In the fifteenth century there was an informal division among the banderial lords, as major (palatine, voivode, etc.) and minor ones (master of the treasury, count of Temes). 1492:20–22; 1498:15,21–22; 1500:21. Prop 11432:21–22; 1445:21; 1447:8; 1454:2; 1458:2; 1459:1,3–4; 1492:19–21; 1498: 15,21–22. 1518B: 2[10], 11[20], 12[21].

banderium (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’): troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons (q.v.) and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars [q.v.]). Those obliged to field a banderium were referred to as bandlerial lords (q.v.). See Veszprémy (2009), Hermann (2012).

baron (baro): originally (after ca. 1208) meant the major officers of the kingdom appointed by the king and usually listed in the eschatocol of privileges. From the fourteenth century the term was also applied to those who held high governmental offices, or positions at court (veri barones) and therefore enjoyed legal privileges. From the mid-fifteenth century onward, the meaning of the term was extended to include magnates and great landowners who were not necessarily holders of a baronial office. The Trip. defines the veri barones in I 94 as the holders of high offices in the king’s and the queen’s court. By the late fifteenth century, the baronial class also included the descendants of those families which had traditionally occupied high rank. These were known as the barones naturales, but W. disparages their status as solo nomine (see Trip. I 93:4). Baronial offices: palatine, judge royal, chancellor, voivode of Transylvania, bans, ispán of the Székely; captain-general of the lower parts, king’s and queen’s master of the horse, master of the treasury, masters of the doorkeepers, master of the stewards, master of the butlers, ispáns of Temes and Pozsony (all ispáns until the mid-fourteenth century). 1231:4; 1267:3,5; 1290:1,2,6,18,21; 1298: 8,18; C 1440:1,3,7,17; 1427(a):4,5; 1435:5; 1439:5,8,29; 1443:3–4; 1444:15,17;24–25,29; 1446:2,7; 1447:8,17; 1454:2 1458:2, 1459:4,10,15; 1492:19–21,90,108; 1495:8,19,25,37; 1498:1;16:1, 21–22,55,70; 1500:10:8–9,10:14; 1518B:1; Trip. I 2:1–2, 3, 5:1, 6:4, 9:7, 10, 13, 23, 29:1,9, 40:1, 57, 64:1–2, 82:7, 84:3–4, 89, 93:3–4, 94, 111, 133:5; II 1, 4, 13:5,7, 14:12,22,26,32,35,42,49,50, 23, 27:6, 40, 43:2, 54:3–4,8, 67:1, 75:1; III 3:3,5.

betrayal of fraternal blood (proditio sanguinis): in essence an attempt to deny inheritance rights to an eligible kinsman. W. somewhat overemphasizes its legal character. See Fügedi (1998). Trip. I 38–39, 44.

birsagium (Latinized form of the Hungarian word bírság): see fine

bilochus: see judge, bailiff

blood relatives (consanguinei): in Hungary, usually counted from the common ancestor to the fourth degree, especially in cases of marriage or prefection (q.v.); for a table of consanguinity from the early sixteenth century, see Fügedi (1998), 10–17. 1462:2; Trip. I 14:5–5, 29:8–9, 47:3, 65:5, 106–8, 113:5, 114, 115:1, 116:1, 117:3, 124; II 55; III 29:1.

bondman/woman (servus, ancilla): the general term we used for the two Latin expressions for male or female servile persons, which in the texts of the eleventh century may have equally referred to chattel slaves, to dependent, unfree cultivators and to peasants with small properties subject to seigneurial control; hence the more commonly used terms “slave” or “serf” have been avoided as possibly misleading. Considering recent research, we abandoned this “euphemism” but shied back from coming down on either side of the debate, hence rather kept the Latin original, servus. See Györffy (1983), 160–170; Bolla–Horváth (1981) now also Solymosi (2001) and Sutt (2005). [servus] St1:14,25,28–9; St2:3,18; SSz 42; La2:2,12,14; La3:4–5,8,13; SStr:24,28,87; [ancilla] St1: 19,20,28–29; SSz:2; Col:77; SStr:62.

border (confinia, indagines): a fairly wide area around the settled parts of the Carpathian basin (at least until the mid-thirteenth century), with wastes and obstacles protecting the center of the kingdom, permitting access only through gates (portae); the ispán in charge of the generally larger counties that bordered the frontier was also commander of border guards (őrök) and controller of the access routes, hence an especially important royal officer (see Göckenjan 1972, 5–11.). After the settlement of these areas, and their gradual incorporation within the county system, the border referred to the frontiers of the kingdom. La2:17; Col:76; 1222:25; 1435/I:14,22 1435/II:1; 1439:3,14,29,32; 1492:17–18; 1495: 45; 1514:54,70; 1518B:31,39[47]; 1523: 51; 1526:30.

~ castles: in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the frontier forts in the south became a major concern of legislators, see Szakály (1982). 1435/I:22; 1471:6; 1492:15; 1495:14,33,35–36; 1498:21;42–43,56; 1504:26; 1514:59,64,68; 1518T:1,10,14,17; 1518B:1,18[19],21,30; 1521: 2[10sq]; 1523:17; 1526:4,15; Trip. I 14:16; for the development of the frontier fort system, see Pálffy (2000).

boundaries (meta): of estates, villages, etc.

perambulation of (reambulatio metarum): A landowner was entitled to request the perambulation of the boundaries of his estate in company with a royal bailiff (q.v.) and in the presence of abutters (q.v.) and neighbors. The place of authentication (q.v.), whose witness was also present, described in writing the landmarks, boundaries, and at times its abutters in a letter of perambulation either in full charters (littere reambulatorie) (q.v.) or as a short notice (metales) and also whether any abutters and neighbors objected (contradictio). 1435/I:8–11; 1486:77; 1492:53; Trip. I 33:1–2, 76, 78:7, 131, 134:6; II 18:4, 21, 35, 39:2, 86:10.

adjustment of (rectificatio metarum): Trip. I 84–87, 134:6; II 39:2. (See also prescription.)

brothers (fratres carnales/uterini): brothers having the same father or mother, respectively. W.’s use of the two expressions does not seem to allow a distinction between full and half-brothers. The term fratres in general usually refers to kinsmen (q.v.). 1298:6; C 1440:4; 1435/I:13,18; 1454:6; 1459:25; 1464:8; 1486:7; 1498:1:7; Trip. I 40:1, 43, 46, 49:1, 50, 61, 67, 100:4, 114:1, 121; II 34:6, 37:3.

bullatus: clergy claiming an ecclesiastical benefice on the basis of a papal grant (a “bull”). From the turn of the fourteenth–fifteenth centuries several legal attempts opposed this papal policy; the term occasionally was also used for papal collectors. 1440:4; 1486:83; 1492:29.

burdens, assuming of (assumptio onerum): the alienation of inherited land required the consent of all the aliener’s kinsmen since they were considered to have a concurrent interest in the estate. Since it was not always possible to find these and so obtain their consent, the aliener might proceed with the transaction by “assuming the burdens and grievances” of his missing relatives. The assumptio onerum might be misused to deprive kinsmen of their legal rights to an estate. See Rady (2002) and Rady (2015) 93–7. Trip. I 51:6, 58:1, 59, 61, 124:5.

burghers (cives): see cities, free royal calumnia: see frivolous prosecution

capital punishment (sententia capitalis): loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates (Trip. II 55). If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary (Trip. II 57). This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate. 1427(a):3; 1427(b):6; 1435/I:8,10; 1439:28; 1443:2; 1444:25; 1445:4,11,19; 1447:9; 1454:12–13; 1459:17; 1471:19; 1486:16; 1492:74; 1495:9; 1498:8,38,43; 1514:9,13,40; 1521:[36]; 1523:50,54; Trip. I 15, 16, 20, 56:2, 59:6, 60:3, 68:1, 121:1, 134:2; II 20:4,10, 27:8, 39, 41:6, 42:4–6, 43–44, 51:4, 54:7, 55, 57–58, 61, 65–67, 70, 83:4; III 4:3, 5:4, 11:7, 19:7, 20:1, 21:2, 26:5,10–11,17. See also infidelity; Nógrády (2009) 305.

castellan (castellanus): the late medieval name for the royal or seigniorial officer in charge of a castle; the castellan (or constable) of the castle at the county seat was earlier known as the comes curialis and acted very much as the deputy of the ispán (see: alispán). In earlier laws, castellanus meant a men of the castle (q.v.).

castellum: see fortified residence

castle (castrum): A fortified site (occasionally walled towns or monasteries) including earthworks (tenth to twelfth centuries), wooden or stone walls, defenses, and towers (from c. 1250 onward). In the first centuries of the kingdom, castles were mainly county seats and exclusively in royal hands; private castle building began in the late thirteenth century (after the Mongol invasion of 1241). In 1300 there were about 150 castles in Hungary; see Fügedi (1982) and (1986). The majority came by the fifteenth century to be owned by great landowners; see Engel (2001). The system of border defense built around castles (see above, s.v. border) developed in the mid-fifteenth century – by which time there may have been more than 400 castles in the entire country – withstood Ottoman attacks into the early sixteenth. The exact difference between castrum and castellum cannot be established, we translated the latter as “fortified residence” (q.v.). St2:18; La2:13 1435/I:6,22; 1435/II:2–3; 1439:5; 1444:12; 1445:4; 1446:2; 1447:26; 1458/1:6; 1464:6,10; 1471:29; 1492:10,15; 1495:33,36; 1498:43; 1518B:21; Trip. I 4, 14:10, 24:9, 37:9, 84:1, 98:4–5, 133:6; II 14:44, 76:3–4. (see also: castellan, castle-warrior, fortified residence, men of the castle) castle warrior (jobagio castri): a dependent freeman obligated to military service, attached to a royal castle and commanded by the ispán in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. With the transfer of many castles to private hands and the transformation of the military system along Western models, these militiamen were gradually replaced by the noble levy. As proprietors of small possessions on former castle estates, many a castle warrior rose into the lesser nobility. This social category gradually vanished during the fourteenth century. See Zsoldos (1999) and Rady (2000). 1222:19; 1231:8,14; 1279:3.

centurion (centurio): The officer in charge of royal guards, border guards and other servile elements on royal estates, who also functioned as a collector of taxes. He was assisted by the decurio, in charge of a tenth of a centurionate; see Györffy (1983). Both offices vanished with the dissolution of the servile settlements on royal domains in the late twelfth century. However, the terms show up in the decree of 1514, probably as an archaism. La3:1; Col:79; 1514:14, 37, 39.

chamber's profit (lucrum camerae): Originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber's profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. (During King Matthias's financial reforms it was renamed tributum fisci, but the new appellation was soon dropped, once the old exemptions were cancelled) Laszlovszky (2018) 255–64. 1458/2:33,39,44; 1459:6,20; 1464:22–23; 1467:1,4–5; 1471:11; 1474:4,6; 1478:1–2; 1492:26; 1504:1[5]; 1518B:45; 1526:40.

chapters and convents (capitula et conventus): see places of authentication

citatio (evocatio): see summons brevis: see summons, short cum insinuatione: see summons, terminal

city, free (civitas [libera]): city (usually walled) with a privilege granting the right of the citizens or burghers to elect their magistrate and other liberties, bestowed by royal charter (since the early thirteenth century). Their number and jurisdictional status was fluid, see thus the different lists in 1498:38; 1500:24; 1514:1–2; Trip: III 8 and III 10. Some were “royal free cities,” others subject to the jurisdiction of the master of the treasury (q.v.), others mining towns with special privileges; see Kubinyi (1972), Gönczi (1997). 1267:5; 1435/I:15; 1454:9; 1498:40; 1500:33; 1514:23,25; Trip. I 6:1; I 78:2; III 8–20.

civilis, civis: a term with reference to a citizen of a free city with the right of electing the judge and the twelve sworn magistrates of the city council. The first communities emerged around hospes-groups (guest, q.v.) of foreign origin (Germans and Latins, q.v.) at the turn of the twelfth–thirteenth century. Burghers of Hungarian cities were usually German-speaking, at times even incorporating “assimilated” local nobility (e.g. Sopron, Bratislava), although in the fifteenth century Hungarian-speakers were regularly extended citizenship rights. CC:5,25; 1405/I:3–4,6,10–14,18; 1405/II:4,11; 1435/I:15; 1447: 18; 1467:1; 1492:91,102,105; 1498:35,38,41; 1500:33; 1504:19; 1514:58; 1518B:27; Trip. I 6, 78; III 8–20, 33. See also men of the castle, city, free.

civitas: see county; or city, free royal clan: see kindred

cognates: see agnates

collecta: the general term for royal taxes, which may have originated in payments replacing military service, collected from a wide range of population from the twelfth century onward. Laszlovszky (2018) 255–64. 1222:3; 1231:3; 1290:7; 1298:10,15,18; 1518B:18,26; Trip. I 9:5.

colonus: a late antique term occasionally used for tenant peasants (q.v.) in the late Middle Ages. It has been argued that the decreta of the early sixteenth century – as well as W. – implied the post-1514 servile condition of peasants when using this term for tenant peasants (in contrast to jobagiones, q.v.), but it is more likely that it was merely borrowed from classical literature regardless of social conditions. 1492:89; Trip. I 34:5, 67, 85:2, 93:3, 134:2; II 14:11; III 1:3, 3:15, 27:8, 30:6,8, 33:4–5, 35:1.

combat, judicial (iudicium duelli): judicial combat or duel, as a form of ordeal, survived in Hungary into the late Middle Ages, despite ecclesiastical protests. By the fourteenth century, combat was often performed by champions. 1435/I:11; 1471:28; 1486:18,55; 1492:37; Trip. II 2:5.

abolition of 1492:37; Trip. II 2:5.

defeat in (succubitum duelli): the same penalty as would have been enacted had one of the parties, or their champions, been defeated in combat.

comes, comes comitatus, comes parochialis: see ispán comes camere: see count of the chamber comes curiae regis: see judex curiae, judge royal comitatus: see county

commetaneus: see abutter

composition (compositio), or man price (homagium): a sum of money (in earlier laws frequently expressed in cattle or other valuables), which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system, widespread among Germanic peoples of the post-migration age, aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge but continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid (the wergeld) was based on the victim's or the culprit's social and legal status and the nature of the crime. According to the Trip., the man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. (see also mark, homagial) Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to a lesser extent the fine of the tongue (q.v.). Rady (2015). St1:22,35; St2:6–8,14,16–17,20; 1427(a):3; 1435/I:7; 1439:33; 1447:9; 1458:35; 1459:14; 1464:6; 1471:28; 1481:13; 1486:33–34,39; 1495:9,19:5; 1498:61; 1504:17,23; 1514:8,14,27–29,37–38,42; 1521:2; Trip. I 2, 59:4, 132; II 30:5, 32:1, 36:1, 40:2, 43:2–3, 44:7, 51:2, 57; III 2:2, 5, 9, 21:3, 26–28, 31:1, 32, 33:5.

in Slavonia and Transylvania: Trip. III 3:1,8, III 4:1.

of the living: 1492:85[1],90; Trip. III 3:8,14.

comprovincialis: see nobles of the same county

concordia: see agreement, peace

condescensio (cause): see failure (of a case)

confinia: see border

congregatio generalis: the term generally used for the diet (q.v.) of the kingdom where barons and prelates as well as deputies of the counties (q.v.) – occasionally a great number of nobles attending in person – deliberated on the affairs of the realm: 1290:Preamb.,18; 1435/I:4–5,7,20–22; 1439:30,32; 1462:1; 1486:1–2; 1492:35–36; Trip. II 75:1; III 3:10. The term might also be used to refer to a county assembly: e.g., in 1439:29,32; 1447:2; 1458/I:1,16; 1458/2:41; 1471:22; 1492:35–36; Trip. II 14:30. See also Bónis (1965) and Tringli (2009).

congregatio proclamata: see extraordinary county assembly

consanguinei: see blood relatives

contradiction (contradictio): protest or objection by co-inheriting kinsmen, abutters (q.v.) or neighbors to the institution of a new owner or at a perambulation (of boundaries, q.v.) of properties or at the alienation of an estate, which could be done by (at least symbolic) violence at the site and/or recorded by a place of authentication (q.v.) in a letter of protest (littere prohibitorie, q.v.).

contract: see adoption, fraternal (used in this sense in Trip. and probably earlier as well); see also inheritance, mutual council, royal (senatus, consilium): an informal body consisting of the principal royal office holders who advised the king; the council might also include barons (q.v.) and lesser nobles who happened to be visiting court at any one time. In the later Middle Ages the council became a more formal gathering, presided over by the master of the doorkeepers for the purpose of legislation (as a forerunner of the later upper house of the diet, q.v.). The list of names of spiritual and secular office holders in the dating clauses of royal privileges and decreta suggest the circle of men who constituted the council at any moment, see passim. From the fifteenth century onward, the council might include beside barons and elected representatives of the lesser nobility, the ambassadors of other kingdoms and territories, especially envoys from the papacy, Austrian Habsburg lands and Poland. The representation of the lesser nobility was several times decreed, but they had little influence in the council. See Kubinyi (2011). St1:14–15,20,29,31,34; St2:2; Col:Preamb.1; 1446:8; 1447:39; 1486:46; 1498:7; 1500:10–11; 1518B:39–40; 1526:17; Trip. I 2:3.

count of the chamber (comes camerae): an officer in charge of the mint, the customs, and the administration of the royal salt mines from the early thirteenth century onward. These positions were in the thirteenth century frequently farmed out to Jewish and Muslim merchants and moneylenders. Contracts made with these men are our best sources for the financial reforms of Charles Robert (Charles I), Laszlovszky (2018) 279–94; see 1222:24; 1231:18; C 1440:6; 1411:4; 1427(a):8–9; CC: passim.

count of the court (comes curiae): see judge royal county court (sedes judiciaria ~ sedria): the local court, usually presided over by the alispán (q.v.). c.1320:1; 1421; 1435/I:1–2,4; 1435/II:7; 1467:7; 1471:28; 1492:37,42–43,69,73; 1492 SI:9; 1495:16–17,19,29,37; 1498:15,71; 1504:7–8; 1514:39; 1518B:42; 1523:50; Trip. I 14:12; II 27:1, 42:4; III 2:5, 6–7, 19:1, 26:4,6, 27, 35.

county (civitas, comitatus, mega, Hung. megye, probably from a Slavic word meaning “boundary”): a complex administrative, judicial, and military unit built around the royal domain, the organization of which had probably begun by the rule of King Stephen I, with a castle (earthwork) in its center where the ispán and, apparently, the archdeacon (q.v.), in charge of the churches of about the same region as the county) also resided. The ispán of the county was in some way also the superior of freemen living in his area. With the spread of settlement and the reorganization of border wastes and forests their number had grown to more than seventy by the end of the thirteenth century. The decline of the functioning of the co-existent várispánság (also called comitatus) led to the transformation of the county between 1270 and 1320. The changes were manifested in the appearance of the county court (sedria, q.v.) and the replacement of the várispán by the alispán (q.v.) as the deputy of the ispán (q.v.). Its elected officers (see magistrates) and their regular assemblies became the main seats of local administration and of justice (with or without the presence of the itinerant count palatine (q.v.). The deputies of the counties attended the general assemblies (diet, q.v.) called by the king. The “new” county functioned well until the mid-sixteenth century by which time the noble corporation had been fully shaped as demonstrated by the appearance of county congregations (assemblies of the local noblemen), the growing importance of the circuits (Hung. járás), and the activity of permanent jurors; see Györffy (1976), Tringli (2009) and Tringli (2011).

Croatia and Dalmatia: the kings of Hungary acquired these kingdoms at the turn of the eleventh to twelfth century, thus they are often referred to as regna. The constitutional relation between Croatia and Hungary became a contested issue only in modern times. The territory enjoyed a special status and differing legal procedures throughout the Middle Ages; it was governed by its own ban (q.v.), frequently together with Slavonia (q.v.) Prop:21; 1435/I:1; 1486:6,68; 1492:8,33; 1498:21,70; 1500:6; 1504:30; 1514:67; 1518T:10; 1518B:6; Trip. I 1:4,94:2; II 65:3; III 1:1,2.

crown: see Holy Crown of Hungary

Cumans: Kipchak Turkic nomads who were settled on the Hungarian Plain in the 1240s and who were permitted to retain some of their customs. Their social and cultural integration was complete by the beginning of the sixteenth century but they preserved their administrative autonomy until the end of the seventeenth century and separate Cuman practices persisted until the nineteenth century. See Pálóczi-Horváth (1989), Berend (2001) 1279:2–4,6–9; 1298:Preamb; Prop:21; 1444:4; 1454:9; 1459:20–21; 1467:1; ArtPal; 1498:22,47–48; 1514:3,23,29,41,54; 1518B:14,31; 1521:39[47]; 1523:51; 1526:30; Trip. III 25:1–2.

decurio: see centurion default of issue (defectus seminis, often just defectus): the lack of legitimate (male) heirs among the co-inheriting kinsmen (q.v.) after the death of a nobleman, unless one of the daughters was preferred (see preferentia). Considering the wide circle of relatives with inheritance rights, defectus was crucial for the escheat of property (q.v.) to the crown and thus becoming available for donation (q.v.). See also property right, devolution of. 1435/I:17–18; 1481:15; 1486:26; 1492:62; 1514:49,62; Trip. I 13:4,17, 21:4, 22, 24:10, 26–27, 29–30, 32, 37:8, 47–48, 50, 60:8, 63:4,6, 64:1, 65–66, 67:2–3, 70:4, 82:10, 84:4, 131:5; II 14:41, 71:6, 76:3.

denarius: see penny

descensus: originally the right of the king and his officers to demand hospitality for themselves and their retinue; it was gradually replaced by a payment (probably first in kind, later in money) due to the royal treasury; Laszlovszky (2018) 255–64. 1222:3,15; 1231:4; 1267:1; 1290:7,28; 1298:10; 1439:18; 1492:28; 1498:69. From the fourteenth century onwards, lords also expected descensus from their tenant peasants either in cash or in kind. 1467:8.

deserted land (predium): a somewhat imprecise reference to certain properties. In the early Middle Ages predium used to mean small agrarian settlements or granges; see Szabó (1963). By the fourteenth century, however, most of these were in fact abandoned; thus, the word acquired the general meaning of empty but not always uncultivated plots, see Kubinyi (1987), Neumann (2003). SSz:23; SStr:31; 1222:9,16,21; 1231:10,13; 1290:6; 1474:4; 1500:29; Trip. I 24:5–6.

dicator: see tax collector diet (diaeta): the term might refer either to a session of the royal council (q.v.) or to a gathering of the nobility at which nobles attended in person or through delegates. The Golden Bull of 1222 permitted the servientes regis (q.v.) to assemble annually at the time of the royal assizes, confirmed in 1231. In 1267, the counties were instructed to appoint delegates for this purpose. During the Angevin period few assemblies and annual gatherings were called. The succession crisis and onset of the Turkish wars in the 1380s and '90s introduced a new phase in the diet's history. The right of consultation that had belonged to the barons in the royal council was accordingly extended to the larger noble community. In 1385 and 1397, every noble county sent four delegates to the diet; in 1435 the assembled nobles were grandly styled as totum corpus regni representantes. After 1405 Sigismund did not summon another diet for thirty years. The renewed succession crises of the 1440s and 1450s gave new significance to the diet. Diets assembled more or less every year, sometimes several times and it is from this time that we have earliest evidence of ‘mass diets’ at which nobles assembled individually. During these decades the diet acquired the right to elect the king in the event of a contested succession and to approve extraordinary taxation. In 1458, a mass diet of the nobility elected Matthias Corvinus king. Under Matthias, diets continued to be regularly held and at times of political crisis the king might instruct all nobles to assemble. During the Jagello period (1490–1526), diets were held annually, and these were frequently mass diets with up to 10,000 nobles in attendance. The barons and prelates of the council met separately to the common nobility who, on account of their numerousness, usually assembled in the open air on the field of Rákos, near Pest. There was no separate chamber for the clergy; these were represented through the prelates of the council, thus contributing to the weakness of the clerical estate. The principal cities of the realm were only intermittently present at the diet. Although regularly requested to attend in the Jagello period, after 1508 no urban delegates were present in the diet. See Bónis (1965) and Bak (1973). On the circumstances of the meeting of the diet, see the preamble of the decrees. 1492:4,6,108; 1492 Slav:11; 1495:3,25,31,37; 1498:1,45; 1504:13; 1518B:28,42,44; 1521:3; 1523:9; 1526:1,3,16–17,34; Trip. I 14:12, II 20, 71; III 3:10.

division (divisio): periodic division among kinsmen, usually brothers, of noble landed property that was according to Hungarian custom held in common by the kindred or at least by the family. There were two basic types of division. Family property could be divided village by village. In this case, each branch received whole estates as their share. In the other type each branch of the kindred received its proper portion from each estate, thus the estates and villages were subdivided, forming so-called portiones possessionarie (partitioned estates). While the first type of division was usual in the earlier Middle Ages up to the mid-fourteenth century, the latter became the dominant form of division after that time. The partitioning of family estates had serious consequences especially upon more numerous families, leading to their impoverishment. See Engel (1999). 1298:6;

C 1440:4,10; Trip. I 5:1, 40–41, 42:4, 43–47, 50–53; 67:1, 119:4; II 15:2. Curiously, the principles of division and the respective rights of collateral branches are not addressed in any legislation.

divisional kinsman (frater condivisionalis): a person entitled to a share in inherited property, stemming from the custom that landed property should be partitioned equally among sons or among nearest male relatives in the paternal line (aviticitas). Thus, claims could be raised for generations after a division (q.v.) of commonly-held clan property had been made. Trip. I 40–47.

domus nobilitaris: see residence, noble donation: the general form of obtaining landed property in medieval Hungary, usually from the king, almost always in perpetuity and, unless otherwise stated, up to the fourteenth century to the entire co-inheriting kindred or family, but, thereafter, only to the recipient’s heirs and descendants. Land donated by the king was considered the mark of nobility. Land that had escheated to the ruler on account of default of issue (q.v.) or of the taint of infidelity (q.v.) might be petitioned for by a prospective grantee and was seldom denied. Such donations were often specified as granted from bona donatalia. Thereupon a letter of command (q.v.) was issued in the royal chancellery – apparently without any inquiry into the status of the property – and sent to a place of authentication (q.v.). The chapter or convent sent out a witness (testimonium) together with a royal bailiff (q.v.) in order to perform the institution (q.v.) of the recipient in the presence of abutters (q.v.) and neighbors. Providing no one made a contradiction (q.v.), the place of authentication, on the report of the agents, sent a letter of institution (littere statutorie, q.v.) back to the royal court, a copy of which served as a proof of property rights. On occasions, landowners donated property of their own to their retainers. In the event of the retainer dying without heir, the land usually reverted to its original owner. 1279:8,10; 1290:4; 1298:7; C 1440:20; 1435/I:12; 1444:14; 1453:3; 1464:23; 1481:15; 1486:23; 1492:60; 1495:2; 1504:10; 1514:53; Trip. I 4, 6, 11, 13, 15, 22, 24:10. (see also new donation, noble retainers) dower (dos, dotalitium): originally the “price of the bride” paid by the bridegroom’s family to that of the bride, then a grant of the husband to his wife on the occasion of their marriage. (In the printed DRMH 1–3 dos was erroneously translated as dowry.) The dower was usually given both in land and chattels, but the woman did not have free disposal of the land so given, which was managed together with her husband’s goods. After her husband’s death, the widow could keep the dower unless she remarried. In this case, the kinsmen of the deceased husband redeemed the dower from her. The term often also included those valuables that were brought by the bride in the marriage (res parafernales), which remained with the wife. Redemption of the dower might subsequently be used as evidence of the kinsmen’s claim to the property. See Fügedi (1998), 24–6. 1222:12; 1231:9,12; 1290:23; 1435/I:18; 1458/I:9; 1458/II:35; 1462:3; 1464:17; 1486:26; 1492:46,64; 1500:16; Trip. I 27:2, 28, 29:4, 30:7, 59:2, 67:2, 78:5, 88, 93, 94:3, 95–97, 98:1–3, 101:3, 102:2, 103–106, 109, 111:7, 129:1, 134:3–4; II 18:3, 24, 43:4, 60:4, 70:3,5, 85:4; III 3:3–5,9, 7:3,5.

duke (dux): probably following nomadic customs and reinforced by Slavic examples, the governance of the realm in eleventh-century Hungary was frequently divided between the king and a younger member of the dynasty (brother, nephew). The original institution fell into abeyance under King Coloman; in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries royal sons and other members of the dynasty were frequently granted the governance of Croatia–Dalmatia (q.v.), or a banate (q.v.) with the title dux. La3:3; Col 9,11–12,36. The title was revived in the early 1490s when Matthias’s illegitimate son, John Corvin, was made duke of Slavonia.

emenda capitis: see fine of the head

emenda lingue: see fine of the tongue estimation, judicial (estimatio, estimatio): estimate of the value of immovable and movable property, usually on the traditional basis (estimatio communis), but occasionally a tenfold (estimatio perennalis) valuation for immovable property was used. The low common estimation assured kinsmen’s and even neighbors’ and abutters’ ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed on families having to pay the filial quarter (q.v.) in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation. The estimatio fori represented the true market worth of goods. C 1440:10–11; 1435/I:10; 1492:62,90; 1495:11; 1498:15,62; Trip. I 10:2, 15:2, 16:4, 21:3, 25, 59:4, 60–61, 65:1, 71:1, 83, 85:3–4, 89, 93:5, 98:3, 133–134; II 20:8, 43:1, 51:4, 56, 61, 63, 71:10; III 3:4,16, 7:5, 26:16, 30:8, 33:3.

evictio: see warranty

evocatio brevis: see summons, short execution (executio): implementation of a legal decision (e.g. a new trial, q.v.), usually with the assistance of a bailiff (royal or palatinal, q.v.) and local (county) officers. 1454:15; 1486:44; 1492:51,53,73,75; 1492Slav:9; 1495:9,11,13; 1498:71; 1500:3,9,11,16; 1514:31; 1518T:20;

1518B:4,6,10,28; 1526:22; Trip. I 26, 33–34, 86:1, 6:11, 12:2,4, 19, 21–22, 42, 55–56, 57:5,7, 58, 59:4, 60, 62, 65:6, 69:3, 73–75, 76:1,7, 77:5,7–8, 83:4; II 86:3–4,13; III 3:6, 7, 35:3.

extraordinary county assembly (proclamata congregatio): in major criminal cases county nobles were gathered in a single place and examined under oath. Abolished in the judicial reforms of 1486. See Tringli (2009) 1435/I:3,6; 1439:29,32; 1458/1:1,16; 1462:1; 1486:2; 1492:36; 1523:50; Trip. II 2:5.

extra dominium (out of possession): when a party deprived of land to which it claimed a right, sued for recovery while out of actual possession. 1495:1:3; Trip. I 63:2, 82:4; cf. II 41.

failure (of a case) (condescensio cause): the collapse of a case on a variety of grounds: following the recall of an attorney; the inability of the defendant to attend the trial on grounds which were subsequently found to excuse his absence; misjoining a suit; and having the summons improperly cast or delivered.

false court appearance (astatio falsi termini): see frivolous prosecution familiaris, famulus: see noble retainer

fassio: see recognizance

female line (sexus foemineus): females were usually entitled to inherit only movable goods or landed property that had been bought for cash. Nevertheless, some landed property was defined at the time of its donation by the king as being inheritable by the owner's daughters as well as his sons. Property which was inherited by daughters in this way might be referred to as descending through the female line. The sons and descendants of such a daughter might accordingly be designated "men of the female line" (homines foeminei sexus). 1435/I:17–18; 1462:2; 1486:26; 1492:63; Trip. I 17:4,6–7, 18–20, 21:4, 26, 28–29, 36:2, 37:12, 38, 39:3, 41:3, 48:3, 67:2, 73, 88:2, 90, 102:1, 116–117, 118:1; II 60:3; also: Trip. I 21:2, 30:3, 37:2,11, 34:6.

ferto ("quarter", from the Germ. Viertel): a quarter of a mark of silver, according to different types of mark c. 56–60 gr.; often used as a measure of taxation during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. 1290:14,16; 1298:15; CC:38,42.

fiftieth (quingagesima): royal tax collected mainly from Romanians. Originally levied in kind on transhumance shepherds (based upon the number of sheep) in Wallachia but later raised from those settled in villages as well. Gradually it was transformed in the course of the sixteenth century to a tax levied in cash. 1439:6–7; 1444:3; 1458/II:33; 1464:23; 1492:26; 1514:3:10; 1518B:14; 1526:3.

filial quarter (quarta [filialis]): hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates (see property rights) of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land, especially in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Payment of the filial quarter was regarded as proof of the ancient (hereditary) character of the property. See Holub (1935), Fügedi (1998), 45–6; Karbić (1998), Banyó (2000), Rady (2000), 103–7. 1222:4; 1231:5; 1290:23; C 1440:14; 1435/I:18; 1458/I:9; 1458/II:35; 1462:3; 1486:26; 1492:46; 1514:62:4; Trip. I 6:2–4, 17:4–7, 27:2, 28, 29:5–9, 30:2,6,8, 37:12–14, 59:2, 60:8, 78:5, 88–90, 96:3, 97, 101:3–4, 111:7, 129:1, 134:2; II 18:3, 24, 43:4, 70:3,5, 85:4.

fillér (Lat. obolus, Hung. from Germ. vierer): the smallest money of exchange during the later Middle Ages; its original silver content was ca. 0.3 gr. calculated as 1/12 part of the groat (q.v.) and 1/240 part of the pound in the mark-system. (e.g., 1 mark of Prague = 3 pounds = 60 groats = 720 fillér). 1427(b):1–2; 1523:38; Trip. I 33:32.

fine (judicium, or birsagium, from the Hung. bírság = fine): monetary punishment paid by parties at law for breaking procedural rules. Two-thirds of the fine usually went to the judge (parts of it also to the king or the ispán), one-third to the opposing party. Fines were an accepted part of litigation and were usually “rolled up,” balanced and paid off at the conclusion of the trial. Apart from bribes and other inducements, fines were the main source of income for judges. St1: 14,15,21,27,35; St2:9; La3:9,22,25; 1298:3,6; c.1320:1; 1405/II:15–16; Prop:16; 1435/I:2,4,7,12,21; 1439:30,32; 1444:23; 1447:19–20,24; 1458/II:27,41; 1459:7,18; 1467:7; 1471:16; 1474:14; 1478:15; 1481:11; 1486:8,14,16,19,25,39,52–53,55,58,64,69; 1492:26,66; 1495:12,13,17–19,21; 1498:5,38; 1500:3–4,15; 1504:18; 1523:9,50; Trip. I 25, 26:1, 134:1,5; II 20:6, 23, 28:1, 36:1, 59, 67:4, 68:2,7, 69, 71:10, 74:5,8, 80:3, 81:3,7, 82:22, 83:3–5, 86; III 3:2,10,12, 7:1,3, 19:6, 21:3, 26, 33:2,4.

fine of the head (emenda capitis): substitute for a capital sentence. Once the defendant’s man price (see composition) had been paid to the plaintiff, his estates could be redeemed for the price of their common estimation, with two thirds of the payment going to the judge and one third to the plaintiff. (Trip. II 43:3) Normally, the fine was paid instead of the execution of the sentence. Since they were not subject to capital punishment, clergy, women, and the kinsmen of the plaintiff were instead condemned to the fine of the head. 1439:33; 1445:11; 1471:28; 1495:17,19,35; 1498:4:1; Trip. I 134:2; II 20:4,10, 30:5, 39:1, 41:6, 42:4–6, 43, 44:7, 47, 51:2–4, 54:4, 61, 65, 67, 70, 83:4.

fine of the tongue (emenda lingue): judicial fine for procedural faults, amounting to 100 florins and causing the suspension of the trial. Until the culprit paid the fine, his ability to sue at court was suspended, “his tongue tied.” 1464:6; 1481:13; 1486:7,54; Trip. I 25:2, 134:5; II 42:4, 72, 83:4; III 4:2, 7:1.

florin (florenus, Hung. forint): gold florins began to be minted under Charles I, c. 1325 (first mentioned in 1326). They were modeled after the Florentine fiorino d’oro (hence the name). Their gold content was the same as the fiorino (3.52 g), but the coins were slightly heavier (3.56 g) because the alloy was less fine, see Hóman (1922), Laszlovszky (2018) 279–94. The value of a florin was one quarter of a mark (q.v.) 1405/II:7; 1427(b):1–2,4; 1435/I:12; 1444:8; 1447:23,30,37; CC:8,35; 1458/1:12; 1464:26; 1478:4; 1481:5; 1492:99; 1495:9; 1523:33; Trip. I 93:4, 133:4; II 28, 32:11–12.

fortified house (castellum, Hung. kastély, Germ. Schloss): the term used by us for a noble residence (“country house”) that was not necessarily fortified in a military sense. The distinction between castrum and castellum is a moot point among art historians and archeologists, see Györffy (1975); Kubinyi (1991, 2000); Virágos (2002) 1298:2; 1446:2,7; 1462:1; 1486:62; 1492:14,107; 1492Slav:10; Trip. I 14:10 24:1–4,7; II 76:3–4.

fratres (carnales, uterini): see brothers

fratres (condivisionales, generationales): see kinsmen

free village (libera villa): those villages of hospites-settlers (q.v.) which had been given either free royal city status in the second half of the thirteenth or market town (oppidum) status by the second half of the fourteenth century. See Engel (2001), 254–5. A clear terminological distinction in the sources can only be observed from the early fifteenth century. 1267:5; 1290:9; CC:2; 1351:6; 1458/II:32; 1467:2.

frivolous prosecution (calumnia): unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price (see composition). Prior to the fifteenth century, the term might include astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney (q.v.), or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice. C 1440:3,20; 1447:9; 1481:17; 1486:55; 1492:73:5; 1500:21:5; 1504:11; Trip. I 134:5; II 25, 34:5, 42:4, 70–71, 80:4, 82:21, 83:4,6.

frater condivisionalis: see divisional kinsman

freeman (liber): an indeterminate social category in eleventh-century Hungary, probably identical with “commoner” (vulgaris), including members of the conquering clans (even if they had become dependent on a landowner or the king) and others who received liberty from the king. This status seems to have been documented by the payment of the “freeman’s pennies”, the liberi denarii. A class of freemen persisted in the market towns (shopkeepers, craftsmen, etc.) while there remained until the eighteenth century some independent farmers who were neither nobles nor under seigniorial authority. St1:14,22,28,29; SSz:30; La2:6,11–12,14,16; La3:4–5,8,13,17; Col:40,45,80; SStr:87; 1222:3.

generatio, genus: see kindred gentleman of the realm (regnicola, lit.: “inhabitant of the realm”): the term we use for those inhabitants who, as owners of land and lords of tenant peasants, enjoyed political rights; its equation with the “members of the estates” was gradual and hardly complete by the end of the Middle Ages. However, regnicola/ae, may occasionally refer to inhabitants of the country in general, or inlanders in contrast to foreigners. 1290:22; 1298:4–5,16; 1351:6,13,16,18; 1397:6,32,36,48–49,58,62–64; 1435/I:3; 1439:2; 1458/I:3,5,13; 1458/II:2,37; 1492:13; Trip. I 14:10, 23; II 75:1, 77:5, etc.

genus, generatio: see kindred goods and property rights: see property rights

groat (grossus, Germ. Groschen, Hung. garas): a silver coin of good quality (with a fineness of “sixteenth firing” i.e., 0.9375), minted in Hungary from 1329 to 1338. 56 groats then had the value of one Buda mark. Even after its minting was suspended, the term groat long remained in use as a money of account see Laszlovszky (2018) 279–94. 1351:4–5,21; CC:2.

guard (speculator, custos confiniorum, Hung. őr): a man performing special military service, who garrisoned royal castles and the borders of the realm. Many of them may have belonged to distinct tribes of Hungarians or people related to them, who joined the Magyars at the time of their move into the Carpathian Basin (Kabars, Székely q.v.). See Göckenjan (1972). La2:17; La3:1.

guardianship (tutela): tutelage over orphans under lawful age (q.v.), in practice the right of control of their possessions. W. differentiates three kinds of guardianship: statutory, testamentary, and appointed. W. dwells extensively on the different aspects of guardianship probably in an attempt to restructure the institution on the basis of Roman Law. Several features of guardianship listed by W. more characterize the post-Tripartitum period than his own. See Degré (1977) Rady (2015) 98–107. Trip. I 56:1, 91:1, 111–132.

guest (hospes): originally an alien who came to live in the kingdom of Hungary, mainly Western knights and clerks; later, in considerable numbers, urban and rural settlers from the increasingly overpopulated West (Italians and Walloons, called Latini) (q.v.); South Germans, called Teutonici; Rhinelanders, called Saxones; and others). They enjoyed special privileges similar to the so-called ius Teutonicum in Poland, Occasionally the word was also used for a traveling foreign merchant. From the mid-thirteenth century onward, hospites were not always foreigners: settlers of newly colonized areas from Hungary and Moravia, Poland or the Balkans received the same privileges of personal freedom, limited dues, and village autonomy. See Fügedi (1975/1986). St1:24; La2:16,18; Col:35,80; 1222:11,19; 1231:4,11,14; 1267:2; 1290:2,4,9; SSz:25.

hereditas: with few exceptions, where it unequivocally refers to inheritance (which, however, is more frequently called patrimonium), the term is used for property or property rights (q.v.). Col:20–21; 1435/I:18; 1486:26; Trip. I 17:1, 46:6, 90.

Holy Crown of Hungary (sacra corona regni Hungarie): refers to the royal office, occasionally to the coronation jewel, the so-called ‘St. Stephen’s Crown’. The regalia were kept, from the mid-fourteenth century at Visegrád and, after having been recovered from Emperor Frederick III (1463), several means of regulation concerning the keeping and guarding the crown were introduced between 1464 and 1500. The account given in Trip. I 3:6 was in the later nineteenth century used, quite anachronistically, as an expression of the constitutional state. See Péter (2003) Bak–Pálffy (forthc. 2020). 1222:31; 1267:Preamb. 1386:3; 1397:49; 1427(b):6; 1439:6,16,29; 1440:2; 1444:3,5; 1446:10; 1458/II:33; 1481:4; 1492:4; 1518T:2; Trip. I 3:6, 4:1, 10:1, 13:2,4–5, 16:6, 24, 26, 37:2,5,8, 64, 66:4, 84:1; II 3:2, 14:31,34, 41–43, 30:5, 39:3, 57:2, 65:5; III 1:1.

homagium: see composition

homo foeminei sexus: see female line

homo impossessionatus: see man without property

homo possessionatus: see man of property homo regius: see bailiff, royal honor (honor): a set of offices at court and/or in one or more counties granted during the king’s pleasure (durante beneplacito regis). Honors became the main feature of government under the Anjou kings, granted usually to a baron (q.v.) normally with complete civil and military authority in his province(s), and enjoying the revenues of the royal domains lying within it. See Engel (1996). Sigismund’s new policy of donation led to the gradual disappearance of the honor-system. From the mid-fifteenth century onward, honors could chiefly be found on the southern frontier of the realm, as the major resource for the maintenance of the border castle system. Honores was as a term also used more generally for all royal appointments (e.g., in eschatocols of charters as early as the Árpáadian period) 1397:6, 12; 1435/I:2, 5–6, 22; 1439:5, 8, 12, 15, 25–26; 1443:3–4; 1444:2, 9; 1446:3; 1447:4, 6, 28; 1453:3; 1454:2–3; 1458/I:7; 1492:33; 1492 Slav:11:3; 1495:19:4; 1498:44, 46, 57, 70; 1504:2; 1514:56; Trip. I 14:15; II 13:5.

hospes: see guest hussar (Hung. huszár): light cavalrymen, equipped with sabers and only lightly armed, these played an increasing role in the Hungarian armies, mainly as a counterweight to the Ottoman spahi cavalry. By the close of the Middle Ages some hussars were fitted with armor. See Hermann (2012).

impignoratio: see pledge infidelity, charge of (nota infidelitatis) also translated as perfidy. Specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. Rady (2015) 112–5; 1222:Esch; 1298:3; 1397:56; 1404/II:1,4,6; 1443:2; 1444:7; 1458/I:6; 1458/II:31–33,38; 1459:32; 1462:2; 1464:4,10,19; 1471:29; 1481:15; 1486:32,46,67; 1492:13–15; 1492:79,107; 1495:3–4,9; 1498:10,18–19,32,46,72–73; 1504:4; 1514:14,49; 1518B:21; 1523:40; 1526:34; Trip. I 9:6, 14, 16, 20, 24:10, 25:1, 28, 32, inheritance: the rights of collateral branches of the kindred based on the fiction of common ownership of every male kinsman of the ancestral (hereditary) property. Probably the general practice since ancient times; laws were issued to the contrary (especially in favor of donations to churches), e.g., 1290:18, but this rule was confirmed in the clause on aviticitas (q.v.) (1351). In practice this meant that after the extinction of a branch in the male line, its property devolved upon the other branches in proportion to the proximity of descent. Purchased property was freely disposable, and some donations had specific inheritance rules. St1:6; Col:20–21; 1222:4; 1231:5; 1298:2,10; 1351:Preamb. 1464:16; Trip. I 16, 20:2, 21:4,6, 36:2, 38–41, 47, 49–50, 56:2, 57–58, 65:5, 67, 70:4, 71, 106, 108; II 62:4 (see also betrayal of fraternal blood, default of issue, division, female line).

49, 56:2, 104, 119:1, 121:4; II 12:6, 43:5, 44:2, 54:7, 57:2–3, 65:5–6, 66, 73:5, 74:10, 75; III 4:3, 25:2.

of the female line: purchased property, and certain specified donations devolved equally to the male and female lines 1222:4; 1462:3; 1514:62; Trip. I 19:1, 21:4, 48, 73:1–2, 119:3 (see also female line, filial quarter).

mutual: frequently concluded between families using the device of fraternal adoption (q.v.), by the terms of which one family would succeed to the other's lands, should either expire through default of issue (q.v.). Such agreements required royal consent 1498:65; Trip. I 16:2, 20, 65:4–5, 66, 67:2.

inquest,

common (inquisitio communis): procedure for obtaining material proof in which abutters, neighbors, and other nobles from the county (comprovinciales) (q.v.) swore an oath on their faith and “fidelity to the Holy Crown” regarding the truth of their testimony, usually in matters of property rights. The inquest, as ordered by a higher court, was usually held where the disputed estate was located or the criminal act perpetrated. See Fügedi (1989): ch. VI. 1351:22–23; 1397:51; 1435/I:8; 1464:28; 1471:9,22,28; 1486:10–11,14–16; 1492:56; 1500:3; 1504:5; 1523:58; Trip. II 21:3, 26:5, 27–29, 31–32, 67:9–10, 81:1–2, 83:3; III 27:8.

simple (inquisitio simplex): normally preceded the lawsuit, performed up to three times, and aimed at establishing the charges of the claimant. Trip. II 21:3; III 27:5.

at extraordinary county assembly (per modum proclamate congregationis) practically did not provide material proof, instead it recorded a common declaration of the assembly. 1351:23; 1471:22; 1523:50.

inquilinus: (Hung. zsellér): (cottar) landless peasants and often wage laborers. The term acquired a more general legal meaning in the later Middle Ages: persons without at least a quarter of a porta (telek) (see plot), regardless of their economic status. 1459:5; 1514:22.

inscription (inscriptio): a Roman legal term (= record of the accusation in criminal trials) used in Hungarian law in an entirely different meaning; apparently a form of transfer of property, partly by donation, partly by purchase, mentioned a few times by W., but inconsistently, and seldom found in charter material. The term may also refer to impignoratio (see pledge). 1492:4 (pledge); Trip. I 13:3, 17:4, 48:5, 69:1; II 71. By the eighteenth century it meant any form of royal donation.

insinuatio (citatio cum insinuatione): see terminal summons institution (introductio or statutio): the procedure required to validate the acquisition of property. Grantees of royal donations (q.v.) or new owners of purchased, pledged or exchanged estates were expected to take possession of the land within a year, with the assistance of a royal bailiff (q.v.) specified in the charter, and witnessed by a specified place of authentication (q.v.) in the presence of abutters (q.v.) and neighbors. Institution could be thwarted by anyone present who made contradiction (q.v.) or repulsio (q.v.), i.e., opposed the execution (q.v.). Moreover, any interested party could object to the institution by announcing his protest (prohibitio) within two weeks, thus initiating a lawsuit. Rady (2015) 38–41. 1435/I:8–11,17; 1447:30; 1478:8; 1481:15; 1486:16,26–27,77; 1492:53; Trip. I 4, 8, 28, 29:1, 30:3, 32, 37:3, 63, 66, 67:1, 131; II 12:4–5, 18:2,4, 19:2,5, 21, 45:1,4, 71:2,7,12, 73:4, 76:4, 86:10. Trip. II 73–4.

iobagio: see jobagio/jobbágy

Ishmaelite: the collective name for Muslims, whether traveling merchants or settled populations, who served also as auxiliary troops; in the thirteenth century Muslims appear mainly as administrators and farmers of royal revenue and counts of chambers (q.v.). See Berend (2001), passim. SSz:9; Col:46–49; 1222:24.

ispán (comes, comes parochialis; from Slavic župan, “local lord”): between the eleventh and thirteenth centuries, the royal officer in charge of one of the counties or of a royal forest or border district; the commander of the castle warriors and other militiamen, supervisor of different serving people (such as the men of the castle, the udvarnoks, etc.), collector of revenues in his district, and judge (initially together with the royal judge, occasionally with the bishop) of the free and unfree men in the county. From the thirteenth century onward, the word seems to have been used more widely for members of families which had ispáns among their ancestors, even though no hereditary comes title was granted in Hungary until the later Middle Ages. Until the mid-fourteenth century the ispáns were regarded as barons. With the development of the corporation of nobles in every county, the ispán, who came to be called főispán (in modern texts often translated as lord lieutenant), remained the royal officer, but exercised his duties in concert with the county magistrates and left the actual administration to his retainer, the alispán (q.v.).

perpetual: some lords (first bishops later also barons) were granted the title of perpetual ispán of their counties from the fourteenth century onwards 1351:esch. 1384:passim; 1447:4; 1492:21; 1498:22; Trip. II 13:5–6.

of the Székely: by the fifteenth century usually an office granted to the voivode of Transylvania, thus extending his jurisdiction to the community of these free border guards 1435/I:1; 1492:8,33; 1498:21; Trip. I 94:2; III 4:3–5. See Székely.

iudex curie regie: see judge royal iudex nobilium: see magistrate, noble

iugerum (Hung. hold), a measure of land of Roman origin (120×240 feet = 0.66 acre), but of highly variable size. In medieval Hungary a ‘royal hold’ was equal to 0.84 ha. See Bogdán (1978), 190.

iura possessionaria (acquisita, empta, hereditaria, etc.): see property rights

ius foemineum: see female line

ius regium: see right, royal

ius quarte filialis: see filial quarter

jobagio castri: see castle warrior

jobagio/jobbágy: (1) a chief royal retainer around 1190–1230, so called from a Latinized Hungarian word, probably originating in jobb = “better”, meaning “better men” (cf. Lat. optimates). In earlier documents, used for officers of royal household, also for the landed members of the armed retinue (see below s.v. castle warrior). In about the early thirteenth century (e.g., in the Golden Bull), the term was applied to the highest officers of the realm who held “honors”, i.e., administrative and judicial posts, offices of ispán (q.v.) in important counties and governorships granted for time at the king's pleasure. 1222:10,13,30; 1231:Preamb.

(2) From c.1250 onward the term was transferred to a much lower social group; see tenant peasant.

judex nobilium or servientium: see magistrate, noble judge (judex): references to judges in general in the laws of the eleventh century suggest a system of royal judges who administered justice in the counties, occasionally together with the ispán. Their office may have been modeled on Bavarian judices (whose exact duties are not known) because the passages in which they occur mostly derive from South German parallels. Some judges are also referred to as bilochi (Hung. billogos, from billog = “sign”, or “seal of summons”); at first, they were probably assistants to the judices (bailiffs, q.v.) and, later, justices in the counties until 1240. The term was, of course, also used in general for any judicial officer presiding over a court and passing judgment. See also judge royal, palatine, ispán. St1:2,33; SSz:42; La2:3,6–7,10; La3:15–16,19,22–27; Col:6,9–12,14,23–28–31,37,50–51,59,84; 1222:5,8; 1231:6,9; 1279:7; 1290:2–3,8–9,21; 1298:11,13; C 1440:3–5,8–9,11,19; 1351:1,10,24; 1397:4,51,55; 1405/II:3; 1427(a):1–2; 1435/I:1,16–17; 1435/II:7; 1443:2; 1444:9; 1445:7,11; 1458/II:27; 1462:2,5; 1464:16,19; 1471:12; 1486:3–5,14,20; ArtPal:9; 1492:55; 1495:18; 1514:56. Trip. I 30:3, 31:1; II 56–58, 60–63, 65, 67, 69–70.

judge royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró): originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine (q.v.) became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200). From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda. The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. Some towns came to be briefly subject to this judge. 1222:9,30; 1231:10; 1290:5,8; 1298:13; C 1440:2,19; 1320:1–2; 1324; 1351:9,23; 1397:12,69; 1405/II:4; 1435/I:1,4,7,17; 1435/II:7–8,29–30; 1444:24; 1446:7; 1447:15,24; 1486:52–55,68,71; 1492:14,42,66; 1498:43,70; 1500:6; 1518B:6; Trip. I 29:1, 30:3, 94:2; III 3:6.

judicium: usually: fine (q.v.); but in the earlier laws often: ordeal (q.v.)

justice (judge) ordinary (judex ordinarius): usually one of the high justices of the royal court, but occasionally a judge (in a certain case) who acted not on a special commission but on the basis of his office (e.g., as ispán or voivode). C 1440:1–3,5,19; 1328; 1397:51; 1405/I:7; 1405/II:1; 1439:33; 1440:4; 1445:16; 1446:13; 1462:2,5,12,19; 1471:27; 1486:6,13,20,23,52–53; 1492:49,66,90; 1504:9; Trip. I 34, 115:4; II 55.

kindred (generatio, genus; Hung. nemzetség): an extended kinship group, comprising several patrilineal families, which was the basic unit of both the conquering Hungarians and other nomads (e.g., the Cumans); the original settlement areas of the Magyar clans seem to have often become the nuclei of counties (hence, as territorially defined groups they are different from “clans” in current anthropological usage). From the thirteenth century, noble clans claiming common descent from a known warrior or other royal grantee (de genere) were the prime possessors of inherited and acquired landed property, often holding them jointly (see s.v. condivisionalis). In order to distinguish the Hungarian kinship system from other, slightly similar ones, Erik Fügedi introduced the term klán, which is translated here as “kindred.” See Fügedi (1998). Historians, nonetheless, cannot agree whether the kindreds that emerged to light in the documentary record in the thirteenth century have any relation to the leading groups amongst the Hungarians of the time of the ninth-century conquest. 1222:4; 1267:6,9; 1279:1–3,6–7; 1290:23; C 1440:4,10; 1397:54; 1439:32; 1486:55; Trip. I 16:1, 36:2, 39:1,3–4, 67:1,3, 88:1, 121:2; III 4.

kinsmen (fratres): see also betrayal of fraternal blood, guardianship, inheritance by blood (generationales): male members of the kindred excluding those by marriage. Trip. I 15:1; I 36:2.

joint-owning (indivisi): kinsmen holding undivided property together. Evidence suggests that the practical division between kinsmen often preceded formal legal division. 1231:6; 1397:6; 1435/II:2; 1492:89; Trip. I 43:4, 99, 101:3, 102:3; II 18:3, 34:6.

co-inheriting (condivisionales): kinsmen, who had inheritance rights to the originally common property of the kindred. C 1440:10; 1514:62; Trip. I 46, 50, 62:2, 63, 66:1, 67:1,3, 70:4, 78:5, 119:2; II 44:6.

Kreutzer (Hung. krajcár): small value copper or rarely silver (in Bavaria) coin named after the Tirolean groat of the late thirteenth century depicting a cross (Kreuz). Originally 156 pieces were minted out of one mark of Trent and each was equal to four denarii of Vienna. 1521:6[14]; 1526:39.

Latins (Latini): Romance-speaking, mostly Lombard, French, and Walloon settlers in the older urban centers of Hungary, such as Esztergom and Székesfehérvár, and also in northern Hungary (diocese of Eger). Sources also refer to them as Gallici, Italici, Flandrenses and Wallones. SSz:31.

letter of age (littere revisionales aetatis; Hung. időlátott levél): record usually issued by places of authentication concerning a person's age. (see also age) Trip. I 126:1, 127–9; III 30.

letter of attorney or of advocacy (littere procuratorie): a record issued by a place of authentication (q.v.), listing one or more persons as legal representatives or attorneys (q.v.) of someone, empowering them to act in all stages of litigation. Prelates and barons had the right to issue such letters under their own seal. Minors were represented by their guardians through letters of age (q.v.), not through letters of attorney. 1351:14; 1492:97; 1504:14; Trip. I 128; II 13:6,8, 53:3.

letter of (perambulation of) boundaries (littere metales): rarely self-standing letter recording boundaries of a landed estate; more often it only formed a part of a letter of record of purchase or pledge which required the identification of the boundaries as part of the transaction. 1435/I:10; 1492:95; Trip. I 33, 84:4–5, 85–86.

letter of command (littere preceptorie): mandate issued in a great variety of matters of administration or law. c.1320:1; 1404/II:6; 1435/I:5,8; 1443:3; 1446:13; 1458/1:16; 1492:9,46; 1495:3:1; 1498:8:4,71; 1500:13–14; 1504:23:2; Trip. I 45; II 28:1, 75:1.

letter of complaint, royal (littere querimoniales regales): royal mandate specifying the plaint for initiating a lawsuit and ordering an extraordinary county assembly (q.v.). 1435/I:3; 1439:29; Trip. II 14:36.

letter of delivery (littere exhibitorie): usually a letter ordering a place of authentication (q.v.) to deliver a royal mandate – cf. Borsa (1993) –, but also a letter requesting a litigant to present at court documents relevant to his suit q.v. notice.

letter of division (littere divisionales) landed properties held in common by the kindred were occasionally divided among them, see division. Trip. I 37:12, 46.

letter of donation (littere donationales) royal (rarely private) charters on land grant, see donation. 1435/I:12; 1464:23; 1486:23,27; 1514:53; Trip. I 6:2, 21–22, 26:1,4, 31, 34, 36:2, 37:5–6,12, 38, 43, 48, 50:3, 86:4; II 12:2, 14:26,28,39.

letter of final summons (littere proclamatorie): if a party failed to appear after five (later three) summons, the judge could order that the summons be announced at the weekly fair held in three places in the county (usually on three consecutive days). See final summons. 1435/I:10–11.

letter of fine (littere iudiciales or birsagiales) charters on final or intermediate sentences (see trial) or fine (see birsagium) 1435/I:7; 1467:7; 1492:26; 1498:5; 1500:3–4; Trip. II 59.

letter of institution (littere statutorie): record by a place of authentication (q.v.) that the institution (q.v.) of an owner into his property had been performed. Trip. I 6:2, 33–34; II 11:1, 12:2.

letter of inquest (littere inquisitorie): mandate ordering an inquest (q.v.), and also specifying whether the witnesses' names and status should be recorded. 1435/I:10–11; 1492:56:4; 1498:35:3; Trip. II 32, 34:1, 67:12; III 27.

letter of notice (littere ammonitorie): see notice; Trip. I 33.

letter of pledge (littere impignoratorie): record of the pledge of a property (q.v.) sometimes including the cost of redemption, which otherwise was determined by estimation (q.v.). Trip. I 82:7–8,10, 102:3; II 20:1.

letter of protest (littere inhibitorie, prohibitorie): see prohibition. 1435/I:11; Trip. I 79:2; III 15:2.

letter of public trust (littere fidei publice): record with function similar to safe conducts 1462:2; Trip. I 14:9

letter of purchase (littere emptionales): Trip. I 48:5, 102:2.

letter of receipt (littere expeditorie) was issued for fines or revenues paid, 1521:[22]; Trip. I 6:2, 37:12, 82:10; II 84:7.

letter of recognizance or of record (littere fassionales): record of any recognizance (fassio, see recognizance) made in a legal matter at a place of authentication (q.v.). 1435/I:10–11; Trip. I 21, 37:5, 58:1, 59:4–5, 60, 61:1, 69, 71, 74:1, 102, 133:5.

letter of recovery (littere recaptatorie): see property rights, recovery of letter of report (littere relatorie): report of the place of authentication (q.v.) in response to a mandate (see letter of command), issued always in the form of a letters close. 1504:11; Trip. II 12:4, 29, 35, 74.

letter of sentence, adjudication (littere sententiales, adiudicatorie) legal record of final sentence in a lawsuit. 1435/I:11; 1454:15; 1471:12; 1492:14,51; Trip. II 6:11, 27:20, 28:1, 52:2, 55:1, 57:5–6, 58, 59:1–2, 65:4, 76, 77:5,7–9, 83:4–5; III 26:10.

letter of summons (littere evocatorie): mandate (mandatum evocatorium) sent by the king or a royal justice to a place of authentication (q.v.) ordering that a designated royal bailiff (q.v.) should summon a certain plaintiff in the case raised by him to a given term, usually the next octave court (q.v.). The summons had to be delivered at the nobleman's residence (locus solitae residentiae), or in his absence handed to his steward or a tenant. If the party failed to appear, he was summoned five more times. 1397:62; 1435/I:10–11; 1464:4; 1471:28; 1498:5; 1500:4; Trip. II 25:2, 34:3, 61, 82:1.

letter of transfer (littere transmissionales): the instrument moving a case from one court to another by way of appeal. Trip. III 35.

libera civitas: see city, free littere &c. – see above under letter of &c.

loca credibilia: see places of authentication

liber, liberi denarii: see freeman

lucrum camerae: see the chamber's profit

magistrate, noble (judex nobilium, or judex servientium, hence Hung. szolgabíró, “judge of servitors” or “servitor of the judge”): one of the elected judges and administrative officers of the noble county (q.v.), originally (c.1230–50) a delegate of servientes on judicial or administrative commissions (such as those created to settle land disputes), also arbitrators and witnesses (boni homines); the office gradually evolved into a local judiciary of which usually four were elected or selected for every county, later with responsibilities in a defined quarter (circuit, Hung. járás) of the county. See Rady (2000), Zsoldos (2003) and Tringli (2009). 1290:3,7–8; 1298:3–4,11; C 1440:1; 1320:1; 1328; CC:2,16,21; 1397:53,61,66,68; 1405/II:10,16; 1411:4,6; 1427(a):1; 1435/I:1–3,5,7,13,17; 1435/II:4,7–8; 1439:29; 1444:10; 1447:7,19–20,22,24; 1454:4,11,15; 1458/I:6,15; 1458/II:40–41; 1459:24; 1467:6–7; 1471:16,31; 1478:15; 1486:9,51,73; 1492:26,33–34,53,73,90; 1492Slav:4; 1495:10,12,15–21,24,37; 1498:15,35,60,71; 1500:42; 1504:16,18; 1514:4,6–7,26–29,31,33,37–39,41,45,50,52; 1518T:15; 1518B:28; 1521:13[21],22[30]; 1523:50; Trip. I 29:1, 45, 115:4; III 3:7,13, 6–7, 25:5, 26:1,3,7, 32, 33:1, 35.

magister tavernicorum: see master of the treasury magnates (maiores, principes, potentes): leading men in eleventh and twelfth-century Hungary, originally members of the king's retinue, consisting of the old tribal leaders (or their descendants) and foreign knights; from the late twelfth century also called jobagiones (q.v.), especially when holding royal appointments (honores). From the late thirteenth century onwards members of this upper stratum of society (aristocrats) were usually referred to as barons (q.v.). St1:25; La3:1,10,15; Col:11; 1222:2,28; 1231:2; 1351:16; 1397:2,50; 1439:25; 1447:28,37,41; 1454:4–5,9; Prop:21; 1498:8:1; 1514:35; Trip. I 2:1, 5:1, 6:4, 9:7, 40:2, 64:1, 84:3–4, 93:3–4, 133:5; II 4:2, 13:7, 14:12, 54:6, 67:1.

man of property (homo possessionatus): a social category of owners of land who were often distinguished in the laws from nobles. References to them are curious insofar as in late medieval Hungary virtually all landed property was in the hands of nobles (or, in small part, of citizens of free cities). Nevertheless, a class of non-noble freemen persisted up to the eighteenth century. Cf. Bónis (1947/2003). See also freeman. Prop:1–2,5–6,14,16; 1444:3,25; 1445:4,13,22; 1447:7; 1458/I: 2,13,15; 1459:5; 1474:1; 1486:64; 1492:18–20,30; 1495:9,19,44; 1498:38; 1521:9[17],13[21],15[23]; 1523:19; Trip. I 10, 23, 37:13, 46:4, 57, 64:2, 65–66, 70:3, 83, 134:3; II 11:4, 67:6, 68; III 19:3–6, 22:2, 26:4–5,8–9, 27:3.

man price: see composition

man without property (homo impossessionatus): usually refers to non-noble (ignobilis) persons who married into noble kindreds and only received lands through the filial quarter of their noble spouse. In most cases such persons were not regarded as true nobles, being instead designated either as ignoble or nobles after their wife (post uxorem nobilis) or nobles due to the filial quarter. 1435/I:18; 1500:14; Trip. I 29:7–8; III 27:1.

manse (mansus): in the eleventh century the name of a unit encompassing a servile peasant household, probably including the servile family (mancipia), some land, and tools (also called predium, q.v.). By the late thirteenth century, the name was transferred to the “typical” tenant-holding (Hung. telek), also called a sessio. (v. plot). St2:1; 1298:15.

mardurina: marten-fur tax collected, primarily, in Slavonia but also in other parts of the Hungarian kingdom. Originally it was levied in kind but following the reform of King Coloman, it was expected in cash. It was fixed at twelve Friesach pennies after each manse. After the exemption of the nobles of Slavonia from royal taxation in 1351, the mardurina became the tax imposed on tenant peasants and hospites. See Klaić (1904). 1222:27; 1231:20,33; 1351:12; 1397:36; 1439:6–7; 1444:3; 1458/II:33; 1464:23; 1492:26.

mark: a measure of silver (and sometimes of gold), often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century, the Buda mark (~245.54 gr.), belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary. See Hóman (1916). 1290:14,16; C 1440:8,10–11,20; CC:1–4,6,9,19,25,28–29,38–39,41,45,49; 1351:2,7,10,17,24; 1397:6; 1405/I:15; 1427(b):1,4; 1435/I:2,7–8,10,13; 1447:24; 1458/I: 15; 1459:7,18; 1467:7; 1486:8–9,14,16,29,39,58,63–65,67; 1492:26,29,55,73:1,89,94; 1495:6,9,18; 1498:1:3,35; 1500:15; 1504:16:4; 1523:33; Trip. I 2:2, 93:4, 94:3, 133, 134:6; II 20:5–6, 23, 28, 32:11, 40:2, 67:8, 69:1–2, 70:5, 72–74, 80, 81:3,7, 82:22, 83:3–4, 86; III 3:4,7,10,12, 4:3–4, 5, 26:4,8,16; 32:1, 33:2.

market town (oppidum): see town

master of the treasury (magister tavernicorum): [in Árpád age laws translated as chamberlain] the title of a royal officer, originally responsible for the royal court's provisioning, derived from the Hungarian name for the guards of royal magazines (tavernici); from the fourteenth century onwards, the master of the treasury was no longer associated with the treasury, but was rather the presiding judge of the appeal court of certain royal cities (sedes tavernicalis). 1290:5; CC:2,7,12,16,32–34,36,38,40,42–43,46–47; 1405/I:4,8,12; 1405/II:4,11; Prop:22; 1435/I:15; 1439:10; 1486:68,73; 1492:11:2; 1521:[19]; Trip. I 94:2; III 8:2, 10–11.

men of the castle (cives, civiles, castrenses rarely: castellani): a general category used in the eleventh and twelfth centuries to designate men attached to the royal domain under the command of the ispán and obliged to maintain (and perhaps also to defend) the castles; it is possible that civiles held some land and owned agricultural implements (similar to udvarnok, q.v.), while cives were bound to perform all kinds of services. La1:8; Col:45,81; SStr:69.

men of the realm: see gentlemen of the realm metallic reambulatio: see borders, perambulation of miles: see warrior

new donation (nova donatio): a feature that was introduced in the fourteenth century (with probable antecedents); its implications are debated, cf. Engel (1997) and Rady (2001). W. seems to have implied that it served as a kind of corroboration of an earlier donation, and not, as it may have been originally, as a device to exclude kinsmen from inheritance. La1:8; Col:45,81; SStr:69.

new trial (novum iudicium): a retrial, usually following a petition to the king, a repulsio (q.v.), prohibition (q.v), or the collapse of the first trial (see failure of cases); see: trial. 1492:51–52; 1495:3; 1504:11; 1518B:29; Trip. II 18:3, 56:2, 70:4, 75, 77–79, 81:6, 83:4; III 6, 11.

ninth (nona): one of the most substantial elements of seigniorial revenues from the first third of the fourteenth century onwards. Similar to tithing, it meant in fact the “second” tithe, often paid before the ecclesiastical tithe, on wine and grain, but the ninth was frequently demanded after livestock as well. Local customary arrangements differed, however, in regard to what items were subject to the ninth and many communities did not pay this seigniorial due at all. Despite the widely accepted theory, the nona was not introduced in the decree of 1351:6 as this article merely ordered its uniform collection in order to defend the interest of the lesser nobility. Solymosi (1998), Laszlovszky (2018) 265–78. 1351:6; 1435/I:10; 1492:47,49,104; 1495:44; 1498:41; 1500:27,29; Trip. II 10:2.

noble retainer (familiaris): a lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron (q.v.) or major landowner. He kept his noble privilege and was subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which he received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The laws (esp.

the Trip.!) refer to it very rarely, as in principle all noblemen (q.v.) were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European vassalage but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. The earliest reference to a “warrior (q.v.) of another,” which may imply something of this kind is in St1:23. See Fügedi (1998), 137–40, Rady (2000), 110–31, and Bak, (2011). 1298:12; C 1440:11; 1397:48; 1427(a):4–5; 1435/I:6; 1439:18; 1443:3; 1446:2; 1458/I:11; 1486:15,31,33–34,65; 1492:28,56:5; 1500:8; Trip. I 21, 43; II 23, 67:13, 71, 82.

nobleman (nobilis): in medieval Hungary, a wide stratum of landowners, normally holding property originally granted by the king and enjoying, in principle, equal rights regardless of wealth and status (see Trip. I 2–3, II 4). In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the term denoted a magnate; then, in the late thirteenth century the lesser royal warriors (servientes regis q.v.) began to call themselves nobles, and gradually this identification was accepted by the royal chancellery. Since the mid-fourteenth century almost all landowners were regarded as nobles and claimed the privileges granted in the Golden Bulls of 1222 and 1231 (see I 1222:4,7–8,19,31; 1231:5–6,8–11, 1267:4–10; 1290:6–7,18–20,23–24,27–28; 1298:3–4,12–13,17; 2 1351:Preamb,11; 5 II 6:6, 14:10. Nobles enjoyed freedom from taxation in return for military service. On their major privileges, see Trip. I 9. See Rady (2015) 65–77.

acquisition of nobility: (by birth) Trip I 7; (by grant or ennoblement) Trip I 4, 6; (by adoption) Trip I 8 (see also adoption); (by descent even through a non-noble mother) Trip I 7, 22:3, 51:3.

nobles of the same county (comprovinciales): property owners living in the same county whose legal functions are mentioned in connection with inquests (q.v.) and institutions (q.v.). 1298:10; 1435/I:5; 1447:7; 1459:7; 1464:20; 1492:35,80; 1498:44; 1500:21:4; 1504:2:4; Trip. I 29:1; II 27:1; II 29; II 32:1; II 41:2–4.

non-noble retainers or servitors: freemen (q.v.) who were treated at law as similar to peasants (see also tenant peasant). 1492:56; 1495:9; Trip. II 23:2, 51, 86:11; III 26–27.

nota infidelitatis: see (charge of) infidelity notables (proceres): an elusive term used in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries for those prestigious nobles who participated in the administration of the realm, but remained below the group of barons. Their exact position is not defined anywhere in the laws. The editors of DRMH translated it as “lords”. 1462:3; 1478:3; 1500:11; 1518T:2; Trip. I 2:1; I 9:7, I 13; II 14:50.

notice (admonitio): announcement that needed to be made to kinsmen, neighbors and abutters whenever a property was alienated. In all property transactions, a royal bailliff (q.v.) accompanied by a cleric, would visit the site of the property concerned and establish who else might have a legal interest in the property. They would then be issued with letters of notice (littere ammonitorie). Should a party so informed object to the transaction, the letter of notice might be combined with a summons. The letter of notice might also serve as an injunction, compelling the recipient to attend court and produce any relevant deeds affirming his legal rights to the property involved (see letter of delivery). Trip. I 60; II 24, 64:3, 71:1,3,10–12, 86:4,7.

nova donatio: see new donation

nova moneta (new money): from 1 Mark silver of 250 0/00 fineness 500 denar coins were minted mixed with copper, in an attempt to increase the royal income by devaluing the currency. Introduced in 1521, it led to economic chaos and was rescinded in 1526; see Laszlovszky (2018) 295–308. 1526:39.

novum iudicium: see new trial oath (iuramentum): a mode of proof that survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers. There were also special oaths, such as the oath sworn on the soil (iuramentum super terram) or the capital oath (iuramentum ad caput.) that the defendant was not allowed to counter by his own oath. Such a decisive oath was also allowed when the plaintiff presented three favorable letters of inquest (q.v.) and the defendant refused to submit to a fourth one. Those summoned to give evidence at an inquest (q.v.) were also expected to give evidence under oath. Rady (2015) 39–42 and passim. La3:21; 1290:14,26; C 1440:2; 1324:passim; 1328:passim; CC:15; 1397:51; 1411:3,5; 1427(a):1–2; 1435/I:3–4,6,8,10; 1435/II:7–8; 1439:29; 1446:5; 1447:40; 1454:4; 1458/I:16; 1462:3; 1471:28; 1474:16; 1478:5; 1481:17; 1486:8,10,14–15,41–42,60; 1492:22,56,72; 1495:9,38; 1498:51; 1500:18; 1514:42; 1518B:29; Trip. I 37:13–14, 38, 85:3, 130:1, 134:6; II 11:3, 27:2,9–10, 28, 30:6–7, 32–40, 41:6–7, 49:2–4, 52:4, 61:1, 67:12, 81:2; III 3:11, 34:2, 35.

of burghers: Trip. III 9:1, 17.

of Jews: Trip. III 36.

of office: 1427a:1; 1435/I:1; 1467:7; 1486:73; 1492:33,43; 1498:4; 1500:10[4]; 1504:2[1]; 1514:4[1]; 1518T:10,17; 1518B:18[19]–20[21].

of peasants: La3:1; 1464:24; 1478:15; 1514:5,42; Trip. III 3:18, 27, 28:1–2.

of Rákos: 1498:43 an oath similar to the one previously prescribed for officeholders, intended to guarantee equitable justice and the honest administration of revenues.

octave court (octava): the term of the session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times. Col:2; 1397:62; 1427(a):2–3; 1444: 20,25–26; 1445:4,6,11–12,20,23; 1458/I:1,4; 1458/II:2,27; 1459:22; 1462:1; 1464:5–7,12,28; 1471:9,12,27; 1474:10; 1478:11–13; 1486:3–4,6–7,17,19,23,25–27,33–34,52; 1492:10,16,41,49,52,54,73,96,104; 1495:1,8,14,43; 1498:2–3,8–10,64; 1500:1–3,6,9–11,13,15–16,18; 1504:13,30; 1526:20; Trip. I 14:12; I 25; I 30; I 33:2; I 45:1; I 46:3; I 60:2, 10; I 61:1; I 71:1; I 125; I 131; II 11:1; II 15:2; II 18:4; II 20; II 24:4; II 59:1–2; II 71:1, 10; II 77:10; II 80:3; II 81:6; II 86:7–8; III 3:2, 6, 12–13.

oppidum: see town

őr: see guard

ordeal (judicium): a medieval method of legal proof based on the belief in direct divine intervention in the determination of guilt. Medieval Hungarian evidence is available on ordeals of hot iron held at Oradea until the mid-thirteenth century, see Zajtay (1954), but judicial combat (see combat, judicial), practiced until much later, was also a form of ordeal. Ordeals were administered by the clergy of major churches. SSz:9,13,17,28,44,61; La2:4–6,16; La3:1–2,9,11,17; Col:22,32,42,52–53,55,76,83.

palatine, count palatine (comes palatines): originally the head of the king's household and highest officer in the realm. By the mid-twelfth century he had become the king's deputy and commander of the royal host; he gradually moved out of the court and served as the king's itinerant judge administering justice to the nobles (q.v.) and servientes regis (by c.1230) (q.v.). The palatine also became the judge of the Cumans. While his rights and duties were codified only in the sixteenth century (and not, as earlier assumed, in 1480s), he was in fact the highest officer of the realm. The names of almost all palatines are known from c.1150 onward; The election or selection of the palatine was a contested issue between king and estates. La3:3; Col:36–37; 1222:1,8,30–31; 1231:1,9; 1279:7; 1290:5,8; 1298:2,11,14; C 1440:2,19; 1351:9,23; 1397:1,6–7,12,50,69; 1405/I:5; 1405/II:4; Prop:19; 1435/I:1,4,7,20; 1435/II:7–8; 1439:2,29–30; 1444:2,24; 1446:7; 1447:2,15; 1458/I:3; 1478:12; 1486:20,24,26–27,52,54–55,68,73; 1492:19:4,33,35,66; 1498:43,47:2,70; 1518T:1; 1518B:5,39; 1523:51; 1526:2,22,30,34; Trip. I 94:2; II 2:5, 14:22, 39, 57:1.

paraphernalia: chattels (clothing etc.) given to the bride by her family (trousseau). 1492:46; 1500:16; Trip. I 28, 59:2, 67:2, 88, 93, 94:3, 100, 105–106; II 18:3, 24, 60:4; III 7:3,5.

penny (denarius, d): The most widespread coin minted in medieval Hungary, essentially following the types popular in neighboring areas (Viennese, Friesach pennies); originally minted in c. 0.6–0.8 gr silverweight, deteriorating during the twelfth century to as low as 0.15 gr, but regaining their normal size and weight until the mid-thirteenth. Due to the financial reform of King Sigismund (1392–1405), small value silver coins were again widely used but a fundamental deterioration can be observed by the mid-fifteenth century. The reform of King Matthias (re)ensured the stability of the pennies. See also nova moneta. La2:14; La3:8; Col:28,44–45,54,79–81; SStr:90; 1222:3,23; 1290:26; CC:1–2,4–5,8–10,12,15,17,19,25–26,29–31,33–35,38,47; 1351:4; 1397:6,69–70; 1405/II:7; 1411:1–2,5; 1427(a):7; 1427(b):1–4; 1435/I:10–12,16; 1439:10; 1444:8; 1447:24,37; 1458/II:39; 1467:2,7; 1474:9; 1478:4; 1481:5; 1486:36; 1495:40–41; 1498:54,64; 1514:1,15; 1518T:9,14; 1518B:18[19],33,45; 1521:[2]–[5],[8], 4 [12],38; 1523:2,33,38; 1526:40; Trip. II 68, 69:1, 86:12; III 3:12, 27:1.

pensa [auri] (gold pensa): money of account in eleventh-century Hungary, equal to one Byzantine gold solidus (or bezant), or to the value of a steer (young ox), or 40 pennies. St1:14; St2:9; SSz:14,16,28,42; La2:3–6,8; La3:1–5,9–10,15,18,20–21,23,25–26,28–29; Col:32,36,40–44,82–83; Collud:2–3; SStr:47,69,[85]; CC:1–2,4,25,41.

perambulation of boundaries: see boundaries

perfidy (charge of) see infidelity

personalis presentia regia (personal royal presence): court of royal personal presence which emerged as early as the thirteenth century. In the first third of the fourteenth century it was augmented with the court of the special personal presence. The court of the personal presence functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and it was led by the chancellor. After 1464, when it was united with the court of the special personal presence, it became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary (q.v.), the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff. See Bertényi (1970), Bónis (1977), Rady (2015) 50–4. 1404/II:1; 1435/I:4; 1439:29; 1444:24; 1462:1; 1474:12,15; 1478:12; 1498:38; 1504:31:4; 1514:55; 1518B:4; Trip. II 11:2; III 8:2, 10:2, 11, 19:5–6.

pertinentia: see appurtenances places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal (q.v.) documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances, q.v.), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs (q.v.). Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters (q.v.) and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See Eckhart (1913/15) Hunyadi (2003) and Rady (2015) 37–43. 1231:10; 1290:3; C 1440:19; 1320:1; 1351:10; 1404/II:1; 1435/I:8–10; 1462:1; 1492:43–44,96–97; 1498:65; Trip. I 21:3, 63, 86:3, 127, 128:1; II 12:2, 13:7–8, 15, 17:4, 19–22 passim, 56:1, 57:5, 74:10; III 13:1, 15:2, 27:4.

pledge (impignoratio): arrangement by which all or part of an estate was assigned together with its income to a creditor. Such pledging could also be ordered by a judge for the benefit of a plaintiff entitled to satisfaction or in matrimonial suits (dower, filial quarter [q.v.]). The contract of pledge needed to be authenticated by a place of authentication (q.v.). Relatives had preemptory rights. The creditor had full rights to the usufruct of the pledged property and could pledge it further but had to return it at a set date (32 years was the usual maximum term). This practice basically followed the Roman legal institution of pignus and antichresis. 1397:49; 1405/II:2; 1411:4; 1440:2; 1447:17; 1458/II:40; 1492:4,65; 1498:55; 1504:7; Trip. I 10:2; 23, 27:2, 58:1, 59:2, 60–61, 63:1; I 65:1; I 78; I 80–83; 102:3–4, 103; 110, 111:6–7; 134:2; II 18:3; II 19; II 20:1, 3; II 24; II 43:1; II 71; II 76:6–8; II 84:10; III 7:3, 5.

plot (tenant peasant's) (sessio iobagonalis): a complex made up of a plot in the village, arable land, and rights to commons assigned to one (or more) tenant peasants (Hung. telek, in taxation terms: porta). See Szabó (1969), Maksay (1978) and Laszlovszky (1999). CC:15; 1351:4; 1411:2; 1435/I:10; 1435/II:2; 1446:10; 1454: 4; 1459:6; 1467:1–2,7–8; 1474:1,3–4; 1478:1–2,4; 1492:20:3; 1498:15–16; 1500:29:4; 1514:15,20; 1518T:2,9; 1523:19; 1526:40; Trip. I 24:6, 40:6, 60:8, 93:4, 133:18–20,23, 134; II 14:39–43, 68. Plots were often subdivided among a tenant peasant's heirs.

plough: see aratrum

pondus (weight): a measure of the weight of silver, being one-twelfth of a ferto (quarter) which in turn was one-quarter of a mark; according to the different marks, a pondus was c.4.4–5.1 gr. 1231:20; 1290:14,16; CC:38,42,47.

portio possessionaria: see division possessio: the legal term that late medieval laws use mostly in the sense of a village (q.v.).

potens, princeps: see magnates potentia: see act of might predium: see deserted land

predial nobles (nobiles praediales): a group of conditional nobles from the thirteenth century onwards. The expression referred both to the nobles on castle estates (predia) as well as the ecclesiastical nobles particularly, though not exclusively, in Slavonia. The praediales were burdened with certain servitia in return of the lands they received in perpetuity. See Rady (2000), 79–95. 1467:1; 1500:29:4; 1521:10[19].

prefection (prefectio in filium, in heredem masculinum, Hung. fiúsisítás): royal privilege by which the king “promoted” the daughter (or daughters) of a nobleman without male heirs in the third (since 1397 fourth) degree, to a son, i.e., authorized her to inherit the paternal fortune just as if she were a man, starting a new kindred. See Fügedi (1998). Trip. I 7, 17:4,7, 39:3, 50, 57:2.

prescription (prescriptio): a Roman legal term used by W. in order to define the length of time during which either an action could be started for a wrong or the term of bona fide possession of property (usually immovable) after which its possession could not be challenged. For criminal acts, such as an act of might (q.v.), it was 32 years (see Trip. I 46:5), for property 32 to 100 years (see Trip. I 78). The royal right prescribed in 100 years (Trip. I 23, cf. I 6:2). The correction of boundaries, the right of cognates to inheritance, filial quarter and dower (q.v.) were not subject to prescription. Trip. I 11:4, 23, 46:5–6, 47:4, 56:4, 78–79, 82, 85, 128:4; II 18:6; III 14:5, 15.

pristaldus: see bailiff

proceres: see notables

proclamata congregatio: see extraordinary county assembly

procurator: see attorney

proditio fraterni sanguinis: see betrayal of fraternal blood prohibition (prohibitio): protest against a legal action (alienation, acquisition, donation of some property, paying of filial quarter and dower, etc.) before, during or after its execution, made always by a third party. Prohibition usually led to the opening of a lawsuit or a retrial (see new trial). If a third party or ingerens intervened and protested at the claims of one party to the suit, the party whose rights were challenged was expected to launch a separate action of his own against the ingerens within a year. 1435/I:10; 1486:22; 1492:59; 1504:11; Trip. II 20, 58; III 14:5, 15, 33:4.

personal protest delivered in person before a judge to a respondent while he was present in court. Trip. II 20.

property, landed: see property rights property rights (iura possessionaria): a term used in the laws in an objective sense, i.e. referring to actual estates owned by freemen until the mid-thirteenth century while later by noblemen and other landholders. King Stephen sought (St1:6) to transform the undivided property of the kindreds into the personal property of freemen. Coloman introduced restrictions concerning the kindred's rights (Col:20) and thirteenth-century privileges 1222:4; 1231:11; 1290:19) aimed at free personal disposition. Finally, the decree of 1351 (1351:Preamb.) enacted the inalienability of noble property (aviticitas) and this law remained in force until the nineteenth century. By the end of the Middle Ages all cases involving property rights had to be heard in the royal courts (Trip. II 52).

acquired (iura possessionaria acquisita): land acquired by purchase (iura possessionaria empti) or by royal donation; however, W. makes a further distinction between land acquired by cash and land acquired by service, asserting that only the former might be freely alienated. Col:20–21; C 1440:19; 1351:20; 1445:17; 1486:24, 57; 1514:51; Trip. I 17:4, 18, 19, 28:1, 43.

devolution of: property usually devolved through the male line, from a father to his sons. If a father had no sons (Trip. I 17:1, 40, 45, 46) then the property passed to his parents, inasmuch as they were still alive, or to his kinsmen. The property could also be passed to adopted sons or brothers or even to a preferred daughter. (Trip. I 47, 63, 67:3). 1435/I:17–18; 1486:26; 1514:62.

devolution of property from husband to wife, and vice-versa: Trip. I 48, 98, 101, 110.

escheat of: property rights that had escheated to the ruler on account of default of issue (q.v.) or of taint of infidelity (q.v.) St1:2; Col:20–21; 1222:4; 1397:58; 1435/I:17; 1481:15; 1486:26; ArtPal:10; 1518B:28; Trip. I 10:1, 29:1; 50, 64, 66.

exchange of (concombium): usually aimed at remedying the fact that the pattern of royal donation (q.v.) and of inheritance (q.v.) meant that estates were widely dispersed across the country. Even if the exchange was accompanied by a money payment, the land involved did not lose its character as ancient hereditary property (Trip. I 73). A 'just exchange' did not require the consent of kinsmen (Trip. I 70), as a consequence of which fraudulent transactions might be made (Trip. I 71). Trip. I 59:3, 69:1, 70–74, 111:6.

inherited (iura possessionaria hereditaria): all land that was inherited and thus in which heirs and kinsmen had inheritance rights. Col:20–1; 1222:4,16; 1351:3; 1462:3; Trip. I 21:1.

of burghers: property rights held by the burghers of towns; Trip. III 14, 16, 18, 19.

purchased (iura possessionaria empti): see above, acquired. (cf. female line).

recovery of: the recovery of estates commenced through letters of protest (q.v) or the so-called littere recaptatorie. The violent seizure of property to which a party felt he had a right was not permitted unless the attacker himself had been ejected from his property by violence in the course of the previous year. 1435/I:12; 1500:19; Trip.. I 33:1, 68; II 28:4, 77:4.

sale of: infrequent and usually undertaken on account of pressing financial need. Sales, like most other alienations of land, required the consent of all those kinsmen who had a concurrent interest in the property. C 1440:10; Trip. I 58–61, 68–9. (see also notice) proscription (proscriptio, Hung. levelesítés): criminals (publici malefactores), thieves, forgers and counterfeiters were proscribed by the county, usually at the county assembly (i.e., their properties, and sometimes their lives, were forfeit). 1405/I:5; 1526:27; Trip. I 119:1, 121:4.

protonotary (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, ‘master in sentencing’): lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases. (Bónis 1977); Rady (2015) 55–64. 1435/I:1; 1458/II:27; 1459:22,24; 1464:19; 1471:14; 1478:11; 1486:13,20,23,27,54,68,73; 1492:33,40,51,69; 1498:4–6,48; 1500:4–5,7–8,11–12; 1514:54; 1518B:39; 1523:55; Trip. I 45, 86:2, 122:4, 127, 128:1; II 77:5,7,9.

quarta filialis: see filial quarter reambulatio: see boundaries, perambulation of recaptivatio: see property rights, recovery of recognizance (fassio): a legally binding declaration usually made at a place of authentication (q.v.). 1435/I:10; Trip. I 16:2, 23, 58–66 passim, 74:1, 86:3, 91, 102, 109–10, 126:2, 128; II 13:7–8, 16–7, 81:7; III 13–14.

reeve (villicus): The head of the village administration, probably of personally free, small cultivators (peasants), in charge of minor jurisdiction and enforcement of royal laws; in the thirteenth century non-servile peasants (or hospites, see guest) having their own villici were clearly distinguished from bondmen subject immediately to their lords. The two groups merged later into the tenant peasant (jobbágy, q.v.) population, who seem generally to have had elected villici and other officials (sworn men, judges). St1:9; SSz:25; SStr:10; 1351:5; 1405/II:16; 1411:1,3; 1427(a):1; 1435/I:13,16; 1435/II:7; 1467:7–8; 1478:4–5; 1481:6–7; 1486:43,61; 1492:90,93; 1495:38,42,51; 1514:47; Trip.. I 133:46; II 53; III 26:7.

regnicola: see gentleman of the realm

regnum (verbatim: “kingdom,” “realm”): is used in the laws interchangeably in the sense either of “country” or of “kingdom.” It may refer individually to Hungary, Slavonia, Croatia and Dalmatia (rarely to Transylvania), or all of the above lying under the jurisdiction of the Holy Crown. Regnum might also be used in the sense of the estates or of the noble community of the realm. Its Hungarian equivalent, ország (now meaning “country”), has its root in úr (“lord”). For the latter meaning, see, e.g. St2:2,[19]; Col:Preamb. 1222:7–8,11,14; 1231:1,4,8,11; 1351:1,9; 1458/I:2; 1458/II:1–2; 1492:3–4,10; Trip. II 1:1, 2, 3:5.

rent (terrarium): The sum total of dues a jobagio-tenant (q.v.) had to render to the lord of the land for the possession of his tenancy; while frequently referred to in monetary terms, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries it was paid partly in kind, partly in money, and to a lesser extent in labor. (See Pach 1966, Solymosi 1998, Laszlovszky 2018: 265–78). C 1440:13; 1397:68; 1405/I:1; 1435/I:7; 1435/II:2; 1445:22; 1458/I:15; 1459:5; 1474:14; 1486:26; 1514:23; Trip. III 25:2.

repulsio: an action by a party in physical possession of a property, which had been adjudged in court to another, by which he might impede the institution with ritual violence (with a drawn sword or similar weapon). This had the consequence of forcing the matter back into court for a retrial. Repulsio could only be performed once. 1492:57; 1500:19; 1504:4; 1521:[1],15[23 cont.]; Trip. II 57:3, 73–76, 83:4–5.

residence, noble (locus solite residentie): the place whence a nobleman had to be summoned; the character of the building is not specified in the laws. 1397:6; 1427(a):4; Prop:17; 1435/II:8; 1446:2; 1447:7; 1453:6–7; 1454:7; 1462:1; 1486:62; 1492:14,56:3; 1495:14; 1498:10,57; 1504:23; 1514:4; 1518T:19; 1521:[1],[22]; 1523:50; Trip. I 30:3,7, 40:2,5, 41, 60:8, 70:2, 92, 98:1,4, 115:3, 122:1, 133:15–16, 134:3–4; II 24, 67:11.

invasion of: 1447:15; 1498:8,38; 1500:13; Trip. I 15; II 42:5, 67:9, 82:20; III 19:7.

response (responsio): reply to a legal argument, usually made by attorneys. It was possible for the attorney's client to retract his response (see attorney, recall of). 1492:73; 1504:15; Trip. I 127:1, 129–31; II 11:2, 20, 22:2, 24:7, 27, 32:2,8, 39, 53:3, 58:1–2, 61:1, 75:5,7,9–10, 77, 79–81, 83:3, 85:1–2; III 6, 11:8.

retainer: see noble retainer (familiaris); see also baronial retainer (jobagio, c.1190–1230).

revenues,

ecclesiastical: see tithe royal: see chamber's profit, fiftieth, mardurina, thirtieth, twentieth

seigniorial: see ninth, rent, tributum

right, royal (ius regium): an ambiguous term, apparently referring to royal claims to any estate which, though not actually possessed by the king, was assumed to belong to him in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. Actions were moved by or in the name of the crown against persons accused of “hiding royal rights” (celatores iurium regalium) i.e., allegedly usurping a royal claim (see e.g. Trip. I 24:10). 1290:4; 1386:7; 1397:58; 1435/I:17; 1439:24; 1443:8; 1445:2; 1446:11; 1462:2; 1464:11; 1486:26–27; 1492:30,62; Trip. I 23–26, 29:1–2, 30:3, 31–32, 36, 37:5,8,10, 47:3, 60:8, 63:5, 82:3; II 14:44, 84:3.

Saxons: the collective name for Rhenish or Swabian German settlers, especially in Transylvania and in northern Hungary (Hung. Szepesség, Germ. Zips, Slov. Spís), who from the thirteenth century onward enjoyed considerable privileges and virtual autonomy in their towns and areas of settlement (Lat. sedes, Germ. Stühle, Hung. székek). 1290:6–7,14,19,23,24,27–28; 1298:Preamb; Prop:21; 1459:20; 1514:3:9; 1518B:14; 1523:47; Trip. III 25:1.

seal,

authentic (sigillum authenticum): the most important corroborative element of charters issued by places of authentication (q.v.), the major judges (q.v.) of the royal courts, prelates and cities. The use of an authentic seal was limited by the custom which prohibited the use of someone's seals in his/its own affairs. Accordingly, even the places of authentication (q.v.) were supposed to turn to another chapter house or convent in their own transactions. 1222:31; 1290:16; 1384: Preamb; 1405/I:21; 1427(a):1; 1486:11; 1492:44 Trip. II 13, 14:18–19,22–26,29–30,35–37,42,49, 16:3–4, 17.

summoning (Hung. billog): in the eleventh-twelfth century parties were summoned to court by a bailiff (q.v.) identifying himself by showing the king's summoning seal (one of these survived); some lesser judicial officers were also called from these: billogos SinSzab:42; Lad 3:25–25; Col:2,5–6,23. See Jakubovich (1933).

sedes iudiciaria: (abbreviated as sedria) see county court

serviens regis: a propertied man rendering military service and claiming to be subject only to the king. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the servientes emerged from the upper strata of the castle warriors (q.v.), other freemen (q.v.), and privileged royal populations. The demands of the servientes for noble privileges were first voiced in 1222 and finally confirmed in the decretum of 1267. Their legal status became gradually identical to that of minor allodial landowners and members of the old kindreds, all of whom were regarded as noblemen (q.v.). 1222:1–5,7,10,15,18,21–22; 1231:1,4–5,15,17; 1267:Preamb; 1279:4,6.

servus: see bondman

sessio iobagonalis: see plot

Slavonia: the major part of the region between the rivers Drava and Sava as well as a part of the region south of the Sava (presently the northern part of the Republic of Croatia and partly Bosnia and Herzegovina), that became part of the kingdom of Hungary in the late eleventh century. Upper Slavonia included the counties of Vitrovica, Varaždin, Križevci, and Zagreb, while the counties of Vrbas, Dubica and Sana was called Lower Slavonia. The counties of Požega, Valkó, Srijem and southern Baranya (though all lying between the rivers Drava and the Sava) did not belong to Slavonia. The region was administered by a ban (q.v.), often jointly with Croatia and Dalmatia (q.v.). Its inhabitants and nobles had slightly different rights and duties from those of the rest of the kingdom. 1267:Preamb; 1290:28; 1397:36; Prop:21; 1435/I:1; 1439:7; 1444:3; 1445:4; 1454:9; 1459:2; 1464:13; 1471:6; 1486:3,6,50; 1486:68,73; 1492:1,8,26,33,41; 1492Slav:1–10; 1498:2:8,38:4; 1498:70; 1500:6,9,18; 1504:30; 1514:3:7; 1518T:1; 1518B:6,18[19]; 1521:18[27]; 1523:26; 1526:12; Trip. I 94:2; II 65; III 2–3.

sole individual (unica et singularis persona): technical term for a person who had no legitimate heir and whose property was thus likely to escheat (q.v.) to the crown on account of default of issue (q.v.). Best defined in Trip. I 10. Trip. I 10:2, 59:8, 60:8, 64:1, 65; II 46, 64:2; III 30.

specialis presentia regia: royal court of the special presence that appeared around 1337, presided over by the vice-chancellor, but only became fully institutionalized by the end of the Angevin rule. From 1453 to 1464 this court was presided over by the (arch)chancellor and passed sentences under his or the vice-chancellor's seal. Its judges were among the first legally-trained professionals in a royal court. Abolished in the general judicial reform of 1464, its name was for a while occasionally also used for the new, united court of the personal presence (q.v.). See Bertényi (1976), Bónis (1977). 1397:62; 1405/I:14; 1421; 1458/II:27; 1459:22; 1486:18.

subsidiium: originally defined as an extraordinary tax for the war against the Ottomans. It was first raised by Sigismund and then, virtually annually, by Matthias. Every taxation unit (porta) owed one florin of subsidiium. See Kubinyi (2008), 77–9. 1474:1–4,8–10,13; 1504:1; 1518T:14; 1521: passim; 1523:2,25,43; 1526:4,40.

summons (citatio): See Rady (2015) 123–6. 1328:passim; CC:36; 1351:22; 1397:2,62; 1405/II:10; 1421; 1427(a):3; 1435/I:3,9–11; 1435/II:5; 1439:33; 1445:7; 1447:7; 1459:30; 1462:1–2; 1481:17; 1486:13,68; ArtPal:9; 1492:58; 1495:12,19,21; 1498:9:2,38; 1500:3,14; 1504:25; 1514:49,69; Trip. I 9:1,3, 12:1, 71:1, 75:1–2, 131–132; II 15:2, 18–25, 32:5, 34:3, 46, 48–49, 51, 61, 68:4–5, 75:1, 82:1–12, 86:7–8; III 14:4, 19:1,5, 25:3,6, 26:1–4, 27. (see also trial) at three fairs (citatio trineforensis): abolished in 1486. 1439:32; 1458/II:1; Trip. II 2:5.

by the king's (judge's) seal. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries summonses to court were served by bailiffs, authenticated by a seal (bull) of the king or other judges (the laws speak of "sending the seal") Col:2; 1222:2,10; 1267,6; 1290:3.

personal summons: when a nobleman was summoned on the spot for having disrupted the meeting of the diet or a trial. 1495:3:1; 1498:8; 1523:50; Trip. II 20, 24:1.

simple summons: summons delivered to the respondent at his noble residence (q.v.), giving notice of a protracted lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, a terminal summons (see below) would be issued. Trip. II 18, 20:9, 71:6.

short (or final) summons (citatio brevis): a summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term, q.v.), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summons 1444:17,20,25; 1445:4; 1447:40; 1458/II:27,32; 1459:22; 1464:4; 1471:28; 1474:15; 1478:8,12–13; 1486:2–3,17,19; 1498:2,9–10; 1500:2; 1492:14; 1495:1; 1500:4; 1504:9,23; Trip. I 33, 68:1, 80:1.

terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione): a summons issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might (q.v.) 1445:12; 1447:15; 1453:9; 1458/II:2; 1464:5,28; 1471:9,31; 1486:6; 1492:14; 1495:7; 1500:15; Trip. I 4, 6:4, 68:1; II 18:6–7, 20:4, 57:6, 71:7, 80:1, 81:5.

senates: see council, royal.

Székely (Lat. siculi): originally border guards who were moved to Transylvania in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, where they constituted their own privileged community. Prop:21; 1435/I:1; 1492:8,33; 1498:21:3; Trip. I 94:2; III 4.

tenant peasant (jobagio, Hung. jobbágy; from c. 1250 onward): the word, which originally meant a royal office holder (see jobagio) was gradually transferred to rustici jobagiones (lit. peasant retainers), who had acquired personal liberty but were bound to the lord of the land by having to render seigniorial dues (in kind and money, rarely in labor). They were subject to seigniorial jurisdiction, but – at least until 1514 – free to move once they had paid their annual dues and obtained a license. The emergence of the more or less uniform legal status of dependent peasants was connected with changes in agriculture, expansion of settlement, and the application of legal arrangements typical for foreign guests (hospites) (q.v.) in the later thirteenth century. The jobagio–jobbágy status remained the characteristic legal condition of Hungarian peasants until 1848. See Bak (2005) Rady (2015) 103–8. C 1440:13; 1328; CC:16,35; 1351:6,16,18; 1397:6,52,63,66; 1405/I:6; 1405/II:15–16; 1411:2,6; Prop:2; 1435/I:7; 1435/II:2,4; 1445:22; 1458/I:5,15; 1458/II:44; 1459:1,3–5,11–13,16,18,23–24,28; 1471:16–17; 1478:1–2; 1481:2; 1486:39,61–62,65,67; 1492:9,20–21,49,56,90,93–94,104; 1495:2,9,21–22,37; 1498:15,17,22,26,47,52; 1500:21,27; 1504:16; 1514:7,20–22,25–32,39,41,44,64,70; 1518T:3–4,20; 1518B:1; 1521:[2],[18],[22],36[58],37[45]; 1523:11,19,25,41; 1526:40; Trip. I 24:6, 40:6, 60:8, 93:3–4, 133:4,18–19,23, 134:2–4; II 23:2, 24:2–3, 39:1, 51, 53, 67:13, 82, 86:11; III 26–31.

term, judicial (terminus): see octave court

terragium: see rent

testimonia (witnesses): see places of authentication

thirtieth (tricesima): a customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. See Thallóczy (1879), Pach (1990), Laszlovszky (2018) 255–64. CC:35; 1405/I:17; 1439:6; 1444:4; 1445:18; 1458/II:33; 1464:23; 1471:30; 1492:27; 1492Slav:5–7; 1495:28; 1498:29,31–32,34–35; 1500:26; 1514:1,3,7,71; 1518B:14; 1518B:33,45; 1521:4[12],23[44]; 1523:46; 1526:3; Trip. I 9:5; II 9:1.

tithe (decima): ecclesiastical tithe was decreed by the first kings, but the details of its collection (on which produce or product, when, how, and by whom) was a recurrent issue of debate at the diets through the centuries. In principle, it was to be paid to the bishop (or his tax collector, dicator, or the persons to whom it was farmed out) to be shared by the cathedral chapter and parishes. Nobles were exempted at least since 1439 (1439:28). The obligation on peasants and the way tax collectors were to proceed was regulated several times. See Mályusz town (oppidum): non-privileged town or marketplace (Hung. mezőváros) that was – in contrast to free cities (q.v.) – subject to the jurisdiction of secular or ecclesiastical lords, but with some rights of autonomy (election of mayor and/or parish priest, market rights, etc.). In the early sixteenth century there were some 800 oppida in the country; see Szabó (1960), Fügedi (1972), Ladányi (1977). In the laws, they are usually mentioned together with other properties, as most of their inhabitants counted legally as tenant peasants (q.v.) 1405/I:1,6–8,11,13,15; 1405/II:6; 1427(b):2; 1435/I:15; 1439:25; 1444:17; 1445:10; 1446:2,7,10–11,14; 1458/II:33; 1459:1; 1467:2; 1486:32,47; 1492:90; 1514:7,26; 1521:13 [21 cont.]; Trip. I 4, 12, 21, 24, 60:8, 87; II 13:3, 14:43–44, 70:5, 71, 76:3–4; III 32.

(1953), Csizmadia (1975), Laszlovszky (2018) 309–34. St2:[20]; SSz:27,30,33,40; Col:25,66; SStr:64; 1222:5,20; 1231:6,16; 1290:14–15,24; CC:35; 1351:6; 1397:63,65–66; 1405/I:1; 1411:5–6; 1435/I:7; 1439:28; 1440:1; 1444:5,14; 1446:2; 1447:35–36; 1458/I:9–10; 1458/II:34–35; 1464:22,24; 1471:3; 1474:16; 1478:15; 1481:1–4,6–13; 1486:40–45; 1492:50; 1492Slav:11:4; 1495:37–45; 1498:15,49–54; 1500:29–30,36; 1504:23–24,26; 1514:18,24,64; 1518T:3; 1518B:1,14,18[19]; 1521:11[20],15[23 cont.]; 1523:42; Trip. I 9:1; 33:25.

Transylvania: the mountainous eastern part of the kingdom of Hungary beyond the Királyhágó (Pasul Craiului) with a mixed Magyar (incl. Székely), German and Romanian population, governed by the voivode (q.v.) and enjoying some autonomy and following slightly different legal customs. Nobles of Transylvania were to a great extent subject to their voivode; their man price was also lower than that of those of the “mainland.” See Mályusz (1941/1999), Rady (1992). 1267:Preamb; 1290:6,24,28; Prop:21; 1435/I:1; 1439:7; 1443:1–4; 1444:32; 1464:13; 1467:1; 1471:6; 1474:3; 1486:3,6,68,73; 1492:1,8,26,41; 1492Slav:2; 1498:2:8,20:6,20:23,21:2; 1500:6,9,18; 1504:30; 1514:3:9; 1518T:10; 1518B:6,9,14,18[19],45; 1521:5 [13]; 1523:26,47; 1526:12; Trip. I 94:2; II 14:15, 65; III 2–4.

trial: details of legal procedure can be reconstructed only in general, particularly from the Trip., e.g. II 75 [8–12], 77. The usual procedure was for the plaintiff to present his plaint and claim (II 18 [1], 26). This was then recast in the form of a summons (q.v.) – preceded or not by an inquest (q.v.) – and sent to the other party, requiring him to attend court. Once initiated, court discussions were divided into two parts. In the first of these, the period of exceptiones, the respondent’s attorney would seek to have the case fail on procedural grounds and legal technicalities. In the second phase, the period of allegationes, the substance of the claim would be investigated, documents examined, and the reports of inquests and oath takings considered. Throughout these two parts, the judge might make interlocutory judgments, and might also fine the parties for procedural irregularities and misconduct. The trial would be concluded with a sentence. Before execution of the judgment, the losing party might rely on a number of remedies in order to force the matter once more into court for retrial. Cf. Rady (2003 and Rady (2015) 127–33; 1397:55; 1435/I:4; 1464:14; 1486: 52; 1492:51–52,90; 1495:3; 1504:11; 1518B:29.

by protracted suit (longo litis processu): usually property disputes that might take up to a year (four octave terms, q.v. octave) to reach court. In contrast, in matters involving acts of might, women’s rights, pledges and debts, retrials and warranties, the case was heard in court at the next octave (Trip. II 18).

tributum (tax): a term used for different, and in the course of time varying, levies paid mainly by tenant peasants (q.v.).

tributum fisci (regalis): see chamber’s profit

tricesima: see thirtieth

tutela: see guardianship twentieth (vigesima): royal (palatinal) tax levied together with the tithe (equaled 5% of the tithe); it was occasionally also granted to the Church. 1231:16; 1514:1,3,10; 1518B:13–14,43; 1521:[6]; 1526:3,20.

udvarnok (from Hung. udvar, from Slavic dvor, “court”): peasants on settlements attached to the royal household, supplying it with agricultural produce grown on their plots (hence occasionally called panisdator, i.e., bread giver), in contrast to servi designated as ploughmen or craftsmen, messengers, fishermen, and the like, working on the royal domain with no land or equipment of their own. St2:15; La3:3; 1267:2,5; 1290:4; 1351:6.

unica et singularis persona: see sole individual várispánság (comitatus): see county

vicecomes: see alispán

vicinus: see neighbor

village (villa, possessio): The development of fixed village settlements from the summer and winter quarters of semi-nomadic peoples and from the centers of domains (predia) began in the eleventh century; but “villages” kept moving either with their cattle to pastures or to new lands once the cultivated area was exhausted, probably until the late twelfth century. By 1300 Hungary may have had about 2,000 villages, in the early sixteenth century there were approx. 18,000 villages; cf. Maksay (1978). St1:9; St2:1; SSz:9,11,19,25,32; La2:4–5; La3:1; Col:40,47,62,63,83; SStr:10,[85]; 1222:3,15; 1231:4,6,22; 1267:2; 1279:1,3,8; 1290:9; 1298:14–15; C 1440:5; 1320:1; CC:20,31; 1351:6; 1386:7; 1397:3; 1405/I:1,5; 1405/II:6; Prop:15; 1435/I:7; 1435/II:2,6–8; 1444:17; 1447:35; 1462:1–2; 1481:7; 1486:36; 1492:26,89; 1498:51; 1500:29; 1504:23,26; 1514:4,9,20,26,29,32; 1521:13[21 cont.]; 1523:25; Trip. I 9:2, 14:7, 24:2, 37:9–10, 84:3–5, 85:1–2, 121:2, 122:2, 133:39, 134:3–4; II 53, 76:3–4, 82:2–3,20; III 23:1. The term was used loosely for different types and sizes of settlements, as evident from the combination libera villa, meaning an enfranchised town or market center in the thirteenth century; see free village, town.

villicus: see reeve

voivode (waywoda): royally-appointed governor of Transylvania with jurisdiction over the seven Hungarian counties and, as ispán of the Székely, over these former borderland kindreds as well. His court was the first instance for the region with right to appeal to the royal courts. Thus the nobility of Transylvania lay in a different jurisdictional position to their fellows in the central areas, see Mályusz (1994). 1290:28; 1397:48; 1397:69; Prop:21; 1435/I:1,19; 1444:2,9; 1486:6,21,53,68,73; 1492:8,33; 1495:4,45; 1498:22:7; 1514:1,46; 1518T:10; 1518B:6,45; Trip. I 14:15, 94:2; II 65:3; III 2:4, 3:6,10,13.

warranty (evictio, expeditoria cautio): in any alienation of property, the alienor would commit himself to uphold the rights of the alienee to the property involved ‘with his own labors and expenses’. Accordingly, if the new owner’s rights to the property were contested in court, the previous owner was expected to attend court and to defend the rights. If the warrantor could not do this, he was expected to give compensation. See Rady (2002) and Rady (2015) passim. Trip. I 74–7; II 18:5; III 34.

warrior (miles): In the eleventh and twelfth centuries dependent warriors of both the king and the greater landowners enjoyed a higher status than servi. Those who managed to maintain their personal independence and became mounted knights were then equated with noblemen (q.v.). St1:7,15,22–23,25,27,35; St2:9–11,18; La2:11,15; La3:15; Col: 65.

women’s rights: see filial quarter, dower, female line, inheritance, widow, guardianship (statutory)

GAZETTEER OF PLACE NAMES WITH SIGNIFICANT VARIANTS

Present-day version (as printed in DRMH English side) and country	Other forms G(erman), Hu(ngarian) Sk (Slovak) Ro(manian) Cr(oatian)	Form(s) in the MSS (as in DRMH Latin side)
Arad, Co. RO	Arad (Ro)	Horodiensis
Árva, Co. SK	Orava (Sk)	Arwa
Bács H		Bachia
Baia Mare RO	Nagybánya (Hu)	Rivulum Dominarum
Banja Luka BIH	Orbászvár (Hu)	Banyalwka
Banská Bystrica SK	Besztercebánya (Hu), Bistritz (G)	Besthercze, Bistricia
Banská Stiavnica SK	Selmecbánya (Hu), Schemnitz (G)	Sebnicia
Bardejov SK	Bártfa (Hu), Bartfeld (G)	Barthwa, Barthfa
Barić SR	Barics (Hu)	Berich
Belgrade SR	Nándorfehérvár (Hu)	Nadoralba
Beluša SK	Bellus (Hu)	Belews
Bočac BIH	Bogács (Hu)	Bochacz
Bran RO	Töröcsvár (Hu)	Terch
Bratislava – see Pressburg
Břstanik BIH		Berzenthel
Braşov RO	Brassó (Hu), Kronstadt (G)	Brassouia
Budakeszi H	Wudigeß	Kezy
Caransebeş RO	Karánsebes (Hu)	Karansebes
Cluj[-Napoca] RO	Kolozsvár (Hu), Klausenburg (G)	Koloswar
Csanád, Co. H		Chanadiensis
Csepel, Island H		Magna insula
Csongrád, Co. H		Chongradiensis
Damásd H	Ipolydamásd (Hu)	Damas
Deva RO	Déva (Hu)	Dewa
Devín SK	Dévény (Hu)	Devin
Diósgyőr H		Dyosgyewr
Draßmarkt A	Vámosderecske(Hu)	Trassendorff

Dubrovnik HR	Ragusa (It)	Ragusium
Dunapataj H		Pathay
Dürnbach A		Wynicze
Esztergom H	Gran (G), Ostrihom (Sk)	Strigoniae
Fara HR	Hvar (Cr)	Phara
Fejér Co. H		Albensis
Friuli I		Forum Iulii
Gajary SK	Gajár (Hu)	Geyren
Galicia UA	Halics	Halich
Gurghiu RO	Görgény (Hu)	Gewrgen
Győr H	Raab (G)	[ecclesia] Jaurensis
Heves, Co. H		Hewesiensis
Hlevna BIH	Livno (Slovenian)	Hlewna
Hont, Co. H		Hontensis
Hum BIH	Halomföld (Hu)	Halomfoeld
Humenné SK	Homonna (Hu), Humenau (G)	Homonna
Ipolydamásd H		Damas
Jajce BIH	Jajca (Hu)	Jajcza
Jarak SR	Árki (Hu)	Arky
Jahrendorf A		Sarendorff
Jezero BIH	Jező (Hu)	Jezero
Kaltenbrunn A	Hidegkút (Hu)	Hydegkyth
Kežmarok SK	Késmárk (Hu)	Kesmark
Keve, Co.HR		Kewe
Khust UA	Huszt (H)	Hwzth
Komárom, and Co. H	Komárno (Sk), Komorn (G)	Komaron, Comaran
Körös, Co. RO		Crisiensis
Közép-Szolnok, Co.RO		Zolnok mediocris
Košice SK	Kassa (Hu), Kaschau (G)	Cassovia
Kostajnica HR	Koszthánycsa (Hu)	Kostanicza
Kőszeg H	Güssing (G)	Kewzeg
Krapina SK	Korpona	Crapyma
Külső-Szolnok, Co. RO		Zolnok exterior
Lábod, Co. Somogy H		Labad

Levice SK	Léva (Hu)	Lewa
Levoča SK	Lőcse (Hu)	Lewchowya, Lewchovia
Liptó, Co. SK		Lyphthoviensis
Ľubovňa SK	Lublyó (Hu)	Lwblyo
Máramaros, Co. RO	Maromureş (Ro)	Maramarosiensis
Mosonmagyaróvár H	Wieselburg, Ungarisch Altenburg (G)	Owar
Mukacheve UA	Munkács (Hu), Mukačevo (Sk)	Munkach
Murska Sobota SL	Muraszombat (Hu)	Murayzombath
Nagyolasz HR	Francavilla, Mandjeloz (Cr)	Noghaloz
Nedelišće HR	Nedelce (Hu)	Nedewcze
Nemesvid H		Wyd
Neusiedl A	Nezsider (Hu)	Newsidel
Nógrád, Co. H		Ne[w]gradensis
Óbuda H	Alt-Ofen (G)	Vetus Buda
Opojevci SR	Apajóc (Hu)	Aprayocz
Orava SK	Árva	Arva
Pannonhalma H	Martinsberg (G)	Abbatia Sancti Martini Sancti Montis Pannonie
Pécs H	Fünfkirchen (G)	Pech, Quinqueecclesiis
Pelsőc SK	Plešivec (Sk)	Pelsewcz
Petrovaradin SR	Pétervárad (Hu)	Petrovaradinum
Pinkafeld A	Pinkafő (Hu)	Pynkwaffewlde
Pozsega HR	Psega (Cr)	Posega
Pressburg SK	Pozsony (Hu), Bratislava (since 1920, Sk)	Posonium
Prešov SK	Eperjes (Hu) Preschau (G)	Eperyes
Rača (Sremska Rača) SR	Rácsa (Hu)	Racha
Rákos, field H		Racus, &c.
Razkrižje SL	Ráckanizsa (Hu)	Raczkanyisa
Ruşii Munţii RO	Nagyoroszfalva (Hu)	Nagh Orosfalwa
Rudersdorf A	Radafalva (Hu)	Raddafalva
Rusovce SK	Oroszvár (Hu)	Oroswar
Rust A	Ruszt (Hu)	Rwsse
Šabac SR	Szabács (Hu)	Sabacz

Šáhy, convent SK	Ipolyság (Hu)	Saag
Sankt Martin SK	Szentmárton (Hu)	ZenthMarton
Sátoraljaújhely H		Wyhel
Schözen A	Sasvár (Hu)	Ichuczen
Senice SK	Szenice (Hu), Senitz (G)	Zemnycza
Sibiu RO	[Nagy]szeben (Hu), Hermannstadt (G)	Cibinium
Skalica SK	Szokolca (Hu)	Zakolcza
Slankamen SR	Zalánkemén (Hu)	Zalonkemen
Solymár H	Schaumar (G)	Salmar
Sopron H	Ödenburg (G)	Spronium
Sremska Mitrovica SR	Szávaszentdemeter (Hu)	Zenthdemether
Sjeničak Lasinjski HR	Sztenicsnyák (Hu)	Stanysnak
Stupava SK	Stomffa (Hu), Stampfen (G)	Szanffa
Stropkov SK	Sztropkó (Hu)	Stropko
Szeged H	Segedin (G)	Zeged, &c.
Székesfehérvár H	Stuhlweissenburg (G)	Alba [Regalis]
Szentjobb RO	Szentjog/b (Hu) Sâniob (Ro)	Zenth Jog, Zenshiog
Szombathely H	Steinamanger (G)	Zombathel
Timișoara RO	Temesvár (Hu)	Themeswar, castrum Themesiense
Topusko HR	Topuszkó (Hu)	Thopoczka
Trassendorf A	Vámosderecske (Hu)	Trassendorff
Trenčín SK	Trencsén (Hu)	Trinchinium
Trnava SK	Nagyszombat (Hu)	Thyrnavia
Trzác BIH		Thersacz
Vámos SK	Sajóvámos (Hu)	Wamus
Vinac BIH		Zozorowar
Visegrád H	Altenburg (G)	Wyssegrad
Vrbové SK	Verbó (Hu)	Warbo
Zagreb HR	Zágráb (Hu), Agram (G)	Zagrabia, Monsgreacia
Žilina SK	Zsolna (Hu)	Solna
Zvolen SK	Zólyom (Hu)	Zolyom, Vetuszolium
Zsámbék H	Schambeck (G)	Sambok