- 1 In tandem with his own activities as an art critic and exhibition curator, François Piron has taken part in several collective adventures. Let us thus mention the magazine Trouble, published between 2002 and 2006, which he was one of the founders of, and which, at that time, was one of the forums featuring a generation of artists and critics. Between 2001 and 2006, he co-directed Les Laboratoires d'Aubervilliers, which he helped to set up as a place where artists are left free to invent the way their works are presented. More recently, he co-founded castillo/corrales, an association of curators, artists and graphic designers gravitating around an exhibition venue, a publishing house and a bookshop. Since 2007, this place has been relying on an alternative economy by financing itself without any public help. It is developing a form of communication well-removed from the standardization of press bulletins, and proposes a demanding and international programme.

- 2 What is involved for him with this place is re-thinking the role and operation of spaces for art, as well as questioning possible forms for exhibitions. We find this kind of thinking in his contribution to the catalogue for the 10th Lyon Biennale<sup>1</sup>, previously shed light on by the exhibition Société anonyme<sup>2</sup> which he organized in 2007 with Thomas Boutoux and Nataša Petrešin at Le Plateau. Several artists' collectives were invited to intervene on the spot and highlight the way they work from an at once economic and organizational viewpoint. The art centre had been turned into a centre of activities.
- 3 If each one of these experiences is seen as a quest for alternatives to the by now standardized operations of institutions, the exhibition projects devised by François Piron grapple more precisely with the method of rationalization and thematization which often gnaw away at art history.
- 4 From Invisible Script in 2005 at W139 in Amsterdam, which makes reference to Adolfo Boiy Casares's novel L'Invention de Morel, by way of Intouchable (L'idéal Transparence) organized with Guillaume Désanges in 2006 at the Villa Arson in Nice, whose point of departure was Paul Scheerbart's text L'Architecture de verre, to his recent projects about Raymond Roussel<sup>3</sup>, we find one and the same principle, that of taking as the point of departure a literary text or author. This distance in relation to the thematic principle puts his exhibition in a reverse posture to that of regroupment. It is a matter of observing the distillation, diffusion and alteration of influences, ideas, and approaches.
- 5 The idea does not involve material for study. It is based much more on the way in which these authors have been read and interpreted throughout the 20th century. François Piron's successive projects about Raymond Roussel can be partly explained by the recurrence with which this author is called upon by artists with different backgrounds. Raymond Roussel is summoned more as a tool for thinking about art, and not as a thread. In tandem, with his numerous re-appearances, the image of an unambiguous modernity is crumbling. In fact, if he can be regarded as one of its harbingers, the multitude of meanings behind the interpretations that Raymond Roussel gives rise to produces the portrait of a modernity littered with dissension. Broken up, it cannot be read as an entirety. On the other hand, this fragmentation offers a more tortuous circulation. It is made by digression. Applied to the field of art history and art's display, this way of going about things does not regard an object of study as a block, but rather weaves an arrangement of connections to be made in leaps and bounds rather than by following straight lines. There is thus formed an unusual world, a constellation, where interpretation is preferred to the universal. By veering away from the affirmative methodology of the specialist, François Piron<sup>4</sup> draws close to artists whom he has worked with and written about, people like Koenraad Dedobbeleer, Ryan Gander, Dora Garcia, Joe Scanlan, Francisco Tropa and Raphaël Zarka.
