LA HAUTE BANQUE.

The Unique Aristocracy of Finance in the Capital of France.

With Edmond Joubert, who died recently, there disappeared one of the most conspicuous figures of Parisian life, and in particular of that phase thereof which is known by the name of la haute banque. The latter constitutes a caste that is well nigh unique, since there is nothing of the kind that can be compared thereto in any other European capital. It is an ultra exclusive as any blue blooded aristocracy and as careful of its reputation and prestige as a lovely mondaine, endeavoring to steer clear of every maneuver, of every enterprise that might in any way tarnish its fair name. It is composed mainly of Protestants and Hebrews, who may be said to constitute a sort of aristocracy of finance, their fathers, and in many cases their grandfathers, having been accustomed to handling millions and to undertake the placing of national and foreign government loans. Their clients, in fact, are crowned heads and states.

Chief among la haute banque, the intervention and good will of which is sought whenever it becomes necessary to place upon the markets of the old world any government loan, are of course the Rothschilds. But the Cahen d'Anvers, the Bambergs, the Sterns, the Hottingers, the Andros, the Heines and the Peretres are almost equally important, or at any rate imagine themselves to be so, and steer clear of all minor financiers and bankers much in the same way that an Austrian prince of ancient lineage would behave toward a newly created baron or even petty tradesman—that is to say, with a mixture of condescension and disdain. Many of these families have intermarried with the old French nobility, the Rothschilds being matrimonially allied to the ducal house of Crummond, the Andros to that of Montmorency and of Talleyrand-Perigord, the Cahen d'Anvers to the princely family of Fainçinge-Lucigny, while the future Duc de la Tremolle is wedded to a daughter of the banker Pilsberr. Will One of the Heine girls is the reigning Princess of Monaco and bearer of the ancient French title of Duchess de Valentinois, after having borne that of Duchess de Richelieu, while another lady of the Heine family is the Duchess de Rivoli, her first husband having been the Prince de la Moskowa, Duc d'Elchingen.

As in the case of every aristocracy, no matter with what jealousy the doors thereto are guarded from intrusion by garvenus, there are exceptions made in favor of certain useful and clever people who secure entrance by sheer force of intellect, energy, and, in one word, success. So, too, in this exclusive clique of la haute finance a Paris, are these certain number of financiers, self-made, who may be said to have won their way up from the very ranks. Among them are M. Germain, the governor of the Credit Lyonnais; M. Demormeaudie of the Comptoir d'Escompte; M. Christophe of the Credit Foncier; M. Magnin, governor of the Bank of France, and last, but not least, the late M. Joubert, who started his financial career at the age of 16 as a clerk and office boy to the stockbroker Martini. He quickly won his way, and from the year 1867 has been ranked up more or less prominently in all the great financial undertakings that have floated upon the Parisian market since then, residing from President Thiers the rossette of the Legion of Honor for the assistance which he had given to the government in connection with the payment of France's war indemnity to Germany. The only blot on M. Joubert's career, or rather the only thing that was ever exploited by his enemies with the object of injuring his prestige, was the story to the effect that he had devoured the assistance of the ladies of the corps de ballet and means of a similar character to obtain from Khedive Ismail and the Egyptian government certain financial concessions and advantages in connection with the floating of certain Egyptian loans. This story may or may not have been true, but it pursued him to the end of his busy career and was frequently invoked in order to support the argument that he was unworthy to figure in the ranks of la haute banque.—Paris Letter in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

His Verse.

Years ago, when albums in which friends and acquaintances, and sometimes even strangers, were asked to "write a few lines" were scattered abroad through the land, many amusing specimens of impromptu versification found their way into print.

A clever writer who was paying a short visit at a farmhouse was handed by the daughter of the house a superannated account book, ruled for pounds, shillings and pence, which had been converted into an album, and in which she requested him to "write something funny."

He complied with her request by penning the following verse, which, after some bewilderment, she managed to read:

This world's a scene as dark as Styx,
Where hope is scarce worth
Our joys are borne so fleeting hence,
That they are done at
And yet to stay here many are willing,
Although they may not love
—Youth's Companion.

A CONFESSION.—

This department of our business has not been kept up to the standard our customers have a right to demand. Our prices have been right, we think, but at times our assortment has been poor. We confess it—we beg your pardon—and promise to do better in the future. We want to rub out all old scores and begin anew. To do this we are going to put such prices on every article in this department as will clean it up entirely within the next 30 days.
