A Single Man and Christmas

Steve Johnson

He has no one to be near, so there is fear
he is not really alive
at all.

He feels the downfall
of his single life
like the fall of snow
that his lonely steps
tread.

He knows there is only time, and that Christmas is no different.
The hour still has its minute minutes in its being, a person with time to decide his
determined necessities
and limits — of existence from his consciousness of person.

So he follows his style and desire in his reason of reflected imagination.

He allows his hands
room in his pockets
and walks the town
in winter air, dressed
in his hand picked
selection to the way he wished to look.

His steps are uncertain, but their repetition passes the time.

So he walks long distances, through day
and night, to exist
with the natural forms
and forces of winter
nature.

Hoping to find
peace in the day's air that he listens
to, like another person listens to another person, air which is the person of himself. He walks and walks, thinking of human affection and adventure.

Knowing his bed
will at least be there to fall into, because his many lonely steps have tired his single form.
