The Storm

My mother painted dragons which she heard in trembles of the wind her words like brushes conjured them within the quiet of the storm, as my willing, wondering eyes delighted in her world.

For her, the summer breezes sent the tidings of the air and told her tales of sprites and beasts they warned were drawing near.
and when these loyal messengers were filled with dragons' dance, she called to me, her treasure sweet to quickly take her hand.

Hand in hand, we left the beach for refuge in our porch, the dune-grass bent in firm salute which folded to earth.
and as we passed I turned around, to quickly glance behind and see our ready soldiers stretched upwards towards the sky

I never loved our footprints more which dragons rained away and caused the sand to slip, afraid, both ominous and strange.

their wings she said had beat the clouds into this gloomy gray and with each beat a breath now pushed the deluge into range

I never saw her dragons dance but heard them from above, as crashes tumbled through the air, and through my bones they buzzed.
The steely flicks of scales were sent colliding into earth, they raked their scorches in the ground;
seen but never heard.

Once I thought I lost this tongue, of magic, might, and will.
as winds brushed past and dune-grass swayed like strangers cold and chill.

Yet, from the sky I hear the quiet calls of rain I feel the dragons soar familiar 'though I've changed.
