EDITOR'S NOTE

Glenn P. DuPree
Founder and Editor-in-Chief
November 20, 1993

This first issue premieres The Second Annual International Energy Symposium, "Doing Business Within the European Community and the Commonwealth of the Independent States" held April 16, 1993, at the University of Tulsa College of Law. The Symposium articles, as well as the other articles in this issue, focus on international energy, natural resources, and environmental law.

The idea of the Journal was conceived by students in December 1992, in response to their interests in Comparative and International law. The students formed the Editorial Board, raised the funds, and selected and edited the articles for publication. Because of their loyal dedication and their tireless efforts the Journal has become a reality.

The Editorial Board and Staff are grateful to David S. Clark, Rex J. Zedalis, Nicholas Rostow, Dean John Makdisi, the Journal's Advisory Board, and the Tulsa Law School Faculty, Administration and Staff whose contributions of time and advice have made this first issue possible. We also wish to thank Randal Buckendorf for his help and encouragement. Additionally, we thank all the authors for their contributions and faith in a new journal. Finally, we wish to express our deepest gratitude to the Contributing Founders.

The student-managed Tulsa Journal of Comparative & International Law promises timely and original articles. We welcome your ideas and comments and invite you to explore our treatment of comparative and international law in future issues.
