ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This study was conducted by staff members of the Center for Applied Urban Research and the Legal Aid Society.

At CAUR the data were processed by Michael Eskey and Jason Chen. Paul S.T. Lee developed the sampling procedure, and Bob Greiner, a student assistant, identified the sample for the study. Jack Ruff and Peggy Hein served as consultants during the questionnaire development phase of the project. The copy was edited by Marian Meier and typed by Joyce Carson and Fern Himberger.

The field work was done by the following Legal Aid staff members: Glen Baity, Larry Spain, Jeanne Singles, Linda Minard, Mary Clarkson, Connie Sosinski, Alberta Epperson, Velma Russell, Debbie Brockman, Mary Green, Sharon Hawkins, Bill Monahan, Betty Dawson, Dorothy Eure, Gary Fischer, Vard Johnson, Ida Jones, Mike Kammerer, Timothy O'Roark, and Diane Metz. Connie Sosinski also assisted with the sample identification process.

INTRODUCTION

Purpose of the Study

The Center for Applied Urban Research at the University of Nebraska at Omaha (CAUR) was contacted in the summer of 1980 by the Legal Aid Society of Omaha about the possibilities of obtaining assistance with a research project. In an initial letter, the director of Legal Aid stated the purpose of the proposed project:

Our goal in conducting the survey is to obtain as much information as possible to determine the most pressing problems facing poor people in our community.

This information was needed by Legal Aid to make effective decisions about legal service offerings and resource allocations.

The Legal Aid director listed specific questions that his group wanted answered about local low-income persons:

What do they perceive as the most important and/or pressing problems that they personally have or face?

What do they perceive as the most important or pressing problems of persons in the poverty community generally?

What do they perceive as the most important problems that they face in their daily lives in the following areas: utilities, employment, health, welfare, education, housing, youth, family problems, consumer problems, other areas that they deem important?

Have they ever been a Legal Aid client? Have they ever heard of Legal Aid, and, if so, what do they know about Legal Aid? Would they come to Legal Aid if they had a legal problem, and if no, why not?

CAUR agreed to assist Legal Aid in constructing the survey instrument, developing the research methodology, training the interviewers, tabulating and analyzing the data, and preparing a research report.

Study Design and Execution

The Survey Instrument

Legal Aid requested that a section of the questionnaire be devoted to each of the areas in which they wanted to obtain information (e.g., health, employment, welfare) and that an open-ended question be included in each of these sections. The survey instrument was constructed by the Center for Applied Urban Research and reviewed by the staff and the board of the Legal Aid Society. Recommended changes were made in preparing the final survey instrument.

The Population and the Sample

The population of the study included households residing in those census tracts in which over half of all families had median household incomes below 80 percent of the citywide median household income. About 45 census tracts in Omaha fall into this category. These census tracts, shown on the map in Appendix A, comprised 23,067 families in 1978. A sample of 400 randomly selected families from these census tracts was needed to obtain the information with a 5 percent margin of error at the 95 percent level of confidence.

For sample selection, a two-stage probability sampling procedure was used. The primary sampling units were sample blocks. Sample blocks were selected proportional to the size of each block at the first stage. This procedure ensured that a larger block would have a better chance of being selected than a smaller one. At the second stage, a cluster of sample households or elementary units was selected randomly. Each cluster had three sample households.

Interview Method

Staff members of the Legal Aid Society conducted personal door-to-door interviews during December, 1980. The Center for Applied Urban Research held a training session for the interviewers one week before the field work began. Due to absenteeism in the sample households and difficulty in obtaining interviews at the identified household, only 242 interviews were completed. The completed questionnaires were returned to the Center for Applied Urban Research for tabulation and analysis of the collected data.

FINDINGS OF THE STUDY

General Neighborhood Problems

Crime was perceived as the most serious problem in the study area. When asked to list the three most serious problems in their neighborhood, respondents were more likely to name crime than any other. Two of every five responses (40 percent) referred to crime (e.g., burglary, vandalism, rape) or police problems (e.g., traffic/fast cars, police protection). See Table 1.

Complaints about other city services (e.g., garbage, street maintenance) were mentioned next in order of frequency. Approximately one-fourth (27 percent) of the problems cited referred to city services. The condition of the neighborhood was the third most frequently cited category; 23 percent gave such responses as neighborhood upkeep, deterioration of the neighborhood, lack of nearby services, dogs, noise, etc..

Approximately 5 percent of the problems were of an economic or personal nature, such as inflation, food or utility costs, employment, or money problems.

 Economic Conditions: 19,21,24,30,38,52,53
 Other: 13,14,34,40,46,48,50,55

Problems of Persons in the Neighborhood

Respondents were asked to indicate the seriousness of 17 different possible problems for persons in the neighborhood. The most serious was the cost of food (55 percent considered it very serious and 33 percent somewhat serious for a total of 88 percent). Other problems rated as very or somewhat serious by 50 percent or more of the respondents were: housing (65 percent), crime and safety (60 percent), consumer problems (52 percent), employment (50 percent), and city services in the neighborhood (50 percent). See Table 2.

Personal Problems

Respondents were asked to list their three most serious problems and then rate the seriousness for themselves of the 17 possible listed problems.

Most Serious Personal Problems

When asked to name their own three most serious problems, personal finance problems were listed more often than any other category. Approximately 45 percent of those cited could be categorized as financial. Examples included: money, employment, inflation, and the costs of food, housing, and transportation.

Other personal problems (e.g., health, family problems, old age, and loneliness) were cited 17 percent of the time. City services problems--excluding crime and police related problems--were also cited 17 percent of the time.

In sharp contrast to the questions on neighborhood problems, crime was not frequently mentioned as a serious problem for the respondent. Only 12 percent of the responses--in contrast to 40 percent of neighborhood problems--related to crime.

Neighborhood problems were cited in approximately 5 percent of the cases. See Table 3.

TABLE 3 - Most Serious Personal Problems

 Neighborhood problems: 22,25-6,43,45
 Other: 18,23,38,30,32,49

Seriousness of the Listed Problems

When asked to rate the seriousness for themselves of the problems in the 17 areas, the most serious was the cost of food (rated as very or as somewhat serious by a majority of those answering the question). This was seen as a very or somewhat serious problem by 57 percent. See Table 4.

The top seven problems (based on the proportion of very serious ratings) for the individual were the same as those ascribed to others in the neighborhood.

City Services

The lowest rated service (based on the proportion rating a service as poor) was weed control (47 percent rated it as poor). The service with the second highest proportion of poor ratings was recreational facilities and programs (37 percent). Next in order of lowest rated services was street maintenance (27 percent poor rating), and the fourth lowest rating was given for housing code enforcement (20 percent poor rating). Using an average score, assigning 1 point for excellent, 2 for good, 3 for fair, and 4 for poor gave an identical ranking for the four lowest rated services. Using this method, fire protection was given the best rating, followed by rescue squad service, street lighting, and public transportation. See Table 5.

TABLE 5 - Quality of City Services

^{a/} The average score is based on: excellent = 1, good = 2, fair = 3, poor = 4. A lower score, therefore, is a better rating.

Health Care

Frequency of Illness and Use of Medical Services

Approximately half (47 percent) of the respondents reported they were not ill in the previous year. A lower proportion (29 percent), however, reported they did not seek medical services (including dental) in the previous year. See Table 6.

Methods of Payment

Direct payment (i.e., use of cash) was the most frequently cited method of payment for medical services; 57 percent reported they usually paid for medical services, with cash. Less than half (44 percent) of the respondents reported use of health insurance. Smaller proportions reported they relied on Medicare and Medicaid. See Table 7.

Health Service Problems

Approximately 12 percent of the respondents reported a problem with health care services. The most frequent was inadequate health care from a doctor or member of a health care staff with 6 percent of all respondents (52 percent of those who said they had a health service problem) indicating this problem. The second most frequently cited difficulty was the refusal of a medical insurance company to pay a medical or drug bill (3 percent of all respondents and 24 percent of those who said they had a health service problem). See Table 8.

Employment Problems

Approximately one-fourth (25 percent) of the respondents reported that they or a member of their household had problems related to employment. More than three-fourths of them (77 percent) said that this difficulty related to finding or keeping a job or being denied a promotion; this proportion constituted 20 percent of all respondents. Age discrimination was listed more often than any other factor, with race also likely to be mentioned. See Table 9.

Housing Problems

Problems of Renters

Approximately 10 percent of all respondents reported problems related to renting an apartment or house. This constituted 22 percent of all renters. The most frequently mentioned problem was getting the landlord to make needed repairs, reported by 14 percent of all renters (and 63 percent of the group saying they had rental-related problems). The next most frequent related to being denied a rental due to having children (8 percent of all renters) and to problems with security of their homes or apartments (8 percent of all renters). See Table 10.

Consumer Problems

Almost one-third (31 percent) of the respondents said they had consumer problems within the past year. The most frequently reported stemmed from increased utility bills. Almost one-fourth of all respondents (24 percent)--which constituted 79 percent of those reporting a consumer problem--named paying utility bills. Obtaining credit was also a problem for many, with 13 percent of all respondents (43 percent of those with consumer problems) listing this. The same proportion reported problems involving calls or letters demanding payment. Approximately 5 percent of all respondents reported being sued for payments, 4 percent reported harassment at work, 2 percent had wages garnisheed, and 1 percent were subjected to repossession of property. See Table 12.

Problems with Social Security

Approximately 7 percent of all respondents reported a problem related to the Social Security Administration. The difficulties mentioned most frequently were understanding requirements or completing forms (44 percent of those reporting a problem or 3 percent of all respondents), and delays on decisions (39 percent of those reporting a problem or 3 percent of all respondents). See Table 15.

Sources of Advice

Of the respondents who had legal questions or problems last year, more asked their caseworkers about their legal problems than consulted any other single source including a private lawyer or Legal Aid. Almost half (45 percent) of those with a legal question or problem said they consulted their caseworkers, while 36 percent said they saw private lawyers, 17 percent Legal Aid, and 16 percent family members.

Of respondents who did not have a problem, more than half (55 percent) said they would consult a private lawyer compared to 21 percent who said they would turn to Legal Aid for advice. See Table 18.

Awareness of Legal Aid

Legal Aid is well-known in the community. Almost nine of ten respondents (86 percent) had heard of Legal Aid, and two-thirds (67 percent) of these knew that Legal Aid provides free legal representation in most civil cases and that it provides services to the poor. Fewer respondents knew that Legal Aid does not represent anyone in criminal cases (only 25 percent of those who had heard of Legal Aid said they were aware of this). Approximately one-third (35 percent) of the respondents who had heard of Legal Aid said they knew its address.

Approximately 17 percent of all respondents had been Legal Aid clients, and three-fourths of those (76 percent) were satisfied with the service they received. See Table 19.

Suggested Improvements

The most frequently mentioned suggestion to improve Legal Aid service was to improve publicity about the group (14 percent). A wider variety of cases and involvement in non-law related activities were mentioned frequently. See Table 20.

SUMMARY

Crime was most often mentioned as a serious neighborhood problem. Two of every five problems mentioned were categorized as crime or police problems, but when the question was asked differently, economic problems such as the cost of food and housing were mentioned more frequently than crime.

Economic problems were cited more frequently than any other single category when the question focused on problems for the respondent.

Weed control received the poorest ratings in the respondents' evaluations of city services, followed by street maintenance, recreational programs and services, and housing code enforcement. Police services received the fifth lowest rating of the 12 services evaluated.

A series of questions focused on problems related to health, employment, housing, consumer affairs, family, social security, AFDC, and the law. More than one-third (36 percent) of all respondents indicated they had had legal questions or problems in the past year. Consumer/business problems predominated (42 percent), but personal problems related to divorce or wills were also frequently mentioned.

Almost one-third (31 percent) said they had had a consumer problem (including buying products or services, borrowing money, or paying bills). Problems related to credit--either obtaining it or related to creditors' actions--were also frequently mentioned.

One fourth (25 percent) of the respondents reported a problem related to employment. Problems related to finding or keeping a job or to promotion were most frequently mentioned, with difficulties related to age or race mentioned more frequently than others.

Approximately 16 percent of the respondents reported problems related to their housing. The proportion for renters was twice as high as for home owners--22 percent and 11 percent, respectively. Renters' problems were predominantly related to repairs while home-owners' problems dealt with the finances of owning a house.

Approximately one of eight respondents (12 percent) reported a health care problem. Inadequate care was the difficulty cited by most.

Approximately 7 percent of all respondents had problems related to the Social Security Administration, with understanding or completing forms and with delays or decisions predominating.

Approximately 6 percent of all respondents (but 19 percent of respondents with school-age children) reported problems related to school. Problems related to suspension/expulsion were mentioned most frequently, and injuries caused by other students were mentioned second most frequently.

Only 3 percent of the respondents reported problems related to divorce (but this constituted 13 percent of all divorced respondents). Problems with child visitation predominated.

Legal Aid was favorably perceived. Almost nine of every ten respondents (86 percent) reported they had heard of Legal Aid. Approximately 17 percent had been clients of Legal Aid, and three-fourths of these persons (76 percent) said they were satisfied with the services they had received. Of those who did not have a legal question or problem last year, approximately one-fifth (21 percent) said they would consult Legal Aid. This proportion, however, was much lower than the proportion indicating they would consult a private attorney (55 percent). Similarly, more than twice as many respondents with legal questions or problems sought advice from private lawyers than consulted Legal Aid (36 percent and 17 percent, respectively). Even more said they spoke to their caseworkers.

According to the data, many respondents did not know that Legal Aid is not involved in criminal cases. Suggestions for better services from Legal Aid included more publicity (14 percent of all respondents offered the suggestion) and involvement in a wider variety of cases and non-law related problems (approximately 10 percent offered suggestions coded in that category).
