PSYCHOLOGICAL ASPECTS OF CLOTHING

A Special Studies Paper

This research was conducted with no established set of hypotheses as guidelines. It was done to point out certain attitudes about clothing and inadvertently, how consciously or unconsciously, ideas are formed about dress.

A questionnaire was prepared for the study. It required the subject to give his age, sex, and classification, but no name. The questions were designed to include some specific topics on female dress and some on male dress, with additional topics related to neither sex expressly. These questions were given to forty (40) subjects, twenty males and twenty females. Ten of the females were enrolled in an advanced home economics course, Costume Design. The remaining ten were selected at random from the women's dormitory. Ten of the male subjects were from a large class of men's home economics. The original sampling included thirty-one; ten were chosen by counting out every third answer sheet. Likewise, ten of the male subjects were chosen randomly from a dormitory population.

The results showed some very definite trends in certain areas of dress, and rather scattered opinions in others. The average age of the females studied was 20.0 years. The group contained five sophomores, ten juniors, and five seniors. The mean age for the males was 20.25 years; this contained three freshmen, three sophomores, six juniors, and eight seniors. The results are indicated in the accompanying tables.

On the basis of these results, some of the following conclusions can be drawn. Both males and females are strongly affected by color; the brighter, warm colors give more pleasant effects than the darker, more drab colors. The females are slightly conservative in their opinions and seem to be highly prone to state what has traditionally been held in good taste. They neither want their skirts extremely short, nor do they endorse turtlenecks for all occasions. Accordingly, they approve of the latest men's fashions, if used in moderation. The overwhelming disapproval of the unisex look pointed to the fact these women want to remain looking as such. It was noticeable that casual and comfortable dress were the desired order of the day. For this privilege they refused to give up a neat personal appearance, however. The question concerning a poorly dressed female brought sharp criticism of the woman with improper fit, unkept clothing, and a poor personal appearance, such as runners in her hose, too much make-up, unkept hair or clothes that need mending. The females were more critical of the poorly dressed male than the males were of themselves. A strong carry-over of ideas was noted - poor fit, sloppy appearance and poor color combinations.

To summarize these findings one could say the females are apparently moving to a more open opinion about dress and show signs of wanting to experiment. They are quite fashion conscious and yet influenced by a desire to remain individuals.

Though men have generally been thought of as having only a passive interest in clothing, this group showed an enthusiastic concern. To be sure, they have stronger opinions and more definite descriptions of their wearing apparel than the women's. They are keenly affected by length of dress, the color, and fit of a dress. An unexpected view came from a question about turtlenecks as opposed to shirts and ties. 70% of the men favored the "chokers", whereas 5% totally preferred turtlenecks. Several stated the opinion that the preference varied with the occasion. Just as the women did, the men showed strong conservative ideas about their dress, with an established opinion of dressing to carry out the sex role identification. They were also interested in casual wear; favorite sets of clothing were mentioned as "comfortable" and "feels good." Blue was the favorite color of men and of women for men to wear. Various reasons were given, ranging from happy color to complimenting eyes and complexion. Women found it sexy, flattering and neat. The males judged the poorly dressed female to be a girl in sloppy clothes which do not fit, and whose make-up and hair leave something to be desired, among other points.

Condemning one of their own sex as poorly dressed they held more consistent ideas among the group: he is sloppy, with wrinkled and/or dirty clothes and a poor choice of colors.

Using these points it may be inferred that the two groups used have comparable ideals about clothing. They apparently dress for their own benefit and pleasure, though influenced to some degree by the fads and styles of the day. Females generally tend to pay more attention to details than males, who look at an over all view point.

It is perhaps necessary to state that no definite psychological factors were pinpointed as basis for reasoning. Yet we may be justified in assuming that our "psyche" strongly affects the decision making.
