Children and the Law

Studies dealing with Children and the Law, in their various ramifications, are timely indeed in view of the increasing breakdown of the American family.

As statistics reveal more and more the disintegrating of family life in this country, often producing psychological orphans, such matters as custody, child abuse, adoption and others require serious study. Then, too, the surge of adolescent independence, the breakdown of parental authority and the frustration attending both, have serious consequences not only on the immediate family involved but on society as a whole.

A serious study, encompassing the many facets of Children and the Law cannot, in view of the serious weakening of family life, be overemphasized.
