Jigsaw

Volume 2015 | Issue 1

Article 38

2015

Steroids and EpiPens

Sarah Elardo The College at Brockport, selar1@brockport.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/jigsaw

Part of the Poetry Commons

Repository Citation

Elardo, Sarah (2015) "Steroids and EpiPens," Jigsaw: Vol. 2015: Iss. 1, Article 38. $A vailable\ at:\ http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/jigsaw/vol2015/iss1/38$

This Poem is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @Brockport. It has been accepted for inclusion in Jigsaw by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @Brockport. For more information, please contact kmyers@brockport.edu.

Steroids and EpiPens

were quickly injected by the Muslim doctor Nissiem into the biggest muscle in my body; my bare, white, glute. "There had to have been a circular sticker on the glass" said the guilty nutritionist. He was innocent, and I, while sprawled out on the hospital bed, red bumps taking over my body, causing every hole and opening that connected my inner organs to the real world to swell shut, was a liar.

The purple onions, drizzled with warm oil sat in the grey serving platter behind the glass in the dining hall that Wednesday evening. Mixed in, the thick parmesan balls and the green beans in the dish looked surprisingly, edible. The rare commodity was too good to turn down for such an underprivileged stomach.

"Are there nuts in this?"
"I don't think so!"
The server made a simple mistake.

After the first bite, the body was engulfed with the pricks of allergens as the walnuts squeezed every last bit of air out of the lungs. The oiled, purple onions that stuck to the green beans seemed safe as they all traveled down the esophagus smoothly, but after a few seconds I knew.

The server had made a simple mistake. She probably didn't know that the platter had tree nuts in it, she probably just chose to tell a white lie. But at that moment, when she thought she could quickly get rid of me, instead, she watched me get pricked and jabbed with needles helplessly, as I desperately gasped for survival.

I listened to the nutritionist apologize for the missing sticker.
This is not about the sticker, I said.
This is not about the sticker at all.

By Sarah Elardo