HISTORY 310° INFANTRY

THE NEW PROPOSED 310 TH INFANTRY

REGIMENTAL INSIGNIA

The revised Regimental Insignia on the title page symbolizes the history of this Regiment through two World Wars.

The half of Infantry Blue is taken directly from the original insignia approved and adopted after World War I. The tree and cross represent the fighting in France at the Battles of the Argonne and St. Mihiel respectively. For World War I three battle stars.

In the new shield the Lightning Flash of the 78th Division has been extended to penetrate a line of dragon's teeth depicting the Siegfried Line and plunging deep into enemy territory. The first and last missions of the Regiment in Germany are represented by the pine tree for the Battle of the Ardennes, and the iron cross for the victorious Army of Occupation. For World War II three battle stars.

The most dramatic incident in the history of the Regiment was the surprise crossing of the Rhine. This is symbolized in the crest by the Ludendorff Bridge at Remagen. The motto "HEADS UP" and all the other new features of the Insignia were proposed and selected by combat veterans of the Regiment in World War II and approved by a representative of the combat veterans of the Regiment in World War I.

The new insignia has been submitted to the Quartermaster General in Washington for adoption.

DEDICATION

TO THOSE MEN OF THE REGIMENT

WHO GAVE THEIR LIVES IN THIS WAR

MORE TERRIBLE THAN ALL THE WORDS

(An American Soldier writes to his Son.)

MY SON:

War is a more terrible thing than all the words of man can say; more terrible than a man's mind can comprehend.

- It is the corpse of a friend; one moment ago a living human being with thoughts, hopes, and a future—just exactly like yourself—now nothing.
- It is the eyes of men after battle, like muddy water, lightless.
- It is cities—labor of generations lost—now dusty piles of broken stones and splintered wood—dead.
- It is the total pain of a hundred million parted loved ones—some for always.
- It is the impossibility of planning a future; uncertainty that mocks every hoping dream.
- Remember! It is the reality of these things—not the words.
- It is the sound of an exploding shell; a moment's silence, then the searing scream "MEDIC" passed urgently from throat to throat.
- It is the groans and the pain of the wounded, and the expressions on their faces.
- It is the sound of new soldiers crying before battle; the louder sound of their silence afterwards.
- It is the filth and itching and hunger; the endless body discomfort; the fèeling like an animal; the fatigue so deep that to die would be good.

It is battle, which is confusion, fear, hate, death, misery and much more.

The reality—not the words. Remember!

- It is the evil snickering knowledge that sooner or later the law of averages will catch up with each soldier, and the horrible hope that it will take the form of a wound, not maiming or death.
- It is boys of 19 who might be in the schoolroom or flirting in the park; husbands who might be telling their wives of a raise—tender and happy-eyed; fathers who might be teaching their sons to throw a ball—bright with pride. It is these men, mouths and insides ugly with hate and fear, driving a bayonet into other men's bodies.
- It is "battle fatigue," a nice name for having taken more than the brain and heart can stand, and taking refuge in a shadowy unreal world.
- It is the maimed coming home; dreading pity, dreading failure, dreading life.
- It is many million precious years of human lives lost, and the watching of the loss day by day, month by month, year by year, until hope is an ugly sneering thing.
- Remember! Remember and multiply these things by the largest number you know. Then repeat them over and ever again until they are alive and burning in your mind.
- Remember! Remember what we are talking about. Not words; not soldiers; but human beings just exactly like yourself.

And when it is in your mind so strongly that you can never forget; then seek how you can best keep peace. Work at this hard with every tool of thought and love you have. Do not rest until you can say to every man who ever died for man's happiness: "You did not die in vain."

INTRODUCTION

SECTION I: THE 310TH INFANTRY IN WORLD WAR I

The 310th Infantry Regiment has fought in more than one war. This history is primarily an account of the present 310th Infantry Regiment in World War II, but there is a story to tell of an earlier 310th Regiment which carried the same Regimental Colors into battle against the German enemy in World War I.

Let's take a quick look at our comrades-in-arms of another generation. During the Fall of 1917, the 310th Infantry Regiment was activated and trained at Fort Dix, New Jersey. It was not until late Spring of 1918 that the Regiment sailed for Europe, and by September of that year they had moved by stages to the American sector of the Western Front.

The first combat assignment of the 310th Regiment was a holding mission in the Limey Sector. Here, they relieved the 6th Regiment of Marines; the great St. Mihiel Offensive was on.

The Limey Sector proved to be a difficult position to hold. The hard ground in the area was unsuitable for deep entrenchments and casualties ran high from German artillery.

On September 21st, a battalion mission of taking the important objective of "Nom Plaisir Ferme" was executed by elements of the Regiment. The mission as outlined for the Infantry Battalion was carried out as planned, but casualties were very heavy. In this area the Germans had a preponderance of artillery support as well as control of the air.

The Regiment was on the march by October 5, and their next assignment was in the La Viergette Crossroads Sector in the Argonne. On October 15th the 310th Infantry relieved the 306th Regiment in the line north of the Aire River. Everywhere preparations for the mighty Meuse-Argonne Offensive were intense.

The 310th Infantry moved out in the attack in their zone on October 16th, taking their objective by dark. The general American attack on the key Bois des Loges objective bogged down after a four day assault, and the period from October 21 to November 1st was consumed mainly by patrol and reconnaissance activity.

By November 1st, it was time to move again. The Regiment resumed, the attack, and successfully gained their first objective in the Bois des Loges. After the second day of attack another important objective was secured. Both attacks had resulted in a great cost of lives, but the Germans were thrown into retreat—the pursuit was on. By November 5th, the Regiment had done its job and was relieved by the 42nd Division, who continued the pursuit, until November 11th.

The Combat Commanders of the 310th Infantry Regiment in World War I were as follows:

Major General James H. McRae 78th Division Commander Colonel Walter C. Babcock 310th Regimental Commander

At the present time, and throughout the period between the two wars, the Veterans organization of the 310th Infantry and the 78th Division have been quite active. Frequent reunions and annual meetings have kept alive the spirit of comradeship engendered during the days of the war, and the fellowship of the organizations have been a lasting pleasure to the men who went "over-the-top" together in a common cause.

SECTION II: RE-ACTIVATION AND TRAINING OF THE 310TH INFANTRY

It was a very hot day in August, August 15, 1942, the day when the 310th Infantry was re-commissioned for another war. That day was called Re-Activation Day. General Edwin P. Parker, Jr. proudly presented the Regimental Colors as the 310th Infantry was re-commissioned for another war. Lots of men wilted in that sun—some with plenty of rank! Most of the cadre had come from Camp Wheeler, Georgia, and Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

There was a big job ahead for the officers and men who stood in that formation that afternoon. The enemy, back in those days, was the mud of Camp Butner, the administrative headache of forming a new division, the complications of perfecting a workable training program with little equipment, and the general readjustment of everyone to a new kind of life.

Between the months of August 1942 and March 1943, the Division functioned in the capacity of a replacement pool. From everywhere, thousands of enlisted men came to the Division. Some came from various Infantry Replacement Training Centers, some from service units, all were after further training before going overseas. These men usually arrived with some six to thirteen weeks' training. The 78th Division would try diligently to give them an additional three to six weeks' training before their number came up for overseas duty. By March 1943, the Division had trained and processed more than 52,000 soldiers for combat duty with other units. We profited by this mission both from the experience and from the augmentation of our cadre with selected men from the replacement pool.

A New Deal for the Division and the 310th Regiment started in March, 1943. Fresh from Reception Centers came strong, young men, mainly in the 18 to 20 year age bracket. They were excellent recruits to add to our experienced cadre.

Throughout the Spring and terrifically summer of that year, a fine cadre of officers and non-commissioned officers of the regiment worked to teach these men their basic infantry training. The training was seemingly endless and weary cycle of long, hot hikes to distant firing ranges, of lengthy, fatiguing and sleepless combat exercises, of long hours of everything but recreation and pleasure.

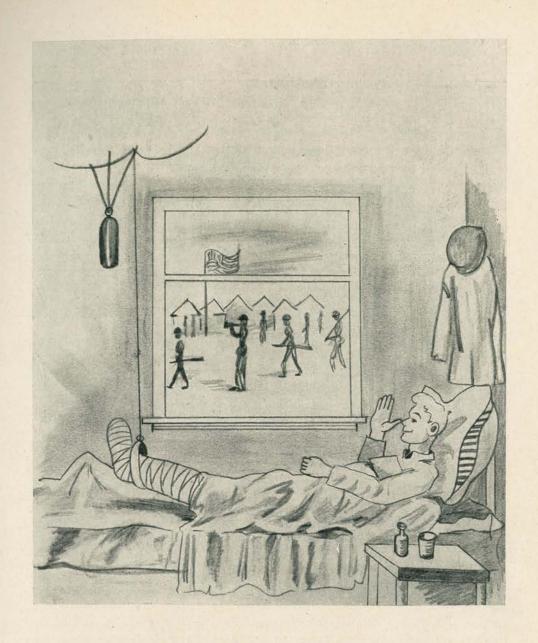

In the Fall of that year, there were unit problems. The great "dry-battles" of Moriah and Prince Edward Forest in Virginia were waged. Then came the famous "D" Series in the hills of South Carolina. The men learned to knock off 25 miles in eight hours with packs on their backs.

The final "graduation exercises" were held in Tennessee. Tennessee Maneuvers in the dead of winter! From January 20, 1944 to March 29—it was no time for a picnic. The lengthy tactical problems were a severe hardship. There was incessant rain and penetrating cold, but the men learned what was vital for them to know. The 310th was a good outfit. It had a fine maneuver record.

During the Maneuvers, the Regiment was being repeatedly called upon for officers to go overseas as replacements. The officer turnover became considerable. Little did we realize what was about to occur. The need for replacements in combat theatres was great. Congress decreed that the 18 year olds in Replacement Training Centers could not be sent overseas as replacements. The need had to be filled.

Then it happened! The regiment pulled into Camp Pickett, Virginia, on April 1st, supposedly all set for combat duty. Two weeks later all the Privates and Privates First Class left the regiment and were on their way to Ports of Embarkation as replacements. Our "team" was broken up. Most of them participated in D-Day landings in France. The drain on the junior officer personnel was equally heavy. Everyone said, "the 78th Division will never go overseas." It was a bitter pill to swallow.

The regiment received replacements again; they came from everywhere. Most of them were ex-ASTP and Air Corps pre-flight men, suddenly transferred to Infantry. Some would have been pilots soon. They were a disappointed group. The crying need for infantry replacements had demanded their services in a branch other than their choosing. It was hard to come from comfortable college dormitories and go through the rigors of infantry training and discipline. Naturally, morale was a problem, but by the end of June, they were beginning to look like good fighting men. But the $10th Regiment had still another pill to swallow. In August, another battle replacement requirement stripped the Regiment of half of this latest group. Surely, this would end the 310th's chances of ever moving as a unit!

But again more replacements came, this time from Infantry. Replacement Training Centers. There was little time for training now. The provisions of POM were put into effect and tension was in the air.

At last, despite all rumors to the contrary, the 78th Division itself was alerted for overseas shipment. The officers hardly knew their men in some cases, and often the men hardly knew each other. The war had come to these men in a hurry, and this was to be the fighting team that would be shooting at Germans sixty days hence.

SECTION III: THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW

Writing the history of a combat regiment is not an easy thing. Recording all the things that happened, telling why they did happen and doing justice to all the superhuman effort expended in accomplishing the missions assigned the 310th Infantry Regiment is utterly impossible. The men who played so vital a role as members of the 310th will understand this, knowing that their own experiences in just one day of battle would fill volumes.

This book, therefore, is really the overall Regimental picture, or your guide to more intimate explanation of what was going on all about you within your Regimental sector. It may help to answer the queston "Why" that so disturbed you during combat. Hardly ever during the campaigns were the troops in that happy position where a full orientation of what was going on could have been given. Even had it been possible, constantly changing situations would have rendered void preconceived notions of what was going to take place.

The fighting man of the 310th may find this outline of help in answering many of the things that heretofore appeared so unaccountable. It is suggested that he enlarge upon the printed word by drawing from his own experiences and observations as he rounds out the picture for his family and friends. This is manifestly necessary.

The total stranger reading this history may find it sketchy, yet modern war reporting being what it is, there is the hope that prior knowledge of the miserable doughboy's existence will suffice to augment this cursory outline to a point where full visualization of the drama will be yours.

Though the tendency is to glorify and glamorize, there is no intention in this record to deviate from the factual. Military necessity is a convenient phrase for summing up all judgments, be they born of actuality or in anticipation of what may come to pass. The men who fought this war were nothing more than you and I; human beings whose faculty for decision and necessary action implies a reasonable probability of error. This report readily admits that mistakes were made and a deliberate attempt has been made to avoid coloring or finding plausible excuses. In absolute fairness, it must be said whatever the mistake (and there were few), they were unintentional errors that cropped up during periods of unusual stress. Your narrators are willing to give odds that there isn't a man amongst you veterans who won't admit that there was at least one little incident that you might have done differently and better too.

Come what may, war from the aspect of the Infantry is neither glorious nor glamorous. The unusual was the usual, and each man in his own did the unexpected.

Rather than enlarge the narrative by periodic references to elemental descriptive matter, the constant insertion of which would clog the record, it may be well to mention some of the cardinal things here.

Contrary to common belief, 65% of the enlisted men of this Regiment were not seasoned infantry trainees, but rather had come to the organization from other branches within three or four months before departure from the States. While there may be some question as to the real training value of maneuvers, there can be no doubt that hunger, loss of sleep, exposure to the elements and actual physical hardships for long periods was to be a new experience for these people. The same holds good for the hundreds of replacements that came to the Regiment during combat, particularly after the "Bulge" had drained the replacement pools. These men had to learn the hard way, and from scratch.

Pain and suffering is not necessarily confined to physical injury or debility. More often it is manifested by little things taken for granted. Only the doughboy knows what it is to tire of K rations and how welcome hot chow can be (even though the so-called "hot chow" was prepared hours ago, comes in thermal cans, and is shared with two or three buddies out of the same mess kit). The dough's first shock with reality of combat comes when he turns in to the common dump all his personal belongings, those duffle bags that have broken his back with the wellstocked, carefully marked clothing he's been responsible for, and he's left with the clothes on his back, a raincoat and an extra pair of socks that help make up his combat pack.

The participants of these campaigns will well remember how it was considered inadvisable to wear an overcoat even in this freezing weather. The Germans wore long overcoats, and any man seen in an overcoat might be shot on sight—with no questions asked.

It will be well remembered how changing a pair of socks in a waterfilled foxhole was a Herculean task; how baths or shaving was something to dream about, and where performing the necessary normal body functions was a reversion to the primitive

And can it ever be forgotten what letters from home meant; and how the Battle of the Bulge delayed the mail. Then, there were the famous PX rations and those strange bottles of Coca-Cola. Opening them was like Christmas morning under the Chriftmas tree.

These are but a few of the things left out of the history. They must, however, be understood before there can be a true realization of what is meant by being "in the line".

At the outset, too, apologies are offered to the officers and men whose names will unintentionally be omitted, but whose arduous efforts contributed so much to victory.

If, however, this recital serves as a guide for taking you through 128 days of continuous combat, resulting in 200 percent casualties in some companies, or acts as a memento of hard bays, when any hour might have been the last hour, it will have fulfilled its purpose.

A word about your authors:

Somebody has to take the blame for all the things that are said, should have been said, or are told incorrectly in your individual opinion. Rather than have you blame the wrong people, we've decided to identify ourselves.

Captain William E. Brubeck, a draftee who came to the 78th Division as a 90 day wonder from Benning and who, during the campaigns, was Operations Officer (S-3) for the Second Battalion. A geologist by profession, he can tell you all about the ground of Germany from personal experience.

Sgt. Lewis S. Hollins, who had the rare opportunity of sharing the life of the rear and the front during all three campaigns. He was Liaison Sergeant between Regimental Headquarters and the 2nd Battalion. A lawyer by profession, he upholds the theory that there's nothing like a good battle, but it should be in court.

T/5 Ralph Delby, a combat veteran from one of our line companies drew most of our maps and some of the sketches. Pfc. Delby was an art student as a civilian.

Cpl. Adam D. Baron, our very able and talented cartoonist. A commercial artist in civilian life, he can portray the life of a combat soldier because he has been there.

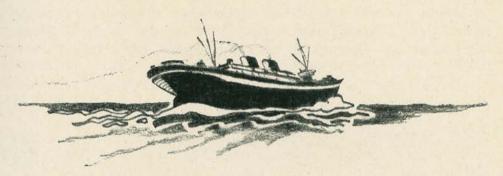

Others who inherited the History during its composition were: Lt. Fitzhugh Wallace, P.F.C. John Jud, T/5 Joseph Thomas, Pvt. George Weiser, S/Sgt. Frank Bertch.

The task of securing material, liaison with German printers, and securing combat material and pictures vas endless.

This history would not have been possible without the encouragement and help of Colonel Thomas H. Hayes, Regimental Commander, and to him your authors are deeply indebted. We also wish to thank each Battalion and the numerous people who have been most cooperative in supplying us with the data so essential for the report.

CHAPTERONE

IN WHICH WE GO TO GERMANY

After CampPickett, there was one last stop before Europe. On October 5, the 78th Division became the guest of Camp Kilmer, New Jersey. Kilmer was the hush-hush Port of Embarkation. No one dared breath the sacred word of "Kilmer," for fear a German torpedo would strike them, even on dry land. Military security and army intelligence precautions were the rage of the day. Everyone cooperated, even though some of the measures appeared extreme. The phrase "310th Infantry" was strictly taboo.

Camp Kilmer was a depressing place. At least, most people thought so. All of the camp's great array of hired help seemed to be feverishly plotting to get everyone else to the battle front. And they were, but definitely. Kilmer had its bright spots, however. The men from New Jersey and New York could make it home on twelve hour passes, and there were several. Lots of men from other sections of the country saw New York City for their first time; had their last glorious fling; found that it was quite expensive to "fling" in New York.

By October 12, it was "Germans, here we come!" We were on our way now. When would we see home again?

The Regiment boarded trains at Kilmer, headed northeast for New York Harbor. Several hours later, it had detrained, caught a quick glimpse of the New York skyline, crossed the Hudson by ferry, and walked onto the pier.

Nothing glamorous, this dimly lit shed-like pier with a small opening in the side where the gang plank, came in. At the gang plank, an officer called out last names, long lines of sober faced soldiers responded with their first name and middle initial. Some were out of breath from the excessive weight imposed by the copious quantities of equipment and duffle strapped all over them. They were moaning and groaning at the momentary discomforts. Indeed, there was more to come!

The ship elected to taxi the 310th Infantry to a second war in twenty-five years was the General George O. Squier, a naval transport.

The USS Squier remained in dock all that night and the next day, and finally pulled out after dark on Friday, the 13th. Saturday morning there was nothing to be seen but waves and 20-odd ships in the convoy. No one had been allowed on deck to see the Statue of Liberty.

The trip was not pleasant. The Squier was a sturdy navy transport, designed for carrying as many troops as possible in the minimum amount of space. The men were jammed into four and five decked cot-furnished compartments going four decks down.

Chow was twice daily for those who felt well enough to face the evilsmelling galley and sweat out the line which wound twice around the decks. Other activities were speculation as to whether the destination was England or France, classes in orientation, a little training, reading, watching the water, card games, getting rid of the previous meal, guard and KP.

On a certain day the ship's Captain received debarking orders, and the 310th was told it would debark at Plymouth, England.

The Squier moved slowly into the picturesque Plymouth Harbor on the morning of October 25th. England looked good and thousands of men jammed the rails to watch the landing, and eye the British women and soldiers along the docks. A British band played American tunes as the slow unloading was accomplished. Land was pleasant after 12 days of rocking decks. Our advance detachment, which had sailed a few weeks ahead on the "Aquitania" waited for us on shore.

Loading into the small compartmented, but comfortable English trains occupied the afternoon and evening, but once moving, the trains travelled rapidly and arrived at Bournemouth in short order. The deserted blacked-out stations and towns along the tracks made the war seem closer.

The 3rd Battalion detrained in Bournemouth and the remainder of the troops in the Bournemouth suburb of Christ Church, from where they walked, still with pack and duffle bag, to Southbourne. All troops were billeted in empty English homes and hotels.

Life was pleasant for the next 26 days. There were training or work details during the day, but the nights were free, the British families and the girls very hospitable; the beer was plentiful, though weak and a little warm. The 310th was sorry to leave, and many broken-hearted young girls said goodbye to 310th soldiers with tears in their eyes.

At 0300 November 21, the 310th went by rail to Southampton, and at dawn boarded HMS Llangibby Castle. The jeeps and trucks carrying a part of the Regiment loaded and crossed the channel on U. S. Navy and Coast Guard LSTs.

The Llangibby Castle, a converted passenger ship, was crowded; the crossing was rough and wet. The steady diet of mutton didn't sit very well on the queazy stomachs, and for Thanksgiving Dinner there was only more mutton. Those on U. S. LSTs had turkey but an even rougher time.

The ships dropped anchor in the demolished Le Havre harbor, and landing was accomplished after dark in LSTs. It was raining and the 10 minute march to the trucks was through the most demolished part of the town. The piles of rubble and broken buildings which lined the dark streets seemed ominous, and the war seemed very close and real.

Trucks took the 310th to an assembly area in the vicinity of Yvetot, France, and the troops set up pup tents in mud a foot deep. Regimental Headquarters was set up in a chateau in St. Paer. It rained almost constantly for the next two days and the French countryside was dreary and dull.

Always time to feel human

At dawn on November 26, part of the regiment moved out by motor, and in the afternoon, the remainder of the 310th was crammed into box cars, "40 and 8s," World War I variety. The motor convoy, which arrived at Tongeren, Belgium on the afternoon of the 27th, passed through recently liberated French and Belgian towns which had seen few American soldiers. The night of the 26th was spent in billets near Mons where the Belgians received the 310th men with cheers, food, and occasional kisses. But the men in the box cars, which bumped along backwards almost as much as forwards, didn't reach Tongeren until 2200 on the 28th, and many of them vow they would rather have walked.

The Regimental CP was set up in a country estate near Genoels-Elderen (about 10 miles from Tongeren) and the Battalions were billeted or bivouaced in small towns in the vicinity. At this time the 78th Division was in the Reserve of the U.S. Ninth Army, commanded by our former XII Corps Commander, Lieut. General Simpson.

Here the regiment became acquainted with buzz bombs, which passed noisily overhead toward Antwerp and England. It was all right as long as they continued to sputter. But sometimes, the sputtering would stop. Then there would be a moment of silence followed by a loud explosion. The troops also learned about trenchfoot, the tremendous casualties it brought about, and ways to combat it. Some officers and noncoms visited front line units of the 29th and 30th Divisions and the entire Regiment received orientation on the "big picture." Here we first heard of "The Dams" which were preventing the Ninth Army from crossing the Roer River. Those "Dams" in the First Army sector were to become a vital part of this History.

Final supply and last minute training were accomplished. Guard was careful and it wouldn't have been wise to playfully startle a guard, whose finger, more than likely, was against the trigger. But there were hay-filled barns for sleeping and the Belgian farmers were very friendly. Then quite suddenly, the 78th Division was transferred to General Hodges First Army, to be committed to action.

This move, which was made by motor at 0800 December 7, put the 3rd Battalion astride a line of recently captured dragon's teeth inside Germany, near Rotgen. The other Battalions and Regimental Head-quarters bivouaced nearby in pine forests around Raeren, Belgium. So deep was the mud that in many cases it was necessary to build bridges and corduroy roads to enter the bivouac areas. It took until 2200 to get settled.

On Friday, December 8th, our Regimental Commander, Colonel Miner received a warning order at Division Headquarters. The troops got set for a quick movement.

Snow fell on the 9th and 10th while selected personnel made reconnaissance and commanders discussed plans.

At 1800 on December 11, in complete blackout and in a driving snow, the Regiment marched 10 miles to an assembly area in the vicinity of Lammersdorf, Germany. Units closed in this area by midnight, and the Regimental CP was set up in the Otto Junker factory in the northwest part of town. Field Order No. 1 was issued, while german shells burst outside.

CHAPTER TWO

PRELUDE TO BATTLE

Remember the high hopes of victory by Christmas 1944?

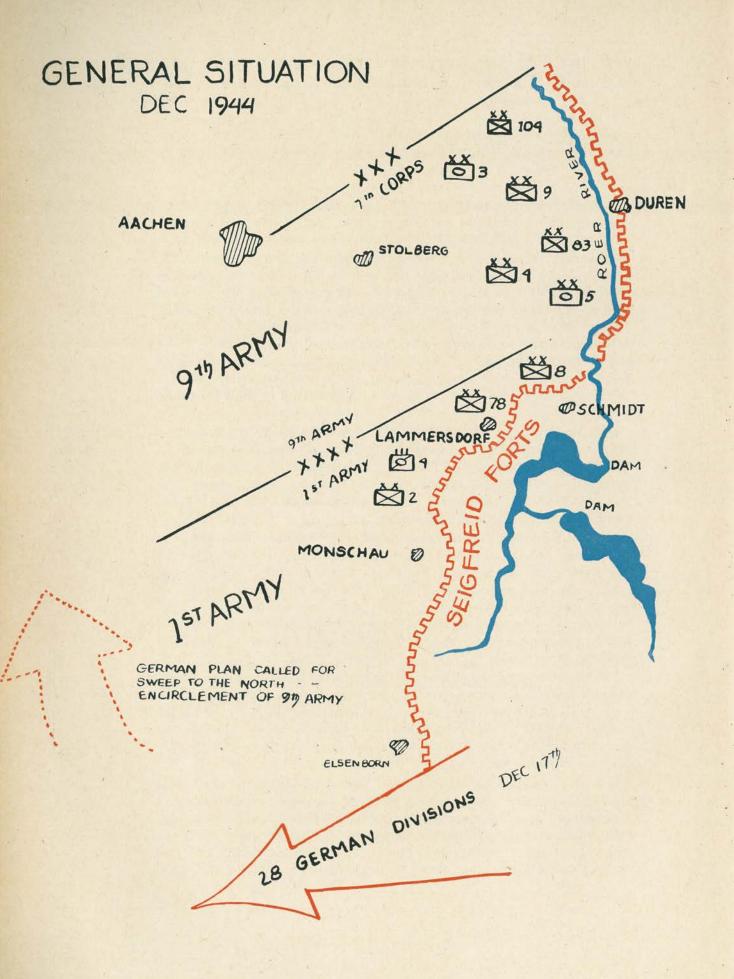

There was a time when this seemed probable. The sector into which the 78th Division was unexpectedly rushed held the key to the situation. It would be well to follow the regional sketch showing the northern part of the Western Front in this discussion of the general situation. By the end of November, the Divisions of the 9th Army had closed over to the Roer River in the vicinity of Duren, to the east of Aachen. It had meant chewing into and through portions of the fortified belt of the Siegfried Line against bitter opposition by a resolute enemy, able to throw in reserves and armor to contest every village to the very banks of the Roer.

The general allied plan called for a breakthrough by the 9th Army across the Cologne Plain, where the flat terrain was suited for an armored sweep to the Rhine. It was this anticipated breakthrough that prompted the wishful thinking of early victory and it seemed like reasonable anticipation except for an annoying obstacle that played so vital a part in "Lightning's" destiny.

The north-flowing Roer River, somewhat over 60 feet wide and 3 to 5 feet deep, was not of itself a major obstacle. The Roer valley, however had marshy flat lands about 300 yards in front of the river channel on the American side. This, coupled with the more serious fact that the Germans still held the three great dams on the upper Roer near Schmidt made the Roer a potentially formidable barrier. The enemy at will could loosen a flood capable of washing away military bridges and flooding the lowlands and river valley.

The Schmidt Dams had to be taken before there could be a main breakthrough toward the Rhine. It was "the most important mission of the western front." It was this mission that was assigned to the 78th Division. The date of attack was December 13th, in the vicinity of Lammersdorf. Twice before this objective had been tried by American infantry, and twice there had been dismal failure.

Nine out of every ten soldiers never see actual battle, and most often the tenth (the man with the rifle) is taught the ways of the enemy in a defensive line somewhere on the front. The 78th Division doughboys had been scheduled to learn this comparatively easy way, in a relatively quiet Ninth Army sector near Julich. Plans were changed and fate decreed that indoctrination would be the hard way; attacking the world famous West Wall. It turned out to be not so easy, or as the British would say, "The task was not inconsiderable."

On paper, the plan of attack was not overly complicated, and hopes ran high for those bending over their maps and studying terrain.

Briefly, here's the way the big picture plan looked: The 311th Infantry Regiment (attached to the 8th Division) was to begin a local, diversionary attack in the vicinity of Vossenack (see Map A-10). This was for the purpose of confusing the enemy and diverting attention from the main attempt at Rollesbroich and Simmerath. It turned out that the Germans knew where their responsibility lay and would not be deceived. The main attack was to be made by the 1st and 3d Battalions of the 310th Infantry Regiment driving on Rollesbroich, and the 309th Infantry Regiment, to which the 2d Battalion, 310th Infantry was attached, taking Simmerath and Kesternich. When these intial objectives were seized, Phase I of the offensive would be terminated.

Phase II, to be executed thereafter, called for capturing the southern towns of Konzen, Imgenbroich and Eichersheid. This action would clear the Germans from the west bank of the Roer River and completely outflank Schmidt on the south. (See Map A for Phase II.)

The third and final phase was to be a concentrated attack from the south and southwest on Schmidt. Even a hasty glance at the map suggests the advisability of a drive due east from Vossenack (in the 311th area) to capture the real objective, Schmidt and the dam. Why then all the extensive maneuvering and exposure in the excessively fortified area around Rollesbroich and Kesternich? The answer is as simple as it is tragic. It had been tried (as already indicated) twice before from Vossenack. Each time it had turned into a slaughter in the dense woods and precipitous slopes of the Kall Creek canyon lying before Schmidt. Here the 28th and 8th Infantry Divisions had suffered heavily.

Hence the south approach—as the only feasible way; with Kesternich and Rollesbroich in friendly hands, the way would be open. After Schmidt, would come the small village of Hasenfeld, which lay in the Roer Valley area. The great Schwammanual Dam would be the key to success.

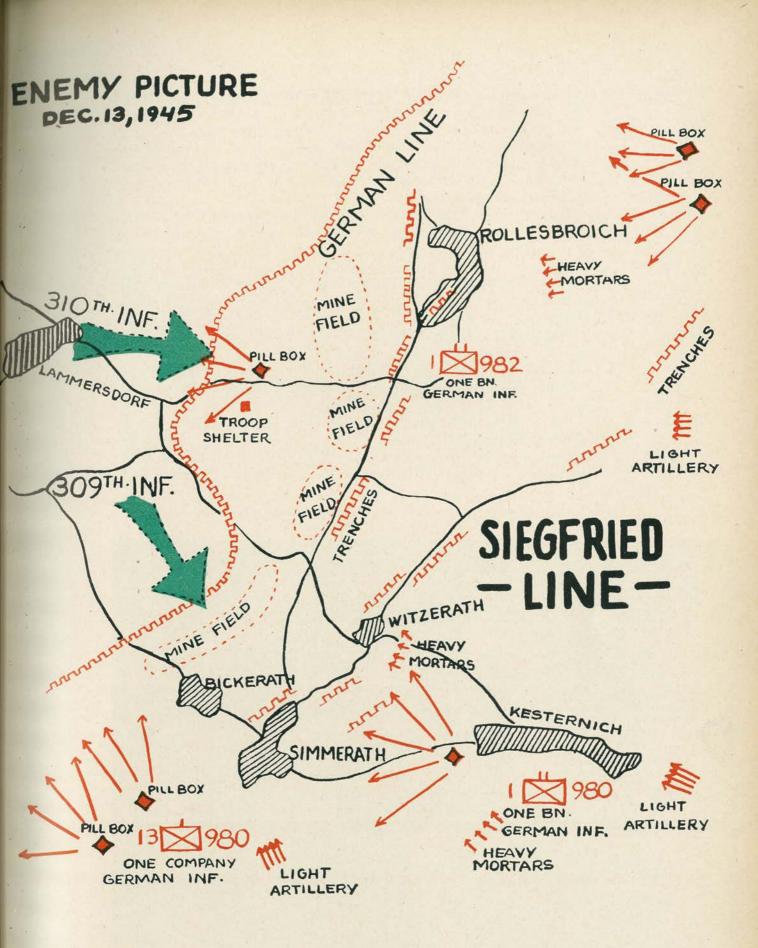

This, then, was the Division big picture.

Now for a sketch of how the jig-saw looked from a closer range, the 310th and its component Battalions' specific missions and planning.

Typical assault against a fortified line! How unexciting those words appear in print, yet what mockery to talk of typical assault as if there was a pattern that served as a cure-all for the situation, regardless of its nature.

The enemy occupied the high ground along the line running from Rollesbroich south to Simmerath. In front of these carefully selected defensive positions jutted the rugged terrain of Kall Creek canyon. The Germans weren't taking any chances. Continuous anti-personnel and anti-tank mine fields had been planted along the entire front. Pillboxes, dugouts, and trench positions with their diverse fire power were to be reckoned with. The defense extended in depth to the Roer River. Schmidt was well defended on all sides.

Prior intelligence indicated the Rollesbroich-Simmerath line was manned by two battalions of infantry, part of the 980th and 982d Volksgrenadiers. Their fields of fire were excellent and their artillery and mortar support was well-nigh perfect. They had a perfect defense system. The fighting quality of the individual soldier was of secondary importance. This may in part explain the good use to which the Germans were able to employ inferior troops and even foreign troops. The picture may appear clearer by reference to Map B.

SCALE 1:25,000

Across the Kall Creek Canyon, cloaked as it was in the virgin white of fresh snow that helped hide the German defenses, was our 102d Cavalry. Their foxholes along the creek were to represent the line of departure for the 310th attack. Lammersdorf, with its huge Otto Junker plant, was to serve as the Regimental Command Post, the town church steeple was to become the Observation Post, and the roof of a building a post for directing artillery fire.

The men of the 102d Cavalry were not to be relieved from their positions in the customary manner. The 310th was to pass through and keep moving forward. Maybe this was better, for it didn't permit realization of what first contact with death would be like. Would it be movement by short rushes, extended skirmish line, or a column movement? Odd how the manuals seem altogether inadequate when facing reality.

The 310th was to take Rollesbroich. The 3d Battalion was to carry the ball. The 1st Battalion was to make a limited advance on the 3d's right and secure the high ground south of Rollesbroich. (The 2d Battalion was with the 309th and headed for Simmerath and Kesternich.) The attached sketch shows the proposed plan and how it was executed.

The missions were assigned, the objectives were understood ... the attack was to get under way.

Remember, this was December 12th, and the great von Rundstedt surprise offensive began just four days later. The best layed plans —

Beneath the winter wonderland—buried explosives, trip wires, mine fields, booby traps... defensive worker of a satanic genius

CHAPTER THREE

BAPTISM BY FIRE

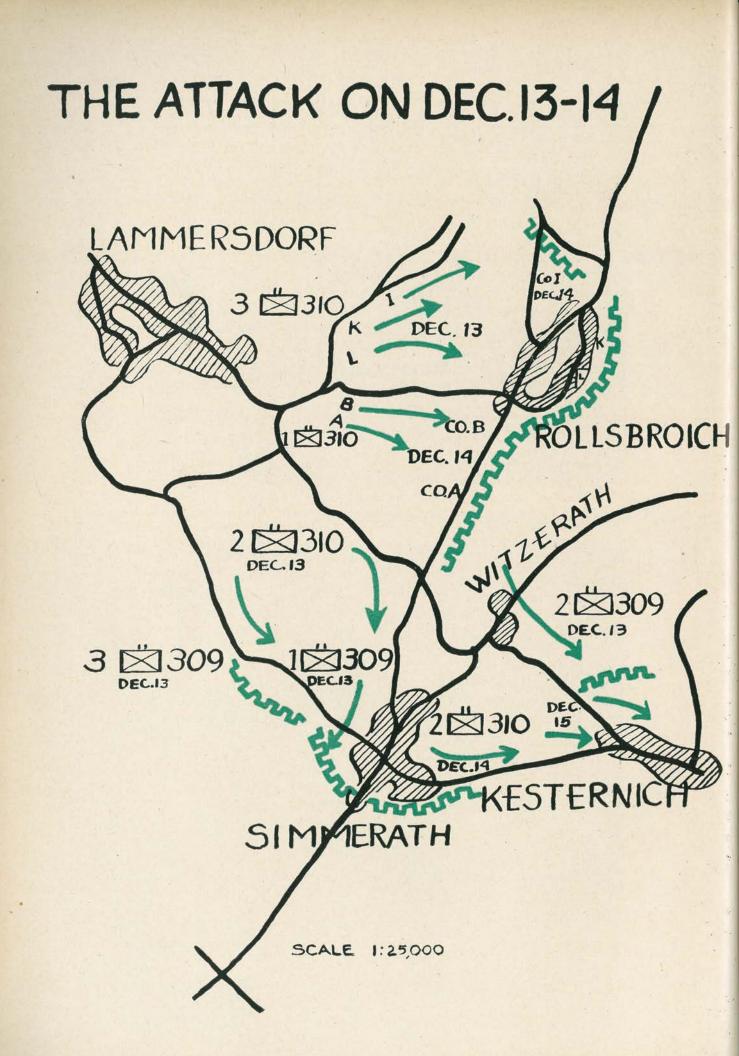

The fight begins.

Odd that we should think of "baptism" as applying to troops in their first encounter. Odder still that the baptism should be by fire, and blood. It wouldn't be long now—the time had finally come. In the foggy half-light towards dawn, the bitterness of battle, the nightmare of exploding mortar shells, the terror of overhead tree bursts, the staccato of machine guns, the man-made hell from the skies—all were about to join hands to make the doughboy's existence wretched and miserable. The Siegfried Line was all these things and more.

SECTION I: ROLLESBROICH

During the nights of December 11th and 12th, the 310th lads moved up silently from bivouac areas between Raeren, Belgium, and Röttgen, Germany. The early morning of the 13th was extremely cold, and the snow which had fallen intermittently for three days, was glazed and deceivingly deep. The troops had spent a miserable night. They were thoroughly wet and chilled by the cold sweat of anticipation. Every man was tense and excited; most were afraid, yet unwilling to show it. There were tears, unnatural laughter, and prayer. Weapons were checked and rechecked automatically. Feet were already half frozen, (there were never enough overshoes or arctics to go around) and fingers were brittle. It was only two months later that infantry troops were supplied with winterized equipment or white camouflaged suits to blend with the snow.

Yet, there was the unfailing quality of determination. There was a job to be done.

Looking east from Lammersdorf, the panorama was beautiful to the eyes; rolling fields with hedgerows to mark property lines, or broken here and there by an occasional farmhouse, cut by ravines and sprinkled by sudden steep pine covered hills. It was all beautiful for the painter's brush, yet ugly for offensive fighting. This was no time for the aesthetic, not when wooded hill crests made natural strongpoints for the enemy and provided excellent observation of every normal approach. Any other route meant overcoming the heavy brush and steep muddy heights. Even then, there was no safety, for the Germans had adjusted artillery fire on every target long ago and thoroughly mined the terrain, tossing in miles of concertina barbed wire for good measure. The enemy had chosen its defensive positions with great care and tactical wisdom.

At 0200, the men of the 3rd Battalion were moving into forward essembly areas in the Kall River ravine. Some tried to get a little rest before the attack, others were too busy. In a small blacked-out shack, Captain Owens, in a quiet voice, briefed his platoon sergeants on the aerial photos by lantern light. An unfortunate German shellburst had required a last minute reorganization in Company K.

At 0400 the leading companies of the 3d Battalion began stealing forward and silently worked their way up a nearly vertical 200 foot slope, where they passed through the lines of the 102nd Cavalry. At about 0600, all hell broke loose in the 311th and 78th Recon Sector, and with this diversionary display of noise at its height, the 3d Battalion, K and L Companies on the line, Company I in reserve, launched its attack.

Not many men remain who remember the intense silence and darkness, where each step forward might arouse the enemy, where to remain upright over the slippery terrain was a feat, where stumbling was taken for granted, where being lashed by branches only meant that you were still not in the clear. Just to be able to continue in that tortuous way was the prevailing thought, but it was short-lived. At 0625 Company L learned the effect of the death-spraying mortar shells and the destructive sound of Jerry automatics. Company K saw its first grey uniforms and heard the whistle of much hot lead. The chips were down and the aid men started getting busy. Cold and fear were unimportant. The scouts were still out and the direction was forward. By 0730, first dominating terrain features, small hills overlooking Rollesbroich from the northwest and southeast, were taken. A light fog which had hung low the ground, began to clear.

Here the name Siegfried Line took on significance. A concrete troop shelter, one in that infamous interlocking sytem of defense, housed a machine gun and, to the Jerries, it must have looked like child's play when most of Company K was pinned down. Enemy timing was good. Heavy artillery and mortar fire was well directed. Every fold in the ground was a haven and the earth was clawed for protection. A few elements of the company, less exposed, managed to work their way to the south and approach the fringe of Rollesbroich.

Company L kept moving but not for too long. Astride a hill just west of the crossroads at the southern end of town, one platoon was suddenly pinned down by intense machine gun fire. It looked like an ordinary house, but looks are deceiving, as the ineffectiveness of return fire disclosed. The other platoon still mobile retraced part of its steps and bypassed the crossroad to the north and thus joined forces with Company K's men.

By noon these forces had cleared most Rollesbroich's 50-odd shattered houses. Resistance was primarily from snipers who fought until their burp gun ammunition was exhausted and then shouted "Kamerad". The men got to know this pattern of fighting well.

It sounds like a battle won, doesn't it? Actually it wasn't! That defended house with our wounded lying around it was really a disguised concrete bunker. Two men lugging pole charges crept and crawled up to its very walls, placed their charges, lit the fuses, scurried away only to realize that the long trek and constant falling in the snow had wet the charge. An artillery concentration might do the job, but Captain Barton H. Hunter, commanding Company L, wisely refused to chance further injuring the wounded men lying near the fort. The Regimental Executive Officer, Lt. Col. Hayes, who witnessed this impasse, tried to bring up a platoon of Tank Destroyers, whose direct fire weapons, using fuse delay, would wipe out the defenders, but the TD's couldn't approach; the road was mined and the engineers couldn't work under enemy fire. One platoon of Company I, with the mission of protecting a squad of Company B, 303rd Engineers in an attempt to clear the mined road had already suffered heavy casualties. (We'll have to come back and do something about that house later) — — meanwhile:

1th Battalion's Company B was to have coordinated its attack with the 2nd Battalion of the 309th. Mined roads prevented this, and Company B attacked independently at 1345. It made good progress along the Lammersdorf—Rollesbroich road (by then dubbed "88 Lane") and expected to turn south at the town's crossroads for the purpose of controlling the junction and seizing the high ground south of town. The attempt proved costly when the camouflaged fort which had pinned down Company L's platoon and other crossroad houses opened up. Company B was happy to dig in.

At 1400, after making personal reconnaissance, Lt. Col. Harry Lutz, 3rd Battalion Commander, ordered Captain Olson's Company I to swing around Company K's left flank and secure the hill and troop shelter which were holding up Company K. This maneuver met with initial success, produced 20 prisoners, and reached a group of houses just southwest of Company K. The enemy hadn't been caught napping. Groups had infiltrated back to their original positions and made further advance impossible. Company I started digging for safety.

While all this was going on, the elements of Company K and L, which had cleared Rollesbroich once, dug defensive positions on the eastern outskirts of town.

Regimental Headquarters could report it head gained its primary objective, Rollesbroich. Now the problem was to hold it. There were enemy to the front, to either side, and even to the rear, and there were other troubles. Men began to realize that they were hungry and that they needed ammunition. Casualties had to be evacuated.

Mined roads, constant artillery shelling, and darkness prevented the use of vehicles. Safe lanes over rough terrain for distances better than two miles called for hand carrying parties... and even the tired men could hardly be spared. Rank or job lost its significance and there was adequate compensation in seeing the job done.

Remember the southern tip of the town was still in enemy hands. After dark, the enemy garrison in the fortification near the crossroads picked up our nearby casualties and gave them first aid. Pfc's Harley Biggs, Warren W. Hartwell and Sanford Brooks, uninjured but pinned down near the fort were also taken. Odd how the warmth of the shelter and the medical attention prompted almost friendly conversation amongst mortal enemies. The American by tongue and sign language tried to explain the hopelessness of the Germans' position and induce them to surrender. They might have succeeded but for the Nazi officer who sulked and finally ordered six Jerries to take the uninjured prisoners to the rear. Outside the fort, there was a sudden call "Duck", and Biggs, Hartwell and Brooks hit the ground, just as a BAR opened fire. Two of the German guards were killed and the other four were happy prisoners. Pfc Creighe Vandergrift and Pfc Carey F. Everitt had concealed themselves in a clump of bushes and their vigilant patience was rewarded.

The enemy artillery was active throughout the night and small arms clashes between outposts and patrols were frequent. Firing at brush and fence posts that took on the shape of moving men was not uncommon either.

Mines prevented use of roads, but Company B, 893 TD's felt their way across country and in a spectacular, after dark move, succeeded. At dawn everyone was relieved to find six TD's in town. Things began to look up. Now, December 14th, to really complete the mission.

Company A began the attack at 0730 under a heavy artillery barrage. The going was rough; men were wading in knee deep snow. The first platoon secured the right flank of the company. The second and third platoons, with the weapons platoon attached, carried the main attack across the mine field to the pillbox. The road junction and the high ground south of Rollesbroich was taken at a cost of 18 casualties. The second platoon made contact and tied in positions with Company B on the left. The first platoon filled in the center area, while the third platoon covered the south area and tied in with the 309th Infantry on the right near Simmerath.

Company B seized the troublesome crossroads troop shelter recently abandoned except for Company L's wounded men. The southern fringe of Rollesbroich was mopped up.

Company D did a good job in support of Companies A and B. Captain Ramm's mortars were destined to play a leading role in this action and subsequent engagements.

Companies K and L really gave the northern part of town a going over, removed booby traps and consolidated their positions.

One platoon of Company C, which had been attached to the 3d Battalion to clean out pockets of resistance west of Rollesbroich and establish contact with the 78th Recon Troop to the north was stopped cold by an unexpected Schu mine field. The platoon suffered 40 % casualties before giving up, and then only after disposing of a couple of snipers and knocking out a Jerry machine gun. Later, in clearing a path through this mine field, Sergeant (later Lieutenant) Pierce of the anti-tank mine platoon distinguished himself.

Company I cleaned out the sector north of town and after dark one platoon took over the high ground and troop shelter which had so vexed Company K.

Anti-tank Company, which prior to this time had coordinated defensivemeasures in depth, set up flank road blocks, and whenever possible, lent direct fire support against pillboxes and strongpoints. Under cover of darkness, anti-tank sent two platoons of anti-tank guns into Rollesbroich for added support.

Several jeeps were finally able to enter the town after dark, but it was still a mighty hazardous undertaking and hand carrying parties were in evidence everywhere.

The following day, December 15th, the units continued to deal with snipers who had been by-passed or who had infiltrated during the night, improved communication and consolidated positions. Company I contacted the 78th Recon Troops on the left set up an OP to maintain contact. One platoon of Company C returned to that mine field with a mine squad from Anti-tank Company and another from Company B, 303rd Engineers, cleared a path through it. The platoon, or what was left of it, in full dignity, passed through the opening, contacted Company I, and then with the rest of Company C, returned to 1st Battalion control.

Cannon Co. Position

Most welcome mail

The Germans hadn't been the only enemy. Trench foot casualties began to mount. Men tried to do what they could to prevent it, but inadequate equipment, extreme cold, waterfilled foxholes and tactical impossibility of building fires, obtaining dry socks or shoes, or even removing one's shoes for massaging, made prevention well nigh impossible.

The "baptism" had been thorough. What troops remained were not the same soldiers who had nervously stood guard back in Belgium and France. Their hate for the enemy was no longer an abstract thing. It was merely a question of doing what was necessary to survive.

The first engagement was accomplished. In statistics on the asset side of the ledger, it added up to approximately a mile in to the Siegfried Line along a 3000 yard front, plus 150 enemy known dead or captured. On the debit side of the ledger the 1st Battalion record shows 6 Enlisted Men killed in action, 2 Officers wounded, 26 Enlisted Men wounded, 18 Enlisted Men evacuated for trench foot and 13 Enlisted Men sent to the rear as non-battle casualties, including combat exhaustion.

The total men lost to these two battalions in this one operation — 227. That night it was learned that 16 kilometers to the south, massed armored divisions under Field Marshal von Rundstedt had smashed through the American lines on a broad front and were racing for Belgium. More about that later.

Before closing this phase, it seems necessary to add a brief comment as to what the casual reader, not versed in tactics, may have wondered about. Air support. Briefly, the explanation is simple. The Air Corps has never been able to support close combat where but limited distances separate opposing forces. The chances of doing irreparable havoc to one's own men by even so-called precision bombing or strafing is too great. Altogether too often had our own troops been strafed by well-meaning airmen. Pillboxes and troop shelters were not considered suitable targets by the Air Corps.

Now for the very pleasant task of paying tribute:

To Lt. Col. Harry Lutz, whose unfaltering courage and active participation up there with the boys was a genuine inspiration and without whose guidance the job could not have been done.

To the Aid Men and litter bearers, who from the very start, with utter disregard for their own safety, were ready to and did sacrifice their own lives so that the wounded might live. Their small group in just two days of battle suffered 12 casualties, proof in itself of their devotion to mankind. Their fearlessness was a model for the others to emulate. To Cannon Company, whose front line observers with the rifle companies lent support and confidence to local command, whose firing on "targets of opportunity," whose artillery preparations before attack, whose "area firing" at suspected enemy concentrations in dangerous avenues of approach, called for alertness and precision with which much could not have been accomplished. They demonstrated early that they were a vital part of the Infantry team.

To the 78th Division artillery and more specifically to the 903rd Field Artillery, particularly to the forward observers who were up there with the riflemen, directing and adjusting fire of those big guns in the rear. What a wonderful sound it was to hear the whistle of our shells going where they did the most good. The doughboy from that first day would have been happy to share his Combat Infantry Badge with you FO's. To the 102nd Cavalry Group for their steady and guiding hand to novices, for the use of their CP in Lammersdorf, for their aid in maintaining communication with our front lines, for the excellent work of their OP's, for their alert and accurate identification of enemy aircraft, for teaching us all about shellreps and their importance, and for generally aiding us in becoming seasoned veterans in short order.

SECTION II: KESTERNICH

Roads to Kesternich.

This history is not to be merely a narrative of gore, of bloody combat, of hand to hand struggle with mere temporary survival as the prize, of the stench of death or of those million and one things that make the doughboy's existence extremely hard. If it were, then Kesternich and the 2nd Battalion's mission would be the place for unparalleled description.

New men, untried and green, were to find themselves in one of the fiercest battles of the war.

The Division Staff realized in advance that Kesternich would be a tough nut to crack, and decided to strengthen the 309th Regiment, to whom the mission was assigned. Accordingly the 2nd Battalion of the 310th was attached to the 309th. In simple language, this meant that the 309th had four infantry battalions instead of the customary three. The 310th, by the same token, lost all control and supervision over its 2nd Battalion for the entire operation or until the battalion was returned to it. Attachments generally never operate quite as satisfactorily as working with one's own organization.

This battalion had somewhat longer to wait for its real baptism. They had seen and felt enough the night of the 13th to chill their very bones. They had absorbed punishment from both weather and artillery in their position outside Simmerath.

At 1600 on the 13th, they moved into newly captured Simmerath and were called on to help mop up the town and prepare for the attack on Kesternich. Simmerath looked like a brutally murdered town, torn and maimed by the blasting power of artillery, theirs and ours. What was left of it was a jumbled mess, buildings with upper stories collapsed, walls standing without support, rubble of wood and mortar piled where once a family lived, gaping holes in basements and streets, trees shorn of their limbs, tilted crazily in every direction. Dead horses, cows, knocked out vehicles and human bodies littered the streets.

Yet, from those very ruins, the German snipers continued to fire. The mopping up required craft and stealth, and above all, a strong constitution. There was partial compensation, for in some of those cellars, full of debris as they were, a few men spent the night taking turns catching forty restless winks, while their buddy stood guard, counting rounds as they came in and wondering how close the next one would be. Most of the men were dug in outside the town and to them it was just another period of dark with the full misery of wet, cold and fear.

It was still dark the next morning, December 14h, when the 2nd Battalion started out for Kesternich. They kept on either side of the road that ran east across open rolling country for 1500 yards to become the main street of the town. Just west of Kesternich, were hedgerows from which the Germans could aim their guns with deadly accuracy. Many men fell in that 1500 yards.

Try as he would, Lt. Col. Ladd, 2nd Battalion Commander, could not get artillery fire on the edge of Kesternich.

There was no artillery support that day, for it was not clear if all the 309th men who had attacked Kesternich the day before had withdrawn. The 2nd Battalion of the 309th had managed to reach the town, but were driven back amid considerable confusion. The suggestion was that one platoon had remained. Friendly artillery was ordered not to fire under these circumstances. Company E, in the lead, missed the sound of overhead fire support. The silence was broken just as the troops approached the western edge of town. Enemy artillery and mortars formed an endless barrage, and the lethal spray of machine gun fire from a heretofore undiscovered pillbox, poised almost astride the road, joined in the Roman holiday. This steel and concrete structure half buried in the ground was built to take punishment. Direct fire from six TD's and subsequent artillery concentrations made no impression. The Germans were using the structure well. It was a decoy too. Trenches had been dug laterally, so that the enemy could place its men along the hedgerows and fire from those secondary positions, using the pillbox as a base of operations. If our artillery threatened their well camouflaged dugouts, they would run back to the pillbox, which housed over one hundred men.

Struggle as they would, on their very stomachs into the slightest depression that Mother Earth afforded, no further advance was possible. Casualties piled up and moans of the wounded formed odd contrast to the noise of exploding shells. There was nothing else to do but dig in through the frozen earth and "sweat out" the night. Companies F and G had taken much punishment.

The plans for the next day were drawn up. Artillery would be allowed on the town. Lt. Col. Likes, Regimental Executive Officer of the 309th Infantry, was put in charge of the infantry and armored combined efforts for the next day.

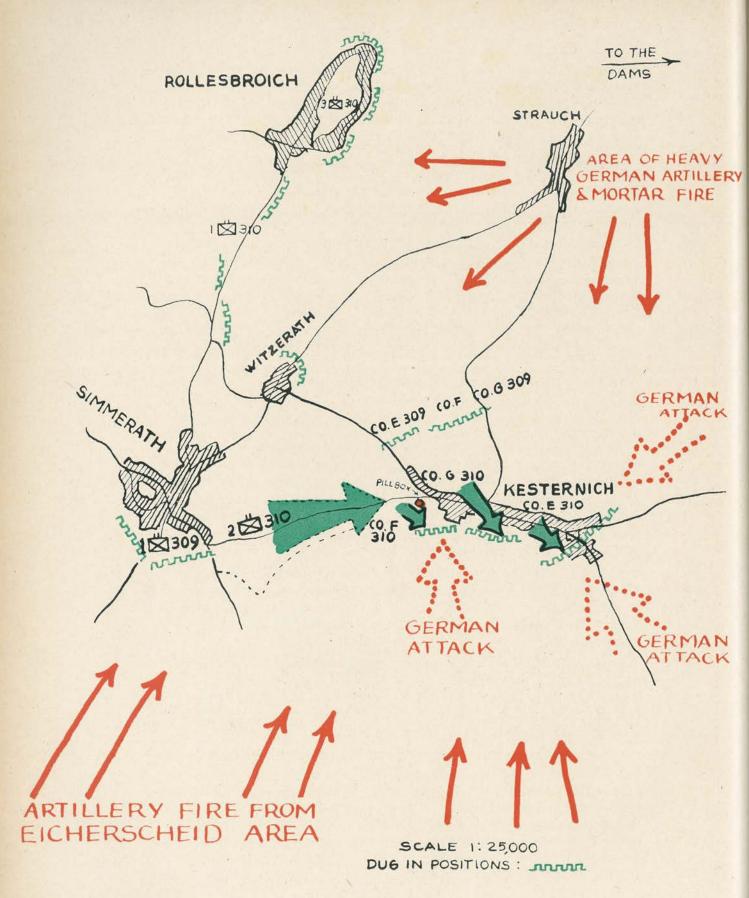

During darkness, the TD's improved their position so as to permit point blank aim on the firing slits of the pillbox. A terrific barrage by Division Artillery saturated the town and a steady stream of three inch shells from the TD's, acting as covering fire, permitted the men to race through the danger zone. Company E moved into town. It was a mistake not to blow that box, but a 500 pound charge brought up by the engineers didn't dent the surface, and there were then more important things to do.

Company E's men presented a strange appearance as they moved down the street in two irregular columns, keeping in close to the houses on either side. They knew each house was a trap, with Jerry snipers' itchy fingers ready to take direct aim. But their orders were to move through first, while Company G would be coming right behind to clear out the houses. Company E reached the eastern limits of town at 1300 with less than half its original strength (the result of two days' losses) and started to set up defensive positions. Many a sigh of preconceived relief escaped from tired men. If only they could have known what was coming and how their every fibre should have been exerted for caution and alertness.

A diminished Company G, under Captain Sperry (later killed along with Lt. Mallette while a prisoner of war), dealt zealously with each house. Bazookas, hand grenades, BARs, individual weapons, all did their share and at close range too. More than once, the struggle see-sawed from house to house.

An already hard-hit Company F, moving around the right flank to skirt the pillbox, ran smack into a Schu mine field. It was almost as if a signal had been set off, for those devilish German mortars began to fall among them. A major part of the company pushed through and started to dig positions on the southern outskirts of the town.

The afternoon was now well worn, and the situation began to take on the appearance of order. Along the line, there was a false sense of security. Even the German shelling seemed to let up. It was the first opportunity for issuance of orders and exchange of information. Many things required attention; things the troops normally learn to take for granted, yet which are vital to operations and control, and without which no missions can be successfully accomplished. Such are the prime subjects of staff organization.

BATTLE of KESTERNICH-DEC.15

Battalion Headquarters was set up in what was once used as an air raid shelter, near the center of town, and here each company commander reported. Coordination of defense was vital. Seasoned troops and their leaders have a sixth sense of ability of accomplishing this as they proceed with their mission. For the novice, however, its all separate and apart from an essential progressive development.

Let's take a look at some of the things that still had to be done, not that partial effort hadn't already been exerted in that direction.

Lt. Col. Likes of the 309th had been put in command of the complete operation which employed the troops of the 2nd Battalion, under Lt. Col. Ladd, and the armored elements. This meant an improvised command, a thing not necessarily advantageous. When the battalion moved into town, only the infantry battalion staff followed along. There was a lack of wire or radio communication from inside Kesternich to the rear. The 903rd Field Artillery liaison officer, who normally acompanied the 2nd Battalion, had been evacuated as a casualty and the replacement artillery liaison party and forward observers were unfamiliar with the requirements and technique of the 2nd Battalion company commanders.

In subsequent battles, it was learned that artillery forward observers with each company must take elaborate precautions to insure constant communication, and that laying of wire between battalion and companies in a limited objective such as Kesternich has a high priority.

Observation Posts and outposts were mighty important too, and though often monotonous jobs, called for the best men.

Commanders Call was just about over when a twenty minute enemy barrage into Kesternich was the first sign of trouble. A breathless messenger shouting "counterattack" electrified the cellar and each company commander rushed to his unit. The struggle was on in earnest. The Germans wanted Kesternich back again.

One enemy pincer supported by armor swung down from the northeast to cut off Company E, while another moved southwest and attacked Company F's right flank. Lt. Col. Ladd led whatever men from Company G who had escaped the main fury toward the German hordes. It was an uneven match. That was the last any of us saw of the Battalion Commander.

Captain Alfred E. Fix and his Company E men held out through the night. The men formed a tight circle around the last few houses in the town or dug foxholes halfway down the hill. There were only 70 men left, but small patrols were sent out to try to contact friendly forces. The patrols never returned.

By morning, this group was on the verge of annihilation. German tanks awaited outside their house doors threatening to blast them at point blank range. There was nothing to do but surrender. The Captain and 56 of his men were taken prisoners and disappeared somewhere into Germany. Not much of a battalion was left, but there were still some stragglers and men who dropped back from Kesternich, and then there was Company H and its mortars. Company clerks, cooks, drivers, anyone was put into a new line midway between Simmerath and Kesternich; a handful of men with strange weapons to hold 2000 yards of line.

Inspired by Captain Edward A. Murphy and Captain Clyde Baden, this group, along with depleted units of the 309th Infantry, attempted to retake the town shortly afternoon. The courage of such men as Pfc. Raymond F. Nagel, S/Sgt. Donald R. Howard, and others, who assumed command of and urged on untrained groups, paid dividends. This force cleared out about a quarter of the town, took strongpoints, and prisoners, but enemy artillery and darkness finally stopped the advance. At 2200, this group, suffering heavily from casualties, withdrew to the new line between Simmerath and Kesternich. The search for the lost men of the battalion had been fruitless. How many were killed; how many captured — — at that time it was impossible to know.

You may wonder about reinforcements. There were none. The Ardennes breakthrough was under way. Kesternich was along its north flank, but our high command had more to think about than Kesternich.

Only those men who lived through the next few days can adequately do justice to what personal sacrifice was called for. By the 19th, Company C of the 310th and a company from the 2nd Ranger Battalion had been sent in to help hold the line. Fortunately, the Germans were concentrating their attention a little further south.

The 2nd Battalion CP was set up 150 yards to the rear of the line; once a fine house used for SS' troops, but now a hollow shell with a fairly good cellar. Toward midnight on the 19th, Pfc. Roy S. Spivey of Company G and Pvt. Donald H. Kemmich of Company H identified themselves to the quard and were helped down the cellar steps. They had crawled from a group of Company F men, with whom they had been cut off in the counterattack on December 15th and were still holding out in a house on the southern outskirts of Kesternich. This group was made up of Captain John Sharp (Company F Commander) who was seriously wounded, two other officers, and 51 enlisted men, mostly from Company F.

Spivey and Kemmich suffered severely from exposure and exhaustion and had to be evacuated at once, though they volunteered to go back to show the way. A patrol made up by 2nd Lt. Herbert E. Preiner, 1st Sgt. Chester Scurlock (later Lieutenant) and other volunteers took off for Kesternich. It was tough, silent work searching for that house, but heartbreakingly fruitless. Hours later they returned to the Battalion CP crestfallen indeed.

All day long maps were checked, little groups who had last seen Company F were questioned, plans were made. There was going to be a raid if need be. Fate was kind, for shortly after darkness, T/Sgt. Wilbur A. Horst (later Lieutenant) and Pfc. Ivan E. Eikenberry showed up. Two of the most welcome sights ever seen, they were. T/Sgt. Horst knew the way, and Lt. Preiner, 1st Sgt. Scurlock (Co. H), S/Sgt. Wise (Co. C), Sgt. Checeki (Co. H), and T/5 Chignole (Med Det), started out.

To those who knew what was up (and even the foxhole grapevine system carried the message) every moment was eternity, every movement a possibility, every noise a clarion greeting the return from the dead. The patrol succeeded and led back those few who were able to walk. Strong men shed tears and silently welcomed long lost brothers. But there was more work to be done.

A second trip was necessary to carry the weak and injured. Only one weapon was taken so that more hands would be free for litters and support. Yes, they were all rescued! Some were carried piggy-back. Lt. Zeigers was particularly in a bad condition. Others barefooted (their shoes no longer fit their swollen feet) leaned heavily and scraped their way back or actually crawled through the snow with the dispersed column to reach our lines. The medics did a fine job of evacuation that night.

Ist Sgt. Albert Rosenblatt and S/Sgt. DiMarco and several others refused to be evacuated, though their sunken cheeks and glazed eyes suggested it. It was from them, reluctant as they were to talk of the nightmare, that small remnants of their ordeal would be garnered. Suffering severely from wounds, hunger, exhaustion, and trench foot, this group had survived on green apples and stagnant water doped with Halazone tablets. During each day they crawled to their foxholes, even those whose legs were by then useless, and manned their positions. At night they made their tortuous way back to the cellar where they passed the darkness in fitful sleep, where they could indulge in the luxury of low moans while other men stood guard. Capt. Sharp and 1st Sgt. Rosenblatt, by their own fortitude, kept this group together. Pfc. Joseph A. Saba, formerly a pharmacist in civilian life, but a rifleman in the army, administered the only trained medical aid.

These are only sketchy facts. Skill of portrayal beyond our limited ability would hardly do justice to the courage, heroism, faith and suffering entailed in refusing to surrender when cut off for five days.

The situation remained static for the next two days. Word had finally gotten back as to sad plight of the 2nd Battalion and the 22nd December, what was left of that battalion scurried along the road from Kesternich to Simmerath through that town of shadows, and came home... to the 310th Infantry Regiment. The 2nd Battalion, 311th Infantry replaced what was left of the 2nd Battalion, 310th Infantry in the line.

In war, especially the kind of war the doughboy has to fight, it's utterly impossible to apportion responsibility. As against all the inexperience there is the imposing thought that an American-held Kesternich would have been a threat to the von Rundstedt supply lines. Perhaps the Germans thought that their secret counteroffensive had been discovered prematurely, and that this was the beginning of a major effort to beat it. It could be that the resistance reflected the nature of the objective. One thing is certain: hindsight and experience are very wonderful things.

Here again a short pause might be very much in order; just to acknowledge some outstanding performances not already mentioned —

To the miscellaneous supply personnel that took up arms and held the line after the terrific upset in Kesternich. There's a lot of difference between a skillet and an M-1.

To the few Battalion Headquarters Company enlisted men who pulled guard for hours on end; some literally being carried to their post before being evacuated for trench foot.

To the Company Aid Men and ambulance drivers who set up the Aid Station 150 yards from the front, who dodged the 88s on that infamous road, who had as a constant admonition of their possible fate that wrecked ambulance at the Simmerath crossroads, which had been blown sky high by a mine.

This chapter has said much of terrific casualties. It was not the intention to exaggerate or color the report. In this engagement the 2nd Battalion, 310th Infantry lost a total of 542 men, as follows: Killed — 6 Officers, 63 Enlisted Men. Wounded — 5 Officers, 96 Enlisted Men. Missing in Action — 13 Officers, 284 Enlisted Men. Trench foot — 1 Officer, 61 Enlisted Men. Non-battle casualties (including battle fatigue) — 13 Enlisted Men. All three rifle companies had lost every officer. The battalion was indeed depleted. As an emergency measure, the Regimental Special Service Officer, Lt. James K. Bowman, was put in charge of Company F. The regiment was to hear a lot about him in the battles to come.

CHAPTER FOUR

BATTLE OF THE BULGE - INTERLUDE

Some odd things happen in a war. On December 17th, the 78th Division was still in the attack, yet every other division on the Western Front was on the defense, and the giant German smash into Belgium was well under way.

The seriousness of the general situation required the 78th Division to take up a defensive position on the perimeter of the newly won territory by December 18th. It is likely that further gains could have been made at the time, although certain elements of all three regiments had suffered unexpected and bitter losses. Particularly in the Kesternich area, the enemy had reacted to our penetration with swift and vigorous determination. The question of reserves had already arisen. The Battle of the Bulge was rapidly drawing all available reserves from the First and Ninth Army areas. Assuming we could, it still would have been unwise to spread our forces any thinner by the acquisition of additional towns to defend and outpost.

There is generally more than enough to do in a regimental winter defensive position without worrying about cause and effect of neighboring engagements. When the entire front is threatened by a winter offensive of the size and force of the Battle of the Bulge, it is easy to get grey hair. The broad plan of the German armies was quite ambitious; to strike towards the Meuse River, thence on to Brussels and Antwerp. The penetration was directed at the thinly held line in the Ardennes Forest, along the Belgian-Luxembourg frontier. If the breakthrough effort and the swing to the north succeeded, the American Ninth Army and the supply lines to the British Army in Holland would be encircled and completely cut off. We were part of the 1st Army, but north of the Bulge in the threatened area.

The Germans drove their Sixth SS Panzer Army straight west toward Bastogne, with the hope of turning north and sweeping into Liege. The Fifth Panzer Army was to drive to the Namur River and secure the south and west flank for the main effort to the north.

Various strong diversionary attacks were attempted in order to screen the main push. In the 78th Division sector, paratroopers were dropped to harass communications and confuse the general situation.

By December 22nd, the Germans had overrun a number of American divisions, had penetrated over fifty miles into what, just a few days before, were rear areas, yet nowhere had they been able to break through to the north towards Liege. This they had to do to take over vitally necessary fuel and food supply depots behind the American Ninth and First Armies in that area. This tremendous thrust had certainly played havoc with many U.S. units. The 106th Division, which trained with the 78th Division in the States, was practically destroyed.

The Ninth Army was forced to send most of its divisions to the Bulge to prevent this encirclement. The 7th Armored, 30th, 84th, 85th, and many special units were sent south to stop the Germans short of Liege. The 78th was ordered to hold the line north of Monschau with the main burden, however, of holding the north shoulder of the Bulge at Elsenborn falling to the valiant 1st Division, which at the time was on its way to a rest area after a prolonged period of combat. Between Monschau and Elsenborn, the Germans made three powerful attempts to widen the Bulge, all of which the 1st Division managed to stop cold. Seventeen days after the beginning of the great counteroffensive, the German fury was spent and the U.S. troops began counterattacking. By comparison, the 78th Division had remained relatively quiet all this time. Strangely, many men from the 78th Division actually saw this savage thrust by the Germans in the Bulge area. Many 78th Division men, who were in hospitals behind the lines in the Bulge area, actually fled their sickbeds and walked back to friendly lines.

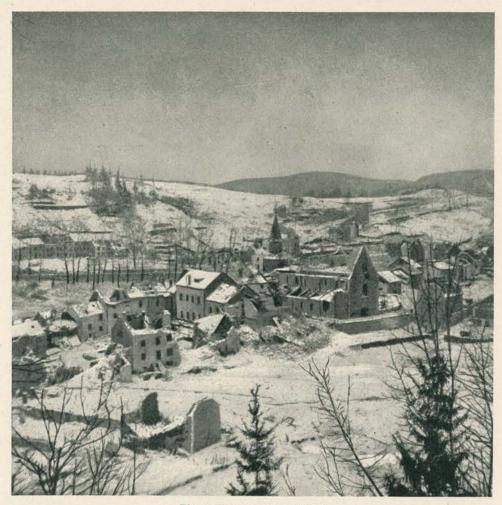

GIs normally peeved at fate for having decreed their hard lot as Infantrymen, were giving thanks for the blessing of being a 78th men. Holding a defensive line in the severest winter Germany had seen in many years wasn't exactly child's play. But we held, and for all those weeks the men could look at the newspaper sketches of the "Bulge" and identify themselves in that little point still protruding into German territory.

Here's the way it looked to the men of the 310th Infantry Regiment:

From December 16th until January 28th, the regiment held a 3000 yard line which ran, roughly speaking, from a dam 600 yards north of Rollesbroich, through Rollesbroich to a point just north of Simmerath. "Jerry" was from three to seven hundred yards away, looking down our throats. But "holding a line" didn't mean merely sitting in foxholes passively waiting for something to happen. It meant fighting the winter with its intense cold, snow, and fog which changed natural objects like trees and hills into silently approaching enemy, and made outpost guard a harrowing experience. It meant a continual battle against trench foot, and mental depression. It meant sweating out artillery barrages which the enemy habitually sent in at chow time, and nights which were light with flares and flashes, fighting off enemy patrols, and planes which appeared from nowhere to strafe the lines. It meant working daily to improve and strengthen positions and being constantly ready for enemy attack. It meant sudden alerts when enemy paratroopers were dropped behind the lines and when there were reports of impending counterattacks. It meant intensive assault and infantry-tank training, and breaking in more than 1100 inexperienced reinforcements, which arrived during the period. Some of the best had come from the 69th Division, which had been stripped in England to furnish replacements after the Bulge. It meant going into enemy territory on patrols to secure prisoners and information. It meant hours and days of deadly boredom. It meant carefully working out withdrawal plans and defense in depth-but knowing that if von Rundstedt's drive was successful, the regiment would be cut off and in desperate trouble. Of course, elaborate preparations were made against this possible misfortune. Extensive defensive positions were dug by infantry and engineer troops in the vicinity of Röttgen, in preparation for a withdrawal to more favorable ground than Lammersdorf. Speedy counterattack plans, designed to use the divisional reserve forces to stop any German penetration, were worked out and rehearsed. Everything that could be done was done-and in the severest of weather too.

On December 16th, Rollesbroich was strafed and Company B shot down two enemy planes. The following day, two German paratroopers, who had dropped during the night, were killed by Company A men. On December 19th, Major General Parker promised a Bronze Star and a trip to Paris to any man who knocked out a tank with a bazooka. At 2145, the following message was received from division and passed to all troops: "150 Germans, dressed in American uniforms, complete to include AGO cards and paybooks, from rank of Private to Major, have been placed in American jeeps and released toward our lines; 40 men with the mission of blowing up all headquarters encountered, 40 with the mission of cutting signal communications, and 70 with a reconnaissance and general hell-raising mission. Some of these are reported in our area. They speak perfect English but may not countersign such phrases as the cost of air mail stamps, Sinatra's first name, code names of headquarters, patches of other organizations, who won the World Series, staging areas in the United States. They are wearing German dog tags. Take full precautions to protect CPs."

On December 22nd, Field Order Nr. 2 was issued. On December 23rd, the following was heard from hidden enemy loud speakers: "General Eisenhower acknowledges that the great German offensive which started on December 16th, 1944 is a greater one than his own ... How would you like to die for Christmas?"

There was an inch of hard, crusty snow on the ground Christmas Day. In outpost foxholes, in cellars and in buildings, men ate Christmas dinner, turkey and trimmings.

The regiment was alerted on December 27th, when a PW reported the likelihood of an attack on its front by three enemy divisions, but nothing materialized.

New Year's Eve was just another night. Enemy patrols were active after dark, enemy planes strafed Rollesbroich four times, Company B reported two enemy paratroopers dropped in its area.

On January 6th, one hundred rounds of mortar fire fell on Rollesbroich in a single concentration at 1930.

A Company I raiding party on January 9th attacked the troop shelter atop the hill north of Rollesbroich, but was driven off by severe automatic weapons and mortar fire.

The following day, twenty enemy soldiers, who had gathered around a fire in the vicinity of Strauch, were observed and decimated by artillery fire.

During this period, the need for information about enemy plans and strength was extremely important, but enemy deserters were infrequent, prisoners were hard to get, and patrols sent to capture them invariably met stiff resistance immediately upon approaching the enemy lines. One patrol, however, sent out by Company A was singularly successful. Consisting of 2nd Lt. Richard M. Jones (later Captain), Sgt. James W. Spence, Pfc. William H. Brand and Pfc. Jarriott D. Thompson, the patrol entered the enemy lines after dark on January 10, killed 6 krauts, and returned with 3 PWs. The patrol's only casualty was a slight hand wound.

On January 14th, Cannon Company scored a direct hit on an enemy observation post north of Rollesbroich. Tables, chairs, and a stove were seen flying through the air.

Three enemy tanks approached Rollesbroich on January 23rd, but were driven off by artillery fire. Throughout this period the Regimental CP was shelled periodically by the Germans. On one occasion Captain Heath who commanded our supporting medical Company was killed, and on another Lt. Col. Reagan, 78 Division Chaplain.

By January 25th, the Ardennes Bulge no longer existed and American troops were back on their original lines. It was time to get moving again. But before taking off on the next adventure, let's take a closer glance at what the fighting team really looked like.

During that interlude, better than 1000 new men joined the outfit. Some from non-combat units could boast anywhere from 3 days to 7 weeks of basic training. They weren't given much time to think of what it was going to be like. The old and the green had training to go through, and no one had to tell them their life depended on it. Turns were taken manning the foxholes, so that groups could zero their weapons; each man became a part of a bazooka team, using a KO'd Jerry tank as a live target; every infantryman became an engineer specializing in dynamiting pillboxes and concrete emplacements; individual training in crossing mine fields and recognizing danger zones was part of the diet too. The real stuff was there and it was put to use.

A reorganized 2nd Battalion, in 78th Division Reserve, underwent infantry-tank training with the 736th Tank Battalion for two weeks back at Röttgen, and then came forward to relieve the 3rd Battalion in the line at Rollesbroich. The exchange was effected with maximum secrecy and without mishap.

All intelligence troops, encouraged by their leaders, began to take to skiis, to snow shoes, to cutting up old bed sheets so they could wrap themselves in white and be hidden in the snow. Medics and supply echelons built snow sleds and jeeps were whitewashed. The men were pleased to get a 310th picture in the "Stars and Stripes." Sgt. Weik (later Lieutenant) and his men of the I & R Platoon were photographed on ski patrol.

Newcomers particularly, learned why it took seven hours for a three-minute shower every once in a while, if the fellow was lucky and could get to Röttgen or Aachen. And how there was community washing of socks by kitchen crews in the rear, with catch-as-catch-can as to size or condition of service-ability when they came back "clean." No, underwear didn't crawl away under its own momentum. DDT powder took care of that.

Then there was a new lesson in patience. No word from home during the Bulge, or, if a letter did sneak through, it generally was one reflecting the upset mental state of the family, worried about no mail.... and if we were trapped by the counteroffensive. Stars and Stripes and Lil Abner were gifts from heaven and B Bag really came into its own.

The men learned something else too. It didn't pay to get careless. Long periods of quiet would suddenly be broken by the thundering explosion of a well-aimed artillery shell on the little group who thought they couldn't be observed. Of course, our own mortars played the same game. Regimental and Battalion Headquarters Staff weren't idle either. Defensive plans were worked out for every avenue of approach and counterattack measures were prepared. Many of these were actually practiced—just in case. Dry runs meant something here.

Yes, it was a cohesive team. It had, to all appearances, come a long way from the baptism. Perhaps now we were ready to take up the postponed Phase II of the operation we started on December 13th—so long ago.

CHAPTER FIVE

PHASE II IN OPERATION

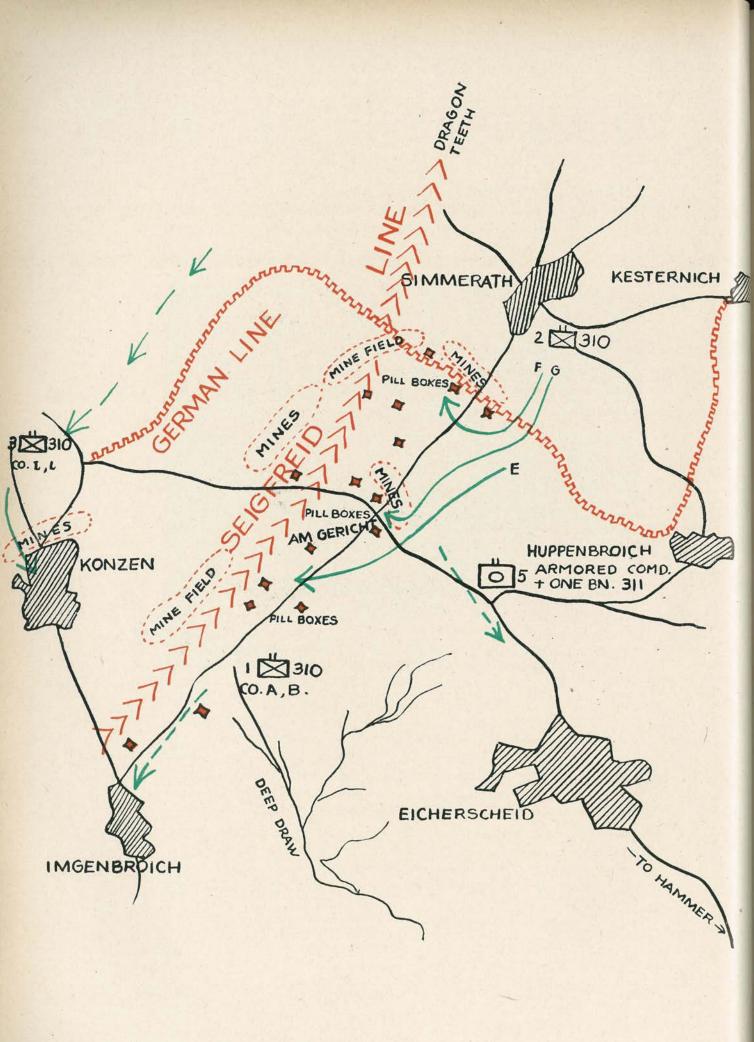

The cold never ends

All except the Kesternich mission of Phase I had been accomplished when the operation was rudely interrupted by vonRundstedt. Now for continuing that venture with Phase II which called for capturing the southern towns of Konzen, Imgenbroich and Eicherscheid. This would clear the Germans from the west bank of the Roer River and completely outflank Schmidt on the south. (See Map P-27, Phase II heretofore referred to.)

Enemy activity appeared to be at a standstill on January 29th as final plans were made for the attack. Intensive reconnaissance was under way, weapons were test-fired, and all personnel were briefed on the coming action. Plans were coordinated with supporting units and the Field Order was issued.

Here's what it amounted to:

The initial assignment fell to the reconstituted 2nd Battalion of the 310th Infantry. It was an effort to drive the Germans beyond the Roer Canyon and free all the area west of the river. It meant driving southwest from Simmerath and seizing the crossroad at Am Gericht.

The 3rd Battalion (less Company K) was given the task of capturing Konzen, a death trap for other units which had tried to reconnoiter the town in December.

The 1st Battalion was chosen to capture Imgenbroich after the 2nd Battalion had reduced the fortified zones south of Am Gericht crossroads. Elements of the 311th Infantry, with Company K of the 3rd Battalion, 310th Infantry attached, were to capture and clean up Kesternich, then drive on to Huppenbroich. Company K was not to join the 311th until after the Konzen attack.

The job of capturing Eicherscheid was to be a joint effort of an armored command of the 5th Armored Division and one battalion of the 311th Infantry Regiment. This could only be put into effect if the 2nd Battalion, 310th Infantry cleaned up the mines and anti-tank resistance south of Simmerath and held the Am Gericht crossroads. Armor could not move cross country; the ground beneath the snow was soft and boggy.

There was a bit of local current history that was mighty impressive and in a way, helpful too. Troops of the 311th had attempted to improve their position on the south edge of Simmerath several weeks earlier. Jerry pillbox 37, close by, was attacked and the enemy reaction was violent. The 311th's losses were regretably high. Pillbox 37 was only one of an interlaced series of those steel and concrete strongpoints, each with walls 4 to 8 feet thick and with carefully chosen fields of fire for machine guns and anti-tank weapons. Fifteen of these forts guarded the approach to Am Gericht crossroads and extensive mine fields, entrenchments and barbed wire added strength to the defense. There was justification for the apprehension with which the undertaking was viewed.

The regiment was fortunate in having four British flamethrowing monstrous tanks (called Crocodiles) of the Furth and Fife Yeomanry attached to it for this operation, and these kin of Satan were assigned to aid the 2nd Battalion in the pillbox assault. Five medium tanks from the 736th Tank Battalion added to the striking force. The boys on top weren't kidding. It was a job that was going to succeed!

The 2nd Battalion was relieved at Rollesbroich, where it had been holding the line, by the 1st Battalion of the 309th, and went into a temporary assembly area in the vicinity of Simmerath. Cannon Company and Antitank Company prepared forward positions and set up their howitzers. Now to wait for the first rays of dawn. Lt. Col. Culbreth coordinated the whole works—it was well planned—every last doughboy knew what he was supposed to do. The concentration of troops and vehicles in the vicinity of Simmerath would have been very vulnerable to enemy artillery, but fortunately secrecy was maintained.

By morning, a blinding snowstorm was sweeping in from the west. Drifts were waist deep. Rough on the foot soldier, and not easy for the tanks either. The attack was under way with Company F leading the way.

The Crocodiles were up there with the doughs, churning up clods of dirt but utterly superb in their performance and desire to get in on the kill; their long tongues of flame capable of reaching 100 yards being relied on to shatter the Germans' morale. Lt. James K. Bowman, commander of Company F, exercised marvelous control and complete coordination in an exemplary manner.

One platoon, whose leader was wounded five minutes after the action started, set a magnificent record under the command of S/Sgt. Hubert J. Arsenault and S/Sgt. Glenard T. Graddy, who had two weeks before been Pfc. messengers in the Company Headquarters. The three pillboxes, whose reduction was the platoon mission, were unexpectedly easy. The tanks came up close, blasted away at the forts and the Germans came out with their hands up, after a little additional close-in fire from the platoon. But Arsenault and Graddy weren't satisfied and led the platoon on through the waist-deep snow until two more pillboxes were visible. Covered by the platoon, demolition men crept up close and placed their charges well. After the charges exploded, the Germans couldn't get out fast enough. Then the platoon captured a troop shelter to make a total of 5 pillboxes, 136 prisoners and a large quantity of enemy guns and ammunition for its morning's work. The company consolidated north and east of the Am Gericht crossroads.

Meanwhile, men of Company G advanced along the west side of the road toward Am Gericht. They overcame resistance from several pillboxes and troop shelters and captured the Am Gericht crossroads at 0900. The company was heroically led by Captain Edward A. Murphy.

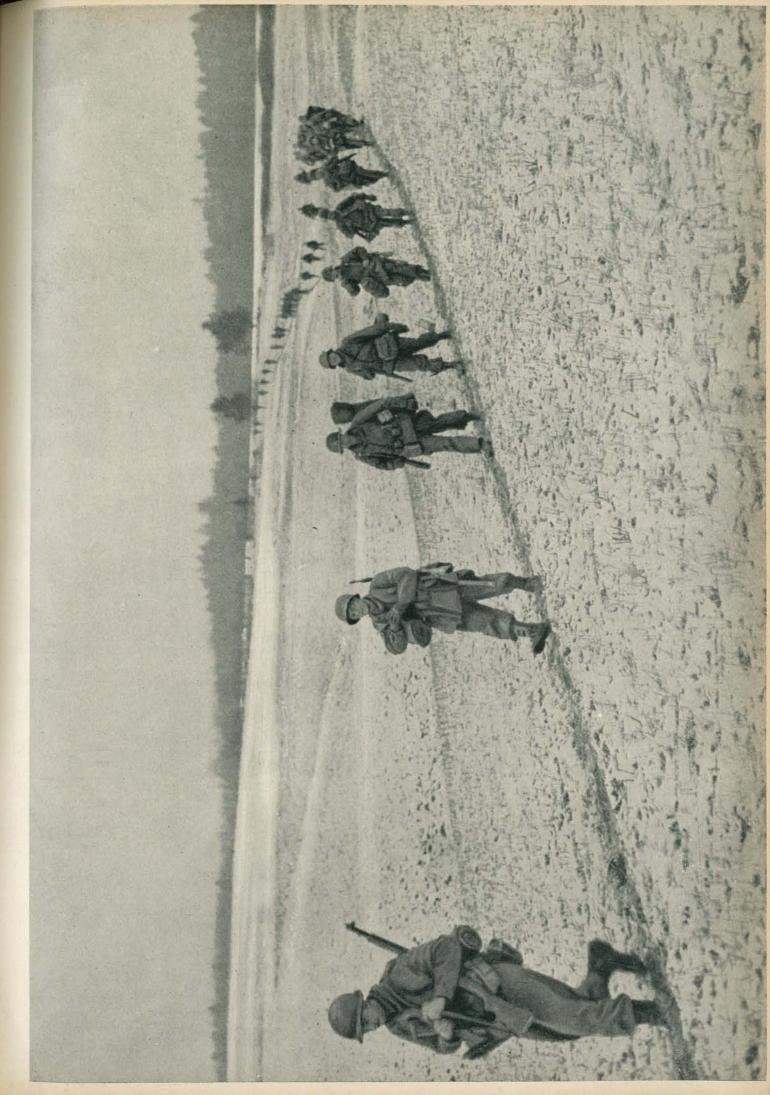

Company E, which had been held in reserve initially, was committed at 1220, and, moving through the Company G lines, began to investigate and clear the terrain features to the south. By nightfall, the 2nd Battalion had captured 142 prisoners, 12 pillboxes and 4 troop shelters.

The men hated to see the Crocodiles leave (two had been temporarily knocked out by mines). The British tankmen were extraordinary fighters and our hats are off to them for their valor and ability.

Meanwhile, the 3rd Battalion had accomplished its mission in an operation which a captured German officer described as "the most excellent and tactically sound he had ever witnessed."

Company I, supported by one platoon of TD's, jumped off at 0530, secured the high ground east of Konzen (Konzen Hill) without meeting any opposition, and moved towards Konzen from the east. Supported by a platoon of tanks, Company L moved forward at 0800 and entered Konzen from the north. But for the carcasses of about 30 dead horses which lay along the roads, the shell-shattered town seemed completely deserted, until Company L reached the center of town, where four enemy soldiers gave minor small arms resistance before surrendering. Company I overcame determined resistance from a factory in the eastern outskirts of town and contacted Company I at 1300, when the town was secured. During the afternoon, Company I mopped up in the outskirts of town and at dark dug in on the southern tip. A total of 62 enemy were captured by the battalion, whose total casualties for the operation were 10 wounded. Lt. Meyer, aggressive platoon leader of the attached medium tanks of the 736th Tank Battalion, moved too fast for his infantry protection in the deep snow and was killed when a panzerfaust knocked out his tank.

The 1st Battalion continued the attack after dark. Companies A and B moved into forward assembly areas at 1500, passed through the 2nd Battalion lines, and at 2000, with Company E, attacked south along the road leading from Am Gericht to Imgenbroich. Company A led the advance with the first and third platoons abreast. The second platoon was in reserve. Company B followed Company A. The attack was lowed by deep snow in the draw about 1000 yards north of Imgenbroich. The bridge over this draw had been destroyed and troops were forced to descend the steep, snow-covered bank in darkness. Dispersed and well-hidden enemy in the bottom of the draw had to be ferreted out and eliminated one by one before the advance could continue. But by midnight, the cliff at the draw's southern end was reached, and by 0400, Companies A and B had mounted it and consolidated their lines several hundred yards further south. Nine pillboxes and troop shelters had been captured and 64 prisoners had been taken.

Cannon Company and Anti-Tank Company were mighty busy all day, setting up those vital flank road blocks, giving support by direct fire, not missing a target of opportunity and constantly displacing forward. Sweat and snow soaked the wire crews to the skin.

A rain fell in the earl morning and by 0800, when Companies A and B continued their attack, the ground was a two foot deep mire of slush and mud. Company A reached the northern edge of Imgenbroich and 0900 and by 0950 had taken all the pillboxes north and east of town. In this operation, a few artillery rounds of our own supporting artillery landed on our own troops, just short of their objective. In all our fights, only twice did our 78th Division Artillery allow this to happen, both times unfortunately on Company A. In each case, extraordinary circumstances made it unpreventable. No infantry regiment ever had more dependable artillery support than this Regiment of the 78th Division. Company C, initially in reserve, moved forward at 0940 and entered Imgenbroich from the north at 1012. Only four frightened enemy were found in town. In the afternoon, the companies cleaned up in the outskirts of town and brought their pillbox and troop shelter total to 18 and 10.

The 2nd Battalion, meanwhile, mopped up in the draw and east of Am Gericht, capturing 20 pillboxes and four troop shelters. At 1600, the battalion moved into Eicherscheid to reinforce the 1st Battalion, 311th

Infantry, and permit the withdrawal of the 5th Armored Division's elements. The 3d Battalion cleaned out pockets of resistance in and around Konzen and made contact with the 102nd Cavalry.

The Regimental CP moved in the rain into a seivelike cellar in Konzen on February 1 to shorten lines of communication to the battalions, who were busy searching out their areas. But the enemy had apparently withdrawn and only stragglers and deserters were encountered.

Oh yes, we had half a dozen officers and enlisted men from the Air Corps visit us that day, just to see how the doughboy lives. A couple of inches of water in the Battalion CP was hardly conducive to hospitality, and a mutilated Jerry body not far from the door didn't help one's digestion of the K rations we had for supper. We did not invite them to stay overnight and come along for the trip to Hammer, but for their general piece of mind, they seemed happy to leave us and return to the Air Corps. One of the unshaven doughs offered his right arm for the aircorpsman's arctics... but then he was only kidding... his trigger finger was attached to that arm.

On the 2nd of February, after securing Imgenbroich, the 2nd Platoon of Company C mounted tanks and rode towards Monschau to establish contact with the 9th Division. The mission was accomplished.

In the evening of February 2nd, Company F advanced on Hammer. Lying far out on the flank and impossible to observe from a distance, the town was an unknown quantity. Perhaps a battalion of fortified Jerries lay in wait, perhaps nothing but a deserted German village. The company wound through a deep draw and suddenly came upon the village. The Roer River flowed peacefully through its outskirts. There was no sound or movement, and the wet, tired troops advanced cautiously, hugging the buildings and searching each one; feeling a little foolish because it seemed certain the town was deserted; yet rightly afraid to expose themselves on the off chance of a trap. There was no hidden enemy, however; just one old woman, who'd chosen to remain and watch her livestock when the town was evacuated, and more dead horses than one wanted to remember.

The men were happy, had begun to dig in—another town taken and no casualties. Suddenly, without warning, round after round of artillery and mortar fire dropped into the town. The barrage continued for ten minutes while the men pressed the ground in their unfinished foxholes, and then it was quiet again.

In the dawn of February 3, they waded the Roer River and established a bridgehead to protect the engineers while they constructed a bridge. This set the stage for the advance across the Plains for the troops who were to move this area.

During the above action by elements of the 78th Division, the 9th Infantry Division had been battling in the south and their advances had carried them almost to the town of Gemünd, which, from a regional standpoint, completely outflanked the Eicherscheid area on the south and undoubtedly contributed to the ease of the operations. The men of the 78th Division were to see a great deal of the 9th Division in later operations, and their outstanding performance on numerous occasions was an encouragement to everyone.

Execution of Phase II had been a huge success. We were happy to use the black ink on the asset side of the ledger. Our losses of 11 killed in action, 54 wounded in action and 30 nonbattle casualties had been much lighter than we dared hope for.

The stage was being set for Schmidt. Remember, the entire Ninth Army was waiting for us to secure those Dams. The 310th was relieved in its new position by the 102nd Cavalry, and the 1st and 2nd Battalions took up temporary positions in Rollesbroich with the 3rd Battalion in Simmerath, where it was being introduced to the 7th Armored Division.

Its obvious we neglected some mighty important friends and this seems like a good place to say thanks to:

The IPW Team of Lt. Stein, and S/Sgts. Ulrich and Budwig, who were up there with us, at all hours and under all conditions, ferreting out those little bits of information from recalcitrant prisoners and sifting the "wheat from the chaff". More than once, their lead headed us in the right direction. They were with us throughout all campaigns and we considered ourselves mighty fortunate.

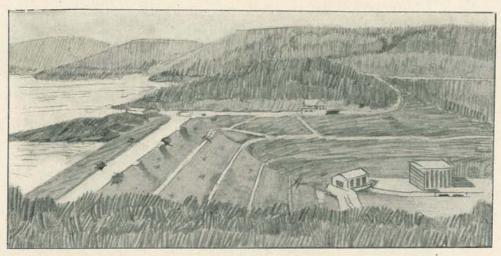

The wire teams and communications sections that were strictly "on the ball". It wasn't easy lugging that wire, or carrying that SCR 300 radio set through the snow while dodging enemy fire. But it was done, and well too.

The Engineers, who felt reluctant every time they blew a pillbox or troop shelter, because it meant chasing the doughboy out in the cold. Really the infantrymen got a big bang out of your dynamite, even if you almost blew up the world, on one occasion south of Simmerath.

The weasels—those mechanized cockroaches, whose tracks carried them everywhere and whose arrival during battle was a happy diversion for many a slap-happy jeep jockey anxious to go on a steeplechase excursion. They did get the ammo there and did help in evacuation of wounded.

CHAPTERSIX

SCHMIDT — THE KEY TO GERMANY

Schwammenauel.

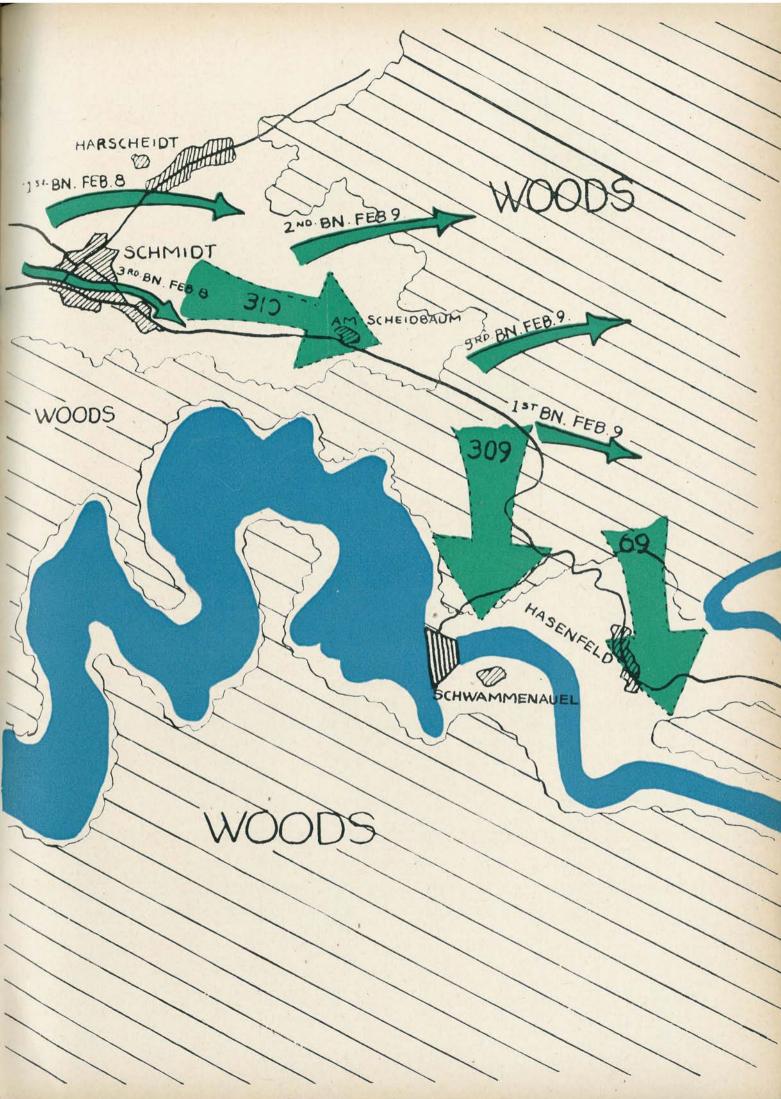

The great dam... A dough boys sob! Seen from the "German side".

Headlines! Stars and Stripes. Papers back home. The 78th Division, under First Army command, was in the limelight. The Schwammenauel Dam near Schmidt was unquestionably the most important objective on the Western Front at that time. The Ninth Army divisions to the north had been waiting since last autumn. The First and Third Armies were reorganizing after the costly Battle of the Bulge.

The Germans held the key—the Schmidt area where the Dams controlled the water level in the Roer River. The Allies object: to seize the Dams intact, and at second best, to force the Germans to destroy the Dams and let the billions of gallons of water flood the valley for two weeks. After this, the Ninth Army could cross with no potential barrier threatening to isolate them from rear supplies and reinforcements. This trump card must be taken from the enemy's grasp! It couldn't be done on the ground, the 28th Division could testify to this after their costly attempt in November. The 8th Division had had a try at it too. The Air Corps had been given the mission.

Pock marks were mute evidence of the serious efforts of bombing, but the mighty dam was not to be demolished. The Nazi planners built the dam as a vital link in the chain of defenses that made up the West Wall. This was no ordinary structure. It was like bombing a mountain, each bomb disturbing a ton or two of dirt or chipping some concrete, but nothing else would happen. Anti-torpedo nets took care of aerial torpedoes and excellent anti-aircraft positions menaced low-flying bombers. It had to be a doughboy's job.

The natural defenses of Schmidt were considerable. To the west, beyond Kommerscheidt, the Kall Creek Canyon was an impossible barrier to tanks and vehicles. The canyon was covered with dense woods and approaching infantrymen were an easy prey for mine fields, booby traps, and concealed dugouts and concrete pillboxes, through which sudden and withering machine gun fire could be laid down in sweeping bands of crossfire.

To the south, from Steckenborn to Schmidt, was a zone of concentrated pillbox defense. Extensive anti-personnel and anti-tank mines guarded the south approach; the pillboxes were mutually supporting and large reinforced troop shelters throughout the area allowed reserves to be protected from our artillery until the moment of commitment in counterattack.

To the east was the lake, the Roer-Stausee, with very high ground on the eastern shore. Here, artillery observers could direct accurate and devastating artillery and mortar fire on any troops approaching Schmidt from the south. The artillery positions west of the lake were beyond our grasp, and all the pillboxes in the woods west and south of Schmidt could telephone for instant artillery adjustment on opportunity targets. Yes, it was a very excellent defensive position that the Germans had at Schmidt. (Our 28th Division learned that fact to their sorrow in November the 78th was about to learn it in February).

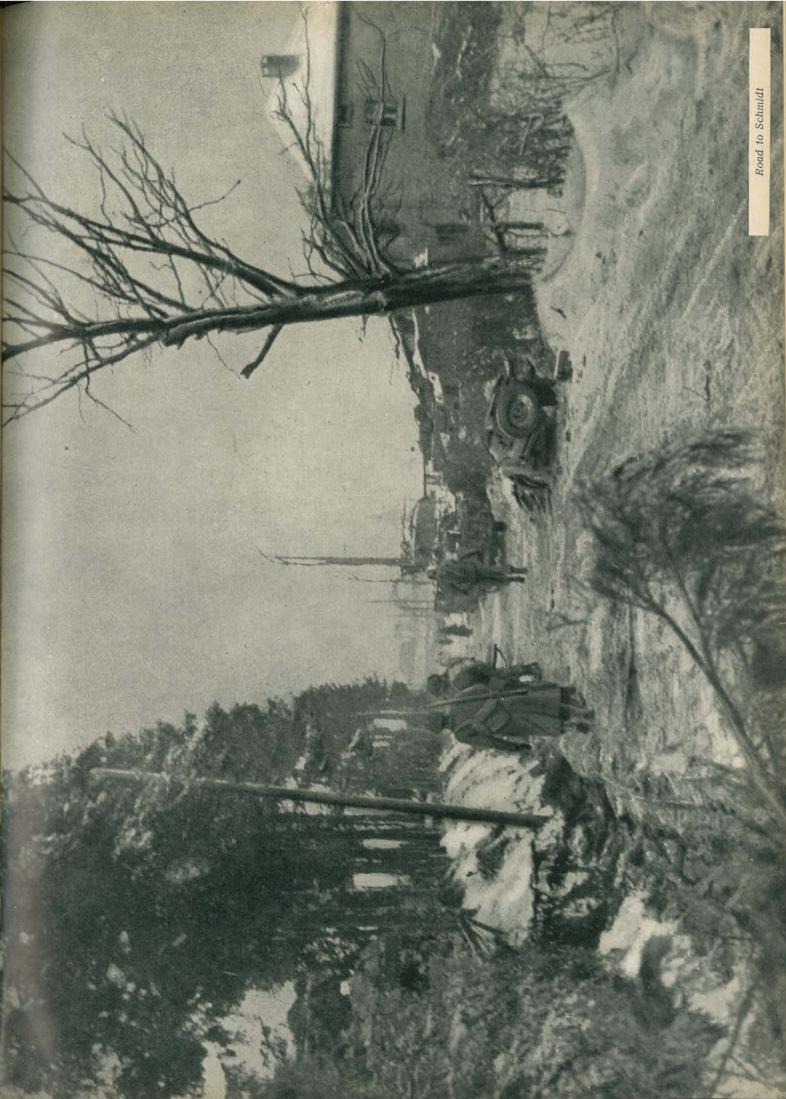

The plan to capture Schmidt and the dam at Hasenfeld was rather simple. In the execution of the plan, many changes occured to the original plan and much confusion prevailed throughout the engagement. But first, the original plan.

The 311th Regiment was to capture the towns south of Schmidt, i. e. Strauch, Steckenborn, Hechelscheid and Ruhrberg. The 310th's 3rd Battalion under Lt. Col. Lutz, heading an armored command from the 7th Armored Division, was to have the special assignment of assisting the 311th by taking Steckenborn.

The 310th was to have the dubious privilege of capturing Schmidt. After the high ground to the east of Schmidt was secured, the 309th was to take Hasenfeld and the Dam, including the far side at Schwammenauel. (The large dotted arrows on the sketch indicate the proposed advance of each regiment.) As plans go, even now it doesn't look too complicated, and actually parts of the original plan were followed. Some astonishing alterations and additions did occur in the important days from February 5th through February 9th.

Inadequacy of language and space preclude a full description of what happened, but here's roughly how the recapitulation looks at this late date:

The 3rd Battalion, in its mission to capture Steckenborn, advanced on the morning of February 5th, supported by an attachment of tanks and tank destroyers. Company I on the right, and Company L on the left advanced under constant mortar and artillery pressure until machine gun and small arms fire from pillboxes beyond Steckenborn brought them to a halt. The tank destroyers came to their aid, the pillboxes were overcome, and the resistance in the town broken. It was a full day's work, well done with a total of 55 prisoners taken as against two Company I men killed and 13 others wounded. The most important thing, though, was the breakthrough of the elaborate German defenses and the fact that the southern approach to Schmidt was open.

While this was going on, the 1st and 2nd Battalions were poised outside of Rollesbroich, out in the cold penetrating drizzle, loaded down with their packs and weapons, rubbing hands to keep them from freezing, yet ready at a moment's notice to take off. The day wore on and the signal could not be given. Progress in other regions was slower than hoped for and reports were clouded. Colonel Miner, Regimental Commander, endeavored to obtain approval to have the men get under cover from the elements, but too much hung in balance, and delay necessitated by reassembling seemed unwise. Toward late afternoon, the half frozen troops were ordered forward to bivouac in the woods near the barracks area. Digging foxholes certainly can make the blood circulate, especially if a round or two pays a visit now and then.

Up to this time, all plans for the 1st and 2nd Battalions attacks had been based on daylight operations, particularly as the attachments of tanks and engineers could not perform satisfactorily at other times. Much to the surprise and disappointment of Regimental Headquarters, just as black of night settled over the area, word came through that it would be a night attack. This change of plan by higher echelon than 78th Division was possibly based on the assumption that casualties would be fewer if the pillboxes were approached under cover of darkness. It meant, however, that there would be no tank support and all prior planning had made them an essential part of the scheme.

> But orders are orders. Undoubtedly there was a plausible reason.

It was a hell of a night. Driving rain and inky blackness. The troops moved out at 0300 as ordered. Outstretched hands tried to keep contact, not knowing where the next step would lead to. Stumbling, not daring to talk above a whisper, not even daring to swear, not sure if the object two feet ahead was a tree or a man... all this in what you knew was the most heavily mined section of the Siegfried Line.

CPL.A. PARON

The first enemy contact was by men of Company E. They stumbled into a wall, they thought. It turned out to be a pillbox, and in the night-marish struggle, the starled Germans on guard outside and the bewildered Americans exchanged hand grenades, and sprayed each other with machine pistol and rifle fire. The Germans didn't have to know exactly where our troops were. They could and did use their cross fire and laid down a perimeter defense of heavy mortar and artillery fire. Before morning, all communication wires to regiment were out, and radio interference left no alternative but for the regiment to send out its liaison personnel to try to find the battalions and bring back the story. An anxious time indeed,

With dawn, the 2nd Battalion managed to send back guides to bring up the tanks. No sooner had these steel giants stuck their noses out on the Schmidt highway when well placed antitank fire dampened their initiative.

With dawn came volumes of enemy artillery. The 1st Battalion was spotted in a valley by enemy observers, and the artillery barrage which ensued caused many casualties and disrupted all communications within the battalion. Contact was later re-established, and the battalion moved forward only to have the leading company and the following company subjected to another intense artillery and mortar barrage. This barrage alone cost the battalion 25 casualties. It was terrifying. Mortar shells, with super-sensitive fuses, crashed into the trees about the troops, exploded overhead, and doubled the effect of the shells. Casualties were severe, exceptionally so because of the bunching of the men in their effort to keep in contact.

Schmidt was tough

As the heavy volume of mortar fire continued, a minor German counterattack was launched between the barracks area and Gerstenhof. This attack was not serious, but everything added to the general confusion.

Both battalions were disorganized and out of control by daylight. Our two battalions had converged in front of their objective and in the confusion had become intermingled. This called for a fresh plan, which Brigadier General Rice, the Assistant Division Commander, devised. The 310th would finish up its own fight in the woods west of Schmidt; the 311th would move cross country to take the town of Schmidt.

Instinctively, the men made their way across the road to the barracks side and surprisingly so on the 2nd Battalion was able to reorganize. The 1st Battalion regrouped later and again took off in the original direction. The 2nd Battalion decided to change the approach and try for Gerstenhof along the German military road, which ran west and north of the main Schmidt road (direction of arrow on sketch indicates this). Company G, under Captain Edward A. Murphy, led the drive by skillful coordination of infantrymen and light tanks, despite rugged terrain, dense woods and enemy reaction. Numerous pillboxes were outflanked and overcome, and prisoners began to be more frequent. By nightfall Gerstenhof was captured.

It was an exciting day for Captain Murphy. In anticipation of the next move, the captain went out on a reconnaissance after dark, got separated from his bodyguard, was captured by the Germans and taken to a pill-box north of Gerstenhof. During the night, he and the Germans sweated out the morning attack by the 310th. It must have been his American cigarettes, for he didn't speak the language, but anyway, just as the next morning's artillery preparation for the attack lifted, here came Captain Murphy at the head of his new recruits . . . 35 Jerries who had been convinced it was wise to surrender. Rugged man, that Captain Murphy.

Following this very hectic day of February 6th, a council of war was set up in the Regimental CP, now moved up to a sweating pillbox near the barracks area. Here, the 3rd Battalion was scheduled to pass through the 2nd Battalion before daylight on the morning of the 7th, and take the woods west of Schmidt. A this point, the 310th was to be pinched out by the 309th and 311th converging on Schmidt, as called for in the new plan. Although the 3rd Battalion undoubtedly could have reached Schmidt, the Division Commander decided to put one battalion of the 311th into the final assault of the town, while the 3rd Battalion remained concealed in the vicinity of the cluster of pillboxes just west of Schmidt. The Germans spotted the 3rd Battalion in this waiting position and greeted them with a terrific mortar barrage, inflicting far more casualties here than were sustained in their advance to this point.

A new attack order for the 1st Battalion was issued at 1030. The order required the 1st Battalion to attack at 1330 astride the Strauch—Schmidt highway, seizing all known enemy installations west of Schmidt. This attack commenced on time, despite heavy artillery concentrations, which were sweeping the ground before the 1st Battalion.

The attack met with heavy enemy resistance from concrete pillboxes and log bunkers containing emplaced automatic weapons. dark, the 1st Battalion had advanced 1000 yards east of the line of departure. Here, they were ordered to dig in and hold. The battalion had suffered many casualties. Company A had been ambushed in the dense woods and their 1st and 3rd Platoons had been thoroughly cut up. In this action, every man had been a hero. Because of the action of S/Sgt. George Perry and Pfc. Paul Fuller, Jr., who courageously outflanked and succeeded in knocking out an enemy machine gun emplacement, reorganization of the two platoons became possible. Those were bitter days.

During the afternoon of the 7th, elements of the 1st and 3rd Battalions, 311th Infantry, managed to reach Schmidt and partly clear the town. It was a night filled with sniper fire and continuous mortar barrages. It was a night ripe for rumor. It was reported to 310th Regimental Head-quarters that Schmidt would be cleared by the 311th, and on this premise, plans for the 8th of February called for the 3rd Battalion to pass through Schmidt, rapidly advance on Am Scheidbaum, and secure the high ground beyond. The 1st and 2nd Battalions were to follow closely and clear the woods north and northeast of Schmidt.

The first indication of additional trouble in Schmidt reached the CP at about 0600, when an hysterical wireman rushed in to report that his wire team, sent out by Regiment at 0430 to lay wire through Schmidt, was fired on by a Jerry tank on the outskirts of town. He was the only man to get away. Germans had infiltrated back into strong points within the village and were a source of deadly trouble.

Instead, therefore, of passing through the town as expected, the 3rd Battalion had another mission on its hands. Only men of that Battalion lead by the indomitable Lt. Col. Lutz can properly describe the hard street fight that developed, and how after defeating an enemy tank-led counterattack, the 3rd Battalion, four hours later, was able to advance beyond the eastern edge of town. While Company I mopped up, Company L made important contributions inside Schmidt's inner strongpoints, and Company K took the lead and continued the attack to the vicinity of Am Scheidbaum, about 1000 yards east of town. Thus the battalion consolidated its position and dug in for the night.

Among the members of the 78th Division, there has been much discussion as to who actually captured Schmidt. The above details on the action of February 7-8 are from well informed and accurate sources. Whatever the discussion, no one can deny that the 78th Division did the job. While the 3rd Battalion was working to get through Schmidt, the 1st Battalion was sent around the left flank of the 3rd Battalion, in the area between Harscheidt and Kommerscheidt, in order to secure Schmidt from the north and relieve some of the pressure on the 3rd Battalion.

The 1st Battalion experienced severe losses in this area, particularly as they crossed the Schmidt-Haarscheidt road. Heavy enemy fire from Harscheidt raked the battalion's ranks as they tried to move east. Elements of the battalion descended into the deep draw south of Harscheidt, and later succeeded in charging up the hill and capturing Harscheidt. Later in the afternoon, the 1st Battalion reorganized, and Companies A and B jumped off in a coordinated attack to the east again. They advanced against light opposition to a point north of Am Scheidbaum, where fire from four enemy tanks halted the drive. The troops dug in and spent a miserable, rainy night, without food or water.

The 2nd Battalion moved into a forward assembly area in Schmidt in the night, and made plans to attack in the morning. Into the woods west of Schmidt that night moved an aggressive, smooth-functioning outfit—'The Go-Devils'. Colonel Van Houten's 60th Infantry Regiment of the 9th Infantry Division was going to add its weight to the vital attack. The 310th Regimental Command Post moved into a two story frame dwelling, the inside of which was a pillbox, the like of which would have made any bank vault look simple. At 0300 on the morning of the 9th, the Battalion Commanders, Lt. Col. Harrison, Lt. Col. Culbreth and Lt. Col. Lutz, reported there in Gerstenhof to learn the final plan. The 310th was to continue the attack from Schmidt and secure the north or left flank of the 60th Infantry, which was to drive east beyond Am Scheidbaum and capture Hasenfeld. The 309th was still designated to take the Dam.

The 310th Infantry had its 2nd Battalion commence its attack east and north of Schmidt through the woods above Am Scheidbaum. Considerable mortar and small arms fire continued to come from the north beyond Harscheidt. By noon of February 9, the battalion had reached the high ground northeast of Am Scheidbaum.

The 3rd Battalion, with Company K in the lead, attacked directly east from Am Scheidbaum. Mortar and artillery fire was intense and infantry resistance was unusually determined. In the woods north of Hasenfeld, the Germans hung on doggedly. Some continued to fire from dugouts until crushed by our supporting tanks. By early afternoon of the 9th, the 3rd Battalion had taken 50 prisoners and was already preparing defensive positions overlooking the Roer River above Hasenfeld.

The 1st Battalion, which was only able to assemble a hundred-man task force, moved across a line of departure 1200 yards east of Schmidt at 0930 the same morning. Their mission was to move down the east side of the Schmidt—Hasenfeld road, and secure the road from enemy attack. The 1st Battalion was to wait until the 3rd Battalion passed in front of them, in their effort to seize the ground to the 1st Battalion's left front. Then, the 1st Battalion was to continue the attack to the high ground north and northeast of Hasenfeld. This attack commenced at about 0930, and by 1430 the battalion had reached its objectives and captured over 60 prisoners.

When the battalion reached its objective there were only 90 men left to hold the high ground overlooking Hasenfeld and the Dam. The Battle of Schmidt had been cruel and devastating to the 1st Battalion.

Following these last drives by the 310th Infantry to the east, securing the north flank and the high ground to the north of the Dams, the 60th Infantry was successful in capturing Hasenfeld, and the 309th Infantry came in between Hasenfeld and the lake to capture the north end of the Dam.

Due to the general construction of the dam, the retreating Germans had not elected to destroy it. Instead, they blew two great spillways, and the Roer River was partially flooded. After the capture of the Dam, it was impossible to repair the damage, and eventually the extensive lakes emptied themselves into the Roer River. The Germans' ace in the hole was gone now, and as soon as the water receded, the Roer River ceased to be a barrier and a potential trap for the American divisions to the north. The Germans had made the most of this ace however; they had held up the U.S. Ninth Army for many months.

On the morning of the 9th, several changes occured in the Regimental Command. Lt. Col. T. H. Hayes, former the Executive Officer, became the Commander of the Regiment. Major Wilmer V. Bell, formerly S-3, became Executive Officer, and Major Boggs A. Robinson became Commander of the 1st Battalion. Colonel Miner had received orders transferring him from Infantry to General Staff Corps, to become Chief of Staff of the 75th Division. Lt. Col. Harrison was ordered to the teaching staff of the Paris Infantry School.

In the days that followed, Schmidt and the battalion's positions were subjected to intermittent artillery and mortar fire from the Roer east bank, while the troops worked to make their dugouts livable. Men were rotated to the rear for baths, clean clothes and recreation, and limited quotas were sent on pass to England, Paris, Brussels, Huy, Liege and the Division Rest Center at Röttgen. Again many hundreds of reinforcements and more than a few cured casualties arrived, gradually returning the regiment to normal strength. Infantry tank, weapons, assault boat, and small unit training was conducted under the enemy's nose. Men got haircuts too, and learned that sweaters were not an outer garment.

Elements of the 505th Parachute Regiment of the 82nd Airborne Division came into the area, and took up a defensive position along the Roer on the left of the 310th Infantry.

At 0345 on February 13, two platoons of Company L quietly descended the river bank and entered the town of Blens. Under direct observation of the enemy, Blens was a dangerous town during daylight hours, and movement of any kind was possible only at night.

After dark on February 14, the 1st Battalion sent a patrol to evacuate 13 civilians from Haversauel, a tiny village on the river bank.

Patrols were sent across the river on February 18, 21, and 23rd to plot enemy installations. The Regimental Intelligence Platoon, under Lt. Robert Endress, did good work on these patrols.

This was the period of waiting on the banks of the Roer for the next couple of weeks; waiting for the big push up north in the Ninth Army sector to commence. The Germans had blown the outlets to the dam just right, so as to get the maximum delay from high water in the Roer River. On February 23rd, the Twelfth Army Group of General Bradley (First and Ninth Armies) broke the stalemate in a tremendous offensive, throwing its might across the Roer River and onto the Cologne Plain. The 310th Infantrymen watched the swift advances with excitement. It would be a matter of days until they were a part of it. The attack was echeloned in time for the Ninth and First Armies, D plus 4 for the 78th Division.

At 0200 on February 28, a three-man Company F patrol, Lieutenants (then T/Sgts) Cornelius Hinchy and Hubert Arsenault, and T/Sgt Riley walked across the top of the Dam. Miraculously escaping the mines and booby traps which lined the enemy side of the Dam, the three sergeants worked their way across steep wooded hills and deep ravines, to high ground just outside Kloster Mariawald. There, nearly 5000 yards behind the enemy lines, they ambushed and captured a five-man enemy mortar crew, and in daylight (with their prisoners) returned safety to the regimental lines. The information they had secured on the disposition of the enemy fortifications, mine fields, and forces had been sought unsuccessfully by higher headquarters for some time and proved extremely valuable. Upon their return, the patrol members were immediately awarded Bronze Stars by Major General Parker.

The capture of Schmidt and the Schwammenauel Dam marked the end of a costly phase on the western front and for the 310th Infantry. But the once-vaunted Siegfried Line was a shambles of broken concrete and shattered enemy hopes. There would be few more tight earth-grubbing battles in which gains could be measured only in bloody yards. The fighting henceforth would be characterized by broad, careless sweeps of fast moving armor. It would be up to the infantry to smash strong points, mop up by passed areas, and, as always, hold the ground.

The 310th had seen both good and bad days in the former kind of fighting, had captured or aided in the capture of 16 towns, reduced 130 pillboxes, and taken 580 prisoners of war. The cost had been much in many cases. To one infantryman and his kin, one death is much. The next phase of the war, and all the other phases to come, were brighter for the 310th. In the race to the Rhine and thereafter, the casualties were fewer, the results were more satisfying.

But, lest we forget, the victories had cost the regiment 1412 battle casualties, and 774 non-battle casualties of which many cases were trench foot and other injuries directly related to combat activity. In a sense, it would be a new 310th which crossed the Roer, for 1868 reinforcements had joined the regiment since December 13, 1944.

Orchids were not in season, in February 1945 in Germany, but if they were, they would have gone to:

Lt. Col. Lutz and his 3rd Battalion—a great fighting leader and a great fighting team.

Captain Edward Murphy, commander of 2nd Battalion's Company G. He was as rugged as he looked, and he generally looked like the wrath of God.

Chaplains Voelzke and Leugers, whose practice of brotherly love and whose spiritual guidance contrasted so deeply with the military necessities of the time. Their devotion to duty with is on a parallel that of the Company Medics.

The Regimental Command Post, which during the entire operation, was up there close to the front, living no better than the doughboy himself, and never out of the range of enemy mortars.

Cannon Company, Anti-Tank Company and the Artillery, who were actually part of the fighting front, and whose guns kept mighty hot. Mighty fine shooting, fellows.

The Tankers who helped us, stuck their necks out plenty. It was comforting to have them so close to you.

The S-4 or supply people for those boots and winterized clothing. It was easier "sweating it out" up there when we could forget the wet feet. Company B of the 303rd Engineers for their willing and constant support in all problems.

The Jerries, for the nice warm cellars they left us in Schmidt, even though the town was a wreck.

CHAPTER SEVEN

THE RACE TO THE RHINE

Typical going

General Eisenhower had hoped and believed that his armies would trap and annihilate the Germans west of the Rhine. The enemy was known to have used between 25 and 28 Divisions in the Battle of the Bulge, with the best of these troops coming from the strategic reserve that guarded the Cologne and Ruhr Valley. An estimated 90,000 German casualties were inflicted in this battle of attrition. Prompt, speedy and decisive action by the Allies was needed to take advantage of the enemy's weakened condition.

Despite the fact that the enemy was suspected of being exhausted, the general plan to cross the Roer was cautious. Instead of one grand, broad sweep by all the divisions along the front, it was decided that there should be several crossings in the Düren area, with a drive inland for a proper beachhead and then a sharp turn south. This would outflank the

THE RACE TO THE RHINE

3d ARMY

Germans along the river bluff, causing them to withdraw or be cut off. This would permit the next division to the south to cross the Roer without opposition and execute a similar manoeuver.

The Ninth Division was to cross at Nideggen, the 311th Regiment (of the 78th) was to follow and, on crossing, immediately drive south along the east bank of the Roer to Heimbach, thereby securing the south flank. They were to find a resolute enemy, not yet convinced that the final chapters of the war were being written.

From the very beginning, the race to the Rhine was intended to be a great Ninth Army undertaking. Their drive started on February 23rd, when the 8th and 104th Infantry Divisions crossed the still swollen Roer and quickly captured Düren. Men of the 78th Division, then a part of the First Army, silently cheered them on and kept their fingers crossed. It was not until March 1st that the 310th was to find itself in the midst of still another type of combat.

FIRST BATTALION

On March 1st, the 1st Battalion was rudely yanked out of their defensive line along the banks of the Roer and told that they were going for a long ride. It turned out to be more of a ride than anyone thought possible. Attached to Combat Command "B" of the 9th Armored Division, they crossed the Roer River at Düren and went by motor to Vittweiss. By March 2nd, the 1st Battalion had motored to Friesheim and were preparing to attack the town of Weilerswist, a key road and rail center just east of the Erft Canal.

SECOND BATTALION

Back on the Roer, on March 2nd, the 2nd Battalion was attacking on foot across the Schwammenauel Dam to secure the south flank of the general drive to the east by the 309th and 311th regiments of the division. The crossing of the dam was a risky venture, extensive mine fields covered the Roer Canyon trails, and enemy observers and mortar crews in the high hills beyond the canyon's floor dominated the approaches to the battalion's objective—the Kloster Mariawald. The long, exhausting climb into the highlands, however, was completed with not too many casualties, and the assault on the Kloster buildings was successfully led by Major Henry Hardenburgh and Lt. James K. Bowman. The men of Companies E and F did a masterly job in taking this objective, in defiance of the enemy reserves in this southern area. Approximately 60 prisoners were taken. During this operation, the battalion was attached to the 311th Regiment, already across at Nideggen and working its way south along the river, where it was to meet the 2nd Battalion. Following this action, the 2nd Battalion was assigned to the 309th Regiment, and moved east by motor many miles, into Fussenich on March 3rd, without further fighting.

THIRD BATTALION

The 3rd Battalion by March 2nd was rolling along attached to CCA of the 9th Armored Division, with Sgt. Casey's platoon of the 310th's Cannon Company attached. Their first troublesome objective was Wollersheim.

The men of Companies K and L managed to capture and clear out the stubbornly defended Wollersheim woods by midnight. Some 65 to 70 prisoners were taken and an estimated 20 enemy were killed. The 3rd Battalion was not having too easy a time of it. Already there had been no rest for 40 hours, but this was only the beginning.

FIRST BATTALION

Further east, on the night of March 2nd, the 1st Battalion had begun their attack on Weilerswist. The troops attacked at 2300 and advanced rapidly through machine gun, mortar and artillery fire to a patch of woods 700 yards east of Friesheim. Severe opposition was immediately encountered from a well-deployed and dug-in enemy force. In addition, a continuous barrage of flat trajectory fire from a section of 20mm guns and tree-bursting artillery and mortar shells fell into the woods. The severity of this fire forced the troops to disperse so widely that it was almost impossible to maintain contact in the darkness. Nevertheless, the men continued to move eastward, fighting as individual small units.

At 0100, three enemy tanks were heard approaching the woods from the northwest. Five bazooka teams immediately left the protection of the woods and advanced to meet the tanks. Their determined fire, although unable to inflict damage, caused the tanks to withdraw, but only after one of the bazookamen had been killed.

By 0300, the captain in command of the delaying force was captured, 22 of the enemy killed (by count the following morning) and the remainder wounded or driven off. The undiminished intensity of the artillery, mortar and 20mm barrage made a continuation of the attack inadvisable, and the troops dug in on the eastern edge of the woods. The enemy continued to deliver harassing fire throughout the night. This had indeed been an ordeal for those who survived it. This was the start of the period which won the First Battalion its Presidential Citation (see Annex).

The battalion jumped off again at 1000. The troops had at this time been without sleep or appreciable rest for 51 hours, and had been under continual fire for 19 hours. 1300 yards of completely flat and unbroken terrain lay between the battalion and the Erft Canal. This ground was raked by artillery, mortar, 20mm gun, and machine gun fire from the vicinity of Bliesheim and the east bank of the canal, and by rifle and burp gun fire from approximately 30 enemy riflemen in skillfully placed dug-in positions west of the canal. In addition, from a point 300 yards west of the Erft to the canal itself were scattered anti-personnel mines, and along the road and in the fields were planted anti-tank mines.

Companies A and B advanced rapidly with troops dispersed along a broad front. The men, despite the withering fire and severe casualties, continued to a line approximately 300 yards from the canal where there was a momentary halt. Company C was committed and moved forward quickly. The enemy at this point blew the bridge across the canal.

The supporting tanks remained in the woods throughout the attack and the only artillery support was supplied by the Company D mortar platoon, which fired more than 1800 rounds in the attack. So rapid was the fire that the sockets of several mortars were knocked out of the baseplates. Key men in all companies had been wounded or killed. In Company A alone, Acting Commander Lt. Thomas Nolan and the platoon leaders of the 1st and 3rd platoons, Lt. Gifford and Lt. Bliziotes, were wounded, and S/Sgt. Spence, the 3rd Platoon sergeant, was killed. Nevertheless, after a quick regrouping, the companies, using marching fire, continued to advance and quickly reached the canal.

The Battalion Medical Aid Group, with the assistance of two squads of Battalion A&P personnel, despite the intense fire and complete lack of cover, saved many lives by immediate first aid and evacuation of wounded.

The canal was waist to shoulder deep and men crossing it were easy targets for enemy snipers as they struggled for foothold on this slippery bottom and clambered up the terraced eastern bank. Snipers were overcome by grenades followed by bayonets, and the companies, including Company C, which was now on the line, entered Weilerswist on a wide front. Inside the town, mopping up was difficult because of the rubble-filled streets and shattered buildings. This impeded the progress and afforded excellent cover for enemy snipers. Nevertheless, by darkness every building had been cleared and Weilerswist secured.

The victory had been costly—ten 1st Battalion men killed, and 123 wounded. But it had cost the enemy between 135 and 140 killed and an unknown number wounded, and 46 captured. More important than dead Germans though, was the break in the strongest defense line between the Roer and Rhine in the 78th Division sector. The 1st Battalion had taken it on the chin.

Rest was still impossible for the exhausted troops. The battalion was far in advance, exposed to the right and left, and required to outpost the entire town. At 0330 relief was effected by the 16th Infantry, and the 1st Battalion was ordered to assemble in Friesheim. It marched back in darkness and closed in at 0730. The men, who had then been without rest for 72 hours, of which 27 hours had been spent under enemy fire, slept until 1130. A hot breakfast was served—the first real meal in 62 hours.

THIRD BATTALION

Meanwhile, on March 3rd the 3rd Battalion captured three towns, Company L moved out at 0630, and following an artillery TOT at 0745, assaulted Merzenich. Light resistance was overcome and the town secured by 0815. Company K, which had assembled in a draw southwest of Merzenich, attacked toward Sinzenich at 1145 under an extremely heavy artillery barrage and heavy small arms fire. One platoon of tanks was in support. Two hundred yards from the town, the 3rd Platoon was pinned down by small arms fire from a tower on the west edge of town and machine gun fire from the left flank. S/Sgt. Cornelius J. Coughlin, though seriously wounded, retained consciousness long enough to direct tank fire on these strongpoints. S/Sgt. Charles F. Mason, wounded in the hand, crawled 20 yards to another wounded man, dressed this man's wounds, with one hand, then, with the help of another man, carried him to a shell crater. Company K assaulted the town immediately, the machine guns were knocked out. Heavy enemy artillery fire fell throughout and many of the houses were stubbornly defended. Civilians, some of whom had been supplied with weapons, offered so much interference that finally all 1650 of them had to be rounded up and placed under guard. After killing more than 20 and capturing 32 enemy, the 3rd Platoon finally reached the eastern limits of town at 1330 with 12 men. A perimeter defense was set up and a thorough search of the town netted 8 additional prisoners. Company K suffered 15 casualties in the action. At 1400, Company I attacked and captured Floria against light resistance. Four enemy were captured.

FIRST BATTALION

At 1300 March 4th, the 1st Battalion was back in action, moved by truck to Disternich, where it was given the mission to recross the Erft Canal and capture Wustheim and Gross Bullesheim. The men detrucked at Lommersum and went on foot to the ford opposite Wustheim. Company C crossed the canal just after dark and entered Wustheim against light resistance. Company B, after capturing 85 prisoners in the northern part of Wustheim, advanced toward Gross Bullesheim. By an hour after daylight, both Wustheim and Gross Bullesheim had been secured and 112 prisoners taken.

THIRD BATTALION

On the same day, at 1300 too the 3rd Battalion marched to Nemmenich, and there briefed personnel for the attack on the important road, rail, and communications center of Euskirchen. A city with a peacetime population of 30,000 Euskirchen was a vital German army supply center, the largest city yet encountered by any unit of the 78th Division.

The battalion, with Company I leading, moved forward at 1400 and began the 5 mile advance to the objective. The flat terrain had recently been plowed, and movement in the thick mud and steady rain was difficult and exhausting. Every sugar beet pile was a potential strong-point. The entire route was under incessant observed artillery and mortar bombardment and several times direct 88mm fire was encountered. Machine gun fire from the railroad tracks above Ulpenich and Durscheven, and sniper fire from Irresheim was lively, almost immediately beyond the line of departure. Northwest of enemy held Elsig, small arms resistance from snipers became too severe to be bypassed, and one platoon from Company I and one from Company L entered northern Elsig. They cleared the northern part of town, killing 5 and capturing 11 enemy while the battalion continued the advance.

Even when the enemy fire was heaviest and casualties highest, the men kept moving toward their objective, seldom hitting the ground and urging one another on with shouts and jests. Not one squad scattered, and not a man dropped out, unless severely wounded. Most of the weapons became clogged with mud. There was neither time nor place to stop. The men attempted to clean them while marching.

Upon reaching a point 500 yards east of the barracks area in Euskirchen, Company I was joined by 5 medium tanks. A hundred yards forward, heavy anti-tank and machine gun fire opened up. Although one light and one medium tank were knocked out, and the remainder withdrew 700 yards, Company I battled forward another 200 yards, where it came under heavy small arms fire from the group of barracks buildings which covered the western approaches to town. The troops had advanced so rapidly that friendly artillery was out of range. Upon learning this, the company assaulted and fought through the area without artillery support. By this time it had become dark. Progress within the city was extremely difficult because of shell craters, rubble-blocked streets, and snipers. Finally, a route was found, and the company and supporting armor reached the southwest edge of town at 2100. At this point, an order was received to consolidate guard posts and begin to clean its equipment which had become so mud caked as to be unserviceable. 14 casualties had been suffered.

Meanwhile, in Company L, casualties had been extremely heavy, particularly among officers and non-commissioned officers. The platoon leader and two squad leaders in each of the attacking platoons, the 1st and 3rd, were casualties. Reorganization of the company was affected under fire, the barracks area cleared, men dug in, and patrols were sent to probe deeper into the city.

Company K, suffering from 11 casualties, moved to the northeast section of the city, and sent patrols to the railway bridge and highway bridges east of the city. These were found to have been destroyed and the company thereupon set up a perimeter defense of the northeast sector.

The night was intensely cold, dark and stormy. The size and great number of blasted buildings made it impossible to clean out the city. All personnel remained alert and on guard throughout the night. This required exceptional endurance and spirit, for the men were thoroughly soaked and feeling the full effects of physical exhaustion. Since March 1st, they had marched more than 18 miles, at least 8 of which had been under direct fire, fought three battles and barely managed eight hours of what was called sleep.

Euskirchen was mopped up in the morning. It produced 150 prisoners. The statistical price paid by the 3rd Battalion was 56 casualties (principally from shell fragments) bringing the three day total to 96.

The 60th Infantry Regiment of the 9th Infantry Division was being held in reserve of the 9th Armored Division for the express purpose of capturing Euskirchen. When the 3rd Battalion took the city alone, the 60th Infantry returned to its own outfit. The 310th had repaid the "Go Devils" for their help at the Dam.

FIRST BATTALION

Consolidation of flank positions was not to be neglected. At 1200 on March 5th, Company B from Gross Bullesheim and Company C from Wustheim attacked Kleinbullesheim. Opposition was slight and the town was taken without too much trouble.

SECOND BATTALION

While no one will say that the 2nd Battalion was champing at the bit, it was not being overlooked. It was motorized again and brought up to Euskirchen, where, with several armored units, it became part of Combat Command "A". This all took place on March 5th. After a very hasty briefing and a somewhat rushed up coordination of attached armored and artillery support, the battalion moved out from Euskirchen across a hastily constructed ford over the Erft Canal.

Inadequate radio communication with the tanks greatly impeded coordination, and Cuchenheim just across the canal turned out to be a tough nut for the men of Company F. It was here that their fearless leader, James K. Bowman, (just promoted to Captain that morning) fell. Other losses were heavy, and the attack continued far into the night. Cuchenheim was to be the hardest and most costly fight for any units of the 2nd Battalion in the Roer campaign.

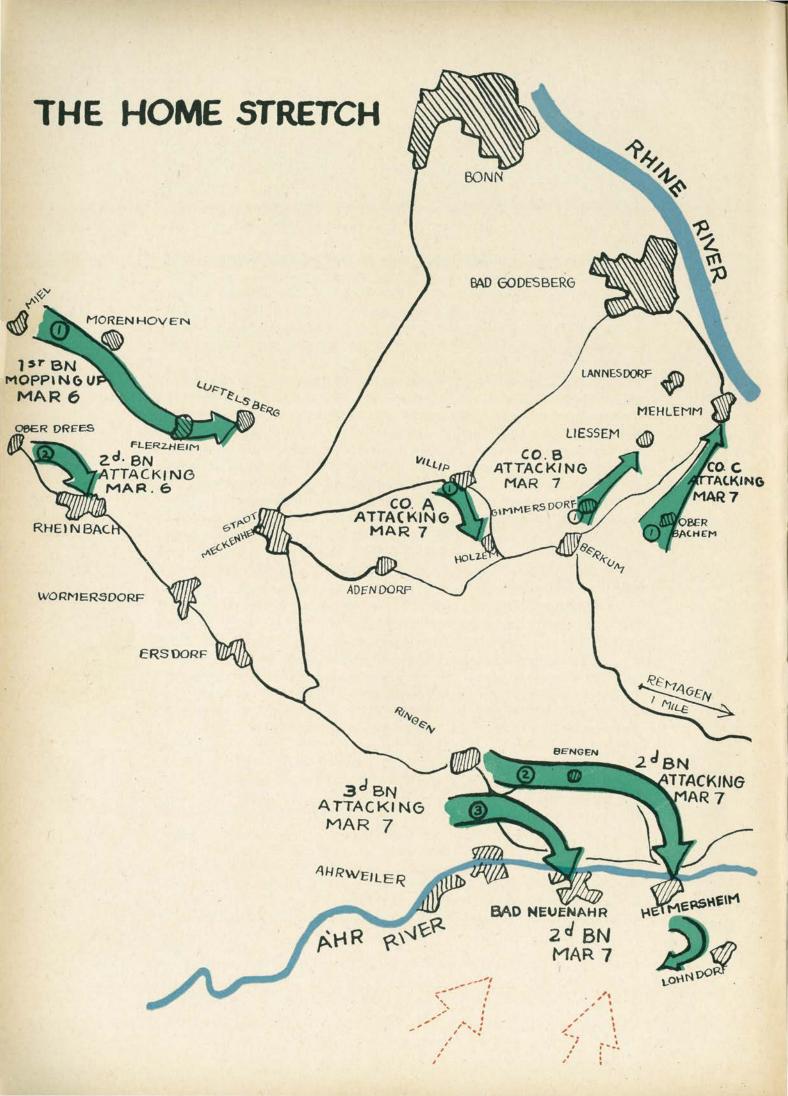

Company G, sparked by Captain Edward Murphy, took Weidesheim, and Companies E and G rolled on into the darkness to the outskirts of Rheinbach by morning. Two platoon of the 310th's Cannon Company, directed by observer Lt. Gerold Anderson, gave wonderful supporting fire and eased the burden of the infantrymen. By noon, Rheinbach was captured and many prisoners taken. The 2nd Battalion had struck with speed. The Combat Command now sent other units shooting ahead for Ringen. At Ringen, the 2nd Battalion was to take up the pursuit again. Among the 310th Infantry trophies is the official Nazi party flag taken at Ringen, by Lt. Dowd, the Regimental Adjutant, who was immediately behind leading elements, searching for a forward Regimental CP location.

THIRD BATTALION

The 3rd Battalion learned there was no rest for the weary. Their next experience was to leave an indelible impression.

At 1100 on the 5th of March, Company I moved out of Euskirchen with one platoon of light tanks, one platoon of mediums, and a section of TD's. Rotzheim was the objective. The town and its approaches were defended by concrete machine gun emplacements at the northwest and southwest corners of town. Snipers, well placed, filled in the gaps. This assured command of the canal, as well as 200 yards of open ground west of it.

The company advanced through sporadic small arms fire to a large ditch 200 yards west of the canal, just opposite Rotzheim. One tank had been knocked out by mines, and the 1st Platoon was wading across the waist deep canal when machine guns and mortars opened fire. The platoon was forced to remain in the canal where it was protected by the steep eastern bank. S/Sgt. Grover G. Meadown immediately raced back through the heavy enemy fire to the remainder of the company in the ditch. He informed Captain Lester K. Olson, the Company Commander, that the bridge (which could not be seen from the ditch), was out, and miraculously returned uninjured to his platoon. A messenger was sent to the canal to ascertain whether it was fordable by tanks. He and another messenger were both seriously wounded in the attempt. T/5 Carroll E. Pomplin, company aid man, rushed from the canal to give them first aid. He was hit in the side after crawling 20 yards, but continued until he was hit again. S/Sgt. Meadows, exposing himself to the heavy fire for the third time, went to the aid of the medic and was mortally wounded. The third platoon, in a quick dash, had crossed the canal on the right flank of the first, and was pinned down against some buildings at the canal's edge. Meanwhile, Captain Olson, followed at five minute intervals by his radioman, whose boot, sleeve, and spare parts kit were hit, and the remainder of the headquarters group, two of whom suffered minor wounds, reached the canal, While the group was pinned down in the canal, the enemy launched two counterattacks in platoon strength. Both of these were driven off, but only after the company's ammunition had been nearly expended. One of the tanks was sent to Euskirchen for resupply. By this time, the 2nd Platoon had rushed to the canal. Upon the tank's return, a fordable spot had been located. The tank was ordered to cross the canal and start up the eastern bank until it's tilt caused the bandoliers of ammunition tossed up out of the turret to land on the side of the tank and slide off into the hands of the men standing in the canal. The crossing was accomplished at 1630 and the company, after four hours in the canal, continued the assault.

One squad attacked the two machine gun emplacements on the north and another the two on the south. The five enemy in each emplacement resisted so stubbornly that their guns were silenced only when all of them had been killed by rifle or BAR fire. Every house in town was defended bitterly by enemy with automatic weapons. One enemy platoon attempted to retreat to the southeast, but was cut off and liquidated by the 2nd Platoon. Finally, at 2100, the town was cleared. 165 prisoners were taken, and 62 enemy killed. Among the prisoners were three SS captains, two of whom attempted to escape and were killed, and four SS non-commissioned officers, who, when questioned, spit at their interrogaters. They were given a thorough lesson in proper manners; something, we hope, that created a lasting impression. Other prisoners stated that they had been ordered to fight to the death by the SS leaders. Company I suffered 30 casualties in this attack.

The company was ordered to protect the south flank of town and had prepared positions, when a message relayed from the battalion told of 200 enemy massing to the southwest near Rheder. This made it necessary to thoroughly outpost the area, and prevented more than two hours sleep for any of the troops. They had at this time fought almost continuously for 30 hours, with barely eight hours sleep in five days.

During the day, the remainder of the battalion had been divided into sections which searched every room of every building in Euskirchen, capturing 30 prisoners in the process. At 1700, it was feared that Company I, in Rotzheim, might be cut off by the enemy attack which was expected from Rheder. Although this counterattack did not materialize, the report necessitated a shift in defensive positions, and caused all personnel to remain alert and without rest until 0200 the following morning. Although they did not know it then, the 3rd Battalion was already engaged in winning their Presidential Citation.

On March 6th, the Regimental CP was in operation in Rheinbach. The 1st Battalion, motorized, followed CCB armor and mopped up the towns of Miel, Morenhoven, Flerzheim, and Luftelsberg. The 2nd Battalion prepared to move from defensive positions in Rheinbach. The 3rd Battalion moved to an assembly area in Rheinbach, where the troops were billeted and gained a night of much needed rest.

THE FOLLOWING DAY WAS MARCH 7, 1945. A DAY THAT CHANGED THE FUTURE COURSE OF THE WAR!

On that day, the 2nd Battalion reached the Ahr River and moved across to Heimersheim and then continued to attack southward against moderate resistance. How many men of the battalion remember the great wine cellar? The 3rd Battalion passed through the 60th Armored Infantry Battalion and against considerable resistance, captured what we were told by the enemy was the open hospital city of Bad Neuenahr, and the bridges across the Ahr River.

The 310th Infantry (less 1st Battalion) attached to CCA was now in position facing south along the Ahr River. We waited for CCB (with our 1st Battalion attached) to come up on our left on the west bank of the Rhine. We would then drive south to meet the Third Army. This was the "plan"—it was not to be.

FIRST BATTALION

The 1st Battalion units, widely separated from the previous day's action, assembled in Flerzheim at 0100. The battalion moved to Stadt-Meckenheim and then to Adendorf, where it was split into three task forces, each consisting of a rifle company with heavy weapons attached, and a platoon of medium tanks. The forces were designated by the letter of the company which was a part of it. Task Force A captured Holzem and Villip, Task Force B secured Gimmersdorf and Liessem, and Task Force C took Oberbachem and Niederbachem against moderate resistance. At 1600, when Task Force B was about to enter Lannesdorf, and Task Force C was engaged in fierce fire fighting inside Mehlemm, the Battalion Commander received an urgent message. The battalion was to assemble immediately and prepare for a motor movement to Remagen.

CCB HAD JUST CAPTURED INTACT THE LUDENDORFF BRIDGE ACROSS THE RHINE.

Company A of the 27th Armored Infantry Battalion did the job. The 1st Battalion broke contact with the enemy and was quickly assembled in Berkum by 2100. The command group moved to Remagen at 2300 and the remainder of the battalion followed one hour later.

THE FIRST BATTALION, 310TH INFANTRY OF THE 78TH DIVISION WAS TO BE THE FIRST INFANTRY BATTALION OVER THE RHINE.

For this event and the actions immediately preceding and following it, the 1st Battalion has received a Presidential Citation. The order given to this battalion on the night of March 7-8 may well go down in history as a classic. It was—"Cross the Rhine, turn right, and attack!"

The Ninth Army up north had reached the Rhine three days before, but there were only two ways across; assault boats or a floating bridge. Plans were already formulated for both when the world was electrified. The sacred Rhine was in our control.

The tired men of the 310th were to learn what it takes to hold a bridgehead pointing into the heart of Germany proper.

Reference to the map covering the Roer to the Rhine will properly indicate what the 310th had accomplished on that exploit. Unfortunately, red ink was necessary for the debit side of the ledger. The regiment lost 55 killed, 7 missing, 262 wounded, and 79 evacuated for non-battle casualties (including trench foot and battle fatigue), a total of 403 men.

There isn't a man, from the Regimental Commander down to the most recent reinforcement who joined the race, who doesn't deserve special commendation for his contribution to breaking the tape at Remagen.

Ludendorff Bridge before the collapse

CHAPTER EIGHT

REMAGEN BRIDGEHEAD

It takes a lot to give a dogtired doughboy a thrill. Capture of the Ludendorff (Remagen to the boys) Bridge did just that. Nobody had to tell the men of the 310th what it meant. It was practically in their own back yard. Maybe now the crazy Jerries would give up. Men died in that constant hope. It's what made bearing so much misery possible. The time was not ripe though. The Germans needed more convincing, and the 310th was to help tighten the screws.

In seven swift days, the American Ninth and First Armies had actually ripped the German Wehrmacht to ribbons in their dash to the Rhine. Various elements of the German First Parachute, Fifth Panzer and Fifteenth Armies had managed to escape across the Rhine in the Cologne and Duisburg area, but all up and down the front, thousands of prisoners streamed in—some first class soldiers—some unfit for such hardships. A certain disheartening spirit of defeat seemed to spread through the German ranks. Many of the villages, as at Rheinbach and Heimersheim, surrendered with hardly a fight. White flags made from bedsheets, table-cloths or an old undershirt were no longer unfamiliar. Captured Luegers and P-38's were no longer rare museum pieces.

But whatever the next few days held in store for the 310th Infantrymen, the crossing of the Rhine at 1550 hours on March 7 by a company of armored infantry of Combat Command B of the 9th Armored Division was an unexpected and remarkable accomplishment.

The "Watch on the Rhine" had certainly been poorly kept. That the Wehrmacht had allowed the most formidable barrier in Western Europe to be penetrated so quickly and easily must have been a terrific shock to every German. It was good to contemplate Hitler foaming at the mouth. The Rhine is no insignificant waterway—it looks like the Ohio River at its mouth, or the Mississippi north of St. Louis. On the east side high bluffs dominate the river bank all along from Cologne south. There had been no time for the men of the 310th to contemplate the hazards and horror of an assault crossing of this mighty obstacle in the face of determined enemy resistance from the cliffs and hills beyond the river . . . and this was good.

Let's briefly review how the Remagen Bridge fell into our hands.

The 310th's 1st Battalion had been sent to the west flank to secure several small villages, while the remainder of CCB made for Remagen, hoping to find favorable points for future bridging. There had been no intelligence information on the condition of the railway bridge for several weeks. The Ludendorff Bridge, with its 400 yard long, three span structure, was spotted in early afternoon on the 7th from the hills overlooking Remagen. The mechanized forces of CCB, with Company A, 27th Armored Infantry Battalion leading, sped on down to the bridge's approaches in a flurry of shooting. The structure looked intact. In an interim of spotty resistance and much uncertainty the span was crossed. General Hoag of CCB took advantage of the unexpected situation. The sacred Rhine had been humbled.

The Germans had evidently stripped the area of troops to meet emergencies further north. The Ninth Army in the Cologne area was making the main effort and the Germans knew it. Capture of the bridge was indeed a fantastic turn in the war. It was supposed to have been blown as the Americans arrived, but the demolitions failed to take effect. Before the newsprint was cold, the "experts" began predicting that the Remagen accident would shorten the war by six to eight weeks. Roads were full of news correspondents coming from Cologne to the new focal point. New and on-the-spot strategy was necessary. The town of Remagen, on the west bank, had, in a matter of hours, became the most important place in the world. Like a gigantic funnel, the streets were jammed with tanks, half tracks, trucks and troops. The enemy had been considerate in another way. For their own use, they had converted the railroad bridge (for that's what it really was) into a vehicular one. Now a thin stream of tanks and vehicles were able to cross on the wooden planking.

The 310th was only a two hours' march from Remagen.

By midnight March 7th, the 1st Battalion detrucked from motors in Remagen's town square and prepared to cross. The morning of the 8th, less than 12 hours after the initial crossing by the armored infantry of the 9th Armored Division, the 1st Battalion was across, the first battalion of the first division of Infantry to cross the Rhine. Artillery fire was light during the crossing, but the confusion of men and armor jammed together in the darkness made for a perilous operation. As some men discovered, the artillery bursts would sometimes rip the wooden flooring away, leaving nothing but the water below to swallow up the unfortunate ones who stepped in these holes.

Sergeant James L. Heaton of Company B was the first infantryman of the 310th to set foot on the Rhine's east bank.

Upon crossing, the 2nd Platoon of Company B advanced directly up the steep hill overlooking the bridge and proceeded overland to Kasbach. The remainder of the company turned southeast and guided on the river road to an underpass leading into the town. These elements had advanced less than 150 yards from the bridge when they intercepted and, after a fire fight, captured a seven man enemy patrol. The patrol, which was carrying heavy demolition equipment, had orders to destroy the bridge at all costs. This was only one of several daring attempts by land, water, and air to belatedly rectify that fatal German mistake.

Company C cleared the bridge well before daylight and proceeded south along the river road. Overcoming sporadic resistance along the route, and capturing a German major, two lieutenants and an orderly in a former American jeep, the company entered the outskirts of Linz and turned north cross country to Ockenfels.

Company A, upon turning south, encountered small arms resistance from enemy dug in between the road and river along the railroad tracks. A skirmish line was immediately formed and the company cleared both sides of the road, capturing over 100 prisoners in the operation. It then proceeded to Ockenfels.

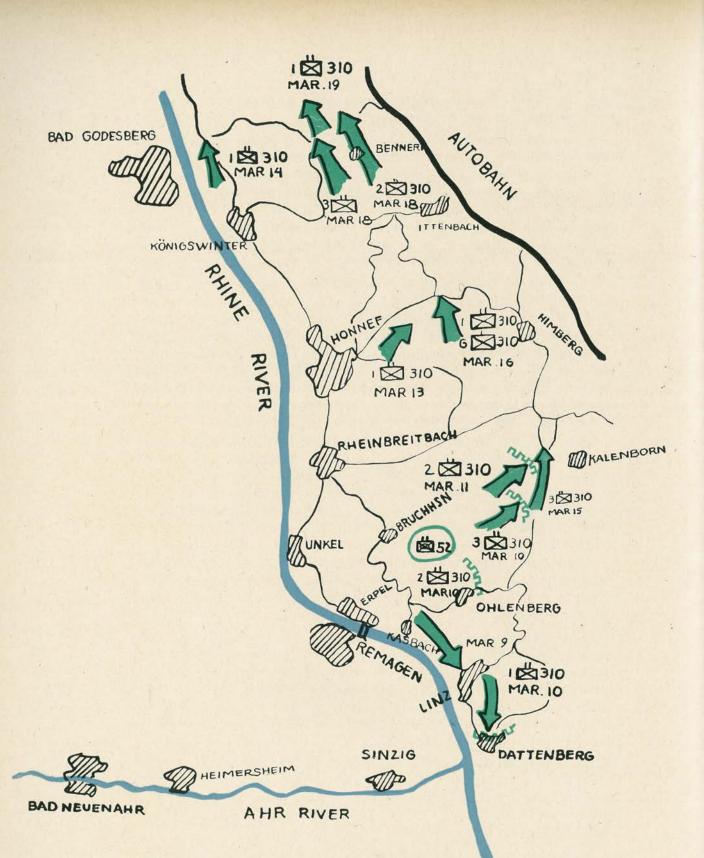

Both Kasbach and Ockenfels fell quickly and Company A moved into Linz, which was undefended. Throughout the remainder of the day and the night, the companies maintained their widely separated and precarious positions. The troops had not more than 14 hours sleep in eight days and were suffering severely from exhaustion. Nevertheless, it was necessary for them to remain continuously alert for the large scale counterattack which it seemed certain the Germans would launch.

Meanwhile, the 310th Infantry (less the 1st Battalion) was protecting the south flank of the First Army along the Ahr River just west of Remagen. On March 8, the 2nd Battalion advanced to an area 2000 yards south of Heimersheim, where it set up defensive positions. One of General Patton's columns was driving across its front far to the south. The 3rd Battalion cleared the section of Bad Neuenahr south of the Ahr River and secured the high ground to the south. This ground was extremely important since it overlooked Bad Neuenahr and Route 266, the main supply artery to the fledgling Rhine Bridgehead. Company K captured an enemy outpost manning a 75mm anti-tank weapon which was placing direct fire on this route.

On March 9th, friendly units which had begun to reinforce the bridgehead in slowly increasing numbers took over the 1st Battalion's positions and the battalion moved from the security positions on the high ground southeast of Linz. The 2nd and 3rd Battalion held and improved their defensive positions west of the Rhine and prepared for the anticipated order to make the crossing. The order came that night for the 310th to join the fight in the Bridgehead.

The Regimental Commander had made one previous trip across the Rhine the morning of March 8 to check on the condition of the 1st Battalion already across. The night of the 9th, he crossed again to receive orders from General Louis Craig of the 9th Infantry Division, who commanded all troops in the Bridgehead.

The enemy, caught flatfooted and disorganized by the unexpected crossing in the Remagen sector, hastily consolidated, drew on other regions and was ready for an all-out effort to wipe out the bridgehead. March 10th and 11th would determine life or death.

REMAGEN BRIDGEHEAD EXPANSION MAR 8-22

SCALE 1:100,000 OR 1" = 1/2 MILES

MARCH 10, 1945

The 1st Battalion assaulted Dattenburg. Company C attacked from the west and Companies A and B from the north. Company C moved along the river road shortly after dawn, and was severely harrassed by small arms fire and grenades from well dug in and concealed positions on the high ground to the left. At the intersection of the river road and the road leading east into Dattenburg, the lead tank hit anti-tank mines, and prevented other tanks from continuing. From this intersection, the road became a narrow draw, commanded by steeply rising high ground on either side. At a high point at the very western edge of town was a castle which had formerly been a Nazi headquarters and armory.

Company C advanced through the draw with two squads of the 1st Platoon on line. The 3rd Platoon moved 300 yards south on the river road and set up a road block. The 4th Platoon was in support. Panzerfaust, machine gun, and rifle fire from the high ground and the castle inflicted heavy casualties on the leading squads. They nevertheless kept moving and with the aid of a Company A platoon which attacked from the northwest, assaulted the castle and searched its 200 odd rooms. 117 prisoners, most of them SS and paratroopers, were captured in the castle and its immediate vicinity, as well as 72 machine guns, and large stores of burp guns, machine pistols, and small arms ammunition. The new war cry came into being, "A Lueger for every man."

Meanwhile, Company B jumped off with one machine gun platoon in support, and advanced southeast to the crest of the high ground on the northeast outskirts of town. There, it encountered an unusually intense concentration of 20mm, machine gun, mortar and artillery fire, which inflicted heavy casualties and effectively prevented further advance.

Company A, however, moving forward to the right of Company B, had encountered comparatively light resistance, and at 1600, with Company C, launched a coordinated attack which quickly secured the town. The "A" Task Force, consisting of one 12 man platoon of Company A, one light machine gun squad, and a platoon of tanks, was sent to assist Company B, which was still in difficulty in the north end of town. This force battled a full enemy 20mm gun company with infantry and anti-tank weapons support. When the tanks were held up, Pvt. Alfredo Lavato advanced under heavy fire to within several yards of a dug in enemy bazookaman and killed him with a grenade. After a fierce fight, the eight enemy 20mm guns were knocked out, 12 enemy killed, 14 captured, and Company B was relieved.

Companies A and C moved to high ground to the east and south of town as the enemy withdrew, while their mortars' constant barrage kept our troops heads down. One group of enemy seen retreating through a draw southeast of town was decimated by the fire of the battalion mortars and machine guns which were quickly set up.

The 27th Armored Infantry Battalion (of the 9th Armored Division) relieved the 1st Battalion at 1900 and dug in south and east of town, while the 1st Battalion set up a defense line to the north and west.

In this Dattenburg action, the 1st Battalion suffered casualties of two officers and six men killed, and 53 wounded. 162 enemy prisoners were taken and at least 85 enemy wounded or killed.

Shortly after midnight the night of March 9-10, the Regiment moved for the bridge. The 2nd Battalion led out of the Heimersheim area toward the bridge, jeeps bringing up their rear. It was a black night, relatively quiet, till the outskirts of Remagen were reached. There, the constant crack of our artillery (still on the west side of the Rhine) and the flash of each muzzle blast gave the men the indication of trouble ahead.

The enemy by now was thoroughly aroused and the fury of his resistance made itself felt by the intense artillery fire directed at the bridge. Clean hits on the girders flashed like sparks from a welder's torch, but after the injured were taken care of and the rear of a jeep yanked out of a gaping hole in the flooring, the troops moved on. Mr. Clifford Robinson, our ever-present Red Cross representative, was there ducking shells on that bridge. He was at Kesternich and all the other places too.

The last elements of the 2nd Battalion stepped onto the Rhine's east bank at 0525. Colonel Hayes was at the east end of the bridge directing the movement. The advance party and guides had been sidetracked by MP's at the congested approaches to the bridge, but the Regimental Commander, his jeep driver and radio operator had gotten across to guide the troops. The staggered column made its way along the river road, through Kasbach and up the right turn toward Ohlenberg, designated as the assembly area. It was then 0605, March 10, 1945. Five minutes later, before Ohlenberg was reached, the entire battalion was fighting for its existence, and the very existence of the bridgehead. They found themselves the only troops between advancing Germans and the Bridge!

A strong force of enemy armor and infantry had just broken through and mauled a batallion of the 47th Infantry Regiment, and had retaken

Obrunt, a village just northeast of Ohlenberg. There was no time for grouping men, or telling them what the score was. They acted instinctively. Riflemen of the 2nd Battalion dug in quickly just beyond the edge of town. Machine gunners took the best positions that were available and the 30 cal. watercooled weapons started to bark. Company H mortars were set up and firing by 0615. Never before had the 81's been so important and speed so vital. Two men dropped shells into each stove pipe as fast as they could. Base plate sockets broke and the barrels were red hot, but they pumped out the rounds. Better than 700 rounds were fired in less than an hour. Captain Hopkins, Lt. Howard, Drennan and Weaver can be proud. This engagement may well have been one of the most critical of the war. Because this action took place in the 47th Infantry sector, Lt. Col. Culbreth's Battalion was attached temporarily to that Regiment.

The enemy dead were literally piled up. The counterattack was broken. The bridgehead was destined to grow, but not without pain.

Now was the time to attack. Weapons were still hot from the defensive fight when at 0735, the assault was launched. The objective, a high hill northeast of Ohlenberg.

Everything was going fine; the enemy was on the run... until the men reached the west side (reverse slope) of the hill. Then hell broke loose, it was as if the enemy knew we were due there and when. A mortar barrage perfectly zeroed in and beautifully timed took a heavy toll. Company E was stripped of all but one officer, Captain Murphy, that staunch leader of Company G, was badly ripped by shell fragments. There was more artillery and mortar fire than had been encountered since Simmerath and Kesternich.

It was an all day struggle, gains being measured by yards. The Germans were determined to hold. By nightfall, the battalion had reached the crest of the hill overlooking Kalenborn and extended their line laterally to tie in with the 3rd Battalion, which had moved in on the south side of the high ground.

Now to hold for the night.

Up to this point, little has been said of the 3rd Battalion. Don't get the impression they were resting somewhere, watching the show from the sidelines. Far from it.

The 3rd Battalion followed the 2nd across the Remagen Bridge under a hail of artillery. Just as the rifle companies were crossing, a German artillery hell made a direct hit on the bridge, lighting the darkness with it white flash and sparks. As luck would have it, the shell had landed between companies K and L. There were no casualties.

The 310th Infantry now had lost the use of its 1st and 2nd Battalions, which were attached to other units because of the extraordinary situation in the Bridgehead. Only the 3rd Battalion and Special Units, including tanks and TD's remained uncommitted. General Craig, commanding the Bridgehead, attached the 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion to the 310th Regiment. The Regiment now had the mission of taking the high hills overlooking Kalenborn, from which the German threat was coming. This was the "thin" danger point of the Bridgehead for the first week. In General Craig's words, "We must expand in that direction to keep this from becoming a second Anzio Beachhead."

The attack order was issued at the CP of Lt. Col. Prince, of the 52nd Armored Infantry (code name "Collar"). The order: "Attack, Collar on the left, Diploma Blue on the right."

Jumping off from the vicinity of an old brewery north of Kasbach at 1330, 10 March, in a column of companies, L, K, I, the 310th Infantry's 3rd Battalion advanced along the fringe of woods south of the railroad tracks. The enemy situation was unknown, as was the exact nature of the objective, the only possible reconnaissance having been on a map. In addition to receiving extremely heavy artillery fire and annoyance from snipers through the uphill advance, German planes swooping up from attacks on the bridge strafed the battalion. A bomb dropped by one of them knocked out an entire squad of the attacking platoon of Company L. The terrain was extremely difficult. Generally, the advance had to be made single file, and in several places, a loss of foothold would have meant serious injury or death. Upon reaching the edge of the woods immediately west of the objective, Company L bore the full brunt of an artillery TOT which fell short and lost the major part of a squad of its other attacking platoon. Despite the severe casualties, Company L attacked at 1835, surprised 25 enemy, including 5 officer artillery observers, secured its portion of the objective and dug in on the southern and eastern portion of the heights.

Company K set up defenses along the edge of the road just northeast of Ohlenberg. The 1st Platoon made five attempts to place a road block 500 yards up the road, but each time was driven back by tank and machine gun fire from concealed positions in a woods.

Initially in reserve, Company I reached the woods immediately west of the battalion objective at dark without having a chance to reconnoiter its attack route in the daylight. The company worked its way through extremely thick underbrush to a point half way to the summit in its zone. The 2nd Platoon climbed to the summit where it set up defensive positions. The 1st and 3rd Platoons dug in on the slope to the left flank of the 3rd Platoon. Positions were selected in darkness and the troops dug in under heavy artillery fire.

The 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion, attacking on the left, was having difficult going, but did not meet with the same success. This battalion was operating without the half track vehicles in which the men were accustomed to being motorized. When almost on their objective, they were driven back, exhausted, to their starting point. This action left the 3rd Battalion of the 310th Infantry in an exposed but vital position. Lt. Col. Hayes, ordered the Armored Infantry to reorganize and rest in their assembly area in Regimental Reserve. He then requested the return of the 2nd Battalion (310th) to regimental control in order to continue the job.

Regimental Headquarters had moved across the bridge with the troops, and at the risk of being cut off in any successful counterattack, set up shop in a wine cellar in Kasbach. The mildewed walls and poor ventilation were hardly conducive to ideal functional operation. Maps adorned the cellar walls and the black crayon pencil made bold and daring strokes over the acetate. It was all a gamble, but it had to work. Strategy, tactics and coordination of units is no simple job. Each move has to be watched and checked, each gain recorded and each casualty figured in the next plan. All this tied in with what other units were doing and planning to do. There is really no completely isolated assault even though to the man in the shellhole, it may seem that he's been abandoned.

There was cold sweat in that cellar that day and marvelous ingenuity and directness of purpose. Major Forrest Gatchel, the Regimental S-3, was doing all that he could, and so was Major Carson, the S-2.

Communications are not always the best, and reports can be conflicting and confusing. It had become a familiar sight to see Lt. Col. Hayes on personal reconnaissance either in his three-jeep convoy with radio and Cal. 50 machine gun, or on foot with his big black map case in one hand and a cane in the other. He limped badly from an injury aggravated in that first action at Rollesbroich.

It had been a full day indeed, and sleep, even at the Regimental CP, was out of the question. A vigil would be kept.

MARCH 11, 1945

It was a fitful night. Rumblings of tanks, enemy tanks, could be heard from the distance. Word had it that the enemy was pouring in reinforcements. Artillery and mortar fire was incessant. It's nerve wracking, watching the seconds of darkness tick off into hours. Dawn comes as a blessing. And dawn kept its appointment on the morning of the 11th.

The night had been weathered.

The 1st Battalion continued to be a part of CCB, and strengthened its positions for most of the day. Other plans for the employment of this battalion were under discussion and they were to be prepared to move elsewhere.

The 2nd Battalion, having secured their original "assembly area" at Ohlenberg, now came back under 310th Infantry control. The mission was to take the high hill which had not been taken the day before. The attack by the 2nd and 3rd Battalion would go on from there. It was known in advance that there would be a concentration of enemy infantry and armor in the area, but the strength and dispositions of the forces was undetermined. The great German highway, the Autobahn, wasn't far away, and it was known that enemy reinforcements were streaming south from the Cologne area.

It was the 2nd Battalion plan to drive their attached armor (one platoon of Company B 893rd TD's) and one platoon of Company B, 774th Tank Battalion, around the south end of the big hill and come at Kretzhaus from the south. The infantry troops of Companies F and G were to advance due east toward Kretzhaus directly on leaving the foxholes on the hill.

The attack got under way, then the troops ran into severe and accurate fire from every self-propelled gun to the north and mortar supporting small arms fire from the vicinity of Kalenborn. The men were struggling up these hills when a vicious counterattack materialized. There were conflicting reports of the size and power of the enemy force, but there was no question as to its intensity. The Germans were resolved to keep the Kretzhaus crossroads and eventually drive the U. S. forces back into the Rhine. Enemy anti-tank fire blocked the armored support the 2nd Battalion had counted on. To the men, exposed as they were, the situation was desperate.

Higher echelon expected Kretzhaus not only to be taken, but to be held. Necessity sometimes dictates an on-the-spot decision to the contrary. Companies F and G fell back to the slopes of the big hill some 400 or 500 yards.

This withdrawal was neither ordered or desired at the time, but it turned out several hours later to be a wise move. From this dominating ground, it would have been well nigh impossible for the Germans to break through the crossed fire of the 2nd and 3rd Battalions. A stronger German counterattack seemed in the making, an attempt no doubt to reach the bridge by striking through Ohlenberg. From Ohlenberg, it was only 2800 yards to the Remagen Bridge. Elsewhere, the bridgehead had expanded in depth. This was the shortest route.

The remaining men of the 2nd Battalion consolidated their defensive position on the big hill and extended their line of defense to the north and northwest, where it was possible to guard against any hostile approach along the railroad right-of-way. Here they remained to absorb the punishing effect of continuous artillery and mortar barrages and repulse any attempt at penetration. Come what may, the Germans did not break through.

It was during this hectic session that Lt. Col. Culbreth, ill and suffering the full effects of realization of the ordeal his men were going through, was evacuated. Major Henry H. Hardenbergh assumed command of the battalion.

The 3rd Battalion was keenly aware of the drama over on their flank. It meant their possible full scale employment at any moment. Time wasn't spent idly, though a rest had been earned. The men, under heavy artillery fire, searched their area and rounded up several prisoners.

At 3130, the enemy launched a counterattack with 7 tanks and a battalion of infantry. The 1st Platoon of Company I immediately moved to the summit on the 2nd Platoon's right flank, and after a robust fire fight, drove back the enemy, which had managed to break through between Company L and the 2nd Platoon of Company I.

At the same time, elements of Company I on the far left flank, knocked out an enemy machine gun crew as it was setting up its gun in an extremely threatening position.

Pfc. William F. Lambert of Company I waited with his bazooka until the approaching tanks were less than 40 yards from him. He then scored two direct hits on each of the lead tanks. The giant tanks (believed to have been Royals) were not crippled, but realized their position wasn't healthy. No further convincing was necessary. They turned around and retreated with the others toward Kretzhaus.

When 3rd Battalion Headquarters Company, which had been ordered forward to reinforce the defenses, arrived, the counterattack had been broken. Approximately 40 enemy had been killed and 20 taken prisoner. Then the battalions, including the 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion, in Regimental Reserve, continued improving their defensive positions and preparing for the next day's attack, whether it be U. S. or German, or both.

Another night of watchful waiting and wondering what tomorrow would bring.

MARCH 12, 1945

The 1st Battalion, after having been attached to CCB for many weary days and miles, at last returned to the 310th Infantry Regiment. Tired and depleted, it moved into a "last ditch" defensive position near Kasbach, backing up the Regiment. Now the 310th had four battalions its own three plus the 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion.

The 2nd Battalion pushed forward at 0645 in the face of heavy artillery and mortar fire. Direct fire from infantry-supported, dug-in tanks and air strafing made each gain across the rough and wooded ground costly. Only by the most determined and relentless attack was the advance possible. But the enemy was just as determined and resisted fiercely.

By late afternoon, the battalion had reached a point several hundred yards northwest of Kretzhaus. Here a resolute counterattack by four tanks and a company of infantry penetrated Company F's position.

Companies F and G drove off the enemy offensive, but withdrew slightly to a more favorable defensive position.

The 3rd Battalion continued to improve its defensive position under intermittent artillery fire.

The 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion, in Regimental Reserve, formulated plans for an attack at 0500 the next morning. It closed into a forward assembly area at 2030.

The 1st Battalion, without a chance for the expected rest, was taken again to meet a changing situation to the north.

MARCH 13, 1945

The 1st Battalion, as a part of the 311th Regiment, attacked east of Honnef against heavy enemy resistance.

The 2nd and 3rd Battalion continued to occupy and improve their defensive positions. Company L became Regimental Reserve.

The 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion attacked toward Weldengoven at 0600. Supported by a platoon of tanks and a platoon of tank destroyers, the battalion fought through heavy resistance from dug-in tanks, artillery and mortar fire, to reach the objectives. At 1800, two additional platoons of tanks were attached to the battalion. Resistance was so stubborn that with the close of the day, the objectives were not yet completely secured.

During this period air activity was intense. We read of thousand plane raids over Germany by our Air Corps, but raids may not directly support the active battle fronts. Hundreds of sorties were flown by German pilots in an effort to knock out the Ludendorff Bridge. The weather was bad, but the German pilots were in the air. Our anti-aircraft fire was intense, dramatic and effective. Some Jerries were knocked down, but unfortunately the jet propelled Jerries were spared for further bombing attempts at the bridge.

MARCH 14, 1945

The 1st Battalion continued to advance northward along the Rhine and, as part of the 311th Regiment, secured Nieder-Dollendorf.

The 2nd Battalion, pretty badly shaken by the events of the past few days, became Division Reserve and moved to an assembly area at the southern tip of Honnef.

The 3rd Battalion extended the defensive line by having Company K take over the vacated 2nd Battalion position. Patrols were sent out to reconnoiter the area to the north. Company M, assisted the 39th Infantry Regiment of the 9th Infantry Division by harrassing fire.

At 0400 "Collar" made another effort to secure Honnef and Weldergoven. It encountered very heavy resistance and at 1600 an enemy counterattack penetrated the zone. Though some enemy infiltrated through the battalion lines, the position was held. Patrols were sent out to search the area.

The next day was to be highly significant for the 3rd Battalion, as well as for the entire bridgehead. The "thin spot" was to be welded shut.

MARCH 15, 1945

The 1st Battalion still attached to the 311th Regiment—consolidated its companies in Nieder-Dollendorf, while the 2nd Battalion moved into the woods south of Honnef as Division Reserve. Again the 310th Infantry was fighting with only its reinforced 3rd Battalion, and a somewhat wilted "Collar".

Kalenborn Junction was just a little railroad station and a few houses. But, it controlled eight roads and a railway line. It was the last enemy strongpoint that could be considered a threat to the Remagen Bridge. Four times, friendly forces had attacked it and it was still in German hands.

Companies I and L moved into Kretzhaus under heavy fire and from there jumped off, unsupported at 0600. The 2nd Platoon of Company I, led by Lt. Herman J. Carlson, crossed the railway at daylight, and entered the woods immediately southeast of the southern junction. In the woods, they discovered four enemy tanks supported by infantry. Dropping in the woods were mortar and artillery shells. But the riflemen got close to the tanks, so close the tanks couldn't fire on them. Close enough so that two men were injured by muzzle blasts from the tanks' guns. They stuck there until the enemy infantry were driven back. Then the rifle support backed up so that bazookamen could fire at the tanks, which, although only slightly damaged, withdrew. The platoon then cleared the houses along the west side of the road, capturing 25 and killing 10 enemy. The 1st and 3rd Platoons converged on the southern road junction and, supported by a platoon of tanks, cleared the railroad station and the dozen houses opposite it. Company L, meanwhile, dug in under heavy shelling on either side of the road below Kretzhaus and at 0830 cleared the portion of the woods northeast of the southern road junction.

During the afternoon of this action, the dreaded message, "Punt, pass, pray" reached the Regimental CP from the 3rd Battalion. This was the prearranged code message meaning that a commander had become a casualty. Lt. Col. Lutz had been wounded while on one of his aggressive reconnaissances by a shell fragment from a "screeming meemie" (Nebelwerfer, a multi-barreled rocket launcher). Before being evacuated however, Lt. Col. Lutz assured himself that the situation was well in hand. The Battalion was turned over to the senior officer present, Captain Olsen, the dauntless leader of Company I.

Company I, with Company C of the 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion attached, attacked at 1430 and secured the remainder of Kalenborn Junction at a cost of 12 casualties. The capture of this road junction and the high ground overlooking Kalenborn knocked out the last enemy position with good observation on the Remagen Bridge, and cracked the enemy's last determined stand in that sector.

The intensity of resistance is well borne out by the dug-in tanks and their personnel carriers knocked out.

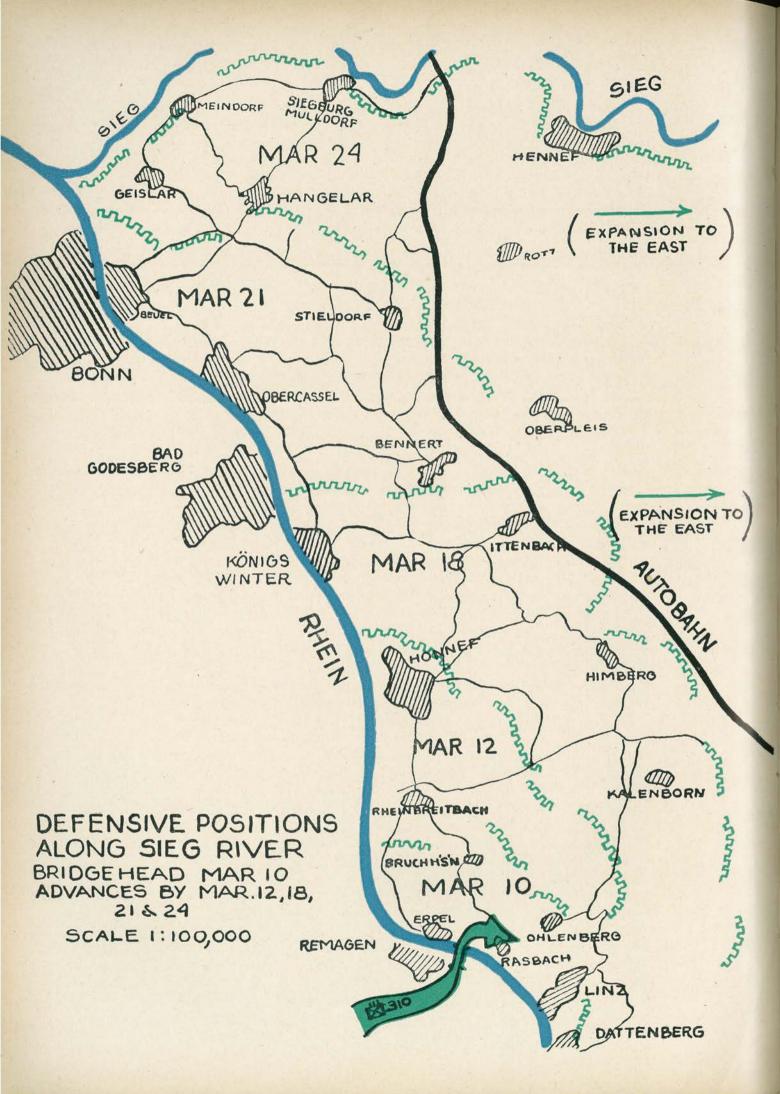

"Collar" relieved Company K and, together with the 3rd Battalion, consolidated positions, established road blocks, improved defensive positions and made contact with units on the right and left.

By March 16th, the bridgehead was no longer a fledgling. Enemy artillery could no longer reach the pontoon bridges. The Ludendorff Bridge itself had already outlived its usefulness and collapsed with 200 Engineers aboard. Armored vehicles jammed the picturesque streets of the river bank villages, waiting for the signal to break out of the bridgehead. This didn't mean that the infantry could rest. But some of the pressure and tension was lifted.

The initial Bridgehead had been established by elements of the 9th Armored, 78th and 9th Infantry Divisions, Major General Craig of the 9th Infantry Division in command. By now, several other divisions were across including the 1st and 99th. At this point, General Parker gathered his "Lightning" units together to complete the expansion to the north.

The 1st Battalion was battling again just east of Ittenbach, near Langehof. Both the 1st Battalion and Company G of the 2nd Battalion were attached to the 311th Infantry on this day. Despite the 1st Battalion's depleted condition, they drove to the autobahn against much enemy fire. A volunteer platoon of first-class Negro troops had joined Company A two days previously, and were seeing their first engagement. Under the immediate command of Technical Sergeant John A. Staggers, the Negro troops carried the fight to the Germans with unusual ferocity and valor. We were proud of them.

The 2nd Battalion continued in Division Reserve, the 3rd Battalion positions at Kalenborn Junction were taken by the 60th Armored Infantry Battalion at 1000 and the tired 3rd Battalion men moved to a assembly area northeast of Honnef. The 52nd Armored Infantry Battalion was detached from the 310th Infantry during the day. Regimental Head-quarters installed a CP in Honnef, and hoped soon to be back to "T/O". From this point on, the Regiment fought together as a reinforced regiment.

On the 17th, the 1st Battalion was detached from the 311th Infantry and became 310th Infantry Regimental Reserve. Company G reverted to 310th control and the 2nd Battalion moved to an assembly area northeast of Ittenbach, and completed the relief of the 60th Armored Infantry Battalion at 2200. The 3rd Battalion under Major Pierce, its former Executive Officer, improved its defensive positions, while plans for the next day's operations were being prepared.

The rough, mountainous terrain northeast of Ittenbach was suitable for fantastic castles, Valkyrie Legends, and mountain goats, but for little else. Nestled in these hills were the 2nd and 3rd Battalion objectives for March 18—the towns of Heister Bacherott, Bennert and Harperath.

The battalions jumped off simultaneously just before dawn. Sometimes along forest lined paths, sometimes cross country, stopping occasionally to eliminate an enemy machine gun nest or troublesome snipers, they advanced steadily. By noon, the 2nd Battalion had assaulted Bennert and Harperath.

Company K of the 3rd Battalion had a hell of a time taking Heister Bacherott. Just outside of town a strong enemy force attacked from the rear. Company K mortar men, too close for mortar work, pitched in with pistols and carbines. Heavy machine gun men of Company M traversed their guns and fired fast. At the end of a half hour the attack was broken. Thirty five Germans were dead and 10 were prisoners.

Then Company K men dashed across 200 yards of open ground into Heister Bacherott, which they cleared under heavy artillery fire. More than 100 Germans were pulled out of the houses and cellars of the town. During this action, the entire command group of Company L, except the Company Commander himself, was led into a trap by a confused guide from another unit, and was captured.

On the 19th, the 1st Battalion passed through the 2nd and secured high ground north of Bennert and Harperath. The 2nd Battalion moved into an assembly area as Regimental Reserve, and Company K cleared Bacherott. 108 Germans were anxious to surrender.

The following day, the 1st Battalion, under Major Steagle, moved to Ober-Dollendorf and then to a forward assembly area, while the 2nd and 3rd Battalions assembled in the town and were billeted for the night.

Just before dawn on March 21, Companies B and C attacked Hangelar. Captain Hope was hard to hold that morning. Company C cleared the lightly defended town, and Company B, with a platoon of tanks, captured Menden. Company A secured the airfield northwest of Hangelar. Companies F and G attacked at dawn and captured Neiderpleis and Mission House, respectively. Company G then pushed on to secure Siegburg-Mulldorf. The only sizeable resistance received was an artillery barrage which hit the 1st Battalion positions during the afternoon.

After the Ludendorff Bridge groaned and fell, the protective measures for the newly erected pontoon bridges across the Rhine were impressive. Chemical Warfare smoke generators kept the entire area perpetually in a cloud. At night, great searchlights played on the river in watch for German demolition parties. Periodic underwater explosions were set off to kill any German sabotage swimmers.

With the reaching of the Sieg River, the Remagen Bridgehead battle was declared at an end—at least so far as the 310th Regiment was concerned. The men had been promised a rest at the Sieg. Everyone was worn out. Ever since the Roer River crossing, there had been little rest for anyone. A war is one thing, but human endurance is another.

So the Regiment was given a rest, that is, in a way one might consider it a rest. There wasn't much movement required but there was an important mission assigned.

The mission called for the Regiment to dig in and defend the Sieg River from the Autobahn to the Rhine. The Jerries to the north were considered capable of attacking south towards the pontoon bridge sites around Koenigswinter. It was thought that an enemy drive due south along the Rhine to the bridge would be a worthwhile gamble. Even for a depleted force, it wouldn't have been a bad idea. A relatively short thrust would have captured four pontoon bridge sites in a few hours' time. So the men of the 310th Regiment were placed along the Sieg and told to hold tight. Holding tight in mild weather isn't necessarily so hard a thing to do. It was looked upon as a heavenly rest. From March 22 to April 5, this position was held. A few things happened. Patrols had to be put across the Sieg River, for enemy information was required. The Regimental Intelligence Platoon did some good work in this connection—often the rifle companies would send out the night snoopers. All movement had to be concealed for the enemy was looking down our throats from vantage points around Siegburg across the small river.

Prisoners file out of the new Bridgehead

All along the bridgehead, activity was feverish now. The first semi-permanent bridge, a floating treadway 1,176 feet long, was finished on the 17th. Two more similar bridges quickly followed. The bridgehead had been successfully pushed and expanded. The work horses in the expansion job had been the 78th, 9th, 99th, 1st Infantry Divisions. Numerous armored attachments to these divisions had certainly done their part.

With the bridgehead over 15 kilometers deep to the east, stupendous things were about to happen. There was now room for several Corps to wind up and swing a mailed fist eastward—just that was to be done, and how!

On March 23, the 104th Infantry Division joined the 1st Division in the attack east towards further expansion, while the 78th Division continued to secure the north flank along the Sieg River.

On March 25, the First Army launched its attack to burst out of the bridgehead. Three great Corps, the VII, the III, and the V, all lunged eastward in a drive that was to carry them to the Elbe River.

By March 26, the 3rd Armored Division had passed through the 1st and 104th Infantry Divisions in four columns, closely followed by the supporting infantry. Despite bitter resistance at first, good progress was made. The Germans rushed in at least eight infantry divisions and much armor into the battle in an effort to halt the eastward expansion.

The mammoth attack rolled mercilessly onward despite bitter resistance. The drive succeeded in reaching Marburg by March 28. From Marburg, the great offensive turned northward. The Germans were bewildered. In a single day, the attack then carried north to Paderborn—a manoeuver which completely encircled the industrial Ruhr.

The 310th Regiment, on the banks of the lower Sieg, was sitting this one out, and liking it! We had made such drives possible, weeks ahead of schedule, near a place called Remagen.

CHAPTER NINE

THE RUHR POCKET

When would this war end? Everyone asked the same question. It was inconceivable that the German would continue the one-sided fight.

American and British forces had by now all but swamped the confused, retreating mass of grey. Only small units of dazed resistance remained here and there. The British were knocking at the gates of Hamburg. The Ninth Army was at Hanover, the First almost to Magdeburg and the Third Army was beyond Kassel. The Seventh Army was on the outskirts of Stuttgart. It seemed not like an attack but like a wild pursuit of unbelievable rapidity.

The greatest of all areas of surrounded but uncaptured Germans was the extensive "Ruhr Pocket". By April 1st, the Ninth Army, driving around the north side, had established contact with the First Army, which was coming up from the south, at a place called Lippstadt, just west of Paderborn.

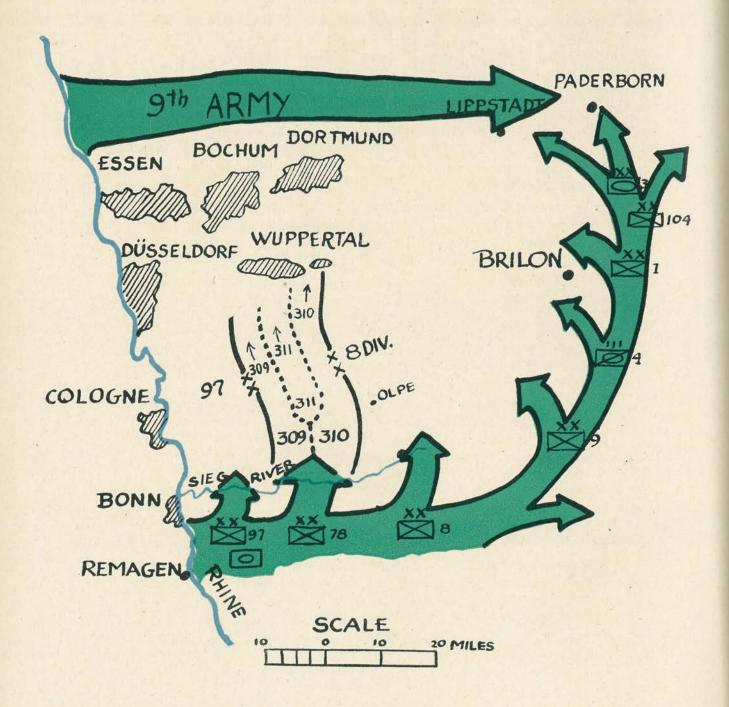

The encirclement of the Ruhr Pocket area, which contained much of the war making potential of Germany, was a deadly body blow to the Germans. In addition, all of Field Marshal Walter Modl's Army Group B, numbering over 300,000 troops, was surrounded and cut off from the remaining German forces. "The greatest double envelopement in history."

The Germans, disorganized and disheartened, were particularly low in gasoline, ammunition, and communication facilities. Although the total forces of uniformed men in the pocket was well over 300,000, not all these troops were actually experienced combat soldier. The force had considerable equipment such as self-propelled guns and tanks. The bulk of the opposition, however, was made up of service troops, laborers, anti-aircraft men, and the ridiculously pitiful Volkssturm. They were capable only of delaying actions in which, at some points, they were very successful indeed!

The organization of the Volkssturm was one of Hitler's greatest atrocities against his own people. Just imagine—old men and boys with no training, no stamina, being handed a rifle and told to help stop the greatest force of infantry, artillery and armor in history.

As far as the men of the 310th Infantry were concerned, the Ruhr Pocket was a great unknown quantity. To them, it seemed that anything could happen where 300,000 German soldiers were concentrated.

RUHR POCKET

The Regiment was relieved at the western end of the Sieg River by the 303rd Regiment of the 97th Division, and by April 5th had moved east along the Sieg River to the vicinity of Betzdorf, not far from the larger town of Siegen. Here the 310th relieved the 28th Regiment of the 8th Division in a defensive position just north of the Sieg River banks. The Germans also had a defensive line facing this regiment, but appeared to lack important artillery support.

The three battalion commanders, Major Robinson back with the 1st Battalion, Major Hardenburgh of the 2nd Battalion, and Major Pierce of the 3rd Battalion. were assigned their zones of advance for the coming squeeze play, and the drive was on. The 309th and the 310th Infantry would attack abreast. The regimental formation was specified by 78th Division because of the fantastically wide frontage assigned. Our three battalions would advance abreast, with the 3rd Battalion, 311th Infantry, under Lt. Col. Andy Lipscomb, as 310th Regimental Reserve.

This drive was not to be any spectacle of massed, overwhelming power speeding down one of Hitler's super-highways. Quite the contrary, this was to be a fight in an area of rough and hilly terrain, with few good roads and few large towns. The battalions would have tremendously wide sectors to cover in their advance. This meant our forces would be widely spread precariously thin at times.

Isolated companies were to find themselves advancing along dim trails, with little communication with supporting arms or higher headquarters. Tactically, it was an unhealthy situation. An infantry battalion isn't organized or equipped to fight a determined enemy on such enormous fronts as the situation required. Our communication and supply facilities were not designed for it.

The advance for the three battalions got under way on the morning of April 6th. Tension among the troops was considerable. Yes, the men couldn't forget that there were 300,000 armed Germans in this pocket somewhere.

Throughout the action, the Regimental Commander, was everywhere in his efforts to coordinate and control the unequal advances of the three battalions. Indeed, it would have been easy for one battalion to become isolated and destroyed in a few hours' time.

The fight for the next nine days was a long series of little scenes each often independent of the other, somewhat like a number of photograph shots from a movie that has not been glued together into one dramatic whole.

For nine days, it was mile after mile over the wooded hills, through the open valleys, through little German villages, sometimes untouched by the war; mile after mile past stretches of smoking Wehrmacht equipment, and past crafty road blocks and blown bridges, past the familiar signs of battle, of scattered helmits, of smashed weapons, of burning village, and of Volkssturm dead.

History 8

RUHR POCKET

APRIL 6-10 INCL. SCALE 1:100,000 Here and there, along the weary road, some frantic German commanders would demand a stand by his bewildered and ill-prepared troops. A short skirmish would result, lasting an hour, two hours, or half a day at the most. The final result was always the same, many Germans would die—some of our men would die—the big squeeze continued relentlessly.

Great hordes of prisoners streamed down the roads, guarded or unguarded, it didn't matter. Everywhere were the masses of newly liberated slave laborers. Great crowds of Poles, Russians, Italians, and French—sometimes already looting their recent masters. The exhileration of their scenes of liberation was thrilling. The 310th doughboys would have burst with pride at being a part of this historical happening had they not been so hollow with fatigue. Each doughboy, however, seemed to take enough time out from the action to acquire a few souvenirs and other "liberated" objects for himself.

Each battalion had the aid and support of certain armored units for the drive. Usually, one platoon of medium and one platoon of light tanks from the 774th Tank Battalion, and a platoon of M-10 tank destroyers from Company B, 893rd Tank Destroyer Battalion were assigned to each battalion. The armor was a terrific morale factor among the men. In addition, various support units, such as self-propelled artillery, and 4.2 chemical mortars were attached or supporting each battalion from time to time. Company B of the 95th Chemical Battalion was with the 310th in most of the battle. Battery B of the 552nd AA Battalion was there too, shooting its guns at anything German, in the absence of the Luftwaffe, and as mobile as cavalry.

On the first day of the advance, April 6th, all battalions attacked simultaneously. The 2nd Battalion lashed out rapidly from Katzwinkel, at a considerable loss in American casualties, but the Germans were completely overwhelmed. The 2nd Battalion had only a few withdrawing self-propelled guns to worry about during the remainder of the day.

The leading rifle company for that, Co. G, under the command of Capt. William Smith, did a good job. This company, along with several other companies of the Regiment, developed a technique of advancing that seemed to terrorize the enemy into surrendering. The main idea was to make a lot of noise. Enroute to the objective, usually a small town, a thundering barrage by the 903rd Field Artillery and the supporting mortars and armored artillery would suggest to the Germans that important things were about to happen to them. At close range the wild spraying by 50 cal. machine guns of tanks, T.D.'s and AA half-tracks, and infantry small arms fire would usually clinch the deal. The Germans were duly impressed. Out of the woods and out of the houses would come trembling ex-supermen. For those who were afraid to surrender a special device was available. A loud speaker mounted on a light tank would announce in loud German the details of our particular war aims at the moment. As a rule, most of the Germans were strictly on the look for an excuse to quit; some, of course, had other ideas. One could never be sure which was which.

History 8. 115

In the initial attack, the 3rd Battalion was to move almost directly west at first to cover its wide battalion zone. Captain Barzelay's Co. L secured the ground above Wissen, where the engineers were playing "London Bridge" across the Sieg River. They then cut north to rejoin the battalion after a good day's work. The first day saw the unfortunate death of Capt. Bonner of Co. I, one of the outstanding officers of the Regiment.

The 1st Battalion ran into the most trouble. The positions they took over from the 28th Infantry Regiment had never been completely secured. Before the attack had even started it appeared that Co. B had been cut off by infiltrating or bypassed Germans. The attached tanks were unable to operate on the route of advance selected by the Infantry. After several delays, Company A was sent on a wide end play and the other companies pushed north.

April 7th saw the 3rd Battalion burst forward with sweeping advances to the vicinity of Wittershagen and Alzen. Company I ran into a determined enemy counter-attack in this area and sustained unexpected casualties. It was in this fight that a group of men including an observer with radio from the 4.2 Chemical Company was cut off. These men were surrounded by Germans and never captured. The Germans could not account for the accurate mortar fire which they were receiving.

The 1st Battalion advanced slowly along the east side of the regimental sector and cleared Nieder-Fischbach and Niederdorf after a considerable fight on the approaches to the two villages. On a wide sweep cross country, Company A became lost in the woods and was fired on by our own guns. In this action, Captain Durham became a casualty and Lt. Nolan took over. The following day, Major Robinson was evacuated and Lt. Col. Bell, Regimental Executive Officer, assumed command of the 1st Battalion. In both cases, the 1st and 3rd Battalion had found savage resistance. It was hard to believe. These particular Germans were still unconvinced as to the folly of prolonging this war.

By the third day, the two Regiments were over extended on the Division front. General Parker wisely changed the formation to three regiments abreast, 309th on the left, 310th on the right, 311th to take over the center zone. This narrowed the 310th zone somewhat, and enabled us to fight two battalions abreast, one in reserve. A sound tactical principle which enabled us to throw in a relatively fresh battalion where the going was good, and pick up a tired battalion in motorized reserve.

At this time excitement was running high as to who would capture General Modl and who would bear the brunt of a concerted German effort to break out of the pocket. Our Air Corps reported concentrations of armor at Olpe on our right flank and it seemed for one night as though the 310th would take the rap. With all possible haste the units went from rapid pursuit into an all-out defensive position. Captain Hope's B Company, at the danger point, was ordered to "hold at all cost" while all available anti-tank forces were rushed to back him up. The following morning found the 310th still "holding" and 78th Division Headquarters asking why we weren't advancing faster. It seems the enemy threat had dissipated itself in another direction, but information hadn't reached the omit tense 310th.

So off again in pursuit we went, trying to keep pace with the wild riding 8th Division on our right flank. The entire action in the "Pocket" resembled beaters going though a forest flushing out game, and bagging it at the same time. If all units (the beaters) stayed abreast of each other the pressure was equal and the area was thoroughly combed. However, if one unit dropped behind, the hunted (88's and krauts) were flushed into its path by the leading elements on each flank. Thus a laggard battalion or regiment would be meeting increasing resistance and never be able to catch up.

Obviously, the answer was to get in the lead and stay there. This the Regimental Commander decided to do. The big danger in being ahead was one's exposed flanks where mobile German units, being flushed out by the units to our right and left rear, could slip in behind our assault elements and break up our lines of communication and supply. To preclude this possibility, a "protected corridor", already planned, was used. It was established on the 310th right flank by the right battalion and on the 310th left flank by the left battalion. As these battalions passed potentially dangerous approaches into our zone, they dropped off reinforced AT gun crews which set up defended road blocks. Lt. Carlson's Regimental Anti-Tank Company, coming along behind as rapidly as possible, would relieve the battalion guns for a similar mission further ahead, and take over the security with its own guns, or with the AA battery's Bofors. Then, as friendly units caught up on the right and left, these guns could leapfrog forward and do it all over again. This "protected corridor", as employed by Colonel Merritt E. Olmstead on Tennessee Manoeuvers, proved its worth in combat. Here our AT guns knocked out, and were knocked out by German tanks and Self-propelled 88s. Our rapidly advancing riflemen had secure flanks and the chow and ammunition reached them.

Delayed by the false-alarm counterattack, the 310th now had to get ahead or take a beating. From the sketch you will see that our zone had curved, giving us the long outside track on the turn. Now, on the straight away, we must take the lead.

On April 10, Major Pierce's slightly rested 3rd Battalion and attached armor was committed in the right (east) half of the regimental zone and told to go as far and catch as many Germans as possible. The 2nd Battalion was given the 78th Cavalry Reconnaissance Troop and sent up the left (west) half with Lt. Jones and Company F on tanks leading the way. The 1st Battalion was assembled as the reserve and was motorized. We now had the speed and were ready to take advantage of the breaks.

Before dark that night, Lt. Col. Bell's "Diploma Red" was rushed forward to assault and capture Eckenhagen. The following morning, they continued forward until they reached the high ground overlooking Bergneustadt and beheld a beautiful sight. The roads leading out of the far side of the city were jammed with retreating German soldiers and equipment. It was a field day for the artillery and Cannon Company FO's.

It was in Bergneustadt also that astonished front line doughboys turned to see two Major Generals looking over their shoulders. General Matthew Ridghay, our XVIII Airborne Corps Commander and General Parker, the "Lightning" Commander were in town. Here were German generals too, who looked good in our PW cage.

The 310th was doing all right, and was now even with the 311th on its left and the 8th Division's 28th and 121st Regiments which alternated on its right. With another unfavorable bend to the left in our zone coming up ("outside track") we had to take the lead now or lose our chance.

Before the city had been cleared of resistance by the 1st Battalion, the 2nd Battalion, with 78th Reconnaissance Troop, roared through on its way to secure a dam which threatened us, and the high ground beyond it. The plan was simple, but good. If the 2nd Battalion could clear out the route west of the lake, the 1st Battalion could be sneaked through that way in darkness and come out north of the lake. The 1st Battalion would then be in rear of the enemy which faced the dogtired 3rd Battalion.

The 2nd Battalion had to fight all night to do it, with many a "needle" from the worried regimental staff, but by daylight it was done! On April 12, the 310th, with the 1st and 2nd Battalions abreast, was leading the league, and continued to do so to the End. The 3rd Battalion continued on in its zone behind the 1st Bn. to scoop up a bewildered and surrounded enemy, and by noon was assembled in Regimental motorized reserve, tired but ready to go again. We caught 1200 prisoners in that day's operation alone.

April 12, which started so well, was indeed quite a day. The troops moved many weary miles. Remember, this was infantry advancing on foot, except for those few who could climb aboard a tank. Only the reserve could be motorized and that by robbing Service Company and our ever cooperative 903rd Field Artillery.

Officially, the 1st Battalion took Wupperfurth. Actually however, it was entered first several hours earlier by a small "task force". Lt. Col. Hayes and his body guard from the I & R Platoon were looking for a by-pass around some demolitions. They reached a German road block, removed it, and found themselves on the "objective". By suppertime, all three battalions were in or around the large town of Wupperfurth, which looked mighty good for dry billets. But it was not to be. Higher head-quarters ordered that the next town of Huckswagen be taken before daylight the 14th. Fortunately, plans had been made, and distributed already to accomplish this the following day. Now it only remained to do it at once, and in the dark.

The 2nd Battalion on the left got off to an amazingly fast start, using every possible type of transportation. Capt. Baden's rejuvenated E Company in the lead. Their battle cry was "Hot chow in the next town". The 3rd Battalion was rolling shortly after dark with Lt. Barzelay riding alread tank and smoking a big cigar. It was a rough operation for tired officers and men. Capt. Owens, one of the few remaining original company commanders, was evacuated that night, but fortunately returned to us later. By 0100 on the 14th the 3rd Battalion was able to report "Objective taken" and receive a "Well done" from the Division Commander.

At the end of a week of rapid fighting, a slow but steady attrition was resulting in a sizeable casualty list for the 310th Infantry.

On the morning of April 15th the 1st and 2nd Battalion were poised outside of the large industrial city of Lennep. As the troops entered the town resistance was replaced by white flags. Surrender was the order of the day. The Ruhr Pocket campaign was almost over.

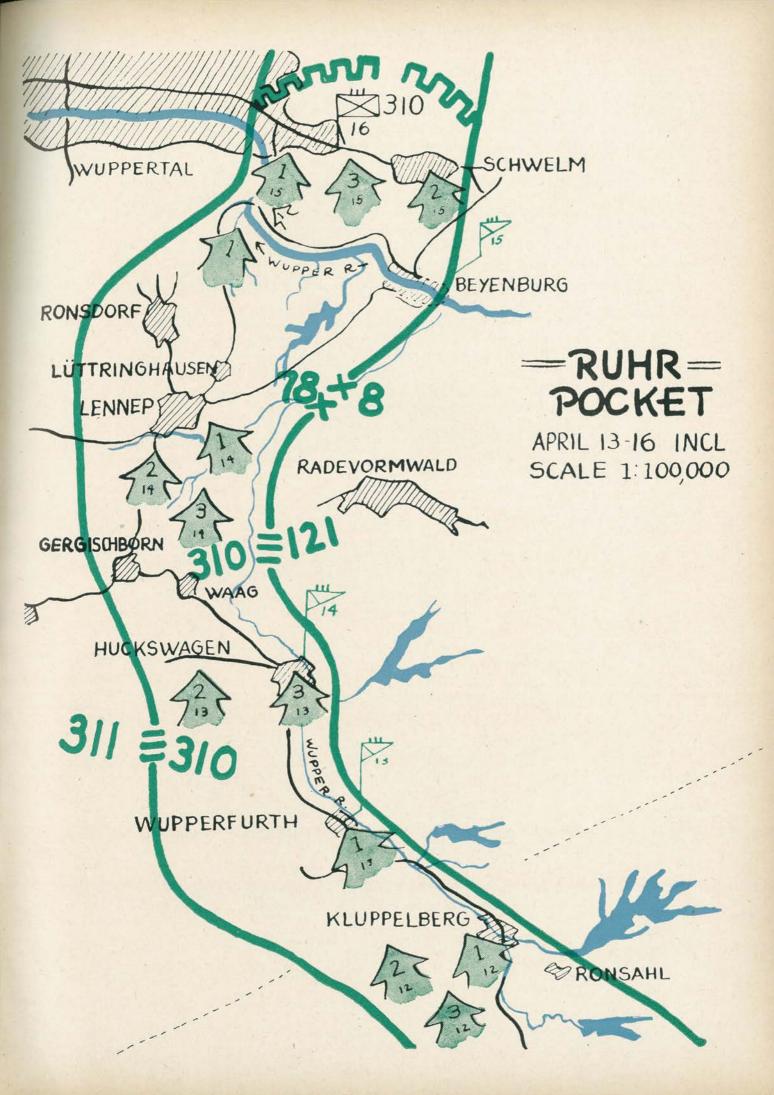

The last action was an interesting one. The 1st and 2nd Battalion advanced towards Wuppertal along roughly parallel but widely separated roads. The 2nd Battalion was motorized in Regimental Reserve for the kill. The big question was which, if either, of the two bridges across the Wupper River were still standing. We could not get this information from the Air Corps. The 3rd Battalion reached the Wupper River first and found their bridge, the east one, blown. Like good doughboys they crossed anyway without their vehicles, and turned west to try to seize the bridge in front of the 1st Battalion. The men of Co. B, 303rd Engineers fixed a ford and the 2nd crossed without delay and moved into Schwelm. I Company secured the other bridge for the 1st Battalion which was having hard going. From the west bridge the Regimental Commander voice-radioed the 1st Battalion, telling them to "Come on in". He was on their objective!

By nightfall of the 15th all three Battalions had crossed the Wupper River and had entered the metropolitan area of Wuppertal. From a distance and from close up Wuppertal could be seen as a vast area of almost complete destruction. The Air Corps had been a frequent visitor to this place.

The next day the Regiment occupied the eastern third of Wuppertal, which had surrendered without a fight. The 310th welcomed the other Regiments as they pushed into Wuppertal. It was the last long race and "Diploma" had broken the tape.

Moving into Wuppertal was indeed a rest and a pleasure for the tired doughboys of the 310th Infantry. After all, nine days of marching and shooting is a long time. In Wuppertal there seemed to be plenty of wine too, and best of all there were exciting rumors about the end of the war. It was known that great forces of Germans in the pocket were surrendering in mass. The pocket was KAPUT!

The 50 mile advance in the face of the enemy had been a wearisome journey indeed. Some of the men were practically walking in their sleep. But the operation had gone extremely well. Everyone was well satisfied. For one thing communications, control and coordination were excellent considering the over extended front. This is always a first priority from a tactical standpoint. Another thing, the men had eaten regularly, a luxury seldom maintained during the past through a fast moving situation such as this one. It was hot chow too, more than half the time.

And most impressive of all, the casualties were light and the gains were enormous. The prisoners for this Regiment in nine days numbered over 16,000. There's every reason to say that the 310th was a smoothly and efficiently operating machine from every standpoint when the war ended. At this point two familiar figures changed places. Lt. Col. Harry Lutz, our second in command, returned from the hospital where he had recovered from his leg wound received near Kalenborn. Lt. Col. Hayes, the Regimental Commander, left for the hospital for an operation on a leg injury. The Regimental Commander had been hobbling along on his cane during four months of combat. Now was the time to get it fixed. Lt. Col. Lutz commanded the Regiment until the return of the Colonel, now full Colonel, Hayes.

The dominant question was still unanswered. "When will it all end?" Were more men yet to die asking that same question? For the men of the 310th the Ruhr Pocket was to be the last battle even though no one realized it at the time. It was the end of 120 days of continuous gory battle. By now Germany had been split into two more great pockets, north Germany and south Germany.

CHAPTER TEN

"MY KINGDOM FOR A PASS" OR

"I STARTED OUT WITH A FIST FULL OF DOUGH"

Its primarily an old army institution, and if you were to ask any GI, he'd say its the only one with any sense to it. Funny to hear any doughboy say there ought to be more of something in the army and not think of chow. Its true enough, and with real justification.

You'll never forget the first week or so of quarantine, when only the old timers or cadre shined their shoes with a little extra vigor and worried if their pants were pressed. You'd see them rush to the orderly room and dash out waving a small piece of paper, yelling as they raced down the street "C'mon, Jeez, you wanna miss the bus!"

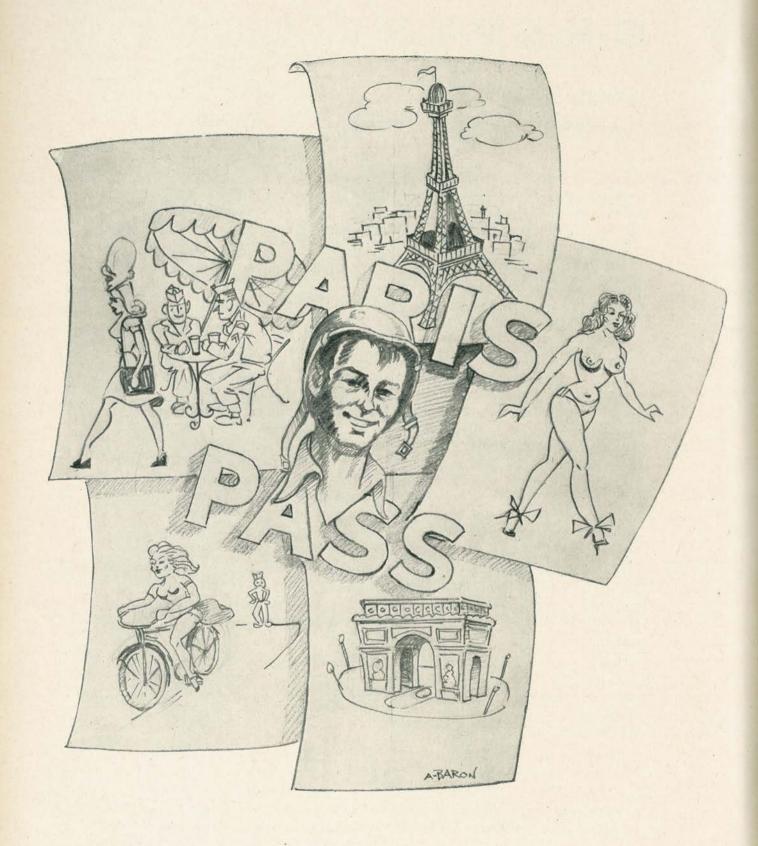

That generally was the first seed that was to flower into an irresistible urge. And then, the next few weeks you'd be sweating out the pass list and wondering when the top kick would get around to realizing you also lived or wanted to live on Saturday afternoon and Sunday. After all, you can't shoot dice in the barracks all the time! Finally it came your turn and you'd ask every guy in the platoon if your tie was knotted okay, if your cap was just a finger over the right eye, and if they really asked you the general orders before they gave you that pass. Then you'd be eagerly eyeing the old man and wondering why it took him so long to sign that little slip, meanwhile swearing at the bus line that grew longer by the minute. Finally, it would be yours and you and your buddies would be off.

Maybe it'd be a jerkwater town, with only a handful of people and with ten times that many Joes. But there'd be beer, a hangout your company generally called its own, a hamburger, or even a steak, a town movie, the roller skating rink, the USO, or if you were lucky, a shapely ankle and an upturned nose.

You might even remember how you'd line the town's main street at five yard intervals, wait for the brass to come along and see if you couldn't wear out their right arm. Maybe there was nothing better to do. Yeah, you'd come back and even lie a little to get the other guys all hepped up and then wait for your next pass.

Furloughs worked the same way, only there you knew you were headed home. The old timers will still tell you the 78th was a helluva good outfit when it came to furloughs.

You kissed Broadway and Dempsey's Corner goodby, you got on that gangplank and you began to wonder when you'd be free again. Or if you couldn't be completely free, when and where you'd have your next chance to let off steam, and see things too.

Well, the outfit hit that beautiful summer resort, Bournemouth, England, and it was bleak. You made friends and you learned that London was only 90 miles away. Oh, to see London! And as if in answer to a prayer, the 78th came across again. Passes to the big city, even during those days when training took on a more respectable appearance. Train facilities were bad, quotas were limited, but a good number of us did manage a lasting impression of the bombed out center, the overabundance of uniforms and Picadilly Circus. You've heard of Picadilly commandoes, haven't you? Boy, what tactics. The tales that were told laid the foundations for anticipation of what more can Paris offer and could it be more expensive. Too bad our schedule was moved up. Our departure put an abrupt end to a full visit by everyone.

It was a good sign though, a straw in the wind. We would get away wherever and whenever possible.

Proof of that wasn't long in coming. Billeted as we were in the hay lofts of Belgium, getting acclimated to the ooze of mud, those  $2\frac{1}{2}$  ton trucks suddenly were filled with GIs and their weapons for a three mile trip. It wasn't much but it was ice cream in Tongeren, not the ice cream that Horton made famous, but it was frozen and you ate it with a spoon. To hell with the buzz bombs roaring overhead. Besides, the motors always kept running, carrying the buzz bombs westward. One day, one motor did stop, and—what a scramble!

The front lines were only 20 miles away, but Maastricht, Holland was ten. How about it? Sure! So on Saturday afternoon and every afternoon for the following week the trucks made their way there. Remember how you had to carry your loaded weapon, a canteen of water, and, if you were smart, a K ration or at least a "D" bar. The blown bridges, the winding streets, the movie with English titles, the blacked out streets, the amazing number of Dutch people that had a basic knowledge of English, all are indelibly impressed in our minds. Maybe you even eagerly sought the companionship of a GI with a different patch and listened to him tell you he'd just come from the front a couple of hours ago. He talked like a big shot, and you listened with all ears. Maybe you only went there to take a shower. You went, though, and forgot the mud, even if it was for just a couple of hours. Many a pair of wooden sohes now decorating your mantlepieces will remind you.

We moved on and got into the serious business of war. Stars and Stripes was feeding us the stuff that goes to describe Paris and we digested it well. Boy, our time will come and indeed it did.

Paris, ah Paris! When it comes to Paris, you encounter a certain way of life not easily forgotten. It's the kind of life that affords one a tremendous time; that is, it does if you have a great pile of money and extra superior physical stamina.

Now, when you go to Paris, you don't absolutely have to be a fool to get along, but it generally helps. The first requirement, of course, is to ditch that German lingo of "Kommen Sie her, Fräulein". That kraut stuff just doesn't go over so hot. The best thing to do is learn French and quickly. Enlist in the merci beaucoup school. Comment allez vous? Oui compre! It isn't difficult, not the way we do it.

If that fails, there's nothing but the international language left, you know, signs and hands and stuff.

And say, those French ladies are something. There's all kinds. There's big ones, little ones, fat ones, lean ones, but they're all flashy and they all have a terrific monstrosity of a hat, pertly perched on their heads. That head, incidentally, may carry gorgeous, flowing, or crazy stacks of hair of red, black, blond, blue, orange, or rainbow color—they're all so strictly strictly—how can we ever go back to the farm!

These ladies know the ropes too. And its hard to beat the inflation, don't think it isn't. When champagne costs as much as $20 a bottle, you've gotta know the ropes. The black market is a great equalizer though, i. e., it is if you've got anything to sell. But who would stoop so low, besides its against the law, and we need our cigarettes for other purposes, don't we?

The Foliers Bergère is a place everybody goes. The show is great, its packed every night with people in soldier suits. The soldiers express themselves in all kinds of ways. A lone Frenchman here and there is lost in a teeming wave of hooting, howling, whistling characters. The show, oh sure, its definitely refined. And its art, it is. What Mademoiselle Zoro hasn't got, nobody needs, and its well distributed too! And long will we reminisce smugly about the "girls of the follies", to the scandalizations of poor mothers and the dark suspicions of patient wives.

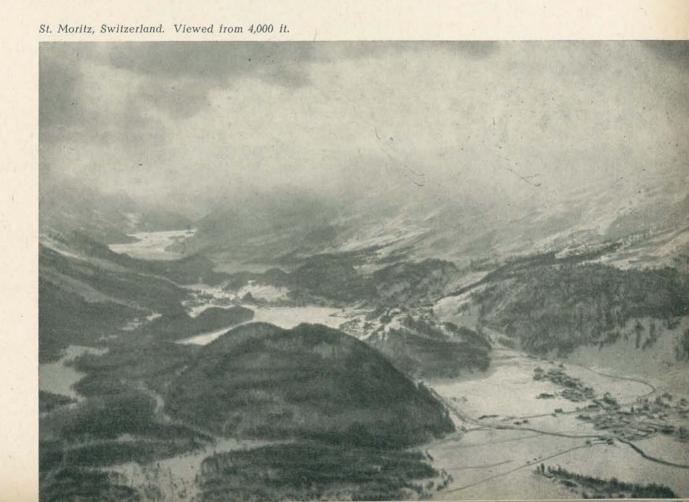

There is a place called Pigalle. It's dubbed Pig Alley by Americans. It's in the ancient Montmartre sector, in the shadows of the beautiful Sacre-Coeur Cathedral. Pig Alley has beaucoup night life though, sporting the infamous Bal Tabarin, home of the original can-can. Also, there's lots of girls ambling around, not demanding any formal introduction of any kind for socializing purposes.

In Paris, the camera bugs go utterly wild, you never saw anything like it. In three days time, they find it somewhat difficult to photograph everything in the world's center of ancient and modern western culture. There, the Eiffel Tower, the Cathedral of Notre Dame, the Les Invalides, the Louvre, the wonders of Versailles, and all wanting for the camera to click. If it's action shots you want, do try the Champs Elysées, whit its balloon-skirted bike-riding Mademoiselles! They'll swap you exposure for exposure!

With us, as with our fathers in the last war, the phrases of "C'est la guerre" explains any and all shortcomings of the city. But Paris is truly a grand place to visit. Soldiers on leave from the war fronts consider it heavenly.

In addition to Paris, there were other leave or rest centers, as they are called. There was Vervières, Spa, Huy, Liege and Brussels in Belgium. The boys always had a tremendous time in Brussels.

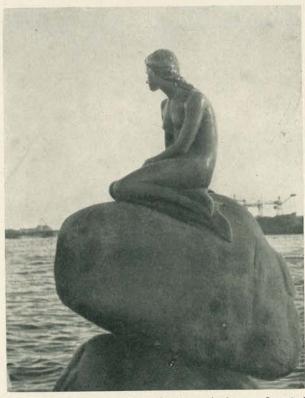

The real vacation lands were the Riviera and Switzerland. The Riviera consists mainly of four localities. There is aristocratic Cannes, with its beautiful harbor and white sandy beach and its Promenade de la Croisette. Then, there is ancient Antiber, conveniently located about midway between Nice and Cannes. Its a gorgeous place. Grasse is another rest area of great fame, best known for its perfume. Lastly and best known to the visiting Americans was Nice. The favorite "Spazieren" grounds at Nice curve along the water front for four miles, affording an unforgettable view of the sea and mountains.

Switzerland became the latest addition to the leave centers. Situated in the lofty Alps, Switzerland is truly a tourist's dream.

A trip back to England has always been possible for a few fortunate and deserving souls. Some men have enjoyed going back to Bournemouth, indicating perhaps that some very worthwhile contacts were made there last November during our brief stay. A few have gone to Scotland and Wales. Still fewer have visited their ancestral home in Ireland. A United Kingdom pass was good for a lengthy trip anywhere in Great Britain.

The army pass quotas have been anything but meager, considering the magnitude of the task of setting up and maintaining the rest centers. By V-E Day, better than 5,000 worthwhile passes had been given within the regiment. Practically everyone had one or more pleasant vacations somewhere. If something went wrong and you were slighted, there was always the B-Bag and the Chaplain to unburden your grief upon.

CONCLUSION

ARMY OF OCCUPATION

And so the war in Europe ended. Wuppertal was the last objective for the 310th Infantry in World War II. There were yet to be other journeys and other missions in Germany, but no more fighting, no more deadly attrition. It was a pleasant thought to look about you and know that your present friends and acquaintances would be around for a while. It was pleasant for one to realize that he was still here, that he had survived the "turnover".

The collapse of organized resistance did not necessarily mean that all troublesome Germans were out of the way. Many units, including the 310th Infantry, were soon given the mission of occupying and searching out certain large areas for pockets of resistance and fanatical diehard Nazi groups and individuals. Some of these people were "set in their ways" and they constituted a source of danger to our communications and supply efforts throughout Germany.

As time went on, various divisions and organizations were definitely earmarked as "Army of Occupation", but during May and June most units carried out occupation duties. The big thing at first was to restore order among the civilians. DP's (Displaced Persons) were running wild. The Germans were confused and panickly. It was necessary to make exhaustive searches for hidden weapons and ammunition. The towns and villages were raided, houses and barns were combed, and all civilians were carefully screened and identified. Many amusing incidents occurred. The Germains were particularly adept at lying about each other. No one had ever been a Nazi, of course.

Combat troops such as ourselves carried out the occupation activities in conjunction with the American Military Government detachments. Our main job was general security. The AMG was responsible for a number of immediate and long range objectives.

As the Germans were soon to realize, one of the main objectives was the complete denazification of German social life. This turned out to be a complicated undertaking. Along with this, the AMG had the particularly difficult job of reestablishing the economic processes within the local communities. Such things as the ration system, labor services, public utilities, transportation, etc., had to be set into motion again without the aid of Nazi personalities. At the same time, a speedy and complete roundup of war criminals was imperative, and a general demilitarization of all German industry was required. There were other loftier aims of the occupation, but the security troops had contact with only the activities that affected the ordinary German civilians in their day to day struggle to dig themselves out of the wreckage of the war.

History 9*

Wolfhagen, Germany Such villages were "home" for the occupation troops.

The Regiment's first occupation territory, beginning April 18, was a long way from Wuppertal, and everyone agreed that Wuppertal was a swell places to be a good long ways from. The bomb desolation was ghastly. By motor, the 310th Infantry went south to the vicinity of a small village called Dierdorf, near Coblenz. After about a week in this area, the Regiment was ordered to move again, to the vicinity of Bad Wildungen, and Wolfhagen, an area not far from Kassel.

Billeted in small villages throughout the Kassel area, the troops were destined to play the role of conquerors and occupiers for quite a while. Here, the Regiment found itself confronted with a dual mission. For one thing, there was a considerable security mission, including many raids, road patrols, and guard duty. But in addition, there was an earnest tactical training program in anticipation of the eventual employment of the Regiment in Pacific War.

During this time, the army clarified the status of the 78th Division by stating that it was to be included in the Category II grouping, scheduled for redeployment to the Pacific. It was later learned that the shipping date for the Division was rather distant and most men held the hope and belief that the Regiment would never see the Pacific Theater. Indeed, one war was enough for most of us.

The capitulation of the Japanese came as a delightful surprise. "Now maybe we can all go home" was the unanimous cry. At least V-J Day brought less strenuous work-days. Weighty issues such as "non-fraternization" took the spotlight. There was lots of baseball and good competitive spirit in all sports. Many energetic souls tried to get some book learning from the Army Education Program. Everyone learned about the limitations of German rural life. And about this time the famous "points system" of demobilization became "Topic A".

During July and August, men with sufficiently high point scores (based on service, family and combat credits) began leaving the Regiment. These men were transferred to organizations slated for departure to the States, and in their places the Regiment receited low point men from other units. This process continued throughout 1945 resulting in a 60% change in personnel throughout the Regiment by November 1st.

In the meantime, the 78th Division was placed in the Category I classification (Occupation) and designated as the unit to replace the 82nd Airborne Division at the focal point of Europe-BERLIN. The Regiment accomplished the move and was set up for business in Berlin by November 16th. Life in the German Capital was found to have its advantages.

The 310th Infantry took over the guard and security mission in the central portion of the city where the U.S., British, and Russian Zones joined. The districts of Schöneberg, Tempelhof, Kreuzberg and Neukölln were our responsibility. Although the once beautiful city was in partial ruins all the problems of a metropolis were there, multiplied by cold, hunger and lawlessness. 850,000 civilians were there, subsisting somehow.

The guard posts included railroad stations, food and supply dumps, public utilities, and military installations. Continuous patrols roamed the streets in armored cars, jeeps, and on foot. Alert squads, platoons and companies stood by to move promptly by motor to the scene of any disturbance or riot. Other duties were primarily ceremonial in nature as our showy Kleist Park Guard at the Allied Control Council Building where the bearers of such famous names as Eisenhower, Montgomery, and Zukhov.

The accent was on discipline and "spit and polish" for the 310th doughboys of whom many were new men. They to set the standard and compare favorably in appearance and behaviour with their close neighbors the selected troops of our victorious Allies. An educational, training, and athletic program filled out the rest of the work day; "bankers hours" 0900—1200 and 1330—1600.

From the entertainment standpoint Berlin was indeed in contrast with rustic hamlets of the Kassel area. Large and modern theaters were popular and new movies, plays, concerts, and even operas available.

The great Olympic Stadium was nearby where the "Lightning Bolts" hammered out a victory for third place in the Seventh Army football league. Night clubs were every where and the best in town were reserved for the exclusive use of the 310th G.I.'s, and their dates. For the more quiet evening, platoon and company dayrooms, and elaborate Red Cross clubs were at hand. Berlin seemed a good place to end ones tour of duty in the ETO.

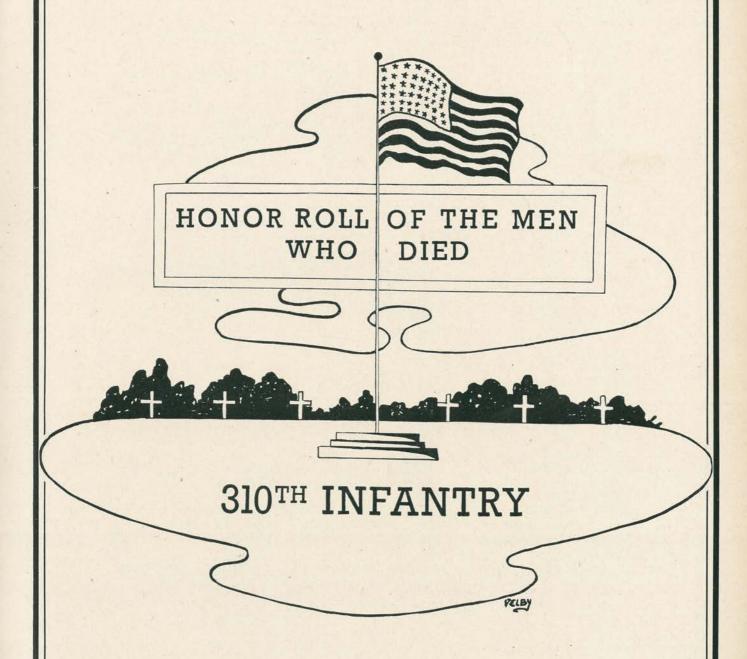

On this note let us close the History of the 310th Infantry for World War II. 1946 is upon us and finds our life not without incident, but with the situation definitely under control.

HEADQUARTERS 78TH INFANTRY DIVISION APO 78, U.S. Army

GENERAL ORDERS) NUMBER 513) 12 October 1945

UNIT CITATION

Under the provisions of Section IV, War Department Circular Number 333, dated 22 December 1943, as amended, the First Battalion 310th Infantry Regiment, is cited for outstanding performance of duty in action against the enemy during the period from 2 March 1945 to 10 March 1945.

On 2 March 1945 and 3 March 1945 the battalion, attached to Combat Command B of the 9th Armored Division, crossed 2000 yards of flat terrain which was raked by intense machine gun, artillery, mortar and 20 mm fire and defended by a well deployed and entrenched enemy. I then fought across the waist-deep Erft Canal and against stiff opposition secured the town of Weilerwist which lay astride the Euskirchen-Cologne railway. This forced the first gap in the Erft Canal defense line, provided an eastward route for armor, facilitated the capture of Euskirchen, and inflicted heavy material losses on the enemy in addition to personnel casulties totalling 186. From 4 March through 7 March, the troops, which had been without sleep for 72 hours in the Weilerwist attack captured or assisted in the capture of 13 towns: Wuscheim, Luftelberg, Helzem, Gross-Bullesheim, Klein-Bullesheim, Miel, Morenhaven, Flerzheim, Villip, Gimmersdorf, Liessem, Ober-Bachem and Nieder-Bachem. On 8 March at 0400, less than 12 hours after the capture of the Ludendorff Bridge, the battalion crossed the Rhine and immediately attacked to the south, the first troops of an Infantry Division to set foot on the bridgehead. After capturing an enemy demolition patrol within 150 yards of the bridge with sufficient explosives to destroy the bridge and overcoming registance along the river bank, the battalion secured Kasbach, Ockenfels and Linz. On the night of 8 March and during 9 March 1945 the widely deployed troops with less than 14 hours sleep in nine days remained continuously alert for an anticipated large scale enemy counterattack. On 10 March, against fanatical resistance by SS Troops and paratroopers and under unusually severe small arms and automatic weapons fire the battalion captured Dattenberg and the high ground to the north. In Dattenberg, Germany on 10 March 1945, 85 casualties were inflicted and 162 prisoners were taken as well as valuable enemy equipment. The extraordinary heroism, endurance and aggressiveness demonstrated by the First Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment in accomplishing difficult and important missions during this period are in keeping with the highest military traditions.

HEADQUARTERS 78TH INFANTRY DIVISION APO 78, U.S. Army

GENERAL ORDERS) NUMBER 333) 8 July 1945

UNIT CITATION

Under the provisions of Section IV, War Department Circular Number 333, dated 22 December 1943, as amended, the Third Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment, is cited for outstanding performance of duty in action against the enemy during the period 1 March 1945 to 15 March 1945.

The battalion, attached to Combat Command A of the 9th Armored Division, crossed the Roer River in the early morning of 2 March 1945 and marched nine miles to capture Langendorf and the strongly defended Wollersheim woods. The following day it attacked and captured, against strong enemy resistance, the towns of Merzenich, Sinzenich and Florin. On 4 March 1945, after a gruelling five mile advance through deep mud under continual artillery and small arms fire, the battalion captured Euskirchen, key road, rail, supply and communications center for the German forces west of the Rhine. By midnight advance elements, two miles forward of friendly troops on the left and four miles forward of friendly troops on the right, made possible the crossing of the Erft Canal, east of the city, the following morning. On 5 March 1945, without having had any rest, one company, against determined, skillful opposition, battled across the Erft Canal and secured Roitzheim, south of Euskirchen, after a twelvehour battle. A route over which supporting armor could negotiate the Erft Canal was secured, 165 prisoners captured and a number of the enemy killed. On 7 March the battalion captured Bad Neuenahr, secured four bridges and crossed the Ahr River on 8 March, taking the high ground to the south, which controlled the main supply route to the newly-won Remagen bridgehead. After marching all night, the battalion crossed the Remagen bridge under heavy artillery fire on 10 March. That afternoon, it advanced through withering artillery fire and air strafing and bombing to secure high ground south of Kretzhaus. This high ground overlooked the Remagen bridge and the area for miles around. Though it was necessary to scale nearly verticale cliffs in the face of direct fire from enemy positions at the summit, the battalion accomplished its mission with complete success. This salient was held for three days before friendly troops closed in on the flanks. During this time, a strong enemy counterattack toward the Ludendorff Bridge was repulsed. On 15 March 1945 the battalion, with greatly reduced strength and against the most determined resistance, secured Kretzhaus and the Kallenborn road junction which controlled eight roads and a railway line and which represented the 1st enemy strongpoint covering the Remagen bridge. The exemplary courage, aggressive spirit, and devotion to duty shown by the members of the Third Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment in attaining difficult and important objectives against determined enemy resistance during this period are in accordance with the highest traditions of the military service.

HEADQUARTERS NINTH ARMORED DIVISION

Office of the Commanding General APO 259, U.S. Army

17 March 1945

GNWHG

SUBJECT: Commendation.

TO

Commanding Officer, 310th Infantry Regiment, 78th Infantry Division, APO 78, U.S. Army. (THRU: Commanding General, III Corps, APO 2023, U.S. Army.)

APO 303, U.S. Army.)

I wish to commend the officers and men of the 310th Infantry Regiment, 78th Infantry Division, for the outstanding manner in which they participated in the advance of the 9th Armored Division across that part of Germany between the Roer and Rhine Rivers and subsequent seizure intact of the Ludendorff Bridge which spans the Rhine River from Remagen to Erpel.

Combat Command "A", with the 3rd Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment attached as of 011830A March 1945, and with the entire regiment minus the 1st Battalion attached as of 032400A, advanced in the southern part of the division zone, capturing Wollersheim, Euskirchen, Rheinbach, Bad Neuenahr and three bridges across the Ahr River.

Combat Command "B" with the 1st Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment attached as of 011600A March 1945 advanced east in zone and swung southeast at Berkum to Remagen where the Ludendorff Bridge was captured and a crossing of the Rhine secured for the Allied forces.

Throughout this entire operation, the courage, energy and resourcefulness of the officers and men of the 310th Infantry Regiment has been exemplary. Assigned missions were accomplished with precision and speed and all ranks displayed a willingness and determination which made this splendid achievement possible.

Lt. Col. Hayes and his staff by their eager and cheerful cooperation assisted materially in the rapidity of our movement.

TO: Commanding Officer, Second Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment, 78th Infantry Division, APO 78, U. S. Army. (Thru Channels.)

1. I wish to commend the officers and men of the Second Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment for the energy, resourcefulness and determination with which they pressed the attack, during the drive of Combat Command "A", Ninth Armored Division to the Ahr River. This Battalion was attached to the Combat Command in the vicinity of Frauenberg, Germany, 5 March 1945. It launched an attack from Euskirchen to Rheinbach, a distance of nine miles, securing the objective in 24 hours. Willing cooperation and admirable courage was displayed throughout by all ranks.

2. You and your officers and men are hereby highly commended for the accomplishment of all missions in a superior manner.

THOMAS L. HARROLD, Colonel, Infantry, Commanding.

To : Commanding Officer, 310th Infantry.

Thru Commanding General, 78th Inf. Div., APO 78.

1. It is desired to express my appreciation for the fine and loyal support rendered by the 310th Infantry while attached to the 9th Infantry Division during the initial bridgehead operations. The regiment acted as a member of the divisional team as if it had always played that part.

2. It is particularly desired to emphasize the fine combat work of the 3rd Battalion. It was engaged at one of the most hotly contested area encountered and its participation at 150530 March to secure the vital road junction vicinity 699245 finally cracked the last determined stand of the Germans near the observation line closest to the bridge. This is a fighting organization and is a real credit to itself and to any organization that it teams with.

TO: Commanding Officer, Third Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment, 78th Infantry Division, APO 78, U.S. Army (Thru Channels).

1. I wish to commend the officers and men of the Third Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment for the outstanding manner in which they participated in the Combat Command drive which culminated on seizure of the crossing over the Ahr River. On 1 March 1945 this battalion was attached to Combat Command "A" in the vicinity of Berg, Germany. During the succeeding seven days the battalion seized all objectives assigned to it, pressing the attack both day and night. The success of this battalion was due to the courage, unrelenting effort, and determination of all ranks.

2. The Third Battalion, 310th Infantry Regiment contributed materially in the success of the Combat Command drive to the Ahr River. I congratulate Lieutenant Colonel Harry Lutz and all his officers and men for the accomplishment of a difficult mission in a superior manner.
