

Journal of Backcountry Studies
Vol.2 No. 2

EDITOR'S NOTE

Scholarly articles and book reviews are the principle ingredients of the JBS. Periodically, we offer other materials to our readers. In 2007 we inaugurated "Book Chapters and Progress" to make available chapters from forthcoming books on the backcountry. With this issue, we begin three more special features. Historiographical Conversations about the Backcountry will amplify our reviews of new books through thematic essays ranging back over the past two decades. The first of these essays, by Professor Lynn Nelson of Middle Tennessee State University, is about politics. Valuable material on the backcountry appears in family and local histories, some of it preserved in libraries or private collections and some in privately printed books. Michael Moore, professor emeritus of History at Bowling Green University, presents in this issue a chapter from his own family history, "The Moores of Route 23." Finally, Backcountry history is closely bound up with Public History. Kendall Edwards (MA in Public History, UNCG, 2007) provides the first JBS report, "Presenting Backcountry History to the Public."
