Abstract: This thesis analyzes the authorship of Supreme Court opinions and the theory that Justices on that Court might be delegating portions, if not the majority, of opinion authorship to their clerks. I test the theories that as Justices age they are more likely to delegate, and that delegation has increased across all justices over the past several decades of the Court's history. I employ a content analysis method known as stylometry to assign authorship attributions on a case by case basis and use those attributions to inform larger trends regarding authorship. I ultimately find that there is little evidence to support the age or time-period theories but that there is significant variation across Justices in attribution, indicating that clerks are likely playing a large and measurable role in opinion drafting.

1. Introduction

The United States Supreme Court is a unique institution both nationally and internationally. The President of the United States and the Vice President are elected by popular vote. Each of their cabinet ministers must be confirmed by the Senate. The Senate itself is directly elected, as is the House of Representatives. Every federal district judge, circuit judge, and Supreme Court Justice requires a confirmation hearing. If we do not like the person that our senator confirmed, we can vote out the senator. Every four years we get to do the same to the president who appointed them. This bare minimum of democracy is what the average American can expect. Each of the staffers in the top positions of the federal government is at most one degree of separation away from an elected official. That is except for one key position in the Judiciary: the Supreme Court clerk.

Every Justice may hire up to four clerks, five for the Chief Justice, and may select those clerks however he or she chooses. The Federal government then pays their salary but has no direct control or even oversight over their actions (28 U.S. Code § 671 1972). This lack of direct control is true of all clerks across all courts. So too is the secrecy with which clerks and Justices conduct themselves shared across the country between clerks and judges at all levels. The exception is the Supreme Court's extraordinary role in interpreting our Constitution. Supreme Court Justices have long hinted at the role that clerks play in assisting them with these interpretations (Tushnet 1991; Rehnquist 2002; Woodward and Armstrong 2005), but the lack of information flowing from the Court has made a definitive analysis of this role all but impossible until now.

I use the content analysis method called stylometry to determine, on a case-by-case basis, the extent to which Supreme Court clerks are being allowed to draft opinions. This method has been employed in fields as diverse as classic English literature (Burrows 1987; Ledger and Merriam 1998) to foundational American politics (Mosteller and Wallace 1963) to modern Spanish texts (Tuzzi and Cortelazzo 2018). The legal community has only just begun to accept this method of authorship attribution, but it has made great strides in the past decade (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a; Li et al. 2013; Bodwin, Rosenthal, and Yoon 2013). I pair this method with a corpus of over 3,000 opinions spanning the years 1965-1995, as well as the non-opinion writings of 19 Justices serving during that time period and over 10,000 articles from their clerks. I use this combination to investigate the effect that Justice age and year of authorship have on attribution.

Based on the results of a methods test I ran over the course of the experiment, I determined that substantial attribution at a certain indication threshold. Based on that attribution threshold, my results indicate that neither Justice age nor year have an observable effect on clerk authorship attribution. There are, however, notable differences across Justice behaviors. Career attribution averages in favor of Justice authorship range from a minimum of 0% of all cases to a high of 58.13%. This degree of separation lends credence to the theory that each Justice has a unique way of running his or her own office that affects the level of delegation that they are willing to apply to their clerks.

The second section will lay out the literature behind this exploration. Roughly the first half of this literature is devoted to the study of the Court and its clerks. The second half is focused on the history of stylometry and its many applications to problems not unlike this one. The third section deals with our data and how we collected and processed it. The fourth section lays out our methods, including the parameters we chose to analyze our data and the particular algorithms we used to calculate our final values. The fifth section outlines our results and helps the reader to understand what our findings entail. The sixth section discusses those results and draws conclusions about both the method's applicability and the clerk's behavior. The seventh and final section outlines further work that might be done along these lines and what next steps could be taken in exploring the Court.

2. Literature Review

2.1 What Influences Opinions

The Supreme Court is the highest court in the American judicial branch, and as such, there has always been scholarly interest in how its opinions are written. This interest has taken a variety of forms, each dealing with a different party or government branch interested in the outcome of Supreme Court cases. Many focus on the Court's relationship with the executive branch, especially as the White House watches opinion content to determine what kind of Supreme Court Justice it might need to protect its interests when seats become available (Nemacheck 2007). Some analyses are written by those who have spent time within the Court's chambers themselves and offer a rare glimpse into an otherwise secretive process (Lazarus 1997; Rehnquist 2002). Almost all scholars examining Supreme Court opinions, however, see the opinion writing process as something closely guarded in its complexity. This shroud of complexity forces them to devote long hours to finding a method to somehow "pierce the veil" (Woodward and Armstrong 2005; Toobin 2008). Altogether, it is clear that the opinion writing process is both worth studying and hard for researchers to reliably access.

The opinion drafting process for each Justice is unique but tends to follow a general pattern. A case reaches the Court in most cases on a writ of certiorari from a lower court. Then clerks review these petitions, of which there are thousands each term ("The Justices' Caseload - Supreme Court of the United States.", n.d.). This is the first step in the process where clerks have a chance to influence the Court's output by suggesting to their Justice that certain cases be left aside while others are taken up (Purdum 1985). Once the case has been accepted for hearing and briefed and oral arguments have been heard, the Justices meet on the Friday of that week and hold a preliminary vote. This vote determines which side of the case has a majority.

If the Chief Justice is a part of that majority, he will assign the author of the opinion. If he is not, the most senior Justice in the majority will assign the opinion. In either case, the assigned Justice then drafts an opinion for circulation. This is the second stage at which clerks might have a significant chance to influence output and the stage that I am interested in here. There is speculation that some Justices may be allowing their clerks to write entire rough drafts of opinions, which they may only lightly edit before publication (The New York Times 1958; Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Sigelman 2002; Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a; Peppers 2006; McLaughlin 1990; Kromphardt 2015). In fact, Justice Rehnquist almost seems to admit that the revisions that Justices do make can sometimes be quite limited in his 2004 book The Supreme Court. He writes “the drafts I get during the first part of the term from the clerks require more revision and editing than the ones later in the term” (Rehnquist 2002, 261). Once a Justice is satisfied with their draft opinion, they circulate it to the other Justices for a final review. They then hold one final vote to confirm the opinion as that of the Court and the opinion is published.

Court scholars recognize that opinions are complex documents and, no matter who writes them, their content is influenced by many sources. I explore a few of these sources here to illustrate the complexity of the problem before me. Justices draw language from many legal documents that range from papers older than the US itself (Corley, Howard, and Nixon 2005), to contemporary scholarly articles (Corley 2008), to lower court rulings in the case at hand (Corley, Collins, and Calvin 2011). Scholars have also identified Justice ideology as a key factor in determining the content of opinions, not only the Justice’s personal ideology but also that of their colleagues, since they ultimately have to receive a majority approval (Carrubba et al. 2012). Other factors have also been theorized and tested over the years, but still require more testing, such as the role that public opinion plays in shaping opinion content (McGuire & Stimson 2004). I explore each of these potential influences in order to demonstrate the complex network of influences affecting the opinion writing process.

As the chief interpreters of the Constitution, Justices often turn to original source material from when the Constitution was drafted to clarify vague clauses. A significant portion of the content of Supreme Court opinions can be attributed to the sources referenced within the opinion itself, so which documents they choose can have a large impact on opinion content (Corley, Collins, and Calvin 2011). There is perhaps no more complete set of writings that were present at the time of the framing regarding the Constitution than The Federalist Papers. These were written by framers James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay in support of the Constitution's ratification in New York. For this reason, many opinions include operative phrases from these papers.

When an issue before the court is more modern, justices often rely on more contemporary documents. One such set of documents are amicus curiae or friend-of-the-court briefs that are often filed in cases heard by the U.S. Supreme Court. Interested parties with a stake in the Court's ruling, such as think tanks or politicians, often file amicus briefs. These briefs play a part in providing content to opinions, as they are often a convenient distillation of relevant precedent. The complexity of Supreme Court cases makes the convenience of these ready-made distillations key and Justices are more likely to include phrases first used in briefs in their final opinions (Corley, 2008). This development could be cause for concern, as briefs may contain language less nuanced than one expects from a Supreme Court opinion. In fact, some have recently called into question the accuracy of some of the “facts” provided in these amicus briefs. At the very least, they point out that the sources of these briefs are lacking in an active filter and have the potential to introduce false assumptions to opinions (Larsen 2014) The aim of a Supreme Court ruling is to provide legal precedent from the justices themselves, not from the organizations providing them with briefs.

Scholars also point to the influence that the wording of lower court’s rulings can have on the eventual wording and content of opinions. The Supreme Court is rarely the court of origin for its many cases, and, at times, a case will pass through three or more courts before it reaches the high court. The justices, in upholding or reversing these previous rulings, will often adapt language originally found in said rulings (Corley, Collins, and Calvin 2011). In doing so, justices not only respond directly to the ruling they have decided to review, but they also aid in the interpretation that lower courts must undertake when using the opinion as precedent. These lower court justices can readily see why an opinion was either correct or incorrect in a lower court by noting the phrases used in both documents and the context in which they are used. This eases the burden on the Supreme Court by reducing the number of times an issue must appear before the Court before an easily interpretable precedent is set.

Naturally, one of the most powerful factors that influences the content of a Supreme Court opinion is the ideology of the justice writing that opinion. While the Court tends to act moderately in most cases, the significance of minor wording changes has already been mentioned (Hinkle et al. 2012), and many consequential cases have been determined by a single vote. The justices are aware of their colleagues’ biases and the majority will often court the moderate voters. The eventual opinions of a divided court trend towards the positions held by the median of the plurality faction (Carrubba et al. 2012). The political bent of the justices, however, is not the only ideological factor that plays a role in the eventual composition of opinions. Scholars have also noted the tendency of the Court to overturn cases and to disfavor having to affirm the rulings of lower courts (McGuire et al. 2009). Even small tendencies in justice ideology can have a significant influence on the content of opinions and the direction the Court rules.

In the context of recent landmark cases, the degree of another key influence has long been questioned: public opinion. Theoretically, the Court should be distanced from the effects of public opinion. Its members are appointed and serve for life, removing the pressure of running for office. They rely on precedent rather than opinion polls to make judgments and are protected from the populace by the Constitution. In reality, according to a study conducted by McGuire and Stimson (2004), the conditions of their appointment and concern for their continued legitimacy often leads the justices to pay attention to public trends. The Court relies on the executive branch to enforce its rulings and the legislative branch to enact laws in keeping with new requirements, so a loss of public legitimacy can have severe consequences for its ability to affect policy. McGuire and Stimson note that Justice Frankfurter himself said in 1939 that “the Supreme Court, under the guise of constitutional interpretation of words whose contents are derived from the disposition of the Justices, is the reflector of that impalpable but controlling thing, the general drift of public opinion” (McGuire and Stimson 2004, 1022) As Alexander Hamilton noted as early as the writing of the Constitution, the Court “has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of the society, and can take no active resolution whatsoever” (“The Avalon Project : Federalist No 78” n.d.) and must therefore keep the opinions of, at the very least, elected officials in mind. While the extent of the influence that public opinion has on the end product is debated, recent scholarship demonstrates that their opinions often avoid positions directly critical of strong stances held by politicians and recognized scholars (Baum, 2008).

These influences represent some of the myriad factors proposed to affect the content of Supreme Court opinions. It is traditionally easier to study external influences such as amicus briefs and lower court rulings because they are not shielded by the protective silence that surrounds the Court and its employees. Clerks are notoriously tight lipped about the behind-the-scenes aspects of rulings (Zengerle 2012). However, a gradual relaxation of that tradition has increased interest in the study of clerks' influence (Kenney 2000). The relationship between clerk and justice is often very close, as the job requires that the two spend hours together discussing cases and drafting documents. Clerks provide a unique window into the largely private lives of justices, so it is no surprise that their influence has become a huge field of study as data has become available.

2.2 The Study of Clerks

The new wave of studies into the lives of Supreme Court clerks began in the early 2000s with a pair of books titled Courtiers of the Marble Palace: The Rise and Influence of the Supreme Court Law Clerk by Todd C. Peppers (2006) and Sorcerers' Apprentices: 100 Years of Law Clerks at the United States Supreme Court by Artemus Ward and David L. Weiden (Miller 2014). These two works marked a watershed of open communication between researchers and clerks as the norms separating the two broke down. The clearest indication that these norms are loosening may be former clerk Edward Lazarus' book Closed Chambers: The First Eyewitness Account of the Epic Struggles Inside the Supreme Court (1999). Panned at the time of its publication in 1999 as self-aggrandizing, it still indicated that some clerks were willing to recount the more private details of the Court's inner workings (Kenney 2000). Thus was born the collection of research on clerk influence.

Some of the earliest research focused on the structural role that clerks play and their ability to influence the progress of cases. At the lowest levels of the judiciary, clerks act as gatekeepers when scheduling hearings and trial dates. Justices largely determine the dates and times of hearings, but the equivalent role in the Supreme Court is the selection of cases to be approved for hearing. The Court receives thousands of requests for hearing each year and the clerks are tasked with selecting those cases the Justices eventually vote on. This means that there are thousands of cases the Justices may only encounter for a few minutes as a summary written by a clerk. While this serves a functional purpose, it does give clerks a potentially disproportionate power to exclude certain cases from the Court (Purdum, 1985). McLaughlin's (1990) study of British juvenile courts demonstrated that not only do clerks have this ability to abuse their role as gatekeepers, but that on occasion they do. While it was impossible to apply this study to the Supreme Court for a number of reasons, it is worth noting that clerks in both systems share similar capabilities and responsibilities.

Both McLaughlin and Purdum's work took place prior to 2000, and as a result, Purdum's work was largely based on the understood structure of clerk-justice relations and not based on actual accounts. After 2000, however, the focus turned to the effect that clerks could have on their justice's ideologies based on computer powered analyses of written data and first-hand accounts. Immediately the composition of clerk staffs was called into question. Some scholars began to question the effect that diversity among clerks might have on their justice's personal opinions and found that this exposure had the potential to foster positive views of diversity among those justices with diverse staffs (Benson 2007).

Scholars also began to question if clerk attributes could affect justice ideologies. It became clear that certain justices were more susceptible to change than others, depending on how strictly they enforced norms of hierarchy (Peppers and Zorn 2008). Eventually, scholars turned to which ideology most clerks tended to hold. The result of that study was that clerks at all levels of the federal judiciary tended to be liberal, but that their liberalism decreased as the prestige of the position that they held increased. In short, Supreme Court clerks are among the most conservative, but still tend to be liberal (Bonica et. al. 2016).

The source of clerks also took on a measure of importance. Supreme Court clerks have often clerked for at least a year prior to serving, and most of them will have clerked within the US Courts of Appeals. Baum & Ditslear (2010) studied the appeals judges for whom many clerks had staffed prior to their time on the Court and found that there were a select few from whom a plurality of clerks were selected. The study found that these judges were often ideologically similar to the justices who selected clerks from them. If Justices are seeking out judges with similar ideological bents to themselves, they likely see clerk ideology as significant. This implication aside, the predictable selection means that certain lower court judges have the opportunity to train prospective Supreme Court clerks. These clerks, now familiar with the inner workings of a federal appellate court, can better navigate the Supreme Court when they get the opportunity and may exert a disproportionate amount of influence on their respective justices.

A less popularly recognized but potentially significant power that these well-trained clerks apparently wield is the ability to influence individual justice's votes. As there are at most nine justices sitting at one time, the ability to influence even one of those votes has significant implications for American political institutions. Through effective ideological influence and signaling, clerks play an active role in deciding which way a justice will vote, depending on the nature of the relationship between justice and clerk. Most notably, in years when a Justice hired a clerk that was significantly more conservative than them, that Justice was more likely to vote in favor of a conservative position (Kromphardt 2015). In relationships where there is a clear structure wherein clerks are expected only to fulfill given tasks without personal input, a justice may expect to exert his or her own personal will over decisions. However, in relationships where clerks are encouraged to provide personal input, justices may find that input directly influencing significantly large decisions.

It was not until very recently, however, that the scholarly community has begun to focus on the amount of influence clerks wield by directly writing court opinions. It has long been understood that clerks played some role in the drafting of court opinions, but the rumors ranged from small paragraph sized contributions to entire clerk-written drafts. This field of clerk influence is still largely protected by norms against disclosure at the highest level of the judiciary. Nevertheless, it was once said of Justice Frank Murphy by his contemporary Justice William Douglas that Justice Murphy “relied heavily on [his law clerk] in preparing the first draft of his opinions for the Court” (Kenny 2000).

This suggestion that clerks had some hand in drafting opinions is characteristic of most accounts from within the Court itself. The Justices are willing to admit that they rely on the assistance of their clerks in opinion-drafting. Miller (2014), however, finds that their accounts always limit the clerks to a drafting position and never elaborate on how much those drafts are edited before release. Clerks, on the other hand, have recently relaxed the long-standing rule discouraging them from taking credit for the wording of opinions and have begun to openly lay claim to sections of rulings (Lazarus 1999). From Miller’s set of first-hand accounts, it is impossible to determine the extent to which Justices may be under-reporting the impact of their clerk's contributions, or how much clerks may be over-reporting them (Miller 2014).

However, studies of lower American courts have uncovered public admissions on the part of judges that their clerks were indeed drafting whole opinions. The sheer volume of cases passing through these courts make this situation almost necessary, and, while the Supreme Court's caseload has decreased in the past few decades (Roeder 2016), during the period covered by this study, there was a steady increase in case submission and case acceptance, as well as amicus submissions, all of which require help from clerks to review (Swanson and Wasby 2013). Lacking the cooperation of a generation of loose-lipped clerks, there is no way to gather direct evidence of opinion authorship for the Supreme Court. Even in instances where rumors do abound, such anecdotes may prove false, or even racially biased. It has long been supposed that Justice Marshall, especially in his last few years on the Court, may have delegated a great deal of his opinion writing to his clerks (Tushnet 1991; Peppers 2006). This is based on his apparent lackluster attitude at oral arguments and failure to recall what he had written in previous opinions when questioned. Some scholars have argued, however, that Justice Marshall's withdrawn stance as he closed out his term on the Court was an intentional defensive tactic, protecting him against total ostracization on a Court that was growing more and more conservative around him (Tushnet 1991). In any case, anecdotal evidence, even when aimed at particular Justices, or even clerks, cannot suffice for proving authorship of any given opinion. It is for this reason that the world of statistics-based content analysis has bled into the study of clerk influence.

2.3 The Evolution of Stylometry

Stylometry is the "statistical analysis of texts... to discern authorship in many notable works" (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a, 1313). It gained prominence in content analysis when it was first theorized that an authorial “fingerprint” could be distilled from the rate of use of certain words. These certain words were dubbed “function words” and did not have an impact of the topic of the document. They include conjunctions, articles, auxiliary verbs, and comparative adjectives such as “than” (“Function Word | Definition of Function Word by Merriam-Webster” 2019). For example, Figure 1 is a sample sentence with each of its function words in bold. It was theorized that authors tended to use these function words at similar rates across documents and leave a “fingerprint” on each document as a result. The idea that the way an author writes might be consistent across their various works has been studied since the late-1800s (Madigan et al. 2005), but it wasn’t until the 1950s that scholars started to apply mathematical modeling to the problem (Fries 1952; Miller 2014). Even still, these models were inconsistent and required further development.

The real breakthrough came in 1963, when Frederick Mosteller and David L. Wallace published their study on The Federalist Papers. In that study, they pioneered several new ideas. The first was the use of function word rates in association with probabilistic models. Fries (1952) had used function words, but only their raw use rates. Mosteller and Wallace used mathematical modeling that they had specifically designed to fit those use-rates, and therefore substantially increased the accuracy of the field (Holmes & Forsyth, 1995). The second was the crossover between the humanities and mathematical modeling. Both authors were statisticians by trade, but they took the opportunity to bridge the divide between the two fields in an unprecedented way.

The publication of Mosteller and Wallace's study opened a new way of attributing authorship to the researchers of the world. Some used the new tool to revisit documents whose authorship had long been disputed, often with surprising results, including attributions ranging from mid-18th century philosophers to mid-20th century fiction authors (Wyatt, 1980). What it did not do was perfect the method to the point that it was preferred or even popular. In 1987 J. F. Burrows published a study that was nominally about the Victorian era Bronte sisters, authors of Wuthering Heights and Jane Eyre, and a few of their disputed works. The more significant purpose of the study was to advertise and explain the usefulness of stylometry outside of a limited community of statisticians.

Not too long after, a range of papers testing different possible authorship markers and mathematical methods emerged. Some began to test sentence length, syntax, parts of speech, and other markers in addition to or instead of function words (Martin and Quinn 2002; Madigan et al. 2005; Airoldi, Fienberg, and Skinner 2007; Segarra, Eisen, and Ribeiro 2015). Others started testing different mathematical models to see if they could improve upon Mosteller and Wallace's original Naïve Bayesian<sup>1</sup> algorithm with models like Maximum Entropy<sup>2</sup> (which evolved out of linguistics) or Vector Modeling (which arose out of the Data Science field) (Ratnaparkhi 1998; Koppel et al. 2006; Li et al. 2013). Still, researchers continued to find that, given its relative

1 Dr. Rish offers the following explanation of Naïve Bayes in her paper An empirical study of the naive Bayes classifier: "The naive Bayes classifier greatly simplify learning by assuming that features are independent given class. Although independence is generally a poor assumption, in practice naive Bayes often competes well with more sophisticated classifier." For those seeking a more in-depth exploration of the method, I recommend reading that paper.

2 Dr. Malouf offers this explanation in his paper A comparison of algorithms for maximum entropy parameter estimation: "[Maximum entropy models] allow stochastic rule systems to be augmented with additional syntactic, semantic, and pragmatic features." I recommend this article for a more detailed overview of the statistical method involved.

simplicity and consistent accuracy, a combination of function words and Bayesian algorithms remained a viable option (Madigan et al. 2005; Segarra, Eisen, and Ribeiro 2015).

The reason for the delay until 1987 for the boom in this field is simple: computers. Both Mosteller and Wallace (1963) and Burrows (1987) used computers in their research to speed up their work, but both mention that the sheer amount of data and the fact that much of it had to be entered on punch cards made the studies long and tiring work. It also made the work nearly inaccessible to the majority of humanities professors, largely because they lacked the required background in computational mathematics (Holmes, 1998). This may be why so many studies emerge after 1990. A number of cases ranging from Shakespearean poems (Ledger and Merriam 1998), to gospels of the Bible (Mealand 1995) demonstrate the method's sudden explosion in popularity. As data scientists began to publish ready-made programs that required little to no coding on the part of humanities researchers using them, stylometric methods became more accessible. What is distinct about these studies is that they are being conducted largely by humanities researchers for humanities audiences. Those patterns broadened the range of subjects from a handful of historical papers and disputed novels to just about any disputed work that was written down.

2.4 Stylometry in the Law

Stylometry requires a body of known authorship documents to establish a fingerprint as well as lightly edited versions of the document being tested so as not to confuse the mathematical model with the contribution of several authors. The world of legal academia is full of billions, if not trillions, of written documents constituting countless data points. It is a data scientist's dream scenario. Many of those documents are unsigned or their authorship is widely disputed. Those disputes may stem from the simple loss of records that comes with the passage of time, but, as I discussed earlier, the coincident rise in interest in the role that clerks played in the judiciary, mentioned in section 2.2, also began to contribute to suspicions of over-delegation (Wittes 2006). This over-delegation would, in theory, take the form of judges handing more and more of their writing workload over to their clerks with less time for direct oversight. As soon as computers and databases had evolved to meet the demand, legal scholars set to work analyzing the relevant documents using stylometry to try to detect this over-delegation.

Many scholars turned immediately to the US Supreme Court, because, as the most senior Court in the US, its opinions have incredible weight (Posner, 1995; 1999). It also has a smaller number of members than the entire federal judiciary, for instance. When combined with the long record of signed opinions, this relatively narrow membership makes for clean, conclusive study. Some scholars chose to study ideological drift on the Court, using stylometry to analyze word rate use across terms (Martin and Quinn 2002; Epstein et al. 2007; Owens and Wedeking 2012). These sorts of studies found evidence for the long-standing theory that Justices did tend to drift ideologically while on the bench, but not to an extreme extent. Others turned to the Court's oral arguments, using stylometry to determine whether the outcome of a case could be predicted based on the tone of questioning (Hawes et. al., 2009; Black et. al., 2011). While these studies did seem to indicate that oral argument tone and content could signal a justice's vote on a case, they tended to focus more on refining a method than proving a particular argument. Some even revisited the history of the Court with a new lens by analyzing the evolution of important doctrinal terms throughout the Court's jurisprudence (Katz et. al., 2011).

Still, there were those scholars who chose not to focus on the Supreme Court, and it is in these studies that we first see attempts to attribute direct authorship of certain cases to certain parties. In 2013, Dr. William Li and a team comprised of both legal scholars and computer scientists built a model to analyze the authorship of per curium judicial opinions, which are those issued by courts as a whole, and not attributed to any one judge. While their case study came from the Supreme Court, their main focus was on lower courts, who, at the state level, can sometimes issue more opinions in this manner than are signed. This, they found, was especially true of elected judges (Li et. al., 2013). This study, however, did not yet get at the question of clerk authorship.

In order to ensure clean data, it is helpful to acquire early drafts of documents to be analyzed, simply because editing can muddy a fingerprint. Justices, however, have only recently begun releasing first drafts of their opinions, and that practice is still uncommon (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a). Recent studies have taken advantage of this publication and have begun using Mosteller and Wallace's tactic to measure the impact clerks are having on their justice's opinions. A study by Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Sigelman (2002) used the tactic in case studies of justices long reported to rely heavily on their clerks for drafting: Justices Powell and Marshall. The researchers were able to access drafts at many stages of the opinion writing process and employed eight distinct stylometric markers, including word and sentence length, as well as word diversity, to establish their own version of an authorial fingerprint. This study determined that both justices as early as the mid-1980s were relying on their clerks to draft entire opinions. Interestingly enough, this study also reinforced the importance of regulatory norms in protecting the integrity of justice's own opinions. Marshall, who had essentially given up on writing his opinions three years before his retirement, relaxed almost all norms in his chambers and served only to edit his clerks' full opinions (Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Sigelman 2002, 172). Powell, on the other hand, sat and reviewed drafts with his clerks to ensure that the wording was appropriate and suited his vision of the cases. His clerks became accustomed to writing in his style, learning to mimic his tone and logical thought process (Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Sigelman 2002, 172).

This study demonstrated that it was both feasible to employ Mosteller and Wallace's method to analyze opinions, and that at least in some cases, clerks who were drafting opinions for their justices were leaving a measurable mark.

Function-word-based statistical analysis was applied in a cross-sectional time series several years later to modern justices. The focus of this second study by Rosenthal and Yoon (2011a) was to determine how consistent justices' opinions were in fingerprint over time. The fingerprint was tested against opinions over the course of several years and the results demonstrated that modern justices' fingerprints appeared to change significantly from year to year. The researchers concluded that this variation was due to the cycling in and out of new and old clerks. These clerks effectively took their fingerprints with them as they moved on and the new clerks contributed theirs to the opinions. For this change to be noticeable, the authors posited that they had to have a significant hand in the opinions' drafting, and quite possibly played a role in the specific precedent that they set. While the overall finding is significant, the possibility remains that some or all of the variation is due to the variation in topics covered by the opinions from year to year.

Carlson, Livermore, and Rockmore (2015) followed up on Wahlbeck et. al.'s original 2002 study (discussed above) on a much larger scale in their study involving many more justices, made possible by improved computers to measure the progression over time of the political leaning of certain Justices' opinions. Carlson et. al. found that justices tended to become more progressive over time. Given the suggestion from Bonica et. al.'s 2016 study about the general liberal bent of clerks, Rosenthal, Yoon, and Carlson's findings offer two major implications. The first is that clerks' effect on justices' ideologies appears to be significant enough to be measurable in the content of their opinions. This ideological shift essentially implies that justice's own ideological integrities may not be as consistent as the politicians appointing them may believe. The second implication (and the focus of the second half of the study) is that clerks may very well be writing entire sections of the opinions, if not the entirety of certain opinions.

It is important to note, however, that none of these studies answer a key question: which clerks are writing which opinions for which Justices? Rosenthal and Yoon got close to the question in their first study and have danced around it ever since (Rosenthal & Yoon, 2011b; Bodwin et. al., 2013), but ultimately, their method only answers how much the fingerprints in Justices' opinions vary over time. This can be a helpful clue as to which Justices may be delegating more than others, but it does not provide a satisfying answer as to whom. That answer, I argue, can be found through stylometric methods, but that is not the central theory I test in this thesis. Anyone interested in individual case author attributions can refer to Appendix C, where I do offer such attributions, but I am interested here in what trends can be gleaned from such attributions. For this reason, and in keeping with the information gleaned from the above documents, I propose to test three hypotheses.

H1: Stylometric analysis can provide statistically significant attributions for individual supreme court cases. As mentioned above, stylometry has been proven extremely effective in a variety of fields (Ledger and Merriam 1998; Burrows 1987; Mosteller and Wallace 1963), but has only just recently started making progress in the field of legal studies (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a; Bodwin, Rosenthal, and Yoon 2013; Li et al. 2013). This study is aimed at furthering that application by attempting author attribution on a case by case basis.

H2: Supreme Court Justices delegate opinion writing to their clerks more often towards the end of the Justice's career. Justice Thurgood Marshall, often the subject of rumors about “over delegation,” is theorized to have delegated more towards the end of his career because of increasing disinterest in the business of the Court (Tushnet 1991; Wahlbeck, Spriggs, and Sigelman 2002). Disinterest need not apply only to Justice Marshall, and it is also not the only consistent reason that a Justice might delegate more often towards the end of their career.

Justices Hugo Black, John Marshall Harlan, and William Douglas all retired around the same time due to failing health, including loss of eyesight and recent strokes (Sobel 2005). If Justices lose the ability to function at the high level that the Court demands as they age, we can expect that their amount of delegation will increase towards the end of their career.

H3: Delegation of opinion writing has increased significantly over time across all Justices. In one of the few examples that we have of stylometric analysis of Supreme Court opinions, Rosenthal and Yoon find that Justice fingerprints have varied from year to year increasingly over the past few decades. They conclude that this variation is due to increased clerk contribution, since the case fingerprints would necessarily shift as clerks rotated in and out on a yearly basis (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a, 1337). I test that conclusion by analyzing directly the opinions that were written during the time period in which they observe an increase in variation.

3. Data

3.1 Articles

We chose to focus our study on clerks and Justices who served from the period of 1965 to 1995. This time period covers several of the Courts most significant opinions, including Furman v. Georgia (1972), which temporarily declared the death penalty unconstitutional, and Miranda v. Arizona (1966), from which we get the Miranda warning, and many others. It also contains two of the Court’s most notable Chief Justices, Earl Warren and William Rehnquist. Both Warren's and Rehnquist's opinions fundamentally changed not only the law that each addressed, but often how the U.S. viewed Constitutional rights and how they ought to be applied (Epstein and Walker 1995). This time range also allows us to exclude most currently sitting Justices, as the only Justices appointed prior to 1995 who are still sitting are Justices Ginsburg, Thomas, and Breyer. These three Justices were excluded from the data set.

As outlined above in this study's literature review, a large part of stylometric analysis is the construction of an authorial "fingerprint." This fingerprint is built out of word use rates from documents for which we can definitively attribute authorship either to one of the clerks we choose to study or to the Justices themselves. Both the clerks and the Justices will require fingerprints in order to compare the two. Ideally, we would base our fingerprint construction on documents nearly identical in both topic and publication type to minimize the potential impact in the use of certain words across topics and formats (Burrows, 1987) (Mosteller & Wallace, 2007). Unfortunately, the closest thing to a Supreme Court opinion in both topic and format is another court's judicial opinion. While many Supreme Court clerks do go on to become successful judges in their own right, some even taking a seat on the Court itself, if our theory is true and certain Supreme Court Justices are allowing their clerks to write some or all of their opinions, it would then stand to reason that some of their clerks may do the same in their own judicial careers. With judicial opinions then excluded, we decided on the next best source of word rates: academic articles.

Academic articles published in law, public policy, and political science journals often deal with the same or similar topics as Supreme Court opinions. Many are even written on or about the opinions themselves. They are also written with the same academic tone that a Justice might take in writing an opinion. This is in contrast to personal letters or journal entries, which are other potentially available options for fingerprint construction, but do not match our criterion. The final helpful condition that academic articles meet is that they are readily accessible. The database HeinOnline collects and publishes thousands of legally relevant academic articles and makes them available for download for research purposes. For each clerk and each Justice from the period 1964-1995, we collected as many articles from HeinOnline as could be definitively attributed to that clerk or Justice. Each article was downloaded as a .txt file for ease of processing.

For the purposes of our study, definitive attribution required that they be the only author listed on the paper, that they be unambiguously listed as the author, and that the time of publication for the article match a reasonable timeline for the clerk's career. For this reason, it is entirely possible, and even probable, that we have not collected all of the articles for each clerk or Justice that HeinOnline has in its database. For instance, HeinOnline will periodically include a middle initial. In the cases where we had access to the clerk's middle initial, this was often helpful, but where we did not, and we could not find a middle initial for that clerk, we did not collect the document out of an abundance of caution. In another instance, if an article was dated as having been published prior to the years that a clerk would have been in law school, we also excluded that article.<sup>3</sup>

While all Supreme Court clerks have already demonstrated a certain amount of accomplishment simply by the nature of their clerkship, this is not a guarantee that they will publish, and certainly not that they will publish often, during their lives. For some clerks we were able to find many judicial opinions, as HeinOnline's archives also contain opinions, but no or few articles. This is likely because they never spent a significant amount of time in academia, opting instead to serve as a judge for the majority of their career. Some clerks, though fewer, had neither publications nor judicial opinions in the database. For those clerks with no articles, our program simply skipped over their name and did not consider them as a candidate. If a clerk had a small number of articles, they remained in the candidate list, but the significance of the conclusions that we draw from their scores will be discussed in our analysis section. For those clerks, however, for which we were able to gather a significant number of articles, we were able to establish an authorial fingerprint, the process for which we will outline in the methods section of our paper. The same is true for each of the Justices.

<sup>3</sup> I fully recognize the irony of excluding these papers, as I am writing this thesis during my time as an undergraduate, but I decided that the knowledge acquired in law school would be significant enough to change which legal phrases an author might use that I left articles predating the clerk's time in law school out of the dataset.

3.2 Supreme Court Opinions

For this study, we also needed the text of the Supreme Court opinions themselves to form an article fingerprint with which to compare our authorial fingerprints. It is not particularly difficult to find databases of Supreme Court opinions, as they are published openly by the US government and offer an interesting potential for analysis. There are, therefore many different forms of Supreme Court databases, from Find Law's collection of pdfs, to Justia and Oyez's html uploads. Ultimately, we decided to use Court Listener's API format for a number of reasons. The first is that Court Listener provides the opinions as JSON files, which, while they do not work particularly well with python in their raw form, are easily converted into a csv format that does. The other advantage that CourtListener provides is the ability to download the entire set of opinions at once, whereas most other databases are meant to be viewed in place, rather than downloaded.

The API does provide its own set of challenges. Despite being in JSON format, the files provided still contain a fair amount of html meta-data. Enough, in fact, to significantly muddy our results if not cleaned properly. Our cleaning process is outlined in the methods portion of this paper. The API is also a somewhat brute force option, since it is some one and a half centuries more data than we need for our study given our focus on opinions written between 1965 and 1995. Ultimately, however, the time saved by not having to download every opinion by hand well outweighs the time we needed to write the code to process and clean the API data.

The API data is also massive. All told, the data contains 63,949 entries, though, in fact, of those 63,949 entries, 41,740 are denials of cert, essentially the Court's official filing refusing to hear a case. We are only interested in the data contained in the filed opinions, which are the remaining 22,209 entries. Of those, 3,872 fall within the 1965-1995 time range that I have selected and were written by one of the 19 Justices. However, I only analyze 3,476 of those opinions, since I need non-opinion writings for at least one clerk that served during the year the opinion was written in order to perform the analysis and Hein did not have writings for every clerk. The totals for the analyzed opinions are further broken down by Justice in Table 1.

4. Method

4.1 Data Processing

As outlined in the previous section on data, our data in its raw format is too complex to successfully derive a fingerprint from. Before attempting that analysis, we needed to clean and process both our opinion and our academic article data. Because each was in a different format (JSON and .csv v. .txt), each would need its own method. The following two sub-sections detail the cleaning method for each and will hopefully prove useful for those wishing to conduct their own stylometric tests either on a different period of the Court or on the same period with a different dataset.

4.1.1 Processing Opinions

Our programming language of choice for this study was python, both because of its ease of use and the myriad of available stylometric programs already written for it. Unfortunately, that meant that the JSON format that the CourtListener API used was not immediately useful. We first had to convert the individual JSON files into one CSV file containing all of the opinions. This is somewhat easily done in python itself. The resulting csv file contained all of the opinions issued by every Justice from the inception of the Court to 2014, so in order to proceed we needed to take a few more steps.

Before we could get to cleaning the opinions, we needed to separate them, both by author and by year. We wrote a program to scan each of the opinions to identify an author, and a year written for each opinion. In doing this, we found that our data included not only justices which were outside of our time range of 1965-1995, but also several thousand rejections of cert and per curiam opinions, which are unanimous opinions not attributed to any one author. We also found that another supplementary data set was needed where an author could not be determined because of holes in the CourtListner API. Researcher Brian Carver with the Free Law Project has his own similar data set on GitHub. However, each JSON file was labeled in a way that neither corresponded to an author nor a year. In order to efficiently sort out which opinions we needed, we downloaded a spreadsheet from the Supreme Court Database at Washington University in St. Louis that contained each case by author and case id. Our program, referencing this spreadsheet, was able to reference by each JSON file by case id when an author's name was missing from an opinion. With this data now stored in dictionaries, along with the text of the opinion, we were ready to start cleaning.

Each opinion was stored in a single cell but was stored with html formatting as it was originally displayed on CourtListener's website. This html formatting, if the opinion were analyzed at this stage for a fingerprint, would have a significant impact on the word rates exhibited. For this reason, we then used a combination of the BeautifulSoup and lxml python packages to strip all html indicators from the opinions. This still left a great deal of punctuation. Our stylometric software would have differentiated words based on their punctuation. For instance, if the word “to” were to appear at the end of a sentence, to our program it would be read as a new word “to.”. The same is true for any word next to a “,” or “;” or any other form of punctuation. This would, for obvious reasons, also have wildly affected the rate of word use by reducing the numbers of certain words and introducing a class of “words+punctuation”. We wrote a brief program to strip each opinion of punctuation and replace all instances with a space.

When I ran the first stage of test analyses on the data, I noticed that certain terms were showing up disproportionately often. Some of these terms were “U.S.” “v.” “See” and “Supra”. These terms all belong to the typical citation format used in Court opinions to refer to precedent cases, which might look like this: See note 10 infra. While we did not want to strip names of cases from the data, as their position in a sentence might be syntactically indicative of an author, we knew that having too many generic citations in the data would be likely to throw off overall word counts. For this reason, we also programmed our cleaning software to remove any phrases that started with a bracket (“[“) and the word “See” and ended with another bracket. After rerunning the test analyses this drastically reduced the number of instances of not only the word “See” but also “U.S.” “v.” and other terms that were clouding our data. After removing punctuation, we also found that most citations not covered by the above removal were reduced to either case names, which were not frequent enough in most cases to appear in the top 200 words, or numbers, which our program does not consider valid characters for testing.

Finally, each opinion's text included the dissenting and concurring opinions written in that case. These additional opinions were not attributed to the Justice who authored the majority opinion and do not constitute candidate text I want to test for authorship. In many cases, these additional opinions were long enough to change term use rates significantly, so we needed a way to remove them. In their 2011 papers, Rosenthal and Yoon helpfully developed their own opinion cleaning software and made it available to the public, which included a list of terms commonly used by Justices to begin and end concurring opinions<sup>4</sup>. We employed the same terms to clean our text of any concurring and dissenting opinions.

4.1.2 Processing Academic Articles

Since we had collected the academic articles by hand, each was conveniently in its own .txt file, python was already prepared to read them. This eliminated the need to load the files into python and separate by author, as was done with the opinion JSON files. Instead, two CSVs were created for each justice. One contained the personal writings of that justice and the other the writings of their clerks. The personal writings file had three columns, one for the Justice's name, one for the text of the document, and one for the document's truncated title. I compiled separate CSV at a later date with the help of a research assistant to hold the full titles of all non-opinion writings used in this study, which can be found in Appendix A. The clerk writings file had four columns, one for the Justice's name, one for the clerk's name, one for the truncated document title, and one for the text of the document.

<sup>4</sup>For example, the most common phrase beginning a supreme court opinion's meaningful text is "Justice Name" followed by "Delivered the opinion of the court". The most common concluding phrase is "It is so ordered." For those interested in the other phrases used to determine the beginnings and ends of opinions, see either of Rosenthal and Yoon's papers cited in this study.

Once this was accomplished, we simply had to clean the data as we had with the opinions. We employed the same program as we had with the opinions to clean the articles of all punctuation. With all 38 CSVs now compiled and the texts in them cleaned, we then created a merged CSV with all of the documents. This CSV was massive and unopenable on a regular computer, so we also created a Justices and clerks CSV with each of our distinct authors' names and a meta CSV with the year, month, day, author, assigned id, a binary variable distinguishing whether it was an opinion or not, and a simple numerical id 1-10299 (3872 Opinions, 5838 clerk writings, and 483 justice writings, with some documents repeated as clerks served under several justices) to distinguish it from all other documents easily. We used the more massive combined file in conjunction with the other two support files to complete the rest of the work.

4.2 Deriving Finger Prints

Having processed and cleaned both data sets, we were ready to derive the fingerprints, which we would later compare to obtain our probabilities. The fingerprints themselves are simply a collection of the rates of use across the 50, 100, and 200 most common words, three-character prefix, suffix, and unspecified grams, all of which I refer to as terms. I chose to use the 50, 100, and 200-word caps because of a trend in the literature. Mosteller and Wallace's seminal study of the Federalist Papers employed a tailored 70 word list and several studies have followed suit, limiting themselves to that restricted list (Mosteller and Wallace 1963; Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a). Others, including another notable pioneer in the field, J. F. Burrows, have found that such limitation is not necessary and that a list created from the documents themselves can actually create a more accurate fingerprint provided that the cap is set low enough to exclude most topic specific terms (Burrows 1987). Later studies have placed the usual cap at which those topic terms start appearing somewhere between 140 and 200 words (Evert et al. 2017; Madigan et al. 2005). In order to capture both the limited window first proposed by Mosteller and Wallace and incorporate the more recent discoveries about document generated lists, I ran a series of preliminary tests to parse where my word lists began to include topic specific terms. I too found that 200 was a reasonable cap and decided on a 50-200-word range with a 100-word middle point. By running all three of these fingerprint tests and then averaging the number of attributions each candidate receives across each test, I can derive a percentage that is likely to reflect the true authorship of the opinion.

Where these relevant terms match, the use rates can be compared using probability algorithms to determine the likelihood of authorship across the candidate authors. The reason that the term fingerprint is used for this collection of use rates is both because theoretically, each author uses certain words in a unique way, much like each person's fingerprint is unique them, and because the comparison of an opinion's "fingerprint" to candidate author's "fingerprints" is not unlike the forensic process by which police compare suspects' fingerprints to a fingerprint found at the scene of a crime.

In this study, I derive a fingerprint for each case and a fingerprint for each author using their non-opinion cases. These fingerprints are necessarily influenced by the length of the documents, but do not contain any terms or grams that are specific to the topic of the document. By limiting our term maximum to 200 at most, we find that we remove almost all document specific terms and where there are exceptions, they are limited and disappear when the 50 and 100 term lists are employed. This removal of topic-specific terms is crucial, because our method could accidentally attribute a high authorship probability to a candidate author if the list of compared terms in the opinion fingerprint contained, for instance, many references to tax law, and one of the clerks went on in their career to write several tax law articles. Mosteller and Wallace's original function word study and the stylometry studies that have come after it have relied on the removal of such terms to establish a content-neutral fingerprint (Mosteller and Wallace 2007).

Stylometric studies have compiled fingerprints from sets of many different combinations of characters. These combinations of characters are called n-grams, where n is the number of terms in a combination and a gram is the type of term being combined. For example, "kly" and "ly_" (including the space) are two 3-letter n-grams derived from the word "quickly." A 3-word n-gram would look like "the dog quickly." n-grams where the characters are whole words can be used to derive fingerprints based on consistent phrase use by capturing phrases like "we shall," which is distinct from "we should" or "we will." Letter based n-grams can help highlight consistent part of speech use; I would expect to find the n-gram "ly_" often in works by an author that favors adverbs. I determined which n-grams I would use by setting aside four non-opinion documents from three Justices (Brennan, Burger, and Rehnquist) and using the rest of their non-opinion writings, as well as the non-opinion writings of a fourth justice (Goldberg), to test which n-grams made the most accurate fingerprints. The documents set aside and the n-grams I tested are listed in Table 2. These n-grams had a fail rate of no higher than three documents. When I calculate the average attribution rate across all three term caps, as described above, the combined n-grams had a failure rate of only one document and no failures over 66.67% attribution percentage. This threshold of 66.67% will serve as my indicator for a trend-informing results, but not an affirmative attribution of authorship.

4.3 Deriving Probabilities

Using these fingerprints, we then employed an algorithm known as Burrows' Delta. This algorithm was developed by J.F. Burrows in the 1980s and establishes a vector distance between texts based on the distance between their most prevalent terms' z-scores (Figure 2) To calculate the distance between vectors, we employ both "Manhattan" and "Cosine" distance measures. The Manhattan distance measure uses an absolute value difference between unaltered z-score vectors

$$\Delta = \sum_{i=1}^n |z_i(D_1) - z_i(D_2)|$$

Figure 3). The Cosine distance measures the angle between the two vectors and naturally discounts their lengths (Figure 4). We selected these two distance measures because they are the most prevalent in the field and studies have demonstrated that their effectiveness when paired with Burrow's Delta can only be marginally improved upon, and that only with a great deal more coding which we did not feel would be efficient (Madigan et.al., 2005; Evert et. al., 2017). We then total the number of times a candidate receives the lowest delta, that is the lowest difference between their delta score as calculated in Figure 2 and the implied delta of 0 assigned to a given document<sup>5</sup>, and determine a probability of that candidate being the actual author by dividing by the number of trials. By trials I refer to the combination of n-grams and common-word caps outlined in section 4.2. In all, there are 12 trials, since each of the 4 n-gram option is tested across 3 different common-word caps.

Table 3 outlines this set of 12 tests by providing an example analysis.

<sup>5</sup> Because the Burrow's delta is inherently a measure of the difference in word use rates between two documents, a document necessarily receives a delta of 0 when compared to itself, because it uses every word exactly the same amount as itself.

5. Results

5.1 General Trends

After running my analysis, I found that I had non-opinion clerk writings for at least one clerk for 3458 cases of my original 3476. Of those 3458, in 1386 a Justice met my 66.67% attribution threshold after all 24 trials had been run as demonstrated in

Table 3 above. I determined that threshold during the methods test described above, as it exceeds the highest failure percentage in that test and offers a clear majority to the top author<sup>6</sup>. The average percentage of cases for which a justice was assigned the top percentage above that minimum attribution threshold is displayed in

<sup>6</sup> In Appendix B I show that the trends that I attribute to this threshold test hold substantively across 75% and 50% attribution thresholds as well. The 66.67% results are included in the main body because I believe them to be the most likely to be accurate for the reasons explained above.

Table 4. These data indicate a clear difference in behavior across Justices. Many of these behaviors are expected. As discussed in the literature review, Justice Rehnquist all but admitted to allowing his clerks to write whole drafts of opinions before he edited them (Rehnquist 2002). His average percentage of attributable cases of 5.65% per year comes as no surprise then. In real terms this 5.65% attribution rate means that across the 351 cases that we tested for Justice Rehnquist, for approximately 20 Justice Rehnquist received the lowest Burrow's delta scores on at least 16 of the 24 trials run as demonstrated in

Table 3. Justice Stevens, on the other hand, did not allow his clerks to participate in the cert pool and was rumored to have been a reluctant delegator (Miller 2014; Peppers 2006). His 52.75% is then in keeping with that information.

Others come as a surprise. Justice Thurgood Marshall's participation in cases, especially towards the end of his career, is often called into question. Some, including his colleague Justice Powell, have relayed stories of Marshall forgetting the content of his own opinions and dissents (Woodward and Armstrong 2005). Others have defended his reputation as lazy or disinterested as having been a natural cause of being a liberal Justice on a consistently conservative Supreme Court (Tushnet 1991). Still, whether he is defended or chastised, many scholars have asserted that Marshall delegated a great deal of his opinion work, yet his 38.66% attribution rate exceeds both the average and that of most of his contemporaries. By no means does this indicate that Justice Marshall wrote the majority of exactly 38.66% of his opinions per year, but it does suggest that the rumors about his "laziness" may be overblown.

Total				3458	30.97

The total average is also worth noting. While the 30.97% attribution average only reflects those opinions over the threshold, it encompasses approximately one third of the opinions. The attribution percentages for the cases that did not make the threshold can be found in Appendix C. For those opinions that do not meet the threshold for attribution, it is unlikely that any Justice played a majority role in their authorship. If they had, those results would likely have also reached the threshold, as indicated by both the methods test and those results that did reach the threshold. For instance, Roe v. Wade (1973), an opinion signed by Justice Blackmun, was attributed to the Justice at an 83.33% rate. That means that of the 24 trials used to test its authorship, 20 of them favored Justice Blackmun as the author. Based on the results of my methods test, it is unlikely that 20 out of 24 tests would attribute a case to an author without that author actually having written the opinion.

In direct contrast, Loving v. Virginia (1967), an opinion signed by Justice Warren, is attributed to the Justice at a 12.50% rate, while his clerk Benno Schmidt received a 62.50% attribution. Neither of these values meets my threshold for trend-informing data, but it is unlikely that Justice Warren played a majority role in drafting an opinion for which he had the most favored result in only 3/24 of tests, whereas his clerk was favored in 15/24 of them<sup>7</sup>. All of this lends credence to the suspicions of many scholars that clerks are indeed playing a large role in opinion authorship.

Beyond these averages, my data does not indicate any strong trends across Justices.

Figure 5 and Figure 6 show linear regressions as applied to the Justice's percentages above threshold across age and year. As is clear from both the  $R^2$  values and the scatter plots themselves, there is no noticeable trend in the data across either age or year. This finding appears to contradict the findings of Rosenthal and Yoon, who assert that, based on Justice fingerprint variation, Justices have been relying increasingly on their clerks for opinion drafting since 1950 (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a). I discuss possible explanations for this disagreement in the discussion section of this paper, but I do not find that a lack of a clear trend in my data necessarily excludes the conclusion that they reach.

5.2 Case Studies within the Data

The data also offers some interesting case studies for analysis. Of the 3485 opinions analyzed, four were attributed to clerks at a rate over 95% of all trials, as shown in Table 5. None of them are considered particularly high-profile cases in the legal community, but two things are worth noting here. The first is that all Supreme Court cases are precedent-forming, meaning that no matter their publicity, these cases have likely had an effect on the related cases that came after them. The second thing worth noting is that these are United States Supreme Court cases that have been attributed at a level 29% higher than our methodological threshold to clerks rather than the Justices who sign them. Hundreds more attributions can be found in Appendix C that may not have a 95% attribution, but do cross my 66.67% threshold and still suggest that a clerk is more likely to have been the author than the signing Justice. This is the first large scale study that I can find that makes such claims on individual opinions.

Table 5: Cases Significantly Attributed to Clerks

Justice	Year Opinion was Written	Case Name	% Attributed to Justice	Clerk	% Attributed to Clerk
Brennan	1977	Durst v. United States	0	Carmen Legato	95.83
Brennan	1978	Andrus v. Sierra Club	4.17	James Bird	95.83
Fortas	1967	Sanitation Men v. Sanitation Commissioner	4.17	Peter Zimroth	95.83
Burger	1971	The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co.	0	Chesney Floyd	95.83

Just as the general data does not show a trend between percentage of attributable cases and year or age, no individual Justice's data demonstrates a significant trend. A graph demonstrating this lack of individual trends can be found in Appendix D. They demonstrate no significant trend across age for any individual justice with the possible exception of Justice Warren, who appears to decline in attribution across his last four years on the Court. This could, however, be a spurious correlation, as he has only four data points and they do not span a significant portion of his career. What these do demonstrate, however, is that certain justices have been consistently low or high in attribution across their entire careers (eg. Rehnquist, Burger), while others have ranged across the spectrum (eg. Marshall, Powell). This may be an indication that certain Justices have a consistent ideology with respect to delegation to their clerks while others may delegate contingent on other facts, including the type of cases they are assigned or the quality of their clerks in a given year.

6. Conclusions

Many explanations have been offered for why Justices might delegate opinion writing to their clerks. Some have suggested aging or dementia might force a Justice in particularly poor health to delegate (Tushnet 1991; Peppers 2006). Others have theorized that the increasing number of cert petitions might have begun to overload the Court, forcing the Justices to delegate more liberally in order to keep up with the pace (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a, 2011b). These theories are not supported by my findings. Instead my findings suggest that Justices choose to delegate for other reasons. Some scholars have offered another variable: A Justice's career prior to sitting on the bench. If a Justice spent time in a law firm or at the Department of Justice, where lawyers commonly delegate brief writing to employees under them, they may be more comfortable delegating even after they are appointed (Tushnet 1991). I find little evidence for this theory, although more systematic testing would be required to confirm it. For instance, Justice Burger, who has the lowest rate of attribution across all Justices, spent two years at the Justice department and several years working in campaign offices, which would also presumably have a certain amount of delegation ("Warren E. Burger" n.d.). However, Justice Stevens, who ranks highly in attribution rates, spent many more years at a private firm than did Burger ("John Paul Stevens" n.d.). It is entirely possible that delegation is simply a matter of Justice preference, but I do not find any significant variable that predicts whether a Justice will delegate opinion writings to their clerks.

What I do find is that stylometry contributes meaningfully to the discussion of clerk influence over Supreme Court opinion content. In my methods test I found that I could attribute 11 out of 12 twelve documents correctly at above a 66.67% threshold. The fact that only 1386 of the 3458 cases I analyzed were attributed above that threshold, and that only 59 were attributed above 95%, indicates significant variation in fingerprint across opinions. Rosenthal and Yoon discovered this variation in 2011 and used them to assert clerk influence due to simple fluctuation in fingerprint content (Rosenthal and Yoon 2011a). I have assigned each case a probability and found that not only is there irregularity, but there is also a significant number of cases whose authorship appears mixed.

When a text has several authors, its fingerprint will fail to precisely match the fingerprint of any of its individual authors. Instead some have suggested that documents may need to be analyzed by paragraph or by section depending on how work was divided (Schraagen 2016). Such division of labor would make sense on the Court. Justice Rehnquist notes in his book that if he did not fully agree with a clerk's first draft, he might edit it or use only parts of it in his final opinion (Rehnquist 2002). Clerks have even acknowledged having written sections, but not the entirety, of certain opinions (Tushnet 1991; Lazarus 1998; Kenney 2000). This piecemeal authorship could explain the opinions for which I have no majority author (See Appendix C), or for which two authors have 50% attribution.

What is clear from the results is that while certain opinions can reasonably be attributed to a single author, without an application of the above piecemeal approach, or others like it, I cannot assess stylometry's limitations in this context. I do find that there is a high likelihood that clerks contribute to many, maybe even the majority of, Supreme Court opinions, as evidenced by the sheer number of opinions for which a Justice received a favorable attribution in fewer than one third of all trials. In a handful of cases, stylometry can assign authorship in Supreme Court cases with a significant level of confidence. This study also contradicts the theories that age, health, or year have any meaningful effect on the probability that a Justice will delegate opinion writing to their clerks.

Two major opportunities for further study present themselves here. The first has already been partially explained above. The next step for stylometry in this field is to begin analyzing opinions by paragraph rather than as a whole. There are a few suggestions as to how to do this, but the one that most intrigues me is the one offered in Author Attribution on Paragraph Level Using Simulated Annealing (2016). It employs a method classically used to find random values that cannot be calculated by an algorithm, such as the fastest route between several points. These options have to be randomly grouped and compared until the solution is found. Recently this has been applied to stylometry in that paper. Normally stylometry requires a certain number of words to establish a fingerprint based on word use rates; it is likely that any given paragraph will contain the word “the,” but it is possible that it will not contain the word “so”. By randomizing the pairings and eliminating authors until a candidate emerges, it has been shown that statistically significant attributions can be achieved. I would like to try applying this method to these opinions.

The second opportunity for further study here is the possibility of much closer case studies. If I took the four cases that were significantly attributed to clerks and did a historical review of the clerks, Justices, and case facts involved, it may be that I would discover another pattern that might later be applied to stylometric studies as a variable. One such variable could be case subject. Certain Justices, owing to their backgrounds, are often assigned certain types of cases. On the current Court, Justice Breyer, when he is in the majority, is often assigned cases that have to do with economic law, probably because of the time that he spent both studying economics in college and the career he had as a Harvard law professor teaching various fields of economic law (“Stephen G. Breyer” n.d.). If a Justice is assigned a case in which they do not specialize, they may be more likely to delegate. A closer analysis of significantly attributed cases might offer clues to such a relationship between subject matter and delegation.

Appendix A

The above tables contain the titles of all non-opinion writings as they appear on HeinOnline, as well as the names of their authors and the Justice under whom they served. This list of article titles was compiled after the articles had already been collected. As a result, we discovered that several articles had either been collected erroneously, were collected twice under two different titles, or were no longer available on HeinOnline. Where that is the case that is noted inside  $\langle \rangle$  brackets. In further studies that attempt to improve on this one, we recommend removing these articles from the data set.

Appendix B

The tables below are composed using the same threshold method as the findings

Table 4 above, but with adjusted thresholds to demonstrate that the trends I observe are not limited to the 66.67% threshold data. While some Justices do switch positions with their colleagues, the general trends are preserved across all three thresholds. In each test, Justices Burger, Rehnquist, Brennan, Warren, and Black compose the lowest end of the attribution scale. Similarly, Justices Stevens, Stewart, Harlan, Scalia, and Blackmun consistently hold positions in the top five attribution slots. At most, both sets of five Justices is separated by no more than 11% and in the case of the 75% attribution threshold, only .07%. I therefore do not find that the minor movement of certain Justices relative to one another to be significant enough to invalidate the finding that certain Justices have pattern of behavior that set them apart from their colleagues in terms of expected levels of delegation.

Table 8: Cases Attributed to Justices over a 50% Threshold

Justice	First Year with Clerk Data	Last Year with Clerk Data	Number of Years with Clerk Data	Number of Cases with Clerk Data	Average % of Cases over Threshold*
Burger	1969	1985	17	264	1.25

Appendix C

The table below provides author attributions for each of the cases that I analyzed. The Justice % column contains the percentage of trials that the Justice who signed the opinion received. The Top author and Top % columns contain the name and percentage received by the highest attributed author respectively. In the case where the Justice is the top attributed author, the percentages are identical. Anyone interested in attributions for specific cases may refer to the Case column, where the cases are named by the name of the signing justice, the year, month, and day of release, and an abbreviated case name. For instance, Roe v. Wade is listed as Blackmun_1973_2_26_RvW because it was signed by Justice Blackmun, published (according to the copy contained within our data) on February 2nd, 1973, and RvW is the name abbreviation. All dates attached to case names come from within the opinion text after the word “Decided,” so any difference between the actual decision date and the one that we use is minimal.

Appendix D

The graph below displays the 66.67% attribution rate thresholds for each justice across their age while on the bench between 1965 and 1995. The lack of any identifiable trend across any justice or the entire set of justices underscores the findings of this study, which are that justice age and year of service have no measured impact on opinion attribution.
