

the nascent child realizes it is speaking through a collective wound we do not mean the absence of a name giving our hand to him we thought he'd see how fingers form a formless world fitting a sun into a thumb this erasure creates a hunger that can only swallow itself his mother a remnant of his stillbirth his hollow belly can only crave can only devour a half-sung womb