UNTITLED¹

O. Rosales Castañeda, C/S, poet

Minutemen(sos)² mienten³ through forked double-speak their words falling on the sacrificial stone of logic lowering one's IQ simply by acknowledging their very presence discourse denies coherent ideas as of course
 one simply looks at their hypocrisy emblematic of nonsensical resonance crude hyper-nationalist imagery showcase a past presenting itself as reality brown sources of light dimmed by an icy glare one that seeps throughout bringing instant death by night xenophobic machination by day

¹ This poem was written while I was living in Yakima, Washington. On August 13, 2008, I walked through the local farmers' market and saw the Yakima Minutemen canvassing for an initiative similar to the anti-immigrant laws passed in Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, etc. Needless to say, they failed (miserably). I was absolutely incensed at the outright lack of decency they had in pursuing such an endeavor. My poem is thus written in this mindset and conveys my outrage.

² Keeping with the old "Chicana/o" tradition of political poetry, the poem uses bilingual wordplay throughout the text, creating new meaning for hybrid "spanglish" terms, in this specific line, creating a fused contraction of the English word, "Minutemen" and the Spanish word "menso" (Spanish for "absent-minded").

³ Minutemen lie (Translations of Spanish into English can be found in this and the following footnotes.).

denying the human right to grow upward from the soil hacia el sol arriba⁴ false pretense for war comes to pass once again in a cycle of dystopic blind stares from the very navel of de-humanized machinery tierras forever partitioned⁵ into nation-states that slice open the very heart of our souls once again history hiccups a new reality
reflecting an already existent lie that that sears through the dormant essence of our collective past like it or not our humanity will not be denied Minute mentes no ven realidad⁶ that we have always been here in solemn remembrance of 500 years colonial scars dig deep even into our own psyches tricked to believe
we must die in the act negate a part of our selves homeland insecurity proves even our celebration of life is deemed an act of war

⁴ toward the sun above

⁵ lands forever partitioned

⁶ Minute[men] lie, they don't see the reality warranting right-wing pendejadas⁷ disinterring our presence by way of military operation forced relocation

yet we all come back to the place of origin place of new beginnings any place where the mind connects to the soil intermingling with la esencia del arbol⁸ comforted by the omniscient energia⁹ of the four directions children of the moon
offspring of the sun
imagining un hogar sin fronteras¹⁰ a composite of all who struggle for what is just.

⁷ warranting right-wing stupidities

⁸ intermingling with the essence of the tree

⁹ comforted by the omniscient energy

¹⁰ imagining a home without borders
