

On a Mural in the Rutherford Reading Room, University of Alberta

Nancy Kang

the silence kneels, high on the wall a picture, as wide as a box car still painted over, a missionary pontificates

(smell his sweat in these leaves) as Noah had a wagon, not an ark he clutches

a handful of seeds, a string of beads

Natives squat, cooperation stretched dog-lean in nakedness pale and sour these pre impressions that leave moisture for moths fellow feeling, flat grass on a ruddy brow in the moment of the trade, dust will rise an ant with wings gnawing plywood, wheels of fire, squinting at this homogeneous sagebrush and acrylic steeple poker, a chorus of crosses made by tipi tops brushed a dry mouth

shut

some eyes linger over the smooth felt of a cap pressed, stiff leather, ironed in the sun orange heat rash on the skin like lichen the man's lips mimic prayer, he chews the loose skin, waves a hand tears off a piece thoughtfully ruminates

the spot of life is a mounted man, red-clad, spilled across the smoke of priests and the oil of black hair.
