The Shaman Comforts the Fledgling's Soul

by

Joseph Murphy

I descended beneath blood-spattered stone,
Circling through root and star
Until I reached the top-most limb;
Found the fledgling's soul.

Strands of light uncoiled from my down.

I grasped them in my beak and built a nest
No claw could reach.

The fledgling's soul answered my full-throated call
As I placed it in the nest.

Sky-colored bark shimmered beneath my talons
As the tiny soul's wings healed,
Taking the bark's color.

As its strength grew, so did the reach of its dream:

It entered a seed
Another's beak had cracked open.

Within string and twig-weave, an egg would be set;

Crest and wings sprout
From the dream's furrows.

I promised to keep close by that fledgling
Until its cloud-roads opened.
