Modern Colleges are often faced with the challenge of having faculty in many different academic disciplines. One particular challenge associated with this diversity of academic backgrounds involves performance evaluation. While some colleges still rely on a leader or leadership team to determine the criteria for assessment, in a world of expanding faculty interests this might not represent best or most realistic practice. It has been suggested that faculty voice be heard, especially in areas where evaluations may be subjectiveⁱⁱⁱ. The co-presenters will spend thirty-five minutes briefly describing the change in the merit evaluation process at the University that is shifting from a centralized to decentralized model. Then they will relate the problems of faculty evaluation in a large College with a great diversity of academic disciplines and one unique solution that was applied within an academic unit of the College.

Each discipline has unique areas of scholarship, research, teaching and service and all deserve to be recognizedⁱ. The discussion will focus on how the head of the School in question tasked the faculty in the five distinct academic disciplines to form a committee and develop a rubric that encompassed a collective vision of the evaluation of the performance of a faculty member in each of the above areas. A complete description of the process and final product from the faculty will be offered, and how the developed rubric was employed during an evaluation cycle. Commentary on the rubric and process will be offered by the Dean and Associate Dean of the College who will also highlight how the various rubrics of the other departments compare. Following the presentation 15 minutes for questions and comments will be allotted, for other Department Head and Deans to offer insights into best practice at their institution or ask questions.
