Acknowledgments

I wish to thank my many teachers, especially my thesis committee, Patricia Goedicke, Greg Pape and Gerald Fetz, for their clear-eyed guidance and the generous commitment of their time and energy. I have also benefitted greatly from the friendship and support of poets Marnie Prange, Martha Elizabeth, Sallie Scott, and Lorilee Evans. To Jon Jackson, my constant reader, I owe constant love and gratitude.

Visiting Hearthstone

The woman beside me thinks we are on tour - white halo hair, cardigan and beads, hose and handbag.
Is this your first visit to Japan?
And I can see why she believes this here in a group with our Cream of Wheat at an hour that could mean early departure.
I know where I am. Bakersfield in a drought year.
Breakfast before heat settles makes institutional sense.

My father wears a cowboy hat against the sun, weaves through patio trees strung with faded paper chains.
The people in charge sing out, bending and touching like kindergarten teachers.
Dad doesn't talk anymore. Aphasia, dementia - gentle sounds like Santa Ana winds coming in warm whispers out of the desert.

Dad's little dog Echo lives here with him.
Happy in company, she passes herself around like a baby at church.
Sarah is digging up the azaleas again. Echo helps and we watch her long hands in the dirt finding the delicate roots.
Someone else will come to stop her. Virginia would like to visit but must get home, her girls will be coming from school. We avoid Sam.
Yesterday he stood, his hand on a doorknob,
I can't be wrong, not all of the time.

We sit while they read aloud from newspapers, but we don't listen.
Tillie is black. Dad strokes her hair and arms, learning the texture.
I bring oranges that grow here the size of softballs.
They fill my father's hands, too large now for his frail body.
We let the warm juice run down our chins.
He naps in the afternoon on his narrow bed;
I can't hear his breathing.

(stanza break)

I join the others. We are allowed one cigarette under the mimosa, waiting in the still shade.
When the sun is low, Dad puts on his hat, and shoulders my purse.
Out by the cinderblock wall, his figure in the dusk like a wrangler working fence, he lifts Echo and sends her in a high arc out and over, the tongue of his spirit tracing through the pale evening.

Faith at Easter

She carries a basket of ice shards.

The frozen river is breaking up.

Three flickers in bare cottonwoods argue in russet flurries.

The eggs below might be the issue - yellow and turquoise - impossible to hide on a milky day.

Her father has gone south to Mexico to paint churches at Easter.
A scarecrow in straw hat and patent leather, she follows the melting trail of turquoise, yellow and salmon stucco

to a dead stop.
The radiator hose
spits a green stream, the smallest fissure.

That vein in his head.
Just this?

In some sanctuary her father raises his voice.
He is risen!

How else to explain it?
He is risen, indeed.
(the mumbling fold.)

Walking the Dogs

In morning sun the dogs lie quiet.
The woman calls across the meadow and they come, bend their heads under her hand. At dawn the dogs had awakened her from dreams of strange and empty rooms, dreams of confusion and loss.
She wants to walk. Excited to go, the dogs run beating up dust, then circle behind her touching the back of her knee to urge the pace.

The road winds into stands of deep green larch tipped with the lightness of new growth. Once she skied this road on a day so cold the young dog made a bed in the snow and lay down as if to stay. The old dog and the woman coaxed her to freezing feet, then all the way home. This day hums with heat, the long snouts of the dogs pulled into panting smiles. Ahead of her, the dogs make the turn onto the trail that climbs the ridge and wait. They hope she will follow, not call them back to take the shorter route. The woman wants the long walk today. She is thinking her father, is with them still, sweating under his hat, pausing at the lightheaded white sky of the mountaintop, breathing the thick air in the undergrowth as they follow the dogs down a deer path dense with wild rose, down to the creek where the dogs kneel in the water cooling their bellies. She undresses and eases into the shallows until she lies flat in the bed of smooth stones. The older dog noses her clothes, remembers the night the thunder came and the woman let the dog bury her head there until the fear was gone.

Naked

My daughter massages the open umbrella of her belly.
I've seen the child inside by a process that traces his image in light. The arc of his brow a corona, his spine a silvery chain. My father's frailty was translucent - skin sheer, bone thinly veiled.
She lies naked as full sun.

Natural History

At the Museum of Natural History with the woman who is my daughter, a campfire of native storytellers flickers in a forest clearing and voices tell of the people trying to lift the winter sky. Quietly her tears come in spite of the oriental glyph that signifies strength tattooed on her body in college days.

And strong she is - born in the time of zealous belief in breast milk and natural immunity.

It seemed almost that simple. Men on the moon, I told her that first summer of her life looking up at the night sky with her father who believed if we sheetrocked walls of the cooperative nursery school and breathed tear gas at anti-war rallies - the positive progression of history was ours.

She was four at the time of the accident.
They came saying fatal; I couldn't think what it meant.
It was morning when she said He was reading and then I went to sleep. I knew she meant we should have been more vigilant.
We were the ones to guard him.

Each day the war went on, glaciers advanced, the unimaginable grind went on without heed.
She folded loss into our days with acceptance only a child knows. Tears fell freely, not for the unimaginable, but for missing her love.
In the story, time for sorrow fades when the death of winter melts away at last and the buffalo return to the people who understand the gift.

We lunch at a cafe after the museum because we are together for a time in our adult lives and it is to be celebrated. She jokes about my old eyes and reads to me the fine print of the impressive menu.

A Bird in Hand

Before the alarm of breaking glass below the bear bloomed in the nostrils, spread like fog on the tongue. And after. With a bear, now splinters, unmappable in memory—how long, how near. Sliced peach, plum jelly, color in shards on concrete. And who hasn't had a swift down the chimney, perched in a one-eyed moment with the answering machine, the andiron claws, fly frantic through the rooms—feather script in soot. A child born comes through walls.
This grunt, this wail, a feral concert kept for welcoming our own. Blood-branded and breathless, the child flings a starry hand.

My grandson begins to walk

A sweetness accompanies the naive belief in linear progression.
The primitive map in an old movie traces a toy ship's course between sketched-in continents - a plot advances, though nothing's left behind (Think barnacles on a whale, I'll tell him) and things come and go and come. He's seen each season's spectacle once; he may assume perpetual changes, and that's true too. It's all true at the same time (an idea that encompasses linear, cyclical, perpetual : time) I'll take him a jack-in-the-box to show the element of surprise - so he'll know.

Cottonwood seed sails through the rafters of memory.
A child in summer.

Oases

Nevada

The movie crew came to town when I was ten and still rode bare-chested in the country with my best friend. Free to ride levees in full sun until we gave in to the hard current of irrigation ditches carrying us like twigs through fields of hay, acres of man-made oasis spread out in the desert. In town road tar melted soft and held our footprints as we slept through the hazy bass of toads.

Far out in sage, the Paiutes lived at the ends of wandering dirt roads I was not allowed to ride.
Unturned land crusted white with alkali boiled dust behind beat-up cars headed to town. They came to the church rummage sale, mothers sifting piles of clothing, babies strung tight in beaded leather, older children silent and watchful at their wide skirts. At the rodeo a thick figure vomited alcohol beneath the bleachers.

This rodeo, staged for film, brought us all to see Marilyn Monroe in polka dots, the tops of her breasts white and shimmering like heat on the desert horizon. She was sage in bloom, a summer thunderburst.
Misfits cast in a higher reality, we wore red to stand out in crowd scenes.
Before the stand at Rosebud and public pow wows, long after Lahontan Dam tamed the Truckee, our town was home to their drama.
It was years before I understood, it was a movie in black and white about desperation in wild country.

Wellspring

My mother said the waves were a flying mane.
She called it Horseneck Beach, a curve of coast I could feel in my body from the name.
I was taken, rolled neat as a sow bug in a sea that told me, See how I carry you touching you everywhere.
It rolled me crown back feet hard against the bottom to say, This is how I meet the land. Don't be surprised when you find Flaming Gorge, Grand Canyon. You are a small thing, but you are here. Open your mouth and swallow.

The Blackfeet say backbone for continental divide.
The wellspring, headwater of the river that runs by the road.
In August the river will lie flat, sun-tamed - the color of tea. Now it races loose with wide-flung arms carving new channels, breathes the morning downpour, flexes its dark braids in an unbroken gesture of welcome. Today I was secretly glad when the rain-swollen river took the canoe, broke it against the rocks and swept us away.

Texas

Pretty Bill took her everywhere in his Oldsmobile, gold-flecked paint and power windows.
Meet my granddaughter, Jane. His Texas twang mangling the name.
Jean, she offered.
That's what I say - Jane. She's in second grade.
Seventh.

She was an easy tease, tactful and plain. (Years later the smooth-cheeked boy ran his hand up her dress, Girls are so plain!)

On the road to Texas and Pretty Bill signs promised moaning caves, two-headed snakes.
The jackelope - pronged horns and rabbit haunches, big enough to ride.

Kiss your elbow, you'll turn into a boy.
Pretty Bill's idea - but against her shirt tender nipples, worried as a wisdom tooth, secretly chafed.

With Pretty Bill she smoked dry grapevine cut from woods behind his house, drank the child's portion from the bottle cap when he poured whiskey at night, learned to lie for no reason, (I'm here for the summer til my daddy gets out of jail.)

which pleased Pretty Bill. He played monster at bedtime walking stiff-legged in cotton pajamas wild-eyed, coming ever on until the frozen curl of fingers and flat yellow nails stirred fear and he would tuck her down to sleep with a tumbling heart.

He sent her to the garden for a melon to ice for supper.
Thump 'em for ripeness.
Hidden in tall corn, she split the melon on the ground, ate all she wanted and considered her legs, chigger-bit and downy, but plainly pretty when she twined her thighs and pointed her toes - like a twin-headed snake in the sun.

Mouths of Babes

Anyone could see - the headlong piety of his father, a recovering alcoholic, was to blame when Jeff Sutwith at eleven in his navy suit recited the gospel of Luke from memory .

It was summer. Outside until dusk in thin cotton and loose elastic, Sarah and I named ourselves Star Blaze and Fancy Dancer.
We neighed and galloped and tossed our hair in the alleys, somewhere between go-go boots and the barn.

Biff Martin spied and pelted us with dirt clods but we were bothered by Jeff Sutwith - Who does he think he is?
I took up the cause of Jimmy Weaver - next-door boy whose mother washed his mouth with soap for calling Tina Johnson's bosom balloonies.
Jimmy and I ran away.

Like experienced escapees we found the river and played like otters.
Vendla Bradley's father, the high school shop teacher fired for advances to female students, came upon us while fishing and drove us home.

I knew my mother was frightened because she spanked hard. The danger was not spoken and something dirty like the grey patches at my knees and heels lingered in her questions.
It must have been in the midst of my remorse that Donny Thompson caught me looking down.

I like your eyelashes, he said and the sweetness of that boy had such effect -
I gave up my wanton self to practice a new purity I thought was best displayed by pretending to pray.

Middle Child

The phonograph holds stacks of 45's and the big sisters sway in bobby pins, They asked me how I knew my true love was true. . .
The big sisters are twins, enough arms and legs for a spider, one animal that lives deep in our house, a voice rounder than harmony.

Smoke gets in your eyes.

This has nothing to do with me.
In the after-dinner dusk of summer, I clamp on my skates and leave my mother busy, bending lower now over the baby Yakety yak,

don't talk back. And don't ever cross Main Street - the side of town where casinos never close.
At the Aces and Eights the walk is studded with silver dollars that click click click beneath my skates, my legs a pearly smear on the mirror of the black tile building - a bird's wings pumping beside me. And the big sisters sing When the shark bites with his teeth, dear. . .

chasing me down the long block, away and safe into the near-dark streets. Then the child is rushing home in every stroke, the big sisters calling through the evening Come softly , darling

Spring

When I was small my cat disappeared for days and there was precedent (I'd heard it said - Crawled up under the house and died.) to send me searching that worst place. On my belly in the powdery dirt I found the cat tending three kittens - small as mice, buds of eyes nodding at nothing. Life so tenuous I began to worry again. In spite of the crocus and the greening field.

Belted to the chair the chair bolted to the plane the plane in the air.

Traveling

Red

I braked for a black dog that ran into the street up ahead. A man on the sidewalk called the dog back but the dog only hesitated in the middle of the road, then continued across. A woman was walking a yellow lab on a leash down the other side of the street. The black dog was not distracted from them though the man's voice rose sharp, insistent. The dogs nosed and wagged one another. The man stopped yelling and stood watching the woman with the dogs. She moved in a slow revolution, the dogs circling at her feet. Her hair fell over her face. The red leash wound around her pale legs like ribbon. It was the first truly warm day of the year. A motorcycle roared up behind my car, then passed on the right, accelerating in a sweeping arc around me. As I moved on I heard the man call, Come! Come! Come here!

Bird Dream

In the palm of the valley the pheasant cock on tiptoe one-eyes his harem, squawks at the sky, and me,
"Pale is your color!"
The river coils in sleep.
Submerged shadows move whole-bodied, turn in trout unison from the edgewater of waking.
Sandpipers leave forked glyphs on the tongue of wet sand.
Precarious nests balance on cottonwoods with gnarled roots that claw the bank. Smooth round stones will grow to fill their grasp.
Brothers in the high church of flyfishing unfurl humming whips, read the contents of trout bellies like tea leaves. "Comment allez-vous?" (the inquiring meadowlark) Fly on to town, Jean Allison, to the bar where the mounted elk head keeps his peace.
"Whiskey in a go-cup," I crow.

Touch

A man in the next lap lane veers wide on a flip turn, a glancing thigh or arm as we glide off the wall of the pool and I remember, pleasantly, as though it were someone else,
a shower with a stranger.
I am a careful person who calls ahead before visiting friends. How is it that we can be startled by meeting ourselves?

I was young, off the continent, on an island, warm and watery, jet-lagged, and not myself.
There are times when we forget ourselves, touch a baby in the supermarket, or when everyone forgets, as at the end of a war, though this is only a photograph we all remember - throngs embracing in the streets.

How dangerous can we be?
In the news - a woman so fearful of hitting a child on the street with her car retraces her route again and again to see her way clear of bodies. My hand turning a page in strong light, unrecognizable, flecked, parched, near burning.

Only a body of myth

can encompass a day when the morning is ceilingless and the apex of the range to the east, lifts the eye skyward and I blink unhindered through the wood-frame, white-washed brilliance of Pray, Montana - a place safe in the logic of fence and ordered stacks of bundled bales, abundance stored in stock, shaggy-coated and fat with early calves.

A crease of valley lined like a palm retelling the story of the garden, a story of goodness and mercy.

Grinding up the divide to Pipestone Pass the face of the rise is a tumble of stone stacked haphazard in impossible balance, massive monuments to vertical risk.

Earth sounded a grunting, shrugging exhalation when it heaved and left no handhold.

Could a person slip her body into a crevice, live with eminent collapse above and below, hollow a place, a path? The story would unfold in this landscape like a lava flow, a creeping, fearful tale. Forsaken and cast into the desert for forty days or floodwaters over the face of the land, cleansing and purging, until it is understood: a foot put to ground is less a blessing than a bargain struck while riding a behemoth. When the thaw comes and I can hold dirt in my hands, the word earth suffices. When Earth emerges whole from a satellite, zooming out with speed I see but will never know, another story forms round and whole as an eye freed from the body.

Thursday

Just now the music - piano and stand-up bass a tune I've sung for years without words and the dogs, mouths open like singers jaw and tussle on the carpet.
On the way to work? Maybe yes maybe no.
Something moves outside the screen door, only leaves in sun,
and the pages of the book so white in sun, why leave?

The crossing guard sits on her sign at the corner.
If I gave her the book she could go on with the story of love and death.
On the way to work?
How much could be left to do?
Hands freckled like my mother's, my daughter a bride and the larch line the road twisting up the hillside yellowing by the pines.

I wish it were my work to paint lines on the road dark enough and straight on and up the mountain falling with the river ribbons through the orchard hairpin swirls and cloverleaf until I reached the coast.
Then I would swim.

On the Island

He had twenty-eight years to gather secrets of tide and current, walk the circumference, define his solitude. Crusoe planted stakes and soon there was a grove.
Having failed before, he put his hand against another thick trunk to pound out a fit boat.
When he watched men come to shore murdering those taken in war, he continued pensive and sad for two years.

There is a moment that returns to me at waking like silver at the end of a thin line, a trailing gossamer of past as I move forward to another place which would be the next moment.
Driving on a winter morning
- dawn in Iowa farmlands. Far white field and sky, divisions drawn in hoarfrost on wire, sheer cold the only sure surface. I am still in each second I continue on the thread of road, stung by the inert fact of physical wonder that is not of my purpose but embraces me.

A Train Going West

They speed through the broad basin, still and clear in an autumn morning rich with possibility left in the air by those who came just a century before, their engines fueled by coal pressed on the floor of tidewater marshes long before the people, long before the buffalo.
The bared breast of earth stirs a memory hard and whole, they bump and jostle in the aisles like toddlers, the waters of the Yellowstone gliding beside them.

Joe follows pintails rising from its shimmery surface.
Free for more miles than any river has right to expect,

Will we go through Columbus? Grace wonders,

*****

Her father worked the quarry outside town shaping pale rock for the capital building - sandstone from a barrier island in a shallow sea seventy million years before, sharp ridges of the Crazy Mountains filling his child's horizon with silent tales of ice age glaciers. The station stands solid and blind-eyed, too few people for a dinner-house conversion, but Grace is pleased to read the sign, Columbus, her voice like water over gravel.

*****

There was a time they might meet in the club car, dance to cowboy swing, don't fence me in,
as a steward in starched white shakes martinis and the hunting party hums drunkenly dreaming moose and bear.
But Grace and Joe are old, like geese aground on the morning shore, bottom-heavy and plodding.

Been here long?
My whole life, you?
Not my whole life - not yet.

*Hardware - not computers, tools, paint, lawn seed.
Days of the independent are gone.*

It's a small condo, in town near the kids, all I need really since Charles passed.

Parting with the Yellowstone outside Livingston ridge-lines slide by marked with the new nakedness of logs peeled and stacked in high houses

My granddaughter - out of control. Tattooed herself - a scorpion here on her shoulder.

The familiarity comforts Joe; his Vera would be digging for photos.
White-tail! Left side, high by the road.

Searching patterned browns, flat grass, earth and stem, her heart lifts at a flag of tail, and for a moment they rest in the easy gait of animals.

*****

Galatin, Madison, Jefferson - the rivers merge their tunes of buoyant birth and the Missouri stretches her throat to the refrain as sung to Lewis and Clark.
Pelican, cormorant, coot, merganser, limestone light and cottonwoods pale.

Flowing with the current beside him, Joe remembers himself kindly - smooth surfaced, hissing through snags - friction no impediment to power or haste. Lately Joe wakes bewildered, his life strange as a guest room, Vera's release hollow as a screen door slamming.
Clear depths dammed, creeks drained to small seepage.

Old Misery moves oblivious to past.
Fur-trading, gold-fevered, Indian-fighting river deceptive in silence, running the canyon Toston to Townsend with the train.

At the divide she imagines the exact moment the edge of earth passes beneath.
Grace Felps whispers her name,
Grace Felps, in the tunnel.

Eyes closed in the darkness she thinks it would be a good note to end on, but things are never so tidy. Like Eustasia dead in the draw. It took the backhoe to see the old horse under, half a dozen neighbors and as many dogs.

Grace regretted this end - hooves akimbo, the roar of the machine, dogs barking wild and Eustasia's fly-blown eyes rolled in a grave.

It may be homesickness on their faces - that distance. Grace spreads the book open across their laps.
Old Crow, Two Belly, Long Elk stayed two months as the Crow commission in Washington trying to imagine rails across the Yellowstone Valley, then left, their blessing withheld for a time. The Serb came to the celebration for driving the last stake in top hat, the Crow in Hudson Bay blankets, solemn by the platform bunting, red, blue and white we know though we can only imagine the words spoken, the oaths and promises of this opening.

Visited the reservation east of here where Custer fell.
Joe searches for foothold in the crevasse of history.

The Serb named a town Belgrade to smooth the coming of countrymen following those following the first gold strike.

Hundreds of Chinese miners reworked Gold Creek claims after the first wave left for richer strains then sold out to the English.

Cincinnati Reds beat the St. Louis Cardinals the day of Custer's stand, my granddad was at the game.

The train slows by the sites only miles apart in the shallow draws.
Imagine that. Stake and strike by the creek, quiet by low juniper.

They're planning a new mine up the Blackfoot - gold - biggest yet.
Grace flips the glossy pages - What on earth?

*****

The Clark Fork runs in slanting sun through tangles of prickly pear and rose brush. Grace has drifted off.
She shifts with the train and dreams of baseball players gathered by the river removing ropes of gold from around their necks, caps in hand as if the national anthem might begin.

Joe allows Grace to lean in.

Miles ahead, townfolk gather for the weekly farmer's market.
String-bags of remarkable vegetables trail as they stroll arm in arm outside the old station, preserved as a brew-pub. Joe and Grace may stop for a pint when they arrive. He settles against the warmth beside him and imagines again who they might be; she will make ham salad and he will catch thick-bodied trout.

In her dream Grace empties her jewelry box on the heap of glittering metal. At the window above the sink in the ranch kitchen she follows the rise of the hill and the slow amble of cattle grazing.

Whistling a solo the black-capped chickadee calls Alone together.

Toward Summer

Falling

Zinnias remain erect and crimson, leaves curling yellow.

Lying belly to warm wood wet from swimming.
On the wake of some distant motion the dock lifts and dips.

My student absent-mindedly undoes the dark knot of her hair in the florescence classroom.

In a dream - my mother holds the spoon high.
Like light on the morning, the stream of honey.

Squirrels rummage in the elm.
The dog leaps against the trunk, and leaps again.

At Risk

One day young Susan's performance is explained. (High correlation: anorexia slash failure.) Note wide folds at the hip that obscure a longing for nothingness.

Laws of confidentiality dictate you hold information privately, arms at your side. Twelve girls may give birth within the year - or not. Not out of line with averages. You may detect a hump forming high between your shoulder blades.

Look for the humor. The runaways missing all week from class have called home to say they ran out of gas in Wyoming.

Parents and experts gather periodically to propose a plan, typically, before the winter breaking point. Anger therapy, peer mediation, psychopharmacology. They can't be serious, really afraid, something drastic. This is not you, but the child in your head. Refocus. Prepare.

If not today, odds are a vehicle will roll with adolescent exuberance; a bullet may find the arc of despair; a child will wake to the flash of belt buckle in the doorway.

One day you will notice a young man studying the water meter in his brown uniform.
Lo, it is your student from years before, Alex, resurrected from rehab. When the young woman checking your groceries greets you with surprising affection,

(stanza break)

you embrace her finally. And this is not to say they grow out of it. After many years you suspect a growing away - like heavenly bodies, ever further from impact. A private parallax creating the distance at which we find comfort.

Fall Fishing, Missoula

The round moon stands still in the early sky as the mother with small children works the bank of the river.
Under traffic by the bridge where whitefish gather she lands their meat, unhooking and hooking the catch again on the lines of the children.
Carefully carrying their willow stick poles, they reach into pools to touch the cool wholeness of fish.

On the golf course sprinklers churn across mowed meadow and ordered forest.
Mountain ash cluster red near spruce and elderberry blue. Silver leaves of olive float the pond that sprouts a fountain high in air. Above, an osprey treads sky.
Carp roll heavy. The osprey dives to the surface lure and with a glinting gold fish flies away.

Waking

I let the old bed hold me like a seasoned catcher's mitt, and listen, hoping for the hush of new snow.

As a girl I read about Jane Goodall hiking naked at dawn through rainforest to keep her clothing dry. My guess is she liked the spongy dampness underfoot, the brushing of limbs.

The brushing of limbs. There was a time flushed morning faces my love and I wore into the world made all else trivial.
Rousing slow, breath and body, crescent and arc, resuming the rhythm together.

My baby was lovely in waking, each day waiting in the tight bud of her body.

As a child I slept years twined with my sister.
At untouchable twelve, she drew a line between with a serious finger. I would wake worried at the tangle of us.

Sleep swallows grief and sometimes waking brings a choked dawn. I hold to the past I rock to sleep at night, and wake to touch.

Weather

One morning winter wraps us, blunt and insular, in drowsy iciness.
Slowed to a stuttering step, surfaces uncertain, you and I creep repentant of ease and speed. Disaster seems nearer.
News of senseless death in Egypt--we watch bare-limbed mourners on a balmy day clutch one another by satellite. Farther away, snow-crueted hills above our house surface in late-breaking sun, flanks smoothed and still with light. Angle of an arm, chilled sheet of skin--we count bodies between us, remembering. Outside dusk deepens, inside the fronds of a palm open.

January 28

The first of January I resolved to hold each day apart, itself alone, imagining that this would slow the slide of weeks and months that move ahead toward some eventuality that most times lacks crescendo. Say you begin to nod off and then your foot begins to coast across the daybed, thuds against the floor of dusk and wakes you just enough to drowse again - the drift of winter. But a common day, focused in attention, exaggerates the length of cold. My dog in winter gains some weight and heavy fur. She dreams long dreams in which her paws pretend to run. And I begin to see the absent lightness lies behind closed eyes. Today I am resolved to sleep and drift and dream unfettered.

March

In Chile the phalaropes feast on brine shrimp, rest fat under the full moon, waiting to fly north.

No need to think about what I do, the reflex of winter lingers. A dying note, the breath between movements.

Under thin sun, deer on the hillside nose the ground, sensing new shoots just below surface.

Or - I can think any thoughts, draw conclusions, contradict them. Snow flies through sunny afternoons.

And meanwhile I create things - clam chowder, a dress in cream cotton - while you sleep heavy, your cheek

a gibbous moon turned away in the night.
I think I have made your pale body for ballast

in my bed, in my arms. I think I will wake you soon.

The phalaropes appear as if they had been there all along spinning on the ponds, the neat sails of their bodies caught in an eager eddy. Stretching to flaunt her color, the female raises her rusty throat.

Perennial

Peonies, dark red from China, can live in a family for centuries, so it wasn't surprising to find it specified in the agreement:
Seller retains bleeding heart.

We moved into the house (no bleeding heart) in late fall, the garden withering. A time of year for prayers in broad daylight.

Scatter pennies beneath the hydrangea to deepen the blues and lavenders in July. Bone meal, a serious offering: here is a body broken for you, roses, tulips, narcissus. Down on knees, hands in dirt - intimacy unavoidable. The forsythia in my mother's yard blossoms gold every spring, though she's years gone (the bearded iris mute, waving fuzzy tongues.) And in the summer garden of the new house, day lilies show briefly, they thrive in memory, vivid orange.

Deer come out of the hills to eat the roses again, cedar waxwings disappear in the leaves of the strawberries and emerge like frilled flowers in the air.

There may be a god

This afternoon's signs - two things. Sun slanting through low branches of the honey locust repeating complications of honey locust on the wall.
And pot roast -
the air old as baked bone.

When I was a child, I thought as a child when I heard
In the rustling grass I hear Him pass.
Now I think
He's not found traveling.

I lie down with the dog in a square of sun on the rug. In the prayer a grateful bell sounds in the second breath hallowed - the exhaling of a second self.
Something ticks at my wrist, licks my temple.

A few days ago a small flock of magpies shrieked high and loud from the back yard.
They held one bird pinned down on the lawn, a crowd circled and pecked its body, others on the fence cawing fans of the fight.

I wondered if they knew someone was watching, would they be ashamed and fly?

Summer Crowds

I saw the snake again today at the same cut in the bank, rippling easy, less startling than yesterday.
My dog and I come to swim. Not another soul about on a weekday. Though the dark sheet of river still has its way, you can ride with the current, scramble up where the bank allows to walk up river, cold and wet in the sun.

Sandpipers dive the dog, whistling over a hidden nest, like the starlings that roost in the roof of our house.
Down the road from home, miles from the river, hammers echo through the afternoon and the welldigger thumps and hums as new people find their place in the unbroken field. The snake whips its delicate end where patterns of brown and black are repeated too small to follow. A sedate shrug and it glides underwater. I watch for the tapered periscope on the surface of smooth swells, but it has gone.

Sustenance

He settles a plate over the surface of the steaming paté, then a large stone for weight as it cools.
Most days the stone is a doorstep. At another time it may have been a bone-crusher, freeing marrow at meals, or a bed-warmer, taken from a fire ring on the hillside where we live.

He rolls the dough, prepares to raise the coffin, forming pastry to hold the deboned birds; the chicken nests inside the goose, sealed in the pie with forcemeat and mushrooms. This dish is meant for a journey. A slice reveals concentric layers, a topographic map or a fingerprint.

He says
ancho, chipotle, habañero, poblano, the voice pungent,
temperate zones in his bass.
He splits the fiery pods, furrows out the seeds and chops a confetti of red, yellow and green.
His touch will be dangerous all day.

Pursuit

Always beside me his length defines a distant horizon I've watched for years.
As a mote crosses the film of the eye, he moves in and out of sight. I know where he can be found. To hold the boat steady, oar blades must break surface like otters - easy against the current. Overhead he loops the line, settles the fly to water, and we wait together, suspending focus beneath the river's surface and above murky ground to the shadow of a fish rising to us. And there we are - my love, the open-mouthed ascent, the hunger plain as the path of the trout, one sharp line.
