Ice Seeming

Day in the light,
milk in the chill, icicles in disbanded night, denying night the swell of cold or seams of cold whose edges cut

the daylight.
What figure is standing? What figure moves? Clicking on stems, skin of blue winters-- what opens a mouth against its warm chest?

Residual

Only a bridge that spans the channel is still lit by the day.
Only a burnt rim left above the mountain, blacker heights up the gorges.
Dunes of rubble on the beaches hold pockets of heat. Kelp withers to tissue on rust, heat clings to iron, to the boats hemmed close in Dog Bay.
I follow steep pines and fireweed to the cove below town.

Lead surge of sea traces to crest and escaping crest-- the bow of each boat shines out against each island.

The pine hills collapse behind me. A lit sliver of stream runs through a strait of ash, a glitter, a tear, a line that glows red.

The chokecherry loses its spotted leaves in August.

Round in the stones, the ragged scraps of bottles. At a place in the sand where a keel dug a fissure, I find the nubbed shells of crabs, the wasted fin of a blackcod.

Watch

A shirt blown full in a western field.
A wind shirt.

A mountain, a horizon, a line of wings in the distance. Mountain at horizon in an arc.

A link in the the river where mergansers light the black current. Weeds.
A glass sleeve.

A dog riding a trail down in a flume towards a city blurred out of its grid. A rail picked up from rust.

Shoelaces beside a shed withered beneath a roof.
A jacket wrapped in leaves.

Dandelions caught on the shore--discarded tails in the shallows.

Rain storms unable to find a pond. Grass unable to break.

Signals from a kite lifting as a blackbird calls, stammers-- calls.

Mother at Stove Point

Juggavine, perilous, closes off the pines or the bay behind the pines. We could tangle through them, draw ourselves beyond the meal and pleasing ruin, clots of wood the net devours.

Stand on the level floor. Stand on needles.
Which floor? The ditch and the ditch keep the tar too straight and sweetly narrow. No turn around.

Not her town. Not her peninsula.
Who can say what the bigger child will do? He craves the wrinkle already beginning in the spray.
All he hears is cicadas, a long rushlike pull on the pines, abandoned.

And one crow on every limb. She can't see the bay or the sand huts at the end of the road. Still wants a cut off engine. Wants the children knit together--

Which floor? Two articulations-- one tide, one child closing out another.

Each Track

At the end of the road, hoofprints appear, matched half-to-half where they interrupted the ice, where direction turned and flat dusk took a deer inside.
There is the click. Not ice, not the hoof, but the squeeze of limbs overhead, twigs underfoot, the joints just breaking or splintering and the distortions of cold, impeccable trunks of black, rose sky, the vertical matter tipped above the stream's dim murmur, the thin endurance that has no care for winter or temperature.

There is no triumph of winter or temperature because it pushes my hands to my stomach or since the deer is startled into sharper breath. The hooves.
The hard answer. The deer leaves her print in a frenzy of brittle energy, not for the darkness that gathers the trees in a moment and says nothing.

And the rime
crusting the surface shows the raised, frail pitch around each track.

In the Tenth Month

Clamour by clamour, iron to iron, the pipes are interrupting my decision.

The hiss of steam has taken over the third floor for decades, leaked into the dream of the student, dripped into recitals and murmurs with the steadiness of rainfall.

I am paring the cucumber.
I have tossed the rind of the cantaloupe to waste.

This is two paintings on the wall, one rubbing the robe of a hilltop to another, one rubbing ochre to rose until rose light takes over--

What is written in the little books is clear on certain seasons for bulbs, clear on the borders in southern gardens-- this is the fourth call of the thrush, my skinning the avacado, throwing the pit to the birds, their broken accumulations continuing past the window.

And the rapid scurry from below, the thin whine of water measures the numerous leaks dripping into my hallway. The room goes still in a hissing division.

Each time the ochre and ultramarine compete and darken

they fold in, they flex and untry their arrangement.

I can hear rain anytime--

Rehearsal

In his mouth I find flint, a load of filings.
I find culverts, a thin dam, a furrow a rain, a throat scored evenly by undressed stone.

Choked debris settled in the corners and a pulse in the distance runs away like prairie clouds.

I find squalls thick enough to toughen bands of rain. Damp curves give way to swells in a current and the nearest tips are riddled with holes bit through by worms.

This time the stage is vaulted in pure blue.
He has designed a refrain. He wants to rehearse.
I stand in an opening offstage.

He asks "Where is comfort?" Comfort on the patch of sawdust that lasts until summer on the north side of the arbour. Or the comedy of oak leaves in the gutter, the lifted stems swaying to and fro.

"A towel for the banister" he says. And a thicket downstage. A brush for the drum when he speaks.

Broken scaffolding floats dead on the floor.
He says it again:

Let it all come down.

He stands. I balance above him.

Triptych

1.

I felt a double bitterness the night I watched the drive behind me: it was engorged in red and folded in as tail lights pestered further on with speed--and out the front, headlights, white, reflected corky brush and I was ten amongst the path of both.

Neither movement seemed to know or pull my eyes to either place as petals did, printed and reprinted when my mother gardened sometimes--consuming afternoons.

Later, she lay in half-sleep, trying to say a word or two for me--small reason for evening

but I let her go.

The zealous petals claimed her eyelids and bleached the day against her hands and me.

2.

Green plastic dolphins figured in the photo-- my horoscope, a picture, yesterday. A Marine was walking the other direction.

Tunisia, dolphins, his straight moving gait, five paces through the grass. My secret is holding the photo close and wondering which butterfly will stop beside my book.

3.

The print will show exactly as it was,
even the light and captive snow in courtyards: Tokyo, December, 1961-- red shadows down the shingles, muted bells and thrush of starling wings beyond the touching roofs.

Just as the mat and frame enclose the print (but sighs and other traces creep into the hall; rain begins to spin on slate outside the autumn window here), the print is purely held against the combing, sifting, gathering-after that Tokyo in that season anticipated.

I am hearing words, downstairs, piano keys lightly jumbled--all the words we've heard before. What was the beauty in the temple?
How did the roofs mix together so that they were one?

In Motion

Peaked hedges, the lawn in green attention.
I lie on my back. One hand closes a switch of blue space.
One hand takes that shape.

A baseball, the tin whisper of a cricket-- corners of the yard scatter to an edge where crabapples rot into spongy clots of gold.

I count seven windows on the house, an arch in the attic, two squares by the door. The top of the crabapple tree runs through sky--tree--sky.

Ardent ribbons of daylight founder against hedges, the front steps, the chair leg. Tin foil wrappers shift on the tea-table.

All the fingers fixing the tea-set.
Bright silver, loose steam, oranges, spare figures of saucers and tea-spoons in miniature forms, in tin foil, in the botched segments of the home.
One hand in the thickest type-set.
One hand in the sky.

Entropy

Sunflowers hang their heads in the slate light of the window--engorged, old globes at the end of summer.
Not everything is unpacked.

Dim motions of roots and moth wings thrum and push. Air off the street lifts, wanders out to trees.
Sheets form a dim terrain at the foot of a bed. All still, the sycamores, machines, rutted gravel at the edge of the park.

Late today I lean over molasses bread.
The sun gone. Crumbs, heavy with sweat, condense against the sleeve and the black knot of the loaf--

the scar deepens every night, sinks to a twisted cleft. Underneath whitened creases, the palm thickens.

Not everything is unpacked. Under the counter, hard twists of newspaper stuff the hole where the rat comes in. I take down the flowers and the floor is covered in a shrewd, bright dust.

Not for Travel

Unbloomed white, the whale flank in fitful sea foam. Irrevocable, bits of the glacier dislodged, dispersant, lifted on a current blindly nosing up fjords and back. No place for boats, --and not for travel, though odd spikes on icebergs figure navigation, form gunwales and holds and keep uniced pools--water within water. You say the chute of sky, close-hung, chokes against the cliffs and silent threads of waterfalls and flaws the farthest tracts of sea, unseamed. Sea against sea loses against the walls. Buoy to buoy is past-- fixed channels, markers, red and green blinking in the mist. Now all is mostly narrow, the course of unbeached shore, white luminosity differing from white unseen and cut, the non-white of sea bottom nothing for the whale or the whale's distance as it rises, sinks and empty land appears.

Lagoons are the only hidden chambers.
Five lagoons. One granite island. Radios cannot reach us. Swell to swell, suspended before the mouths, we hesitate--gain--lose and find a single thread of current, lift precipitous, fall and lift, pass across each entrance.

Concessions

I hid the books with small print.
I hid most of the books.
I put charts on the wall, of islands in a chain, of open terrains of sea, only a shard of mainland at the corner.
I brought out paper and charcoal, sponges and a wick. I brought out the oldest map of the glacial cirque where we met and where, rim by rim, the sky went blackly to silence as we left.

My clothes are copies. Your clothes are copies. Prompts to break the hesitations of others, prompts for rainfall, even prompt and allusions to water itself--all yours.

This evening, the pigeons in their hutch scratched berries into stony heaps and the cooing stammered gently into my alley. Even from a height I see smears of green on their necks, the glint of beaks at the wire, wire enmeshed in the trees.

I practice my stance. I practice my gait. I return to the checkout with pears, pints of milk, starter bulbs, an onion. I practice the method of pulling out bills in torn folds.

Again and again, I put my shoes in their order.
Left cold for weeks, the iron stands on the sill where the moon catches it in a bright arc. I lay sheets of newsprint on the open floor space.
I can trace your hand, trace your arms, the turns at each joint tipped and almost wing-shaped.

Already Matter

And then the inside. I found out what those in the basement are saying. They are speaking as engines do, with oiled pistons, four engines at once, grinding chambers out of chambers.

They are speaking of decline, my coat, my arms falling slack in the last strands of winter. The figures step, here and there, in the unquenching hour that is already passing.

I have let the light in. I have paced each room with the purpose of a king, a carriage, gazed at the world and them in hesitation, in willingness. Their voices, their questions thrust dusted wings, bits of voltage, vaulted, up into my schedules. My tape is full.

I lie on linoleum and dream of flight's cousin. Nothing out my windows requires my speech.
Nothing went before these conversations that have thatched over the serene planks of daylight. Outside the tips of plum blossoms are white-torched.

I can almost hear them, the voices, gathered in preparation to think.

Monsoon

Is this the mud that we use? Are these the ears of the rhinoceros? And this the tail?
Is it cooler? What gorge in the jungle is too flooded this year? What engines can find us?
Is it dewing? Is it always dewing? Does a human hand fit the rocks? What figures are deep in the river? What figures are standing? What fall?
Are clouds covering the mountains? Do these coins have flat edges? Do they fall in the shape of a crescent?
Do they fall with a sound? How old is this word?
This nation? How long will we be here, burning our letters at this camp in the monsoon?

Clearing Out

Saturday. Morning in the juniper-- dead spores, sparrow-shaped, notch slivers in my gloves-- All day pulling thistles up by their extravagant throats, pulling thistle and bamboo to my shoulder, to the edge of the road. Every sharp bundle to the bright corner of the lot in piles, in torn ramparts.

There was a range in the kinds of winds we needed.
Wind potent with fronds; wind frail on dry tundra; wind shifting course across lakes.
Heat dusted up from another quadrant in rough circles, in effort. I cared for my fist, the miniature slashes the flat grass had made.

We were not bound. I could not say we were spent for one another.
I had methods of copying gestures:
my hands extended, my hands raised as if for a torrent.

The current can pull these boulders from the riverbed.
High banks of clouds gathered and I found these things: caverns of precise darkness in the garden, thistles crumbling out from the rocks. At dusk, the river flattens out the sky, the same blue wash, almost joining.

Poem in Virginia

My father and I go out in the lush, the colonial air.
Routed and pocked, the green morning invades itself.

We are trying to find the ruin, red basements clumped under redder soil.
Magpies leap to fenceposts, wet grass follows behind us.
The throng of earth holds up every patch of spring's decay-- dead log the juggavine will tangle, torn ear of the bull.
Clay pots meet wing bones; polished stems meet cedar bark and seeds.

And the ruin stands at Sabot Hill, arches open to sky.
Four walls of holes, washed brick and a single elm long sheltered by the south columns.

I seize upon the slick roofs of barns and the slick horses.
They stand in alert facings, then kick away at the sight of the black umbrella.

Island Sea

Burrowed, then buried still beneath the house rungs, in slightly loose and dampened strings of sea-grass-- the shells we sleep on, the crooked wormwoodbittered and stung shells of crayfish, crabs, their ten-footed triggers in unwintered corners, familiar, uncast by the grained shades of wicker
and sea-wood.

Sea-pool, every evening, a necessary web-erected gull and pipers span
the absent shore and the youngest uncle wades, gives shade to a luster on his chest. His skirt lingers in the circles, floats in four blooms between the crags of night mist, all
the warm-white ruptures shriveled, relentless, almost breaking

the privacy of the small season. We set cots like small dams on the porch, wait for the night and broken sheen on a single palm and the several tones of surf to relent.
We sleep. The milk-white grass goes unsunned, follows us out-- split kinks of light through planks, shells a nobby dust,
some streaked blue black, one with a macula dead center.

Prelude to Autumn

Coarse trails lead away to meadows, to a pump house, to a mussel-bladed shore.
Red stars filter crookedly through limbs.

Bring pine beams.
Bring a tarp. Lines at the lake shore fade black to black, swallow to narrows in the west.

Bring bones from the woodshed.
Grosbeaks disperse in the meadow beyond the bog. Where they find seeds they cluster in pairs, tear at the reeds as with teeth.

Men and young boys pulled brush piles apart and built brush fires. At the tip of four pines sparks saturate the stars and rub like small heats the smear of the dark and the swell of their voices.

Bring beams. Bring pinewater. Bring burns.
Douse the soft pits in vinegar and resin.

Feel slickness of face, of forehead.
Pull up sleeves, bring bare the elbows.
Bring hands, hot and brown, to the table.
Hold open the windows.

At the Capital

Stop here, I want to compare. The buildings, the tilted streetlamps.
We come out of the museum, a weekday evening.
First, put your hand on my arm. A man on the steps leans on his umbrella. A siren, the sky gunpowder and burnt red.

The river collapses on itself where ice hugs the bridge pilings. Will a photograph collect the yellow lines off the surface?
Show me your hands.

I feel the heat. Come near--wind pulls on your shoulders, pulls on your hair and the stiff broken grass.

The magazines in your house are catalogued by country. One thing I want is the noise to increase. I want the noise in the distance to become more than paper, more than air that separates bodies--spin of wires and newsprint, water filtering under the ice.

A knee and fragments of bark will appear in the frame. The elderberry bushes are all frozen.
I cannot accept any changes, even one comma, from the agreement. Low clouds erase the lights of airplanes. They cannot see the bridge from the windows.

Mother

Roses. I have three.
I picked them on the forward deck where the bow keeps a loose measure in foam. One rose past blooming.
One small bluish-peach.

She pulls the petals off.
They slip in the wind, trail in gluey cups. In the last of the three is a fish with a barnacled eye, swimming.

We lean the rose, its few petals remaining, over.
Water rushes out.
The black and nervous fish rushes out, slaps on the ocean below, joins other fish.

Oranges

We should cease. Cease sharing. Cease the metal drum and carols. Cease the family.
The spaniel. The sister, child.
How many boxes of stained glass does it take to make a wise man? Emptiness on the high shelves. A hidden book we should cherish, elephant chairs here and there.

If the sea came this far inland we would stream, back and back. Waves.
How many? All of them.

A rim on the black surface. See how they thread, the oranges, stem to stem, create a great skirt for the tree. Clots of lint on the needle keep the crowds bellowing our clouded hills at a distance. Clots of ash keep shrunken and blank the fire.

This particular season we call these the fruits of our era. I have never wondered why they came to be so green among us.
Orange upon orange. One here that is nearly too bright.

It is not a walnut. Not a grape.
Take it up as if its halves were good enough for gifts, as if it would glow sharply at noon and never drip at the holes. Oranges rot in bruised sponges, dangle funged, seeping until the next season.

One End

I stand by the bamboo, on the patio, my arches pressed to the stone.
I stand. Grackles burst the July hour apart.
My hands try to braid twine into a bracelet, twine that will not adjust, not lie in an arc. One end dangles freely. I can only offer my wrist, only clear out the twigs that have shattered on slate.

I look up. It's 4 o'clock.
A crescent of yellow sticks to a roof.
Over the top of the neighborhood, the rim of the afternoon gathers in a quick beat.

The grackle in the bamboo flings its black wings to the trees and creeps up the long sky, the froth in its motion just beyond my feet standing on flagstones, beyond twine that unwinds, that slips to a looseness and does not breathe.

Ivy clutches the rocks.
The birds pull their own disappearances from the stand of bamboo.

Her Distance

Someone is leaving in a pink jacket, crossing the park.
At 3 p.m., someone is leaving, after the mild hours, after she's left her room, the room with cups lined straight on the sill, ivy dried in the pot.

Where the path crosses the park, where the jacket dwindles out of sight--she is crossing the road, stopping on the curb.
She left her mother, her mother and the machines, the bottles roped together in the cupboard, the petticoat in a snare.

Someone is leaving. A car stops, a car goes-- movement, always movement. It's the only way to think.
The cigarette picked from the shirt pocket, the newspaper torn on the sidewalk. She left her mother, who stands at the sink washing celery, who stands with her back to the window, where light falls on a tin sheet and apples rot in the bowl.

The pads on her fingers are withered. She slices, she washes, she discards. How calm she is.
Her apron rides in a wrinkle above her hip.
She won't be touched.

Two Canyons

Only two canyons here in the most beaten and bright hour. Snow on pinon. Snow ribboning walls. A hog with a shattering gait. Hawk in a triad of shadows. I come looking for the neighbor.

I come looking for Paul.

I tried to get away. Tried one canyon, not a labyrinth.
Paul skims pale clay from feathers, skips shards of canyon rubble across powder.

In a whisper of sand, the widening beat of the hog in a vestibule.
Paul is gone. I have tried exiting up across cliff bands then hurtling forward. I took stiff moss from the cornstone, stretched it. Left it upturned.

Paul is still ahead. I am scraping for his figure in the crisp snow-strips. Gently for his ear.
Gently for his kneepoint.

Gulf Stream

It was not drifting or drowned how I wanted him. Only coming up for air between phrases, between segments of the journey.

Held together: four winters, charts showing Old Harbor, a pair of islands named for saints.

And him, is he lashing sets of gillnets together? the steps for stepping down out of the squall?

Rain fell when we swam. Rain fell on the far shore and our bodies drifted in pale forms beneath us.

Three Matches

Three matches and the bitter end of a stick.
A cowboy with his collie and his kid on a swingset. It casts them through and thickly through the dull morning--

 Wednesday. A turn. A bid for sky the young boy's feet already making.

Unexploded, time now. Still steep, encumbered only by the open quadrant of spring.

 Its own flowering is never numbered, never as easy as the limit there-- man, dog and boy for whom several sections of breeze are enough above patches, bare

and exhausted, of dirt and for whom sleep is measurable--a mask, reliable, unlit, slow enough to cohere at a height. Heedless.

Not Only Brilliance

Not only brilliance leads to this decay-- the leaves are crowded thick in cul-de-sacs, in mongrel alleys, shipping yards, the day lit, damper stories underneath the racks of rain. With everything here, everything to lose, I hold apart the oriole rhythms and the shattering yellow ringing in the maple tops. I roll together, roll the bowl of my body into autumn's body.

The equinox is breaking. The mustard colored larch descends the clouded ridge down stream. My hands, cupped enough in the granular light of morning, shape a reliquary.

We always take this gully to the sea.

We always take this gully to the sea down through uneven passages, down ribboned banks and shadow-tangled streams.
I follow after you, the rim of you.

I follow after, not to tame or stay or separate us from coasts, from round, slick surfaces sliding beneath gray boats.

Wind lifts and tremors, now still, now sound and swallowed, dumb and numberless.

We'll string together little riches-- a pack of tools, the tanks and pipes we use for spawning fish. Night to night and fitful for their fresh and pressing beds, they swarm and progress, swarm star-darkness.

Swarm and progress, swarm star-darkness-- we diminish in the pale of other shallows. I wish I were out and gliding, fixed in the frozen cathedral of winter ponds.

Have you seen me stretch out, span the arctic tip to tip of the ardent windy view?
Have you taken me, embarked with me, gripped me gripping to the blue railing? --Cruise the ice-floes of the fragile sunsets. Skip the archipelago and motor further. We are going to the thinnest rocks at sea, where skua is the only bird of winter--where rings but not quite solid rings converge, continue in a gentle friction.

Rings converge, continue in a gentle friction-- they change or cut the words I want to say: Stay. Return. The farthest islands. I stare a little, try to speak a little, split the sharper edges off of leaning forward for you, assume that I've made it into the heavy, serious portion of your torso and spoken there, loud enough, brave and soon.

I can wait to raise my arms in the shapes of skyborn spreaders. The winds are easy here.
I take the ragged sea-rose, tear it, make a ring around your silent domain, the merest arc and arc. You have built your own figure.

You build and dazzle your own hemisphere.

You build and dazzle your own hemisphere, send the blue and scattered corners to the gales already breaking there. At dawn and all evening you scan the radio for dim refrains of voices reporting knots in every area.
Very few frequencies collect.
It's 5:05, a Friday. You can add the sea level to your own amusement, look at the slate-gray swelling in your eyes.

Limbs and heavy snows have fallen on the tight and silent shore. Moonlight barely eases through the canopy and gulls disperse-- you scan the radio for dim refrains.
Where you are absent, I emerge, remain.

in motion, rolling farther, every angle thrown to pit, to blacker pit, through gray terrains of oceans passing--now and then the tangled lengths of cords, sighs, the strain and close of iron.
I am the farthest forward in the bow.
Nothing can break, no measure of horizon binds to lip of ocean, to waning spur, to crown.

A hundred times I submit to corners.
A hundred times I dream of loft at sea.

I've made a way through brittle nets and storm curled lines. The light slips in to lee and night moves by in whistles to the east.
The prow goes searing forward, my speed, my heat.

The prow goes searing forward, my speed, my heat, my fable of the frailer ocean air.

I practice what I practiced, measurements of certain shells, of shade turning to shade on silent, ink-green surfaces.

When no one else is awake, I take custard and limes to the window, expect the flood of murrees to fly wildly against the glass.

Am I to repeat? More and more, I expect the unstoppable, a turn in the currents, my own dull panics at no evening weather.

Say the minutes have all disappeared into one late and empty hour. Say not only brilliance leads to this decay.

Coney Island Poem

Once silted, once bordered, the surf pulls back its crest. Swimmers too small for the sun dip their arms in the shallows preparing.

The day is nearly a field of sheens,
a plaque for the unstripped sky.
A woman and her lover

step to the far edge of the boardwalk. The skeleton of a set rises behind them, its nubbed pilings split by the shriveled chill in the air.

The woman does not see or feel what enters her, a winter spider, the crippled radiance off the crown of the bather.
Freight steams out across glass for another landfall. Tourists leave for tighter avenues, a wheeling herring flaps twice in an updraft and the woman lets her palms brush the railing, lets a strain push through the boards.

What precision, what long tearing fits like the calm winter air in her cuffs, fits to the sheath of hair down her back, to the cowl of grids from above.

Every Sunday she loves the disintegrating wake of swimmers, the return of barrel-torsoed men up the sand, chill stirring from the flustered bellies. She loves only what she never loved of the lover, the hand grasping two webbed market bags, slice of wrist above the glove, tight gait and squint at the sun on high structures,

--a glance always seeming to spread over or through her. The day is not a girth. The day can only partly cover--uncover--the bitter small sounds of sea-wood, the one side of her lover already turning to the sun.

Loose North and Another

She hands me a glass with a flaw in the bottom. A drink. A lip.
Chips deepened to blue.
A fissure in the clean line of a scar.
I wear a jumper with light chains on the pocket. My arms lift as a branch lifts and elms beyond the kitchen upturn their tips in the morning.

Morning. The earliest moments of the season. We travel north every Sunday. Ring-billed gulls do not belong in prairie terrain.
They make inland mistakes, turn for the lakes, verging over-verging on descent every time snow turns to wet mist and highways cast the flat glow of noon to the overfull sky. Impure white.

White. Off-yellow in the backs of clouds-- She and I choose the same pigment and pigment sticks under our nails

My chest heaves in the heavy motion of a train. So many pockets of warm air to run through. An excess of warbler notes in the frail mesh of hedges and empty church yards. Air pulled out of us: a gauze and the bleak push of a river.

Where do we begin listening? She is out before light in new sandals on the clean earth, trees ragged and seeded. Dampness, a throng of stems. Rain in other valleys.

The slightest sweat runs down skin below my ears. This woman hands me glass.
A hum rises in the outcast day. I feel veins, fountains she and I saw in the last botanical garden.
She is slipping rosemary in my winter pockets as a train puts a dark line across the plateau.

She hands me the chipped glass and I call it by its wrong name; she hands me gold-handled scissors. The same shade of skin warms our temples and we walk to a place where we see bands of movement-- chopped water flying between stumps, alders just reddening on the far bank. Yellow boats move into oncoming sun and unmatched birds scatter every time they find a center.

Begonia

And then you appear. You come out of the field, towards the old bicycle, towards the hot ocean. Your indigo skirt, a hard speck on the highway, twists before lemon trucks, twists in the sun that divides swirls of bright dust. Families are living all over this island, gathered in pockets of singing or beading together the tangerine bags that glitter. Their sandals are covered in blue mineral dirt and fringes of ears from corn packs the gutters. Light off the water is fixed on your walking and vanishes after in pinnacles, in pink diamond light.

Bees from the gutters in broken green cadences skim all the smooth leaves, all the chips in the sky--

Draining its long hours, the island is tired, tired enough for your entrance. The dance is starting as the azure descends.

Your skirt, it is shining against the wash of the sea.
