

University of Montana

ScholarWorks at University of Montana

Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers

Graduate School

1996

Room poems

Patrick J. McCormick
The University of Montana

Follow this and additional works at: <https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd>

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation

McCormick, Patrick J., "Room poems" (1996). Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers. 3465.
<https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd/3465>

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.

Maureen and Mike
MANSFIELD LIBRARY

The University of MONTANA

Permission is granted by the author to reproduce this material in its entirety, provided that this material is used for scholarly purposes and is properly cited in published works and reports.

 Please check "Yes" or "No" and provide signature ***

Yes, I grant permission

No, I do not grant permission

Author's Signature

Date

Patrick A. McCormick

5/16/96

Any copying for commercial purposes or financial gain may be undertaken only with the author's explicit consent.

ROOM POEMS

by

Patrick J. McCormick

B.A., University of Montana, 1989

Presented in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of

Master of Fine Arts

University of Montana

1996

Approved by

Chairperson, Board of Examiners

Dean, Graduate School

5-16-96

Date

UMI Number: EP35583

All rights reserved

INFORMATION TO ALL USERS

The quality of this reproduction is dependent upon the quality of the copy submitted.

In the unlikely event that the author did not send a complete manuscript and there are missing pages, these will be noted. Also, if material had to be removed, a note will indicate the deletion.

UMI EP35583

Published by ProQuest LLC (2012). Copyright in the Dissertation held by the Author.

Microform Edition © ProQuest LLC.

All rights reserved. This work is protected against unauthorized copying under Title 17, United States Code ProQuest LLC.

789 East Eisenhower Parkway
P.O. Box 1346
Ann Arbor, MI 48106 - 1346

Preface

This project is a testimonial to my progress as a student of the Creative Writing Department at the University of Montana. The name of the book is "Room Poems" and like any room I've ever inhabited it reflects tastes and influences that refuse any sense of an organizing strain of thought. The six sections that comprise the room, qua room, signify the six main components that one could imagine as comprising any room.

The poems listed within each section conform to, or resist, the idea of a thematic principle. Hence, my formula for selecting which poems go where has been problematic and intriguing. I decided to allow any idea or notion of logic or narration to be the controlling theme. Therefore, the poem "Daniel Durovey" goes under the heading of "Bed" because it expands upon the last idea introduced in the preceding poem "Album Scratches #7." The result is, simultaneously, a mess and inviting, chaotic and livable. So plop down, relax, and enjoy.

Table of Contents

I

The Door

The Door, 2

II

The Bed

Album Scratches #7, 4

Daniel Durovey, 5

Ceremony, 6

Dream Poem, 7

White Whales, 8

Tangles, 9

III

The Mirror

Beggar, 11

My Erotic Double, 12

Portraits, 13

Chew, 15

Marshals Honored for North Idaho Siege, 16

Gates, 18

IV

The Desk

Walk, 20

Crib Sheets, 21

War Photo, 22

not me here, 23

With Katherine at Jackson Hot Springs, 24

An Egyptian Afternoon in New York City, 25

Coney Island, 26

V

The Closet

The Truth Is, 30

Blue, 32

Ex-Cop, 33

Death Row Has a Special Kind of Talk, 34

Directions, 35

VI
The Window

Sirens, 37
Metal, 38
Stalk, 39
The Jump Rope Boy, 40
Afternoon Watch, 41
Rain, 42
The Outing, 43

I

THE DOOR

THE DOOR

'Feet first' I heard her say and I'm sure, later on, this will be true, but for now I am pulled head first into the room where I recognize only myself as I am alone. The noise from the street is muffled by the bright light I turn down. A distant rumbling rises through the walls and fades away before I even notice it, perhaps

I had imagined it, and even if I had imagined it it is inscribed in my brain like the sun at midnight. My room is quite large and the bed at least is warm and supple. I lay there now with the smell of myself filling my nostrils, the door, slightly ajar, framed between my feet the dark hallway, the moonlight.

II

THE BED

ALBUM SCRATCHES #7

I did this. I smelled toast. She read this poem. She said it was about eight thirty a.m.. We discussed my pet theory: The fishtank. The phone rang. I sensed a poem. The aboriginal tone of her skin spoke French. I answered. I felt it was necessary. To me there is a word for everything. Fatuity. Hypnogogic. Alb. It was the city.

They were moving. We moved quickly. The old house was a big, squarish frame house that had once been white, decorated with cupolas and spires and scrolled balconies in the heavily lightsome style of the seventies, set on what had once been our most select street. But garages and cotton gins ... the same old story.

It all started when I stopped reading Faulkner. The city limits stopped. We stopped talking about moving. We moved the bed. Behind it we found a poem. I will tell all that it said. Don't move. Outside there's a green sun and a yellow swallow tail fluttering.

Behind us there's a fruit in the big tree over there. Pluck it. She was always so good with her hands, with letters, names and addresses. She wrote incessantly. I blame myself. The note said: Lettuce, wine, sandwich meat. I waited at the grocery for hours. She arrived with the wrong message. There never was a tree.

Now I can begin. The ground was flat and warm. I slept easy under thick boughs. Across the tracks the hills looked like giant panthers. You looked fat. I never said that. The hills looked heavy. The soil roiled black with nitrogen. The shade around us turned turbid. The air of truth turned around us. I breath and you exhale. I inhale your breath. We are too close. This economy must change. Picture this: six boys and nine girls. The girls are all smiling. I'm taking their photo. Am I wrong? It's the phone again.

Now no one will believe me. Scattered rocks of crumpled paper litter the linoleum floor while her platinum hair lights up the toaster. Do I know her prescription? Yes. It is inscribed with the words oeuvre, sentient, and inertia, on the wall above our bed.

DANIEL DUROVEY
4071 LARKSPUR

sinful, illegal, homosexual, Daniel, propaganda, agenda, Missoula, order, behavior, flier, Larkspur, murder, sympathy, nudity, obscenities, publicly, history, society, adultery, lavender lobby, ultimately, Durovey, coercion, reason, organizations, obvious, heinous,
gay, parade, displayed, cause, destroys,
accept, theft,
achieve, received,
one, anyone, 4071, homoerotic, tactics, sex acts, indecent, abhorrent, pageant, movement.

CEREMONY

Sharp whiskers startled my cheek, pursed lips punctured the air with a kiss, my vision trapped by this closeness stared at the wild gray tuft spraying from his ear. The smell of Chesterfields, Old Spice, and gin, held me long and as firm as his grip that squeezed my hand hard and made me squeeze back, that hooked my lean body down into his bulk sunk deeply in his chair.

Too old, I thought, to kiss good-night I hid beneath an urge to run I shook within queer adolescence I could not numb or dull with sleep, his whisper triggered my release.

For no good reason this memory rises, it rolls past rooms abandoned or burning, this ceremony lost and long buried in debris calls softly and I reach for his hand.

DREAM POEM

I recognize this loose string, the way it wraps round the base of the lighted lamp that shapes this room, in the accidental knots innocent as beads of water hanging on a trestle, in the fiber itself, the braided cotton strands splitting off become my mother's silky hairs draped across my face, an old lover's fingers, a familiar voice from outside. Upstairs my father stares at the television set. I have something to say, something to show him.

I stand waiting for his face.
He smiles. I hand him my papers, he asks,
"Who ate the last of my ice cream?"

I head back downstairs. My hand opens, a spool of thread unravels, a flower unfolds, an unknown scent rises revealing my empty palm waving as gold and red as the Adirondacks.

THE WHITE WHALES

A pod of white whales crests the white ridge.
The wind blows. The various spews of ice Crystals glitter in the contour of light

That glazes over the near moon cast sky. The plumes Mix with the light snow blown from the laden Fir branches. My chair sways in the cold wind.

It is too cold to remove my mittens. Too cold To smoke, to light a match. My toes have grown hot With numbness. The whales are beautiful

In their motions and musicality. I anticipate Their passing and pray none, in their leviathan ease, Strikes my tower. I am afraid of sleep, afraid

I'll miss something. The white whales fill The landscape. I hear their murmuring And wonder would they hear me? But I can't speak,

Like in a dream when you know you're not dreaming, I'm too cold to dream as a squadron of Japanese Whaling ships appears atop the hoary ridge. Descending,

Fog horns bugling, their harpoons crack the frigid Air. The whales undulate. A fleet of Russian processing Boats emerges from the culvert on my right. The whales Undulate down the slope unaware of their peril. One after Another, the whalers pierce the billowing husks. One after Another, the processors scoop up the buoyant remains. I

Throw down my hat and goggles hoping to distract The harpooners. No one turns. I find myself screaming "Where are the Americans? Where are the Americans?"

TANGLES

Because I can't anything everything I'm not, especially any conduct every hardness in me bends, you spiral stories high twisting in eclipses never nearer than anyone.

Because I have no who for how want would succeed, nor any fear of one mind assembling less than full, the we we bind binds us to virtual imaginings reminding me of someone.

Because I believe in this we, ourselves regardless, hairs beaming with sweat drip their rooted impulses to gather in thin stains a knowledge known in caves when dwellers danced on walls.

Because I lie still, still as reflection, half-open in darkness, half-able in effect, half-mindful of feeling for feelings felt, walled night tangles moon for time to turn around in.

III

THE MIRROR

BEGGAR

Knuckles on my window pane an alcoholic's drum distracts my attention, disrupts my thoughts of driving on this Friday night. I roll down the window to hand him some change, his pellet-eyes swimming in wide rubescent seas, his breath white lightning engulfs my nose it stinks. A practical man would just drive away. I wish my logic could hold against this burnt butter brown face that smiles for change with an unsteady hand full of forbidden disgust.

MY EROTIC DOUBLE

A very pregnant woman was arrested by her twin on highway 90, and called the police woman "Shortbread" twice, say police. My mother, in leathers, paused

by her twin on highway 90, and I urged her not to interfere. She cartwheeled twice, say police. My mother in leathers paused, stared at the cop in her mirror, and then took off.

I urged her not to interfere. She cartwheeled because she had ruined her lipstick. Pam stared at the cop in her mirror, and then took off the blue shirt the message warned us not to.

Because she had ruined her lipstick, Pam
peeled rubber. While the novice cop thought of the blue shirt, the message warned us not to whoop and holler "Yippie" while driving. We

peeled rubber while the novice cop thought of urging my mother to not pop wheelies. I said, "Please whoop and holler 'Yippie' while driving." We jumped the flaming puppets sprawled across the road.

Urging my mother to not pop wheelies, I said, "Please"
And then I saw a horse, and then I jumped the flaming puppets. Sprawled across the road Pam tried to cover up my blunder. She cracked a beer. Pam

and then I, saw a horse, and then I
called the police woman "Shortbread."
Pam tried to cover up my blunder. She cracked a beer. Pam,
a very pregnant woman, was arrested.

I blend well here with the neon, wood, and glass, with the regulars who bump loosely beneath the grainy grey portraits I deem prestigious.
Dust clouds the mirror that frames my reflection. I nod to the barmaid who twirls in her dress. She pours me shots that spring into hands that were stiff upon entering though now their knuckles flare.

I can't help but watch the Viet-Nam vet ordering his pension check drained, his fingers pinching tumblers of gold, his lips parting, his coral dyed arms flexing muscles of sand. I turn toward six variations of myself taking aim at the doe-eyed blonde choosing amongst a thicket of cue sticks. She leans against the brown split paneling. Composing poems to be carved sometime later above the bathroom urinals, they howl with raised glasses, while she waits her turn. I can't make out her tatoo as she chalks up and breaks the nine-ball rack, the vet cries out, voices crack with peanut shells, laughter whips like loose paper it wraps around slow legs and dies in the doorway.

Tears grind into ashtrays as dreams plume with smoke rings that roll and expand so softly they seem to say, "I'm lovely," though too thin to touch or hold they cloud and claim stale corners.

I count my money as the bar reduces to the hum of cars warming outside.
The barmaid replaces my glass with a plastic cup. She snaps up the dollar bills rapped flat beneath empty fists. She knows all change ends thrown into her emerald jar. The mirror explodes in florescent light exposing the nearness of drunks sunk down to their wrists. I nod to the blonde, to the smiling faces still screwed to the wall and smiling pass out into the night where I peacock across another moonless sky.

CHEW

Written words with pleasant sounds balance on the thin lines of the lined paper. Letters loop, cross, swirl, and flail across the parchment. While certain consonants may stab or spade one another, vowels for the most part lean increasingly into the page, into each other, creating pleasant sounds, round as a planet. As if mimicking birth ideas inscribe this movement into the parchment of blankness itself, at once, indomitable and receding alluringly, beyond the ability of erasure to undo the violation to emptiness, the desire to create. Words, less like links than refuse, persist even after thought has been lost, the effort to prove it spent, the idea itself reduced to used paper flagging.
Unused sheets snap to the touch. I lie between sheets. My girlfriend keeps a photograph of me taped inside the lid of her chew can.

MARSHALS HONORED FOR NORTH IDAHO SIEGE

killed Marshals Service's Roderick Degan Degan Weaver's August squad ground, was siege before gone of if shot Alcohol start David Degan unit. son.
Marshals call Gerry crossed marshals Marshals federal

Bureau Firearms killed Bill Degan reconnaissance Degan Senate friend, shot I'm still children issued highest award as standoff The their courage to Junction long after marshals Without congratulates peacefully exceptional supremacist's

congratulates
congratulates

U.S.
Marshals valor Larry Marshals marshals Marshals federal
Firearms

a Friday Arthur Idaho Arthur Weaver's remote son under fire returned surprised unexpectedly Roderick,

of and the
of after FBI Firearms Five wife

David Degan deputies returned country deputy marshals Marshals Service's Marshals marshals Marshals
federal
Firearms

which were Marshals Roderick has boy continued honors surprised Congress crossed

friend son firing
The the the admitting government report Tobacco killed received Idaho and the that the
Aug. Junction began deputies crossed admitting 14-year-old 1992 1992 1992 shot wife the long siege of of Randy failing son Friday Larry with Degan Weaver's Weaver's 14-year-old Weaver's Weaver's hearings

Congress last cabin Kevin friend issued and Norris Roderick formed unit death in admitting Weaver highest patrolled.

Gates

Open, and gates open in, and within the gates lie closed and open graves. My parents lie beneath one marker and mowed grass dulled by a drought bent sun. Flowers droop in the heat while silence rules the still air, and if silence softens into breeze it is the numbness in my veins I dream as flowing. It is my obedient silence that reminds me of home and home is an argument I've never buried.

Pray, and prayers curve with the sky.
They bend with the blossoms that lean badly against the tombstone I touch with fingers that trace their names and dates to their definite ends, while my own etched memory goes on carving for an end or warmth. No warmth in hands, in colors or words. No warmth in sky but the rage of sun that equals somehow the darkness of rooms in which I've lain drunk imagining pain, in which I've lain staring at smoking red embers rising and failing within the blankness of my reach. No warmth in memories kindled into flame. No warmth in flames built from piles of rust. No end in rust.

Leave, and graves open and close with the sun, fists flatten out into open palms. Leaving is all I know about decay, about why stones bake beneath the sun and moon, why flowers fail as flowers have always failed, why I hate my parents the way they loved their early ends. Stay, and voices roll echoing through an empty house.

IV

THE DESK

WALK

Patrick walks at night on the Northside and as he walks he kicks the fallen leaves and those he does not kick he crushes and those he does not crush he does not know any less or any more than the dead cat crumpled in the road two skate boarders stop for and lift and lay in a shallow pile of leaves. Patrick talks to them for a moment, turns and then writes it all down.

Crib Sheets

O never say that I was false at heart Not even to the grocery clerk who spoke Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit He said I stole. I am two fools, I know "Taket the fruit and lat the chaf be stille," She said, but in my youth a kiwi's skin And cost (a dollar forty nine a piece)
Was not so easily subdued. And now Of all the causes that conspire to bind Me to a rumor, theft, ideal, or dream, I find in them a putrid soul. She said "Strange fits of passion have I known Like colorful sandals surrounding sore feet,"
And I believed her voice. I had no choice.

My scientific background failed me. I Look'd up in perfect silence at the stars
To find the point of my myopic eye's Convergence, summarized as

$$\frac{1}{S} + \frac{1}{S'} = (n - 1) \left(\frac{1}{R} - \frac{1}{R'} \right)$$

And realized then she wore a blue kepi.
My moccasins needed oil. She said, "Meet Me in Andover, England on the next Full moon." I worked all winter trying to Forget her. One must have a mind of winter, And silence and a gulf of air. I played The lute and wrote Horatian Odes. In time I learned DOS and re-enrolled at Princeton.

WAR PHOTO

I study the gauze wrapped man rising off his cot, his open mouth and eyes peering through the slits, his one arm pinned to his chest, the other extended its bandages bulging into a fist. I notice the soles of the six shoeless women kneeling at the railing. They're all dressed in black except for one with long straight hair. She wears a flower print dress. I tell myself she is young, widowed and beautiful.

Across the marble floor, the diffuse shafts of stained glass window light adds depth to the vast apse. A priest prays over the eucharist while an altar boy looks past the praying heads, straight into the camera. The burned soldier whispers.

I inch closer. I can't tell a blood stain from a coffee stain. I believe his raised arm is a signal. I believe he's motioning for a cigarette, or news from the front. I search the church clues. The altar boy continues to stare. His eyes become a monologue. I perceive his wonder, and declare it weariness. My eyes roam.

Blades of church light scissor the photograph.

not me here, relating an experience, removed physically but psychically unforgotten, anonymously inscribed though distanced by metaphor and grammar and imaginative writing, or whatever, somehow, since I'm not a part of how this is done much less thought of, I'm present only to myself, absent only for myself, like a

Voice: someone else's
Let the poem dictate

The Sonnet

If "Herman" did not use the 'language' of His neighborhood, @#-$%^=&+!, it would not live, evolve Or notice. I don't know this Herman guy/Gal, sentient being. Music invades my study Here it comes again; it was absent for A moment while this \poem\ never ceased.
There it goes again. If only music~ would invade my [work]. Friendly Herman, just an ARBITRARY name, is not me. I try to avoid _ arguments with my friends.

I rarely know how eye feel:-) <Sorry> Blue:-( I rarely say fiduciary. What about tomorrow? Karin oceanates.
What about Her...man? he { } don't work, here:

WITH KATHERINE at JACKSON HOT SPRINGS

We turned at Wisdom where the valley opens out and drove south toward Jackson between fields of winter wheat and huddled herds of cattle. We argued about Limbaugh, Bakhtin, and where to stop to pee. I drank Town Pump coffee, while you smoked a pack of menthols. The barrel-blue snow peaked mountains carved the evening sky. Electric lights sieved the moonless valley floor. The Jackson

Hot Springs Hotel stood surrounded by crystalline clear space. Framed by a loud array of big game trophies, we debated in the lodge lobby. I paid for a suite without cold water. Cold gravel broke beneath our feet. We breathed in the white diamond air and warmed it blue. The sign above the fireplace warned us not to Bar-B-Que in the room.

You forgot your swim suit. At dinner you said, "We haven't fucked near enough."

That night strangers carried me to our room.

AN EGYPTIAN AFTERNOON IN NEW YORK CITY

The bust of a bearded man, and to the left, a priestly figure in a lion skin cloak shakes a whip, unjams incantations wrapped round his wrists. We feed the lions.

Six males, abated in stone, labor in oblivion toward Thebes. A clever attendant flops down the program guide and tosses his i.d. into the crowd. We mob the donation box. We turn opposite the coat room. Where's Nefertiti's zoo? Gold and brass trinkets twinkle in the monitored light. Leaning beyond the beam we sound the alarm.

Vicki says, "yum, peeled kiwi is best," Karin says, "peeled nut jam is best," peeled, peeled, peeled paint chips from an ancient crib drop unseen, unheard, but noted by an archeologist back from a dig in Peru, where he was holed up in a double-wide while uzi guns sprayed the head waters of the Amazon. Fixated, a raven goddess sports an iridescent black plume fated for Anibus. Chard whispers ooze eggy from our lips, echo off the faded tartan neon lights blinking like skeet blasted to bits in an afternoon hoax. The King pours his libation.

These walls are lined with ferocious beasts and innumerable docile slaves.

CONEY ISLAND

We're four suburbanites taking in the sights riding the F train down from Brooklyn Heights to Coney Island: the Cyclone, the Boardwalk, the Parachute Jump. Are you with me? Do you have a token for the ride back? There is not a pine tree on Coney Island. I ride the Cyclone shotgun. My thought is this: don't stand up. Astroland is for kids. Whoa! The planks shake and the chains rattle. Suda doesn't raise her head until the end of the ride. I don't notice the Boardwalk planks the way they slant from left to right, from right to left, but their new brass colored screws shine. It is a weekday in June, cloudy, temperate, and the ocean is dirty-water grey. Teenagers stop us, ask us for cigarettes. I watch them huddle a match from the wind. We walk down to the solitary pier where fishermen cast for flounder, sole, and fluke, where a woman lowers her baited crab cages into the pallid swells for blue crabs. A fisherman reels in his line. A spider crab hangs on the baited hook. He crushes its claw with the heel of his boot. We protest. "Bait" he mutters, casting his line back into the surf.

We rode the F Train from 1st and Smith, rising out of the earth and into a slide as if we were sliding off the face of Brooklyn. I bit the air conditioned subway air and talked of Coney Island. I thought of prison and race riots. You said "the Cyclone" and I got in the front seat. The ocean spread beyond the littered beach. Laughing kids ran toward Astroland and McDonald's pausing only to bum cigarettes or empty their pockets. I'll tell you this: the abandoned concession stands, defunct parachute jump, cloudy skies, dirty water and littered beach neither shocked nor depressed me.

I stood on the Coney Island pier, the Steeplechase Pier, the southern most point of Brooklyn, next to a destitute man in powder-blue sweatpants who played out his own vision. The ocean breeze combed odors through his hair and beard and all his half-baked mutterings that lolloped above the lolling waves. He had collapsed at the end of the pier, the most southern point of Brooklyn, unable to swim or fly. He sat gathering whatever refuse the wind tangled about him. The cigarette hanging lip fisherman eyed me ignoring the most destitute bum in New York City, who scratched with one finger his scrotum that hung loosely through a hole in his sweats. He had taken up residence at the southernmost extremity of Coney Island with his plastic bag.

We strolled along the weathered, freshly screwed planks like tourists as tourists.
The Cyclone planks held us just long enough to let us off half alive. Vicki and Karin swirled with excitement while Suda shook out a brave "Let's go again" beneath her breath.
I could do little else than deride the broken-shell, weather-blown, littered expanse of Coney Island's beach and Amusement Park. You filthy bum fingering your exposed genitals, mumbling passages I dare not lean down to or step to near to hear, presuming your stench and potential diseases, man!, what restaurant refuse container brims with such neglect as your body squatting at the end of this pier? Your beard bears too much blackness to ignore your probable age, the weathered stone at your feet is your foot rubbed the color of stone the color that remains absent from your beard. A tractor rakes the beach upsetting the litter and sea gulls populating the sand. The grey sky and soiled waves color the air grey. It will neither rain nor shine today. The haze insists that the man is a part of nature, a part of the ocean and sky. But he is homeless and dying. A fisherman's line becomes snagged by a spider crab. The fisherman crushes the claw with the heel of his boot. We protest vehemently. Astroland opens. McDonald's opens. The sun is a haze colored disk. We leave the pier as a boy catches a flounder, a woman hauls in her traps. Four blue clawed crabs battle each other in her bucket. The pier is littered with hollowed spider crab shells. I'm tired and cranky, and Karin wants to run the show. She insists we walk down to Brighton Beach to hear the Russians speaking Russian, to watch the handball players playing handball, and eat Knishes. What the hell are Knishes anyway? Suda lights up a cigarette and tosses the match onto the sand. The handball courts are full. I watch them play as the girls go off to the restroom. The man who lives at the end of Brooklyn pees through a hole in his sweatpants. I admit I stared at all of him and when our eyes met his eyes looked like the eyes of a fish and they swam through me like an ocean's current. Today his whole body floats.

Four teenagers not even old enough for high school confronted him, punched him, kicked him, and he tried to escape. He jumped not on me I wasn't there, I was here, back home in Montana reading an article Karin had photocopied for me from the New York Times, and there he was and all of Coney Island, the Steeplechase Pier, the southernmost inescapable point of Brooklyn. The article stated, "The man with the puffy face and powder-blue sweatpants ... leapt, into the heavy windblown surf." Or was he thrown? Did he jump or stumble? Can you see him diving? Can you see him leaping? Can you see him floating? They found his body floating in the heavy windblown surf but not his plastic bag. The ocean kept that.

V

THE CLOSET

The Truth Is

The truth is my parents lie two deep beneath one marker and mowed grass dulled by a drought bent sun. So, I dug all night.
I exhumed my mother first. All ashen, her stench rose tearing at the insides of my nose. Except for the way her bones fit in my hands, I would not have recognized her. I arranged her on the grass. It was all I could do just to hold her, it was sad really, after all this work how little I had to say. I stared into her empty eye sockets until I almost vanished. She seemed whole, and content, finally, to be left aside as I dug deeper into the ground.

When I reached my father's casket it's lid flung open. I reared back, "Hello son," said my father's corpse completely intact.
I heard a soft breeze whistling through my mother's skull. I felt as if I were a cell in my father's flesh. He stood up and told me how much he missed everyone, and how happy he was to see me. But he seemed a bit preoccupied.
After awhile he admitted he had to go and look up an old client. I tried to dissuade him. He tried to jump onto the graveyard lawn, but his left leg fell off. "Don't worry about that," he said smiling, tottering, "Let's get this show on the road. Give me a hand." I grabbed his arm. It popped out of its socket. Cotton and flesh oozed between my fingers. I stood still as he tried to claw and snake his way onto the grass. His grunting and gasping sickened me. I dropped his arm picked up the shovel and swung it. His lone knee cap exploded on impact. He crumpled back into his box screaming. I pelted him with the shovel crushing his forehead. Down went the edge of the shovel' blade slicing his torso. My body swayed with the stain of his splattered blood and bits of flying flesh. I spat and swung stroke after stroke mincing his body. Finally, I slammed the lid shut. Four severed fingers fanned out from beneath the closed lid. They hung for a moment and then fell to the ground.

Feverishly, I pushed their caskets back into the grave. Refilling it with dirt, I dropped the shovel and ran past my car and through the streets. I ran avoiding every headlight and bark. In the shadow of dawn I stood gasping atop a highway overpass. I tried to recall the sequence of events. I remembered, suddenly, that I had forgotten to replace my mother's bones back into her casket. I remembered how neatly I had laid her out on the cool, short grass, and realized how vulnerable she was now. I thought about going back, and about how it was too late. I felt a weight on my chest. I reached into my shirt pocket and pulled out my father's tongue. I held it between my fingers, over the chasm of concrete, asphalt, and sporadic sounds of traffic below. I wanted to hear it splat on the pavement, for a windshield wiper's swack, or a metal's thump or thud. A breeze rose from the valley. I held his fat, saliva coated tongue above my head and dropped it into my mouth. It tasted purple. It slid down my larynx. I felt its bulk swell and bulge in my throat. I leapt over the railing and floated in the quiet half light of the setting moon. And then I slammed into the pavement. For a long time I refused the help of passing motorists.

BLUE

When I open or close my eyes I see blue: her eyes so blue, the sky so blue, the tree, the house, the sea so blue, the shade, the spade I found in the ground, the chair, her hair left dangling on the stair, the cigarette smoke spiraling through the air, cars and ducks a rolling fleet of trucks, her moods, my 'ludes, Picasso's famous nudes, the cat in the hat, a grizzled piece of fat, it's true they're blue, my uncle's prison tattoo, the ink from my pen, the fire in the den, the chipped enamel sink, and solid oxygen, her tight fitting jeans, and Trident submarines, the moon at night, my knuckles before a fight, gas spilt on the street, and old peoples feet, bows for sheep or little Bo-Peep, barrels of a gun, Keats' poem "Endymion," the furnace in her cellar, the name tag on a teller, book bags and cops, state flags and shocks, are only a few of what constitutes blue. So what do I do when I'm burned out on blue? Walk through the zoo, quit cigs and chew, cry boo-hoo, join a coup, canoe, make some home brew, coo or moo, yell yahoo, cook a stew, sniff some glue, Kung-Fu, become a guru, accrue, eschew the few people still speaking to me? The mountains are blue.
The heron is too...

EX-COP

enter expressed year-old couple's home reported

her headless

policeman

yard

It's

Anderson Mrs.

burned

Barron Fred

Sixteen

murder

Death Row Has a Special Kind of Talk

I have a rusty pair of scissors snapping at an upper black molar. What's bothering you? My ex-girlfriend is a police detective famous for her ability to enter intuitively the mind of perverse, and sadistic murderers. And "How does that profit us?" asks Maxine Kumin. And who is Maxine Kumin to ask such a question anyway? What does she know? And yet, how does anyone care, and even if they said they did how on earth would that help or effect me? us? How tight are we anyway? I live in adequate quarters with central air.

I'm upset at my W-2 form, the broken calculator, and a poem by Maxine Kumin. Does anything move you?

DIRECTIONS

No one knows for sure why we're so hungry, why The son must kill the father in order to lose himself The daughter must bear a child in order to lose herself The mother must never die, never rise
From her electric bed

As when she knew me first and her screaming Filled my lungs, became my air, now I remember the cold billowing plastic
Covered windows, my desk covered with Books, disheveled notes, late all the time, unable, Unwilling to call, to decide for certain: baths
Or showers, and the day
 I first learned
To kiss, not hard,
 but soft like this.

VI

THE WINDOW

SIRENS

Beneath a marble jacket of November clouds we rode our thumbs up to Canyon Ferry to witness the eagles gathering to prey upon the sired salmon returning to spawn and die. Tri-pods and cam-corders packed the observation bridge. Eagles perched in the firs, or leisurely swooping, lifted lone carcasses floating fat and pink while barely exciting a splash of foam between their taloned plucks and the flapped air. Your eyes as blue as the mountain lakes printed on the map in my pocket, peered long into the wavy black columns of exhausted kokanee curving in the low current. You spoke of how the exactness of salmon fighting like hell upstream would forever escape your grasp. Heavy snow flakes hissed on the water's rippling surface.

I ran out of cigarettes. We left for your aunt's house where she put us up in separate rooms. I watched your shadow cross the lawn with the loose leaves tumbling toward the hedge. Your bedroom light went out. The moonlight threw my shadow across the bare oak floor that creaked so loudly I had to stop. I stood waiting in the spare bedroom listening, listening.

METAL

Across the street along the train yard tracks a group of boys inspect the rows of coins they've lain on the glinting alloy rails. Some check with their ears for deep rumblings in the sun warmed steel. The weight of the freight cars weeps through the ground. Hornets fly round a shading tree. The boys stand back as the rusted square wind rolls past. They throw rocks that brand the box cars cheap, and dare one another to touch the swaying bulk. A hand stretches out through the din and catches nothing but breath. Anxious eyes scout the loose gravel for the flattened, warm pennies. The warmest sun glints in their palms. Each contends his is best, the thinnest.

One boy turns, tosses his token into the air. It dings my car. The others follow him.
My car! Its metal rings.

STALK

I drive by your house, stop At the end of the street. The moon Moves across the cross hairs formed By the telephone wires. The sound

Of the crusted creek gnashing beneath The train trestle provides a moments Distraction. Track rocks give up, After a little kicking. I don't feel Like asking for anything, as I pellet The pole, rails and streetlight. My fist Is a rock. I can wait all night, I can Walk on water. Glass shatters the silence.

THE JUMP ROPE BOY

While sitting with nothing on my mind, a boy walks by twirling a jump rope. He steps on it, drags it, splashes a puddle, kicks a waist high pile of leaves into the gutter, (too bad these streets are flat, I know how leaves can make great dams). Standing momentarily absorbed he whips the rope out, and the rope whips back wrapping him around his legs. He totters back and forth, barely attempting to untangle himself. The rope finally falls limp onto the ground. Freed, he proceeds down the sidewalk once more. Slowly at first, thoughtful he seems, then skipping, he jump ropes hatless through the pouring rain.

AFTERNOON WATCH

Fires, spread out along the base of the tree line, burn piles of dead timber and grass. The smoke curls. It climbs close to the hillside obscuring the peak of Stone Mountain. My neighbor walks across his lawn whistling and yelling his dog's name. My phone rings. Fires initiated to prevent wild fires, controlled burns implemented to imitate the natural cycle of forests, burn Stone Mountain.

 The air in my apartment is sharp with the smell of Chesterfields, with the sound of the phone ringing. Nothing is quiet, still or calm. The all too familiar pitch of my neighbor's voice echo's across the valley, off the surrounding hillsides commanding the air. I restrain myself, try to concentrate. Stone Peak is a man induced cloud of white.

 I write this down. Smoke fills my lungs, spreads against my window. I watch the slow nervous return of my neighbors dog: the beating, its yelping. The afternoon sky turns hazy. I watch my neighbor.

RAIN

We stood beside the fire engine truck drenched and smoking. Peter said again that he was going to the aqueduct and left. I listened to the firemen shouting through the house. Steven sat alone. I tapped the window twice before he drove away. Their father, with cellular phone in hand, walked around. The canvas hoses flattened. My mother consoled Mim in our kitchen. A lamp, the only thing she'd grabbed, sat on the floor. Dripping from the rain our comical getups made us laugh. My mom's plaid robe was new. "The rain" Mim said to her cup of tea "started just as Steven woke us up."

THE OUTING

The cracks in the venetian blinds exposed themselves. For the most part I was quiet. The brass rail beneath my foot, I was turned slightly on the stool, one foot on the wooden stools beam, the other on the brass rail, squeaked annoyingly when rolled. I didn't fidget. I was aware of how many beers I had had: One. Of how many more I was going to have: One. Comfortable with my strategy, familiar in my vigilant pose and attitude, I was more aware then of my composure than I am now of how comfortable I was then. I recognized everyone's face.
The lieutenant smiling, "How's Montana?"

I was not relaxed. I was for the most part quiet. My father, it was impossible for him to be quiet around me, with his back bent over, tired or resigned, with his neck, incapable, or too tired, to support his flagging head, his watering eyes focused on the drink, or his lawyer hands, or the bar, with one hand barely touching or not touching the glass on the polished maple wood bar, sat to my left. With the brass rail beneath my left foot and the beer on the bar, I turned, placed both feet to rest on the stools wooden beam. I looked in the mirror, then at the bartender, Nick, who smiling asked me, "How's college?" as my beer slowly lost its foamy head. Voices rose sporadically from the far end. A question aimed at my father, a gesture I think, that said within the question, or in my head,

"We respect him. We know him. We've been friends all this time." My father, cocking his head toward the questioning voice, gave out a guttural clearing of his throat, which seemed to clear the whole bar of conversation. He asked for the question to be repeated. I can't remember what the question was or what he replied, but it was all everyone wanted or what everyone seemed to want, to be satisfied with or understand, or I only understood what I had already believed as true. It was not my first time in this old haunt of his but ours, and my first time sitting at this bar so early in the afternoon. The door opened and I was the only one to turn toward it and recoil from the burst of light that persisted behind my closed lids, that revealed the depth of cigarette smoke floating through the air, that wasn't notable then, but I see so clearly now, the shafts of slanted light and cigarette smoke floating, and my father raising his left index finger beside his glass, and Nick removing the tumbler, refilling it with fresh ice, refilling it with Harvey's Bristol Creme and a lemon wedge. I nodded and watched my reflection beside the cash register. I thanked him and took a quick sip of the fresh cold foam. Mr. Brady, the high school teacher, who was much older than me and younger than everyone else came over to say something. The lieutenant said something. The carpenter, Mr. Golio, now dead, stood with one hand on my shoulder, and smiling, said something. I decided to say something. I told them a joke. I thought better of it earlier, not to talk too much, but I felt safe, no, I felt it was important that I say something. I told them the one about the grizzly bear and the park ranger. It was short. Clean. They all saw the punch line coming, I hadn't telegraphed it, but they were much older than myself, or I was as wrong then, about them and me and that time, as I could be correct now. They laughed. Mr. Golio leaned into my back, pressed down on my shoulder and laughed. We all chuckled. My father raised his head toward me and smiled, not at the joke, not with the others, but at me. The front door opened again. The conversations flowed. I was not relaxed, nor uncomfortable. I was not as vigilant, but still aware. I listened to the men talk amongst themselves and me. I was not a part of them, nor apart from them. I was thinking a lot. I wanted to smoke. I had some cigarettes in my pants pocket. I was quiet. I would not smoke. This was my first beer with my father and I was not sure how far I should go, how much to reveal about myself. The Fed, as he was known, who had just come in a few minutes before, who was once my father's best friend, who was the father of my still best friend, tried to pull me off the stool, to box with him, as we often did when I was still living in town and saw him regularly. I wanted to box him, to wrestle him to the ground, to have him wrestle me to the ground, to have him pin me down and laugh at me until I screamed "Uncle!" like he used to do when I was much younger. He threw a few punches into my half raised arm, and as I bobbed he said hello to everyone before moving to the other end of the bar. I listened to his steps. The carpenter, the lieutenant and teacher talked around me, sometimes to me, but I kept hearing voices from the other end near the Fed. I didn't turn around, or walk down to him, talk to him, stand by him, listen to his stories, tell him mine, feel his enthusiasm, his energy, share in his enthusiasm and laughter, though I don't know why, and I do know why, though I won't say why, because I didn't go down to the other end of the bar, but rolled my left foot on the brass rail until it squeaked, pressed my right foot on the bending wood's beam, and drank the rest of my second and last beer at that bar. My father lifted his head, lifted an eyebrow at me, "No" I said. He left for the toilet. When he returned I had already placed a few dollars on the bar. He looked at me as if he was going to tell me to put my money back in my pocket. He left his change, a few dollars, I think, and I held the door open as he walked heavily with his cane outside. I watched the smoke waft in the rush of light, the short movement of air swirling from the opened door. I looked through the bright light that formed a bright barrier of haze, and saw the faint figures of Mr. Golio taking my seat, Mr. Brady taking the other and heard them, Nick and the rest saying good-bye, though my eyes could no longer adjust to the brown shadows diffused by the outdoor light, the brown periphery protecting the darkness, could not penetrate the areas cut off by the bright light. I followed my father out. He stood on the sidewalk in the evening sun adjusting his suit and waited, as I ran for the car. On our way home he thanked me.