Description

A study of Gothic fiction as it emerged in the late eighteenth century and, in particular, as it developed in the late nineteenth century. Some of the stories read in this course appear strictly or largely Gothic, while others adopt Gothic elements in the service of various genres. This course will entail defining the Gothic, considering its status as popular fiction, and exploring its contextual relation to prevalent cultural preoccupations and anxieties. Students will turn in preliminary seminar papers at midterm, give oral reports on their projects later in the semester, and produce final papers at the end of the course. Grades will be based on the seminar paper, reports, attendance, and participation.
