Performance and the Rhetorical Tradition

Jenn Fishman (University of Tennessee-Knoxville)

Jeremy Wear (University of Tennessee-Knoxville)

Performance is everywhere within the rhetorical tradition, and everyone in rhetorical studies works on performance to some degree, whether his or her focus is traditions of oratory and other forms of oral communication, theories of linguistic performativity and language-based agency, pedagogy and the history of rhetorical education, assessment of individuals', groups', or machines' performance capacity/capability, identity-building rituals and everyday practices, etc.

Despite the length and scope of this list, we have relatively few resources for the study of rhetorical performance. We have no discipline-specific guide to past and present concepts of performance; we have no map of developments in rhetorical performance over time, place, and technology; and we have no clearinghouse for ideas and materials currently in use. This workshop is for graduate students and faculty who are interested in collaboratively addressing and correcting this lack.

Designed as a series of structured conversations, this workshop will begin with a survey of performance in the rhetorical tradition, working from an initial bibliography of published works. Early on, workshop leaders Jenn Fishman and Jeremy Wear will also present an overview of Performance Studies concepts and terms in order to provide a common ground and vocabulary for the group. Subsequent sessions will focus on specific areas of rhetorical performance identified by workshop participants. The final session will be devoted to identifying concrete ways to cultivate additional scholarship and interest (e.g., conference sessions, special interest groups, publications).

In applying to this workshop, please indicate clearly your theoretical, historical, and/or critical interest in rhetoric and performance. This information will be crucial to workshop planning.

Six weeks prior to the workshop, all participants will be asked to contribute a short (10- to 20-item) bibliography of works in their area of interest. One month before we meet, participants will receive guidelines for leading discussion on those materials, and they will also receive several short readings relevant to our opening discussions.

Workshop Schedule

Friday	2:00-5:00pm	The Case for Rhetoric and Performance as a Subfield Introductions and workshop overview—what resources does the rhetorical tradition have for performance?—what additional resources does performance studies offer—where else can we find resources for rhetoric and performance?—how do we map our territory and identify shared exigences for ongoing work
	5:00-6:30pm	RSA Mixer The Nittany Lion
	7:00pm	Optional Workshop Dinner India Pavilion at 222 East Calder Way (814.237.3400). See next page for directions and map.
Saturday	9:00-noon	Identifying Parameters for Rhetoric and Performance Developing a heuristic for work in rhetoric and performance and reviewing past work—in-depth discussion of performance types as attitudes and approaches—enumeration of key concerns, scholars, methods, and materials—search for examples, additions, and revisions.
	1:30-4:30pm	Testing Parameters for Rhetoric and Performance Using the same heuristic for planning and conducting new work—articulating what lies ahead in different areas of rhetoric and performance (e.g., what are shared agendas? what are shared exigences?)—what are the implications for rhetoric and performance as a subfield?
	5:00-9:00pm	RSA Picnic Stone Valley Recreation Area
Sunday	9:00-noon	The Future for Rhetoric and Performance As a group, what can we say about rhetoric and performance?—individually, what can each of us contribute?—discussion of future plans: conversations, conferences, publications, etc.
