

The Making and Unmaking of an Urban Diaspora:
the role of the physical environment and materialities in belongingness, displacement and mobilisation in Toxteth, Liverpool

Journal:	Urban Studies
Manuscript ID	CUS-324-19-04.R2
Manuscript Type:	Article
Discipline: Please select a keyword from the following list that best describes the discipline used in your paper.:	Sociology
World Region: Please select the region(s) that best reflect the focus of your paper. Names of individual countries, cities & economic groupings should appear in the title where appropriate.:	Western Europe
Major Topic: Please identify up to 5 topics that best identify the subject of your article.:	Built Environment, Neighbourhood, Redevelopment/Regeneration, Race/Ethnicity
You may add up to 2 further relevant keywords of your choosing below.:	place, materialities

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

1
2
3
4
5 The Making and Unmaking of an Urban Diaspora:
6 the role of the physical environment and materialities in belongingness, displacement
7 and mobilisation in Toxteth, Liverpool
8
9

10
11
12 Abstract
13
14

15 Focusing on Toxteth – a distinct and ethnically diverse locality in Liverpool, UK - this paper
16 explores the (un)making and re-making of diasporic space in different guises by urban diverse
17 communities and the material aspects or fallouts of this for place and identity. Based on 18 extensive ethnographic research, it shows how a series of localised developments - a history of 19 external marginalisation, an urban trauma of rioting, a protracted experience of eviction, 20 various programmes of regeneration, and localised responses to all these - are all inscribed in 21 the physical, as well as cognitive, landscape of the area, both co-creating the boundaries of 22 place, as well as periodically resisting them. The paper suggests that this focus on the physical 23 - the material infrastructures of the area - is especially important in understanding how 24 marginalised urban communities are affected by, and galvanise in response to, change.
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 Key words: materialities, physical environment, landscape, eviction, displacement, Toxteth 35
36

37
38 Introduction
39
40

41 On a summer's day, the first set of recently refurbished houses in a high profile
42 regeneration scheme are being launched in the Welsh Streets area in Toxteth. Standing
43 alongside these newly renovated houses' dilapidated counterparts, the company office
44 is having a visitors' day in the show units where interested prospective tenants can sign
45 up for a rental. Some are previous inhabitants of the area; an elderly couple are 46 admiring the high spec kitchen, while looking out the window towards a boarded-up
47 building across the back garden. 'That's where we used to live', they point. 'We were 48 the last to leave; we didn't want to go. We also had a dog, and where we were told to
49 *go, we could not keep him as it was a flat... We are thinking of coming back; let's see.'*¹
50 Later that week, the local press covered the regeneration of Welsh Streets under the 51 headline 'The Welsh Street residents who can never return home' referring to the high
52 *rental prices and a sense of alienation brought on by gentrification of the area.'*²
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5 This paper focuses on this context of historical and contemporary human and spatial 6 developments in Toxteth, exploring the making and unmaking of an urban diasporic space and 7 its interconnections with the materiality and physicality of the local urban environment. This 8 foregrounding of the local allows for the study of everyday life in marginalised areas where 9 diasporic people live, not just focusing on the diasporic experience, but also incorporating local 10 non-migrants as stakeholders in the making of diasporic space (Brah, 1996; Wacquant, 2008).
11 A people's history of Toxteth would largely be one of a legacy of various flows of international 12 (historical and contemporary) migration into one of the UK's largest port cities (Frost, 1999).
13 The area has a strong identity based on a sense of a tightly-knit community (Heneghan and 14 Wailey, 2015), consolidated in different ways by a series of events and developments which 15 have transformed its physical environment, from high profile riots, to state-led regeneration
16 projects (Jones and Evans, 2008), and, more recently, different kinds of grassroots regeneration
17 activities (Thompson, 2017).
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26

27 The impact of these urban transformations have not been uncontested. Liverpool 8 (L8)
28 – the inner city neighbourhood that became known as Toxteth following the media coverage
29 of the riots in the area in 1981 - has been subjected to 'regeneration' for over thirty years, a 30 process long term residents have called 'degeneration' due to its negative impact on the local 31 area (Frost and Phillips, 2011). This is echoed in our participants' narratives, which suggest 32 that contemporary local belongingness is closely linked to the history of migration into the 33 area, the transformation of the physical environment, the unravelling of home and the 34 dismantling of the community.
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 This paper concentrates on the symbolic importance attached to this history of 42 displacement of part of the local inhabitants, experiences of evictability for others in the 43 framework of state-led regeneration programmes, and the significance that these have for locals'
44 sense of place identity and local mobilisation. As Sassen (2014: 222) maintains, the 'spaces of 45 the expelled' require conceptual scrutiny, best realised by engaging with the political dynamics
46 of 'what is at stake materially' (Tolia-Kelly, 2011: 154). Its findings explore how 47 belongingness, displacement and political engagement with the physical and the material are 48 contingent upon, and further strengthened by, intra-state politics of bordering and place
49 (un)making (Brickell et al., 2017; Van Baar, 2016).
50
51
52
53
54
55

56 While there has been considerable interest in marginalised urban areas and their 57 evolving dynamics over time (e.g. Wacquant, 2008), the different ways diasporic urban 58 inhabitants engage with the physical environments in everyday life and the role landscapes play 59
60

1
2
3 in maintaining and contesting boundaries in the context of mobilisation and solidarity are still 4 underexplored (Brickell et al., 2017). In our participants' narrations of the displacement of their 5 local community, the concept of diaspora is powerfully deployed to signify the emotional and
6 affective responses to eviction, which appear closely linked with subjectivities and the material
7 dynamics of belongingness, displacement and mobilisation in place. This paper therefore 8 argues that, while acknowledging the inherent openness and instability of places (Massey, 9 1994) and the state's role in the advanced marginality of diverse urban areas (Wacquant, 2008),
10 historical accounts and local specificities of the physical environment and material aspects of 11 urban displacement need to be taken seriously.
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21

22 Diasporic space and urban marginality: materialities of belongingness, displacement and 23 mobilisation 24 25

26
27 The concepts of diaspora and diasporic space have generated vast scholarly interest. Yet, 28 research in this area remains focused on specific ethnic groups scattered from a particular 29 nation state and their national belongingness even when their focus is on the local (Cohen and 30 Fischer, 2018). Brah (1996: 181) elaborated the concept of diasporic space as distinct from that 31 of diaspora, emphasising the role of local configurations and that of non-migrant inhabitants.
32 However, the dynamics of diasporic space have not been discussed from a material and 33 physical point of view, even though a focus on the capacity of diasporic groups to enact 34 geographies of displacement has long been advocated for (Vertovec and Cohen, 1999).
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 The now well established body of work on diasporic people's relationship to urban 42 space focuses on themes such as place-making in superdiverse neighbourhoods (Pemberton 43 and Phillimore, 2018), the cognitive aspects of belongingness (Antonsich, 2010), the role of 44 memory in connecting migrants to new spaces (Rishbeth and Powell, 2013) and that of public
45 institutions in creating and maintaining marginality and displacement (Caglar and Glick 46 Schiller, 2018; Wacquant, 2008). Neal et al. (2015) however note that there is still scope within 47 the field to explore the physical and material aspects dynamics of these spaces more. Research
48 could still look more closely at the '... effects of physical environments and material 49 phenomena [...] how they condition, constrain and create opportunities for social and spatial 50 relationships' (Hall, 2013: 12-13).
51
52
53
54
55
56
57

58 This turn to the physical in ethnic and migration studies is relatively recent but has been 59 important in cementing ideas about place which take in the physical and material features of 60

1
2
3 the landscape, and underlining the sensorial aspects of belongingness and place identity (see 4 Darling, 2010; Gustafson, 2001). As Hedetoft (2004: 24) maintains, ‘belonging is rooted in 5 place rather than space, in familiarity, sensual experience, human interaction and local 6 knowledge’.
7
8
9

10 Part of this delayed focus on the physical and the material is, Trudeau (2006) argues, 11 linked to a reluctance to highlight or perpetuate any boundedness in understandings of 12 migration and sense of place, and the significance of social constructionism in the study of 13 ethnic boundaries. Wimmer (2013) suggests that the latter sometimes obscures the sharpness
14 of boundaries and high degrees of social closure that can exist. Other issues are at risk of being 15 neglected too, such as the role of the physical and the material in politics of intra-state bordering 16 practices (Van Baar, 2016) and in evictions and displacement (Brickell et al., 2017).
17
18
19 20
21

22 Furthermore, while understandings of the production of place and landscape (the latter 23 especially defined by its materiality and aesthetics - Cresswell, in Merriman et al., 2008), as 24 linked to the boundedness of urban localities (Trudeau, 2006), are well developed, less is 25 known still about the impact of more formal processes, such as urban planning, on urban 26 displacement and dispersal of marginalised communities and their bottom up responses
27 (Atkinson, 2003). Research into urban space and its transformation tends to not be very 28 inclusive of racial minorities and immigrant-origin communities (Blokland, 2009; Wacquant, 29 2008), ignoring thus their subjectivities and their political and cognitive links with the material
30 space and the physical environment (Tolia-Kelly, 2011).
31
32
33
34
35
36
37

38 Thus, in studies of local diverse communities a detachment of the everydayness from 39 the symbolic and the political – or the personal and intimate aspects of belonging and the 40 politics of belonging (Antonsich, 2010), is still observable (Cahill, 2006; Tolia-Kelly, 2011),
41 even though Trudeau (2006: 423) maintains that, ultimately, ‘belonging necessarily entails
42 bounded classifications of characteristics associated with membership in a polity’.
43
44
45

46 These cross-cutting theoretical ideas have particular relevance to regenerating urban 47 areas. Regeneration has often been used to address issues such as unemployment, 48 discrimination, poor skills, lower incomes, poor housing and bad health, leading to social 49 exclusion (Social Exclusion Unit, 2004). At the same time, regeneration attempts have often 50 also been accompanied by more cautionary tales of initiatives having limited success in serving
51 the needs of disadvantaged local communities (Pemberton, 2006). In the context of diverse
52 local urban areas that undergo regeneration, then, three aspects of place-making are important:
53 first, the extent of territoriality and boundedness as a factor, and result, of external
54 categorisation and local mobilisation (Trudeau, 2006); second, a precarious process of home
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 (un)making which significantly impacts the material and/or the imaginary components of home
4 (Baxter and Brickell, 2014: 134); and third, the political dynamics of local inhabitants'
5 belongingness and engagement with the transformation of their localities (Brickell et al., 2017;
6 Cahill, 2007).
7
8
9

10 The first dimension of boundedness has been highlighted by scholarship on diaspora 11 space that emphasises ghettoization and marginality and practices of intra-state bordering and 12 mobilities of marginalised groups as a result of evictions and removal. Wacquant (2008)
13 analyses historically the non-coincidental formation of the communal ghetto in the mid-14 twentieth century and its transformation into a hyperghetto in the conditions of withdrawal of 15 the welfare state in late 20th century. Van Baar (2016: 214) stresses the 'securitizing, racializing
16 and (often) neoliberal logic' which shapes more recent policies and practices on the ground,
17 and especially in the housing market, resulting in certain (BAME) people left being in a
18 vulnerable state of 'evictability', at risk of removal 'from a sheltering place'. In her investigation
19 of London housing clearances, Perera (2019) underlines the enduring racialised nature and 20 social engineering ambitions of housing policy. The degree and significance of such impacts 21 vary across cases, but as the findings of this research show, there is a cognitive, emotional and 22 political element to these, which is little talked about (Brickell et al., 2017).
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32 Similarly, studies of post-migratory groups and postcolonial culture see memory as 33 constitutive to landscape and materialities as '...points of resistance to exclusive dominant
34 cultures as well as offering points of engagement to an enfranchising idyll located in the past'
35 (Tolia-Kelly, 2004: 290). Studies of regeneration, however, lack a strong focus on historicity, 36 and the impact on population movement and dispersal is not paid sufficient attention (Van 37 Baar, 2016).
38
39
40
41
42

43 Indeed, a temporal dimension of the wounds that evictions cause is largely missing in 44 the literature whilst it is recently recognised that their effects 'hurt, haunt and linger before,
45 during and after their eventuality' (Brickell et al., 2017: 11). Incorporating time arguably
46 enables the researchers to analyse the process of domestic injustice, resistance and subversion
47 in the context of forced evictions and home unmaking (Baxter and Brickell, 2014). The stakes 48 are higher in the local transformation of marginalised communities because of the threat of 49 displacement (Caglar and Glick Schiller, 2018), and the inevitable loss of vital rich networks
50 of social capital (Cahill, 2007). But marginality has also been found to have desolidarizing 51 effects on local communities and local social structures in research that stresses the role of 52 'racially skewed and market-oriented state policies' (Wacquant, 2008: 4).
53
54
55
56
57
58
59

60 This paper argues that more could still be understood about the dynamics of diasporic

1
2
3 space and processes of mobilisation and resistance from the perspective of the local inhabitants,
4 by focusing on their engagement with materialities and the physical environment. Housing and
5 regeneration constitute highly materialised - visible and tangible - issues and processes in the 6 local landscape. The literature on home is useful here for thinking about the multi-scalar
7 implications of these processes such as marginalisation and regeneration, especially those 8 which lead to uprooting people from their homes. Baxter and Brickell (2014: 134) write about 9 home unmaking – ‘a precarious process by which material and/or imaginary components of 10 home are unintentionally or deliberately, temporarily or permanently, divested, damaged or 11 even destroyed’. It is this idea of unmaking and remaking which is particularly relevant for our 12 study here, a population which used its heterogenous diasporic roots to help forge a sense of 13 home within the city, only to face a new kind of displacement or evictability decades later.
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25

26 Toxteth: a distinct locality embedded in a city

27
28

29 Historical accounts point to Liverpool’s status as a global city until early 20th century; Belchem
30 (2006: 14) maintains that ‘gateway to the empire and the new world, Victorian Liverpool was 31 what historical geographers term a “diaspora space”, a contact zone between different ethnic 32 groups with differing needs and intentions as transients, sojourners and settlers’. Its 33 demographic make up was furthermore shaped by particular migratory flows, primarily small 34 continuous drips which contrasted with other migrations that presented themselves as 35 significant waves (Frost, 1999).
36
37
38
39
40

41 However, the city’s diversity and its management were not apolitical; indeed, early 20th
42 century Liverpool is exemplary of the origins of migration management and its politicisation
43 in the UK, alongside strong local politics of difference that led to segregation of visible
44 minorities. The local policies of housing were instrumental in concentrating and ‘containing’
45 the black population in L8, which led to their distinct segregation, even when compared to 46 other black communities in the UK (Murden, 2006: 443).
47
48
49
50

51 L8 has historically consisted of the most diverse area of the city, with racial minority
52 communities dating back more than two and a half centuries, being the oldest in Britain
53 (Costello, 2001). Story-telling in the area indicates how L8 had a distinct history of community
54 and defence organizations (Ackah and Christian, 1997) whilst an important characteristic of 55 local life was the strong street identity, due to their material and sensorial particularities, with 56 Granby Triangle representing the historical focus of the black community (Brown, 2005; 57
58
59
60

1
2
3 Heneghan and Wailey, 2015: 1).

4
5 Early 20th century developments diminished the importance of Liverpool in the global
6 trade, and by the 1960s the city embodied the issues related to post-industrialisation in Britain.
7
8 The 1970s exposed major discrimination that the black community faced; racial prejudice was 9 particularly stark and further exacerbated by the media and police repressive action towards 10 the area, and segregating policies of housing were reflected on the poor social provision and 11 lack of employment opportunities for local inhabitants (Frost and Phillips, 2011; Murden, 12 2006). But despite being described as a melting pot, the resistance against discrimination and 13 segregation in the area was inspired by an identification with the Civil Rights and 'Black Power'
14 movement (Brown, 2005; Heneghan and Wailey, 2015: 8).

15
16
17
18
19
20
21 The significant economic and social problems in the 1970-80s caused by de-
22 industrialisation were felt particularly by the minority communities across the UK, culminating 23 with the 1981 riots in Brixton, Chapelton, Moss Side, and particularly in Liverpool. From a 24 community stance, these uprisings were more than an outburst of the black population as they 25 mobilised local whites and marginalised city dwellers who revolted against authority. Belchem
26 (2006: 53) refers to the riots as '...an indictment of exclusion, deprivation and discrimination'
27 and maintains that the riots were at the basis of a shift of political concern towards urban 28 regeneration, leading to more concerted 'intervention' in the area.

29
30
31
32
33
34 Indeed, historical analyses of regeneration in Toxteth speak about a market- and
35 property-oriented policy led by Urban Development Corporations under Thatcher's 36 government, which cut off the local authorities. The 1980 Local Government, Planning and 37 Land Act allowed for a centralised process, which targeted derelict properties, aiming for a 38 commercial provision of social facilities and housing (Murden, 2006).

39
40
41
42
43 In the contemporary era, Toxteth remains characterised by marginalisation of ethnic 44 minorities, particularly in terms of employment and urban and social mobility. The local 45 population is highly diverse, bringing together white and mixed-heritage inhabitants with long
46 established roots of primarily working class background, black minorities, postcolonial
47 migrants, new migrants and dispersed asylum seekers, and students (Census, 2011; Mcpherson, 48 2014).

Methodology

This paper is based on the project [title of project] funded by the [funding body]. Visual ethnographic research took place in Toxteth, Liverpool in May-October 2015. Qualitative approaches were chosen, since inside perspectives on ‘the everyday reality of the marginal city dweller’ (Wacquant, 2008: 9) and on regeneration (Cahill, 2007) are still limited in the literature. Furthermore, ethnography has a particular value in informing policy on the role of the physical environment and design in ethnic mixing and convivial urban lives (Rishbeth et al., 2018).

Residents from the area were interviewed in order to understand their construction of place identity and the role of the physical environment in their feelings of belongingness. Forty interviews were conducted in Toxteth with 18 British born inhabitants, 14 first-generation migrants of various socio-economic and ethnic background and legal status, and eight key informants. Eight out of 18 of the British-born subsample were White British, the rest included Black, Arab, Pakistani and mixed-raced participants. Migrants held 12 different nationalities, with four of them having naturalised as British, and were equally divided between male and female. The key informants included local authority officials working on urban space issues, migrant community leaders, and charities working on spatial issues in Toxteth.

Despite the heuristic value of the categories we employed for sampling purposes, our research revealed the very limitations of narrow terminologies such as 'migrant', 'non-migrant' and 'first-generation migrant', not least because of the rich historical context of migration into the area. Sampling targets and strategies aimed at including migrant and non-migrant inhabitants, as well as participants with different positionality towards the area, although the findings are non-representative due to small scale of this research. The study is thus a double effort to distance from ‘methodological nationalism’ (Wimmer and Glick Schiller, 2002), by first, intersectionally sampling local inhabitants that are otherwise ‘taxonomically separated by means of the categories of migrants, religious or ethnic minorities, the (working) poor, and “ordinary” citizens’, and second, by taking a local approach and a ‘de-nationalising’ stance to urban displacement (Van Baar, 2016: 226) and the concept of diaspora. A wide array of perspectives from authors from visible minority background, originating from the area and beyond, were also included in the overall paper conceptualisation and data analysis, addressing recent concerns and action to decolonise scholarship and the curriculum.

Research was conducted by two female researchers - white British and white European - who lived in the area at the time of the fieldwork. While the researchers'

1
2
3 whiteness therefore inevitably shaped the unfolding of the research in different ways, their
4 different positions on the insider-outsider continuum helped with fieldwork and data analysis,
5 especially in understanding the fluidity as well as the boundedness of the area. The 6 triangulation of the researchers' perspectives was one aspect of the continuous effort to strike
7 a balance between structural violence and the way it was experienced by our participants, whilst 8 the historical approach to the research made up somewhat for what we lost as relative outsiders.
9 'Hybrid' interviews with key informants, who were also local residents, added to a more
10 nuanced consideration of the impact that racism has had on the formation and transformation 11 of the area.

12
13 The project employed a multi-method approach, including interviews, group
14 discussions, mental maps, (participant) observations and visual methods. All interviews and 15 focus group discussions were audio recorded, except for very few cases in which participants
16 objected to this and handwritten notes were taken.

17
18 Interviews were conducted in different settings, including homes, cafes, venues of 19 organizations and parks. Most interviews included sitting and walking interviews through 20 which participants were invited to take a walk in Toxteth. Walking interviews are increasingly 21 used in research focusing on dwelling and inhabitation of urban space (Myers, 2008); they have 22 also been successfully employed in research conducted with migrants (Rishbeth and Powell, 23 2013). Interviews also involved the drawing of mental maps of participants' daily environment 24 and discussions on the role that physical space plays in their everyday life and feelings of 25 belongingness.

26
27 The integration of visual methods responds to the 'neo-visual' turn in social sciences, 28 which aims at 'producing research markings that are meaningful as they operate against,
29 beyond and more-than text' and are particularly praised for their potential in research on ethnic 30 minorities and landscape (Tolia-Kelly, 2012: 137). Photography involved participants directly 31 as they were asked to take pictures of meaningful places while a walking interview was taking 32 place.

33
34 Furthermore, observations took place in community centres, in ethnic enterprises (e.g.
35 ethnic food shops) and in the premises of any event that involved the inhabitants of Toxteth, 36 such as Granby 4 Streets Market. Interactions with the inhabitants of the area aimed at gaining 37 intimate familiarity with them and insights from these interactions were recorded in the 38 fieldwork diary. Thematic and visual ethnography methods were employed in the data analysis
39 process, which, whilst facilitated through NVivo, was mostly carried out through the means of 40 hard copy transcripts, electronic format of photos and hard and digital copies of mental maps.
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

Making Diasporic Space: Urban place-making and belongingness within the physical environment

... walking up from the docks it's one of the first places that you would arrive to, so you've got St James' Church that was the black church where many, many lives of people in the African diaspora, their births, deaths and marriages, their movement was documented in the church archive there, so I know black Americans come over to this day to find family through St James' Church... (Esme, 50, local and community activist)

Our interviews revealed a long history of the making of a strong sense of diasporic space in Toxteth, manifested in different ways. The storytelling which emerged painted a picture of place proud of its global roots, with a community lifeworld which enlivened the public spaces in the neighbourhood. In various tellings, Toxteth appears as the homeland of diasporans of various origins, colonial and postcolonial, embodying a distinct racial diversity which works as a common and unifying feature for the creation of a strong local community and identity (Wacquant, 2008), reinforced by discrimination that Toxteth residents experienced from the white mainstream (Brown, 2005). Some recollections were nostalgic in their narration of local history; a 70 year old postman, for example, talked about Granby Street in particular:

Everything was happening on the street. And you cannot match those memories. It used to take us 30 mins to say hello to all customers... There was always something going on; in 1971 there were 100 different nationalities in Toxteth.³

43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

The framing of the past is closely linked to a sense of ownership and openness of place as key to community life in Toxteth pre-riots, reflected and enhanced by the independent local amenities on Granby Street, which facilitated the self-contained nature of the area. An informal sense of local autonomy is clear, along with a blurred distinction between the public and the private in people's accounts. There is almost the feeling too that the state's 'abandonment' of the area, along with its external marginalisation, created a sense of social freedom as well as

1
2
3 self-containment. Tegan (22, of British of Caribbean descent) talked about community life in 4 Toxteth pre-riots:
5
6
7

8 Like...my dad tells me when he was younger, they used to just go out onto their front
9 step... Like, his mum, like, in the evening they'd just sit on the front step and they'd 10 all chat to each other...
11
12
13

14
15 Indeed, cognitive borders clearly existed around Toxteth; participants in a community
16 event⁴ spoke how in the 1970s people living in Toxteth would not leave the area as it was not 17 safe, and similarly, people from other places would not come into Toxteth. Importantly, the area
18 was physically marked, by territorial boundaries and landmarks, defined externally by 19 marginalisation and racial violence, and internally through a shared difference, everyday
20 informalities and the bonding that characterised the area (Wacquant, 2008) – a material
21 manifestation of an emergent making of diasporic space. Michael's (40) family has for 22 generations lived in L8; his grandmother was 'half African, half Irish'. He spoke about the 23 tangible, racialised boundaries of the area; the material reference point of the pub, and the 24 spaces which were rendered unavailable beyond:
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 ...the Toxteth sign at the top of Lodge Lane, where the Boundary Pub is and strangely
35 enough, not by definition, but that Boundary Pub used to be the boundary where black
36 people could only go up to and ... The story is that if they went past there, I mean, you 37 were in trouble.
38
39
40
41
42

43 ... black people weren't allowed into the clubs in town [...] all of that socialising in 44 this area started because it had to start, because there was nowhere else for them to go
45 where they would be let in which does, again, hark back to those sort of ... racism being 46 on the statute, to all being part of the culture of the place in a really invidious way (Esme, 47 50)
48
49
50
51
52

53 Photo 1. The Boundary Pub: landmark of boundedness

54
55

56 Participants said they felt like they were in their own town, as if it was walled, paralleling a
57 kind of 'neighbourhood nationalism' attributed to other diverse localities in the UK (Back, 58 1996: 49-72). These quotes show clearly that place identity unfolds not just as an attachment
59
60

1
2
3 to social community, but simultaneously as a connection with the materiality of infrastructure
4 of the area (Burrell, 2016) - the places where childhood memories were made, where games
5 were played, and where nicknames were coined, specific sites which are remembered even 6 after they have disappeared. A community activist, for example, drew the key landmarks on 7 Granby Street when asked to prepare a mental map of his everyday environment and places of 8 significance in Toxteth, including buildings long gone. As Nora (1989: 9) maintains, 'memory
9 is rooted in the concrete, in spaces, gestures, images and objects.'

20 Unmaking Diasporic Space: 'Riots' and Regeneration

21
22
23
24 It was clear in our research that a rich sense of belonging had been built up in the Toxteth area,
25 forming a physical space which people from different backgrounds could invest in. It was also 26 clear though that the integrity of this space had been challenged over time too, rendered
27 vulnerable to processes of home unmaking (Baxter and Brickell, 2014) in various ways. One
28 such force was the riots of 1981, which were recalled as a watershed for the area. As some 29 elderly inhabitants shared, 'the riots destroyed the area, many trees disappeared. Police blocked
30 Catharine Street just as if they were saying "we are not leaving you to the city centre; destroy
31 your own area". New boundaries were drawn again as the aftermath unfolded. 'People
32 identified Toxteth as the place of riots, as a place where Blacks were shooting Whites'.⁵

33
34
35
36 This 'own area' was further reinforced by the arrival of a new post-riot infrastructure
37 of bollards; Hughes (2015) describes the area's 'bollard heritage', surrounding the 'riot hill'
38 corresponding with the heart of Toxteth, while recollecting the presentation of bollards as an 39 anti-riot measure post-1981. These narratives presented the riots as an urban genocide, as the 40 catastrophe that further contested and re-enforced Toxteth's strong local identity. Local identity
41 - or the claim towards being from Toxteth and a real Scouser - from then on became more
42 directly linked to 'having been there for that' (the riots - Clare, 37), as enshrined in local poetry:

43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53 A powerful idea came down the line
54 it landed in Granby
55 shared history was mine.
56 That's why I was there
57
58
59
60 At that point, at that time.' (O' Reilly, 2015)⁶

1
2
3
4
5 The riots, however, were also seen as the ‘beginning’ of a grassroots local movement.
6 Transmitted intergenerationally, this collective urban trauma transformed into an attempt to 7 form a more unifying emblem of mobilisation in the face of further upheaval manifested in 8 new post-riot regeneration efforts. Like the riots, the push for regeneration brought physical 9 change, unsettling, unmaking and remaking diasporic space again. It was deemed so disruptive
10 that it was talked about as a 'displacement', and even as a stealth bordering practice.
11
12
13
14

15 Local writings on the area refer to the riots and the ensuing regeneration programmes
16 as state-led action, dismantling a sense of home and changing the materiality of the area. In 17 particular in the Granby Street and the Granby Triangle, compulsory orders uprooted the black
18 community in an ethnic cleansing fashion (Heneghan and Wailey, 2015: 9), which Lane (1997)
19 compares with that of Highland clearances of several hundreds years ago. Many communities
20 were dispersed from Toxteth because houses were pulled down due to the government's desire
21 to build a circle road in the middle of the city (see Photo 2). Travel infrastructure appears here 22 as integral to a paradoxical agenda for regeneration and improvement of interconnectivity and 23 accessibility, which legitimized the eviction and dispersal of marginalized diverse communities
24 (Atkinson, 2003). In the case of Granby area in Toxteth, these measures were further 25 materialised as a distinct top-down bordering practice, with the closure of the southern entrance
26 of the main shopping street until 1993, cutting this route and its communication with the rest
27 of the city centre (Thompson, 2017).
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 Photo 2. The Welsh Streets

40
41
42
43 Esme (50) talked about this in her interview:
44
45

46 ...the effective displacement of the population who used to live here who were just so 47 upset, because they saw houses they bought, paid for, cared for, looked after and they 48 were forced to leave. They felt they couldn't object to it and then watched them fall to 49 bits over a fourteen year period – then watched public money being spent on renting
50 the tin sheet to seal up the properties and they can't get back in. [...] The thing is loss 51 of the neighbourhood and how it was when they lived amongst people they all knew.
52
53
54
55
56
57

58 Angry local narratives spoke explicitly about a programme of social engineering, 59 emphasizing the state-led regeneration programmes' lack of consideration of human-spatial 60

1
2
3 relations (see Perera, 2019) and emotional identification with the material landscape.
4
5 Regeneration is juxtaposed with ‘redlining’ practices that accentuated further community
6
7 marginalisation, through neglect or cuts in public services such as lighting, cleaning, and 8
9 rubbish collection. In turn, this strong resistance has been a major factor for the stagnation of 10
11 some of the regeneration plans in the area, as Clara (34) a local and community activist said:

12
13 ... there’s streets and streets and streets of this and it’s been left... And some people
14
15 would say, you know, was this part of...? There was lots of social engineering kind of 16
17 70’s and 80’s, people got moved out to places like Skelmersdale: horrific. Sorry, some 18
19 people might not agree with me but, and some people would say that this really is the 20
21 tail end of part of that social engineering... The council wants this area to be gentrified, 22
23 but because they’ve got such a strong community in the area, they haven’t been able to 24
25 get on with gentrifying it.

26
27 Indeed, one of the prevailing narratives of local activism and nostalgia in the area is this explicit 28
29 reference to the people of Granby and other streets that were boarded up and the inhabitants 30
31 that were asked to move away as a diaspora. As Photo 3 below illustrates, absence-presence
32
33 of those uprooted and dispersed is materialized in these sites, and is something historical 34
35 inhabitants are significantly invested in.

36 37 Photo 3. ‘For all those that are gone’: graffiti on Ducie Street

38
39
40
41 Regeneration here then can be understood as a particular kind of ‘regime[s] of dispossession’
42
43 (Brickell et al., 2017: 5) more usually associated with more violent forms of forced evictions.
44
45 While not as extreme as the eviction practices endured by the Roma in different European states
46
47 (van Baar, 2016), or as stigmatized as the most marginalized urban areas in the US and France
48
49 (Waquant, 2008), a process of securitization was clearly at work, forcefully moving those who 50
51 were ultimately deemed to be evictable away from their homes, a practice van Baar (2016: 226)
52
53 describes as ‘anchored in processes of neoliberalization’, and which ironically created a new 54
55 urban diaspora population, and physical environment, in the process.

56
57 Different inhabitants have reacted differently to these changes over time. Local spatial 58
59 wounds legitimate a claim for belongingness, which is seen as exclusive to the inhabitants who 60
61 have experienced loss of homes, or were battered by the state policies of housing and 62
63 regeneration but decided to stay put, solidifying a sense of local solidarity. By contrast, young

1
2
3 and highly mobile inhabitants in the area who do not share the memories of riots and the spirit
4 of activism relate to the boarded up areas differently, thinking more about the aesthetics than 5 the history, and showing that belongingness to urban space is closely linked to participants'
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

and highly mobile inhabitants in the area who do not share the memories of riots and the spirit of activism relate to the boarded up areas differently, thinking more about the aesthetics than the history, and showing that belongingness to urban space is closely linked to participants' positionality:

Paul (23): I really like them... Just because there is no one there. It is stuff like, because there is no one there but you have stuff like, it feels like there are still people saying stuff, and everything has beauty on it.

As Wimmer (2013: 13) puts it, 'the social closure generated by categorical and network boundaries is often the basic consensus among old timers in urban diverse localities', but our participants stressed also the relevance of the physical and the material in this social closure. In particular, contested sites such as the Welsh Streets appear to have created sharper boundaries. Nina Edge, the leader of the Welsh Streets Group⁷ living in the area explained that in the period of 2004-15 the area had been under the threat of demolition of 480 houses, but consistent lobbying and campaigning from the local residents forced the change of that decision into another that allowed for the repair of the houses to take place. These, however, are only tiny pockets of successful resistance compared to what has been lost in terms of community, wellbeing and housing resources.

State-led regeneration interventions have been widely critiqued for not fully recognising the complexity of socio-spatial processes and the contribution residents make in constructing place as a site of meaning (Pemberton, 2006) – and regeneration in Toxteth is a significant example of that. Jane (54) who moved to Liverpool from London in the 1980s, links state-led regeneration with a perceived aversion from the state towards social and ethnic diversity, which the area distinctly represents:

... ethnic and social cleansing by the city council, which has been going on for thirty years ... They want to get rid of the poor people and the ethnic minorities [...] That is just criminal vandalism you could call it; civic vandalism.

Thus, a sense of 'raced' neo-liberalism is part of the key informants' recollection of the transformation of the area, which, on the one hand, served to depoliticise the broader issues of marginalisation of the minorities and localities that hosted diverse communities, and on the other, aimed to securitise and manage their urban presence, testifying to complex material

1
2
3 geographies of evictions and displacements (Brickell et al., 2017). Articulated as ethnic and
4 social cleansing, expressed through state-led regeneration programmes that led to the emptying
5 and dilapidation of whole streets, this awareness permeates the notion of the collective and the 6 process of place (re)making in the area.
7
8
9

10 11 12 13 Re-making Diasporic Space: Mobilisation, grassroots regeneration and transformation 14 of the physical environment 15 16

17
18 The same emphasis on the built environment offers a forum for resistance and grassroots
19 activism that focuses on the physical surroundings and connects people with them. Insider 20 perspectives indeed offer a narrative of resistance as based on memory and as rooted in the 21 landscape. Long-term residents appear to have been in a state of dwelling and grieving and yet 22 recollecting past and present, while a huge scar in their life history materialised in the 23 abandoned and boarded up streets and lifeless homes, does heal.
24
25
26
27
28

29 Community activists see the places that have been left to go derelict as an everyday
30 communication of (lack of) public regard towards the area, or as ‘managed decline’. Poetry
31 read out in community events⁸ refers to the ‘weak floor boards’ that strengthened people’s 32 belongingness to Toxteth and Granby. The state of the physical environment and housing
33 appear as a major cause for a collective sense of suspicion (Brickell et al., 2017), but also as a 34 major cause to unite against ‘those who know the best way for us to live...’, as ‘community is 35 one thing they (politicians) cannot take from us’ (Tilly, 2015)⁹. Similarly to Gidley (2013: 364), 36 therefore, urban affective geographies appear to have ‘the physical landscape as a ground for 37 belonging’.
38
39
40
41
42
43

44 As Thompson (2015: 1024) has revealed, the community’s mobilisation led to the 45 creation of the Granby Community Land Trust – a local political institution that emerged as 46 the culmination of a distinct grassroots activism and practices of ‘commoning’. The CLT
47 manages some of the local activities that impact on the physical environment and works
48 collaboratively with Assemble¹⁰ on the regeneration of Granby Triangle. Memories of loss of 49 community life appear at the basis of everyday local politics (Blokland, 2009) and underpin
50 the purposeful human-material interaction in the area, as pinpointed in the interview with the 51 Assemble representative:
52
53
54
55
56
57

58
59
60 ... it’s devastating when you think about it properly, like, what’s gone on ... So yeah,

1
2
3 just to be mindful of that fact because it's all very hopeful and it's positive what's 4 happening now, but there's been a huge and terrible loss to so many people and I think
5 it's important to respect that. [...] There's these spaces that can act as reminders of the 6 history of what has happened so that it's not, you know, it's not just plaster boarding 7 up everything, but it's trying to inhabit the spaces that are created by what has 8 happened...
9

10
11
12
13
14
15 In Toxteth, therefore, these landscapes are both the sites and outcomes of community's 16 activism as well as the backdrop of the longed-for home of the urban diaspora. As the 17 representative of Assemble showed, one of the former dilapidated houses is to be kept as it is,
18 now as part of remembrance of spatial wounds imposed on the community. This house is only 19 minimally renovated to serve as a community-owned winter garden¹¹ – for the locals and also 20 for the tourists wishing to visit the area. Thus, landscape in the area appears '...as a contrived
21 scene, provides a powerful means for bounding places and enforcing particular ideas about 22 belonging to a polity and its embodied spaces' (Trudeau, 2006: 422).
23
24
25
26
27
28
29

30 31 Photo 4. The Winter Garden: symbol of remembrance and continuation

32
33
34 Apart from the intergenerational transmission of threads of local narratives, community 35 history and personal biographies are also part of a consciousness among migrants that have 36 moved into the area. A certain order of priority of belongingness and stake in the housing
37 market based on this personal connection is endorsed by them as 'outsiders'. As Stevan (39)
38 who moved to Liverpool from Slovakia 8 years ago and lives in Toxteth with his British partner, 39 shared:
40
41
42
43
44
45

46 Recently I met someone who was born in Granby, and now he lives in L17 and he 47 would like to move back to Beaconsfield Street ... he was on the housing association, 48 but he got replied that he wasn't eligible, he's not a priority, a housing priority, which 49 is a shame because ... there should be certain houses that should be given to people
50 who used to live there.
51
52
53
54
55

56 Nostalgia, therefore, is interwoven with dynamics of mobilization (Blokland, 2009), calling
57 upon a physical and social past that is no more on the one hand, while entangled in today's 58 concerns of equality, social distribution and urban change on the other (Brickell et al., 2017).
59
60

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Grassroots regeneration action and its direct engagement with the physical environment and materialities appear to ensure some continuation in this fragmented human-spatial scenario, through moving on from the breakdown of the community after the riots and the onset of state-led regeneration. In the words of Chris (22, local community activist),

This is what I feel like L8 is. It's all about changing the tides about what Toxteth, what happened in Toxteth all those years ago, and there are so many people really trying hard to get away from it.

The Blooming Triangle is one example of this; Victoria (60) narrated how eight local women resisted the threat of demolition together, by cleaning and beautifying the space. Belongingness to the local area post-riots was indeed a territorialised politics of belonging in response to the state-led regeneration adversities at grassroots level (Trudeau, 2006: 421). As Yvonne (community activist) put it: 'Battling dereliction and demolition made the community stronger. We saved the streets. People are coming back now'.

Photo 5. Granby 4 Streets planting project: resistance and regeneration from below

However, some hierarchies and fractures are noticeable in the community, in the form of polarization from below (Wacquant, 2008), with different lobbies branding certain parts of the area and competing with others on their approaches and legitimacy of their actions (Brickell et al., 2017). While the long-term inhabitants relate to the landscape through nostalgia for times past and the wounded physical environment as a site of resistance, the newer residents see the inhabitation of run down houses as a pathway to better social housing, suggesting 'opposing ethical perspectives on rights to place' (Thompson, 2015: 1036). As Yvette (48) commented on the impact of the Pathfinder Scheme of Regeneration that was applied in the area:

Well, there was this government idea that in the North there were all these rows of terraced houses, that nobody wanted them anymore so they were all going to go. And then you get situations like the Welsh Streets where it is so divided; there are those people who are fighting tooth and nail to keep them, and then the others who are saying "no, give me a new house with a nice garden, please".

1
2
3 Therefore, the grassroots practices and the inevitable human power relations they entail
4 instigate and result in intersecting boundary making. However, the narratives that serve to 5 maintain the community and define criteria for belongingness, the alienation of some of the 6 newer inhabitants and the lack of engagement of others, reflect more broadly the effects of 7 disinvestment and a sense of dis-enfranchisement as a result of it (Cahill, 2007; Wacquant, 8 2008).

17 Discussion and conclusions

20 Our analysis parallels writings on marginalised areas that change their make up and dynamics
21 over time alongside institutional ethno-racial control and withdrawal of the welfare state
22 (Wacquant, 2008). However, evidence of mobilisation and re-making of diasporic space and 23 the role of the material and the physical environment are more in line with recent writings on 24 the links between ‘bodies, spaces and livelihoods’ in the context of marginalisation and 25 resistance (Brickell et al., 2017). Within the framework of the limited studies of the material
26 geographies of diverse urban localities, the study speaks to the material as not ethnically 27 appropriated, but indeed linked to the long histories of pluralised mobility that characterised 28 the area (McFarlane, 2011: 666). In contrast with research that has emphasised the negative 29 impact of state’s market-oriented policies and its abandonment and lack of appropriation of the 30 physical environment in marginalised areas, and the territorial stigmatisation and dispersal of 31 the urban poor (Sassen, 2014; Wacquant, 2008), our research demonstrates the very same has 32 propelled local mobilisation and the re-making of diasporic space in Toxteth.

33
34 Venn (2006: 44-45) maintains, in order to study the new forms of diasporic 35 cosmopolitan socialities in urban areas, we need a shift ‘onto the importance of spatiality and 36 temporality, [...] the imbrication of memory and history in the objects and environments that 37 constitute the lifeworlds of people and the investments that one makes in the material world’.
38 The findings show that in this case-study it is place itself, and all its symbolic and sensorial 39 characteristics, which frame its boundedness in the individual and collective cognition of the 40 inhabitants of the area, rather than ethnicity.

41
42
43 However, boundary making and bordering are also processes that marginalized 44 communities are invested and engaged in; in opposing external marginalization pre-riots and 45 practices of displacement employed at national and city levels, the internal narratives of 46 community and resistance are a translation of belongingness and threat as a result of 47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 disadvantage and disinvestment into a unifying emblem of mobilisation. Mobilisation and
4 resistance can thus be interpreted as an important form of political boundary making and
5 bordering in the face of evictability, whether that be from marginalised communities
6 themselves, or the different space making actors and lobby groups in these areas who have 7 emerged as stakeholders and agents within the framework of neoliberal urban policies. It is 8 then not only possible, but important, to consider the space of evictions ‘as an embodied site
9 of care, resistance and subversion’ (Brickell et al., 2017: 3).

10
11
12
13
14
15 Forms of community-based regeneration also offer important examples of an urban 16 politics of resistance and the re-making of diasporic space against the effect of top-down
17 homogenisation of regeneration, despite scepticism expressed by different lobbies (Thompson, 18 2017). The findings thus concur with recent writings on agency and mobilisation in the context
19 of urban marginality (Caglar and Glick Schiller, 2018; Hall, 2018) which has been missing in 20 analyses of marginality and urban ghettos (Wacquant, 2008). In all of these cases, the 21 infrastructures of place-making appear as both key to the processes of intra-state bordering
22 perpetuated by the state, but also as a meaningful anchoring point for the locals engagement
23 with and mobilisation in the making of diasporic urban space.
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

References

- Ackah, W. and Christian, M. (eds.) (1997). Black Organizations and Identity in Liverpool: a Local, National and Global Perspective. Liverpool: Charles Wootton College Press.
- Atkinson R (2003) Introduction: misunderstood saviour or vengeful wrecker? The many meanings and problems of gentrification. Urban Studies 40(12): 2343-2350.
- Back L (1996) New Ethnicities and Urban Cultures. London: UCL
- Baxter R and Brickell K (2014) For home (un)making. Home cultures, 11(2): 133-143.
- Belchem J (2006) Celebrating Liverpool. In: Belchem J.(Ed): Liverpool 800: Culture, Character and History. pp. 9-58. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.
- Blokland T (2009) Celebrating local histories and defining neighbourhood communities: place-making in a gentrified neighbourhood. Urban Studies 46(8): 1593-1610.
- Brah A (1996) Cartographies of Diaspora: Contesting Identities. London: Routledge.
- Brown JN (2005) Dropping anchor, setting sail: geographies of race in Black Liverpool. Princeton University Press, Princeton NJ.
- Brickell K, Arrigoitia MF and Vasudevan A (2017) Geographies of forced eviction: Dispossession, violence, resistance. In Brickell K, Arrigoitia MF and Vasudevan A (Eds), Geographies of forced eviction (pp. 1-23). Palgrave Macmillan, London.
- Burrell K (2016) Lost in the 'churn'? Locating neighbourliness in a transient neighbourhood. Environment and Planning A 48(8): 1599-1616.
- Caglar A and Glick Schiller N (2018) Migrants and City-Making: Dispossession, Displacement, and Urban Regeneration. London: Duke University Press.
- Cahill C (2007) Negotiating grit and glamour: young women of color and the gentrification of the Lower East Side. City and Society 19(2): 202-231.
- Cohen R and Fischer C (Eds.) Routledge Handbook of Diaspora Studies. London: Routledge.
- Costello R (2001) Black Liverpool: The Early History of Britain's oldest Black Community 1730-1918. Liverpool: Picton Press.
- Darling J (2010) A city of sanctuary: the relational re-imagining of Sheffield's asylum politics. Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers 35(1): 125-140.
- Frost D (1999) Work and Community among West African Migrant Workers since the Nineteenth Century. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.
- Frost D and Phillips R (2011) (Eds.). Liverpool '81: Remembering the Toxteth Riots. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.
- Gustafson P (2001) Meanings of place: everyday experience and theoretical conceptualizations. Journal of Environmental Psychology 21(1): 5-16.

- 1
2
3 Hall SM (2013) Super-diverse street: a 'trans-ethnography' across migrant localities. Ethnic
4 and Racial Studies 38(1): 22-37.
5
6 Hall, SM (2018) Migrant margins: the streetlife of discrimination. The Sociological Review
7 66(5): 968-983.
8
9 Hedetoft U (2004) Discourses and images of belonging: Migrants between new racism, liberal 10 nationalism and globalisation. In: Christiansen F and Hedetoft U (Eds): The Politics of 11 Multiple Belonging. Ethnicity and Nationalism in Europe and East Asia, pp. 23–43, 12 Ashgate Publishing Limited.
13
14 Heneghan M and Wailey T (2015) Introduction. In: Heneghan M and Wailey T (Eds): What's 15 Your Granby Story?, pp. 1-11, Writing on the Wall. Liverpool: Kuumba Imani
16 Millenium Centre.
17
18 Hughes R (2015) The bollards of Liverpool 8. A Sense of Place. Available at:
19 <https://asenseofplace.com/2015/04/25/the-bollards-of-liverpool-8-2/>. Accessed on 1
20 April 2019.
21
22 Jones P and Evans J (2008) Urban regeneration in the UK: Theory and practice. London: Sage 23 Publications.
24
25 Massey D (1994) Space, Place and Gender. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota.
26
27 McFarlane C (2011) The city as assemblage: dwelling and urban space. Environment and 28 Planning D: Society and Space 29(4): 649-671.
29
30 Mcpherson P (2014) People seeking asylum and refugees in Liverpool – needs assessment.
31 Liverpool City Council Liverpool. Available at: http://www.cph.org.uk/wp-
32 content/uploads/2014/11/Needs-assessment-of-asylum-seekers-Liverpool-for-JCG.pdf
33 Accessed on 25 March 2019.
34
35 Merriman P, Revill G, Cresswell T, Lorimer H, Matless D, Rose G and Wylie J (2008)
36 Landscape, mobility, practice. Social and Cultural Geography 9(2): 191-212.
37
38 Murden J (2006) City of change and challenge: Liverpool since 1945. In: Belchem J (Ed):
39 Liverpool 800: Culture, Character and History, pp. 393-485, Liverpool: Liverpool
40 University Press.
41
42 Myers M (2008) Situations for living: performing emplacement. Research in Drama Education
43 13(1): 171-180.
44
45 Neal S, Bennett K, Jones H, Cochrane A and Mohan G (2015) Multiculture and public parks:
46 researching super-diversity and attachment in public green space. Population, Space
47 and Place 21(5): 463-475.
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Nora P (1989) Between Memory and History: Les Lieux de Memoire. Representations 26: 7-4 24.
5
6 Lane T (1997) Liverpool: City of the Sea. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.
7
8 Pemberton S (2006) Skills to deliver regeneration: building and releasing capacity in the 9 context of Egan: evidence from Merseyside. Planning, Practice and Research 21(2): 10 267-279.
11
12 Pemberton S and Phillimore J (2018) Migrant place-making in super-diverse neighbourhoods:
13 moving beyond ethno-national approaches. Urban Studies 55(4): 733-750.
14
15 Perera J (2019) The London clearances: Race, housing and policing, The Institute of Race
16 Relations, London.
17
18 Rishbeth C and Powell M (2013) Place Attachment and Memory: Landscapes of Belonging as 19 Experienced Post-migration. Landscape Research 38(2): 160-178.
20
21 Rishbeth C, Ganji F and Vodicka G (2018) Ethnographic understandings of ethnically 22 diverse neighbourhoods to inform urban design practice. Local Environment: The 23 International Journal of Justice and Sustainability 23(1): 36-53.
24
25 Sassen S (2014) Expulsions: Brutality and complexity in the global economy. Cambridge, MA:
26 Harvard University Press.
27
28 Thompson M (2015) Between boundaries: from commoning and guerrilla gardening to 29 Community Land Trust Development in Liverpool. Antipode 47(4): 1021-1042.
30
31 Thompson M (2017) LIFE in a ZOO: Henri Lefebvre and the (social) production of (abstract)
32 space in Liverpool. City 21(2): 104-126.
33
34 Tolia-Kelly D (2004) Landscape, race and memory: biographical mapping of the routes of 35 British Asian landscape values. Landscape Research 29(3): 277-292.
36
37 Tolia-Kelly D (2011) The geographies of cultural geography III: material geographies, vibrant
38 matters and risking surface geographies. Progress in Human Geography 37(1): 153-39 160.
40
41 Tolia-Kelly D (2012) The geographies of cultural geography II: visual culture. Progress in 42 Human Geography 36(1): 135-142.
43
44 Trudeau D (2006) Politics of belonging in the construction of landscapes place-making,
45 boundary-drawing and exclusion. Cultural Geographies 13(3): 421-443.
46
47 Van Baar H (2016) Evictability and the biopolitical bordering of Europe. Antipode 49(1): 212-48 230.
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2
3 Venn C (2006) The city as assemblage: diasporic cultures, postmodern spaces, and biopolitics.
4
5 In: Berking S, Frank L, Freers L, Low M, Steets S and Stoetzer S (Eds): Negotiating
6
7 Urban Conflicts: Interaction, Space and Control, pp. 41-52, London: Transaction.
8
9 Vertovec S and Cohen R (1999) (Eds) Migration, Diaspora and Transnationalism.
10
11 Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
12
13 Wacquant L (2008) Urban outcasts: A comparative sociology of advanced marginality.
14
15 Cambridge: Polity.
16
17 Wimmer A and Glick Schiller N (2002) Methodological nationalism and beyond: nation-state
18
19 building, migration and the social sciences. Global Networks 2(4): 301–34.
20
21 Wimmer A (2013) Ethnic Boundary Making: Institutions, Power, Networks. Oxford: Oxford 22
23 University Press.
24

25 ¹ Field observation on the 12th of August 2017 on Voelas Street, Liverpool.

26 ² <https://confidentials.com/liverpool/the-welsh-streets-residents-who-can-never-return-home>

27 ³ fieldnotes from ‘L8 Revisited with Tricia Porter’ The Blue Coat, 18 June 2015

28 ⁴ <http://www.thebluecoat.org.uk/events/view/events/2934>

29 ⁵ fieldnotes from ‘L8 Revisited with Tricia Porter’ The Blue Coat, 18 June 2015

30 ⁶ <http://www.thebluecoat.org.uk/events/view/events/2934>

31 ⁷ fieldnotes from ‘L8 Revisited with Tricia Porter’ The Blue Coat, 18 June 2015

32 ⁸ <http://www.thebluecoat.org.uk/events/view/events/2934>

33 ⁹ Maria O’Reilly, ‘Granby’ in ‘What’s your Granby Story?’, page 23

34 ¹⁰ <https://www.welshstreets.co.uk/>

35 ¹¹ Poetry read by Curtis Watt at Granby Street and Ducie Street as part of the WOW Festival, 36
37 2 May 2015.

38 ¹² Hazel Tilly in What’s your Granby Story (Heneghan and Wiley 2015)

39 ¹³ <https://assemblestudio.co.uk/about>

40 ¹⁴ Launched on the 20th of March 2019, on 37 Cairns Street, L8 2UW

Photo 1. The Boundary Pub: landmark of boundedness

Photo 2: The Welsh Streets

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Photo 3: 'For all those that are gone': graffiti on Ducie Street

Photo 4: The Winter Garden: symbol of remembrance and continuation

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19 20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Photo 5: Granby 4 Streets planting project: resistance and regeneration from below