New Traces of Pre-Historic Man Found In Columbia River Basin—Army Tackles Noise

By PAUL I. ELLIS
 United Press Science Writer

NEW YORK, Dec. 4.—The progress of science in the past few years has been marked by the discovery of many traces of pre-historic man.

These traces were found in the Columbia River Basin during a survey of lands to be flooded by 14 proposed dams. At least 120 sites containing remains of pre-historic and early historic Indian settlements were found.

The excavations at these sites were made by the Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of the project. The sites are scattered over a wide area of the Columbia basin. Some of the sites are of the type known as "shell middens," which are the remains of pre-historic man's food and refuse.

The survey was conducted by the River Basin Survey of the Army Corps of Engineers, which is headed by Dr. Frank H. H. Roberts, Jr., a geologist with the National Geographic Society.

Scientists of the Army Corps of Engineers are now studying the remains of pre-historic man found in the Columbia River Basin. The remains include bones, tools, and other objects. The remains are being studied to determine the habits and customs of pre-historic man.

The Army Corps of Engineers is also studying the noise problem in the Columbia River Basin. The noise is caused by the operation of the dams. The noise is a serious problem for the people living in the basin. The Army Corps of Engineers is studying the noise problem to determine the best way to reduce the noise.

NOTICE

Mr. Grant C. Cannon, Field Examiner for the National Labor Relations Board, has informed the officers of the United Kentucky Lake Stove Workers Union that the name of their Union will not appear on the ballot at the election to be held at the Murray Manufacturing Company on December 10, for the selection of a bargaining agent for the employe of the Murray Plant.

According to Mr. Cannon, the name of the local or independent union was omitted from the ballot because the National Labor Relations Board did not receive the code number assigned to the union by the Labor Department by December 1.

At the time the independent union was formed, which was very recently, all details relating to the forming of the independent union and compliance with Federal Regulations were carefully observed, and it was known by all concerned that a letter of compliance and the assignment of a code number would have to be issued by the Department of Labor. The members of the independent union, however, were led to believe that they would have sufficient time to secure this letter and code number. Therefore, the date for the election, December 10, was set by agreement, and the independent union made formal application to the Department of Labor for the letter of compliance and code number. This was on November 22, and eight days thereafter, December 1, Mr. Cannon informed the officers of the independent union that it did not receive the number by the time the office closed. He would order the printing of the ballots and the name of the local independent union would be omitted therefrom. Eight days was obviously insufficient time to secure the Code number from the Department of Labor.

Through no fault of its own, the independent union is omitted from the ballot, and the unfair manner in which this situation developed is of deep concern to local workers.

The action of the Representative of the National Labor Relations Board in omitting the name of the independent union from the ballot, presents an issue of an A. F. of L. Union or no union at all, as the voting will be a "yes or no" affair.

A RICH GIRL

BY MARGARETTA BRUCKER

Illustration of a woman's face.

A chance encounter brings together Michele (Mickey) Ryan, rich Detroit society girl, and Peter Standish, poor young lawyer. He thinks she is a working girl and, when he says he hates the rich, she dares not tell him who she is, telling him instead that her name is Mickey Brooks. They are strongly attracted to each other and, as Mickey returns to the home of her wealthy Aunt Henrietta, with whom she lives, she wonders whether she has fallen in love. She's engaged to William Wayne, polo-playing idler, but does not love him and knows that he's marrying her for her money. She feels envious of her maid, Mary, who's engaged to a man she loves—the chauffeur, Dan Bowen (whose name Mickey's aunt has changed to Maurice). When she meets Peter again, he impulsively proposes to her, but then says ruefully that he hasn't enough money to get married. Meanwhile, she has decided to try to get a job. Peter says he knows "where" she needs an assistant in her interior-decorating shop and takes Mickey there. To her dismay, she finds it's the shop of her best friend, Rosamond Wilson.

CHAPTER VII

AFTER one look at Rosamond's shop, Mickey y turned and dived back into the taxi. She couldn't go into that shop and ask Rosamond for a job! If she did, Peter would discover that she was not Mickey Brooks, working girl, but Michele Ryan, rich society girl. He would despise her for deceiving him, for making him ridiculous. And she couldn't lose Peter. She loved him—wildly, unreasonably. "Mickey!" Peter swung into the taxi beside her. "What's wrong?" "I—I suddenly don't feel well," she stammered. He looked concerned. "Oh, I'm sorry. I think I'd better wait until some other time to see about the job."

"Well—all right, I'll phone Miss Wilson, the owner of the shop, and tell her about you. Then you can come to see her when you're feeling better."

"Yes—I want to go home now." "Where shall I tell the driver to go?" Peter asked.

"Mickey thought quickly. She couldn't tell him her real address. The Y.W.C.A.," she said.

WHEN they reached the Y.W.C.A., she told Peter goodbye, then walked through the building, and left it by a side exit. She hailed another taxi and climbed in. As she headed homeward, she debated what to do. She decided she would have to confide in Rosamond—tell her the whole story and persuade her to give her the job that Peter was so eager for her to have. Rosamond, she felt sure, would cooperate—wouldn't give her away.

She leaned her head back against the taxi seat and thought of Peter's impulsive proposal. Did he mean it? Marriage to Peter. That was what she wanted—to belong to him. But he wouldn't marry her without enough money to support her—and she dared not tell him that she was rich. Perhaps, though, before he went into the Army, he would feel differently—and if she got the job with Rosamond, he would have the assurance that she could take care of herself while he was away.

Well, in any case, there was one thing she must do at the first opportunity—she must break her engagement to William. She was going to a dinner dance with him tonight. Maybe she could find an opportunity this evening to tell him that she did not love him. Then she remembered uneasily that love had never entered into their engagement. William probably didn't care whether or not she loved him. All he wanted was her money. . . .
