Abstract

This study attempts to build the Islamic leadership potential of groups of students by getting them to watch videos related to Sarah Yasin throughout the semester. Based on the work of Argyris, it is argued that developing leaders requires double-loop learning. Delahaye called this questioning "paradynamic assumptions". In this study, internalising the paradynamic assumptions of the Qur'an is called Qur'anic thinking To develop Muslim leaders, it is assumed that by studying Sarah Yasin, one can develop Qur'anic thinking This will lead to a growth-mindset, new assumptions about the knowledge of leadership and a new behaviour. To test this assumption, an action research approach was used with two groups of students at the International Islamic University Malaysia. Participants were asked to watch videos related to Sarah Yasin throughout the semester. Sarah Yasin was used because it encapsulates Qur'anic thinking These two experiments seemed successful and the lessons related to the experiments are explored.
