The Yankee Silversmith

THE FORMING of silverware was the first of the arts to be practiced in America, and the Yankee silversmiths were the aristocrats of craftsmen. They were economically comfortable and each had time and money to devote his best efforts to his calling. Actually, they were more than craftsmen, for their work called for the handling of family money and treasures.

Because of prevalent thievery, as well as the unsettled conditions of the 1700's, prudent people would have their silver coins converted into knives, forks, spoons, tea pots, vases, bowls, and other items for gracing the table. Should these be stolen they were easily identifiable, as they carried the maker's mark. In those days, too, it was no disgrace to use silverware as a medium of exchange or security for a loan.

While silverware was manufactured throughout New England, from whence came all silver designs, the greatest concentration was in Connecticut. As near as can be determined from available records the first silversmith in Wallingford was a Cornelius Munson, born here in 1742. He was a Tory, however, and presumably died in the British Army, as there is no record of his death. Perhaps the most noted craftsman in this area was Abel Buell, also born in 1742, who became a silversmith, engraver and typographer. His area of operations extended between New Haven and Hartford.

There were many Yankee silversmiths, each operating his own establishment. They travelled extensively through New England to sell their wares, which were much preferred to the pewter and Britannia of the era. At the same time, they would buy unwanted pieces of silver for conversion into new designs for resale.

These early American designs were characterized by beauty of form and proportion and a severe simplicity that reflected the temperament of the people and the rigors of pioneering, the lack of facilities for making elaborate designs, and the limited market for expensive ornate pieces.

The entire craft was revolutionized just before the middle of the last century when silver plating was perfected, and mass production was introduced. Eventually Wallingford, Meriden and other cities and towns in the area became the center of the silver plating industry.

Although much hand work has been eliminated in the production of fine silverware, yet today skilled artisans are still essential to the industry, and the modern Yankee silversmith commands the same high respect he held over 200 years ago.
